The Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels presents:

- nearly 200 in-depth articles
- hundreds of cross-references
- extensive bibliographies
- subject index
- Gospel Scripture index
- many topics not found even in multivolume Bible encyclopedias
- Bible-encyclopedia-length articles on subjects related to Jesus and the Gospels
- the contributions of over ninety evangelical scholars from North America, the United Kingdom, Europe and Australia

This reference work will be of use to scholars, pastors and students of the Bible for years to come. In one volume it summarizes the best in evangelical scholarship in light of the many modern challenges facing Jesus studies.

Editors:

Joel B. Green (Ph.D.) is professor of New Testament interpretation and director of Greek studies at Asbury Theological Seminary in Wilmore, Kentucky. He is the author of How to Read the Gospels and Acts and The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation of the Passion Narratives, and coauthor with Mark Baker of Recovering the Scandal of the Cross.

Scot McKnight (Ph.D.) is professor of biblical and theological studies and chair of the department at North Park University in Chicago. He is general editor of Guides to New Testament Exegesis and wrote Interpreting the Synoptic Gospels in that series. He is also the author of A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period.
Consulting Editor:

universities and colleges throughout Great Britain, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. Website: www.ucf.org.uk.

USA ISBN 978-0-8308-1777-1

Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-8308-1777-8

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.
InterVarsity Press

Executive Director
Kenneth DeRuiter

Editorial Staff

Editorial Director
Andrew T. Le Peau

Reference Book Editor and Project Editor
Daniel G. Reid, Ph.D.

Managing Editor
James Hoover

Editorial Assistants
Dorothy Bowman, Kathleen Carlson,
Gloria Duncan, Rhonda Skinner
Cynthia Bunch, Cynthia Reid

Proofreader
Robin Sheffield
Production Staff

Production Manager
Nancy Fox

Production Coordinator
Deborah Keiser

Design
Kathy Lay Burrows

Design Assistant
Amy Munroe

Typesetters
Marjorie Sire, Gail Munroe

Programming Consultant
Richard E. Ecker
Contents

Preface

How to Use This Dictionary

Abbreviations

Transliterations

List of Contributors

Dictionary Articles

Gospel Reference Index

Subject Index

Articles Index
Preface

We live in the Age of Information. This is no less true today for students of the New Testament who are inundated with a virtual flood of research on Jesus and the Gospels. How can those in professional ministry, leaders in local churches and other Christian organizations, seminarians, even academic scholars, stay abreast of fresh studies of Jesus and the Gospels?

In the last thirty years new methodologies and approaches have been championed, some becoming commonplace. Older viewpoints have been transformed, some overturned, others confirmed. Unfortunately, while these new studies have helped us appreciate better the perspectives of the Gospel Evangelists and brought into sharper relief the challenge of the life and message of Jesus, they have also grown more numerous and technical. How can the fruit of vital study of Jesus and the Gospels in recent years reach the front lines of ministry and life together in our communities of faith?

At the same time, New Testament scholarship informed by classical Christian faith has more and more entered the discourse on Jesus and the Gospels. A growing body of evangelical scholars have begun engaging the academic community in stimulating ways. Regrettably, while the general populace on both sides of the Atlantic have been exposed to the sensationalism of such projects as the Jesus Seminar and Jesus: The Evidence, no major undertaking has made available to the larger church the representative scholarship of students of Jesus and the Gospels which is both critically responsible and theologically evangelical.

The Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels has been prepared to meet such needs as these. For students it provides introductory discussions and comprehensive surveys. For pastors and teachers it provides reliable and readable information. For theologians and biblical scholars it provides up-to-date reviews.

Because of its narrow focus on Jesus and the Gospels, the Dictionary consists of fewer entries than other one-volume dictionaries. In selecting topics it was decided that subjects that would be handled adequately in a one-volume Bible dictionary would not be included in the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels. The goal was to provide greater depth of coverage and concentration than would normally be available.

Articles in the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels treat questions arising from the Gospels themselves, longstanding traditions of interpretation of Jesus and the Gospels, significant background issues, and the range of methodological approaches used in Gospels study today. These essays concentrate on Jesus and the Gospels, limiting their discussions to the needs of those who study, teach and expound the Gospels. To be both evangelical and critical at the same time has been the object of the Dictionary. Its contributors, all representative of contemporary evangelicalism, have attempted to portray a range of interpretive alternatives in their discussions as well as to be faithful to the Gospels as Scripture.

We pray that the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels will be found useful to those preparing for and engaged in Christian ministry in all its forms—from the small group to the lecture hall, from the marketplace to the seminary, from the local church to the department of religious studies, and beyond.

Joel B. Green

Scot McKnight

I. Howard Marshall
How to Use This Dictionary

Abbreviations

Comprehensive tables of abbreviations for general matters as well as for scholarly, biblical and ancient literature may be found on pages xiii-xxi.

Authorship of Articles

The authors of articles are indicated by their first initials and last name at the end of each article. A full list of contributors may be found on pages xxiii-xxv, in alphabetical order of last name.

Bibliographies

A bibliography has been appended to each article. The bibliographies include works cited in the articles and other significant related works. All bibliographical entries are listed in alphabetical order by the author's last name.

Full bibliographical information has been supplied whenever possible. Abbreviations used in the bibliographies appear in the tables of abbreviations.

Bibliographies for each of the four Gospels include a special listing of commentaries on the respective Gospel.

Cross-references

The Dictionary has been extensively cross-referenced in order to aid readers in making the most of material appearing throughout the volume. Four types of cross-referencing will be found:

1. One-line entries appearing in alphabetical order throughout the Dictionary direct readers to articles where a topic is discussed:
Abba. See God; Prayer; Son of God.

2. An asterisk after a single word in the body of an article, typically at its first occurrence, indicates that an article by that title appears in the Dictionary. For example, "Christ"* directs the reader to an article entitled Christ.

3. A cross-reference appearing within parentheses in the body of an article also directs the reader to an article by that title. For example, "(see Kingdom of God)" directs the reader to an article entitled Kingdom of God. Such cross-references are used either to prevent the confusion an asterisk might introduce (i.e., "kingdom of God*" could refer to either an article on "God" or "Kingdom of God") or to direct the reader's attention to an article of related interest.

4. Cross-references have been appended to the end of articles, immediately preceding the bibliography, to direct readers to articles significantly related to the subject:

   See also Son of David; Son of God; Son of Man.

Indexes

Since most of the Dictionary articles cover broad topics in some depth, the subject index is intended to assist readers in finding relevant information on narrower topics that might, for instance, appear in a standard Bible dictionary. For example, while there is no article entitled "Adam," the subject index will direct the reader to pages where Adam is discussed in the articles on "Genealogy," "Temptation of Jesus" and "Typology."

Similarly, an index of Gospel citations is provided to assist readers in gaining access to information related to various topics.

Finally, an index of the articles in the dictionary allows readers to quickly review the breadth of topics covered and select the ones most apt to serve their interests or needs.

Transliteration
Hebrew and Greek words have been transliterated according to a system set out on page xxii. Greek verbs appear in their lexical form (rather than infinitive) in order to assist those with little or no knowledge of the language in using other reference works.
Abbreviations

General Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Meaning</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>κτλ</td>
<td>καὶ ρὰ λοιπά, and the remainder</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2d ed.</td>
<td>second edition</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3d ed.</td>
<td>third edition</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A</td>
<td>Codex Alexandrinus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B</td>
<td>Codex Vaticanus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C</td>
<td>Codex Ephraemi Syri</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>c.</td>
<td>circa, about (with dates); column</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>cent.</td>
<td>century</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>cf.</td>
<td>confer, compare</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>chap(s.)</td>
<td>chapter(s)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>D</td>
<td>Codex Bezae</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DSS</td>
<td>Dead Sea Scrolls</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>e.g.</td>
<td>exempli gratia, for example</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ed.</td>
<td>edition; editor(s), edited by</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>esp.</td>
<td>especially</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ET</td>
<td>English translation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EVV</td>
<td>English versions of the Bible</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Meaning</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gk</td>
<td>Greek</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Heb</td>
<td>Hebrew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>i.e.</td>
<td>id est, that is</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>km.</td>
<td>kilometer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LXX</td>
<td>Septuagint</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>mg.</td>
<td>margin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MS or MSS</td>
<td>manuscript or manuscripts</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MT</td>
<td>Masoretic Text (of the Old Testament)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>n.d.</td>
<td>no date</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>n.s.</td>
<td>new series</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NT</td>
<td>New Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>o.s.</td>
<td>old series</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OT</td>
<td>Old Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>p. or pp.</td>
<td>page or pages</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>pace</td>
<td>with due respect to, but differing from</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>par.</td>
<td>parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>passim</td>
<td>throughout</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>pl.</td>
<td>plural</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Q</td>
<td>Quelle (&quot;sayings&quot; source for Synoptic Gospels)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>repr.</td>
<td>reprint</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>rev.</td>
<td>revised</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
sy          Syriac
Tg.         Targum
v. or vv.   verse or verses
vol.        volume
x           times (2 x = two times, etc.)
§ or §§     section or paragraph number(s) (usually indicating Loeb Classical Library numbering system for Josephus)

Translations of the Bible

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Translation</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ASV</td>
<td>American Standard Version (1901)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AV</td>
<td>Authorized Version (= KJV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>JB</td>
<td>Jerusalem Bible</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>KJV</td>
<td>King James Version (= AV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NASB</td>
<td>New American Standard Bible</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NEB</td>
<td>New English Bible</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NIV</td>
<td>New International Version</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NRSV</td>
<td>New Revised Standard Version</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>REB</td>
<td>Revised English Bible</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RV</td>
<td>Revised Version (1881-85)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Books of the Bible
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Old Testament</th>
<th>Job</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Gen</td>
<td>Ps</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ex</td>
<td>Prov</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lev</td>
<td>Eccles</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Num</td>
<td>Song</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deut</td>
<td>Is</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Josh</td>
<td>Jer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Judg</td>
<td>Lam</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ruth</td>
<td>Ezek</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1-2 Sam</td>
<td>Dan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1-2 Kings</td>
<td>Hos</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1-2 Chron</td>
<td>Joel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ezra</td>
<td>Amos</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neh</td>
<td>Obad</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Esther</td>
<td>Jon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mic</td>
<td>1-2 Cor</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nahum</td>
<td>Gal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hab</td>
<td>Eph</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zeph</td>
<td>Phil</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hag</td>
<td>Col</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zech</td>
<td>1-2 Thess</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Book</td>
<td>Books</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------</td>
<td>-------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mal</td>
<td>1-2 Tim</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tit</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>New Testament</td>
<td>philem</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mt</td>
<td>Heb</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mk</td>
<td>Jas</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lk</td>
<td>1-2 Pet</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jn</td>
<td>1-2-3Jn</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Acts</td>
<td>Jude</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rom</td>
<td>Rev</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The Apocrypha and Septuagint

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Books</th>
<th>Books</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1-2-3-4 Kgdms</td>
<td>1-2-3-4 Kingdoms</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Add Esth</td>
<td>Additions to Esther</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bar</td>
<td>Baruch</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bel</td>
<td>Bel and the Dragon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1-2 Esdr</td>
<td>1-2 Esdras</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4 Ezra</td>
<td>4 Ezra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jdt</td>
<td>Judith</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ep Jer</td>
<td>Episde of Jeremiah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1-2-3-4 Macc</td>
<td>1-2-3-4 Maccabees</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pr Azar</td>
<td>Prayer of Azariah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Title</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------</td>
<td>--------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pr Man</td>
<td>Prayer of Manasseh</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sir</td>
<td>Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sus</td>
<td>Susanna</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tob</td>
<td>Tobit</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wis</td>
<td>Wisdom of Solomon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Adam and Eve</td>
<td>Life of Adam and Eve</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ahiq.</td>
<td>Ahiqar</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Apoc. Abr.</td>
<td>Apocalypse of Abraham</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2-3 Apoc. Bar.</td>
<td>Syriac, Greek Apocalypse of Baruch</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Asc. Isa.</td>
<td>Ascension of Isaiah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Apoc. Mos.</td>
<td>Apocalypse of Moses</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>As. Mos.</td>
<td>Assumption of Moses (or Testament of Moses)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Apoc. Elijah</td>
<td>Apocalypse of Elijah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Apoc. Zeph.</td>
<td>Apocalypse of Zephaniah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bib. Ant.</td>
<td>Biblical Antiquities of Pseudo-Philo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1-2-3 Enoch</td>
<td>Ethiopian, Slavonic, Hebrew Enoch</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ep. Arist.</td>
<td>Epistle of Aristeas</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ep. Diognetus</td>
<td>Epistle to Diognetus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jos. and As.</td>
<td>Joseph and Asenath</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jub.</td>
<td>Jubilees</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liv. Proph.</td>
<td>The Lives of the Prophets (followed by prophet abbreviated)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mart. Isa.</td>
<td>Martyrdom of Isaiah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Odes Sol.</td>
<td>Odes of Solomon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pss. Sol.</td>
<td>Psalms of Solomon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pseud.-Phoc.</td>
<td>Pseudo-Phocylides</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sib. Or.</td>
<td>Sibylline Oracles</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. 12 Patr.</td>
<td>Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Reub.</td>
<td>Testament of Reuben</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Sim.</td>
<td>Testament of Simeon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Levi</td>
<td>Testament of Levi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Judah</td>
<td>Testament of Judah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Iss.</td>
<td>Testament of Issachar</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Zeb.</td>
<td>Testament of Zebulon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Dan.</td>
<td>Testament of Dan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Naph.</td>
<td>Testament of Naphthali</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Gad.</td>
<td>Testament of Gad</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Asher</td>
<td>Testament of Asher</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Jos.</td>
<td>Testament of Joseph</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Benj</td>
<td>Testament of Benjamin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Title</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------</td>
<td>---------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Abr.</td>
<td>Testament of Abraham</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Job</td>
<td>Testament of Job</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>T. Mos.</td>
<td>Testament of Moses (or Assumption of Moses)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Early Christian Literature

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Acts Pil.</td>
<td>Acts of Pilate</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Augustine

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Civ. D.</td>
<td>De Civitate Dei</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Conf.</td>
<td>Confessiones</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>De cons.</td>
<td>De consensu evangelistarum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hom.</td>
<td>Homilia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quaest. Evan.</td>
<td>Quaestiones Evangeliorum</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Barnabas

Chrysostom

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Horn. Mt.</td>
<td>Homilies on Matthew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Regno</td>
<td>De Regno</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Clement of Alexandria

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Paed.</td>
<td>Paedagogus</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Clement of Rome

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1-2 Clem.</td>
<td>1-2 Clement</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Cyprian

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Ep.</td>
<td>Epistulae</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Cyril of Jerusalem

Cat. Catechesis
Did. Didache
Diogn. Epistle to Diognetus

Epiphanius

Haer. Haereses

Eusebius

Hist. Eccl. Historia Ecclesiastica
Dem. Ev. Demonstratio Evangelica
In Ps. Commentary on the Psalms
Praep. Ev. Praeparatio Evangelica

Gospels:

Gos. Bar. Gospel of Bartholomew
Gos. Eb. Gospel of the Ebionites
Gos. Eg. Gospel of the Egyptians
Gos. Heb. Gospel of the Hebrews
Gos. Naass. Gospel of the Naassenes
Gos. Pet. Gospel of Peter
Gos. Thom. Gospel of Thomas

Hippolytus

Apos. Trad. Apostolic Tradition
Ignatius

Eph.  Letter to the Ephesians
Magn. Letter to the Magnesians
Phld. Letter to the Philadelphias
Pol.  Letter to Polycarp
Rom.  Letter to the Romans
Smyrn. Letter to the Smyrneans
Trall. Letter to the Trallians

Irenaeus

Haer. Advenus haereses

Jerome

Ep. Epistulae
Vir. De Viris Illustribus

Justin Martyr

Apol. I, II Apology I, II
Dial. Tryph. Dialogus cum Tryphone Judaeo
Mart. Pol. Martyrdom of Polycarp

Origen

Comm. Joh. In Johannem Commentarius
Comm. Mt. In Matthaeum Commentarius
Contra Celsum Contra Celsum
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Work</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Polycarp</td>
<td></td>
<td>Letter to the Philippians</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tertullian</td>
<td>De praesc.</td>
<td>De praescriptione haereticorum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Marc.</td>
<td>Advenus Marcionem</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>De car.</td>
<td>De carne Christi</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Classical and Hellenistic Writers and Sources

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Work</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Aeschylus</td>
<td>Suppl.</td>
<td>Supplices</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appian</td>
<td>Mith. W.</td>
<td>Mithridatic Wars</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Civ. W.</td>
<td>The Civil Wars</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aristotle</td>
<td>Cael.</td>
<td>De Caelo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Pol.</td>
<td>Politica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Corp. Herm.</td>
<td>Corpus Hermeticum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Demosthenes</td>
<td>Lacrit.</td>
<td>Against Lacritus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dio Cassius</td>
<td>Epit.</td>
<td>Roman History</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Hist. Roman History

Dio Chrysostom
De Homero De Homero et Socrate
Disc. Discourses

Diodorus
Bib. Hist. Bibliotheca Historica

Diogenes Laertius
Vit. Vitae

Epictetus
Disc. Discourses
Diss. Dissertationes

Galen
De Placitis De Placitis Hippocratis et Piatonis

Isocrates
Panath. Panathenaicus

Josephus
Ant. Antiquities of the Jews
J.W. Jewish Wars
Life Life of Flavius Josephus
Ag. Ap. Against Apion

Justinian
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Work Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Digest</td>
<td>Digest of Roman Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Livy</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Epit.</td>
<td>Epitomae</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hist.</td>
<td>History of Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lucian of Samosata</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philops.</td>
<td>Philopseudes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philo</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cher.</td>
<td>De Cherubim</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Decal.</td>
<td>De Decalogo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Det. Pot. Ins.</td>
<td>Quod Deterius Potiori Insidiari Soleat</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Deus Imm.</td>
<td>Quod Deus Sit Immutabilis</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Flacc.</td>
<td>In Flaccum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fug.</td>
<td>De Fuga et Inventione</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gig.</td>
<td>De Gigantibus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jos.</td>
<td>De Josepho</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leg. All.</td>
<td>Legum Allegoriae</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leg. Gai.</td>
<td>Legatio ad Gaium</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Migr. Abr.</td>
<td>De Migratione Abrahami</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mut. Nom.</td>
<td>De Mutatione Nominum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poster. C</td>
<td>De Posteritate Caini</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Praem. Poen.  De Praemiis et Poenis
Quaest. in Ex.  Quaestiones in Exodum
Quaest. in Gen.  Quaestiones in Genesin
Rer. Div Her.  Quis Rerum Divinarum Heres sit
Sacr.  De Sacrificiis Abelis et Caini
Som.  De Somnis
Spec. Leg.  De Specialibus Legibus
Vit. Mos.  De Vita Mosis

Philostratus

Pindar
Isth.  Isthmia Plato

Plato
Crat.  Cratylus
Leg.  Leges
Soph.  Sophista
Symp.  Symposium

Pliny (the elder)
Nat. Hist.  Naturalis Historia

Plutarch
Anton.  De Antonio
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Work</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Rom.</td>
<td>Quaestiones Romanae</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mor.</td>
<td>Moralia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Non Posse Suav.</td>
<td>Non Posse Suaviter Vivi Secundum Epicuram</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pomp.</td>
<td>De Pompeio</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ser. Num. Pun.</td>
<td>De iis qui sero a numine puniuntur</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Polybius</td>
<td>Hist.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quintilian</td>
<td>Inst. orat.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Suetonius</td>
<td>Claudius</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Domitian</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Nero</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Tiberius</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Vespasian</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tacitus</td>
<td>Ann.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Hist.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Xenophon</td>
<td>Mem.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Dead Sea Scrolls and Related Texts

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>CD</th>
<th>Cairo (Genizah text of the) Da mascus (Document/Rule)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>P</td>
<td>Pesher (commentary)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Q</td>
<td>Qumran</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 Q 3Q, 4Q etc.</td>
<td>Numbered caves of Qumran yielding written material (e.g., 1Q = Qumran Cave 1); followed by abbreviation or number of document</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>lQapGen</td>
<td>Genesis Apocryphon from Qumran Cave 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1QH</td>
<td>Hôdâyôt or Thanksgiving Hymns from Qumran Cave 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>lQIsa&lt;sup&gt;a,b&lt;/sup&gt;</td>
<td>First or second copy of Isaiah from Qumran Cave 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1QM</td>
<td>Milḥāmāh or War Scroll from Qumran Cave 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>lQpHab</td>
<td>Pesher on Habakkuk from Qumran Cave 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1QS</td>
<td>Serek hayyahad or Rule of the Community, Manual of Discipline from Qumran Cave 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 QSa</td>
<td>Appendix A Messianic Rule, to 1QS from Qumran Cave 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1QSb</td>
<td>Appendix B, Rule of Benediction, to 1QS from Qumran Cave 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3Q15</td>
<td>Copper Scroll from Qumran Cave 3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4Q139</td>
<td>Ordinances or commentaries on biblical laws from Qumran Cave 4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4Q169</td>
<td>Pesher on Nahum from Qumran Cave 4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4Q171</td>
<td>Pesher on Psalms from Qumran Cave 4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4Q176</td>
<td>Tanhumim or Consolations from Qumran Cave 4</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
4Q186 (see 4QMess ar)
4Q246 (see 4QPs DanA³)
4Q504 Words of the Luminaries from Qumran Cave 4
4Q513-14 Ordinances or commentaries on biblical laws from Qumran Cave 4
4QCryptic Magical text from Qumran Cave 4
4QEn Giants a-e 1 Enoch fragments from Book of Giants from Qumran Cave 4
4QEn 1 Enoch fragments from Qumran Cave 4
4QEnastr a-g 1 Enoch fragments from Astronomical Book from Qumran Cave 4
4QFlor Florilegium or Eschatological Midrashim from Qumran Cave 4
4QMess ar Aramaic "Messianic" text from Qumran Cave 4
4QMMMT Miqsat Ma'aseh Torah (unpublished) from Qumran Cave 4
4QPBless Patriarchal Blessing from Qumran Cave 4
4QPhyl Phylacteries from Qumran Cave 4
4QPrNab Prayer of Nabonidus from Qumran Cave 4
4QPsDan A³ Pseudo-Danielic Writings from Qumran Cave 4
4QPssJosh Psalms of Joshua from Qumran Cave 4
4QShirShabb Songs of Sabbath Sacrifice or Angelic Liturgy from Qumran Cave 4
4QTestim Testimonia text from Qumran Cave 4
4QtgJob  Targum of Job from Qumran Cave 4
4QtgLev  Targum of Leviticus from Qumran Cave 4
4QZodiac Magical text (unpublished) from Qumran Cave 4
5Q15  New Jerusalem from Qumran Cave 5
11QMelch  Melchizedek from Qumran Cave 11
11QpaleoLev  Copy of Leviticus in paleo-Hebrew script from Qumran Cave 11
11QPs\textsuperscript{a}  Psalms Scroll from Qumran Cave 11
11QTemple  Temple Scroll from Qumran Cave 11
11QtgJob  Targum of Job from Qumran Cave 11

Targumic Material

\textit{Tg. Onq.}  Targum Onqelos
\textit{Tg. Neb.}  Targum of the Prophets
\textit{Tg. Ket.}  Targum of the Writings
\textit{Frg. Tg.}  Fragmentary Targum
\textit{Sam. Tg.}  Samaritan Targum
\textit{Tg. Isa}  Targum of Isaiah \textit{Tg. Neof.}  Targum Neofiti I
\textit{Tg. Ps.-J.}  Targum Pseudo-Jonathan
\textit{Tg. Yer. I}  Targum Yerušalmi I
\textit{Tg. Yer. II}  Targum Yerušalmi II
Yemenite Targum (Yem. Tg.)

- Tg. Esth I, II First or Second Targum of Esther

Order and Tractates in the Mishna, Tosepta and Talmud

Same-named tractates in the Mishna, Tosepta, Babylonian Talmud and Jerusalem Talmud are distinguished by m., t., b. and y. respectively.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Arabic Abbreviation</th>
<th>Hebrew Name</th>
<th>English Name</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>'Abot.</td>
<td>'Abot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Arak.</td>
<td>'Arakin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Abod. Zar.</td>
<td>'Aboda Zara</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B. Bat.</td>
<td>Baba Batra</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bek.</td>
<td>Bekorot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ber.</td>
<td>Berakot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beṣa</td>
<td>Besa (= Yom Tob)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bik.</td>
<td>Bikkurim</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B. Meṣ.</td>
<td>Baba Meşi’a</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B. Qam.</td>
<td>Baba Qamma</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dem.</td>
<td>Demai</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Erub.</td>
<td>'Erubin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Ed.</td>
<td>'Eduyyot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Git.</td>
<td>Giṭṭin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hag.</td>
<td>Ḥagiga</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbr.</td>
<td>Meaning</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------</td>
<td>--------------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hal.</td>
<td>Ḥolla</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hor.</td>
<td>Horayot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ḥul.</td>
<td>Ḫullin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kelim.</td>
<td>Kelim</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ker.</td>
<td>Kentot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ketub.</td>
<td>Ketubot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kil.</td>
<td>Kil'ayim</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ma'aš.</td>
<td>Ma'asherot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mak.</td>
<td>Makkot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Makš.</td>
<td>Makširit (= Mašqin)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Meg.</td>
<td>Megilla</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Me'il.</td>
<td>Me'ila</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Menah.</td>
<td>Menahot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mid.</td>
<td>Middot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Miqw.</td>
<td>Miqua'ot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mo'ed.</td>
<td>Mo'ed</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mo'ed Qaṭ.</td>
<td>Mo'ed Qaṭan</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ma'aš. Š.</td>
<td>Ma'asher Šeni</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Našim.</td>
<td>Našim</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nazir.</td>
<td>Nazir</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ned.</td>
<td>Nedarim</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Full Form</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-----------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neg.</td>
<td>Nega'im</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nez.</td>
<td>Neziqin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nid.</td>
<td>Niddah</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ohol.</td>
<td>Oholot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>'Or.</td>
<td>'Orla</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Para.</td>
<td>Para</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pe'a.</td>
<td>Pe'a</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pesaḥ.</td>
<td>Pesaḥim</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qinnim</td>
<td>Qinnim</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qidd.</td>
<td>Qiddušin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qod.</td>
<td>Qodašin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roš Haš.</td>
<td>Raš Haššana</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sanh.</td>
<td>Sanhedrin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Šabb.</td>
<td>Sabbath</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Šeb.</td>
<td>Šebi'it</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Šebu.</td>
<td>Šebu'ot</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Šeqal.</td>
<td>Šeqalim</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sota.</td>
<td>Sota</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sukk.</td>
<td>Sukka</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ta'an.</td>
<td>Ta'anit</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tamid</td>
<td>Tamid</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Tem. Temura
Ter. Terumot
Ṭohar. Ṭoharot
Ṭ. Yom. Ṭebul Yom
'Uq. 'Uqṣin
Yad. Yadayim
Yebam. Yebamot
Yoma. Yoma (= Kippurim)
Zabim. Zabim
Zebah. Zebahim
Zer. Zera'im

Other Rabbinic Works

'Abot R. Nat. 'Abot de Rabbi Nathan
'Ag. Ber. 'Aggadat Remit
Bab. Babylonian
Bar. Baraita
Der. Er. Rab. Derek Eres Rabba
Der. Er. Zut. Derek Eres Zut
Gem. Gemara
Kalla. Kalla
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Mek.</td>
<td>Mekilta</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Midr.</td>
<td>Midraš (cited with abbreviation for biblical book; but Midr. Qoh. = Midraš Qohelet)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pal.</td>
<td>Palestinian</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pesiq.</td>
<td>R Pesiqta Rabbati</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pesiq.</td>
<td>Rab Pesiqta de Rab Kahana Kah.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sem.</td>
<td>Şemahot</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sipra</td>
<td>Sipra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sipre</td>
<td>Sipre</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sop.</td>
<td>Soperim</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>S. 'Olam Rab.</td>
<td>Seder 'Olam Rabbah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Talm.</td>
<td>Talmud</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yal.</td>
<td>Yalqut</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Periodicals, Reference Works and Serials

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>AB</td>
<td>Anchor Bible</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ABQ</td>
<td>American Baptist Quarterly</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AGJU</td>
<td>Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AGSU</td>
<td>Arbeiten zur Geschichte des Spätvjudentums und Urchristentums</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
AJBl  Annual of the Japanese Biblical Institute
AJT  American Journal of Theology
ALGHJ  Arbeiten zur Literatur und Geschichte des hellenistischen Judentums
ALIJOS  Annual of Leeds University Oriental Society
AnBib  Analecta Biblica ANRW Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt
ASNU  Acta seminarii neotestamentici upsa-liensis
ATANT  Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments
ATLABibS  American Theological Library Association Bibliography Series
AusBR  Australian Biblical Review
ATR  Anglican Theological Review
BBB  Bonner biblische Beiträge
BCJ  Brown Classics in Judaica
BG  Berlin Gnostic Codex
BGU  Ägyptische Urkunden aus den Museen zu Berlin: Griech. Urkunden I-VTII (1895-1933)
Bib  Biblica
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>BibO</td>
<td>Biblica et orientalia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BibRes</td>
<td>Biblical Research</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BibS(F)</td>
<td>Biblische Studien (Freiburg, 1895-)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BibS(N)</td>
<td>Biblische Studien (Neukirchen, 1951-)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BMI</td>
<td>The Bible and Its Modern Interpreters</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BRev</td>
<td>Bible Review</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BSac</td>
<td>Bibliotheca Sacra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BT</td>
<td>The Bible Translator</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BJRL</td>
<td>Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BJS</td>
<td>Brown Judaic Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BTB</td>
<td>Biblical Theology Bulletin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BZ</td>
<td>Biblische Zeitschrift</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BZNW</td>
<td>Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CBQ</td>
<td>Catholic Biblical Quarterly</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CCWJcw</td>
<td>Cambridge Commentaries on Writings of the Jewish and Christian World 200 B.C. to A.D. 200</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CD</td>
<td>Church Dogmatics, Karl Barth</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CG</td>
<td>Nag Hammadi Gnostic Codices</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CGTC</td>
<td>Cambridge Greek Testament Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CII</td>
<td>Corpus inscriptionum iudaicarum, J. B. Frey (1936-1952)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CNT</td>
<td>Commentaire du Nouveau Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CRINT</td>
<td>Compendia rerum iudaicarum ad novum testamentum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CT</td>
<td>Christianity Today</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DJD</td>
<td>Discoveries in the Judaean Desert</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DRev</td>
<td>Downside Review</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EB</td>
<td>Études bibliques</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EBC</td>
<td>The Expositor's Bible Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EBT</td>
<td>Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EDNT</td>
<td>Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EKK</td>
<td>Evangelisch-katholischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ELS</td>
<td>Enchiridion Locorum Sanctorum. Documenta S. Evangelii Loca Respicientia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EvQ</td>
<td>Evangelical Quarterly</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ExpT</td>
<td>Expository Times</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FB</td>
<td>Facet Boob</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FIRA</td>
<td>Fontes Iuris Romani Antejustiniani</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FJ</td>
<td>The Foundation of Judaism</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GBL</td>
<td>Das Grosse Bibellexikon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GNS</td>
<td>Good News Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GNTE</td>
<td>Guides to New Testament Exegesis GTJ Grace Theological Journal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HBD</td>
<td>Harper's Bible Dictionary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Herm</td>
<td>Hermeneia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HeyJ</td>
<td>Heythrop Journal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HNT</td>
<td>Handbuch zum Neuen Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HNTC</td>
<td>Harper's New Testament Commentaries</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HSS</td>
<td>Harvard Semitic Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HTKNT</td>
<td>Herden theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HZ</td>
<td>Historische Zeitschrift</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IBS</td>
<td>Irish Biblical Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICC</td>
<td>International Critical Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IDB</td>
<td>Interpreters Dictionary of the Bible</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IDBSup</td>
<td>Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Supplementary Volume</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IEJ</td>
<td>Israel Exploration Journal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Int</td>
<td>Interpretation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IntC</td>
<td>Interpretation Commentaries</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IRT</td>
<td>Issues in Religion and Theology</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ISBE</td>
<td>International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (rev. ed.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>JAOS</td>
<td>Journal of the American Oriental Society</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>JBL</td>
<td>Journal of Biblical Literature</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>JCSR</td>
<td>Journal of Comparative Sociology and Religion</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
JETS  Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society
JR  Journal of Religion
JRE  Journal of Religious Ethics
JRS  Journal of Roman Studies
JSJ  Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic and Roman Period
JSNT  Journal for the Study of the New Testament
JSNTSup  Journal for the Study of the New Testament Supplement Series
JSOT  Journal for the Study of the Old Testament
JSOTSup  Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series
JSPSup  Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha and Related Literature Supplement Series
JTS  Journal of Theological Studies
JTSA  Journal of Theology for South Africa
KNT  Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
LAE  Light from the Ancient East, A. Deissmann
LSJ  Liddell-Scott-Jones, Greek-English Lexicon
MBTh  Münsterische Beiträge zur Theologie
MeyerK  H. A. W. Meyer, Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neue Testament
MNTC  Moffatt New Testament Commentary
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Code</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>MPAT</td>
<td>A Manual of Palestinian Aramaic Texts</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NAC</td>
<td>The New American Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NCB</td>
<td>New Century Bible</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NewDocs</td>
<td>New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NIBC</td>
<td>New International Biblical Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NICNT</td>
<td>The New International Commentary on the New Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NIDNTT</td>
<td>New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NovT</td>
<td>Novum Testamentum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NovTSup</td>
<td>Supplement to Novum Testamentum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NRT</td>
<td>La nouvelle revue théologique</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NTD</td>
<td>Das Neue Testament Deutsch</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NTOA</td>
<td>Novum Testamentum et Orbis Anti-quus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NTS</td>
<td>New Testament Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PC</td>
<td>Proclamation Commentaries</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PEQ</td>
<td>Palestine Exploration Quarterly</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PG</td>
<td>Patrologia graeca, ed. J. P. Migne</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PRS</td>
<td>Perspectives in Religious Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PTMS</td>
<td>Pittsburgh Theological Monograph Series</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PTR</td>
<td>Princeton Theological Review</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RAC</td>
<td>Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RB</td>
<td>Revue biblique</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RE</td>
<td>Real-Encyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, Pauly-Wissowa</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RelSRev</td>
<td>Religious Studies Review</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RevQ</td>
<td>Revue de Qumrân</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RHPR</td>
<td>Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>RST</td>
<td>Regensburger Studien zur Theologie</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SAJ</td>
<td>Studies in Ancient Judaism</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SANT</td>
<td>Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SBEC</td>
<td>Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SBLASP</td>
<td>Society of Biblical Literature Abstracts and Seminar Papers</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SBLDS</td>
<td>SBL Dissertation Series</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SBLMS</td>
<td>SBL Monograph Series</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SBLSBS</td>
<td>SBL Sources for Biblical Study</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SBT</td>
<td>Studies in Biblical Theology</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ScrHierJudaism</td>
<td>Scripta hierosolymitana SCJ Studies in Christianity and Judaism</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SE</td>
<td>Studia Evangelica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SEA</td>
<td>Svensk Exegetisk Årsbok</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SEG</td>
<td>Supplementum Epigraphicum Graecum (Leiden, 1923-)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SJ</td>
<td>Studia judaica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SJLA</td>
<td>Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SNTSMS</td>
<td>Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SJT</td>
<td>Scottish Journal of Theology</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Str-B</td>
<td>H. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>StudLit Studia Liturgica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TD</td>
<td>Theology Digest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TDNT</td>
<td>Theological Dictionary of the New Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TDGR</td>
<td>Translated Documents of Greece and Rome, ed. R K. Sherk</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THKNT</td>
<td>Theologische Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TI</td>
<td>Theological Inquiries</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TJ</td>
<td>Trinity Journal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TLZ</td>
<td>Theologische Literaturzeitung</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TNTC</td>
<td>Tyndale New Testament Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TS</td>
<td>Theological Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TSAJ</td>
<td>Texte und Studien zum Antiken Judentum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TSFBul</td>
<td>Theological Students Fellowship Bulletin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TToday</td>
<td>Theology Today</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>--------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TWOT</td>
<td>Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TynB</td>
<td>Tyndale Bulletin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TZ</td>
<td>Theologische Zeitschrift</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UBSGNT</td>
<td>United Bible Societies Greek New Testament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VoxEv</td>
<td>Vox Evangelica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VT</td>
<td>Vetus Testamentum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WBC</td>
<td>Word Biblical Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WEC</td>
<td>Wycliffe Exegetical Commentary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WUNT</td>
<td>Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Transliteration

Hebrew

Consonants

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Hebrew</th>
<th>Transliteration</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>א</td>
<td>'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ב</td>
<td>b</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ก</td>
<td>g</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ד</td>
<td>d</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ד</td>
<td>d</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ה</td>
<td>h</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ו</td>
<td>w</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ז</td>
<td>z</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ח</td>
<td>h</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ט</td>
<td>t</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>י</td>
<td>y</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>כ</td>
<td>k</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ק</td>
<td>k</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ל</td>
<td>l</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>מ</td>
<td>m</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>נ</td>
<td>n</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ס</td>
<td>s</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ע</td>
<td>'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>פ</td>
<td>p</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ض</td>
<td>p</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>כ</td>
<td>s</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ק</td>
<td>q</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ר</td>
<td>r</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>פ</td>
<td>s</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>צ</td>
<td>š</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>נ</td>
<td>t</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>נ</td>
<td>t</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Long Vowels
('à) = à
(è) = è
(í) = í
(ò) = ò
(ú) = ú
(â) = â
(ê) = ê
(ô) = ô

Short Vowels

. = a
. = e
. = i
. = o
. = u
. = a
. = e
. = o

Greek

A = A
a = a
B = B β = b
Γ = G
γ = g
Δ = D
δ = d
Ε = E ε = e Ζ = Z
ζ = z
H = È
η = è
$\Theta = \text{Th}$
$\theta = \text{th}$
$I = \text{I}$
$i = \text{i}$
$K = \text{K}$
$\kappa = \text{k}$
$\Lambda = \text{L}$
$\lambda = \text{l}$
$M = \text{M}$
$\mu = \text{m}$ $N = \text{N}$
$\nu = \text{n}$
$\Xi = \text{X}$
$\xi = \text{x}$
$O = \text{O}$

$\omicron = \text{o}$
$\Pi = \text{P}$
$\pi = \text{p}$
$\rho = \text{r}$
$\Sigma = \text{S}$
$\sigma/\varsigma = \text{s}$
$T = \text{T}$
$\tau = \text{t}$
$\Upsilon = \text{Y}$
$\upsilon = \text{y}$
$\Phi = \text{Ph}$
$\phi = \text{ph}$
$\Chi = \text{Ch}$
$\chi = \text{ch}$

$\Psi = \text{Ps}$
$\psi = \text{ps}$
$\Omega = \text{O}$
$\omega = \text{o}$

$\varphi = \text{rh}$
$\varepsilon = \text{h}$
$\gamma/\varsigma = \text{m}$
$\gamma = \text{ng}$
$\alpha = \text{au}$
$\varepsilon = \text{cu}$
$\omega = \text{ou}$
$\upsilon = \text{ui}$
List of Contributors

Allison, Dale C., Jr., Ph.D. Research Fellow, Friends University, Wichita, Kansas, USA.

Banks, Robert, Ph.D. Homer L Goddard Professor of the Ministry of the baity. Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA.

Banchy, S. Scott, Ph.D. Adjunct Associate Professor, Department of History, University of California, Los Angeles, California, USA.

Bauer, David R., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA.

Bayer, Hans F., Ph.D. Dozent in New Testament Exegesis and Department Head in New Testament, German Theological Seminary, Giessen, Germany.

Beasley-Murray, G. R., Ph.D., D.D. Senior Professor of New Testament Interpretation, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA.

Black, David Alan, D.Theol. Scholar in Residence, The Lockman Foundation, La Habra, California, USA.

Blackburn, Barry L., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Atlanta Christian College, East Point, Georgia, USA.

Blomberg, Craig L., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado, USA.

Bock, Darrell L., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas, USA.
Brown, Colin, Ph.D. Professor of Systematic Theology and Associate Dean of the Center for Advanced Theological Studies, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA.

Broyles, Craig C., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Religious Studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada.

Bruce, F. F., D.D. Late Rylands Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis, University of Manchester, Manchester, U.K.

Bürge, Gary M., Ph.D. Karl A Olsson Professor of Religion and Chair, Department of Biblical and Theological Studies, North Park College, Chicago, Illinois, USA.

Burnett, Fred W., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament and Coordinator of Classical Studies, Anderson College, Anderson, Indiana, USA.

Caragounis, Chrys C., D.Theol. Associate Professor, University of Lund, Sweden.

Chilton, Bruce, Ph.D. Bernard Iddings Bell Professor of Religion, Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, USA.

Corley, Bruce, Th.D. Professor of New Testament and Dean, School of Theology, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Fort Worth, Texas, USA.

Corley, Kathleen E., MA, Ph.D. (CandL). Sioux Falls College, Sioux Falls, South Dakota, USA.

Crump, David M., Ph.D. Pastor, Immanuel Christian Reformed Church, Salt Lake City, Utah, USA.

Danker, Frederick William, Ph.D. Professor Emeritus of Biblical Theology, Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago, Chicago, Illinois, USA.

Davids, Peter H., Ph.D. Scholar in Residence, Langley Vineyard Christian Fellowship, Langley, British Columbia, Canada.

Davidson, Maxwell J., Ph.D. Lecturer in Systematic Theology, Baptist Theological College of Western Australia, Perth, Western Australia, Australia.

Dockery, David S., Ph.D. General Editor, Broadman Press, Nashville, Tennessee, USA.

Dunn, James D. G., D.D. Lightfoot Professor of Divinity, University of Durham, Durham, U.K.

Edwards, Ruth B., Ph.D. Senior Lecturer in New Testament, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, U.K.

Ellingworth, Paul, Ph.D. Translation Consultant, United Bible Societies, Aberdeen, U.K.

Elliott, Mark A Th.M. Ph.D. Candidate. University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, U.K.

Evans, Craig A., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical Studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada.

Farris, Stephen C., Ph.D. Professor of Preaching and Worship, Knox College, Toronto School of Theology, Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

Fee, Gordon D., Ph.D, Professor of New Testament, Regent College, Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada.

France, R. T., Ph.D. Principal, Wydiffe Hall, Oxford, U.K.

Garland, David E., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Interpretation, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA.

Geddart, Timothy J., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Men-nonite Brethren Biblical Seminary, Fresno, California, USA.

Giles, Kevin N., Th.D. Rector, St Matthew's Church, Marryatville, South Australia, Australia.

Green, Joel B., Ph.D. Academic Dean and Associate Professor of New Testament, New College Berkeley, Berkeley, California, USA.

Greidanus, Sidney, Th.D. Associate Professor of Preaching and Worship, Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan, USA

Guelich, Robert A, D.Theol. Late Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA.

Hawthorne, Gerald F., Ph.D. Professor of Greek, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA.

Heard, Warren J., Jr., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Counseling Psychology and New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA.

Hearon, Holly E., D. Min. Ph.D. Candidate, Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California, USA.

Herzog, William R., II, Ph.D. Dean of the Faculty and Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Colgate Rochester Divinity School/Bexley Hall/Crozer Theological Seminary, Rochester, New York, USA.

Hoehner, Harold W., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas, USA.

Howard, Carol D. C., M.Div. Th.D. Candidate, Harvard Divinity School, Cambridge, Massachusetts, USA.

Huffman, Douglas S., MA New Testament Teaching Fellow/Ph.D Student. Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA.

Hurst, Lincoln D., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Religion, University of California, Davis, California, USA.

Hurtado, Larry W., Ph.D. Professor of Religion and Director of the Institute for the Humanities, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada.

Johnson, David H., Ph.D. (Cand.). Instructor, Providence Theological Seminary, Otterbume, Manitoba, Canada.

Kruse, Colin G., Ph.D. Senior Lecturer in New Testament, Ridley College, University of Melbourne, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia.

Kynes, William L, Ph.D. Pastor, National Evangelical Free Church, Annandale, Virginia, USA

Levison, John R., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies, North Park College, Chicago, Illinois, USA

Liefeld, Walter L, Ph.D. Distinguished Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. Deerfield, Illinois, USA

Losie, Lynn A, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Religion, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California, USA.

Lunde, Jonathan M., Th.M. Ph.D. Candidate, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

McKnight, Edgar V„ Ph.D. William R Kenan, Jr. Professor of Religion, Furman University, Greenville, South Carolina, USA

McKnight, Scot, Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

Marshall, I. Howard, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Exegesis, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, U.K.

Martin, Clarice J., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, New Jersey, USA

Michaels, J. Ramsey, Th.D. Professor of Religious Studies, Southwest Missouri State University, Springfield, Missouri, USA

Moo, Douglas J., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

Morris, Leon, Ph.D. Principal Emeritus, Ridley College, Melbourne, Australia.

Mulholland, M. Robert, Jr., Th.D. Vice President and Professor of New Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA
Osborne, Grant R., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

Page, Sydney H. T., Ph.D. Academic Vice President and Professor of New Testament, Edmonton Baptist Seminary, Edmonton, Alberta, Canada.

Painter, John, Ph.D. Reader in Religious Studies, La Trobe University, Melbourne, Australia.

Paschal. R. Wade, Jr., Ph.D. Director, Beeson International Center for Biblical Preaching and Pastoral Leadership, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA

Schmidt, Thomas E., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Westmont College, Santa Barbara, California, USA

Scholer, David M., Th.D. Distinguished Professor of New Testament and Early Church History, North Park College and Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois, USA

Scott, J. Julius, Jr., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical and Historical Studies, Wheaton College Graduate School, Wheaton, Illinois, USA

Shirbroun, G. Franklin, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, The Episcopal School of Theology at Claremont, Claremont, California, USA

Shogren, Gary S., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Biblical Theological Seminary, Hatfield, Pennsylvania, USA

Sloan, Robert B., D.Theol. Associate Professor of Religion, Baylor University, Waco, Texas, USA

Smith, Robert H., Th.D. Professor of New Testament, Pacific Lutheran Theological Seminary/Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California, USA
Snodgrass, Klyne R., Ph.D. Dean of the Faculty and Paul W. Brandel Professor of New Testament Studies, North Park Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois, USA

Stein, Robert H., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Bethel Theological Seminary, St Paul, Minnesota, USA

Thompson, Marianne Meye, Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA

Travis, Stephen H., Ph.D. Vice-Principal, Sc John's College, Nottingham, U.K.

Trites, Allison A., Ph.D. The John Payzant Distinguished Professor of Biblical Studies, Acadia Divinity College, Acadia University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, Canada.

Turner, Max, Ph.D. Director of Research and Lecturer in New Testament, London Bible College, Middlesex. U.K.

Twelftree, Graham H., Ph.D. Minister, Hope Valley Uniting Church, Adelaide, South Australia, Australia.

Watson, Duane F., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament and Greek, Malone College, Canton, Ohio, USA

Weatherly, Jon A., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Cincinnati Bible College and Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio, USA

Westerholm, Stephen, Th.D. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada.

Whitacre, Rodney A., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Trinity Episcopal School for Ministry, Ambridge, Pennsylvania, USA.

Wilkins, Michael J., Ph.D. Department Chair and Professor of New Testament language and Literature. Talbot School of Theology, Biola University, La Mirada, California, USA.
Williams, David John, Ph.D. Vice Principal, Ridley College, University of Melbourne, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia.

Wise, Michael O., Ph.D Associate Professor of Aramaic, Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois, USA.

Witherington, Ben, III, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical and Wesleyan Studies, Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, Ohio, USA.

Yamauchi, Edwin M., Ph.D Professor of History, Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, USA

TRANSLATOR

List of Contributors

Allison, Dale C., Jr., Ph.D. Research Fellow, Friends University, Wichita, Kansas, USA.

Banks, Robert, Ph.D. Homer L Goddard Professor of the Ministry of the baity. Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA.

Banchy, S. Scott, Ph.D. Adjunct Associate Professor, Department of History, University of California, Los Angeles, California, USA.

Bauer, David R., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA.

Bayer, Hans F., Ph.D. Dozent in New Testament Exegesis and Department Head in New Testament, German Theological Seminary, Giessen, Germany.

Beasley-Murray, G. R., Ph.D., D.D. Senior Professor of New Testament Interpretation, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, USA.

Black, David Alan, D.Theol. Scholar in Residence, The Lockman Foundation, La Habra, California, USA.

Blackburn, Barry L., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Atlanta Christian College, East Point, Georgia, USA.

Blomberg, Craig L., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado, USA.

Bock, Darrell L., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas, USA.
Brown, Colin, Ph.D. Professor of Systematic Theology and Associate Dean of the Center for Advanced Theological Studies, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA.

Broyles, Craig C, Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Religious Studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada.

Bruce, F. F. D.D. Late Rylands Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis, University of Manchester, Manchester, U.K.

Bürge, Gary M., Ph.D. Karl A Olsson Professor of Religion and Chair, Department of Biblical and Theological Studies, North Park College, Chicago, Illinois, USA.

Caragounis, Chrys C, D.Theol. Associate Professor, University of Lund, Sweden.

Chilton, Bruce, Ph.D. Bernard Iddings Bell Professor of Religion, Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, USA.

Corley, Bruce, Th.D. Professor of New Testament and Dean, School of Theology, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Fort Worth, Texas, USA.

Crump, David M., Ph.D. Pastor, Immanuel Christian Reformed Church, Salt Lake City, Utah, USA.

Danker, Frederick William, Ph.D. Professor Emeritus of Biblical Theology. Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago, Chicago, Illinois, USA.

Davids, Peter H., Ph.D. Scholar in Residence, Langley Vineyard Christian Fellowship, Langley, British Columbia, Canada.

Davidson, Maxwell J., Ph.D. Lecturer in Systematic Theology, Baptist Theological College of Western Australia, Perth, Western Australia, Australia.

Dockery, David S., Ph.D. General Editor, Broadman Press, Nashville, Tennessee, USA.

Dunn, James D. G., D.D. Lightfoot Professor of Divinity, University of Durham, Durham, U.K.

Edwards, Ruth B., Ph.D. Senior Lecturer in New Testament, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, U.K.

Ellingham, Paul, Ph.D. Translation Consultant, United Bible Societies, Aberdeen, U.K.

Elliott, Mark A Th.M. Ph.D. Candidate. University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, U.K.

Evans, Craig A., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical Studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada.

Farris, Stephen C., Ph.D. Professor of Preaching and Worship, Knox College, Toronto School of Theology, Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

France, R. T., Ph.D. Principal, Wydiffe Hall, Oxford, U.K.

Garland, David E., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Interpretation, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky. USA.

Geddet, Timothy J., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Menonite Brethren Biblical Seminary, Fresno, California, USA.

Giles, Kevin N., Th.D. Rector, St Matthew's Church, Marryatville, South Australia, Australia.

Green, Joel B., Ph.D. Academic Dean and Associate Professor of New Testament, New College Berkeley, Berkeley, California, USA.

Greidanus, Sidney, Th.D. Associate Professor of Preaching and Worship, Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan, USA

Guelich, Robert A, D.Theol. Late Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA.

Hawthorne, Gerald F., Ph.D. Professor of Greek, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA.

Heard, Warren J., Jr., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Counseling Psychology and New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA.

Hearon, Holly E., D. Min. Ph.D. Candidate, Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California, USA.

Herzog, William R., II, Ph.D. Dean of the Faculty and Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Colgate Rochester Divinity School/Bexley Hall/Crozer Theological Seminary, Rochester, New York, USA.

Hoehner, Harold W., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas, USA.

Howard, Carol D. C., M.Div. Th.D. Candidate, Harvard Divinity School, Cambridge, Massachusetts, USA.

Huffman, Douglas S., MA New Testament Teaching Fellow/Ph.D Student. Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA.

Hurst, Lincoln D., Ph.D. Associate Professor of Religion, University of California, Davis, California, USA.

Hurtado, Larry W., Ph.D. Professor of Religion and Director of the Institute for the Humanities, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada.

Johnson, David H., Ph.D. (Cand.). Instructor, Providence Theological Seminary, Otterbume, Manitoba, Canada.

Kruse, Colin G., Ph.D. Senior Lecturer in New Testament, Ridley College,
University of Melbourne, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia.

Kynes, William L, Ph.D. Pastor, National Evangelical Free Church, Annandale, Virginia, USA

Levison, John R., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies, North Park College, Chicago, Illinois, USA

Liefeld, Walter L, Ph.D. Distinguished Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

Losie, Lynn A, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Religion, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California, USA.

Lunde, Jonathan M., Th.M. Ph.D. Candidate, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

McKnight, Edgar V., Ph.D. William R Kenan, Jr. Professor of Religion, Furman University, Greenville, South Carolina, USA

McKnight, Scot, Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

Marshall, I. Howard, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament Exegesis, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, U.K.

Martin, Clarice J., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, New Jersey, USA

Michaels, J. Ramsey, Th.D. Professor of Religious Studies, Southwest Missouri State University, Springfield, Missouri, USA

Moo, Douglas J., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

Morris, Leon, Ph.D. Principal Emeritus, Ridley College, Melbourne, Australia.

Mulholland, M. Robert, Jr., Th.D. Vice President and Professor of New Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA
Osborne, Grant R., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA

Page, Sydney H. T., Ph.D. Academic Vice President and Professor of New Testament, Edmonton Baptist Seminary, Edmonton, Alberta, Canada.

Painter, John, Ph.D. Reader in Religious Studies, La Trobe University, Melbourne, Australia.

Paschal, R. Wade, Jr., Ph.D. Director, Beeson International Center for Biblical Preaching and Pastoral Leadership, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, USA

Schmidt, Thomas E., Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Westmont College, Santa Barbara, California, USA

Scholer, David M., Th.D. Distinguished Professor of New Testament and Early Church History, North Park College and Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois, USA

Scott, J. Julius, Jr., Ph.D. Professor of Biblical and Historical Studies, Wheaton College Graduate School, Wheaton, Illinois, USA

Shirbroun, G. Franklin, Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, The Episcopal School of Theology at Claremont, Claremont, California, USA

Shogren, Gary S., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament, Biblical Theological Seminary, Hatfield, Pennsylvania, USA

Sloan, Robert B., D.Theol. Associate Professor of Religion, Baylor University, Waco, Texas, USA

Smith, Robert H., Th.D. Professor of New Testament, Pacific Lutheran Theological Seminary/Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California, USA
Snodgrass, Klyne R., Ph.D. Dean of the Faculty and Paul W. Brandel Professor of New Testament Studies, North Park Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois, USA

Stein, Robert H., Ph.D. Professor of New Testament, Bethel Theological Seminary, St Paul, Minnesota, USA

Thompson, Marianne Meye, Ph.D. Associate Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA

Travis, Stephen H., Ph.D. Vice-Principal, Sc John's College, Nottingham, U.K.

Trites, Allison A, Ph.D. The John Payzant Distinguished Professor of Biblical Studies, Acadia Divinity College, Acadia University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, Canada.

Turner, Max, Ph.D. Director of Research and Lecturer in New Testament, London Bible College, Middlesex. U.K.

Twelftree, Graham H., Ph.D. Minister, Hope Valley Uniting Church, Adelaide, South Australia, Australia.

Watson, Duane F., Ph.D. Assistant Professor of New Testament and Greek, Malone College, Canton, Ohio, USA

Weatherly, Jon A, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Cincinnati Bible College and Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio, USA

Westerholm, Stephen, Th.D. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada.

Whitacre, Rodney A, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Trinity Episcopal School for Ministry, Ambridge, Pennsylvania, USA.

Wilkins, Michael J., Ph.D. Department Chair and Professor of New Testament language and Literature. Talbot School of Theology, Biola University, La Mirada, California, USA.
Williams, David John, Ph.D. Vice Principal, Ridley College, University of Melbourne, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia.

Wise, Michael O., Ph.D Associate Professor of Aramaic, Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois, USA.

Witherington, Ben, III, Ph.D. Associate Professor of Biblical and Wesleyan Studies. Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, Ohio, USA.

Yamauchi, Edwin M., Ph.D Professor of History, Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, USA

TRANSLATOR

ABBA. See God; PRAYER: SON OF GOD

ABLATHAR

The high priest (see Priest, Priesthood) who, according to Jesus, gave David and his men the Bread of the Presence which only priests were allowed to eat (Mk 2:25-26). This reference is extremely problematical since 1 Samuel 21:1-6 indicates that Ahimelech gave the bread to David. Matthew (12:4) and Luke (6:4) remove reference to Abiathar, and several manuscripts of Mark omit the reference (D, W, 1009, 1546, it, Syr) although none, interestingly, substitutes Ahimelech for Abiathar. The possible solutions to the problem are few: (1) the phrase epi Abiathar archiereōs ("when Abiathar was high priest") has been misunderstood; (2) the author of Mark misrepresented Jesus; (3) Jesus was mistaken; (4) the OT references are faulty.

The first option (Wenham, Lane) suggests the phrase is a general reference to the section in 1 Samuel where Abiathar plays a significant role, similar to the usage in Mark 12:26 by which Jesus specifies a particular portion of Moses'* writings with the phrase epi tou batou ("about the bush"). But this explanation has been effectively rejected (Lagrange, Rogers) as contrary to the attested usage of such a phrase and not parallel to 12:26.

The second option sees 2:25-26 as a later addition to the account (Hultgren, Klostermann). But it has been argued that this explanation disregards the literary integrity of the passage as a whole (Taylor).

The argument that Jesus was mistaken pointedly raises theological issues regarding the authority of Jesus and the Gospels. But another explanation, a variation on (4), may provide a satisfactory solution to the problem. In 1—2 Samuel, 1 Kings and 1 Chronicles, two different traditions appear. The major tradition presents Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, who gave the bread to David, as priest under David prior to David's kingship and co-priest with Zadok under David's reign (1 Sam 21:1-9; 22:9-16, 20-22; 23:6-9; 30:7; 2 Sam 15:24-36;

The existence of two traditions, rather than an error, is supported by the presence of the minor tradition in the material of the major at 2 Samuel 8:17, and especially by the presence of the major tradition in the material of the minor at 1 Chronicles 15:11. The latter is noteworthy in that the Chronicler, in an otherwise verbatim reproduction of 2 Samuel 8:15-18 (par. 1 Chron 18:14-17), retains Ahimelech son of Abiathar as priest with Zadok but changes the role of David's sons from priests (kōh₂nim in 2 Sam 8:18) to chiefs (hāriʾšōnîm in 1 Chron 18:17). Such a concern for accuracy regarding the priesthood would seem to require a reversal of Abiathar and Ahimelech to agree with the rest of Samuel and Kings, unless the Chronicler knew a tradition which preserved the order of Ahimelech as son of Abiathar. The Chronicler appears not to have been interested in materials prior to the Davidic kingship, retaining only the death of Saul as the historical prelude to David's reign (1 Chron 10). Thus the Chronicler provides no information on the period of David's flight from Saul during which the Ahimelech/Abiathar account occurs. The Chronicler's strong reliance on the minor tradition, however, implies that Abiathar would have been the priest who gave David the bread rather than Ahimelech.

While the evidence is inconclusive and susceptible to various interpretations, it is possible to view the presence of Abiathar in Mark 2:25-26 not as a mistake of Jesus or Mark but as reflecting Jesus' and/or Mark's acquaintance with the minor tradition which reversed the roles of Abiathar and Ahimelech. Whatever the case, until the dual traditions within the OT are resolved, there remains scriptural evidence for the reliability of Mark 2:25-26.

See also Gospels (Historical Reliability): Old Testament in the Gospels.

ABIDING

As a common translation of the Greek verb menein, "to abide" has rich theological associations in the Fourth Gospel where 40 of the 112 NT occurrences of the verb occur (it appears another 26 times in the Epistles of John). It is used to communicate the enduring character of Christ,* and more importantly, when used with the preposition "in" and a personal object, it points to the relationship of mutual indwelling of the Father, the Son (see Son of God) and the believer.

1. Abiding As a Quality of Character.

In the Greek OT menein, when used in a theological sense, most commonly speaks of the abiding character of God.* In contrast to the transitory nature of all things human, God remains, he endures, he is immutable. In the NT period this was considered to be a trait of the Messiah also, as evidenced by the crowds in John's Gospel who say, "We have heard from the law* that the Christ abides forever" (12:34). And John would have us know that Jesus is the Son who abides forever (8:35), who gives food that abides unto eternal life (6:27), and who enables one to produce fruit that abides (15:16).

In addition, in the first use of the verb in the Gospel, the Evangelist relates that John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) saw the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) coming down from heaven* as a dove and remaining (emeinen) on Jesus (1:32). This was no momentary experience of the Spirit, perhaps like that of the judges or prophets,* but an enduring reality in Jesus' life.

2. Abiding in Relationship.

Of greater interest is the use in John's Gospel of the phrase "to abide in" with a personal object to express the relationship of Jesus to the Father and both to believers. The priority must be given to Jesus' mutual indwelling with the Father: "Don't you believe that I am in the Father and the Father is in me? The words that I speak to you are not from myself, but the Father who abides in me does his work" (14:10). This is a dynamic relationship which energizes the ministry of Jesus. Out of this personal union come his words and his works which manifest the character of God. "Do not believe me unless I do what my Father does. But if I do it, even though you do not believe me, believe the miracles, that you may learn and understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father" (10:37-38 NIV).

The Son obeys the Father and imitates the Father (5:19-20; 14:31), but the Father imparts his life to the Son ("I live because of the Father," 6:57; also 5:26), and together they share this common life and are united in love (3:35; 5:20; 14:31; 15:10; 17:21-23). This relationship between the Father and the Son becomes the model and source of the relationship between Jesus and his disciples.*

Jesus called men and women into this relationship of mutual indwelling using the most graphic imagery: "He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me and I in him" (6:56). Just as the Father has loved Jesus, so Jesus has loved his disciples, and they are to abide in his love (15:9). Just as Jesus has remained in his Father's love by obeying his commands (see Commandment), so the disciples are to abide in Jesus' love by obeying his commands (15:10). And as they abide in him, Jesus will convey his life to them, even as a vine* gives life to its branches (15:4-6). His life will manifest itself in their lives as they bear fruit, even as his works were the work of his Father. Apart from him the disciples can do nothing, just as Jesus could do nothing apart from the Father (5:19, 30).

Jesus mediates to his disciples the relationship he enjoys with his heavenly Father. "Just as the living Father sent me and I live because of the Father, so the one who feeds on me will live because of me" (6:57 NIV). The one who loves Jesus will be loved by the Father, and together the Father and the Son will make their abode (monē— a cognate of menein) with him (14:23). "I have given them the glory* that you gave me, that they may be one as we are one: I in them and you in me" (17:22-23). This is the perfect unity that results from the mutual indwelling of the Father, the Son and the believers.

"Abiding in Christ" assumes the most intimate union possible. The identification of Jesus with the true vine (15:1), a symbol of Israel* (cf. Hos 10:1; Jer 2:21; Ps 80:9-12, 15-16; Is 5:7), in which the disciples are to abide, suggests a corporate dimension to his person that has important christological implications.

This union with Christ, however, must not be con-fused with ideas of the Hellenistic mystery cults (see Hellenism), some of which taught a loss of individuality or a pantheistic absorption of the believer into (he being of the divine. The teaching of the Fourth Gospel maintains throughout a moral dimension that assumes individual responsibility. It is a relationship that always begins with the divine initiative, but which calls for a human response: "Abide in me . . . abide in my word ... abide in my love" (15:4, 7, 9).

W. L Kynes

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. See APOCALYPTIC TEACHING.

ABRAHAM

1. Abraham in the OT and Early Jewish Literature
2. Abraham in the Synoptic Gospels
3. Abraham in the Gospel According to John

1. Abraham in the OT and Early Jewish Literature.

The patriarchs became increasingly important to the Jewish people after they returned from their exile in Babylon. Abraham was one of these important figures whose stature is reflected in extra-biblical Jewish literature and in the NT.
1.1. Abraham in the OT. Later accounts of Abraham are based on the stories of the patriarch found in the OT. The depiction of the life of Abraham is found in Genesis, from his inclusion in the genealogy* of his father, Terah (11:27), to his death and burial (25:7-10). The major events in Abraham's life are his leaving his father and birthplace (12:1), his sojourns in Egypt and Gerar (12:10-20; 20:1-18), his battle with the kings (14:1-16), his meeting with Melchizedek (14:17-20), God's covenant with him (15:7-21; 17:2, 4), his union with Hagar and the birth of Ishmael (16:1-15), God's commandment of circumcision for Abraham and his descendants (17:9-14), the promise of the birth of Isaac (17:15-21), the birth of Isaac (21:1-7), the offering of Isaac (22:1-19) and the death and burial of Sarah (23:1-20).

Four primary themes are found in the Genesis account: the promises from God that Abraham would have many descendants (12:2; 13:16; 15:5; 17:2, 4; 22:17) and land (12:7; 13:14-15; 15:7), the obedience of Abraham (12:1-4; 17:1; 22:16-18) and the subsequent blessing of all nations through Abraham (12:3; 22:18).

Within the OT Abraham functions in three primary ways. First, he is the father of the Jewish people (Gen 25:19; 26:15,24; 28:13; 32:9; 48:15-16; Ex 3:6; Deut 1:8; 6:10; 9:5; 30:20; Josh 24:3; 1 Chron 1:27-28, 34; 16:13; Ps 105:6; Is 41:8; Jer 33:26; Mic 7:20). Second, he is the original source of blessing for the Jewish people (Gen 26:3-5, 24; 28:4; 35:12; 50:24; Ex 2:24; 6:3-8; 32:13; 33:1; Num 32:11; Deut 1:8; 6:10; 9:5, 27; 29:13; 30:20; 34:4; 2 Kings 13:23; 1 Chron 16:15-16; 2 Chron 20:7; Neh 9:7-8; Ps 105:7-11, 42; Is 51:2; Mic 7:20). Third, his name is used to identify the God of the Jewish people as "the God of Abraham" (Gen 28:13; 31:42,53; 32:9; Ex 3:6, 15-16; 4:5; 1 Kings 18:36; 1 Chron 29:18; 2 Chron 30:6; Ps 47:9).

Abraham functions in three more noteworthy ways. His obedience to God and his laws (Gen 26:4-5; see also Neh 9:7-8) was the basis for the blessing of his descendants. God's compassion toward the Jewish people is sometimes invoked on the basis of his covenant with Abraham (Deut 9:27; 2 Kings 13:23; Mic 7:18-20). Finally, God brings Abraham out of the midst of idolatry (Josh 24:2-3).

1.2. Abraham in Early Jewish Literature. The authors of Jewish literature from 200 B.C. to A.D. 200 used many of the same themes found in the OT accounts in accordance with their particular situations. Josephus* and Philo portray Abraham as one who assimilates pagan, particularly Hellenistic (see Hellenism), culture (e.g., Josephus Ant. 1.154-157, 161, 166-168; Philo Ahr. 88 and Quis her. 88). In other texts Abraham is one who isolates himself from Gentile* influence (Jub. 22:16, Bib. Ant. 6.4). The authors of these texts have not only apologetic motives, as in the case of Diaspora authors Philo and Josephus, but didactic motives as well. The Jews are permitted or instructed to live in their respective situations in the same way that Abraham is portrayed as living in a particular situation at a particular time.

Four major themes are found in these texts. First, the stress on Abraham as a tenacious monotheist, often portrayed as the first, is prevalent in texts from Palestine and the Diaspora from 200 B.C. to A.D. 200 (Jub. 11:16-17; 12:1-5, 16-21; 20:6-9; Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 6.4; Josephus Ant. 1.154-157; Philo Abr. 68-71,88; Praem. 27, 57-58; Virt. 212-216; Ebr. 107-110; Apoc. Ab. 1—8). Second, God establishes a covenant with Abraham through which his descendants are blessed (Jub. 15:9-10; Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 7.4; 1 QapGen 21.8-14; m. B. Qam. 8.6; m. B. Meš. 7.1) and are shown compassion (Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 30.7; Pss. Sol. 9:8-11; T. Levi 15:4; As. Mos. 3:8-9). However, often one must obey the stipulations of the covenant to remain within it (Jub. 15:26-27). Eventually other nations would be blessed as well (Sir 44:21). Third, Abraham’s character is extolled. He is righteous (T. Ab. 1:1A), hospitable (T. Ab. 1:1-3A; Philo Abr. 107-110; Josephus Ant. 1.196) and virtuous (Josephus Ant. 1.154, 165, 256; Philo Abr. 68, 269; Quis her. 88; Mig. 166-167). He is faithful (Sir 44:20; 1 Macc 2:52; Jub. 17:17-18), he loves God (Jub. 17:18) and is even called the friend of God (CD 3.2-4). Josephus maintains that Abraham and his seed are rewarded because of his virtue and piety (Ant. 1.234). Fourth, Abraham lived according to the Mosaic Law* (Jub. 15:1-2; 16:20; Sir 44:20; m. Quid. 4:14) or the natural/philosophical law (Philo Abr. 3-6). Abraham is alive (4 Macc 7:19; 16:25; T. Levi 18:14; T.Jud. 25:1; T. Benj. 10:6) and praises those who die for keeping the Law (4 Macc 13:13-18). Abraham established the covenant by being circumcised (Sir 44:20). Additionally, Abraham is noted for his powers of intercession (T. Ab. 18:10-11 A) and his ascension to the heavens* where he receives revelation (Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 18.5; T. Ab. 10-14; Apoc. Ab. 15:4-30; 4 Ezra 3:14-15).

2. Abraham in the Synoptic Gospels.

Abraham is mentioned in all of the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 1:1-2, 17; 3:9; 8:11; 22:32; Mk 12:26; Lk 1:55, 73; 3:8, 34; 13:16, 28; 16:22-30; 19:9; 20:37).
2.1. Abraham Tradition Common to All Three Synoptics. Abraham is mentioned only once in Mark (12:26), and then within the context of the Sadducees' question regarding the marital status in the resurrection of the woman who had married seven brothers consecutively (12:18-27; see also Mt 22:23-33; Lk 20:27-40). The Sadducees, who did not believe in the resurrection (Mk 12:18; Mt 22:23; Lk 20:27), present the idea of the resurrection as an absurdity within the context of present human relationships.

In both Mark and Matthew, Jesus gives the Sadducees a twofold answer since they know neither the "Scriptures nor the power of God" (Mk 12:24; Mt 22:29). By the power of God, those who have risen from the dead are like angels and do not marry. Thus, marriage is made obsolete. Secondly, Jesus uses God's identification of himself to Moses at the burning bush (Ex 3:6) as proof that God is the God of the living, not of the dead. After all, God can only be God of those who are alive. God is faithful to his promises to the patriarchs to be their God (in the case of Abraham, see Gen 17:7) and, subsequently, to his covenant people as well. The account in Luke divides the modes of life into present and future ages (Lk 20:34-35), adding "for all live to him" (Lk 20:38). The author of 4 Maccabees similarly portrays the patriarchs as those who "do not die to God, but live in (or 'to') God" (4 Macc 7:19; 16:25).

2.2.1. The Genealogies. Although both Matthew and Luke include Abraham in their genealogies* (Mt 1:1-2,17; Lk 3:34), he is more significant in Matthew. The Evangelist introduces the Gospel with "the book of the genealogy of Jesus Christ, the son of David (see Son of David), the son of Abraham" (1:1). The transition to the genealogy is simple since it begins with Abraham "the father of Isaac" (1:2; see also 1 Chron 1:34). Abraham is mentioned a third time in chapter one (1:17) where the Evangelist outlines turning points in Israelite history as being fourteen generations from Abraham to David, fourteen generations from David to the Babylonian exile and fourteen generations from the exile to the Christ*

It is important that Jesus is the son of Abraham for three major reasons: (1) It means that Jesus is a Jew, a physical descendant of Abraham; (2) although the title "son of Abraham" was not messianic (Davies/ Allison, 158), in order for the Messiah to transmit the blessings begun with Abraham to his people, he had to be a descendant of Abraham; (3) Abraham was the originator of Israelite history while Jesus appears to be its culminator (Mt 1:17).

Although Luke's genealogy only mentions Abraham (Lk 3:34), it is still significant that Jesus is a "son of Abraham" since as such he is a Jew and a channel of blessing to the people of God. In Luke, Jesus' genealogy, traced back to Adam and God, may reflect the theme of extension of salvation* to the Gentiles, since it envisages his relationship to all humankind as God's Son (see Son of God; Fitzmyer, 1:190).

2.2.2. Children of Abraham from Stone (Mt 3:9; Lk 3:8). Both Evangelists mention Abraham within the larger context of the ministry of John the Baptist* at the Jordan River (Mt 3:1-17; Lk 3:1-9; see Jn 8:33, 39). John warns those coming to him for baptism* (Pharisees* and Sadducees in Mt 3:7; a "multitude" in Lk 3:7) that they can rely no longer on their ethnic privilege as descendants of Abraham to guarantee them protection from the wrath of God. God can raise up "children"* (Mt 3:9; Lk 3:8) of Abraham from stone (See Is 51:1-2; Pseudo-Philo Bib. Ant. 23.4-5; Gen 17:17; 18:10-14). The genealogical tree of Abraham (Is 11:1; see Wallace-Hadrill) is even in danger of destruction. It is not Abrahamic descent that will save them from the wrath of God, but conduct which is "consonant with an inner reform of life" (Fitzmyer, 1:468; see also Jn 8:39 and below).

2.2.3. Abraham at the Eschatological Banquet (Mt 8:10-11; Lk 13:28-29). Both Matthew and Luke speak of the eschatological banquet (see Table Fellowship) at which Abraham, Isaac and Jacob will preside (Luke adds "all the prophets" in 13:28). It is common in Jewish tradition that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are found together with the righteous (see Justice, Righteousness; see Ward, 176; cf. 4 Macc 13:17; T. Levi 18:14; T.Judah 25:1; T. Benj. 10:6. See also Acts 3:13; 7:32 for occurrences of the threesome). The Matthean account occurs at the conclusion of the story of the Gentile centurion (Mt 8:1-13; see Lk 7:1-10), whose faith is unrivalled even by the Jews (Mt 8:10). In Luke the eschatological banquet scene is inserted within the parable of the narrow door (Lk 13:22-30). Both contexts, however, depict the inclusion of the Gentiles at the eschatological banquet in the kingdom of God* (Mt 8:11; Lk 13:29; see Ps 107:3; Is 49:12) and the exclusion of certain Jews (Mt 8:12; Lk 13:27-28). In these accounts Abraham is primarily an eschatological figure, although in Matthew as well as in Luke the Evangelist is establishing a "connection and continuity between the history of Abraham and the events of which he himself is writing" (Dahl, 140). The portrayal of Abraham as a heavenly figure is certainly not unique (see above, 1.2.), nor is his reputation for hospitality, even to Gentiles (see above, 1.2.; T. Ab Rec. A 1:1-2).

2.3. References to Abraham Particular to Luke.

2.3.1. The Hymns. Luke is unique in his inclusion of hymns within his infancy narrative. Luke may have used outside source material in the composition of these hymns. However, to "admit such sources does not mean that Luke has not reworked them, in his own style" (Fitzmyer, 1:309). Two of these hymns refer to Abraham (Lk 1:46-55, 67-79). The Magnificat is the hymn of Mary (see Mary's Song) as she rejoices in anticipation of the birth of Jesus (see also 1 Sam 2:1-10). The theme of the hymn is that God helps his people in the present as he helped them in the past. Historically, he has destroyed the powerful and rich (see Rich and Poor); he has helped the oppressed and the poor (Ex 2:24). God continues to help the poor and oppressed in the present time (Lk 1:47-48). This assistance is based on God's faithfulness to the descendants (literally "seed"; see also Acts 3:25; 7:1-5) of Abraham because of his promises to him (see 1. above; Mic. 7:20). Abraham himself was without land or descendants until he was blessed by God (Gen 17:7-8; 18:18; 22:17-18). Mary's experience "is not an isolated incident but rather part of the merciful remembrance of God who wants to fulfill his promises of salvation" (Zorrilla, 233). Successive generations will also experience the compassion of God (1:48).

The Benedictus is a prophecy given by Zechariah (see Zechariah's Song) concerning his son, John. John will prepare the way before the Lord (Lk 1:76) who will bring salvation to his people (Lk 1:68-69). This salvation, the purpose of which is to enable persons to serve God without fear from enemies (Lk 1:71, 73), is based on the mercy promised to the Jewish ancestors for which the covenant (or oath, Gen 22:16-17; 26:3) sworn to Abraham (Lk 1:72-73; Ps 105:7-11) is the foundation. Dahl (146-147) sees the messianic redemption as described in terms "reminiscent of the deliverance from Egypt, and seen as the fulfillment of God's oath to Abraham" (Ps 106:10; Gen 15:13-14; Acts 7:2-8,17).

2.3.2. A Daughter of Abraham. The "bent" woman who is healed on the Sabbath (Lk 13:10-17) is called a "daughter of Abraham" (13:16). This is the only use of the expression "daughter of Abraham" in the Greek Bible. In Luke only Jews are called children of Abraham (Dahl, 151). In the pericope the Sabbath* and the synagogue* "segregate this needy woman from divine help" (Green, 649). Jesus recognizes that as a child of Abraham she is one to whom salvation was promised (Lk 1:46-55; see 2.3.1. above). God's faithfulness to the descendants of Abraham continues because of his promises to the patriarch. This is seen especially in the case of the excluded and the outcast. The daughter of Abraham who is excluded by the religious structure is healed (see 2.3.2. above). Zacchaeus, the outcast son of Abraham, has salvation extended to him. Luke's special concern for the oppressed is noticeable when the rich man, though he is a child of Abraham, is not allowed to join Lazarus in Abraham's bosom (see 2.3.3. below) because of his lack of compassion toward Lazarus while they both were alive. Thus, those thought to be excluded from the chosen are included, while those thought to be chosen are excluded.

The healing of the bent woman is a sign of salvation happening as fulfilled by the ministry of Jesus, the "lord of the Sabbath" (Lk 6:5). Notably, she is healed on the Sabbath, a day commemorating the Israelites' liberation from bondage (Deut 5:15; see Lk 13:16), and it is on this day that the woman's bondage is removed. By rebuking the disease, Jesus is also rebuking Satan (13:16; see also Green, 653; see Demon, Devil, Satan). She may be one of those who is included in the eschatological banquet presided over by Abraham and his descendants (Lk 13:28-30; see 2.2.3. above).

2.3.3. Abraham's Bosom. The heavenly Abraham (see 1.2. above) is included within this pericope which condemns the rich man and exalts the poor man Lazarus. (For analyses of similar folk tales, see Fitzmyer, 2:1126). After his death Lazarus is carried by angels* to "Abraham's bosom." "Abraham's bosom" is not a synonym for Paradise, although this passage reflects the tradition in which Abraham is thought to be in heaven (see 1.2. above). The poor man enjoys close fellowship with Abraham (Marshall, 636), perhaps reminiscent of the intimacy between Abraham and Jacob in Jubilees 23:1-3 (see also Lk 13:29). The rich man has died and resides in Hades, separated from Abraham by a great chasm (Lk 16:26; cf. 1 Enoch 22). The rich man cries out to Abraham, calling him "Father" (Lk 16:24,27, 30) and demanding assistance from Lazarus. Abraham answers him, calling him "child" (Lk 16:25). The rich man's status as a child of Abraham does not bring him relief. Father Abraham himself refuses to assist him (Lk 16:25-26; for Abraham as judge, see T. Ab. 10:6-16A). Abraham will not even send Lazarus to the rich man's family to warn them because they already have the Law of Moses (Lk 16:31). Luke is stressing that salvation involves a "reaction of faith" (Fitzmyer, 2:1129) which the rich man did not have. He was thus condemned, although he was a Jew. Abraham is also appropriate in this pericope because, unlike the rich man, he was often portrayed... as having followed the Law (see 1.2. above), which was not burdensome (Philo Abr. 5; Deut 30:11-14).

2.3.4. Zacchaeus As Son of Abraham. Zacchaeus is a rich, chief tax collector for the Romans (Lk 19:2; see Taxes), and as such he is a sinner* (Lk 6:24), especially in the eyes of the Jews (Lk 18:9-14; 19:7; see also Loewe, 321-23). Upon interacting with Jesus, Zacchaeus repents (Lk 19:8; see Lev 6:1-7; cf. the story of the rich ruler, Lk 18:18-25). Salvation is extended to Zacchaeus, the "son of Abraham" who once was lost, by Jesus who "came to seek and to save the lost" (Lk 19:10; Ezek 34:16). Zacchaeus is again a true son of Abraham who, like other outcast Jews, has received the fulfillment of the promises to Abraham in the ministry of Jesus (Gen 17:7; see 2.3.2. above; Dahl, 149-54).

The name of Abraham, while occurring nowhere else in the Johannine writings, is found ten times in John 8:31-59. Throughout the account Jesus points out that although the questioning Jews are descendants of Abraham in a physical sense (Jn 8:37), they deny it by their actions (Brown, 357). First, they are not like Abraham because they strive to kill Jesus, a messenger of God (Jn 8:40, 42; Gen 18:1-15; perhaps Jn 8:35 refers to Eliezer and Isaac, the house slave and the son; see Gen 15:2; 17:19). Second, while Abraham was known for his exemplary character (see 1.2. above), Jesus' opponents are said to be children of the devil, whose desires they fulfill (8:44). Third, Jesus' opponents are unlike Abraham because they do not recognize that Jesus is God (Jn 8:58-59; for Abraham as the first monotheist, see 1.2. above). Other references to Abraham in the chapter concern the death of Abraham (Gen 25:8, which lacks a testament; see T. Ab. which provides an explanation for this lack) and Abraham's rejoicing to see Jesus' day (Jn 8:56).

Just how Abraham saw Jesus' day goes unexplained. Brown refers to Jubilees 16:17-19: "Abraham was told that it was through Isaac that the holy people of God would be descendant, and that both Abraham and Sarah rejoiced at the news" (Brown, 360; see Gen 17:17; 21:6). Perhaps the Evangelist is referring to the Genesis account in the knowledge that Jesus would come from this holy people. Another explanation might be that Abraham was given a revelation of the future like the one in Apocalypse of Abraham which mentions God's "chosen one" (31:1). Abraham had special knowledge of God (see 1.2. above, especially so in the works of Philo; see Jn 8:32) which, in terms of contemporary Jewish thought, meant that he escaped idolatry (Ap. Ab. 6—8; Jub. 12) and the consequent slavery to sin (Jub. 20:6-10). This portrayal of Abraham certainly fits the theme of freedom (8:32) and slavery (8:34-35) in John 8.

See also Moses.

N. L. Calvert

ADULTERY. See DIVORCE

AMEN

Amen is used one hundred times in the Gospels— thirty-one times by Matthew, thirteen times by Mark, six times by Luke and twenty-five times (always doubled, "amen, amen") by John. The word is simply a transliteration of the Greek word amēn, which in turn is a transliteration of the Hebrew ī'amēn, a word derived from a verb that means "confirm, support, establish, verify." Yet in no English version, except those based on the Textus Receptus (cf. KJV and NKJV and only at Mt 6:13; 28:20; Mk 16:20; Lk 24:53; Jn 21:25) does it appear as "amen." Rather it is always translated as "verily," "truly," "solemnly" or is not translated at all other than in a way to give emphasis to what is being said: "Believe me," "I tell you this," "Remember this," and so on.

In the OT "amen" was used most frequently as the response of an individual or the congregation to corroborate or affirm a word spoken by another—a prayer that was made (1 Chron 16:36), a curse that was pronounced (Deut 27:14-26) or a doxology that was sung to God (Ps 41:13; 72:19; cf. 3 Macc 7:23). "Amen" was the acknowledgement of the validity of the word spoken, of its binding nature. As a consequence "amen" meant something like "Yes, I (we) fully agree" or "Yes, this is true" or "May it most certainly be as you say!" Sometimes it appears in a doubled form, "amen, amen" (Num 5:22; Neh 8:6), apparently to make the response especially emphatic. This doubled response-form is the only form found to date in the literature from Qumran (cf. 1QS 1:20; 2:10, 18). Only very occasionally is "amen" found at the beginning of a saying (1 Kings 1:36; Jer 28:6), and never is it used by people to confirm or validate their own words. The NT, exclusive of the Gospels, uses "amen" in a way similar to that of the OT—such as being placed at the end of a doxology (Rom 1:25), used as the response of the people to a prayer (1 Cor 14:16), employed as an emphatic "Yes" to God (2 Cor 1:20).

In the Gospels, however, the situation is quite different "Amen" is never found at the end of a saying as a response of the people but only at the beginning of a saying. It is always the first word of the formulaic expression "Amen, I say to you," and it is always and only spoken by Jesus, apparently to emphasize the significance of the words he was about to speak. No other person—apostle or prophet—of the early church felt at liberty to follow his example by making use of this very formula (but cf. 1 Cor 7:12).

It is difficult to classify the sayings of Jesus introduced by "Amen, I say to you." Some of them are sayings about the kingdom of heaven/kingdom of God (e.g., Mt 13:17; 18:3) and about entering the kingdom (Mk 10:15; Jn 3:3-5). Some are sayings about the eschaton (Mt 10:23; 16:28 par. Mk 9:1; 25:40, 45). Some are sayings that challenge the Judaism of Jesus' day, or better, its exaggeration (Mt 6:2, 5, 16; 8:10), but many cannot be classified so easily. Nevertheless, the "amen"-sayings of Jesus are weighty utterances. They affirm such things as the importance of reconciliation (Mt 5:26), of giving freely (Mt 10:42), of faith (Mt 17:20; Jn 5:24), of joy over the lost being found (Mt 18:13), of humility and openness to God versus arrogant independence from him (Mt 21:31) and of not attributing good to evil origins (Mk 3:28). Interestingly, however, not every statement of Jesus is introduced in this emphatic way. Many of his significant sayings have no introductory formula whatsoever (e.g., Mk 10:45).

Scholars have observed: (1) that as yet no exact Hebrew equivalent of the expression "Amen I say to you" has turned up, (2) that it is found in all the Gospels and (3) that it appears in all strata of the Gospel tradition. These facts suggest, then, that "here we have the creation of a new expression by Jesus" (Jeremias, 36), "an authentic reminiscence" of Jesus' own words (Brown, 84). Surely this is so. This new expression was intended by Jesus not so much to direct attention to his divinity as to his authority* to speak for God as the messenger of God. Although not precisely identical, the closest analogy to his "Amen, I say to you" is the formula so frequently used by those who spoke the words of God in the OT—"Thus says the Lord"—that expression of the prophets by which they made clear that their words were God's. To be sure, Jesus was more than a prophet, but there is a sense in which he stood in that same tradition (see Prophet) as one filled with the Holy Spirit* (Lk 4:1). With the words "Amen, I say to you," Jesus certainly went beyond the OT prophets because he, unlike them, had been given the Spirit without measure (Jn 3:34). Like them, however, he was in essence saying the same thing but in a higher key: "You must listen to what I have to say, because the words that I speak are not mine; they are the very words of God!" (Jn 3:34).

Although the expression "Amen, I say to you" did indeed originate with Jesus and was used frequently by him to give expression to his unique authority, it may also be true that, aware of this, the Gospel writers added this formula to other of Jesus' remarks to make them especially emphatic. This inference may be drawn from noting that there are places in Mark where an important saying of Jesus is introduced with the formula "Amen, I say to you," but where Matthew and Luke, who have identical or similar sayings, either omit the formula altogether (Mt 12:39; 16:4; Lk 11:29b with Mk 8:12; Mt 19:29 with Mk 10:29; Lk 17:6 with Mk 11:23), or modify it in some way such as "For this reason I say to you" (Mt 12:31 with Mk 3:28), "But I say to you" (Mt 26:29 with Mk 14:25). "But I say to you truly (alēthōs, Lk 9:27 with Mk 9:1), "Truly (alēthōs) I say to you" (Lk 21:3 with Mk 12:43), "For I say to you" (Lk 22:18 with Mk 14:25), or simply "I say to you" (Lk 22:34 with Mk 14:30). Furthermore, in the Lukan parallels to Matthew, although "amen" always appears in Matthew, it never does in Luke—either there is no formula whatsoever (Mt 5:18 par. Lk 16:17; Mt 18:13 cf. Lk 15:5) or "I say to you" shows up without the prepositioned "amen" (Mt 5:26 par. Lk 12:59; Mt 8:10 par. Lk 7:9; Mt 10:15 cf. Lk 10:12; Mt 11:11 par. Lk 7:28; Mt 13:17 par. Lk 10:24), or it is replaced by "Yes (mi), I say to you" (Mt 23:36 par. Lk 11:51), "Truly (alēthōs), I say to you" (Mt 24:47 par. Lk 12:44). In any case, it is clear that each instance of the "Amen, I say to you" formula was intended to underscore the authority of Jesus to speak for God, and to emphasize the importance of his words.

See also Prophets and Prophecy.

G. F. Hawthorne

ANGELS

According to the Gospels, angels are spirit beings who serve God,* particularly in connection with Jesus' work of proclaiming and establishing the kingdom of God. They are important in passages dealing with certain significant events in Jesus' life and work, including his birth,* the temptations* in the wilderness, the coming of the Son of man* and the eschatological judgment,* and the resurrection.* While first-century Jewish thought regarded revelation as a major role for angels, the Gospels make this function prominent only in the birth and resurrection narratives. These events at the beginning and end of the Gospels mark the coming of the Son to dwell on earth and his return to heaven.*

1. Terminology and General Jewish Background
2. The Nature of Angels
3. The Angel of the Lord
4. The Synoptic Gospels
5. The Gospel of John
6. Conclusion
1. Terminology and General Jewish Background.

In the NT "angel" translates the Greek word angelos. In classical Greek an angelos was a messenger who represented the one sending him and who enjoyed the protection of the gods. In the OT mal'ak was used for both human messengers (e.g., Gen 32:3; Is 33:7) and angels (e.g., Gen 21:17; Ps 103:20). The LXX translators used angelos for mal'ak when they understood it to refer to angels. Likewise, they used angelos to render a few other expressions for angels, such as "sons of God" (e.g., Job 1:6). In the Gospels angelos occurs fifty-four times; in five instances it refers to human messengers (Mt 11:10; Mk 1:2; Lk 7:24, 27; 9:52), and the remaining occurrences refer to angels.

In the OT world view angels are spirits created by God and subordinate to him. They worship him as members of his court (Dan 7:10) and serve him by intervening in human affairs, bringing divine messages (Gen 22:11-12), protecting and aiding his people (1 Kings 19:5; Ps 91:11) and smiting their enemies (2 Kings 19:35). Particularly important is the one called the Angel of the Lord (see below). Compared with the OT, intertestamental Jewish literature such as 1 Enoch, Jubilees and the writings of the Qumran community, evidence a wide proliferation of ideas about angels. Nevertheless, the essential elements of the beliefs we encounter in the Gospels are already present in the OT. It is unnecessary to seek elsewhere, such as in Greek mystery religions, for the origins of NT beliefs concerning angels.

2. The Nature of Angels.

The Gospels only incidentally provide information on the nature of angels, and not from any speculative interest. Angels belong to the structure of reality and are mentioned in matter-of-fact language, as when Jesus answered the Sadducees' objection to the idea of resurrection (Mt 22:30; Lk 20:34-36). The fact that angels belong to God clearly indicates their subordination to him (Lk 12:8-9; Jn 1:51). They also belong to Jesus, the eschatological Son of man (Mt 13:41). On the other hand, the devil's angels are destined with him for eternal fire (Mt 25:41; see Demon, Devil, Satan; Heaven and Hell). The Gospels offer no prehistory of these angels, though the notion of angelic sin was developed in Jewish writings (e.g., 1 Enoch 6—9; 2 Apoc. Bar. 56:12-14) and is reflected in the NT (2 Pet 2:4; Jude 6). The fact that their ultimate fate is in God's hands presupposes his sovereignty over them and the devil. Angels can dwell in heaven (Mt 18:10; Mk 12:25) and move freely between heaven and earth (Mt 28:2; Lk 2:13; Jn 1:51). Those who watch over "little ones" enjoy access to God (Mt 18:10). They are holy (Lk 9:26) and can be associated with God's glory* in visible form (Lk 2:9; cf. 24:4), though this is a derived glory, arising from their close association with God (cf. Lk 9:26). Their numbers are very great (Mt 26:53; Lk 2:13; cf. Dan 7:10).

No speculation is entertained about their appearance, although they can present themselves in human form (as in the case of the "two men" seen at Jesus' tomb, Lk 24:4) and converse with people (Lk 1:13-20; 24:5-7). Since angels never die, they do not need to marry and reproduce (Mt 22:30; Lk 20:36). They are never said in the Gospels to possess wings.

Gabriel, whose name means "God is strong" or "man of God," is the only angel named in the Gospels (Lk 1:19, 26). He stands in God's presence (Lk 1:19; cf. 1 Enoch 9:1; Jub. 2:18; lQH 6:13; T. Levi 3:5, 7), which means, in the imagery of a royal court, that he is God's personal servant. It was Gabriel who appeared as a man to Daniel, interpreting a vision and giving insight (Dan 8:15-26; 9:21-27). The only other angel named in the Bible is Michael (Dan 10:13, 21; Jude 9; Rev 12:7), though various non-canonical Jewish writings name many angels. Gabriel features in several lists of leading angels or archangels, the earliest of which include four names (1 Enoch 9:1; 1QM 9:14-16), while others enumerate seven (1 Enoch 20; cf. Tob. 12:15; Rev 8:2). In their angelology the Gospels show marked restraint, not engaging in speculation about angels. Their focus is on Jesus himself.

3. The Angel of the Lord.

In the OT the phrase "the Angel of the Lord" occurs some sixty times. This angel is a special servant of Yahweh who helps accomplish God's will among his people. Thus he appeared to Moses* at the burning bush (Ex 3:2), opposed Balaam (Num 22:22-35) and encouraged Gideon (Judg 6:11-16). He is said to have caused death among Israel's* enemies (2 Kings 19:35) and in Israel itself (1 Chron 21:14-15), though he usually comes to the aid of God's people (Ex 14:19; Judg 2:1; 1 Kings 19:7; Ps 34:7). Often this angel cannot be distinguished from Yahweh himself (e.g., Gen 16:11, cf. Gen 16:13; Judg 6:12, cf. Judg 6:14). According to the Gospels an "angel of the Lord" appeared to Zechariah, announcing the birth of John the Baptist* (Lk 1:11). He also told Joseph of Jesus' conception by the Holy Spirit* (Mt 1:20, 24), announced Jesus' birth to the shepherds (Lk 2:9-12) and rolled back the stone at his tomb (Mt 28:2). From the linguistic data of the LXX and the NT, it is not clear whether or not these occasions involved the Angel of the Lord as described in the OT. However, general similarities between the Gospel nativity narratives and certain OT passages which mention the Angel of the Lord suggest that the angel in the nativity accounts is to be identified with the Angel of the Lord of the OT.

4. The Synoptic Gospels.

Angels play a special role in four major events during the life and ministry of Jesus as recorded in the Synoptic Gospels.

4.1. The Birth Narratives of Jesus. The angel Gabriel announced to Zechariah the imminent birth of John the Baptist, stating that John would prepare the way for what God was about to do (Lk 1:11-20). Bringing divine revelation was considered a primary function of angels in OT times (e.g., Gen 31:11-13; Dan 10:13-14; Zech 2:3-5), as it was in the intertestamental period (e.g., 1 Enoch 10; 93:2; 4 Ezra 4:1-4). In particular, the Angel of the Lord announced the forthcoming births of Ishmael (Gen 16:11) and Samson (Judg 13:3-5). Gabriel also revealed to Mary that she would bear the Son of God through the Holy Spirit (Lk 1:26-38). Joseph learned from an angel in a dream of Mary’s pregnancy and that the child would be named "Jesus" (Mt 1:18-25; cf. Lk 2:21). Within the context of the biblical tradition it was appropriate that an event of such salvific importance should be announced by heavenly messengers.

Luke tells us that an angel told the shepherds of Jesus’ birth (Lk 2:8-12), and they, like Mary and Zechariah, were reassured by him in the midst of their fear (Lk 2:9-10; cf. Lk 1:12-13, 29-30). This angel was accompanied by brightness marking the activity of God (cf. Lk 9:34). A "multitude of the heavenly host" (Lk 2:13 RSV; cf. 1 Kings 22:19; 1QH 3:22) then appeared, praising God. Evidently, these angels are to be understood as heavenly attendants in God's royal entourage rather than as a celestial army (cf. 1QH 3:35; 1QM 12:7-8).

Matthew relates the role of angels in protecting Jesus during his early years. An angel of the Lord warns Joseph in a dream, telling him to flee to Egypt because of Herod the Great (Mt 2:13; see Herodian Dynasty). The return journey was also in obedience to angelic revelation in a dream (Mt 2:19-21), and it was presumably an angel who spoke to Joseph in the dream that led him to settle in Galilee (Mt 2:22-23).

4.2. The Temptations of Jesus. Jesus was tempted by Satan at the threshold of his messianic ministry. At one point the devil quoted Psalm 91:11-12 (Mt 4:6; Lk 4:10-11), urging Jesus to throw himself from the pinnacle of the Temple and trust that God's angels would protect him. While such a spectacle might have appeared capable of vindicating his messianic status, Jesus rejected the devil's suggestion, perceiving that it would have constituted an attempt to force God's intervention on his behalf (Deut 6:16; Mt 4:7; Lk 4:12). Angels ministered to Jesus at the conclusion of his temptations (Mt 4:11; Mk 1:13; cf. Heb 1:14). Specifically, this may mean that they provided food (cf. Elijah, 1 Kings 19:5-8). If so, God's care of the Messiah who is faithful to his office would be contrasted with Satan's proposal that he obtain food and angelic intervention illegitimately. According to Luke 22:43 Jesus was also strengthened by an angel in Gethsemane.* While scholars are uncertain whether or not this verse was part of the original text, the idea that angels might strengthen the servants of God is well documented, as in the Qumran War Scroll (1 QM 12:7-9; 17:5-8) and the account of the Maccabean resistance (2 Macc 10:29-30).

4.3. The Coming of the Son of Man and the Final Judgment. Jesus taught that he would come to earth again as the Son of man "in clouds with great power and glory" (Mk 13:26; cf. 14:62) and accompanied by angels, to execute judgment* (Mt 16:27; Mk 8:38; cf. Lk 9:26). Such allusions derive from Daniel 7, with its figure "like a son of man" who is presented before God and given an everlasting kingdom (Dan 7:13-14). God is depicted as sitting in judgment, attended by innumerable angels (Dan 7:9-10).

The idea that angels will serve God in relation to the final judgment is important in Jewish apocalyptic eschatology of the intertestamental period. They function as a kind of heavenly police force, arresting offenders, presenting evidence and executing punishment. In Jesus' teaching the end of the age will see angels separating the righteous from the wicked (Mt 13:36-42; see Sinner; Justice, Righteousness). Angels will be dispatched to gather God's people from all and they will be with the Son of man when he sits in judgment (Mt 25:31). They will also assist in inflicting punishment on evildoers (Mt 13:41-42, 49-50; cf. 1 Enoch 90:20-26; CD 2:5-7). When Jesus taught that those who acknowledged him and his teaching would ultimately be acknowledged before God's angels at his coming, the angels were being cast in the role of hearing evidence in the heavenly courtroom (cf. 1 Enoch 99:3). Those ashamed of him will be denied before the heavenly court (Mk 8:38; Lk 9:26; 12:8-9). Matthew 10:32-33, however, places this acknowledgement and denial before the Father, without any mention of angels. But this does not imply that for Luke (12:8) "the angels of God" is a periphrasis designating God himself, for the word "God" is still used. Moreover, in Luke 9:26, a saying set in a similar scene of eschatological judgment, both God and angels are mentioned.

4.4. The Resurrection Narratives. In all four Gospels (Jn 20:11-13 is discussed below) angels announce Jesus' resurrection. In the Matthean account, an angel rolled back the stone at Jesus' tomb (again, probably the Angel of the Lord, Mt 28:2), and reassured and instructed the women who had gone there (Mt 28:5-7). In Luke "two men" appear in similarly dazzling dress (Lk 24:4-7; cf. 24:23), while Mark 16:5 has "a young man" in white (cf. 2 Macc 3:26, 33-34). At this critical point in the gospel story angels intervene, bringing divine revelation and encouraging and instructing Jesus' followers. Similarly, angels were integral to the events surrounding the Savior's birth. We might best understand the mediation of angels at both his birth and resurrection as marking the unique meeting of heaven and earth in these events.

4.5 Angels and the Welfare of Humans. Angels have various functions in relation to God's people. "Little ones" (perhaps childlike believers rather than children as such) have guardian angels who dwell in God's presence (Mt 18:10; see Child, Children). The language is drawn from the context of a royal court and concerns access to the king. Angels with such access to God are particularly important in Jewish thought, being called "angels of the Presence" (Jub. 1:27; T. Levi. 3:4-8; 1QH 6:13; lQsB 4:26). Since the "little ones" are served by such angels who actually look on God's face—a privilege not normally belonging even to the angels closely associated with God's throne (1 Enoch 14:21)—it is clear that God has great concern for them.

Elsewhere, angels are said to be linked with God's people as a nation (Dan 12:1), with individual churches (Rev 1:20), with the worshiping community at Qumran (lQSa 2:8-9) and with pious individuals (1QH 5:20-22). Jesus could speak of joy* in the presence of God's angels (either the joy of angels or joy shared by God and angels) when a sinner repents, a further indication of the angels' alignment with the purposes of God (Lk 15:10; cf. 15:7). In a manner unparalleled in Jewish writings prior to the second century A.D., Jesus speaks of angels carrying Lazarus to a place of bliss at death (Lk 16:22).
As we have already noted, Jesus received angelic assistance following his temptation in the wilderness (Mt 4:11; Mk 1:13). At the close of his ministry, in the midst of his arrest in Gethsemane, he professed to have at his disposal more than twelve legions of angels (Mt 26:53). The implied military* function of these angels is reminiscent of the Qumran sectarians' anticipation that angels would fight for them in the eschatological war (1QM 7:6; 13:10). Yet Jesus chose the way of suffering and death to fulfill his mission (see Death of Jesus).

Compared with the Synoptics, there are relatively few references to angels in the Gospel of John and no mention of them in relation to a final judgment. This is understandable in the light of John's realized eschatology.* There are only three (or perhaps four) passages to consider.

John's Gospel reflects popular beliefs regarding angels in at least one instance. The idea that angels bring divine revelation is reflected in the crowd's interpretation of the divine voice from heaven (Jn 12:29). While some identify it as thunder, others perceive it to be the voice of an angel. John 5:4 (though unlikely to have been pan of the original text) accords with a then-popular notion that unusual phenomena were attributable to angels. Here the healing properties of the pool at Bethesda are ascribed to the stirring of the waters by an angel of the Lord.

Early in the Fourth Gospel Jesus tells Nathanael he will "see heaven opened, and God's angels ascending and descending on the Son of man" (Jn 1:51). The allusion is to the patriarch Jacob's vision of a ladder on which angels ascended and descended, linking heaven and earth (Gen 28:10-17). Jesus appears to be telling Nathanael in a figurative way that once again God would reveal himself from heaven to the pious on earth, and that this revelation would directly involve Jesus as the Son of man (cf. Jn 1:14, 18; 3:13).

Finally, on resurrection morning Mary Magdalene looks into the tomb and finds two angels in white seated where Jesus' body had lain (Jn 20:11-12). Apparently they were not present immediately prior to this, when Peter and his companion had gone inside On 20:3-8).

6. Conclusion.
The Gospels present angels as exercising functions similar to what we may observe in the OT and intertestamental Jewish writings. These include mediating heavenly revelation, aiding the pious and assisting in the final judgment. However, unlike the OT and other Jewish writings, the angelology of the Gospels is, like the Gospels as a whole, essentially christocentric. The functions of angels relate directly to the life and ministry of Jesus. Specifically, angels mediate direct revelation from God only at two moments: Jesus' birth and his resurrection. In the interim, he himself is the pre-eminent disclosure of God.

See also Apocalyptic: Birth of Jesus: Demon, Devil Satan: Judgment: Resurrection: Son of Man: Temptation of Jesus.

M.J. Davidson

ANOINTING

1. Usage in the Gospels
2. The Anointing of Jesus

1. Usage in the Gospels.

Acts of anointing are described in the Gospels in the contexts of fasting* (Mt 6:17), healing* (Mk 6:13; Lk 10:34; Jn 9:6, 11), burial (Mk 16:1; Mt 26:12; see Burial of Jesus) and honoring guests (Lk 7:46). Each context reflects a well-established custom (for healing, cf. Is 1:6; burial, cf. Lk 23:56; Jn 19:39). Honoring guests by anointing them was a custom associated with wealth (cf. Amos 6:6; Mic 6:15). In the case of fasting, Jesus breaks with tradition by instructing those fasting to assume a festive appearance to draw attention away from their act of piety (cf. 2 Sam 12:20-23; Jdt 10:3; 16:7).

The verb most frequently employed for "anointing" is aleiphō. It refers to the external act of anointing and appears in a variety of contexts (Mt 6:17; Mk 6:13; 16:1; Lk 7:38, 46; Jn 11:2; 12:3). Chriō, from which we derive "Christ,"* or "the anointed one," appears only once in the Gospels, of Jesus' anointing by the Holy Spirit (Lk 4:18; Is 61:1 LXX; see Holy Spirit). Even though epichriō, "to smear," shares a root word with "chriō," it suggests no messianic nuance; it is associated with healing in John 9:6, 11.

2. The Anointing of Jesus.

2.1. The Four Gospels. Each Evangelist records the anointing of Jesus, though their emphases differ.

2.1.1. Mark. Mark 14:3-9, appearing at the outset of Mark's passion narrative, helps link that narrative to the rest of the Gospel by presenting the woman's act and Jesus' death as integral to the gospel (euangelion; cf. Mk 1:1, 14-15; 8:35; 10:29; 14:9; see Gospel [Good News]). Some have seen in this episode a royal anointing, noting how in Mark Jesus goes to his death as the Messiah (Mk 14:61; 15:2,9,12,18,26,32). Jesus' interpretive words, however, employ the rare word myrizō ("to anoint"—never used in the LXX for a royal anointing) and explicitly designate her act as an anointing for burial.

This story portrays the anonymous woman* as a genuine disciple.* First, she is contrasted with the Jewish leadership and "one of the Twelve," Judas (Mk 14:1-2, 10-11). Second, because she recognizes Jesus' impending departure, even her use of this oil, worth almost a year's wage for a day laborer, is "a beautiful thing." Jesus' words—"You will always have the poor" (v. 7)—have sometimes been read as fatalistic: poverty is inevitable (see Rich and Poor). This is unfortunate since Jesus thus alludes to Deuteronomy 15:11, which calls on God's people to assist the poor. Her act of love* toward Jesus now takes precedence over those acts of piety which must continue after his departure (cf. Mk 2:19-20). Finally, though Jesus' other followers cannot understand his predictions of death (e.g., Mk 8:31-33), she recognizes that the cross lies in his path.

2.1.2. Matthew. Matthew 26:6-13 marks a turning point in Matthew's Gospel with the beginning of the passion narrative. Following on the fourth and final prediction of Jesus' death (Mt 26:2; see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection), which alone omits reference to the resurrection* (cf. Mt 16:21; 17:22-23; 20:18-19), it focuses attention on Jesus' impending crucifixion. Yet Matthew ties the anointing to the resurrection by declaring that the one whom "you do not always have" (Mt 26:11) is raised to be "with you always" (Mt 28:20; cf. 1:23).

The anonymous woman who anoints Jesus fulfills for Matthew the role of a true witness in the midst of false witnesses (religious leaders; cf. Mt 23:2-3; 26:59) and inconstant witnesses (disciples; cf. Mt 16:22; 26:14,56,75). In anointing Jesus for burial the woman witnesses not only to Jesus' death (cf. Mt 28:1; the women do not come to embalm the body), but also to his kingship (cf. Mt 2:2; 16:28; 19:28; 21:5; 25:31; also Mt 2:11, the oils used in ritual anointing) and messiahship (Mt 1:22; 2:4; 26:28). The disciples, like the legalistic Pharisees* of Matthew's Gospel, see only the waste of the ointment and chastise her. Jesus responds by calling what she has done a "good work," pleasing to God (cf. Mt 5:16), and proclaiming that what she has done will be told in all the world.

2.1.3. Luke. Luke 7:36-50 places Jesus' anointing during his Galilean* ministry. Rather than focusing on Jesus' burial, this story enlarges upon the affirmations made of Jesus in Luke 7:33-35: one who enjoys a festive meal, a friend of sinners,* and Wisdom* recognized by her children. Luke narrates a surprising and complex interplay of social interactions: Simon—Jesus' host, a Pharisee with religious insight, concerned with cleanliness—fails to act as a host or recognize Jesus' significance, and shows no concern for cleanliness (see Clean and Unclean); a sinful woman (a prostitute*?) embraces forgiveness,* functions as Jesus' host (Lk 7:44), and performs a generous act of love; and Jesus, friend of sinners, nevertheless extends grace to Simon by sharing his table, then, contrary to Simon's opinion, he exercises prophetic insight into Simon's thoughts.

Sharing center stage with Jesus is this woman, who washes Jesus' feet with her tears and anoints them (rather than his head—cf. Ps 23:5) with valuable oil. A recipient of forgiveness, she responds spontaneously and graciously to Jesus, recognizing in him God's redemption (Lk 1:68; 7:29-30; 19:44).
2.1.4. John. John 12:1-8 marks the beginning of John's passion narrative. Set in Bethany, where Lazarus* was raised (Jn 11), the narrative is thus rooted in Jesus' proclamation, "I am the resurrection and the life" (Jn 11:25). It is shadowed by the Sanhedrin's* plot against Jesus, a direct consequence of his having raised Lazarus. John differs from the other Gospels by identifying the woman who anoints Jesus as Mary of Bethany (cf. Jn 11:2). Some confusion surrounds why Mary anoints Jesus' feet (cf. Jn 11:32), then immediately wipes away the expensive oil with her hair. Since the woman is not designated a "sinner," as in Luke, her action seems inappropriate. Some have suggested that Mary anoints Jesus' feet as if preparing his body for burial. This, then, would be a prophetic anointing, since it is Nicodemus, not Mary, who later brings spices to anoint Jesus' body (Jn 19:39-40). Another interpretation links the anointing of Jesus' feet with the washing of the disciples' feet by Jesus (Sabbe). In this context Mary's act of anointing exemplifies the attitude of service and devotion to which Jesus will call the disciples (Jn 13:12-15). Mary's action and attitude stand in stark contrast to that of Judas, highlighting her role as a true disciple.

2.2. Tradition History. In spite of these differences, these four stories are remarkably similar with respect to form (i.e., setting, the woman and the ointment, the reaction, Jesus' response) and detail (Green, 106-8). Two details are especially noteworthy. First is the major agreement of Luke and John against Matthew and Mark regarding the object of the woman's attention (feet versus head). Second, there are verbal agreements between Mark and John: the type and cost of the ointment (Mk 14:3, 5; Jn 12:3, 5); Jesus' command, "Leave her alone!" (Mk 14:6; Jn 12:7); and the contrast between the poor (whom you will always have) and Jesus (whom you will not always have) (Mk 14:7; Jn 12:8; cf. Mt 26:11). This suggests that Mark/ Matthew represents one form of the tradition, Luke another, with John's story a conflation of the two (see Tradition Criticism). Some have argued on this basis that John knew and used the Synoptics as sources, but then John's redactional activity becomes inexplicable (see Synoptics and John). It is more likely that John had his own source which already reflected a cross-fertilization between the traditions behind the Synoptics. Whether the Synoptics represent two separate incidents in Jesus' ministry—the one centering on the penitent woman interrupting a meal at a Pharisee's house in Galilee (Luke), the other a pre-burial anointing in Bethany (Mark-Matthew)—continues to be debated.

See also Burial of Jesus; Death of Jesus
ANTIPAS. See HERODIAN DYNAST

ANTI-SEMITISM

The term anti-Semitism refers to prejudice, hostility or hatred directed against the Jewish people. The question of whether the Gospels* are anti-Semitic is complicated by the conflicting definitions given to the term. A variety of details in the Gospels have been alleged to demonstrate the Gospel writers' hostility to the Jews. These details reflect the conflict between the early Christian communities and non-Christian Jews as well as the conflict between Jesus and his contemporaries. However, other details indicate that the Gospels censure or condemn only those Jews who rejected Jesus and the gospel (see Gospel [Good News]).

1. Definitions
2. Alleged Anti-Semitism in the Gospels

1. Definitions.

Anti-Semitism is defined in different ways, some more restrictive than others. Most narrowly defined, it refers to the hostility toward the Jews based on nineteenth-century theories of racial superiority. Used more broadly, anti-Semitism refers to any attitude of prejudice or hostility directed at the Jewish people as such. In this sense it is often distinguished from "anti-Judaism," which refers to criticism of Jewish religious beliefs or practices. In its widest application, however, anti-Semitism is used to refer to both hostility toward Jews and denial of the validity of Judaism* as a religion.

The issue of whether the Gospels contain anti-Semitic material is decided in part by the way anti-Semitism is defined. If it refers only to attitudes based on nineteenth-century racial theories, then the first-century Gospels cannot be anti-Semitic. If it is used in the broadest sense to include negation of Judaism as a religion, then the question is more complex. None of the Gospels allows ongoing validity to Judaism apart from belief in Jesus as the Messiah (see Christ). But they present such belief not as the replacement of Judaism but as its fulfillment. The status of Judaism is thereby markedly redefined, but its legitimacy is not denied. Furthermore, religious controversy between Christians and Jews may have nothing to do with hostility to the Jews as a people. Condemnation of some Jews on religious grounds is fundamentally different from prejudice against all Jews on racial grounds. The Hebrew Scriptures themselves provide examples of such religious condemnation within Jewish circles. A proper evaluation of the Gospels' attitude toward the Jews must consider not only their denunciation of Jewish rejection of Jesus but also their affirmation of Jewish belief in Jesus and their ongoing concern for evangelism among the Jews. These factors indicate that the Gospel writers regarded the Jews as no different from non-Jews in their need for positive response to the gospel.

Furthermore, the anti-Semitic use of material from the Gospels must be distinguished from anti-Semitism in the Gospels themselves. Various texts of the Gospels have been understood in ways that contributed to anti-Semitic attitudes, but such interpretation, even if it is common, may not necessarily reflect the intentions of the Evangelists. Like all texts, allegedly anti-Semitic passages must be interpreted within their historical and theological contexts. Ancient rhetorical conventions were considerably different from modern ones; ideological opponents were routinely condemned in venomous terms. Language which sounds violent to modern ears is often relatively temperate by the standards of the first century.

Various details of all four Gospels have been understood to indicate that the Evangelists were hostile to the Jews in some respect. Some of the more prominent are examined under the headings below.

2.1. Generalizing Language. The Gospels use certain expressions which have been understood as anti-Jewish stereotypes. But the way the expressions are used suggests otherwise.

2.1.1. This Generation. All the Synoptics include sayings of Jesus in which "this generation" is denounced as unbelieving and subject to judgment* Though it is recognized that the phrase could have been used by Jesus in intra-Jewish controversy, certain redactional features, such as the apparently unfavorable comparison with Gentiles* (Mt 12:39-42; Lk 11:29-32; cf Mk 8:12), are taken to indicate anti-Semitism on the part of the Evangelists.

However, Josephus' use of generation illustrates the way a Jewish writer of the first century could use the term with reference only to one segment of the generation. On three occasions he uses it to refer not to the entire Jewish nation but to the Zealot faction which resisted the Romans in the siege of Jerusalem (J.W. 5.442-43, 566; 6.408; see Revolutionary Movements). The Synoptists use the expression in much the same way, implicitly limiting it to unbelievers. For example, in the context preceding the denunciation of this generation in Matthew 12:39-42, the Jewish crowd's positive response is contrasted with the Pharisees'* unbelief (12:23-24). Luke notes a similar division among Jesus' Jewish contemporaries (Lk 7:29-30) immediately before a denunciation of this generation (7:31-35). The statements reflect the sharp conflict between Jesus and his opponents, but their setting indicates that Jews are not condemned en masse.

2.1.2. The Jews. Likewise, the use of "the Jews" for the opponents of Jesus has been taken as an indication of hostility toward all Jews. This usage is frequent in John, but it is also found once in Matthew (Mt 28:15) and several times in Luke's second volume (e.g., Acts 9:23; 12:3; 13:45; 17:5; 22:30; 26:2).

Again, however, Josephus' usage is pertinent. Frequently he designates those Jews who fought against Rome* simply as "the Jews," even in contexts where they are distinguished from other Jews who had no part in the rebellion (e.g., J.W. 2.466; 5.109-10; 6.71-79, 251-53). The limitation of the term is implicit in the context.
There are similar indications that John did not intend to characterize all Jews as unbelievers with his use of "the Jews" for Jesus' opponents. On some occasions the expression "the Jews" alternates with more specific terms for Jesus' opponents such as "rulers" or "chief priests and Pharisees" (Jn 7:1,13,26, 32, 45-49; 8:13, 48, 57; 9:13, 15-16, 18; see Priest and Priesthood). Likewise, Jewish persons may be distinguished in the narrative from the group called "the Jews" (5:15; 7:11-13; 9:22). "The Jews" can even be divided among those who accept Jesus' claims and those who reject them (10:19-21; cf Acts 14:1-5). John affirms that Jesus was a Jew (Jn 4:9) and that "salvation comes from the Jews" (4:22). Some scholars have taken these different uses as indications of various levels of redaction with different degrees of anti-Jewish hostility. However, Josephus' usage shows that "the Jews" could be used by a single author with various tacit restrictions in different contexts. John's Jews thus need not characterize all Jews as Jesus' opponents; it is implicitly limited to the antagonistic leaders.

Nevertheless, the question remains as to why John called Jesus' opponents "the Jews" so often. He could and did employ more specific terms, such as "rulers," "Pharisees" and "chief priests." The answer probably lies in John's application of the traditions about Jesus to the situation Christians faced when he wrote. John's church appears to have been in conflict with non-Christian Jews. His interest in the expulsion of Christian Jews from the synagogue (9:22; 12:42; 16:2) suggests that such was the experience of some in his circle. By designating Jesus' opponents as "the Jews," John could make a subtle connection between them and the Jews who opposed Christians at the time that he wrote. But John clearly did not intend to represent all Jews as unbelievers; those expelled from the synagogue* for their belief in Jesus were themselves Jews. John's use of "the Jews" thus indicates an intense theological conflict between Christians and non-Christian Jews, but it does not indicate that the writer regarded all Jews as evil and unbelieving.

2.2. Denunciation and Pronouncement of Judgment. Various texts of all four Gospels have been alleged to condemn all Jews, sometimes with a contrasting pronouncement of blessing on the Gentiles. However, several details of these texts indicate that the Evangelists understood the statements to extend only to those Jews who rejected Jesus. Only some of the more notorious examples can be treated here, but similar observations can be made concerning other texts.

2.2.1. The Parable of the Wicked Tenants. This parable* (Mt 21:33-46; Mk has been taken to imply that the privileges of Israel are transferred to the Gentiles (Mt 21:41, 43; Mk 12:9; Lk 20:16). But all the Evangelists specify the leaders, in contrast to the crowds, as the ones against whom the parable was spoken (Mt 21:45-46; Mk 12:12; Lk 20:19), thus suggesting their loss of leadership among God's people.

Matthew 21:43 appears to signify more: a withdrawal of Israel's elect status as a nation. However, the singular ethnei ("nation") instead of the plural ethnesin ("Gentiles") implies a transfer of the kingdom not to the Gentiles as such but to another nation, namely, the church, which Matthew understands as composed of both Jews and Gentiles. The text reflects the intense controversy between those who accept Jesus as Messiah and those who reject such a claim, but its denial of Jewish religious prerogatives does not imply a condemnation of Jews as such. For Matthew, belief in Jesus, not ethnicity, determines elect status.

2.2.2. The Denunciation of the Pharisees. All the Synoptics present Jesus' discourse against the scribes and Pharisees, though Matthew's version is the most extensive (Mt 23:1-36; Mk 12:3840 [scribes only]; 11 11:39-52; 20:45-47). Because the Pharisees are understood by modern Jews to be the founders of post-Temple Judaism, this discourse is taken as a particularly sharp attack on the Jews. Matthew is especially seen as waging a bitter, personal attack on his Jewish contemporaries who, under the leadership of the Pharisees, have cast Christians out of the synagogues.

Again, several other elements of the text deserve notice. In all the Synoptics the denunciation of the Pharisees follows the crucial question about the Messiah (Mt 22:42; Mk 12:35; Lk 20:41). The discourse thus reflects not a mere personal conflict but the crucial issue in the Gospels: response to Jesus. The contrast between the Pharisees and "teachers of the Law*" and "the Christ" as teacher (Mt 23:8-11 ) implies not a condemnation of all Jews but an appeal to the Jewish masses to follow Jesus instead of the leaders who reject him (cf. Mt 15:12-14; 16:6, 12). The harshness of the denunciation has parallels in the criticism of outsiders in the Qumran literature (e.g., 1QS 4:9-14; see Dead Sea Scrolls) and in Matthew's own condemnation of believers whose lives are inconsistent (7:21-23). Thus, Matthew's Jesus does not condemn the Pharisees because they are Jewish. The condemnation springs in part from their rivalry for the allegiance of the Jewish people. Finally, though, the Pharisees are condemned because in Matthew's view their rejection of Jesus disqualifies them from the status they claim for themselves.
2.2.3. The Jerusalem Oracles. Jesus' oracles of judgment against Jerusalem (Mt 23:37-39; Lk 13:34-35; 19:41-44) have been understood as the Evangelists' interpretation of the destruction of Jerusalem (see Destruction of Jerusalem) as the condemnation of the Jews. But again the judgment appears to be confined to those who reject Jesus.

Luke particularly stresses the role of Jerusalem as the city that kills Jesus (e.g., 11:9:31, 51). But for Luke Jerusalem does not function as a figure for the Jewish nation as a whole; rather, Luke distinguishes Jerusalem from the rest of Israel* (Lk 13:31-35; cf Acts 13:27). Further, Luke does not insist that all Jerusalemites opposed Jesus or that their judgment is irrevocable: the "daughters of Jerusalem" are sympathetic to Jesus in the Lukan passion narrative (23:27-30; see Passion Narrative), and in Acts the Jerusalemites are offered forgiveness* (2:22-24, 38, 40; 3:13-20).

In Jesus' apocalyptic discourse (see Apocalyptic Teaching) Matthew and Luke deliver different versions of Jesus' instructions to flee at the approach of disaster (Mt 24:15-16; Lk 21:20). If the reference is to the destruction of Jerusalem, then the text implies that faithful disciples* of Jesus are found in Jerusalem and escape the fate that befalls the rest of the city. Moreover, Luke indicates that the redemption of Jesus' Jerusalemite audience will follow the city's destruction (21:28; cf 20:45; 21:37-38; 24:21). Because of its rejection of Jesus, the city is condemned with harsh language, but that condemnation does not preclude the salvation* of some.

2.2.4. "Your Father the Devil." The assertion "You are from your father, the devil" (Jn 8:44) has been repeatedly employed to malign the Jewish people. However, it is doubtful that John intended it so. The statement is severe, but it is set in the midst of bitter controversy: Jesus' opponents deny the legitimacy of his birth (8:41), claim he is not a real Jew and judge him demon-possessed (8:48; see Demon, Devil, Satan). In the framework of Johannine dualism and according to the rhetorical conventions of the day, such harsh accusations call forth a harsh response. But there is little to indicate that John condemns all Jews as diabolical. The belief of some Jews is noted earlier in the episode (8:30), and these are challenged to ongoing discipleship* (8:31). Indeed, John may intend the controversy which follows as a struggle between Jesus and his opponents for the loyalty of these believers. In that struggle both sides employ pointed language characteristic of such controversies in the ancient world, but the Christians' condemnation of their opponents is based on their response to Jesus, not their ethnicity as such.

2.3. Responsibility for the Crucifixion. All the Gospels indicate that the Jewish leaders initiated the plot to kill Jesus and that Pilate's attempt to release Jesus was met with the Jewish crowd's demand for his death (see Death of Jesus). This version of the events has been widely understood as reflecting a tendency to exonerate the Romans and implicate the Jews. Again, however, the evidence requires a more balanced assessment.

2.3.1. Pilate's Role. Pilate's (see Pontius Pilate) capitulation to the crowd's demand is not presented by the Evangelists in a positive light (see Trial of Jesus). All the Synoptics include references to Gentiles in Jesus' predictions of the passion (Mt 20:19; Mk 10:33; Lk 18:32; see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection), and Pilate is presumably numbered among them. In Matthew, Pilate yields to the crowd despite the warning of his wife's dream (27:19). His washing of his hands is an empty gesture (27:24); he can no more evade his responsibility than could Judas (see Judas Iscariot) or the high priests (27:3-7). In Luke, Pilate pronounces Jesus' innocence three times (23:4, 15, 22). However, this serves to emphasize Jesus' innocence (cf 23:41, 47; Acts 3:13, 13:28), not to exonerate Pilate, who in Acts is numbered among those who gather against the Lord's Anointed (Acts 4:25-28). In Mark, Pilate's resistance to the crowd's demand is minimal. In John, he is cynical and self-serving (18:35, 38; 19:8). Thus, no consistent exoneration of Pilate can be traced in any of the Gospels.

2.3.2. The Jewish Crowds. Both Matthew and Luke refer to the crowd which demands Jesus' death as laos ("people"; Mt 27:25; Lk 23:13; see People, Crowd). This term is used in the LXX and NT to refer especially to the nation of Israel. Hence, some have understood Matthew and Luke to indicate that the entire Jewish nation is implicated in the demand for Jesus' death.

It is not clear, however, that this is the case. Elsewhere in Luke's Jerusalem narrative, laos is used not to signify all Israel but to indicate the common people as distinguished from the Temple* hierarchy (e.g., 19:48; 20:6, 19; 21:38; 22:2). That distinction appears to be the reason for its use in the trial scene. In 23:13 the laos is a group distinct from the high priests and leaders. That Luke does not understand this laos to include all Israel is explicitly indicated in Acts 13:27-28, where only "the residents of Jerusalem and their leaders" are specified as those responsible for Jesus' death.
Matthew's phrase "all the people" probably reflects an established use of the phrase in the context of execution. Deuteronomy 13:9 (MT and LXX: 13:10) and 17:7 indicate the responsibility of "all the people" to stone a condemned person; the Mishnah (m. Sanh. 6:4) indicates that such stoning is the responsibility of "all Israelites." Matthew may have been directly influenced by Jeremiah 26:8-9, 15, where "all the people" demand Jeremiah's death and thereby bring innocent blood on themselves. In all these cases phrases similar to Matthew's indicate the unanimity of the crowd; clearly none of these texts envisages all Israelites as calling for or taking part in an execution. It therefore appears likely that Matthew's phrase also implies the crowd's unanimity. Furthermore, the phrase is comparable to other Matthean expressions which are widely understood to be hyperbolic (3:5-6; 24:9). Thus, this language should not be pressed so that the entire nation is gathered before Pilate to condemn Jesus.

The so-called blood curse (Mt 27:25) must be understood in this light. Matthew may understand "our children" to refer to the generation which experiences the destruction of Jerusalem in AD. 70, particularly if he is influenced by Jeremiah 26. The statement highlights Jewish rejection of Jesus, connecting the rejection at the passion with that of the subsequent generation. But in making that connection Matthew does not suggest that the entire nation definitively and permanently rejects Jesus. The implication that unbelieving Jews forfeit their place among the people of God (cf. Mt 21:43) reflects the exclusivism of messianic belief, but not hostility to Jews as such.

2.3.3. The Identity of the Crucifiers. Luke 23:25-26 and John 19:16-18 have been understood as implying that Jews, not Romans, performed the act of crucifying Jesus. In both cases the interpretation depends on identifying the antecedent of "they" with the Jews in the preceding context. But other factors indicate that Luke and John did not intend to place full responsibility for Jesus' execution at the feet of the Jewish leaders. Crucifixion was regularly carried out by Romans throughout the empire; the charges against Jesus were political in nature, especially as evidenced by the inscription on the cross; and Pilate not only pronounced the death sentence but also had jurisdiction over Jesus' body (see Burial of Jesus). Thus, while responsibility for Jesus' crucifixion is never completely deferred from the Jewish leadership, neither are the Romans fully exonerated in the Lukan and Johannine accounts. Moreover, both Gospels distinguish the soldiers (stratiōtai) from Jewish figures in the crucifixion account (Lk 23:35-37; Jn 19:31-32). John earlier mentions a speira ("cohort"; 18:3, 12) that participates in Jesus' arrest, a term usually referring to Roman soldiers. Luke elsewhere mentions Jewish soldiers, but these he calls "stratēgoi" and "strateuomenoi," not "stratiōtai," which he reserves elsewhere for Romans. Likewise, the Lukan centurion (23:47) bears a Roman military title. In both Luke and John, Pilate's "turning over" of Jesus to his Jewish opponents stresses the role of certain Jews in instigating the crucifixion. But neither Evangelist implies that anyone other than Roman soldiers were the actual executioners. Jewish involvement is stressed, but Rome is not exonerated.

See also Gentiles: Israel: People, Crowd

J. A. Weatherly

Aphorism. See Chreia/Aphorism

Apocalyptic

The adjective is used in at least three different ways: to refer to a type of literature (apocalypse), a kind of eschatology* (apocalyptic eschatology) and an historical movement (apocalypticism). The NT contains only one apocalypse (Revelation), but Jesus and first-century Christians borrowed much from Jewish apocalyptic eschatology, and many scholars would consider early Christianity itself an apocalyptic movement, or place it within the broader current of Jewish apocalypticism.

1. Apocalypse
2. Apocalyptic Eschatology
3. Apocalypticism

1. Apocalypse.

Because the ancients did not consistently use apokalypsis (the Greek word means simply "revelation") to designate works that belong to the genre, any list of apocalypses must be our own, just as any definition must be a modern construct

1.1. Definition. K Koch took six features to be characteristic: long discourse cycles, forecasts of spiritual turmoil, paraenetic discourses, pseudonymity, mythical images rich in symbolism and composite character (evidenced by breaks, contradictions and other signs of long literary development). There is, however, a certain lack of precision in all this, and it is better to accept the definition, at once more comprehensive yet more exact, proposed by the Society of Biblical Literature Genres Project:

"Apocalypse" is a genre of revelatory literature with a narrative framework, in which a revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, disclosing a transcendent reality which is both temporal, insofar as it envisages eschatological salvation, and spatial insofar as it involves another, supernatural world. (Collins 1979, 9)

This definition embraces a large number of old Jewish, early Christian, Gnostic, Greek, Latin and Persian books, all of which evaluate the present and offer consolation and encouragement by focusing on a symbolic universe whose center is a transcendent order or a better future.

1.2. Jewish Apocalypses. For the purposes of NT study, the Jewish apocalypses composed between 250 B.C. (certain Aramaic portions of I Enoch found in the Dead Sea Scrolls* appear to be that early) and A.D. 150 are most important. Many apocalypses have been lost and are known only by name. Of those extant, there are perhaps fifteen (some have uncertain dates), written first in Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek but preserved (by Christians) in translations in numerous languages. These may be divided into two groups, those that recount an otherworldly journey and those that do not. To the former belong 1 Enoch 1—36, 37—71 (the Similitudes), 72—82 (the Heavenly Luminaries); Testament of Levi 2—5; Testament of Abraham 10—15; the Apocalypse of Abraham; 3 Apocalypse of Baruch; the Apocalypse of Zephaniah; and 2 Enoch. To the latter group belong 1 Enoch 83—90 (the Animal Apocalypse); 93 + 91:12-17 (the Apocalypse of Weeks); Daniel 7—12; Jubilees 23; 4 Ezra; and 2 Apocalypse of Baruch.

Apocalypses in the second group revolve around an historical crisis. They also contain historical reviews which divide history into distinct periods. This is not true of the members of the first group, with the exception of the Apocalypse of Abraham (which, being from the second century A.D., is not an early apocalypse). Thus, as J. J. Collins has summarized:

... it would seem that there are two strands of tradition in the Jewish apocalypses, one of which is characterized by visions, with an interest in the development of history, while the other is marked by other-worldly journeys with a stronger interest in cosmological speculation. (Collins 1984, 5)

1.3. Common Features. The ancient Jewish apocalypses share several significant features. All draw heavily on OT phraseology, themes and motifs. All are filled with mysterious revelations, heavenly secrets, obscure symbolism and esoteric wisdom. All reflect alienation from the world as it is. All are also pseudonymous, so that in each case the purported author, who is the recipient of revelation, is always a great hero from the sacred past (Enoch, Abraham,* Ezra, etc.). Finally, most of the apocalypses wrestle with the problem of evil and most anticipate evil’s eschatological undoing; but it is wrong to imagine that all of them are primarily concerned with eschatological matters.

1.4. Mark 13. Along with its Synoptic parallels (Mt 24; Lk 21), Mark 13 has often been dubbed a "little apocalypse" (see Apocalyptic Teaching). It does undeniably share certain important features of the genre. It belongs, however, to an anonymous, not pseudonymous, work. More importantly, its revelations are not attributed to a heavenly intermediary. The earthly Jesus himself uncovers the future. There are in addition no allegories and no involved symbol-ism. If therefore the definition given above (1.1) is accepted, one must hesitate to classify Mark 13 as an apocalypse. Still, like so many Jewish examples of the testament genre, it is very closely related.

2. Apocalyptic Eschatology.

This phrase may be employed in more than one sense.

2.1. Definition. "Apocalyptic eschatology" could designate the eschatological teachings distinctive of or common to the Jewish apocalypses (see Eschatology). This, however, would severely limit the term, for there are apocalypses with very little eschatological material (e.g., 2 Enoch). For this and other reasons it is best to give "apocalyptic eschatology" the more common and broader meaning: it refers to that cluster of themes and expectations which developed, often in association with belief in a near end, in the altered circumstances of the post-exilic period («“Judaism). Characteristic features include emphasis on eschatological signs; expectation of a cosmic cataclysm; belief in a temporally near, other-worldly kingdom; concern for universal human history; and interest in heavenly redeemer figures, such as Melchizedek in the Dead Sea Scrolls or the hidden Son of man in 1 Enoch.

2.2. Origins. For G. von Rad, Jewish apocalyptic eschatology grew out of the wisdom* tradition (301-308). Other scholars have supposed it was begotten by Persian, Egyptian or Hellenistic influence, while additional factors such as cosmogonic myths and priestly interest in the heavenly temple have also received attention. But most while not discounting other factors, have looked to OT prophecy as the major source. As P. Hanson has written, "apocalyptic eschatology is the mode assumed by the prophetic tradition once it had been transferred to a new and radically altered setting in the post-exilic community." This position is justified, despite the problems created by the dearth of material from the fourth and third centuries B.C. and our consequent inability to trace the historical development. OT passages such as Isaiah 24—27 (eschatological prophecies mixed with semi-mythological conceptions); Ezekiel 40—48 (tour/vision of a new or ideal Jerusalem); and Zechariah 1—8 (visions clarified by an angelic interpreter) show us prophetic eschatology beginning to grow into apocalyptic eschatology.
2.3. Jesus and the Gospels. Although he wrote no apocalypse, many have thought that Jesus was a proponent of apocalyptic eschatology. He, however, rejected sign-seeking (Mk 8:11-13; Lk 17:20-21) and explicitly disavowed knowledge of the date of the end (Mk 13:32). He also, with his proclamation of the presence of the kingdom (Mk 2:18-22; Lk 11:20), broke through the pessimistic tendency to draw a hard and fast distinction between the present evil age and the coming good age. And he directed attention away from a mythological, other-worldly redeemer to his own historical person (see Messiah; Son of Man). Furthermore, there is no evidence that Jesus had studied any of the apocalypses that have come down to us; at least he never cites or alludes to such, and their direct influence cannot be traced in his teaching.

These facts entail that one can scarcely, without further ado, turn Jesus and those who recorded his teaching into advocates of apocalyptic eschatology. At the same time, Jesus taught the resurrection* of the dead (Mk 12:18-27) and looked for a transcendent kingdom of God* (Mt 25:3146). He referred to the eschatological downfall of Satan* (Mk 3:20-27; Lk 10:18) and, probably with Daniel 7 in mind, spoke of the Son of man* coming on the clouds of heaven. In addition, he anticipated eschatological tribulation (Lk 12:49-53) and warned of a final judgment* (Mt 11:20-24). All this is characteristic of apocalyptic eschatology, and thus its influence on Jesus cannot be denied.

Taking into account all the facts, the conclusion is this: while Jesus adopted much of the language and teaching of apocalyptic eschatology, he simultaneously revised certain of its elements and consciously rejected others. (Recall that in many areas Jesus was critical of contemporary thinking.) The relationship of Jesus’ eschatological teaching to apocalyptic eschatology is analogous to the relationship between prophecy and apocalyptic: despite close, genetic connections, the two are not the same thing.

3. Apocalypticism.

As with "apocalypse" and "apocalyptic eschatology," "apocalypticism," which concerns the social-historical rather than the literary-theological, is also ambiguous.

3.1. Definition. "Apocalypticism" may be taken to designate something like a millenarian movement, that is, an historical movement, usually short-lived, which is marked by energy and enthusiasm and dominated by the hope that a new order of reality will soon overthrow the existing social order. The so-called cargo cults illustrate the phenomenon. Some would consider early Christianity just such an apocalyptic movement, which raises the prospect of applying to it certain models developed from the sociological study of millenarian movements (Gager). More commonly, however, NT scholars use apocalypticism to refer to a movement within post-exilic Judaism.*

Stimulated by instability and religious crisis (as during the time of Antiochus IV Epiphanes), its members—among whom were the authors of the apocalypses—lived in the symbolic universe of apocalyptic eschatology. The extent and importance of the movement has been variously estimated, some thinking of it as marginal, others as mainstream.

3.2. The Jesus Movement. What was early Christianity's relationship to this so-called movement? According to E. Käsemann, "apocalyptic was the mother of all Christian theology" (102). While exaggerated, there is truth in this statement. The influence of apocalyptic eschatology on significant portions of the NT is clear (see the examples from the Gospels in section 2.3.). Moreover, such texts as Luke 19:11 and Acts 1:6 show that the early church* had in its midst people who hoped that the eschatological climax would come in the near future. It would seem, then, that one might set the Jesus movement within the Jewish apocalyptic movement. And yet the NT contains much of importance which has no parallel in the literary remains of Jewish apocalypticism (including the Gospel genre [$« Gospel (Genre)] and a concentration on immediately past salvific events). Further, even when Revelation— which comes not from the early community but from the end of the first century— is included, "a whole range of speculative interests" closely linked with the apocalyptic movement—such as uranography, cosmography, meteorology—"is missing from the New Testament" (M. Stone). The relationship of the early community to apocalypticism is then one of significant continuity beside significant discontinuity.

The circumstance may be illustrated further by reference to the doctrine of the resurrection. The expectation is found in Daniel 7—12; 1 Enoch 37-71; 83-90; 4 Ezra and 2 Apocalypse of Baruch, and it was accepted by the Pharisees,* whose origins lie within the apocalyptic movement. The importance of the idea in the NT seemingly shows the church's close ties with apocalypticism. But that is not the whole story. The NT does not just look forward to the general resurrection. It also proclaims, as past event, that Jesus, the crucified Messiah, has already risen from the dead and that the general resurrection has commenced (see Eschatology; Heaven and Hell).

Once more, then, the character of early Christianity is ambiguous. On the one hand the centrality of the resurrection firmly associated the church with Jewish apocalypticism. On the other, does not the announcement of the Messiah's resurrection before the day of judgment, with all its attendant implications, make for something truly new? Of course one may object that an historical phenomenon should be classified on the basis of shared characteristics, not peculiarities. But perhaps an analogy may help here. It is true that Aristotle was a member of Plato's school, just as Origen was a member of the catechetical school at Alexandria. Still, each thinker inherited a tradition only to remake it and hand the world something new. Hence, to characterize either Aristotle or Origen primarily in terms of his predecessors is constrictive and so misleading. In the same way one runs the risk of historical distortion by simply setting the early Jesus movement, whether pre-or post-Easter, squarely within the Jewish apocalyptic movement For although Jesus and the first Christians drew from Jewish apocalypticism ideas and inspiration as well as followers, from the outset they passed beyond their nurture and went their own way.

See also Apocalyptic Teaching: Eschatology: Kingdom of God.

D. C. Allison, Jr.
"Apocalyptic" (from the Gk apokalypsis, meaning "revelation") refers to a historical movement a type of literature and to the cluster of theological themes associated with them (see Apocalyptic). Apocalyptic is dominated by an eschatological dualism. This may be summed up as a perspective which views the present age as under the power of evil until the Day of the Lord when God will save the elect judge the wicked and inaugurate the future age of righteousness.* Apocalypticists were often determinists, believing God's will determines everything. The result was often a passiveness or even a pessimism regarding the present age. Hope found its object in the future alone. Using a distinctive literary type (frequently characterized by visions, symbols, pseudonymity, etc.) apocalypses were written to encourage the saints to keep faith despite the trials of the present age.

Some New Testament interpreters (e.g., Käsemann) have viewed apocalyptic as the controlling center or nurturing parent of Christianity. Others have treated it as Christianity's embarrassment Scholarly views range broadly. Jesus is judged by some to have been fanatically apocalyptic and by others to have been free of such corruptions. Each Gospel writer in turn is judged by some scholars to have increased, and by others to have decreased, the apocalyptic elements in their received Gospel traditions.

Several critical questions call for answers. Was Jesus an apocalyptic seer predicting an early end to the present world order, or was he opposed to apocalyptic speculation? Did the Gospel writers faithfully preserve the emphasis of Jesus? Do the Gospels use apocalyptic as a literary genre? How should so-called apocalyptic texts (like Mk 13) be interpreted? What significance does apocalypticism have for interpreting Jesus and the Gospels? What significance does it have for the contemporary Christian? This article will respond briefly to those questions.
1. Jesus and Apocalypticism

During the nineteenth century biblical scholars attempted to defend Jesus against the charge that he was an apocalyptic dreamer who wrongly predicted an early and cataclysmic end to the existing world order. Some defended Jesus by claiming that Jesus did not intend to predict literal future events for the world, but was speaking spiritually. The apocalyptic predictions, it was argued, all had been spiritually fulfilled.

Others defended Jesus by charging the early church and the Gospel writers with error. One view is that chapters like Mark 13 did not derive from anything Jesus really said. Rather, an early Jewish apocalypse was taken up by the Gospel writers and erroneously credited to Jesus. This "little apocalypse" theory, first advanced by T. Colani, has been defended by an array of scholars ever since.

Many nineteenth century scholars portrayed Jesus as a gentle teacher who taught the nearness of God. Unfortunately, they lamented, Jesus has been misrepresented in the Gospels as a fanatical preacher of coming judgment.*

At the turn of the century J. Weiss and A. Schweitzer overturned that consensus by reconstructing a historical Jesus who was thoroughly apocalyptic in outlook, indeed more so than those who had preserved the traditions about him. Under this new reckoning, Jesus believed that the expected divine intervention which would inaugurate the new age would occur at some time during his ministry. His expectations were disappointed more than once, and he finally went to his death imagining that by so doing he would surely spur God to act. The early church was left with the challenge of giving Jesus a more respectable image, covering up his errors and presenting his teaching in a way which served the needs of a community that knew the end (and the kingdom of...
God*) had not come as predicted, but that still believed it would come soon.

This view in its various forms, generally known as "consistent eschatology," has been influential during the twentieth century (see Eschatology). Some, like R Bultmann, have been unconcerned with defending Jesus' apocalyptic perspective or even attempting to reconstruct a portrait of the historical Jesus.* Bultmann's famous program of demythologizing the NT did not attempt to strip Jesus of his mythological trappings (as did many nineteenth-century interpreters), but to reinterpret those mythical elements in terms of their existential meaning (see Myth). Understood from this perspective, the mythology inherent in Jesus' apocalyptic teaching was a means of addressing men and women with the need to be open to God's future—a future near at hand for each individual. Other scholars, such as R H. Hiers, do not find it troubling to think of Jesus as someone who had mistaken expectations and made inaccurate predictions.

Not all twentieth century interpreters have been persuaded that Jesus was an apocalyptic preacher who predicted an imminent end to the world. C. H. Dodd and others have insisted on a realized eschatology, maintaining that Jesus fulfilled OT prophetic hopes and preached a kingdom which was inaugurated in his own ministry. Those passages which suggested a future fulfillment were either intended to be interpreted in this light or were the creation of the early church. Both consistent and realized eschatology seem problematic. Many conservative scholars such as G. E. Ladd, E. E. Ellis and I. H. Marshall have adopted a compromise position first defended by W. G. Kümmel. The kingdom is paradoxically "present" and "still to come." Jesus' mission was to inaugurate the kingdom, but he taught that it would be consummated at a future coming.

The Gospel writers faithfully preserve this paradoxical position. They use apocalyptic imagery to report and interpret events in Jesus' earthly life (e.g., Mt 27:51-53; 28:2-4), and they also use apocalyptic imagery to refer to events predicted for the future (God's final act of judgment and salvation* at the coming of the Son of man; cf. Mt 25:31-46; Mk 13:24-27).

This already/not yet approach may be open to the charge that it is very convenient (unfalsifiable and therefore indefensible, some would say), but unless some such paradoxical interpretation is adopted, neither Jesus' view nor any of the Gospel writers' views can be understood adequately.
2. The So-Called Apocalyptic Discourse (Mk 13).

Mark 13 opens with a conversation between Jesus and his disciples* over the Jerusalem Temple. The disciples admire its beauty; Jesus predicts its destruction (see Destruction of Jerusalem); the disciples then inquire about the timing of that event and the "sign" when "all these things" will be fulfilled. A long discourse by Jesus follows, in which are predicted a series of woes (see Blessing and Woe), political disturbances, persecution of believers, an "abomination of desolation" (see below), a time of unprecedented distress and finally the coming of the Son of man.* Interspersed with these are calls for discernment, faithful discipleship,* courageous testimony, endurance and vigilance in the face of deceivers. The last ten verses of the chapter contain two parables* (28-29, 34-36), renewed calls to "watch" (33, 37) and some hody debated statements about the timing of "these things" (30-32).

What is the source of this enigmatic chapter? Is it a Jewish apocalyptic tract (as Colani's "little apocalypse theory" advocated)? Is the chapter a composite of authentic sayings of Jesus, ethical instruction from the early church and possibly prophetic words by early Christian prophets* (as most modern critical scholars argue)? Or is it Mark's abbreviation of a longer well-preserved "pre-Synoptic eschatological discourse" that goes back to Jesus himself (as Wenham has recently argued)?

If the problems involved in tracing the sources of this chapter are complicated, those involved in inter-preting this chapter are legion. The chapter provokes the following questions, to name only a few:

1. What relationship was predicted between the destruction of the Temple* and the coming of the Son of man? Were both events predicted to happen within a generation (cf. v. 30)?

2. What is/are the requested "sign(s)"? Is the "abomination of desolation" (v. 14) the sign that the Temple's destruction is imminent? Or is the Temple's destruction the sign that the coming of the Son of man is imminent? Is there perhaps a "baffling multiplicity of signs," as C. E. B. Cranfield has put it? Is it possible that Jesus did not intend to give any signs at all?

3. Is apocalyptic calculation encouraged or discou-aged? Does the discourse map out an apocalyptic timetable, or is verse 32 ("no one knows") the real answer to the disciples' question?

Mark 13:30 says that "all these things" will happen within the present generation (genea). If genea refers to Jesus' contemporaries, and if "all these things" includes the return of the Son of man, then the pre-diction was an error. Some have denied that genea must refer to Jesus' contemporaries. Others deny that "all these things" necessarily includes the return of the Son of man (Geddert). The text suggests that it includes all the events related to the destruction of the Temple (cf. 13:4, 23). But exactly what all those things include is never made explicitly clear.

Mark 13:32 denies that anyone (even Jesus) knows when the final day of eschatological fulfillment will take place. It would seem to follow that neither Jesus nor Mark knew whether or not the final Day of the Lord would take place at the time of the Temple's destruction. The self-confessed ignorance of Jesus and Mark on this point is an adequate explanation for the ambiguity of 13:30 and many other verses in the chapter.

Modern interpreters often seem intent on proving one of the following two options: (1) Mark 13 teaches that the destruction of the Temple (and accompanying events) will lead directly to the final intervention of God or (2) Mark 13 teaches that the final eschatological events are not to be connected to the historical events predicted in this chapter. These two irreconcilable options have found nearly equal numbers of suppor-ters.

However, if 13:32 is the controlling presupposition for Mark 13, it would seem to follow that the decision modern interpreters are trying to make is one that both Jesus and Mark refused to make. If Jesus did not know when the end would come, it is unlikely that he would claim to know whether or not history would go on after the crisis surrounding the Temple's destruction.

Mark 13:30 does not indicate what is included in "all these things" which must happen within one generation. The phrase is likely drawn from the disciples' question in 13:4. What no one could know was whether or not the final return of the Son of man was one of "all these things." What seems to be indicated by 13:30 is that the Temple's destruction and its accompanying events were predicted to occur within a generation of Jesus. What is left indeterminate is whether the final return of the Son of man would be one of those accompanying events. It might be; it might not be. Jesus did not know; Mark did not know; readers are urged not to be misled by those who think they know (13:5-6, 21-22). The readers' responsibility is to allow their ignorance of this timing to become a motivation for faithful discipleship and service (13:32-37).

Mark was not, as some have argued, a careless redactor who hopelessly confused his readers by juxtaposing contradictory and irreconcilable positions in this one discourse. Rather he was a Gospel writer who claimed to know no more about the timing of the end than Jesus knew, and who presented a discourse that works out for the disciples the implications of the fact that the end could come at any time.

The calls for discernment and understanding (w. 5, 14), the ambiguous statements (e.g., v. 13: is it about the end of one's life, the end of the crisis, the end of the age?), the cryptic reference to an "abomination of desolation" standing "where it should not" (v. 14), the warnings against deception (w. 5, 22), the ambiguities of the parable of the fig tree (w. 28-29), the uncertain references in verse 30—all these help to preserve both the ambiguity and the discipleship challenge of Mark 13.

Prior to the Temple's destruction, the chapter was intended to warn and encourage believers as they prepared for and responded to the tumultuous events Jesus was predicting; these events, after all, might be the final events of world history. After the Temple's destruction, if history should go on (as we now know it has), it calls believers to be equally discerning and alert: the predicted preliminaries have happened; the end could come at any time.

Mark 13, therefore, does not teach either the conjunction or the disjunction of the two great events predicted (the destruction of the Temple and the end of the age). It rather teaches that the relationship between them is unknowable (though of course the uncertainty disappeared when the first event came and the second did not follow immediately after).

What then is/are the sign(s) about which the disciples asked (v. 4)? On the one hand, everything that happens can function as a sign; that is, a sign of God's sovereign control of history and his care for his faithful people. If events turn out as Jesus predicted, then clearly God is in control.

But, on the other hand, if the disciples wanted signs that would help them predict the timing of the end, no such signs were supplied. In fact not a single event predicted in the chapter is called a sign. The word itself (smeion) does not appear at all in Jesus' answer, except in verse 22 where the disciples are warned against sign-givers. The disciples are told that various events are not to be considered evidences that the end has come (e.g., 13:7), and other events are called (only) the beginning of the travails (13:8).

If Jesus did not endorse sign-seeking, he certainly did call for another sort of watching. The first word of Jesus' discourse is "watch" (bUpett, v. 5—a word that regularly means "be discerning" in Mark's Gospel, cf. 4:12; 8:18). The last word of the discourse is another word for "watch" (grēgoreitr, v. 37—a word that means "be alert and faithful," cf. 14:34, 37-38).

The overall message of Mark 13 seems to be that since no one knows when the end will come, vigilance is required at every moment Trials will test faithfulness, but the disciple must serve and if necessary suffer "to the end" (13:13). Sign-seeking and apocalyptic calculation are not endorsed.

Mark probably wrote shortly before or during the Roman-Jewish War (A.D. 66-70) that resulted in the Temple's destruction by the Romans. As it turns out, the Son of man did not return at that time. Those who heeded Jesus' call to flee (13:14) were saved. Others experienced the judgment Jesus predicted for those who rejected him (cf. 12:9). These events serve, as do so many events in the OT, to point toward the final judgment and the salvation that is yet to come at a future unknown date.

Is Mark 13 an "apocalyptic discourse"? It is in the sense that it clearly reflects a view of history/eschatology in which a present age of crisis and persecution will give way to a future age in which God exercises judgment on his enemies and vindicates and rewards his elect Moreover, it contains eschatological predictions and warns the elect of impending deceptions and disasters. One of the typical patterns of apocalyptic literature is reflected in the structure of the chapter— the beginning of woes (v. 8b), a time of great tribuía-tion (v. 19) and a cosmic upheaval in which God intervenes (w. 24-27).

But in other ways Mark 13 is very unlike "apocalyptic literature." Its concern is not with timetables and calculations. It reports no other-worldly journeys. It contains no visions of the abode of the dead, the divine courtroom or the heavenly throne room. In contrast with typical apocalypses, it insists that the Urning of the end is unknown to the angels, indeed even to the revealer of the discourse (13:32). The discipleship teaching of Mark 13 (reflected in the numerous imperatives, e.g., w. 5, 9, 11, 23, 33) and its apparent anti-sign-seeking message, set it apart from typical apocalypses. It is Jesus' farewell discourse offering hope and calling for faithfulness. It has the same function today for Christians who know that the end did not come with the crisis of A.D. 70 but who look forward to the fulfillment of the promise of 13:26-27.

3. The Abomination of Desolation.

The "abomination of desolation," or "desolating sacrilege" (to bdelugma lis nmòseòs), is a phrase that derives from Daniel 9:27; 11:31; 12:11 and 1 Maccabees 1:54-64. In 1 Maccabees the phrase clearly refers to the historical event of Antiochus IV erecting a pagan altar in the Jerusalem Temple. That "abomination" was an important factor leading to the Maccabean revolt and the overthrow of Israel's Syrian overlords in 164 B.C.

The prophecy in Daniel appears to point toward the same evenL However, as a prophetic word, it may well have further future fulfillments. It was apparently understood that way by Jews who applied it to a crisis in A.D. 40 when the emperor Caligula intended to set up a statue of himself in the Temple. It was certainly taken by Jesus and the Gospel writers as a prophecy pointing to a future fulfillment.

Both Mark and Matthew report Jesus' prediction of a future appearance of "the abomination of desolation" (cf. Mk 13:14; Mt 24:15). Luke interprets the prophecy as a prediction of the surrounding of Jerusalem by the armies of Rome (Lk 21:20; cf. Mk 13:14-23).

Many scholars (especially German) interpret the prophecy in terms of an antichrist figure not necessarily connected with the events of the Jewish war in A.D. 66-70. That seems to be how Paul appropriated the concept in 2 Thessalonians 2:4, where he refers to one who "exalts himself... so that he takes his seat in the sanctuary of God, proclaiming himself to be God" (if in fact this stems from the same prophecy).

Both Mark and Matthew, after including Jesus' prediction of the "abomination of desolation," add the words "let the reader understand" (cf. Mk 13:14; Mt 24:15). The authors are alerting their readers to this reapplication of the Daniel prophecy and calling on them to discern how and when it is fulfilled. Perhaps it was for political reasons that the predictions were shrouded in symbolic language.

The prophecy concerning the "abomination of desolation" was fulfilled when the Jerusalem Temple was desecrated and destroyed in A.D. 70. This does not, however, rule out the possibility of another fulfillment in the future.

4. Jesus' Teaching about the Coming Kingdom.

If Mark 13 were the only source from which to discern Jesus' relationship to apocalyptic, we would perhaps conclude that his concerns (e.g., discipleship) diverged considerably from typical apocalypticists, while his expectations for the future were very similar to theirs.

But alongside Jesus' futuristic expectation must be placed his teaching about the present reality of the kingdom of God (e.g., Mt 11:12; 12:28; Mk 10:14; Lk 11:20; 17:20-21). Texts such as these either state or imply that in some sense the kingdom has already come, the expected turning of the ages was already taking place within the ministry of Jesus. Because the Gospels portray the kingdom as both a future hope and a present reality, they preserve, but also weaken, the dualistic future-oriented perspective of apocalyptic. On this point, however, scholars are not in full agreement, perhaps because the Gospel writers were less concerned to eliminate paradoxes than modern scholars often seem to be.

The early church interpreted the life, death* and resurrection* of Jesus, and also the coming of the Spirit,* using OT texts which explicitly or implicitly refer to the "last days" (see esp. Acts 2:17; see Old Testament in the Gospels). The earliest Christians were under the conviction that even though the old age had still not ended, the new age had already dawned. It was as though the two ages of Jewish apocalyptic eschatology had overlapped. Or to put it another way, it was as though the fulfillment was split into two parts. In one sense the expectations were already fulfilled; in another they were yet to be fulfilled (Acts 2:38-40). There is no better explanation for earliest Christians viewing matters in this way than that Jesus had taught them to do so.

It may in fact have been one of the unique contri-butions of jesus that he took key themes from OT prophecy (calls to covenant faithfulness, divine disclosure of the meaning and significance of histor-ical events, anticipations of God's work in history to bring about his purposes) and some of the key themes of intertestamental apocalyptic (the concept of two ages, predictions of final judgment and vindication, divine visitations by an exalted Son of man, revelations granted to special seers), saw himself as the fuller of both, and fused them into the concept of a kingdom which was already and not yet present. Luke 17:20-37, for example, gives evidence of both aspects in Jesus' concept of the kingdom.

Some modern interpreters are reluctant to admit that this complex, paradoxical view of eschatology could possibly have been in the mind of the Gospel writers, let alone Jesus. Jesus' own views are often thought to have been much simpler (though there is little agreement on which half of the paradox might be authentic). The Gospel writers are thought to have carelessly mixed Jesus' real views with very different views that they or their predecessors in the early church held. Contemporary interpreters who credit Jesus and the Gospel writers with the paradoxical scheme outlined above are accused of making a desperate attempt to salvage a badly confused set of teachings. The burden of proof, however, must surely be on those scholars who would seek to interpret away either the realized or the futurist side of Jesus' teaching (see Beasley-Murray).

The question remains how literally Jesus and the Gospel writers intended their apocalyptic predictions to be understood. G. B. Caird's study of biblical language cautions against assuming that a literal fulfillment was always intended. Jesus and the Gospel writers often incorporated symbolism and imagery into their depictions. They clearly expected a real future return of the Son of man to judge and save (e.g., Mt 25:31-46), but many of the picturesque (or horrific) ways of describing that coming were intended to evoke OT descriptions of the coming of God, not to predict future rearrangements of the heavenly bodies or other phenomena (cf. Mk 13:24-25 par.). There is need for neither embarrassment nor demythologizing if the real intentions of Jesus and the Gospel writers are carefully discerned.

We conclude that Jesus shared some, but only some, of the views of first-century Jewish apocalypticists. He taught that his own coming already had planted the seeds of that kingdom, that his ministry evidenced the powerful advancing of that kingdom, indeed that the time of fulfillment had arrived (e.g., Lk 11:20). But he also taught that there would be a future Day of the Lord (e.g., Lk 21:34-36) that would bring the old order to an end and fully establish God's final kingdom. This paradoxical "already" but "not yet" has implications for many of the key themes addressed by apocalyptic writers.
Jesus taught that the Evil One was still in control of this present world, but that in some sense he was already defeated. Jesus taught that with his own coming, judgment on the world had come, but that nevertheless a future judgment was to be expected (Jn 12:31; 16:11). He taught that final vindication for his followers would be in eternity, but that even in this life they would also be well compensated for any sacrifices they were being asked to make (Mk 10:29-30). He taught that final salvation was still awaited (Mt 24:13), yet that salvation was already available to those who followed him (Lk 19:9).

5. The Four Gospels.

Each Gospel writer faithfully preserves the "already/ not yet" perspective of Jesus. There are, nevertheless, discernible differences in emphasis between the four Gospels.

5.1. Mark. Mark's perspective is that futuristic prophecy and calls for discipleship are inseparably bound together. This is set forth by attaching apocalyptic promises to calls for discipleship (cf. 8:31—9:1; 10:17-31) and by utilizing discipleship teaching in apocalyptic contexts (as noted above). The ultimate expression of discipleship in Mark is the passion of Jesus (see Death of Jesus). Mark's record of Jesus' last night (14:17—15:1; see Gethsemane) seems to be structured around the four watches of the night listed in 13:35. In each scene Jesus models faithful watching while those around him fail. Mark thereby defines for disciples what it means to watch in the end times (Geddert).

5.2. Matthew. Matthew's so-called apocalyptic discourse (Mt 24) closely parallels that of Mark, though it appears to heighten apocalyptic expectation by citing at least one sign (24:30). The parables that follow (24:43-44, 45-51; 25:1-13, 14-30, 31-46) reveal an emphasis on discipleship that is just as strong as Mark's.

A difference may be observed, however, in the way in which Matthew ties apocalyptic themes to discipleship. Mark characteristically holds out the promise of eschatological blessing for those who obediently follow (e.g., 10:28); Matthew characteristically holds out the threat of eschatological woe for those who are disobedient or refuse to accept Jesus (cf. 24:51; 25:30, 41). The ethical teaching of the Sermon on the Mount* and other Matthean texts are regularly tied to the need for "greater righteousness" in preparation for coming judgment.
The instant of Jesus' death is linked to the tearing of the Temple curtain, an earthquake, the splitting of rocks, and the resurrection and appearance of ancient holy ones (cf. 27:51-53). The resurrection occasions another earthquake, a brightly shining angel who rolls away the stone, and the terror of those who observe (cf. 28:2-4). Such apocalyptic motifs reveal that for Matthew, Jesus' death and resurrection are unique, apocalyptically significant events. They inaugurate the new epoch of fulfillment and world mission (Mt 28:18-20).

5.3. Luke. Luke is unique as the only Gospel writer who also wrote about the life of the early church (i.e., Acts). For Luke "history" is of paramount importance; it is the arena in which God acts. Some (H. Conzelmann) have even argued that Luke "de-apocalypti-cized" the Gospel by historicizing the traditions and pushing future expectations far into the distance.

It is probably true that Luke uses fewer apocalyptic images than Matthew in conveying the significance of Jesus' death and resurrection. But it is not true that the future return of the Son of man is a minor emphasis in Luke and Acts. Luke includes various apocalyptic-type passages as well as two lengthy discourses on the end: the so-called Q* Apocalypse (17:20-37); and 21:5-36, which is substantially parallel to the discourses of Mark 13 and Matthew 24.

The Luke 17 material clearly betrays both a realized (v. 21) and a futurist (v. 24) perspective. In chapter 21 Luke, more so than the other evangelists, seems to distinguish between the historical events surrounding the fall of the Temple (21:8-9, 12-24) and the eschatological events that will take place at a later time (21:10-11, 25-36).

H. Conzelmann underestimated Luke's interest in futurist eschatology. A. J. Mattili, in responding to Conzelmann, seems to have underestimated the realized elements. The kingdom is portrayed in Luke as already and not yet, just as it is in the other Gospels, even though differences in emphasis can be detected (cf. the commentaries on Luke by E. E. Ellis, I. H. Marshall and others).

5.4. John. John is unique among the evangelists in his portrayal of Jesus' eschatology. The realized aspects are highlighted, often by taking apocalyptic themes and attaching them to the events of Jesus' life, and especially to his death. For example, during Jesus' ministry judgment is already being experienced by those who reject Jesus (cf. 3:18) and resurrection by those who believe (cf. 5:24-25). Judgment on the world and Satan's defeat occur when Jesus is rejected and "lifted up" (12:27-33).

Some have argued that futurist eschatology disappears from John. After all, the major apocalyptic themes are already exhausted in characterizing the significance of Jesus' life and death. However, futuristic eschatology is not absent from John (cf. 21:22). Part of the literary method of John's Gospel involves symbolism and ambiguity. Often in John, statements have a literal meaning and a symbolic or spiritual meaning (e.g., 2:19). When John uses apocalyptic themes, he often has one eye on the historical events of Jesus' life and death, and another on the final eschatological events for which Jesus is preparing. It is John's way of presenting the already/not yet paradox.

The method of presentation in John is unique among the Gospels. John's ambiguity (more properly, polyvalence) suggests a profound theology of eschatological fulfillment. The resurrected and exalted Lord, present to believers through the indwelling Spirit (cf. Jn 20:22), mediates the blessings of the eschaton. Yet futuristic eschatology is not thereby eliminated (cf. Bürge; contra Bultmann). The emphasis may shift, but John's apocalyptic eschatology is not irreconcilable with that of the historical Jesus and the Synoptic writers.

6. The Significance of Apocalypticism for Today.

There is much in Jewish (and some post-biblical Christian) apocalyptic literature which is inconsistent with the gospel of Jesus Christ. Feverish calculations as to when the end will come, desperate waiting for divine intervention, maledictions against enemies—all these contribute to the negative image that apocalyptic has in some circles.

Yet there is much in apocalyptic which is at the heart of the gospel. Trust in God's sovereignty, a future-oriented hope, a recognition that material earthly existence is not the only reality and the anticipation of a future resurrection to judgment and/or salvation—these are apocalyptic themes which are integral to biblical eschatology. They begin in the OT and are carried forward by Jesus and the NT writers.

The early church did not introduce apocalypticism into the teachings of Jesus, nor was there any need to excise it from those teachings. Like Jesus, each Gospel writer portrayed (albeit with distinct emphases) that the main themes of OT prophecy (e.g., confidence in God's faithfulness, calls for obedience) can be combined with many key themes of Jewish apocalyptic (e.g., expectation of divine intervention in future judgment and salvation). Indeed they must be combined in our own understanding if we are to grasp the significance of Jesus' teaching.

Yet Jesus did more than teach a particular eschatology. He himself was the Seer commissioned to impart to his followers God's revelation (apokalypsis). He presented himself as the appointed Savior and Judge, the authoritative Son of man. With his own life, death and resurrection he inaugurated the kingdom. At his Second Coming he himself will consummate it.

The central teachings of the Gospels can be ascertained even while experts continue to debate the merits and shortcomings of apocalypticism. At points those main teachings coincide with first-century apocalypticism; at other points they diverge from it.

The NT teaches, as did apocalyptic writers, that history is moving inexorably toward a telas, a goal which will not be reached fully by historical processes. This goal-oriented view of history does not however, diminish the significance of the present age (as it did for some apocalyptic writers). On the contrary, this present age is most significant as Christians proclaim and live out the good news that brings about transfer-mation in the lives of individuals and in the world. Such faithful service during the master's absence will elicit God's "well done" when the final reckoning takes place (cf. Mt 25:23).

It is consistent with the message of Jesus and the Gospels to maintain a lively interest in futuristic prophecy. Jesus called his followers to "watch" in the interim time of waiting for God's final consummation. "Watching," however, does not mean calculating timetables and matching newspaper events with the symbols of biblical apocalyptic. Jesus' followers should not claim to know more about the timing of "that Day" than Jesus himself did (cf. Mk 13:32). "Watching" means being on guard against deception and being faithful in times of testing. The primary purpose of futuristic prophecy is to build hope, to motivate proclamation and service, and to promote faithful discipleship.

Christians can learn from apocalyptic. When injustice, loss or persecution threaten to drown out their confidence in God's sovereignty, the apocalyptic perspective invites them to lift their gaze from this world to a new heaven and earth. The kingdom is not yet. At the same time, Christians must never allow apocalyptic to lead to apathy in the face of global problems, or silence in a world that needs to hear the proclamation of the good news. The kingdom is already.

See also Apocalyptic: Destruction of Jerusalem: Eschatology; Judgment: Kingdom of God: Son of Man.

T.J. Geddart

APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS. See Gospels (Apocryphal).
The term "apostle" (apostolos) is used in the Gospels to designate the twelve disciples* called and sent out by Jesus to preach the Gospel (see Gospel [Good News]) of the kingdom (see Kingdom of God) and demonstrate its presence by performing signs and wonders (see Mira-des). The term is not applied to Jesus himself in the Gospels, nevertheless there is good reason to believe that he thought of himself as the apostle of God,* sent into the world* to proclaim and inaugurate the kingdom of God. There is also good reason to believe that the origin of the Christian apostolate is to be traced back to Jesus, in particular to his sending of the Twelve on their Galilean (see Galilee) mission, and that the notion of apostleship betrays certain affinities with the Jewish institution of the "šāliḥah ("envoy"). This in turn enables us to understand better the nature of the Christian apostolate.

1. Terminology
2. The Origin of the Idea of Aposdeship
3. Jesus, Apostle of God
4. The Apostleship of Jesus' Disciples
5. Nuances in the Evangelists' Understanding of the Apostolate

1. Terminology.

In addition to the word apostolos, two other terms are significant for our understanding of apostleship in the Gospels. First there is the cognate verb apostellō ("to send"), which is used in all four Gospels. The second is the verb pempō ("to send"), used synonymously in John's Gospel. The use of these terms in non-biblical sources has been documented often (see e.g., Reng-storf) and need only be noted here in the broadest outline.

1.1. Apostolos. In classical Greek apostolos was used in an impersonal way, for example, in reference to the dispatch of a fleet (or an army) and then in reference to the fleet (or army) itself. There are a couple of isolated places where apostolos is used personally; however, it is noteworthy that in these cases the idea of being an authorized agent is quite secondary; it is simply the quality of having been sent that is primary. Apostolos is found only once in the LXX (3 Kings 14:6 par. 1 Kings 14:6 ET), which is quite surprising because the OT contains many references to messengers sent from God. In the papyri the term is used in an impersonal way (e.g., to designate an invoice accompanying a shipment of corn). Josephus uses apostolos twice, and in one of these cases it refers to Jewish emissaries who came to Rome to petition Caesar for the liberty to live according to their own laws. This comes closer to the use of apostolos in the Gospels, but clearly still falls somewhat short of it. The use of apostolos in the Gospels, and indeed its primary usage throughout the NT to designate someone who is sent (by Christ) to convey a message from God, is then virtually unique in ancient literature.

1.2. Apostellō and Pempō. In secular Greek the verbs apostellō and pempō are used of the sending of persons and things. There is, however, a discernible difference in the usage of the two terms. Pempō is used where mere sending is involved, whereas apostellō is used to denote sending of persons with a commission and in some cases to denote a divine sending and authorization.

In the LXX the verb apostellō is used more than 709 times, and almost always as a translation equivalent for the Hebrew verb ŝālah ("to send"). ŝālah denotes for the most part the idea of being sent with a commission, either by another human agent or by God. Pempō is used much less, and only five times to translate ŝālah. Josephus uses both terms, sometimes as synonyms (where a mere sending is involved), but he chooses apostellō when he wants to convey the idea of being sent with a commission.

In the NT (with the exception of John's Gospel), it may be said that Pempō is used where the simple idea of sending is conveyed, and apostellō when something of a commission is involved. In John's Gospel, however, the two terms are used interchangeably.

2. The Origin of the Idea of Apostleship.

The term apostolos occurs infrequently outside the NT, and this stands in marked contrast to the frequency of its use within the NT. It is found, for example, only once in the LXX, whereas it occurs seventy-nine times in the NT. How can we account for this? Where did this Christian use of apostolos originate?

2.1. The Traditional View. Both Mark 3:14 and Luke 6:13 affirm that Jesus chose twelve disciples "whom he also named apostles," thus tracing the naming of the Twelve as apostles back to Jesus himself. This might seem to settle the issue for many. Those who trace the idea of the Christian apostolate back to Jesus recognize, of course, that Jesus himself probably did not use the Greek term apostolos. He would have used, most likely, either the Aramaic (Šêlîhā') or the Hebrew (Šāliyah) equivalent. Those espousing this view argue that apostolos in our Gospels must be understood in terms of the Jewish institution of the 'Šâliyah("envoy")', an idea with which Jesus would have been well acquainted and had applied to his understanding of his relationship with his disciples.

The institution of the Šâliyah is well documented in rabbinic writings (cf. e.g., m. Ber. 5:5; see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) where it refers to someone who has been authorized to carry out certain fune-tions on behalf of another. The adage "a man's envoy is as himself" occurs frequently in the rabbinic literature, and it underlines both the representative character of the Šâliyah and that he carries the full authority* of his principal. It is suggested, then, that it was in terms of this institution that Jesus understood his relationship to his disciples and that it is his use of this idea that lies behind the use of apostolos in the Gospels.

2.2. Difficulties with the Traditional View. The traditional view is not as strong as it first seems, for two reasons. First, better manuscripts omit the words "whom he also named apostles" from Mark 3:14. That leaves Luke 6:13 as the lone testimony to the naming of the Twelve as apostles by Jesus. Luke's text may be based on a weakly attested variant of Mark, and the inclusion of this clause in Mark in some manuscripts may be due to a scribal gloss.

If we set Mark 3:14 and Luke 6:13 to one side, then all we are left with in the Gospels are: (1) a number of texts where the Twelve are spoken of by the Evangelists as apostles (Mt 10:2; Mk 6:30; Lk 9:10; 17:5; 22:14; 24:10; (2) one saying of Jesus in Luke 11:49 ("Therefore also the Wisdom* of God said, 'I will send to them prophets and apostles, and they will kill and persecute some of them' ") which does include a reference to apostles, but this is omitted in the parallel saying of Jesus in Matthew 23:34; and (3) one Johannine saying of Jesus ("Truly, truly, I say to you, a servant is not greater than his master; nor is one sent [apostolos] greater than the one who sent him" [13:16]), which is clearly not a statement related primarily to the Christian apostolate.

Second, while the institution of the Šâliyah ("envoy") is well documented in rabbinic literature, its documentation cannot be dated earlier than the second century AD. There is no known use of the nominal form Šâliyah before that time. The upshot of this is that it is very difficult to sustain the view that the use of the word apostolos in the Gospels demonstrates either that the origin of the Christian apostolate can be traced back to Jesus, or that Jesus understood it in terms of the Jewish institution of the Šāliyah. This has prompted some scholars to seek alternative ways to explain the origin of the Christian apostolate.

2.3. Alternative Views

One factor which seems to point to a possible alternative explanation for the origin of the apostolate is the rather uneven distribution of the word apostolos within the NT as a whole. Of the seventy-nine occurrences in the NT, sixty-eight are found in Luke-Acts and the Pauline corpus—documents which are particularly related to the early Christian mission. This has prompted a number of scholars (e.g., W. Schmithals) to argue that the idea of the Christian apostolate originated, not in the time of Jesus' mission, but in the early period of the church's* post-Easter* mission.

This view needs to be taken seriously. The major Pauline letters are among the earliest NT documents, and were almost certainly written before any of the Gospels. Therefore the emergence of the Christian idea of apostle, at a literary level at least must be traced to these. It is, therefore, theoretically possible that the idea of the Christian apostolate originated in the early period of the Christian mission, then found literary expression in the major Pauline letters, and later on was used by the evangelists when they wrote their accounts of Jesus' calling and commissioning of his disciples.

Another view is that the concept originated in a Jewish or a Jewish-Christian Gnosticism native in Syria. As Antioch (in Syria) is thought to be the homeland of the church's mission, it is argued that the concept could have been easily borrowed and appropriated into the thinking of the early Christian mission there. However, this last suggestion has not generally commended itself to scholars, not least because the documents to which appeal is made in support of the existence of pre-Christian Gnosticism do not date from the pre-Christian period. Many scholars, therefore, favor the view that the concept of the apostolate arose from within the Church's own missionary experience.

2.4. Return to (a Modified) Traditional View

In more recent times a growing number of scholars have been willing to trace the origin of the Christian apostolate back to the period of Jesus. However, those who do so are reluctant to tie it too closely to the institution of Šāliyah ("envoy") documented in rabbinic writings, as did the earlier proponents of this view. Attention is now focussed instead on the "šālah/apostellō* sending* terminology occurring in both the OT and the NT.

The more recent approach begins appropriately with the earliest literary references to the Christian apostolate, that is, those in the letters of Paul. In these letters Paul speaks of himself frequently as an apostle (\textit{apostolos}) of Jesus Christ, and of Christ's having sent (\textit{apostilló}) him with a commission to proclaim the gospel to the \textit{gentiles}.* \textit{Apostolos/apostellō} in Paul's letters, then, bears the same basic meaning as the \textit{sālah/apostellō} terminology in the OT, that of a person being sent with a commission.

Turning to the Gospels, we find that while the use of the noun \textit{apostolos} is quite meager, that of the verb \textit{apostellō} (and in the case of John's Gospel the use of the verb \textit{Pempō} as well) is quite substantial. Each of the four Gospels uses \textit{apostellō} many times, including what we might call technical uses in which the idea of being sent with a commission is involved. In each of the Gospels these technical uses occur in both narrative statements made by the Evangelist, and in sayings of Jesus which the Evangelist includes in his narrative. These technical uses, like those found in the Pauline letters, correspond with the use of the \textit{sālah/apostellō} sending terminology in the OT to denote the sending of a person with a commission (see 1.2. above). Thus it seems clear that the Christian notion of the apostolate has definite links with the OT notion of sending with a commission (and this in turn corresponds with the role of the Jewish \textit{Šālîah as it is} documented in the rabbinic literature).

However, the question remains: Can we trace the forging of this link back to Jesus, and was he therefore the one who provided the church with its understanding of the apostolate? Theoretically, of course, this link could have been forged in the period of the early Christian mission, and once forged the resulting notion of the apostolate could have been used anachronistically by the Evangelists in their Gospel accounts of Jesus' ministry. Is there any way to reach a responsible decision as to which of these alternatives is to be preferred?

\textbf{2.5. Jesus and the Christian Apostolate.} The case for tracing the idea of the Christian apostolate back to Jesus himself would gain cogency if it could be shown that there are authentic sayings of Jesus in the Gospels (especially in the Synoptics) in which the technical use of \textit{apostellō} mentioned above may be found. In fact there are a number of such sayings whose authenticity can be argued quite strongly on critical grounds. They include both sayings in which Jesus speaks of his having been sent by the Father, and sayings in which he speaks about his own sending of the Twelve/ Seventy.

Examples of sayings relating to Jesus himself in-dude Matthew 15:24 in which he says to the Canaanite woman, "I was sent only to the lost sheep* of the house of Israel,*" and Luke 4:18 where Jesus cites Isaiah 61:1 saying: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim release to the captives."

One example of the sayings which relate to Jesus' disciples having been sent by him is Luke 22:35, where Jesus asks them, "When I sent you out without purse or bag or sandals did you lack anything?" In addition there is a series of sayings in which Jesus comments that those who receive his disciples receive him, and those who receive him receive the One who sent him (Mt 10:40/Lk 10:16; Mk 9:37/Lk 9:48/Mt 18:5).

It can be argued strongly on critical grounds that all these sayings rest on authentic Jesus tradition. For example, Matthew's retention of 15:24 with its exdus-ivist note ("only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel"), despite the embarrassment it may have caused in a church already involved in Gentile mission in the pre-Pauline era (cf. Acts 10:1-48; 11:20-24), strongly supports its dominical character. The reliability of the tradition behind Luke 4:18, with its citation from Isaiah 61:1, is underlined by the fact that allusion is made to Isaiah 61:1 in other sayings of Jesus (Lk 6:20/Mt 5:3-6 and Mt 11:2-6/Lk 7:18-23) which bear the hallmarks of authenticity. In the case of Luke 22:35 it can be argued that the whole pericope in which it is found (Lk 22:35-38), with its advice to take up the sword, is not the sort of saying the church would want to put on the lips of Jesus while at the same time trying to keep the remembrance of him free from any association with the Zealots (see Revo-lutionary Movements). (For a fuller discussion of the case for the authenticity of the tradition underlying these sayings and others mentioned above, see Kruse 13-29.)

Because there are strong arguments in favor of the authenticity of these sayings, there is also a strong case for claiming that the idea of the Christian apostolate originated with Jesus and that he under-stood it in a way similar to that reflected in the use of sālah/apostellō terminology in the OT. This in turn means that Jesus' understanding of the apostolate has close affinities with that of the function of the Šālīyah reflected in the rabbinic writings.

We can now turn our attention from arguments thai the idea of the Christian apostolate originated with Jesus and seek to understand what, according to the Gospels, that apostolate entailed. We begin with a discussion of Jesus' own apostolic consciousness.

The term apostolos is only once applied to Jesus in the NT (Heb 3:1), it being nowhere used of him in the Gospels. However, there are a number of sayings of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels in which he betrays a consciousness of having been sent by God (Mt 15:24; Lk 4:18; Mt 10:40; Mk 9:37; Lk 9:48; 10:16). The Gospel of John attributes to Jesus some thirty-nine statements to the effect that he has been sent by God, including statements using both aposteüō and pempō (cf. e.g., 5:30, 36,38; 6:29, 57; 7:16, 29; 8:16,42; 10:36).

3.1. The Source of Jesus' Apostolic Consciousness. It appears from the Gospels that the primary aspect of Jesus' consciousness was that of his filial relationship with the Father (cf. e.g., the boy Jesus' reply to his parents in Lk 2:49: "Did you not know that I must be in my Father's house?"), and that he had been sent by the Father to carry out his mission (cf. Lk 4:43: "I must preach the kingdom of God to the other cities also; for I was sent for this purpose"). This consciousness of having been sent by God is stressed heavily by the Fourth Evangelist. A secondary aspect of Jesus' apostolic consciousness is that of having been endowed with the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) to carry out the commission which the Father had given him. Each of the Gospels tells how Jesus was endowed with the Spirit at his baptism.* On a number of occasions Jesus appeals to this endowment as evidence that he is the one sent by God to bring in the time of fulfillment spoken of in the OT. For example, in Luke 4:16-21 Jesus cites the prophecy of Isaiah 61:1-2 claiming that this prophecy has now been fulfilled. In Matthew 12:28 he replies to those who assert that he exorcises by the power of Beelzebul by saying, "If by the Spirit of God I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you."

It seems, then, that Jesus' own apostolic conscious-ness was rooted in his sense of unique filial relationship with the Father (see Abba; Son of God) and of having been commissioned by him to inaugurate the time of fulfillment. The activity of the Spirit in his ministry was something to which he called the attention of others so that they might come to recognize that he was sent by God, rather than being the evidence by which he himself was convinced of his calling.
3.2. The Scope of Jesus' Apostolate. One feature of Jesus' own apostleship which is rather striking is its limited scope. According to Matthew 15:24 ("I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel"), Jesus understood his mission to be limited to the Jewish people, and this is reflected in the fact that the Synoptic Gospels never depict him deliberately setting out to evangelize non-Jews. He was sent to announce the coming of the kingdom of God among the Jewish towns of Galilee* and Judea (Mk 1:35-39/Lk 4:42-43). Even the remarkable ministry in Samaria (see Samar-itan), recounted in John 4, is not presented as something which Jesus set out deliberately to undertake (as was the case with the ministry in Jewish towns).

3.3. A Prophetic and Prophecy-Fulfilling Apostolate. Jesus' mission was prophetic insofar as he, like other great prophets (see Prophet, Prophecy) before him, proclaimed the coming of the kingdom of God (Mk 1:14-15/Mt 4:17). However, it went beyond anything that the prophets did in that he was sent not only to proclaim the kingdom, but actually to inaugurate it as well. Accordingly, Luke tells us that Jesus understood the great prophecy of Isaiah 61:1-2 as being fulfilled in his mission (Lk 4:16-21; cf. Lk 6:20/Mt 5:3-6; Mt 22:2-6/Lk 7:18-23).

3.4. Jesus' Apostolate and the Kingdom. What did it mean in practice for Jesus to inaugurate the kingdom? Jesus' statement "the kingdom of God is drawing near" really means that God himself is drawing near. And what did God do when he drew near in the person and mission of Jesus? He began his work of bringing in a new era. He called a nation to repentance, he sat at table (see Table Fellowship) with tax collectors (see Taxes), sinners,* Pharisees* and others; he lifted the heavy burden of religious tradition from the shoulders of the people of the land and liberated those who suffered from disease and demonic oppression. But above all he drew near to forgive the sins (see Forgive-ness of Sins) of all who heeded the call to repentance, and to enter into a restored relationship with them.

But there was also a dark and mysterious side to what God was doing when he drew near in the person and mission of Jesus. The kingdom had not only to be proclaimed and inaugurated. A way had to be opened whereby sinful men and women could participate in it. The crucial part of Jesus' mission was the giving of his life as a ransom for many (Mk 10:45; see Ransom Saying); the pouring out of his blood for the remission of sins (Mt 26:28; Mk 14:23-24; Lk 22:20). It was to achieve this, above all, that Jesus was sent as apostle of God.
4. The Apostleship of Jesus' Disciples.

Each of the Synoptic Gospels recounts how Jesus called the Twelve and sent them out on a Galilean mission. Some doubts have been raised about the historicity of such a mission, but there are compelling reasons to reject such objections. Not least among these is the existence of a reference to that mission in the saying of Jesus in Luke 22:35: "When I sent you out without purse or bag or sandals, did you lack anything?" (cf. 2.5. above). Leaving aside, then, the question of historicity, we may explore the mission traditions of the Gospels to discover what they reveal of the nature of the apostleship of the Twelve.

4.1. The Mission of the Twelve. Mark 3:13-14 reads: "And he went up on the mountain,* and called to him those whom he wished; and they came to him. And he appointed Twelve, whom he also named apostles, so that they might be with him, and so that he might send them to preach." Mark emphasizes that the mission and apostolate of the Twelve originates in the call of Jesus. The purpose for which they were called is clearly spelled out: "so that (hina) they might be with him, and so that (hina) he might send them to preach." There are two parts to the call and the second was intimately related to the first

The first part (to be with him) involved travelling up and down the country with him, sharing food and accommodation with him, experiencing the same acceptance and rejection which he encountered, and observing and sometimes participating in the ministry which he was carrying out. The second part (being sent out to preach) was dependent on the first (being with him) for, as we shall see, their preaching ministry was essentially an extension of his. Mark 6:7-13; Matthew 10:1-42; and Luke 9:1-6 present Jesus' charge to the Twelve.

There are a number of significant points of comparison between their mission and the mission of Jesus himself. First Jesus, who said that he had not been sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt 15:24), insisted that the same limitations apply to the mission of the Twelve: "Do not go into the way of the Gentiles, and do not enter a Samaritan town, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:5-6). Second, the thrust of their mission was to be the same. They were to proclaim that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, and its presence was to be demonstrated by mighty works (Mt 10:7-8). Third, and possibly most important of all, Jesus maintained that the reception his disciples were accorded by the people would be regarded as the reception the people wished to accord to himself, and to the Father who had sent him (Mt 10:40).
All of this has important significance for our understanding of the mission of the Twelve and of the nature of apostleship itself. That the limitations applying to their mission, its essential thrust and the significance of the people's response to it all closely parallel the essential features of Jesus' own mission suggest strongly that their mission was in fact an extension of his. This in turn suggests that the apostellō sending terminology which, as we have seen, is used by Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels (and John), reflects an understanding of the relationship existing between himself and his disciples in terms of the institution of the Šālîah. His disciples were commissioned to act as his representatives, under his authority, proclaiming his message and exercising his power. In the case of Jesus' disciples, then, the words of the rabbinic adage "a man's envoy is as himself" truly apply.

4.2. The Mission of the Seventy. Each of the Synoptic Gospels recounts a Galilean mission of the Twelve, but Luke alone recounts a mission of the Seventy. There are problems surrounding the latter. First, there is the question of whether the text of Luke 10:1 (and 10:17) should read "seventy" or "seventy-two." Both readings are found in the manuscripts and the witnesses seem evenly divided. Other considerations, such as the symbolism of the Seventy(-two), have produced no scholarly consensus about the original reading.

Second, material found in the Markan (6:7-13) and Matthean (10:1-42) charges to the Twelve appears in part in the Lukan charge to the Twelve (9:1-6) and in part in the Lukan charge to the Seventy (10:1-16). Assuming, as most scholars still do, that Mark was written first and that Matthew and Luke made use of some form of Mark as well as a sayings source (Q*) in the composition of their Gospels, it seems that Matthew used his Markan material plus the Q mission-sayings when composing his charge to the Twelve, while Luke used the same sources to compose two charges—that to the Twelve and that to the Seventy (see Synoptic Problem).

Third, when Luke depicts Jesus referring back to the mission of the Twelve (22:35), reference is made to material included in the charge to the Seventy. From this it may be inferred that Luke was not trying to reproduce verbatim different charges to different people, but rather providing an account of the sort of thing which Jesus would have said to two different groups.

In light of all this, the question is asked whether the mission of the Seventy has any basis in history or if it should simply be regarded as a literary creation of the Evangelist It has been suggested, for instance, that Luke invented the story to prefigure the wider mission of the church to the Gentiles. Thus, it is urged, just as the mission of the Twelve speaks of a mission to the tribes of Israel, so the mission of the Seventy speaks of the mission to the nations of the world. (Gen 10 contains a list of nations comprising seventy names in the MT, and seventy-two in the LXX.) Another suggestion is that Luke invented the mission of the Seventy to deal with the tension between the church's tradition concerning the mission of the Twelve and its recognition of the mission of a far wider group of witnesses.

However, there are other ways of explaining the phenomena. First, it is theoretically possible that Luke regarded the existence of mission material in his two sources (Mark and Q) as evidence for two different missions, and he used those sources to compose two mission charges. Second, and more likely, Luke was the recipient of reliable tradition about the two historic missions, and in composing his Gospel he used the mission material from his two sources to provide an account of the sort of thing Jesus would have said in sending out the two groups.

4.3. Post-Easter Mission of Jesus' Disciples. While the mission accounts of the Synoptic Gospels (there is none in John) relate to activity in the pre-Easter period, there appear to be allusions in the charges to a later and wider mission of the disciples in the post-Easter period. For example, the saying "Behold, I am sending you out as sheep/lambs in the midst of wolves" (Mt 10:16/Lk 10:3) does not in some ways fit well with the disciples' actual Galilean mission experience (cf. e.g., Lk 10:17-20). They appear to have been halcyon days. This has led some to suggest that this saying (and others which foreshadow great difficulties and persecution for the missionary band) is a tradition which emanated from the post-Easter period when the church was actually experiencing persecution. However, it is not necessary to draw that conclusion. Jesus would have been well aware of the mounting tension created by his mission and would have been able to foresee the opposition which he would increasingly experience, and which would culminate in his death in Jerusalem. It would have required no great insight or prophetic foreknowledge on Jesus' part to see that his followers would experience similar persecution at a later time.

All this suggests that the material now found together in the mission charges may include not only the sayings which related directly to the pre-Easter Galilean mission but also sayings of Jesus foreshadowing the post-Easter mission of his followers. Then they would encounter the same hostile opposition which he himself encountered toward the end of his ministry. This in turn lends support to the view that the apostolic role of the Twelve in the post-Easter period was at least anticipated by the historical Jesus.

Such a post-Easter mission is, of course, assumed in the post-resurrection commission sayings which are found in one form or another in each of the four Gospels (but in Mark in the longer ending only) and Acts. In both Matthew and Luke, Jesus (re)commissions the Twelve (less Judas Iscariot*), this time to make disciples of all nations (Mt 28:18-20) and to proclaim repentance and remission of sins in his name to all nations (Lk 24:44-49). This reflects the Evangelists' belief that the Jesus who called and commissioned the Twelve for the limited Galilean mission recommissioned the same men (less Judas) to be apostles of the worldwide mission. It also shows that the early church understood that the restrictions applying to Jesus' mission, and which were also applied by him to the Galilean mission of the Twelve, were now deliberately lifted, and a mission to Samar-ians* and Gentiles,* as well as Jews, was actually enjoined.

Each of the four Evangelists portrays the apostolate in his own way. Some things are common to all or most of the Evangelists, but others receive distinctive emphasis in one or other of the Evangelists alone.

5.1. Common Elements. Common to all the Evang-lists is the firm belief that membership in the apostolate is a matter of choice on the part of Christ; there are no volunteers. Each of the Synoptic Gospels make this plain by showing how Jesus took the initiative in specifically calling certain people to follow him (Mt 4:18-22; 9:9; Mk 1:16-20; 2:14; Lk 5:1-11, 27-28). And when it came to the appointment of the Twelve, again Jesus called those whom he desired (Mt 10:1-4; Mk 3:13-19; Lk 6:12-16). While the Gospel of John does not include an account of the appointment of the Twelve, it refers to them as such several times (6:67, 70-71; 20:24) and also stresses that membership in the apostolate is a matter of Christ's choice (6:70; 13:18; 15:16,19).

All the Synoptic Evangelists indicate that the appointment of the Twelve was (initially at least) for a Galilean mission in which they would carry on in Jesus' name the same sort of activity in which he himself was involved (Mt 10:6-8; Mk
5.2. Different Elements. While all four Gospels (and Acts) contain a post-resurrection commission by Christ, these reveal different aspects and/or understandings of the apostolate.

5.2.1. Matthew. In Matthew Jesus says to the eleven: "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you; and behold, I am with you always (lit all the days), to the close of the age" (28:18-20). The fourfold use of the word "all" is our clue to Matthew's emphasis on the nature of the apostolic task: It rests on the authority of the risen Christ ("all authority ... has been given to me. Go therefore . . ."), its scope is to encompass "all the nations," its content is teaching "all that I have commanded you" and its promise is "Behold, I am with you always, to the close of the age."

5.2.2. Mark. In Mark the commission-saying is found only in the longer ending, and there is considerable doubt whether this should be regarded as an authentic pan of the Gospel (see Mark, Gospel of). The saying runs: "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to the whole creation. He who believes and is baptized will be saved but he who does not believe will be condemned" (16:15-16). The stress here is on the universal nature of the apostolic commission and on the serious implications of people's response to the apostolic message.

5.2.3. Luke. In Luke's Gospel the commission-saying reads: "Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer and rise from the dead on the third day, and that repentance and forgiveness of sins should be preached in his name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem. You are witnesses of these things. And behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you; but stay in the city, until you are clothed with power from on high" (24:46-49). Once again the universal scope of the apostolic commission is stressed ("to all nations"). In addition, Luke stresses that the role of the apostolate is to bear witness* to the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ and to call for repentance and offer forgiveness in his name.

This notion of the apostolic task as witness is developed further in Acts, where the apostles are told they are to be Christ's "witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and to the end of the earth" (1:8). What this witness involves is spelled out in the account of Matthias' appointment to succeed Judas Iscariot: "So one of the men who have accompanied us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John until the day when he was taken up from us—one of these men must become with us a witness to his resurrection" (1:21-22).

Finally, there is in the Lukan commission-saying an emphasis on the empowering (by the Spirit) which the apostles were to receive to carry out their task (this also is further developed in Acts).

5.2.4. John. In John's Gospel Jesus appears to his disciples after his resurrection and says to them, "Peace be with you. As the Father has sent me, even so I send you" (20:21). The wording of the commission here implies that the apostolic task involved an extension of the ministry of Jesus himself. In the verses which follow (22-23) Jesus breathed on his disciples and said, "Receive the Holy Spirit If you forgive the sins of any, they are forgiven them; if you retain the sins of any, they are retained." This both elucidates how their mission can be said to be an extension of his (because of the Holy Spirit bestowed) and something of what that means (the forgiving and retaining of sins—presumably by preaching the Gospel and informing people of the consequences of receiving or rejecting it, just as Jesus had done).

See also Disciple: Gentiles.

ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY

We begin with a short discussion of the actual or presupposed geographical data, most of which are contained in the Gospels. Special attention will be devoted to the question of whether the results of archeological investigations can shed light on NT and early church traditions referring to details of locale. In conclusion we will consider what theological significance can be attributed to geographic factors, and whether these factors furnish any grounds for drawing conclusions about the historical reliability (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]) and the origin of the Gospels.

1. The Infancy Narratives
2. Areas of John the Baptist's Activity
3. The Public Ministry of Jesus in Galilee
4. Withdrawal Areas around Galilee
5. The Journeys to Jerusalem
6. Jerusalem
7. Historical and Theological Significance

1. The Infancy Narratives.

1.1. The Birthplace of John the Baptist. To visit Elizabeth, Mary went "into the hill country [oreinē], to a city of Judah" (Lk 1:39). The Greek word describes the distria around Jerusalem (Pliny Nat. Hist. 5.14). A literary tradition that can be traced back to the sixth century identifies the birthplace with En-Kerem (Arabic Ain Karim), seven kilometers west of Jerusalem (ELS 44ff.). Remains of two fourth-century churches indicate, however, that the tradition stretches back to a still-earlier time (GBL 11.776). The identification of this site with the priestly city of Juttah (Josh 15:55; 21:16) ten kilometers south of Hebron is ruled out on philological grounds alone (see John the Baptist).
1.2. Bethlehem. According to Matthew 2:1 and Luke 2:4 Jesus was born in Bethlehem (Gk Bēthleem), the native city of the house of David (see Birth of Jesus). It has often been argued that this is nothing more than a deduction from the prophecy of Micah 5:2, and that Jesus actually hailed from Nazareth. Against this is the fact that Bethlehem as Jesus' birthplace appears in two traditions that are totally different from each other. When John 7:42 is taken as indicating that the Fourth Evangelist knew nothing of Jesus' birth in the city of David, the intentional ambiguity found throughout John's Gospel is being misunderstood. That Joseph set out for Bethlehem because of a tax census (Lk 2:1-4) is explicable only if he had land holdings there—indeed, it is probable that it was his place of residence (cf. Mt 2:11, 22-23). This is not necessarily contradicted by Luke's presentation, since katalyma (Lk 2:7) need not refer to a guest house but far more commonly denotes a large room. Worth mention only as a curiosity is the occasional claim that Jesus' birthplace was the Bethlehem that lay eleven kilometers northwest of Nazareth (J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth, 1952, 315-16).

A somewhat independent reference to Jesus' origin in the city of David is the early Christian geographical tradition, not derivable from the Gospels, placing Jesus' birth in a cave in Bethlehem (GBL 1.196-97). The present Church of the Nativity, lying at the west edge of the hill that marked the old city, was erected over a large rock cave, some 12x3 meters in size. This cavern is one of several that were located near houses and served as stalls or for the storage of supplies (cf. Lk 11:33) in the first century. Already at the beginning of the second century, the local tradition was so well established that Hadrian (in c. AD. 135) made the cave into a sanctuary to Adonis in order to eliminate veneration of it by Jewish Christians (ELS 83ff.). According to Jerome the "manger" (phatnē) of Luke 2:7 was still visible in his time and consisted of a rock groove with plain clay walls (ELS 91) in a side cave some 3x3 meters in size (GBL 11.847). Due to the marble paneling and rebuilding, today it is very difficult to envision the original appearance of this grotto.

1.3. The Shepherd Fields. Based on Genesis 35:21 and Micah 4:8, some Jews expected the Messiah to appear at a place called the "shepherd's tower" (Heb migdalēder) east of Bethlehem (GBL 11.977-78). Luke 2:8 may envision the shepherds at this site. From the fourth century at the latest, the shepherd fields were sought east of Bethlehem at the village of Beth Sahur (ELS 90ff.). Excavations in this area have brought to light a small shepherd settlement dating to the first century (GBL 1.197).
1.4. Rachel's Tomb. Already in NT times, this tomb near Bethlehem was venerated based on Genesis 35:19. This is probably the same site as the present one at the junction that leads to Jerusalem (GBL 1.197). There may have been a connection between the tradition surrounding this tomb and Matthew 2:16-18.

1.5. The Tomb of Herod the Great. Matthew 2:19 mentions the death of the Jewish king. Originally, he had foreseen a family burial site a little north of the modern Damascus gate in Jerusalem in a rotunda modeled after Augustus' mausoleum in Rome. Herod was transferred, however, to the Herodium, his refuge located southwest of Bethlehem on a hill partially constructed from rubble (Josephus J.W. 1.33.8 §673). For a long time his grave was suspected to lie in the main tower, but today it is rather thought to be at the base of the fortress (GBL 11.813; see Herodian Dynasty).

2. Areas of John the Baptist's Activity.

2.1. The Desert John Inhabited. As the parallels to Jesus' birth narratives show, the Baptist was already "in the desert" as a small child (Lk 1:80). Some researchers have suspected that John was brought up in the Qumran community, since the Essenes adopted youths and instructed them in their doctrine (Josephus J.W. 2.8.2 §120; cf. 1QH 9:35-36). The local Christian traditions regarding the desert frequented by the Baptist are of late origin and contradictory (ELS 62ff.). Even if John was in contact with the Essenes during his youth, after his prophetic calling from God he turned away from their exclusivist teachings to preach repentance to the populace at large (see Mountain and Wilderness).

2.2. The Baptism of Jesus. According to Matthew 3:13-17 Jesus was baptized (see Baptism) at the Jordan River where it forms the eastern border (cf. Mk 1:4-5) of the desert of Judea (Mt 3:1). This points to the area between the mouth of the Wadi Farah and the site where the Jordan enters the Dead Sea. Already in the third century Origen (Comm. Joh. 6.104) knew a local tradition about the heights of Jericho on the east bank of the river. This tradition connected the site with the name Bethabara (probably a ford). Subsequently, the Byzantine tradition without exception transferred Jesus' baptismal site to this location, more precisely to the Wadi el-Charrar (ELS 171ff.). This may result from a local Jewish tradition, quite independent of Christian tradition, that located Elijah's* ascension (2 Kings 2:5-14) in this very area (GBL 1.193). It is quite possible that John chose this baptismal site deliberately in order to hint that he was the eschatological Elijah (cf. Mt 11:14; 17:11-13; Mk 9:12-13; Lk 1:17).

2.3. The Mountain of the Temptation. While a symbolic understanding would also be possible (Mt 4:8; cf. Lk 4:5 [see Temptation of Jesus]), it appears that early Byzantine tradition regarded this mountain to have been the Dschebel Qarantal northwest of Jericho, on which the Hasmonean fortress of Dok lay (ELS 189-90). Perhaps the Jerusalem Talmud polemicizes against such a veneration (y. 'Abod. Zar. 39c). According to the Qumran Copper Scroll it seems possible that there was an Essene hideaway there (3Q15 7:11-13). Local Christian tradition preserves, perhaps, the memory that Jesus withdrew (Mk 1:12-13 par.) in a similar manner to the peaceful solitude of this deserted place (GBL 11.659).

2.4. Aenon and Salim. John also baptized at another site, by a sizable spring Aenon (Heb 'ynôn; Gk Ainôn) in the vicinity of Salim (Gk Saleim: Jn 3:23). Baptizing in the Jordan could have been hazardous during high water, but its tributaries were considered as waters of the Jordan (GBL 1.64). Because of the travel route presupposed by the Fourth Evangelist (cf. Jn 3:22; 4:1-6), modern researchers have tried to identify Salim with Ain Farah twelve kilometers northwest of Sichern.

The early Byzantine tradition (ELS 214ff.), however, places the site twelve kilometers southeast of Scy-thopolis (Beth-shan), where the lush springs of Ed-Der arise near Tel Shech Salim (GBL III.1318). In favor of the Baptist's having chosen this site is the fact that Elisha's birthplace, Abel-Mehola, where Elijah made him his disciple (1 Kings 19:15-21), was not far distant. The Copper Scroll suggests (3Q15 12:6-7) that an Essene group that practiced baptism settled in this area (DJD IV.262). Early Christian pilgrims were shown the palace of Melchizedek near Salim, a feature which may point to a tradition formed by this Essene group (cf. llQMelch) in competition with Jerusalem. Since the area lay in the jurisdiction of Scythopolis, a city of the Decapolis, the Baptist was safe here from persecution by Herod Antipas.

2.5. Bethany beyond the Jordan. At this place (topos) east of the Jordan (Jn 1:28: en Bêthama peran tou lordanou), a delegation from Jerusalem interrogated John the Baptist regarding who he claimed to be (Jn 1:19-28). At Bethany Jesus called his first personal followers from among the Baptist's adherents (Jn 1:35-51; cf. Acts 1:21-22). There he tarried, obviously to avoid harassment shortly before the passion. In so doing he gained still more followers from among John's ranks (Jn 10:40-42). In the third century Origen found no place by this name on the east bank of the Jordan. He therefore opted for the reading Bëthabara that appears in a few texts (Comm. Joh. 4.204). The oldest manuscripts P56, P75, however, support Beth-ania, and the transition from John 10:4042 to 11:1-2 shows that the Evangelist was aware of how similar Bethany (on the far side of the Jordan) and Bethany (near Jerusalem) sounded (Jn 11:1, 18). The distances presupposed in John 1—2 and 10—11 speak in favor of a location nearer Galilee* than Judea. In recent time various more precise attempts to pin down the location have not succeeded (GBL 1.193-94).

One explanation that clarifies much holds Bethany to have been the district of Batanaea (Gk Batanaia), the Bashan of the OT, which is designated in the LXX as peran tou lordanou (Num 32:32-33; Deut 3:8; 4:47). A Greek transliteration of Bëthania would not be surprising given the surfeit of various spellings in the targums* and rabbinic literature (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Batanaea belonged to the tetrarchy of the tolerant Herod Philip (Josephus Ant. 18.106-7) and thus furnished Jesus a safe refuge. This attempted explanation does not necessarily conflict with Jesus' baptism at the south end of the Jordan valley, since his baptism is only presupposed in John 1:32-34, not depicted. John 1:35-51 is parallel to the calling of the first disciples* recorded in the Synoptics (Mk 1:16-20 par.) in the vicinity of the Sea of Galilee. Locating Bethany in the north of the Holy Land would fit in well with this. In this northerly setting (Hermon area, "Damascus") certain groups with Essene ties appear to have expected the onset of the eschaton (see Galilee). Occasionally the appearance of the eschatological Elijah was also looked for in the north (cf. 1 Kings 19:15; SDtn 41 [79b]). That could explain why John began baptizing here (Jn 10:40). Perhaps John 10:16 and 11:52 refer to a mission Jesus had among such Jewish fringe groups. If one accepts a connection between the Mandaeans and the Baptist's followers, then the role played in the Mandaean writings (GBL II.648) by the river Yarmuk on the Batanaean border is interesting. Luke 3:3 also presupposes that the Baptist's impact was felt throughout the entire Jordan area.

2.6. Death and Burial. The site of the Baptist's execution is not given in the Gospels, but Josephus cites the fortress Machaerus east of the Dead Sea (Ant. 18.119). Mark 6:22-25 may preserve a recollection of this site when it speaks of separate celebrations for men and women on Herod Antipas' birthday. At Machaerus two large dining halls (triclinia) have been excavated. Rapid communication (cf. Mt 11:2-3 par.) between the fortress and other parts of the country was facilitated by a very well-constructed access road (GBL II.905-6).
Since no later than the fourth century, the Baptist's burial site was presumed to be in Samaria (Jerome Ep. 43.13; 108.13). This location, independent of the Gospels (cf. Mk 6:29), is probably correct. The grave site, uncovered under churches of the twelfth and fourth centuries, reflects a first-century Jewish arrangement. It is obvious that prior to this, the grave of Elijah was venerated at the same spot. The choice of this site by John's disciples could have been entirely deliberate since their master's life so closely followed Elijah traditions. In view of the Baptist's ministry in Aenon near Salim, the existence of John's followers in Samaria is not surprising.

3. The Public Ministry of Jesus in Galilee.

3.1. Nazareth. Since Nazareth (Gk Nazaret) is not mentioned in the OT, in the Apocrypha or in rabbinic literature, some during the last century disputed its existence in NT times. In addition to an inscription mentioning it as a settlement for priests in the third to fourth century, excavations of recent years have removed every doubt (GBL II. 1031-37). The name is sometimes derived from the Aramaic nāṣe'rat, "look-out" "watchtower." Against this, however, speaks its setting in a fertile high valley. Matthew 2:23 connects the messianic branch (Heb nēser) of Isaiah 11:1 with the name Nazareth (see Nazarene). Perhaps members of the house of David from Babylon or the area around Damascus resettled the area in late Hellenistic times and gave it a consciously messianic name (cf. Julius Africanus [Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 1.7.6-12]; GBL II.801-2).

Remains dating from NT times consist especially of cisterns and silos hewn from rock, along with tombs. As it expanded, Nazareth may have grown to a settlement of some 200 persons. It is unfounded to imagine it as remote for two reasons. First it was only an hour's walk from the district capital of old Galilee, Sepphoris, with its theater built during the reign of Herod the Great (GBL III.1429). Second, it lay near one of the most important trade routes of the Roman Empire, the road from Egypt to Damascus. If the so-called Nazareth inscription actually comes from there (GBL 11.1037), then Greek was a common language among the populace.

The connection between Jesus and Nazareth, the birthplace of his mother, Mary (Lk 1:26), is verified in such various Gospel traditions (e.g., Mk 1:9; Lk 2:39; 4:16; Mt 2:23; 4:13; Jn 1:45-46) that it is disputed only by outsiders. After an obviously successful expulsion from his family proper (Lk 4:16-30; cf. Mk
3:21, 31-35; 6:4), Jesus switched his residence to Capernaum (Mt 4:16; cf. Jn 2:12). As yet no sure signs of what is likely to have been the quite modest synagogue* presupposed by the Gospels (Mk 6:1-2 par.) have been found. The precipice (ophryos) of the hill on which Nazareth was built and from which some attempted to hurl Jesus (Lk 4:29), has been confirmed archeologically on the west side of the present-day Church of the Annunciation. When Matthew (Mt 2:23) and Luke (Lk 1:26 and elsewhere) call Nazareth a city (polis), it may be due to their sources containing the ambiguous Hebrew expression ‘ir, which may mean either city or village. Under the Church of the Annunciation lie the remains of a fifth-century Byzantine basilica and a still older, obviously Jewish, worship structure. A fragmentary inscription containing Luke 1:28 indicates that already in pre-Byzantine times there was common knowledge of the annunciation to Mary in this area. Remains of another Byzantine structure, along with a house from NT times, lie under the convent of the Dames de Nazareth. Byzantine pilgrims probably sought Joseph's house here. An old Jewish-Christian baptistry is located under Joseph's Church.

3.2. Cana. To distinguish this Cana (Gk Kana) from the Kanah southeast of Tyre (Josh 19:28), John calls it "Cana in Galilee" (Jn 2:1, 12; 4:46; 21:2). Jesus did two miracles* and obviously had relatives there. The place visited by pilgrims today, Kafr Kennā, six kilo-meters north of Nazareth, was not regarded as the NT Cana until the seventeenth century and is based on a local, philologically impossible identification of names. Most researchers identify it rather with the site of the ruins at Khirbeth Qānā, twelve kilometers north of Nazareth, which was a burgeoning settlement especially in the first six centuries A.D. Ancient pilgrim reports (ELS 206f.) can also be related to this location. Cana was a strategically vital center on the Roman road from Ptolemais (Akko) on the Mediterranean to Magdala on the Sea of Galilee (Josephus Life 16 §86). As yet there have not been systematic excavations, so it is presently impossible to investigate archeologically the frequently alleged connection between John 2:1-12 and the cult of Dionysius. Against the existence of such a cult, however, stands the fact that Cana was, at least after the Bar-Kokhba revolt (A.D. 132-135), a settlement of Jewish priests (GBL 11.751-53). John 2:12 indicates an awareness that one "descended" from Cana to Capernaum.

3.3. Nain. The site Nain (Gk Nam) has occasionally been identified with a [N]ain in Judaea (Josephus J.W. 4.511). Textually, however, this is uncertain. The place Josephus mentions may be the Ain of Joshua 15:32 and 19:7, near Hebron. According to the context of Luke 7:1-11, Nain should be sought in the Galilee region (GBL 11.1022-23). Early Byzantine tradition points unwaveringly to the present-day Arabic village Nein, eight kilometers southeast of Nazareth (ELS 34lf.). During NT times this probably belonged to the Galilean portion of the plain of Jezreel. Nazareth was hardly a city (polis), the city gate mentioned in Luke 7:11-12 could have been no more than the outlet of a street. Excavations have not yet been possible, however. Five kilometers north of Nazareth lies Shunem, where Elisha raised a youth from the dead (2 Kings 4:18-37). The parallel resurrection story about Elijah (1 Kings 17:17-24) could have affected the formulation of Luke 7:11-12, but the witnesses of Jesus' miracle themselves saw a connection with Elijah (cf. Lk 7:18).

3.4. The Sea of Gennesaret.

An essential portion of Jesus' ministry was concentrated on the shore of the Sea of Gennesaret (Gk Gennēsaret). Matthew and Mark call it the "Sea of Galilee" (Mt 4:18; Mk 1:16 and elsewhere) or simply the "sea" (Mt 8:24; Mk 4:39 and elsewhere). Since the Hebrew yam can mean either the high seas or an inland sea, this mode of expression shows the connection of both Evangelists with ancient Palestinian tradition. Luke, in contrast, chose the proper Greek literary designation hmē (Lk 5:1-2 and elsewhere). The name "Sea of Tiberias" (Jn 21:1; cf. 6:1) is not necessarily an anachronism in the first century (cf. Josephus J.W. 3.3.5 §57; 4.8.2 §§456-57). The "twenty-five or thirty stadia" (five-six kilometers) of John 6:19 probably depicts (accurately) the middle of the northern portion of the sea, with the entire body of water measuring about twenty-one kilometers (thirteen miles) north to south and thirteen kilometers (eight miles) at its widest point.

Occasionally reports that mention the sea preserve clear examples of local color. Due to the elevation well below sea level (212 meters), temperatures that permit sleeping outdoors are common (cf. Mk 8:2). The low-lying setting results in sudden violent downdrafts and storms (cf. Mt 8:24; Mk 4:37; Lk 8:23; Jn 6:18). Especially notorious is a wind that blows from the east (cf. Mt 14:22-24; Mk 6:45-48), which arises mostly when the seasons are changing, e.g., around Passover (cf. Mk 6:39; Jn 6:4). Most notably, the Gospels on the whole present the sea's fishing industry in an expert fashion (M. Nun, New Testament Fishery, 1989). An outstanding example of boat travel on the sea is furnished by two recent finds dating to NT times: a boat mosaic from Magdala, and a derelict boat raised from beneath the water near Nof Ginnosar (GBL 111.1371-72).

3.5. Tiberias.

Herod Antipas established Tiberias (Gk Tiberias) c. A.D. 17-18 in the vicinity of the OT Hammath (Josh 19:35) as the new regional capital of Galilee. He named it after his patron Tiberius. It is striking that the Gospels make no mention of Jesus' ministry in Tiberias. Many pious Jews considered the city to be unclean (Josephus Ant. 18.2.3 §38), but that would hardly have deterred Jesus. In addition not everyone shared this view, as the strong support enjoyed by the nationalist-religious revolutionary Zealots (see Revolutionary Movements) in Tiberias proves (Josephus Life 9 §§32-42; 17-20 §§87-101; 53-64 §§271-335). Furthermore, the assumption that Jesus avoided Hellenized cities is untenable, because Mag-dala, Jericho and, not least Jerusalem all belonged in that category. Jesus at least had devotees in Tiberias (cf. Jn 6:23), among whom may have been the wife of the Herodian steward Chuza (Lk 8:3). Presumably the reason that Jesus made no public foray into Tiberias lies in the danger posed by Herod Antipas (cf. Lk 13:31-33). The Jerusalem Talmud presupposes a Jewish Christian church in Tiberias (y. Sanh. 25d), presumably at about the end of the first century. Of the synagogues discovered to date, one may date back as far as the second or third centuries A.D. (GBL III. 1554-56).

3.6. Magdala. This strongly Hellenized site lay five kilometers northeast of Tiberias. Because of its important dried-fish industry, its Greek name was Taricheia (Josephus Life 72 §§403-4). Excavations have uncovered a small synagogue from NT times. They also confirm the urban character of Magdala (GBL 11.909-10). The rabbis criticized the immorality of its inhabitants (Str-B 1.1047), but most of them sided with the Jews in the revolt against Rome (Josephus Life 29 §142). Magdala receives direct mention only in a few late manuscripts at Matthew 15:39 and Mark 8:10. The places mentioned in the original text (see 3.8. below), however, are not scribal slips for Magdala; they rather refer to a region lying further to the north. One of Jesus' most loyal followers, Mary Magdalene (Mt 27:55-56; 28:1 par.), hailed from Magdala; the second portion of her name may give a clue that Jesus ministered there.

3.7. Gennesaret. The NT site, in contrast to the OT city of Chinnereth (Josh 19:35), is located south of (not at) Tell el'Oreimeh, on the northeastern edge of the exceedingly fertile (Josephus J.W. 3.10.8 §§516-21) plain of Gennesaret. It is not entirely clear whether the Gospels refer to the site (cf. Mt 14:34) or the plain (cf. Mk 6:53-56). The late Byzantine text-form at Matthew 14:34 (eis ten gm Gennēsaret) provides the first unambiguous reference to it as an area.

3.8. Dalmanutha/Magadan. Except at Mark 8:10 Dalmanutha (Gk Dalmarumtha) is not attested as a site where Jesus went ashore. The parallel (Mt 15:39) speaks of "the region of Magadan." The rest of the narrative (Mt 16:1-4; Mk 8:11-13) seems to indicate a place on the west shore of the Sea of Galilee. It has been proposed that Mark understood "Dalmanu-tha," which in Aramaic could mean "area of his [Jesus'] stay," as a specific place name (GBL 1.247-48). Some derive Magadan (Gk Magadan) from may-gad, "water of (the Canaanite god of springs) Gad"; this would fit in well with the abundant springs of Tabgha two kilometers southwest of Capernaum. Josephus calls them the "spring of Capernaum" (J.W. 3.10.8 §517), and Byzantine sources speak of the seven springs (Gk Heptapēgon, from which the garbled Arabic Et-Ṭābghah is derived). This appears to have been, in fact, one of Jesus' preferred locations for ministry, one at which he was able to reach large crowds (GBL 2.767). The important trade route from Caesarea Maritima to Damascus bordered the Sea of Galilee at this point, and there was sufficient drinking water available. As early as the end of the fourth century, the Christian pilgrim Egeria found here three firmly grounded local traditions (ELS 281-82): the Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount), the feeding of the five thousand, and the post-resurrection appearance of Jesus related in John 21. These traditions deserve to be taken seriously because there was a continuous Jewish-Christian presence in Capernaum from NT times until the fourth century, providing a means by which the traditions could be passed along.

3.9. The Sermon on the Mount. In the fourth century Egeria found the place of remembrance for Matthew 5—7 to be a cave—not uncommon for Jewish-Christian memorial sites—which can only have been the so-called cave of Job 200 meters east of the Church of the Miraculous Feeding (or Multiplied Loaves) (GBL 11.767). The "level field" (Gk topos peănos) mentioned in Luke 6:17 below a hill (Lk 6:12; cf. Mt 5:1) bears identification with the level stretches, large enough to hold several thousand, lying above this cave. Not until later did the local tradition (influenced by Mt 5:1) shift the scene further up the hill. In favor of a location in Tabgha are: (1) the mention of Capernaum (Lk 7:1; cf. Mt 8:5) following directly after the Sermon on the Plain and (2) the fact that here is one of the few places where the hills extend right down to the seashore (see Sermon on the Mount).

3.10. First and Second Miraculous Feeding. The Jewish Christians thought of the first feeding (Mt 14:13-21 par.) as taking place at an exposed rock at the edge of a small, fertile plain in Tabgha. The pilgrim Egeria found that the rock had been incorporated into a church building, serving as the altar, as it is today. Since the area was uninhabited in NT times, one could speak of a "lonely place" (Mt 14:13; Mk 6:32). Now it appears, nevertheless, that John presupposes that the feeding of the five thousand took place on the eastern shore (cf. Jn 6:1, 17, 22-24). The original text has multiple variants at this point, however, and John can just as easily be understood to assume a location on the western shore (R E. Brown, The Gospel of John, 1971,1.231-59). Luke 9:10 also can be understood to say that the feeding took place not in but on the way to Bethsaida. Perhaps behind Luke 9:12 (episitimos, "food," "something to eat") stands a Hebrew wordplay (bch fɔdâ, "house of food"). The view that the feeding of the four thousand is not simply a doublet may be upheld by topographical considerations: Matthew 15:31 presupposes the presence of Gentiles,* and Mark 7:31 appears to have the Decapolis in mind, late Byzantine traditions (ELS 278-79) actually transfer the second feeding to the area of Kursi (see 4.1. below) on the eastern shore (GBL 1.442).

3.11. Jesus' Appearance by the Sea. Egeria located the encounter between the resurrected Jesus and his disciples* (Jn 21) in Tabgha at some rock stairsteps still visible today (cf.Jn 21:9). A small church had been erected in the immediate vicinity already in the fourth century. The beach of Tabgha was an especially good fishing area, since the water of the warm springs and the vegetation they carry attract many fish, especially at night (cf. Jn 21:3). Another indication of fisher-men's fondness for this site is a small, ancient boat harbor (GBL 11.767).

3.12. Capernaum. This site (Gk Kaphamaoum) is mentioned by Josephus (J.W. 3.10.8 §517; Life 72 §403) and became Jesus' place of residence for a time at the beginning of his public Galilean ministry (Mt 4:13-17; 9:1; cf. Jn 2:12). Excavations of recent years establish beyond any doubt that Capernaum is to be identified with the site of the ruins at Tel-hum (GBL 11.764-68), which was still famous as recently as the seventeenth century (ELS 296ff.). The large village of some 1500 residents consisted of individual living quarters containing large families. Beneath an octagonal fifth-century Byzantine church and a fourth-century Jew-ish-Christian house synagogue, the remains of a private house were uncovered. It had, as early as the second half of the first century, served as an assembly hall for religious meetings. Inscriptions and the reports of early Christian travelers (ELS 299) make it possible to identify the building as Peter's house (cf. Mt 9:27-31; Mk 1:29; 2:1; 3:20; 9:33). Remains from synagogues of the third and first centuries A.D. (Lk 7:5; cf. Mk 1:21-29) have been found beneath the celebrated white limestone synagogue that dates to the end of the fourth century. The tradition reflected in Mark 1:29-39, which probably goes back to Peter, is characterized by notable local color: the synagogue lay not far (Mk 1:29) from the house of Peter's large family (Mk 1:29-30), at the door of which there really was an open area (Mk 1:33). Mark 2:4 (otherwise Lk 5:19) presupposes correctly a building method utilizing clay roofs.

Apparently separated by vacant land from the Jew-lish village, a small Roman-style settlement stood at the present site of Greek Orthodox property. One can easily envision the residence of the Gentile centurion (cf. Lk 7:6). An imperial road passed nearby. The toll booth (Gk telònwn, Mk 2:14) manned by Matthew Levi may have demanded heavy taxes from fishermen rather than road tolls. Halfway between Capernaum and Tabgha lies a small inlet whose acoustic qualities may have served well as Jesus preached at water's edge (Lk 5:1-3). Capernaum was not destroyed in either of the two Jewish revolts. It was gradually deserted, being-inning in the tenth century. Jesus' pronouncement of woe (Mt 11:20-24; Lk 10:13-15; see Blessing and Woe) has Capernaum's eschatological fate in view; it says nothing about a temporal destruction.

3.13. Chorazin. Although no story from Chorazin (Gk Chorazin) has been preserved, Jesus' pronouncement of judgment* (Mt 11:20-24; Lk 10:12-15) indicates an extensive ministry there. Excavations have so far found vestiges of a Jewish village dating from the second to fourth century A.D., but as yet hardly any evidence from NT times.

3.14. Bethsaida. The Jewish village of Bethsaida (Gk Bethsaida) was declared a polis by the tetrarch Herod Philip and named Julias, probably not after the daughter of Augustus, Julias (Josephus Ant. 18.2.1 §28), but rather after Augustus' wife Livia-Julia, sometime after A.D. 30. So it may be not without significance for the age of the Gospel traditions that they use only the old Jewish name. The city lay on the east bank of the Jordan, not far from where it flows into the Sea of Galilee in the district of Gaulanitis (Josephus J.W. 3.10.7 §515). Recent excavations on the mound of ruins called et-Tell have uncovered extensive remains of houses dating from NT times. Some have contained fishing gear. This establishes the location of the city. West of where the Jordan flowed in former times, right at the edge of the sea, lies the small site of the ruins of El-Aradsch. Presumably it was already settled in NT times. It contains the remains of a Byzantine synagogue or church.

It is not easy to decide which of the two sites should be connected with the longer ministry of Jesus in this area (Mt 11:21; Lk 10:13; cf. Lk 9:10). The healing* of the blind man outside the village (kômê) of Bethsaida (Mk 8:22-26) may favor the El-Aradsch location. John gives as the birthplace of several disciples, "Bethsaida in Galilee," and he calls it a polis (Jn 1:44; 12:21). Josephus also calls the rebel leader Judas, who hailed from near Gamia in Gaulinitis, "the Galilean" (Ant. 17.13.1 §341; J.W. 2.8.1 §118). The references in John, therefore, can relate to the Julian city. A semitically influenced, loose usage of polis is, however, also a possibility. In this case El-Aradsch is a viable choice; it fell to Antipas after the death of Herod the Great and thus became part of the political region of Galilee.

3.15. The Mountain in Galilee

According to Matthew 28:16 an important appearance of the resurrected Jesus took place "on the [definite article] mountain in Galilee." An identification with Mount Tabor, which was apparently uninhabited in Jesus' day, goes back to Theodosius early in the sixth century (ELS 321). The same identification may, however, be presupposed also in the fourth century by Eusebius (In Ps 88:13) and Epiphanius of Salamis (GBL III.1517-19). Mount Tabor ranks among the mountains possessing eschatological significance in rabbinic literature (Str-B IV/ 2.930-31).

4. Withdrawal Areas around Galilee

4.1. The Land of the Geratenes

According to Mark 5:1-20, Jesus healed a demon-possessed (see Demon, Devil, Satan) Gentile man here, an area on the east shore of the Sea of Galilee. Mark could hardly have had in mind the far distant Decapolis city of Gerasa; he rather makes use of a Semitic designation, "land of the foreigners" (Heb gērusrm; Gk Gerasmoi), as the name for an entire region (GBL 1.442-43). The city of the Decapolis presupposed in Mark 5:14, 20, must be Hippos. The "country of the Gadarenes" (chora tōn Gadarmón) of Matthew 8:28-34 is found to bear the name for the regional capital, Gadara. If the reading "country of the Gergesenes" in Luke 8:26-39 is original, this perhaps reflects the Semiüc name for Hippos (Gergesa). Or it may refer to the Girgasites, who, according to Deuteronomy 3:14 and Joshua 12:5 (LXX), settled in this area. A local tradition that has received some archeological support locates the miracle at El-Kursi.

4.2. Tyre and Sidon

Upper Galilee bordered on the territory of the Gentile city Tyre (Gk Tyros). When threatened, Jesus found this to be a natural place to withdraw (Mt 15:21; Mk 7:24). Mark 7:24-30 mirrors quite authentically the ethnic tensions that obtained in the border area between Tyre and Galilee (Theissen, 63-84).
4.3. The Decapolis. Another nearby place of refuge (Mk 7:31, Gk Dekapoleōs) for Jesus was that area lying east of the Jordan comprised of Hellenistic-Gentile cities loosely linked by various alliances and political associations (GBL 1.263-64). A Jewish minority lived there as well (cf. Mt 4:25).

4.4. Caesarea Philippi. Matthew 16:13 and Mark 8:27 use this name (Kaisareias tes Philippou), not the later name Neronias, for the capital city of Herod Philip, whose tolerance was well known and in whose jurisdiction Jesus could accordingly feel himself to be secure. In this region around Hermon, Jewish groups expected the arrival of the age to come (GBL 1.225-26). It may therefore be no accident that Jesus chose this site to elicit from Peter, who expressed the sentiments of the entire band of disciples,* a confession of his messiahship (Mt 16:13-20 par.; see Christ).

4.5. The Mount of Transfiguration. The geographical context favors identifying this with Hermon (GBL 11.562-63) rather than Tabor (GBL III.1517-19). In favor of this are the words of Matthew 17:1 and Mark 9:2, "a very high mountain" (horos hypsēkis), which is reminiscent of Testament of Levi 2:5 (cf. Deut 4:48 MT; 4Q213:16-17) with its clear reference to Hermon. This conclusion appears to receive additional support from the most ancient local tradition (Eusebius In ft 88:13; see Transfiguration).

5. The Journeys to Jerusalem.

5.1. The Journey through Samaria. Luke 9:51-56 accurately depicts the tensions between Samaritans* and Jewish pilgrims bound for Jerusalem (Josephus J.W. 2.12.3 §§232-33). Luke 17:11 presents difficulties, for it asserts that Jesus passed dia meson Samareias kai Galilaias to Jerusalem (I. H. Marshall, Commentary on Luke, 1978, 650). It is preferable to think of Jesus passing through the Samaritan-Galilee border area (cf. Lk 17:12-19); the notion that he journeyed first through Samaria and then through Galilee is highly unlikely.

5.2. Sychar and Jacob's Well. There was no doubt in the local tradition of the early church that Jacob's well was to be located one-half kilometer southeast of OT Shechem (ELS 219ff.). This permits confirmation of John's outstanding knowledge of that locale, as borne out in John 4:4-42 (GBL III.1503-5). There is an artificial (Jn 4:11, phrear), very deep (Jn 4:11) well at the junction of important roads (cf. Jn 4:3-4, 6) near the traditional site of Joseph's tomb (cf. Jn 4:5) which Samaritans considered sacred. By "woman of Sama-ria" (Jn 4:7) is not meant an inhabitant of the ancient imperial city of Israel, which had generally been called Sebaste since Herod the Great, but rather an adherent to Samaritan religious views and practices. Her home was in Sycar (Gk Sychar, Jn 4:5, 8, 28), which is to be identified with Askar at the foot of Ebal some 1.5 kilometers away. At that time it was probably the major Samaritan settlement. The holy mountain of the Samaritans (cf. Jn 4:20) was Gerizim. Recent excavations make it clear that the Samaritan sanctuary at Jesus' time, already in ruins, stood not at Tell er-Ras on the slope of Mt. Gerazim, but on top of this mountain, where later a Byzantine church was erected.

5.3. Ephraim. Jesus withdrew to this location (Gk Ephraim) before the passion. It is to be identified with Ophrah in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18:23) and the modern Arabic Christian village Et-Taibibeh (formerly Afra) some thirty kilometers north of Jerusalem (GBL 1.322). Here, "near the wilderness," as John 11:54 rightly notes, a group must have existed among which Jesus did not feel threatened.

5.4. Jericho. In Jesus' day the OT Jericho (Gk Jērichō) was only a deserted heap of rubble. To the south, at the mouth of the Wadi Qilt, Herod the Great had constructed his winter residence, whose opulence is attested by excavations (GBL 11.659). The chief tax collector Zacchaeus belonged to the upper class of this Hellenistic city (see Hellenism). Priests dwelled there too (cf. Lk 10:30-31), however, as spacious burial accommodations indicate. According to Luke 18:35-43 Jesus healed a blind man as he entered Jericho on the way to Jerusalem; Mark 10:46-52 (cf. Mt 20:29-34) has it that the healing took place as Jesus left. Some suggest that Luke speaks of the NT site, Mark and Matthew the Jericho site of the OT. But if the local tradition of Byzantine vintage is correct (Jerome, Ep. 108.12), the healing occurred (as Matthew and Mark have it) as Jesus exited the Herodian city.

5.5. Bethphage and Bethany. The setting of Bethany (Gk Bēthama), whose distance from Jerusalem is correctly given in John 11:18 as fifteen stadia (c. 3 kilometers) from Jerusalem, has been ascertained by modern excavations (GBL 1.193). Inscriptions in a one-time Jewish receptacle for ritual washing suggest that there was a Jewish Christian presence well into Byzantine times. The local tradition that outs a tomb in the area as belonging to Lazarus (cf. Jn 11:1-44) may, therefore, be reliable. The home of the obviously unmarried siblings Lazarus, Mary and Martha (Jn 11:1) furnished a secure place for Jesus to stay (Mt 21:17; Mk 11:11; cf. Lk 21:27), even in the last days. Perhaps Bethany was one of the three sites east of Jerusalem to which the Qumran Temple Scroll assigned lepers (11QMiqd 46:16-18; cf. Mt 26:6; Mk 14:3; see Leprosy). The Evangelists locate Bethany, just as they do Bethphage (Gk Béthphagē; which rabbinic sources place on the outer fringe of Jerusalem; Str-B 1.839-40), in the vicinity of the Mount of Olives (Mt 21; Mk 11:1; Lk 19:29). Even if the precise location of Bethphage still remains unknown, its placement before Bethany (Mk 11:1; Lk 19:29) as one approaches Jerusalem from the Roman road out of Jericho (GBL 1.1%) is correct.

6.1. The Temple. The Lukan birth narrative underscores the significance of the Temple* for devout Jews of NT times. Zechariah learned of the birth of his son John through an angel's appearance at the altar of incense (Lk 1:8-20; see Zechariah's Song). The newly born Jesus was presented in the Temple by his parents, and godly Jews uttered prophecies about him on that occasion (Lk 2:22-38). Jesus' family made an annual pilgrimage from Galilee to Jerusalem (Lk 2:41-51); Jesus himself frequently joined the great pilgrim bands that journeyed to the holy city (Jn 2:13; 5:1; 7:2-13; Mk 11:1-19 par.; see Feasts). The pillared colonnades that surrounded the Temple were the location of Jesus' teaching (Jn 7:28-39; Mk 11:27—13:37 par.). "The portico of Solomon" (Jn 10:23) on the Temple's east side (Josephus Ant. 20.10.7 §221 J.W. 5.5.1 §185) receives special mention. Some archeologists hold that it actually stands atop a wall of Solomon's Temple (GBL 11.510). Excavations conducted thus far (GBL III.1536-41) show that there was ample reason for the excited reactions of Jesus' disciples (Mk 13:1) and Josephus (Ant 15.11.4 §411-425) over the structure's size and splendor.

The Temple was the basis for the political and economic might of the Sadducees (see Judaism). Through the Temple cleansing (see Temple Cleansing), a symbolic action meant to send a clear message, Jesus did away with the bloody sacrifice of animals and established the Temple as the eschatological house of prayer* for all peoples (Mk 11:15-18 par; Jn 2:13-22). The cleansing may have taken place in the royal portico on the Temple's south side (GBL 11.668-69). At the end of his ministry Jesus even foretold the destruction of the sanctuary (Mk 13:1-2). That gave ultimate impetus to the strategy of the Sadducees, who could marshal a host of Jerusalem Temple loyalists against Jesus (Mk 14:57-60 par.). At a Feast of Tabernacles Jesus had proclaimed himself as the spring welling up in the eschatological Temple (J η 7:37-39) and described himself (Jn 2:18-22; cf. Mt 12:6) as well as the redeemed community he founded (cf. 2 Sam 7:12-16; 4QF10r 1:2-13) as the new, spiritual Temple.

6.2. Bethesda. John 5:2 is to be translated, "There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep Pool the [site] with five porticoes called in Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] Bethesda" (GBL 1.194-95). A location north of the Temple square for this (twin-) pool (cf. Sir 50:3), whose name has been passed along (Jn 5:2) in a rich variety of variant forms (Bethesda, Bēθzatha, Bēthsaida [House of Fish—i.e., baptismal symbol?]), is consistently attested both by ancient reports from Christian pilgrims (ELS 460ff.) and by modern excavations. The five stoai (not necessarily porticoes with pillars) were probably located on the four sides and along the dividing wall of the two pools. How the waters came to be disturbed (Jn 5:7) is as yet uncertain. Baths on the east side point to a Jewish healing sanctuary; the Roman emperor Hadrian converted them into a pagan shrine to Serapis. The text-critically secondary verses of John 5:3b-4 also indicate a Jewish sanctuary; they may preserve a local legend current in Jerusalem. The legends about Solomon in the Jewish apocryphal Testament of Solomon may likewise have a connection with Bethesda. On the basis of a reference in the Copper Scroll (3Q15 11:11-14), a shrine with connec-tions to the Essenes or Therapeutae is possible.

6.3. Siloam. In NT times the mouth of the Siloam channel, whose source was the spring at Gihon, was itself regarded as a spring (Josephus J.W. 5.4.1-2 §§140-45). The pool of Siloam (Gk Siloam, Jn 9:7, 11), whose waters flowed from the same source, is identifiable based on reports from ancient Christian travelers (ELS 467ff.) and recent archeological finds (GBL III. 1444-46). The rabbis regarded its water, which during the Feast of Tabernacles was poured out in the Temple to celebrate end-time expectations (Str-B 11.774-780; cf. Jn 7:3-4), as ceremonially cleansing (see Clean and Unclean) and physically therapeutic. Based on references on the Copper Scroll (3Q15 10:15-16) it is possible that the Essenes also regarded Siloam as a sacred site. Hadrian made an overt attempt to supplant a Jewish sanctuary with a Nymphaeum. Although Jesus sent the blind man to wash in Siloam (Jn 9:1-7), he was clearly the healing agent. Tracing the name Siloam to the Hebrew Šēlîhā, "sent" (Jn 9:7), may reflect a pre-Christian tradition (Vit. Proph. 13). In conjunction with the messianic concep-lion of shiloh in Genesis 49:10 (cf. 4QPatr 2:4) it may refer to Jesus' own being sent as Messiah. Perhaps the "tower of Siloam" (Lk 13:4) should be identified with the circular tower somewhat northeast of the pool dating from the second century B.C.

6.4. The Hall in Which the Last Supper Took Place. Jesus celebrated the last Passover meal with his disciples in an "upper room" (Gk anagaion; Mk 14:15; Lk 22:12; see Last Supper). In Luke's presentation this room is to be identified with the first gathering place of the earliest Jerusalem believers. Luke uses the expression to hyperōon (Acts 1:13; cf. 9:37, 39; 20:8), which denotes a hall for religious worship* (GBL 11.1075-77). The definite article shows that Luke was aware of a tradition about this location; the tradition was subsequently passed on without a break into Byzantine times (ELS 473ff). Remains of a synagogue erected by Jewish Christians between A.D. 73 and 135 on the site of the upper room can still be seen on the hill, known today as Zion, in the southwest section of Old Jerusalem at the so-called tomb of David. Jose-phus' allusion to the "gate of the Essenes" (J.W. 5.4.2 §145) and modern excavations justify the assumption that a quarter containing members of this sect was located nearby. This strengthens the view of those scholars who maintain that Jesus celebrated the Pass-over in A.D. 30 according to the Essene solar calendar on Tuesday evening (E. Ruckstuhl).

6.5. Gethsemane. The description of the Evangelists alone (Mt 26:36; Mk 14:32; cf. Jn 18:1-2 [ford of the brook Kidron]) rules out any doubt regarding the general location of the Garden of Gethsemane (see Gethsemane) on the west slope of the Mount of Olives. The name (Hebrew/Aramaic gat Y mı́nī [m]) suggests an olive garden with an oil press. Such an installation (GRI F 460-6Π is actually located in a rave (cf. Jn 18:4) in an area (ELS 533ff.) probably already known to pre-Byzantine tradition (Origen, PC 13.740). The local circumstances would have permitted Jesus to take flight over the Mount of Olives and into the desert right up to the last minute. Luke 22:41 may indicate that memorial sites were shown in Gethse-mane already in the days of the Evangelists.

6.6. The Palace of the High Priest. This palace, in which the proceedings against Jesus («?Trial of jesus) took place (Mt 26:58; Mk 14:54; cf. Lk 22:54), stood on the hill west of the city according to Josephus (J. W. 2.426). Late and secondary is the local tradition associated with the Armenian Church of the Redeemer, which lies only forty meters north of the site of the Last Supper (ELS 566ff.). Reports of early Byzantine pilgrims (ELS 562ff.), which have some archeological support, point to the area of the Church of St Peter in Gallicantu (GBL III.1 109-10). This location on the west edge of modern Mount Zion poses no problems for the authenticity of the local tradition about the room where the Last Supper was held. The impressive tiered street passing nearby, dating to NT times and leading toward the area of Jerusalem inhabited by Essenes, was divided by mounds to preserve ritual purity despite use by persons of different grades of purity (cf. Ep. Arist. 106). The Sanhedrin's* official convening site was at that time probably outside the Temple near the modern square in front of the Wailing Wall.

6.7. The Praetorium. The official residence of the Roman prefect (praitorion), where Jesus' hearing before Pilate took place (Mt 27:27; Mk 15:16; Jn 18:28, 33; 19:9), is today identified by many researchers with the new palace constructed beginning in 20 B.C. (Josephus J.W. 5.4.3-4 §§156-183) by Herod the Great Its location was in west Jerusalem, south of the modern citadel (GBL III.1221-22). Its existence is presupposed in the story of the Magi (Mt 2:1-12). There is, however, no local tradition of any kind in support of this. The tradition for the Fortress of Antonia on the northwest corner of the Temple square is very late and decisively contradicted by archeological investigations at the convent of the Sisters of Zion (GBL 1.68). The most ancient reports from Christian travelers (ELS 583ff.), finally made intelligible by recent excavations, refer to an area on the west slope of the Tyropoeon valley opposite the southwest corner of the Temple (GBL III.1223-24). This is where Josephus (Ant. 20.8.11 §§189-92; J.W. 6.7.1 §358), probably with some archeological support locates the Hasmonean royal palace. Gabbatha (Jn 19:13) could refer to the rock cliff, still visible today, opposite the Wailing Wall (GBL 1.398). The Greek name lithostrōtos that occurs in the same context (Jn 19:13) may refer to a paved square in front of the Praetorium. Such a location for the Praetorium would also fit well with Mark's account, according to which the crowd (presumably from the Temple) "came up" (Mk 15:8).

6.8. Hakeldama. This piece of ground received its popular Aramaic name "field of blood" (Acts 1:19; Gk Hakeldamach) in connection with Jesus' betrayer, Judas (w Judas Iscariot), either because of his violent death (Acts 1:18-19) or due to the innocent nature of Jesus' shed blood (Mt 27:4). The potter's field cited in Mt 27:7-10 probably lay at the end of the Hinnom valley (cf. Jer 19:1-2). Christian tradition since at least the fourth century (ELS 575ff.) is almost unanimous in placing Hakeldama here on the grounds of the Onophrius cloister (GBL 11.508-9).

6.9. The Hinnom Valley. Various Jewish groups associated this valley, which wrapped around the old city of Jerusalem on the west and south, with the expected eschatological judgment* (GBL 11.578-79). In Jesus' own usage the Aramaic gê-hennâ (Gk geenna; Mt 5:22, 29-30 and elsewhere) likewise became a concept for the place of end-time punishment.

6.10. Golgotha. The garden tomb north of the Damascus Gate at the alleged hill of Golgotha is a fantasy of the nineteenth century, excluded by the archeological data. Recent investigations (GBL 1.480-82) show rather that the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre actually lay a bit outside the city wall (cf. Mt 28:11; Jn 19:17-42) in the vicinity of a gate (Heb 13:12; cf. Josephus J.W. 5.4.2 §146 [Gennath-(i.e., garden) gate]) and a busy street (Mt 27:39). Remains have also been found of the temple of Aphrodite, which Hadrian in A.D. 135 erected to displace a Jewish-Christian worship site (ELS 619ff). Golgotha was a rock formation that took shape as a result of quarrying activity. It rose as high as twelve meters and owed its Aramaic name gûlgukâ’ (Gk Golgotha), "the skull" (Lk 23:33; cf. Mt 27:33; Mk 15:22; Jn 19:17), to its shape. All four Gospels betray unusual knowledge of local details in connection with Jesus' burial (see Burial of Jesus). Mark 16:5 presupposes that the ledge on which Jesus' body was placed lay on the right side of the rock burial chamber; this detail is corroborated by the tomb under the dome of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which is regarded as genuine for several good reasons (GBL 1.178). Matthew 27:60; Luke 23:53 and John 19:41 all seem to agree also on the unfinished condition of this tomb. In addition John's Gospel is aware that Golgotha lay very near the city (Jn 19:20) and that Jesus' tomb was in the immediate vicinity (Jn 19:42) of a garden (Jn 19:41). This has all been confirmed by the archeological data. Archeology gives us some insight into the gruesome details of crucifixion, regarded in NT times as the most fearsome form of execution (GBL H.840-42; see Death of Jesus).

6.11. Emmaus. Alleged locations of Emmaus (Gk Emmaous) near Kiriath Jearim and El-Qubeibeh are late and secondary (*ELS*714ff.). Local tradition utterly fails to support the suggestion of Moza; in Josephus (J.W. 7.6.6 §217) the original name of the place (after sifting variants through textual criticism) is not Ammaous but Amassa or Amosa. The best solution is to follow the manuscripts that place Emmaus 160 stadia from Jerusalem (Lk 24:13) and to identify it, as pre-Byzantine tradition probably did (ELS 706ff.), with Emmaus-Nicopolis (today the destroyed Arab village 'Arnum) twenty-three kilometers west of Jerusalem. There one also finds the warm springs which one would expect, given the name Emmaus (Heb hāmmat, "hot spring"). The reading "sixty stadia" in other manuscripts probably arose through a scribal omission. A journey to Emmaus and back on foot on the same day as the resurrection (Lk 24:33-34) does not appear to have been an impossible feat in that day and culture. The designation of Emmaus as "village" (Lk 24:13: κῆμε) is not surprising in view of its destruction in 4 B.C. (Josephus J. W. 2.4.3 §§60-63) and similar references found in other contemporary sources (GBL 1.313-14).

6.12. The Mount of Olives. Because Zechariah 14:4-5 expected the intervention of God in the eschatological battle with the Gentile nations to take place on the Mount of Olives (Gk ὁ ὄρος τοῦ εἶλαιον), many Jewish end-time expectations were associated with it (Str-B 1.840-842). Thus it was that the Egyptian false prophet (Acts 21:38) wished to launch the eschatological assault on Jerusalem from there (Josephus J.W. 2.13.5 §§261-63). Jesus and his disciples often visited the Mount of Olives (Lk 21:37; cf.Jn 8:1), an area that was still within the jurisdiction of the nearby city. There is absolutely no justification for the assumption that "Galilee" in Mark 14:28; 16:7 (par.) refers to a resting place for Galilean pilgrims on the Mount of Olives (GBL 2.1088-91). Jesus' messianic triumphal entry (see Triumphal Entry) began there, which could have been misunderstood by the political authorities (Mk 11:1-11 par.). Luke 19:37 betrays special geographic awareness in speaking about "the descent of the Mount of Olives," down which the Roman road steeply led. Here Jesus announced the destruction of the city (Lk 19:41-44; see Destruction of Jerusalem), as he also made it a place for apocalyptic instruction (Mt 24:3; Mk 13:3; cf. Acts 1:6-7; see Apocalyptic Teaching). From no later than the second century (Acts of John 97) a cave on the heights of the Mount of Olives was venerated (ELS 384ff.). Constantine ordered a basilica to be built over it. Perhaps this preserves an authentic recollection of one of Jesus' distinctive teaching sites. Since at least the fourth century the location of Jesus' ascension has been sought immediately nearby (Eusebius Dem. Ev. 4.18); Luke's statements such as "on the Mount of Olives" (Acts 1:12) and "out to (pros) Bethany" (Lk 24:50) comport with this. The visible return of the resurrected (see Resurrection) Christ to the Mount of Olives is announced in Acts 1:11.

7. Historical and Theological Significance.

7.1. John the Baptist. The Baptist began his ministry in the northern portion of the Holy Land, where some of the Jews expected the coming of the eschatological Elijah (Mai 3:1; cf. Mk 1:2-8; see 2.5. above). Both of his other known baptismal sites were associated with Elijah traditions (see 2.2., 2.4. above). His followers buried John at the traditional site of Elijah's tomb (see 2.6. above). This cannot all be happenstance. It rather shows how in Jewish thought certain areas had significance for the expectation of OT fulfillment. Put another way, John's choice of a specific place for a symbolic action could call attention to a certain claim about his mission, in this case that he was the end-time prophet (see Prophets and Prophecy) in the tradition of Elijah.

7.2. The Gospels in General. The Synoptics, probably for purely catechetical reasons, offer a simplified picture of the geographic framework of Jesus' ministry: (1) baptism and temptation (see Temptation of Jesus) in the lower Jordan valley (Mk 1:1-13 par.); (2) ministry in Galilee (Mk 1:14—9:50), at the end interrupted increasingly by short stays on the other side of the Galilean border (Mk 7:24-31; 8:27-30 par.); (3) journey to Jerusalem (Mk 10:1-52); (4) brief sojourn in the holy city (Mk 11—16 par.). As isolated allusions in the Synoptics also show (Mt 23:37; Lk 4:44; 13:6-9 and elsewhere), John's presentation, which portrays about a three-year ministry with frequent trips between Galilee and Jerusalem (Jn 2:13; 6:4; 12:1), deserves preference historically. The Fourth Gospel's description is also not exhaustive, however, for it seems intentionally (cf. Jn 21:25) to restrict itself to mentioning very little when it comes to the ministry in Galilee and surrounding areas. The geographic schema of the Synoptics has relative historical justification of its own, however the concrete place-names that appear in the Gospel tradition point to a clear concentration of Jesus' ministry in Galilee and Jerusalem.

Three historical questions must be kept constantly in mind regarding what the geographical information says: (1) about the framework of Jesus' ministry; (2) about the local color of the pre-Gospel traditions and (3) about the local knowledge of the Evangelists themselves. The question of the eventual theological significance of geographic factors is associated with these prior questions.

7.3. Jesus. For his family, as for Jesus himself (Jn 7:41-42), his birth in Bethlehem was an indication of his Davidic messianic ministry (see Son of David). The name of his later residence, Nazareth, kept the memory of the prophecy in Isaiah 11:1 alive (3.1. above). From the heights around Nazareth he viewed a panorama of OT salvation* history. It may be no accident that Jesus drew parallels between his own fate and that of Jonah (Mt 12:39-41 par.; 16:4; see Sign of Jonah), whose grave was thought by early Jewish tradition to be the only grave of a prophet in Galilee (Gath-Hefer in the immediate vicinity of Nazareth; GBL 1.411). The choice of preaching sites like the springs of Tabgha (3.8. above) and the Jerusalem Temple also had practical reasons: here Jesus could reach great masses of persons, both from Jerusalem and from the Diaspora. The initial concentration of his own proclamation as well as that of the disciples he sent out (Mt 10:5-6) remains, however, striking. Especially deserving of explanation is the emphasis placed by Jesus' pronouncements of judgment (Mt 11:20-24 par) on Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum, all lying near each other on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee. It was likely not first of all the Evangelist Matthew (Mt 4:12-16), but rather Jesus himself, who saw this concentration on the southern portion of Naphtali, bordering Zebulun, as a symbolic action in fulfillment of Isaiah 9:1-2 (MT 8:23-9:1).

The phase in which Jesus resided in Capernaum (3.12. above) should probably be distinguished from a time during which withdrawal to areas outside of Galilee became necessary (see 4. above) because of increasingly threatening circumstances. To this second phase belong logia that speak of Jesus' homelessness (Mt 8:20 par.). It is hardly accidental that it was precisely in the Mount Hermon area, to which at least a few Jewish groups attached special eschatological expectations, that Jesus, on the occasion of Peter's confession and the Transfiguration, divulged his messiahship (see 4.4., 4.5. above).

There is another reason why Jesus evaded persecution in the north: his death in Jerusalem had deep theological significance (Mk 10:33-34 par.; Lk 13:33; Lk 13:34-35 par.). Here he would identify with Israel's prophets, martyred in Jerusalem (cf. Lk 13:24); and offer his life as an atoning sacrifice, thus terminating the validity of the Temple and its cult. Jerusalem remained, however, even in Jesus' proclamation the focal point of the eschatological pilgrimage of all the nations to the one true God (Mt 8:11-12 par). When after his resurrection* Jesus expressed the desire to meet his disciples in Galilee again (Mk 14:28; 16:7 par.), he was saying that their earlier mission that started there would be renewed. In the same way the resurrected Christ revealed himself at Tabgha (see 3.11. above), which had been a center of his earthly ministry. A manifestation that was decisive for revealing his mission took place on Tabor, a place rich with end-time associations (see 3.15. above). Jesus departed from his disciples on the Mount of Olives, which in both OT and Jewish expectation is specially related to the eschaton (see 6.12. above).

7.4. Mark. Contrary to a widely held nodon, the geographical knowledge of the Second Evangelist does not rule out his Palesunian origin. One can, nevertheless, detect a certain difference. While Mark does not seem to know his way around Galilee very well (see 3.8., 4.1. above), he offers a number of more specific allusions in regard to Jerusalem (see 5.5., 6.1., 6.7., 6.10. above). That agrees fully with the traditional identification of the Evangelist with John Mark of Jerusalem (Acts 12:12). Especially detailed knowledge of Galilee and the north appear in traditions which one can easily envision as Petrine in origin (see 3.4., 3.12., 3.144.4. above).

Much has been made of the theological significance of geographical information in Mark's Gospel. Already in pre-Markan tradition a connection was probably seen between the two miraculous feedings (both stress the isolated [nemos topos] or desolate [erēmia] nature of the location) and the miraculous feeding of Israel in the wilderness (Mk 6:31.; 8:4 par.). This connection was probably intended by Jesus himself (cf. allusions to manna and wilderness in Jn 6:26-59). Perhaps Mark wished to anchor the Gentile* mission in Jesus' ministry with his especially expansive description (Mk 5:1-20) of Jesus' first journey into Gentile territory (see 5.1. above). The stilling of the storm (Mk 4:35-41) that precedes Mk 5:1-20 may intend to draw a parallel between Jesus' ministry and the mission of the prophet Jonah (cf. Jon 1:4-17). It is likewise possible, in view of its close connection with Mark 7:1-23 (clean and unclean) and Mark 7:24-30 (healing of a Gentile woman*), that the location of the second miraculous feeding (Mk 8:1-10; cf. 7:31) in the Gentile Decapolis (see 3.10., 4.3. above) looks ahead to the table fellowship between Jewish and Gentile Christians. The journey from the north to Jerusalem is a prototype for the life of the disciples as they follow Jesus. This is underscored by the repetition of the motif of the "Way" (Mk 8:27; 9:33-34; 10:52).

7.5. Matthew. Corresponding to the scribal characteristics that the first Gospel bears, one encounters geographical information most of all in connection with the fulfillment of OT promises: the birth of Jesus (see 1.2. above) in Bethlehem (Mt 2:1-8; cf. Mic 5:1), the flight to Egypt (Mt 2:13-15; cf. Hos 11:1), Rachel's tomb (see 1.4. above) near Bethlehem (Mt 2:16-18; cf. Jer 31:15), life in Nazareth (Mt 2:22-23; cf. Is 11:1), concentration of the areas belonging to the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali (Mt 4:12-16; cf. Is 9:1-2 [MT 8:23—9:1]), the procurement of the potter's field or field of blood (Mt 27:5-10; cf. Jer 32:9). The location of Jesus' first great (ethical) discourse on "the mountain" (Mt 5:1) awakens remembrances of the giving of the Law* through Moses* on Sinai. Gadara (see 4.1. above) forms the border of the land of Israel in the rabbinc outlook (Mt 8:28; cf. Str-B 1.490). The coupling of the cities of Tyre and Sidon (Mt 15:21) is reminiscent of the OT and indicates that the Evangelist saw Jesus' stay in this Gentile region as paradigmatic. Calling the northern Transjordan "Judea on the other side of the Jordan" (Mt 19:1) is probably due to Joshua 19:34. Even if it holds true for Matthew that the area of Jesus' proper mission is restricted to the purely Jewish districts of Galilee and Jerusalem (Mt 10:5-6), he nevertheless emphasizes how many followers Jesus had from other areas (Mt 4:25) containing Jewish majorities (Judea) or minorities (Decapolis and Transjordan).

The First Gospel's geographical information comports with a Palestinian provenance. It is most specific regarding Jerusalem and its surroundings (see 5.5., 6.8., 6.10. above), as well as the area of Capernaum (see 3.8., 3.93.15., 3.12. above). The roles played in Matthew by Capernaum as the "city of Jesus" (cf. Mt 9:1) and the house in which Jesus sometimes lived (see 3.12. above) are striking (Mt 9:27-31; 13:1; cf. Mt 4:13). In comparison to John, however, Matthew's geographical references are fewer and less explicit than one would expect from a Gospel that tradition attributes to an eyewitness. The unique emphasis on Jesus' preaching becoming known as far as Syria (Mt 4:24) fits with other indicators that point to the First Gospel's final redaction in this locale.

7.6. Luke. The Third Evangelist may well owe his sometimes interesting geographical information on Galilee and its environs entirely to tradition (see 3.1., 5.1., 4.1., 3.10., 3.9., 3.3. above). He hardly had any closer knowledge of Galilee, since he would otherwise not have referred to Nazareth (3.1.) and Nain (3.3.) as cities (poleis). Still more peculiar are a few references, more specific than one might expect, to local features of Jerusalem and its surroundings (see 1.1., 1.2., 1.3., 6.16.12., 6.10., 6.5., 6.4. above). The precise knowledge in the Synopdcs of the distance between Jerusalem and Emmaus is unique (see 6.11. above). An unforced explanation is possible by recognizing that the author of Luke's two-part work had visited the holy city himself according to the events related in one of the "we" sections of Acts (21:15-18). The geographical references in Acts, especially concerning the area between Jerusalem and Caesarea Maritima, strengthen the view that its author was a travel companion of Paul.

Any possible deeper significance for geographical references may lie at the level of the tradition (see 1.3., 3.10., 3.3. above). The Evangelist who wrote for learned Greeks could hardly assume that his readers would have knowledge of OT-prophetic geography. A precise reference such as the one concerning Emmaus betrays rather an historical interest. Nevertheless, for Luke the anchoring of Christian teaching in the reliably transmitted story of Jesus was also theologically relevant (cf. Lk 1:1-4).

7.7. John. Compared to the other three Gospels, John offers by far the most references to places. Often the references are quite specific. His knowledge is sound in whatever areas he describes, whether Galilee (see 3.23.14., 3.5., 3.4. above) and the north (see 2.4., 2.5. above), Samaria (see 5.2. above) or Jerusalem (see 6.16.10., 6.7., 6.5., 6.3., 6.2. above) and its surroundings (see 5.3., 5.5. above). The only meaningful explanation for this is that the Evangelist or at least the disciple who vouched for the tradition (Jn 21:24), was a native of Palestine, though not necessarily of Jerusalem.

Just as John gave a more comprehensive picture of the temporal duration of Jesus' appearance, he also depicts more fully its geographical scope. According to the Fourth Evangelist Jesus also ministered in areas like Batanaea (see 2.5. above) and Samaria (see 5.2. above) where Jewish fringe groups lived. Contact with them appears to have brought on him the opprobrious designation of "Samaritan" (Jn 8:48). It is striking that Jesus often ministered at sacred sites like Jacob's well (see 5.2. above), Bethesda (6.2.), Siloam (6.3.) and of course the Jerusalem Temple (see 6.1.). This was to fulfill the expectations associated with them, to surpass those expectations, and thereby to render them superfluous. In the presence of Gerazim, and in view of the Jerusalem Temple, the supersession of all Jewish sanctuaries through worship of Jesus "in spirit and truth" becomes an explicit theme (Jn 4:20-24).

In John's Gospel Jesus' ministry concentrates so strongly on Jerusalem that one can raise the question whether the stereotyped talk of "the Jews" (hoi Ioudaioi) does not also strike a resounding geographical note (making "the Jews" equivalent to "Judeans"; GBL 11.736). With the name Bethany John linked geographically the inbreaking of salvation in the north with its fulfillment in the south (see 2.5. above). In connection with Siloam he can make christological use of Jewish interpretation of a place name's meaning (6.3.). It is hardly accidental that the most secure anchoring of Jesus' ministry in time and space comes to the fore in the work of the Evangelist who places special emphasis on the Incarnation (Jn 1:14). See also Galilee: Mountain and Wilderness: Temple. Bibliography. D. Baldi, Enchiridion Locorum Sando-rum (3d ed.; Jerusalem: Franciscan, 1982); G. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways: Studies in the
The present ascended status of Jesus is a foundational aspect of the apostolic faith, well attested in the NT writings. Usually, Jesus’ exaltation in heaven* is thought of as the counterpart of his resurrection.* Only Luke provides a narrative in which the ascension of Jesus into heaven is described as an event in space and time, subsequent to the resurrection. Ascension theology is determinative for much of Luke’s thought.

1. The Ascension in the NT
2. Pre-Christian Ascension Traditions
3. The Two Lukan Accounts of the Ascension
4. Resurrection and Exaltation
5. Redaction or Composition?

1. The Ascension in the NT.

The ascension is spoken of in various ways in the NT.

1.1. Ascended Statut. Most of the references speak simply of Jesus' ascended status. They do not mention how he came to be in heaven. Behind the comments about Jesus now "sitting at the right hand of God" stands Psalm 110:1, the most quoted OT text in the NT. Mark roots the exegetical use of the psalm in the teaching of Jesus (Mk 12:35-37; 14:62). In the earliest NT affirmations about Jesus' exaltation, preserved in two pre-Pauline hymns, his reign in heaven is the direct sequel to his death; the resurrection is not mentioned (Phil 2:8-11; 1 Tim 3:16). In other places it is simply accepted that Jesus' present home is in heaven. Thus, in Paul's earliest letter the Thessalonians are said to be awaiting God's* "Son from heaven whom he raised from the dead" (1 Thess 1:10; cf. 4:16). Similarly, in the book of Revelation the present reign of Christ in heaven is taken for granted (Rev 1:12-18; 3:21; 6:1-7; 7:17).

In the Synoptic tradition the sayings about the coming of the Son of man (see Son of Man) on the clouds of heaven imply an exalted heavenly reign prior to the Parousia (see Eschatology), but again the texts say nothing about how Jesus came to be in heaven (Mt 16:27; 24:30; 26:64; Mk 8:38; 13:26; Lk 21:27; 22:69).

1.2. Movement toward Heaven. A second category of texts alludes to the ascension understood as a move-ment upward to heaven, but they do not describe how it occurred. In some of these passages the word ascension or its equivalent is used (e.g., Rom 10:6-8; Eph 4:7-11); in others the specific terms are missing (e.g., Heb 4:14; 6:19-20; 9:24; 1 Pet 3:22). Johannine thought basically follows this pattern. For John, Jesus is he who comes down from heaven (Jn 3:17, 31; 6:38; 8:23; 13:3; 16:28) and then later returns to his Father in heaven (Jn 3:13; 13:1-3; 16:5; 16:28). On three occasions the ascent of the Son is specifically described as "ascending" (anabaino.Jn 3:13; 6:62; 20:17), but more commonly it is spoken of as a "journey" (poreuomai: J η 14:2, 13, 28; 16:7, 28) or as "going" to the Father (hypagò: Jn 7:33; 8:14, 21; 13:33; 14:4; 16:5, 10, 17). In John 20:17, where the resurrected Jesus speaks to Mary, it is implied that the ascension takes place sometime after the resurrection: "Do not hold me, for I have not yet ascended (anabairw) to the Father."

Along with these references we should associate John's teaching on the glorification of the Son of man. Three times John speaks of the Son of man being "lifted up" (hypsoò: Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32-34). This expression bears in mind the cross, but only in so far as it is one step in the process which leads to glorification (see Glory). For John the passion (see Passion Narrative), death (see Death of Jesus), resurrection and ascension of Jesus is "the hour" of his glorification. As this "hour" approaches Jesus prays, "Now Father, glorify (doxazò) me in your own presence with the glory which I had with you before the world was made" (Jn 17:5; cf. Jn 7:39; 12:16, 23; 13:31-32). Only when the Son is glorified is the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit), the Paraclete, given to the disciples* (Jn 7:39; 16:7).

1.3. Visible Event. Luke alone describes the ascension as an event visible in space and time (Lk 24:50-51; Acts 1:9-11). In the Acts passage he dates the ascension forty days after the resurrection. This has led some scholars (e.g., Lohfink, Franklin) to conclude that Luke is attempting to give a new understanding of the exaltation. He wants his readers to believe that the exaltation took place forty days after the resurrection. Jesus ascended into heaven only when the resurrection appearances were concluded. Other scholars (e.g., Fitzmyer, Maile) reject this view, arguing that the two ascension narratives in Luke-Acts are departure scenes rather than interpretations of the exaltation.

2. Pre-Christian Ascension Traditions.

One of the major contributions of Lohfink's important study of the ascension in Luke-Acts is his full and detailed survey of similar traditions in Greco-Roman and Jewish literature. He demonstrates that there was a widespread belief in antiquity that a divine person, or a special agent of God (or the gods), could be taken up into heaven.

In the Greco-Roman world two forms of ascension story can be distinguished: (1) The journey of the soul to heaven and (2) an actual translation, or rapture. In Judaism various forms of ascension are described. These include: (1) A journey to heaven to receive revelations and a subsequent return to earth (e.g., T. Abr. 7:19—8:3); (2) the taking up of the soul after death (e.g., T. Abr. 14:6-7); (3) the rapture, or translation, of a living person who is taken up to heaven never to return (e.g., Enoch, Elijah,* Ezra and Baruch); and (4) the return to heaven of God or a messenger from God at the end of an earthly appearance (e.g., Gen 17:22; Jub. 32:20 and esp. Tob. 12:20-22; see Apocalyptic).

Lohfink notes certain parallels between the Greco-Roman ascension stories and the Lukan narratives, such as the mendon of a mountain, a cloud and the worship of those present, but he finds few linguistic connections. The parallels are much closer with the Jewish ascension stories of Enoch, Elijah, Ezra, Baruch and Moses* Luke's use of many of the terms in the LXX account of Elijah's rapture (2 Kings = 4 Kgdms 2:9-13) in his ascension narratives is striking.

But to find close parallels with the well-known Jewish raptures, notably that of Elijah, does not say all that needs to be said about the possible background for Luke's ascension narratives. The impact of other literary forms must also be considered. There are parallels with commissioning narratives in the OT and in the NT, especially Matthew 28:16-20, with OT departure scenes following a farewell address (see Farewell Discourse), and in regard to Luke 24:50-51 with Sirach 50:20-22 (see Parsons, 52-58).

3. The Two Lukan Accounts of the Ascension.

Luke 24:50-51 gives a brief account of the ascension in which Jesus is said to have led the eleven out to Bethany, blessed them and "then parted from them and was carried up (aneperhò) into heaven." In Acts 1:9-11 there is a longer account in which Luke dates the ascension forty days after the resurrection. He says that while the disciples "were looking on," Jesus "was lifted up and a cloud took him out of their sight." Two angelic figures appeared and said, "Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking into heaven? This Jesus, who was taken up from you into heaven, will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven."

Various explanations of these differences have been given. These include the following: (1) Acts 1:9-11 is a later interpolation; (2) the two accounts reflect two different traditions about the ascension which Luke took over intact; (3) the two accounts refer to two different events: the first to Jesus' ascension immediately following his resurrection, and the second to the end of his bodily appearances forty days later; (4) the two accounts are but one of several examples where Luke gives duplicate accounts of one event, giving different Interpolation theories or appeals to lost sources find virtually no scholarly support today. They lack concrete evidence and better explanations are available. The suggestion that Luke 24:50-51 alludes to Jesus' exaltation immediately following his resurrection and not to his subsequent departure is supported by the shorter reading of Luke 24:51 which omits the words, "and he was carried up into heaven," but the longer reading has the stronger textual support, including p76. Positive evidence that Luke in 24:50-51 is speaking of Jesus' bodily ascension at a point of time after the resurrection is indicated by Acts 1:2, where Luke says that in his first book he dealt with everything Jesus did until he ascended (anelmphthi). As Luke uses the same Greek term in the departure scene in Acts 1:11, it is to be assumed the same matter is in mind. The many overlapping details in Luke's two accounts of Jesus' final departure also support the view that they are describing one event. Both passages mention the eleven, the world mission, the need to stay in Jerusalem until the Holy Spirit is given, the role of the apostles as witnesses, the ascent of Jesus into heaven and the return of the eleven to Jerusalem. Many key terms also are found in both texts.

The differences are explained by the differing literary locations of the two narratives, one at the end of the Gospel, the other at the beginning of Acts, and by the differing theological points Luke wanted to make in each case. In the Gospel the ascension is for Luke a fitting conclusion to the whole drama of Jesus' life. It is the goal of his earthly ministry (Lk 9:51). As he departs he gives a farewell blessing to the eleven. In Acts 1:9-11 the ascension sets the scene for all that follows. Jesus commissions the Twelve for their mission, Promise them the Holy Spirit, and ascends on high to reign as the living Lord* of the church* until his return in like manner.

4. Resurrection and Exaltation.

If Luke wanted the church to understand that the exaltation of Jesus took place forty days after the resurrection, rather than as the immediate sequel to the resurrection, we would expect he would have consistently, or at least usually, kept these two phenomena apart. But this is not the case. Along with other NT writers Luke can speak either of the exaltation as the immediate sequel to the cross, without mentioning the resurrection, or of the resurrection and ascension as two steps in the one movement.
Luke 22:69 is important. In Luke's version of Jesus' reply to the Jewish leaders at his trial (see Trial of Jesus) the words "you will see ..." and "coming with the clouds of heaven" are omitted (cf. Mk 14:62). Only the heavenly session of the Son of man is mentioned, and this is said to be "from now on." Here the exaltation and heavenly session of Jesus are the immediate sequel to his death. Again in Luke 24:26 the risen Jesus connects his suffering on the cross with his entry into glory. No intermediate stage is envisaged. In Acts 2:32-36 the death, resurrection, exaltation and heavenly session are intimately related. It is because God raised and exalted Jesus that he is now proclaimed as both Lord and Christ.* In this Lukan sermon, appeal is made to Psalm 16:10 (Acts 2:31) where an allusion to the resurrection of the Messiah is seen. As David did not rise from the grave, it is argued, the text must refer to Jesus. In underlining that Psalm 16:10 points to Jesus, Luke says, "David did not ascend (anebê) into the heavens" (Acts 2:34)—it was Jesus who ascended. Luke does not indicate when this ascent took place, but a chronological separation between the resurrection and the ascension—presumably in this context understood as the exaltation—does not seem to be envisaged.

The other references to the resurrection in the speeches of Acts also allow for no intermediate stage between the resurrection and exaltation (cf. Acts 3:15-16; 4:10; 5:30-32; 10:40-43; 13:31-37). It seems best to conclude therefore that Luke, along with the rest of the NT writers, thought that the exaltation followed the resurrection. Luke's special contribution was the addition of a departure scene which in Acts 1:3 he dates forty days after the resurrection.

5. Redaction or Composition?

Even if it is accepted that Luke 24:50-51 and Acts 1:9-11 are to be understood as farewell or departure scenes, the question still remains, did Luke construct them on the basis of received tradition or did he freely create them? Because the hand of Luke is so heavily imposed on the material, this question is not easily resolved.

Lohfink gives a carefully reasoned case for Lukan composition. He maintains that what Luke received from the tradition was a recognition scene (Lk 24:36-43) and a commissioning scene (Lk 24:44-49) which have other Gospel parallels (e.g., Mt 28:16-20; Jn 20:19-23; etc.) and to these he added the departure/rapture scene which is unique to his writings. Besides the fact that only Luke recounts the departure of Jesus, Lohfink notes that Luke elsewhere adds departure scenes for angels* or other heavenly beings (Lk 1:38; 2:15; 9:33; 24:31; Acts 10:7; 12:10) and that the vocabulary, style and theology of Luke 24:50-51 and Acts 1:9-11 are characteristically Lukan. Thus he concludes that Luke created the ascension narratives, modeling them on Jewish rapture stories, especially that of Elijah.

If it was Luke's intent to interpret the exaltation as an event forty days after the resurrection, then Luke's addition of these departure scenes is of tremendous theological significance. It is evidence for a Lukan reinterpretation of an earlier understanding of the exaltation. But if, as it has been argued, Luke viewed the resurrection and the exaltation as two sides of one event, the addition of the departure scenes is less significant They only add an account of the final parting of Jesus from his disciples. Nevertheless, their origins still remain an issue.

Evidence which leads other scholars to argue for pre-Lukan tradition as the basis for Luke's ascension narratives is of a cumulative nature. In seeking to pinpoint traditional material, the mention of the quite specific location, Bethany (Lk 24:50), has often been noted and several scholars have found traces of pre-Lukan ascension tradition in Acts 1:9 (see Parsons 61, 140-44). Furthermore, a number of early extracanonical texts also describe Jesus' final departure, and although most of these can be discounted as being dependent on Luke, Parsons argues that Mark 16:19 and Barnabas 15:9 are probably independent witnesses (Parsons, 144-48).

John's Gospel does not recount a departure scene, but the Evangelist quite clearly allows for a separation between the resurrection and the final departure of Jesus to the Father (Jn 20:17). Finally, it is to be noted that along with Luke, Paul chronologically limits the period in which the risen Jesus appeared in bodily form (1 Cor 15:8).

Whether or not the specific forty-day period for resurrection appearances (Acts 1:3) should be taken literally is uncertain. Elsewhere, Luke describes this interval unspecifically as "many days" (Acts 13:31). Possibly he rounded off the days of appearances, bringing them up to the number forty, which was a well-known sacred, round number. Or he may have begun with Pentecost—the feast of the fiftieth day after Passover—and then came back to the first suitable period prior to that. The only other place Luke mentions forty days is in reference to the period of fasting and temptation Jesus endured before he began his ministry (Lk 4:2). One suggestion is that Luke introduced the forty-day period of resurrection appearances in which Jesus taught the apostles* about the kingdom of God (Acts 1:3; see Kingdom of God) as a counterpart to the forty days Jesus spent in preparation before he began his ministry. In the final period of forty days Jesus prepared the apostles for their ministry.

Although we have argued that Luke distinguishes between the exaltation following the resurrection and the departure following the appearances, these two events are closely related in Luke's theology. The departure of Jesus into heaven highlights his heavenly reign, completes his earthly ministry and, together with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, inaugurates "the last days." In important ways the ascension/departure narrative is formulative for Luke's christology, pneumatology, soteriology, ecclesiology, eschatology and missiology.

It is because Jesus now reigns in heaven that he is confessed as Lord and Christ (Acts 2:36). In the resurrection he is exalted to sit at the right hand of God (Acts 2:33), and the departure scene confirms this. The fourfold repetition of the phrase "into heaven" in Acts 1:1-11, and the same phrase in the longer reading of Luke 24:51, makes it clear as to where Jesus belongs. The ascension is the visible and concrete expression of Jesus' exalted status.

Only after his resurrection appearances are completed and Jesus has departed to reign in heaven can the Holy Spirit be given (Acts 2:33). The Spirit is none other than the presence of Jesus (Acts 16:7), albeit in another form. Some speak of the period after Jesus' departure into heaven as "the age of the church," but Luke would seem to suggest that it would be best described as "the age of the Spirit".

Luke does not develop the idea that Jesus died on the cross to pay the penalty for sin, even though this thought appears in Luke 22:19-20 and Acts 20:28. Instead, Luke thinks more of Jesus entering glory through his suffering (Lk 24:26, 46; Acts 3:18; 17:3; 26:23) and from his throne on high granting forgiveness* and the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38) to those who repent (cf. Lk 13:3; 15:7; 24:7; Acts 2:38; 3:19; 5:30-31; 8:22; see Repentance).

Those who respond to the proclamation of Jesus as the crucified but now exalted Messiah become members of the restored or true Israel,* but those who do not listen are cut off from the people of God (Acts 3:23). Usually the word church is used by Luke simply to refer to a local community of Christians, but in Acts 20:28 he calls the restored Israel "the church of God."

The gathering of true Israel, which includes believing Gentiles,* is to take place between the departure of Jesus and his return. The angelic figures who appear as Jesus ascends announce that "this Jesus, who was taken up from you into heaven, will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven" (Acts 1:11). Having given prominence to the future return of Jesus, Luke says very little else on this matter. His gaze is so captured from this point on with the wonder of the age after Pentecost, in which Christ is the ascended Lord of the church, that he places the main emphasis on realized eschatology.

The mission to proclaim Jesus as the crucified Messiah who now reigns in heaven is given first to the apostles (Acts 1:8) and then taken up by all believers. This mission is sustained and directed by the ascended Lord of the church, mainly through the activity of the Holy Spirit (e.g., Acts 4:29-31; 13:1-3; 16:6-10).

In summary, the NT uses ascension terminology of both Jesus' exaltation following his resurrection and of his final departure into heaven following his resurrection appearances. These two matters are nevertheless intimately related for they both bear testimony to one fundamental tenet of the apostolic faith, namely the transcendent reign of Christ as Lord.

See also Glory: Heaven and Hell: Resurrection: Son of God: Son of Man

K. Giles

ATONEMENT. See Death of Jesus, Last Supper Ransom Saying.

AUTHENTICITY. See Form Criticism: Gospels (Historical Reliability): Tradition Criticism.

AUTHORITY AND POWER

Authority is the right to effect control over objects, individuals or events. While human authority may be delegated, God's authority arises from himself alone. Power, meanwhile, is the ability to bring about what one desires. In the Gospels God reveals his authority and power in the person of Jesus.

1. Terminology and Background
2. Authority and Power in the Person of Jesus
3. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers

1. Terminology and Background.

In the NT the usual term for "authority" is exousia (Matthew 10 x, Mark 10 x, Luke 16 x, John 8 x). The OT attributes the word exousia to God only rarely, in passages such Daniel 4:34 (4:31 LXX). Dynamis is the common NT expression for "power" (Matthew 12 x, Mark 10 x, Luke 15 x, John 0 x). In the LXX it is used of God most often in the Psalms; but in general other terms for power and authority, such as dynasteia and ischys, dominate the vocabulary of the Greek OT.

Whereas the nations linked their gods with forces of nature, Yahweh is worshipped as the one true God, who created the cosmos and rules it as king (Ps
He may delegate authority to the human race (Ps 8:5-6), to his special people (Ps 68:35), to kings (1 Chron 22:10), or to Satan (Job 1:12). In Daniel's vision, God gives authority over every nation to "one like a son of man" (Dan 7:14, 27). God's power to save is typified in the Exodus (Ex 15:6, Deut 3:24) and in the hoped-for New Exodus (Ezek 36:22-38; cf. Sir 36:1-11).

In the NT God continues to stand in stark contrast to the gods of the Gentiles.* Their power is conceded to be finite and their authority circumscribed by Fate, but the true God may act freely (Mt 19:26). This explains why "The Power" may stand for God's name, as it does in Matthew 26:64 and parallels. He holds the power of life* and death and eternal punishment (Mt 10:28; see Judgment). Thus, when the Sadducees deny the doctrine of the resurrection,* they are doubting the power of God (Mk 12:24). He gives authority as he chooses— to Satan (Lk 4:6) and to earthly rulers (Jn 19:10-11).

2. Authority and Power in the Person of Jesus.

2.1. Jesus Anointed by God. The coming Messiah (see Christ) was to be anointed with the powerful Spirit of God (Is 9:6-7; cf. Pss. Sol. 17:22-25; see Holy Spirit), and Jesus inaugurates his ministry by claiming to be that anointed one (Lk 4:16-21). It is in the work of Christ that the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) advances with power. Later, when the imprisoned John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) seeks confirmation of Jesus' messianic identity, Jesus adduces his miraculous deeds as evidence (Lk 7:22-23 par.).

2.2. Jesus' Powerful Deeds: Healings, Miracles, Exorcisms. The Talmud records some minor miracles from the Second Temple Period, but Jesus' power was unrivalled. His mastery over disease is epitomized in the healing* of the paralytic in Capernaum (Mk 2:1-12 par.). Jesus begins by declaring the man's sins forgiven, an apparent act of blasphemy. He then heals the man in order to demonstrate that "the Son of man" has authority on earth to forgive sins (see Forgiveness of Sins).

Jesus' power over nature is exemplified in the miracle* of stilling the storm; the disciples ponder the identity of a man who can command the wind and the waves (Mk 4:41 par.), likewise, he can raise the dead. In the Synoptic Gospels he gives life to Jairus' daugh-ter (Mk 5:2143 par.) and to the young man of Nain (Lk 7:11-17); in John 11:38-44 he raises Lazarus.*
The history-of-religions school attempted to define the Jesus of the Gospels as a Hellenistic theios Anēr, or "divine man" (see Divine Man). Reconstructed from scant historical evidence, this figure was defined as a man associated with the gods; the supernatural substance at his control could be passed on to others for healing. The healing of the woman with the hemorrhage is typically cited as a parallel to the theios Anēr. Jesus' healing power seems at first glance to be a miraculous substance: She touches his garment and is healed, and Jesus feels the power leaving him (Mk 5:27-32 par.). But any hint of magic evaporates when Jesus concludes that the woman's faith led to her cure. The theios Anēr viewpoint also disregards the monotheistic and basically Jewish matrix of the Gospels: Jesus is presented as the unique Son of God, whose deeds manifest the coming of God's reign in fulfillment of biblical prophecy (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

The Jews practiced elaborate rites of exorcism (see Tob 6:7-8; Josephus Ant. 8.2.5 §§45-47; cf. Mt 12:27 par.), but Jesus is able to silence demons and cast them out with a terse command (Mk 1:21-28 par.; see Demon, Devil, Satan). In Matthew 12:28 and Luke 11:20 he points out that the destruction of the devil by God's Spirit (Luke "finger of God") is a sign of the advancing kingdom. But in fact the Jews, in accordance with Deuteronomy 13:1-5, would not let exorcisms or miracles act as the definitive proof of Jesus' identity. How could this man be of God when he consistently ignored the Sabbath* customs (Mk 2:24; 3:2 and par.; Jn 7:23; 9:16,31,33) and refused to grant them an incontrovertible sign from heaven* (Mk 8:11-12)?

Thus left with a paradox, the Jewish leaders construe Jesus' power in a variety of ways, sometimes by arguing that a miracle has not taken place (Jn 9:8-9, 18-19), at other times by simply rejecting Jesus out of hand (Jn 11:45-53). A darker explanation of his power is that he can manipulate demons with the permission of Beelzebul (Mt 12:24 par.; cf. Jn 7:20; 10:21). The Talmud, too, accuses Jesus of being a sorcerer who learned the black arts in Egypt (e.g., b. Sanh. 43a). The same charge was raised in the second century A.D. by the Jew Trypho (Justin Dial. Tryph. 69.7) and by the Greek Celsus (Origen Contra Celsum 1.6), a viewpoint updated for the twentieth century by writers such as M. Smith. But the absence of incantations and elixirs from Jesus' swift and potent exorcisms leaves no room for this ancient theory.

In the end the Jewish leaders fulfil Jesus' prediction that his own people would not benefit from his powerful deeds (Lk 4:24-27).
2.3. Jesus' Authoritative Teaching. Jesus' message is critically important both in its divine authority and in its function within the last judgment (see Teacher). He claims that his words will never pass away (Mk 13:31 par.; cf. Is 40:8; Ps 119:89). To escape disaster one must heed his gospel* (e.g., Jn 12:48-50; Mk 8:38).

"He teaches with authority and not as the scribes," so exclaims the crowd (Mk 1:22 par. see People, Crowd). D. Daube conjectures that the crowd is merely distinguishing Jesus from lower-level clerical scribes,* and favorably comparing him with ordained rabbis. But Daube mistakenly assumes that the Hebrew resût underlies this use of exousia, a necessary proof if "authority" is to bear the technical meaning of "ordination." In fact, the context shows that Jesus' authority puts him above any class of scribe. Scribal authority arose from the learned interpretation of Torah and the citation of earlier rabbis. At the same time, the Qumran sectarians (see Dead Sea Scrolls) practiced an allegorical midrash* to discover the hidden message of the OT. Jesus, by contrast, is unschooled in scribal hermeneutics (cf. Jn 7:15-18); he nevertheless boldly prefices his teaching with "Amen"* and entertains no alternatives to his gospel. His claim to be an authority greater than Jonah or Solomon (Mt 12:41-42 par.) comes at a time when prophets* were thought to be extinct (cf. 1 Macc 9:27). Indeed, the Transfiguration* account, with its vision of Moses* and Elijah,* reaches its climax in the Father's command to hear Jesus (Mk 9:7 par.). It is worth noting that many scholars today are concentrat-ing on the authority of Jesus within its sociological context (see Sociological Approaches to the Gospels).

Jesus claims the authority to forgive sins, but he also pronounces judgment, first on Galilean cities (Mt 11:20-24 par.), then on Jerusalem (Mt 23:37-39 par.). The Son of man (see Son of Man) is the eschatological judge in Matthew 16:27; 25:31-46. According to Mark 10:40, however, Jesus does not have the authority to assign the seats on his right and left in the kingdom.

One of Jesus' final actions is to cleanse the Jerusalem Temple.* When the scribes demand to know the source of his authority (Mk 11:27-33 par.), he presses them on their opinion of John the Baptist. He leaves them with the implication that he and John, in contrast with the scribes, were authorized and sent by God.

On several occasions, Jesus states that the Son of man possesses unusual authority. At the Parousia the Son of man will appear in power and glory* (Mk 13:26 par.). But in the present the Son of man can, for example, forgive sins (Mk 2:10 par.). Jewish literature does not picture the Messiah or the Son of man as exercising this right. While some commentators believe that Jesus is claiming that any human being can forgive sins, the Jews' remark about blasphemy in this context strongly suggests that Jesus was asserting that authority for himself. Similarly, in the controversy over gleaning on the Sabbath (Mk 2:27-28 par.), Jesus declares that "the Son of man is lord even of the Sabbath." His statement can hardly be synonymous with "the Sabbath was made for humans" (Mk 2:27 only), as if to say that all people can be flexible in their Sabbath observance (see Sabbath). Jesus is demonstrat-ing his personal authority to interpret God's Law.*

2.4. Delegated to the Disciples. John the Baptist preached that Jesus would baptize people with the Holy Spirit (Mk 1:8 par.). But even while he is on earth he enables his disciples* to duplicate his deeds: to preach and to do powerful acts in his name, such as exorcism, healing and raising the dead (Mk 3:14-15; 6:7,13; 16:17-18; Mt 10:1,7-8; Lk 9:1-2; 10:1-12,17; but see Mt 7:21-23; 24:5). Later on, in Mark 9:38-41 and parallels, the disciples wish to suppress an outsider who is casting out demons in Jesus' name, but Jesus prevents them (contrast with Acts 19:11-17; and note the fourth-century use of Jesus' name by non-Chris-tians in PGM IV.3019-20).

Christ also gives his followers the authority of "binding and loosing," which seems to be the power to proclaim the forgiveness or the retaining of peo-ple's sins (Mt 18:18; cf. Jn 20:22-23). The disciples are further authorized to pronounce symbolic judgment on those who reject their message (Mk 6:11 par.).

Even though Jesus' followers will do works to sur-pass his own (Jn 14:12), he emphasizes: "Nevertheless, do not rejoice at this, that the spirits submit to you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven" (Lk 10:20 NRSV). In the age to come the disciples who remain faithful will be rewarded with more authority (Lk 22:28-30).

2.5. Power m Humility and Submission to the Cross. As the Servant of the Lord (see Servant of Yahweh), Jesus rejects the exploitive power of the world* and the devil, and lives in submission to God (cf. Mt 12:15-21). Even while he invites people to follow him absolutely, he does not force them against their will (Lk 18:18-25).

Matthew and Luke also record that Satan tempts Jesus with the lure of power and authority; the test lies in his demand that Jesus worship* him (see Temptation of Jesus). Jesus resists this temptation to grab earthly power at the cost of disobedience. It follows that he later rejects the option of insurrection when the crowd wishes to make him king (Jn 6:15). His final entry to Jerusalem is not in regal splendor, but in humility (Mt 21:1-5).

In recent study fresh attention has been given to the powerlessness of Jesus against the forces that oppressed and executed him. In this way Jesus identifies himself with the poor and afflicted and condemns the corrupt power structures. We may wish, however, to emphasize several safeguards in order to maintain the original balance of the Evangelists. First, Jesus' divine authority is not merely freedom to act (so Anderson), but also the ability to exercise control over objects, individuals and events. Second, his powerlessness in the passion accounts is due not to his inability to take control of the situation (esp. Mt 26:53), but rather to his solidarity with the will of God (see Gethsemane). Third, God powerfully vindicates Jesus for his obedient suffering; the cross cannot be separated from the power of Jesus' resurrection.

3. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers.

Although Mark portrays Jesus as a teacher (e.g., Mk 1:21; 4:1-2; 10:1; 11:18), he stresses the authority of Jesus rather than the content of his message. The Son of God (see Son of God) exorcises demons with a word and heals with a touch or by an act of will (Mk 1:40-41; 3:9-10). But his conflict with the scribes also includes their concerns over the content of his message, and he is finally condemned as a blasphemer (Mk 14:64).

The content of Jesus' message receives more attention in Matthew and Luke than in Mark. It is not in the Capernaum synagogue,* but after the Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount) that the crowd marvels at Jesus' authority (Mt 7:28-29). While affirming the validity of the OT (Mt 5:17-19), Jesus explores its deeper meaning against the reasoning of the scribes (Mt 5:21-48). He reiterates the formula "You have heard that it was said... but I say" (see Law). The exaltation of Jesus means that all authority has been granted him. Jesus will always be present with his followers as they carry his teaching to every nation (Mt 28:18-20; see Gentiles).

Luke refers to authority and power more than do Matthew and Mark, and for him power is the opera-tion of the Holy Spirit. Mary is therefore told that the Spirit of God and the power of the Most High have been active in the conception of Jesus (Lk 1:35; see Birth of Jesus). Later, Jesus is anointed with God's Spirit (Lk 3:21-22); he returns to Galilee in his power (Lk 4:14); he announces that the Spirit is upon him (Lk 4:18-19); and he has the power of the Lord* for healing (Lk 5:17). The disciples too are promised power from heaven (24:49).

In the Fourth Gospel Jesus has authority because he is the Son of the Father (Jn 5:19-20). He may work on the Sabbath because his Father in heaven does the same (Jn 5:17-18). The Father has placed all things into the hands of the Son (Jn 3:35; 17:2), including all judgment (Jn 5:22, 27). That the Messiah or the Son of man would participate in the judgment was not unknown in Judaism* (see 1 Enoch 45:3; 4 Ezra 2:42-48). But Jesus goes further and claims that the Son will raise the dead for judgment (Jn 5:21, 25, 28-29; 6:39-40). In fact, he himself is the resurrection and the life (Jn 11:25). In Jewish theology the power of resurrection was reserved strictly for God (note a singular exception in b. Sank 113a). Besides raising Lazarus, Jesus has the authority to lay down his own life and to take it up again (Jn 10:17-18; cf. 2:19-22).

Despite the absence of exorcism accounts in John's Gospel, the authority of Satan's kingdom also comes into sharp relief. Jesus is said to have overcome both the world (Jn 16:33) and its "prince" (Jn 12:31).

In conclusion, the Evangelists perceive divine authority and power as the mighty revelation of God in Christ in order to advance his kingdom. When the disciples display God's power, they do so not in their own right but in the name of Jesus. Jesus' authority and power, emerging as fresh revelations of the Messiah's true identity, have provided a foundation for the church's christology.

See also Commandment: Demons, Devil Satan; Ethics of Jesus; Healing: Kingdom of God. Teacher

G. S. Shogren
BAPTISM

Baptism is associated with a general group of practices related to washing. In addition to the common terms for baptism (baptò, baptizó, baptisma, baptismos, bap-tistes), one must also be aware of terms associated with the act of complete or partial washings (louo, niptō). Here we will survey the common terminology associated with baptism, the background and context of NT baptism and the practice of baptism associated with the ministries of John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) and Jesus.

1. Terminology
2. Background and Context
3. The Baptism of John
4. The Baptism of Jesus

1. Terminology.

Of the five different words found in the NT that are built on the root bap-, two are verbs and three are nouns. The basic form is the Greek verb baptō, occurring three times (Lk 16:24; Jn 13:26; Rev 19:13) with the literal meaning "to dip" or "to dye." On the other hand the intensive form, baptiz, which occurs seventy-seven times, is used always or almost always in the cultic sense of Jewish washings (e.g., Mk 7:4), the baptism of John (e.g., Mk 1:4), the baptism that Jesus and/or his disciples performed during his public ministry (e.g., Jn 3:22, 26) and baptism with/in the Holy Spirit and fire (e.g., Mt 3:11, 14). In the latter usage the term takes on a metaphorical meaning that may be understood in terms of Judaism's eschatological imagery of a stream, deluge or flood of fire that would purge the righteous and destroy the wicked (see Holy Spirit).

The noun form, baptisma, is not found outside the NT and is only found in the singular. The term implies not only the external act of baptism, but also denotes the inner meaning and force of the act. Baptism may then be appropriately employed for Spirit baptism as well as water baptism.

2. Background and Context.

2.1. World Religions.

Baptism is not a distinctive or uniquely Christian idea. The practise of Baptism is widespread. Examples include the Hindu rituals in the Ganges River, the purification ritual in the Babylonian cult of Enki, and the Egyptian practices of purifying newborn children and the symbolic revivification rites performed on the dead. Baptizó and related terms were used to define ritual practices in early Cretan religion, Thracian religion, Eleusinian mystery religions and in several gnostic groups and cults.

Common elements are associated with these widespread baptismal practices. Except when used metaphorically, baptism is always associated with water. Baptism is performed in connection with the removal of guilt, cleansing and the granting of a new start Christian baptism shares these common traits and contexts; it also has specific historical contexts and theological significance that give it a distinctive Christian meaning. The context for John's baptism and Christian baptism is informed by the OT, Judaism* and the practices of the Qumran community (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

2.2. Jewish Practices.

Followers of John or Jesus who participated in the baptismal rite, whether Jew or Gentile,* would not have found this practice totally unfamiliar. Water is the element naturally used for cleansing the body, and its symbolic use entered into almost every religious practice, and none more completely than Jewish practices. The purification rituals of Judaism stressed cleanliness and worthiness to serve the Lord (Lev 13—17; Num 19). The ritual of washing was similar to baptism in its purifying implications (Mk 7:4; Heb 9:20; see Clean and Unclean). In Psalm 51:2, 7 the psalmist asked for divine cleansing. Especially significant is Isaiah 4:4, which calls for a washing away of sins by the "spirit of burning," an adumbration of the theme taken up by John in his baptism.

In addition to these OT examples, Jews had a counterpart of the Christian practice in their proselyte rituals. It is not certain when Jewish proselyte baptism began, some arguing that it began at the same time as the Christian rite (McKnight) and others that it preceded the Christian rite (Beasley-Murray). The account of Naaman the leper (2 Kings 5), which is possibly a purification washing, is similar to later proselyte baptism. Much later (by the third century A.D.), it became accepted that male Jewish proselytes were to be baptized in the presence of witnesses seven days after circumcision. In later traditions Judaism required three things of converts to Judaism: (1) circumcision, (2) baptism or ritual bath, and (3) the offering of sacrifice. These rituals of circumcision and washing were most likely preceded by catechetical instruction. The Talmud refers to a baptized proselyte as a newborn child (b. Yebar, 2). Yet for Judaism the decisive turn from heathenism took place in circumcision (see McKnight). The baptism or rimai bath prepared the newly made Jew to offer a sacrifice as the initial act of worship.

Conversion from heathenism to Judaism was viewed as an entry into life from the dead, and this was the source for the Christian doctrine of the new life* of a convert to Christ. It should be noted, however, that in Judaism the concept is only secondarily associated with proselyte baptism, and it shows up only in later traditions. The distinctive Christian understanding of baptism in terms of dying and rising is based on the convert's relationship to Christ who died and rose from the dead (Beasley-Murray, NIDNTT1.144-45).

3. The Baptism of John.

Just as John was the forerunner of Jesus, so his baptism was the forerunner of Christian baptism. Yet the background of John's baptism remains fiercely debated. The cultural and religious context at the time of Jesus require that a number of factors be consid-er.

3.1. Jewish Proselyte Baptism As Antecedent to John's Baptism. It is natural to seek a prototype for John's baptism within Judaism of the first century. But determining the relationship between Jewish practices and understandings of baptism or lustration and those of John or the early church is fraught with difficulties.

In its most-developed form Jewish proselyte baptism was an initiatory rite performed only once upon the Gentile convert, as was John's baptism and Christian baptism. In line with OT lustrations, Jewish proselyte baptism served to cleanse the convert from moral and cultic impurity. John's baptism for the remission of sins reflects a similar concept J. Jeremias has argued that Testament of Levi 14:6 supports a pre-Christian Jewish proselyte baptism. The passage, which he dates in the late second-century B.C., reads "with harlots and adulteresses you shall be joined, and the daughters of the Gentiles you shall take as wives, purifying them with unlawful purifications" (katharizontes aulas katharismō paranomō). He contends that the terminology, theology, catechetical instruction and performance of the rite by Christians resembles the Jewish performance of the rite (see Jeremias, 2940; Daube, 106-8).

There is, however, no clear evidence prior to A.D. 70 that proselytes underwent baptism as a requirement of conversion (see McKnight). This has been argued forcefully, in spite of the continued citation of texts like Sibylline Oracles (4.165) and Epictetus (Diss. 2.9.19). In addition, the following arguments can be made against the idea that Jewish proselyte baptism served as the primary antecedent for John's baptism or Christian baptism. There is no mention of proselyte baptism in the OT, Philo or Josephus. Passages such as Testament of Levi 14:6 remain ambiguous or inconclusive at best. It is therefore doubtful that proselyte baptism existed, at least as a clearly analogous rite, in John's time.

A. Oepke points out that Jewish baptism was political and ritualistic, whereas John's baptism was ethical and eschatological (similar to Ps 51:7; Is 1:15-16; 4:4; Jer 2:22; 4:14; Ezek 36:25; Zech 13:1). Grammatically, there is an important distinction to be observed. The NT uses active and passive (primarily) forms of baptizō and baptizó, while texts referring to Jewish proselyte baptism primarily employ middle or reflexive forms (Oepke, 530-35). Thus, what was self-administered in Judaism was seen more as an act of God* (and surrender to him) in early Christianity.

It is especially significant that John's baptism was received by Jews rather than Gentiles. John demanded moral repentance* and cleansing for the Pharisees.* Jewish proselyte baptism, of course, served as an initiation rite for Gentiles, but Jews, since they were already the people of God, did not need the rite. If John's baptism was developed from Jewish proselyte practices, he transformed it significantly.

3.2. Qumran Washings As Antecedents of John's Baptism. A better alternative for the background of John's baptism can be found in the lustrations practiced by the Qumran community. Numerous studies have been made of the relationship between the baptism of John and the lustrations spoken of in the Manual of Discipline (1QS 3:4-9; 6:14-23; see Badia). Such a relationship can be maintained without accepting suggestions such as John's full-fledged membership in an Essene community located in the area surrounding the Jordan River.

The Qumran community operated outside the Temple* cult and viewed the priests* as evil and impure. Thus, its only available rituals were the baths and lustrations described in the OT. John's practice of Baptism, integrated with his call to repentance and renewal, complements this situation nicely. The Qumran community maintained a strong orientation toward eschatological fulfillment (see Eschatology), seeing itself, in light of Isaiah 40:3, as preparers of the way. John's message was dually focused around the call to repentance, and eschatological expectation and preparation (Mt 3:2; Mk 1:4, 7, 8; Jn 1:23).

Similarly, the Qumran community recognized the inability of the washings to cleanse a person apart from true repentance. John's preaching and baptism also created this tension (Mt 3:7-9). Like the sectarians of Qumran, John did not envision the water purifying apart from repentance (Mt 3:11; Lk 3:7). John's baptismal practices align themselves better with lustrations of Qumran than with Jewish proselyte baptism. On the other hand, we must not lose sight of the major distinction between John and Qumran: whereas the Qumran community's rite was self-administered and practiced daily (or frequently), and is thus best classified as "ritual lustrations," John's baptism was a one-time, initiation rite.

3.3. The Significance of John's Baptism. We must not necessarily conclude that John was seeking to convert people into a messianic community. Rather, John was concerned with bringing about a messianic conscious-ness within the parameters of genuine repentance. John's call for a one-time baptism for those who had been born as Jews was unprecedented. He insisted that one's ancestry was not adequate to guarantee one's relationship with God. That new commitment was solemnized in baptism. There is no evidence that John permitted those who became followers of Jesus to be rebaptized.
The Gospel writers emphasize the points of linkage between Jesus' inauguration of his messianic rule and John's preaching and baptism. It would be mistaken to understand John's baptism as completely analogous to early Christian baptism, though the Gospel writers do not care to distinguish between John's baptism and early Christian baptism. Early Christian baptism was an obvious initiatory rite into the church, though it retained an emphasis on moral purity and cleansing (Acts 2:38). John operated within the perspective of OT expectations for righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness) and, apparently, with a framework analogous to that of Qumran where baptism was regarded as both a means of accomplishing the necessary cleansing and as a sign of repentance. Though there are obvious connections between John and the early church, we must cautiously suggest a dependent relationship. In fact, though baptism was not a part of Jesus' ministry, Jesus initially allowed his disciples* to continue the practice (Jn 3:22), though he later seems to have discontinued the rite (Jn 4:1-3). John's ministry looked forward, expecting the coming kingdom (see Kingdom of God), while Jesus' ministry celebrates the kingdom's inauguration in the present.

4. The Baptism of Jesus.

4.1. Jesus' Baptism by John. The baptism of Jesus at the hands of John the Baptist is explained in some detail in Matthew 3:13-17, briefly recounted in Mark 1:9-11, mentioned in Luke 3:21-22, and implied in John 1:29-34. All four accounts directly link with baptism the anointing of Jesus with the Spirit and the declaration of his sonship (see Son of God). It is this anointing that inaugurates the ministry of Jesus which will be characterized by the power of the Spirit of the new age (Mt 12:18; 28; Lk 4:18; 11:20; Acts 10:38).

What was the relevance of John's baptism to Jesus? Did Jesus need to repent? Matthew alone tells us that John tried to deter Jesus from being baptized, ostensibly because baptism implies that a person has sin of which they must repent. John seems to recognize his own sinfulness in comparison with Jesus and notes that their roles should be reversed—Jesus should be baptizing John. Jesus' reply seems to acknowledge the logic of John's argument, but he nevertheless requests baptism for a different reason.

Theologically, the baptism of Jesus identifies Jesus as the messianic servant who stands in solidarity with his people. As their representative he came "to fulfill all righteousness" (Mt 3:15). Righteousness in Matthew's Gospel refers to those who are upright and law-abid- ing, obedient and faithful to God's commandments (see Przybylski). Matthew has portrayed Jesus fulfilling specific prophecies as well as more general biblical themes. Now he fulfills the moral demands of God's will. In so doing, Jesus identifies and sanctions John's ministry as divinely ordained and his message as one to be heeded.

Jesus began his ministry with the same demand for repentance, affirming John's baptizing work. Yet one important difference must be observed. Jesus was to baptize with fire and the Spirit (Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16). The relationship between water baptism and Spirit baptism came to have greater significance in the epistles and Acts, but its importance in the Gospel account conclusively shows that Jesus never thought of baptism as merely a mechanical act.

4.2. The Baptism with Which Jesus Is Baptized. When the sons of Zebedee asked Jesus to sit at his side, one on the left and the other on the right (Mk 10:35-37), a question apparently stemming from their mother (cf. Mt 20:20-21), Jesus referred them to his own drink- ing of a bitter cup and his own baptism, each of which alludes to some kind of physical distress (see Predic-dons of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). Jesus states that the sons of Zebedee would experience such—but he still had no right to assign seats in the kingdom. The meaning of this metaphorical use of baptism appears to be "painful destiny," in this case death or martyrdom. According to the grammar, while verse 38 implies that the brothers cannot share in the same fate as Jesus (since the death of Jesus is a unique mo- ment of God's judgment), verse 39 backs up and concedes that they, too, may die for their association with Jesus (cf. Mk 8:34-38). At the same time, the Lukan form of the saying (Lk 12:50) suggests that the "bap-tism" also includes the persecution that led up to the death of Jesus and interprets it as an eschatological tribulation.

4.3. Jesus'Command to Baptize. Matthew 28:19 clearly joins baptism with teaching as partners in the process of making disciples. "Make disciples" is the mandate of the risen Christ (see Resurrection). "Baptizing and teaching" are the two procedures associated with the accomplishment of that mandate. Thus Matthew's commission, not unlike baptism in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 3:22-24), joins baptism with discipleship.*

But the resurrection command has a fuller mean-ing. It is a commitment to ("in the name" is literally "into the name," implying entrance into an alle-giance) the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit (all three of whom were involved in the event of Jesus' own baptism in Mt 3:16-17). Matthew wants his read-ers to know that Jesus has taken his place along with the Father and the Spirit as the object of the disciples' worship* and commitment. Matthew's unique use of the trinitarian formula summarizes in the more formal language of the community the essence of what Jesus had taught his disciples about God,* instruction that had implied a unique relationship between Jesus and the Spirit with the Father.

See also Gentiles: Holy Spirit: John the Baptist: Repentance.

D. S. Dockery

BARHOLOMWE. See Disciples

BEATITUDES. See Blessinc and Woe: Sermon on The Mount

BEELZEBUL. See Demon, Devil Satan.

BELOVED DISCIPLE. See Disciples: John, Gospel of BENEDICTUS. See Zechariahs Song.

BENEFACTOR
A desire for lasting memory penetrated much of Greco-Roman culture. States capitalized on this interest by urging wealthy citizens to serve administratively at their own expense, while assuming the expenses of certain public works and a variety of cultural programs. This combination of personal desire and political objectives is documented in thousands of inscriptions in which the virtues and the contributions of honorands are celebrated, and often with a formulaic uniformity that spans Periclean Athens and some current Hellenic expression.

1. The Terminology of the Benefactor
2. Benefactor in the Gospels

1. The Terminology of Benefactor.

Numerous terms are used to express the concept of a civic-oriented person, who is first of all understood, expressly or tacitly, to be a man or woman of arete, that is, one marked by characteristics and deeds of superior excellence. Warriors were especially qualified for such distinction in Homer's world, and a common synonym in his epics is the term agathos, which identifies goodness with social status and bravery (iliad 21.273-283).

After Homer, Hellenes developed elaborate ceremonies in honor of athletes (see Pindar's odes), heads of slate and other contributors to the public welfare. Philosophers encouraged progressive democratization of excellence by emphasizing a variety of moral virtues in definition of model citizenry. The verb euergeteō ("render beneficent service") and the cognate noun euergetēs ("benefactor") appear frequently in honorary documents and in the Septuagint, but numerous other expressions, such as dikatosyn'e (uprightness; see Justice, Righteousness), eusebeia (piety) and sòtma (healing,* deliverance; see Salvation) were used in recognition of exceptional merit in public circles and private clubs and associations. It is important, therefore, to recognize that the English term "benefactor," as used in this article, does not translate any single Greek term, but embraces the general Greco-Roman perception of beneficent deities and exceptionally fine persons.

2. Benefactor in the Gospels.
2.1. Deity as Model of Beneficence. Of primary significance is the importance attached to the divine as model for human character and performance. According to Greek thinkers (e.g., Xenophon, Memorabilia 4.3.2-14), generous concern for humanity is God's primary characteristic. Such thoughtful disposition marks a deity as agathos. For Greco-Roman publics much of the point of the story of the man who addressed Jesus as "good teacher" (Lk 18:18 par. Mk 10:17) relates to this perception. God is the point of departure for proper understanding of goodness. The commandments relate to desirable civic qualities and the instruction "Sell and give to the poor" urges the inquirer to share God's reputation for generosity. The culminating directive connotes that Jesus himself is to be classified as a person of extraordinary merit and himself the gift of a generous God. Similarly, divine generosity is the model for a disciple's* approach to people in need (Lk 6:35 [cf. Mt 7:11]; 8:1-3).

2.2. Salvation. As testimonies to the beneficent power of Isis and Asclepius attest, Greco-Romans prized salvation,* ranging from security of the state to healing of bodily ailments. Luke, most Hellenic of the Evangelists, especially features words of the sōter- family, thereby portraying Jesus as a benefactor who is at the same time the supreme benefaction of God. Supporting this thematic perspective is Luke's use of the term euergetes at Luke 22:25. Jesus is critical of those who claim such reputation without corresponding production. In accordance with Mediterranean ideals, he emphasizes service* (v. 27), and in keeping with the prediction made in 1:32 cites his own dedication to the ideal. His disciples in turn are invited to practice the Hellenic-type invitation to imitate their benefactor, Jesus the Great. According to Acts 4:9, some of them finally learned their lesson. In economical wordplay, Luke further reveals the category in which Jesus is to be understood by declaring in Luke 23:33 that he was crucified between two kakourgoi (malefactors). On a similar note, the application of studies in cultural anthropology to the interpretation of biblical texts, especially Luke-Acts, reveals the rich diversity in the reciprocity systems of the Mediterranean world. Well known is the patron-client relationship critiqued in a number of Luke's pericopae (e.g., 6:32-36; cf. Moxnes).

2.3. Words and Deeds. A frequent rhetorical ploy in descriptions of eminent figures is the use of the word-deed pair. The greatest of leaders and benefactors are those who are noted for both. Thucydides, for example, highlights the political acumen of Pericles with an oratorical masterpiece. Luke (24:19) notes that Jesus was a prophet effective in "deed and word" (so also Moses,* but with the terms reversed, Acts 7:22). This thematic note in Luke's two-volume work sheds further light on the rationale for escalating emphasis on the words and deeds of Jesus in the Gospel tradition.

All the Evangelists are agreed on the importance of the death* of Jesus as God's own demonstration of beneficence and as Jesus' contribution to the salvation of humanity. Mark (10:45) and Matthew (20:28) interpret the death of Jesus as an instrument of "ransom" (see Ransom Saying) and cite a centurion's verdict on the superstar status of the crucified one (Mk 15:39; cf. Mt 27:54).

In John's Gospel the death of Jesus is perceived as an hour of glory* (12:20-33) and described in terms of widespread outreach (12:32), a common motif in honorary documents. It is God who glorifies Jesus but, in place of a centurion's verdict, John uses the inscription of a prefect to proclaim the death of Jesus as the performance of an exceptional person.

Luke's variation of the tradition also found in Mark and Matthew conforms to his own Hellenic outlook. The centurion affirms that Jesus was an "upright" person (Lk 23:47). This verdict comes immediately after the statement that the officer had observed the piety of Jesus (v. 46). By thus linking piety and uprightness, two principal characteristics of exceptional people, Luke dramatically confirms Jesus as the Great Benefactor. So had Caesar Augustus been described (Res Gestae 34). The fact that Luke does not, as in Mark and Matthew, interpret the crucifixion as an instrument of salvation is in further keeping with his Hellenic stress. As Supreme Benefactor, God displays good will by resurrecting Jesus and offering both Jews and Gentiles* an opportunity to repent* and enjoy renewed relations with God by recognizing Jesus as the ultimate display of divine beneficence (Acts 2-4).

All the Evangelists cite miracles* to emphasize the beneficent performance of Jesus and to offer a dynamic context for understanding the climactic beneficence of God in connection with the death and resurrection* of Jesus. In turn the second element of the deedword pair is supplied in Jesus' numerous speeches and sayings. Through this combination, especially nuanced in Luke's Gospel, Hellenically oriented publics would further appreciate what sympathetic Jewish auditors and readers might readily conclude through acquaintance with their Scriptures: Jesus is the Great Benefactor, the unique gift of the Supreme Benefactor.

See also Hellenism

F. W. Danker

BETHLEHEM. See Archeology and Geography: Birth of Jesus.

BETRAYAL OF JESUS. See Judas Iscariot.

BIRTH OF JESUS.

The examination of the birth of Jesus requires an extensive study of various aspects of the birth narratives found in Matthew 1—2 and Luke 1—2.

1. Genre and Sources of the Birth Narratives
2. Theological and Redacţional Emphases in Mat-thew 1—2 and Luke 1—2
3. Use of OT Prophecy in the Birth Narratives
5. The Date of jesus' Birth
6. The Location of jesus' Birth
7. The Virginal Conception
8. The Magi and the Shepherds
9. Canonical Information about Jesus' Childhood

1. Genre and Sources of the Birth Narratives.
The question of the genre of the birth narratives is still being debated, and opinions vary as to whether these stories are more like pagan birth legends or like Jewish infancy narratives, with most scholars now persuaded that they are closer to the latter than the former.

1.1. The Issue of Midrash. The attempt to see the birth narratives in light of Jewish literary practices has been taken a step further by those who view these stories as being essentially midrashic in character (Gundry 1982; Brown 1977). Midrash,* or midrash pesher, by definition is an imaginative interpretation or expansion based on some OT text, usually in an attempt to show how particular OT material has contemporary relevance (Laurentin). Given this definition it is easy to see how Matthew's treatment of the OT in his formulaic quotations might be cited as examples of midrashic exegesis. But what the First Evangelist does with his OT quotes and how he handles his narrative material are not one and the same thing (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

Midrash is a hermeneutical technique, not in itself a literary genre. It could also be argued that we have examples of imaginative haggadah in the birth narratives (cf. Hendrickx who calls Mt 1—2 a "hag-gadic midrash," though it might be better to say midrashic haggadah). A haggadic tale, like a legend, generally develops over a much longer period of time than the few decades that exist between the time of Jesus and the final form of the Gospels. Even as late as the 80-90s there were still some eyewitnesses to the Gospel events, and Luke claims to have relied at least in part on their testimony. It is agreed by most scholars that: (1) no extrabiblical materials provide such precise parallels with the birth narrative material that they can definitely be affirmed as the source(s) of the Gospel material; and (2) that both Matthew and Luke used sources for their birth narratives.

1.2. The Issue of Historical Tradition. To a great degree, how one evaluates the birth narratives is determined by one's presuppositions about the proper starting place for evaluating this material. For instance, if one assumes that both Matthew and Luke received an historical tradition or traditions (see Tradition Criticism) about the circumstances surrounding Jesus' birth and then took that source material, wrote it up in their own manner so as to highlight the theological points they wanted to make, and especially in the case of Matthew wrote it up so as to draw out potential links with the OT, it is possible to come to a plausible explanation of the character of this material. On this explanation real historical substance is posited for the birth narratives, with the Evangelists engaging in some creative editing and rewording of these historical sources according to their respective purposes and according to the conventions of ancient history-writing.

Certainly in light of Luke's prologue (1:1-4) one would naturally expect that this Evangelist was not only using sources, but sources he felt were historically credible to which he contributed his own editing, expansions and corrections (see Redaction Criticism). On the other hand, it is possible to assume that at most the authors only present us with some historical fragments in the midst of a largely fictional account, and that the point of the narratives is primarily theological not historical. Thus, it has been argued, the authors should not be faulted for not presenting straightforward history. If one starts with this assumption it is possible to come to the conclusions found in works such as R. H. Gundry's commentary on Matthew or R. E. Brown's impressive study The Birth of the Messiah.

No approach is free from problems, but special difficulties attend those who begin with the assumption of the essential non-historicity of the birth narrative material. First, it means that one must treat the birth narrative material as substantially different in character from the rest of the Gospel tradition, a great deal of which can be plausibly argued to have a basis in historical events in Jesus' life. In short, it requires that we see the birth stories as some sort of separate entities, perhaps even of a different genre from the rest of the Gospel material. There are, however, various indications that the birth narratives should not be separated from the rest of their respective Gospels. For instance, the thematic and theological unity of Luke 1—2 with the rest of Luke's Gospel has been demonstrated (Minear). Various of Luke's major themes are given their first airing in the birth narratives.

Second, the problem of supernatural phenomena is not unique to the birth narrative material, and unless one objects to the possibility of miracles* a priori, the supernatural occurrences recorded in the birth narratives present no greater obstacles to the case for historicity than do the supernatural events recorded elsewhere in the Gospels. Indeed, one may say that especially in the case of Luke 1—2 the birth narratives are in some ways less miraculous in character than some of the miracle narratives having to do with the ministry of Jesus.

Third, there is evidence in both Matthew 1—2 and Luke 1—2 that we are not dealing with free compositions. The fact that Luke 1—2 abounds in Hebraisms in contrast to the classical Greek prologue in Luke 1:1-4 speaks for the use of a Semitic narrative source(s) of considerable proportions at least up to Luke 2:40 (Farris; see Languages of Palestine). Further, the way Matthew sometimes awkwardly works his formula citations into his narrative suggests he was working with one or several narrative sources to which he has added OT quotations.

Fourth, there are various details in these narratives that are theologically irrelevant and suggest an historical source (e.g., the name of Anna's father). In other cases they go against the grain of the Evangelist's purpose (e.g., Luke tries to cast John the Baptist* and his parents in the shadow of Jesus and Mary to a certain extent, yet he has Mary go visit Elizabeth who is the first to utter Spirit-inspired words). This is more true of Luke 1—2 than Matthew 1—2, but even in the latter birth narrative we find some anomalies that suggest something other than free creation (e.g., Mt 1:23 says Jesus will be called Immanuel, but no one does so).

All of this suggests that to assume we must choose between either theology or history in this material is to accept a false dichotomy. What we likely have is material of historical substance that has been theologically interpreted so as to bring out its greater significance. Theological history-writing, not historicized theology, might well describe what we find here and throughout the Gospels. Both historical material and theological redaction can be found throughout the Gospels (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]).

It is true that the stories surrounding the birth of Jesus record some events in which only one or two people were involved. In such cases this would mean that ultimately if these traditions have historical kernels, they must finally go back to either Mary or Joseph (Laurentin). The assumption of a testimony of the Holy Family, widely held in the church until the twentieth century, can neither be proved nor disproved by the historical critical study of the text If there was such a testimony or testimonies which circulated not as a whole but in parts, perhaps grouped according to source, it would explain how the Gospel writers had access to such essentially private data as Mary's or Joseph's testimony of their encounters with or dreams about the supernatural. This might also explain why Matthew's Gospel seems to present Joseph's side of the story, while Luke's Gospel presents Mary's. It might suggest that Matthew and Luke had access to only one part of the birth traditions (Feuillet, McHugh).

Since the major theological and redacțional thrusts of the birth narratives have been amply presented by Brown, we will highlight only some of the more prominent motifs. It is true that in terms of dramatis personae, the birth narratives do not focus on Jesus but on those who have contact with the child or his parent(s). Thus, an examination of how the Evangelists portray some of the major figures in these birth stories should tell us a great deal about the authors' emphases and tendencies.

The First Evangelist focuses on Joseph's reaction to the divine intervention in Mary's life, and in particular he shows how Joseph is repeatedly led by dreams to do God's* will. It is no accident that, apart from Jesus, only Joseph is called "son of David"* in these stories. He is seen as the typical patriarch who will guide and protect Mary and Jesus as God directs. It is Joseph who is presented to the Evangelist's audience as a model disciple and son of Israel.* He is obedient to the heavenly dreams, but he is also called a righteous (see Justice, Righteousness) man (1:19), that is, one who upholds the Law.* Thus, in 1:18-19 he is depicted as caught between the holy Law of God and his love for Mary (McHugh). The intention of the Evangelist is to paint a picture of a devout Jewish man who is willing to give up what was often perceived to be a Jewish father's greatest privilege—siring his first-born son—in order to obey God's will (1:24).

It is possible that this special attention given Joseph is due either to the concern of the author to demonstrate how Jesus became legally a son of David and/or is part of the attempt to show the respectability of Jesus' origins. In this presentation Mary is not only submissive to Joseph's leading, but also completely silent. Thus, it may be that the author reaffirms the traditional Jewish roles of male headship and female subordination, perhaps because he had a Jewish-Christian audience.

The interlude involving the Magi and King Herod (see Herodian Dynasty) presents two contrasts: (1) between the spiritually obtuse and those searching; and (2) between the vulnerable babe born King of the Jews who is protected by God, and Herod the oriental tyrant who is protective of his throne but in the end is unable to keep it (2:19). The way these stories are interwoven is by a theological or christological structuring of the material. Thus, Matthew 1 will answer the questions Who and How (Jesus' identity as son of David and how he came by it), while the second chapter will focus on locales—the "Where" of Jesus' birth and the "Whence" of his destiny (Stendahl, Brown). He is born in Bethlehem, but he is called out of the land of bondage and sent to Israel to begin to call it back to its true destiny. There is more focus on christology proper (Who Jesus is) than on how he became such.

2.2. Luke. The Lukan birth narratives are more complex for several reasons. There is more narrative material and significant characters in the narration. There is also considerably more interest in presenting a connected narrative reflecting on the human drama, in particular the joys and anxieties wrapped up in childbearing. There are two major paean of praise (1:46-55,67-79; see Mary's Song; Zechariah's Song) and also the shorter Nunc Dimittis (2:29-32; see Simeon's Song) which help to structure this material. Note that there is no genealogy in the birth or infancy narratives proper.

Luke's birth narratives are in many respects the feminine counterpart to those found in Matthew 1 — 2, which is not surprising since a full one-third of the uniquely Lukan material in this Gospel is about women (Witherington, 1988). In Luke 1—2 it is Elizabeth and Mary, not Zechariah and Joseph, who are the first to hear of Christ's coming. It is these women who are praised and blessed, and they first sing and prophesy about the Christ child (see Women).

It is especially in the speech material that we hear one of Luke's major themes: Jesus' coming means God's liberation for the poor and oppressed amongst Israel (1:54, 68-69; see Rich and Poor), but also light* for the Gentiles* (2:32). These songs have been characterized as a reflection of the piety of Jewish "nāwim or "poor." But to a large extent this is also how various of the key figures in Luke 1 — 2 are portrayed—Elizabeth, Mary, Simeon, Anna. All these characters are seen as devout but poor Jews longing for the salvation* God had long since promised them. It appears, however, that Mary is portrayed as more than just a devout jewess, for she is open to God's new action through her and her son to a degree not true of the others—she alone is said to ponder the implications of all these events. As such, she may be seen as a model disciple. More certainly, Mary is seen as the type of an OT prophetess (cf. 1:46-55), and she represents Israel who willingly obeys God's bidding despite the personal cost She is God's servant.

The theme of male-female role reversal comes into play in the presentation of Elizabeth and Zechariah. Elizabeth, not Zechariah, is seen as the person of true and full faith, and she gives her child the name the angel indicates (1:60). It is precisely at the point when Zechariah agrees with the action of Elizabeth that he is freed from his dumbness and is able to praise God.

In a sense we also see this reversal in the story of Anna and Simeon. Simeon is content to die, having seen the arrival of the Coming One, but Anna is invigorated to new roles—going forth to testify that redemption and liberation have come in this child (2:36-38). While Anna and Simeon are both old and both representatives of the old order of Jewish piety and of the yearnings of Israel for Messiah (so? Christ), their contrasting reactions to seeing Jesus are striking. Note also how Luke frames his infancy narrative with a man and a woman who are connected with the Temple* (1:5-25; 2:22-40). Hence Luke indicates how Jesus affects the very heart of Israel—Jerusalem and the Temple—a theme he will return to near the end of the story.

Luke stresses that it is the women especially who react with exuberance at the coming of their liberator. Recent feminist analysis of Matthew 1—2 and Luke 1—2 has stressed, however, that the new roles of women or new portrayal of women in these stories is nonetheless contained in an essentially patriarchal package which highlights and even celebrates worn-en's distinctively feminine role of childbearing (Anderson). On the other hand, a recent feminist interpretation of Luke 2:41-52 argues that the stress on the Fatherhood of God undermines male dominance by devaluing patriarchal institutions and human fatherhood (Fiorenza; see Liberation Hermeneutics). This conclusion may be doubted and certainly could not be argued on the basis of Matthew 1—2. There it is essential to the author's argument that Joseph be established as legally Jesus' father so he may be counted as a son of David, a theme not absent in Luke (cf. 1:69; 2:11; 3:31).

More play is given to the matter of the virginal conception in Luke 1—2 than in Matthew 1—2, but in both cases it is the fact of the coming of Messiah, not the how, that is stressed. One must not underestimate either the Jewish flavor of both birth narratives or the skill with which the Evangelists have integrated their source material into moving and meaningful presentations about the good news that is and has come in Jesus. The shape of their presentations strikingly differs—even when they use many of the same elements. This in itself demonstrates that the First and Third Evangelists were not rigid editors of their sources, but creative shapers of their material who used their sources to highlight their own theological emphases and successfully integrated this material into the larger schémas of their respective Gospels (cf. Minear, Schubert).

3. Use of OT Prophecy in the Birth Narratives

No other section of the Gospels is so clearly linked to OT prophecy as is Matthew 1—2. This is true not merely because these two chapters bear so many quotations or allusions to the OT, but also because their author uses scriptural language in his narrative and discourses. The very structure of the five pericopes in Matthew 1 —2 seems to be determined largely by five formula quotations, which are frequently the focus of scholarly attention (France). Nevertheless, it is the incidents in the story which have led to the collection and structuring of these quotations in their present form (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

Nowhere is it more evident that the story has led the author to an appropriate Scriptural prophecy to relate to it (rather than the Scripture engendering the story itself) than at the close of the birth narrative where we find the problematic but ostensible OT quote "He will be called a Nazarene" (2:23; see Nazarene). The way the author uses these quotes may reflect the midrash* pesher technique, but this is a very different matter than the suggestion that the author's very narrative is an exercise in creative midrash on the OT (Gundry, 1982). Matthew's text for the story is not primarily the OT but a collection of traditions about Jesus' birth which he has reshaped and retold in the light of OT prophecy. The effect of concluding narrative sections by recalling prophecies is that the prophecies seem almost like afterthoughts brought in to confirm information already given in the narrative. In fact, the function of the quotes is to confirm that some rather unusual twists in the story were all along part of God's plan for the coming Messiah.

Notice too that Matthew's narrative action turns on responses to dreams or visions, or to external sources of guidance such as the star. History is shown to reflect a divine schema, or at least God's repeated intervention by various means (words or actions) corrects the course of historical actions or prevents them from going awry. The reshaping of tradition must not be underestimated, but at the same time neither should the author's use of historical sources. France is right to query what fulfillment of the OT might mean to the First Evangelist if in fact he knew that his story was created out of the OT text itself.

Of course the argument could be pushed back one step further, and it could be maintained that the sources the Evangelist received were a-historical to begin with, a fact he did not comprehend. Two important factors argue against this suggestion. First, various key ideas in these stories are shared in common by Luke and Matthew, such as the betrothed couple Mary and Joseph, the virginal conception, the Davidic descent of Joseph, the birth in Bethlehem during Herod the Great's reign, the angelic revelation of the name "Jesus" and Jesus' upbringing in Nazareth. These ideas are shared in common even though there is even more material in Matthew 1—2/Luke 1—2 that is not shared in common, and this shows that our authors are not likely to have borrowed from each other. Second, the character of the narrative (not the quotations) in Matthew 1—2 and also in Luke 1—2 is not dramatically different from that of the narratives in the rest of these two Gospels, and few would doubt that there are historical sources which lie behind at least some of the ministry material.

One must also recognize, however, that traditions about the birth of Moses, and particularly those found in the Palestinian Targums (see Targum), may have affected the way Matthew words his narrative and presents Jesus (Bourke), just as it is likely that various sorts of OT prophetic material have affected the presentation in the Lukan birth narratives (cf. Mal 3:1-3; Dan 9).

Apart from the songs in Luke 1—2, the influence of the OT is less immediately apparent in the Lukan birth narratives than is the case with Matthew 1—2. Nevertheless, it may be reflected in (1) the Septuagintalisms in Luke 1—2 (i.e., use of the language of the Greek OT, especially in the Annunciation to Mary); (2) the focus on women and the importance to them of the birth of a son to whom divine promises are attached (cf. the OT stories about Sarah, Hannah and others); (3) the importance of the naming of the child and the significance of the name given; and (4) the stress on the miraculous means by which conception was announced and then took place, thus emphasizing fulfillment of the divine word.

The first of the Matthean formula quotations and the most important for our purposes is the citation of Isaiah 7:14 at Matthew 1:23. The following observations are crucial.
First, the pre-Christian interpretation of Isaiah 7:14 seems to have seen its fulfillment in Hezekiah, the son and successor of Ahaz. Apparently, there is no evidence that any early Jew saw this as a prophecy about Messiah, much less a prophecy about a virginal conception. The Targums do tend to interpret Isaiah 9:5-6 messianically, but it is not clear that they view Isaiah 7:14 in a similar light.

Second, the Hebrew term 'almāh which is used in Isaiah 7:14 (MT) refers to a young woman of marriageable age. Though the idea of virginity is probably implicit in the term, this is not a technical term for virgo intacta. The Hebrew b'tūlā comes nearer to being such a term (Wenham).

Third, the term 'almāh is never used in the OT of a married woman, but does refer to a sexually mature woman. There are no texts in the OT where 'almāh clearly means one who is sexually active, but it is possible that Song of Solomon 6:8 (cf. Prov 30:19) implies this. It would appear then that 'almāh normally, if not always, implies a virgin, though the term does not focus on that attribute.

Fourth, several of the Greek translations of the OT (i.e., Aq, Sym, Theod) translate 'almāh with neanis; however, the LXX clearly translates it with parthenos. It is probably correct to say that if 'almāh did not normally have overtones of virginity, it is difficult if not impossible to see why the translators of the LXX used parthenos as the Greek equivalent.

Fifth, the Hebrew texts speak of "the young woman," so the prophet has some particular person in view.

Sixth, the Greek term parthenos seems to mean or strongly imply one who is a virgin, but this may not always be the case. In the LXX of Genesis 34:3, Dinah is called a parthenos even though the story is about her being seduced by Shechem. It should be noted, how-ever, that after the rape Dinah is called a paidiskē (34:4). This text then may imply that parthenos some-times has a meaning broader than "virgin" (cf. Gen 24:16, 43, 57 MT and LXX), and it is clear that it can be virtually equivalent to 'almāh on occasion (Gen 24:43). It may be debated whether in some rare cases parthenos may even mean something other than a virgin (cf. Dodd, Carmignac). One must conclude that Matthew did not deduce the idea of a virginal conception from the Isaianic prophecy, though given a prior belief in such an idea, this text became an appropriate vehicle to express the idea in prophetic language.
Space does not allow a further treatment of all the formula quotations in Matthew 1—2 (cf. Gundry), but mention should be made of the citation of Micah 5:2 in Matthew 2:6. It is a curious fact that while it is Matthew who cites this text, he never refers to the shepherd tradition that Luke records, nor does he make anything of Jesus being a shepherd figure like David.

The Third Evangelist offers us no formula quotations comparable to what we find in Matthew, and when he does cite the OT in Luke 1—2, it is both brief and enigmatic (cf. 2:23-24 citing Ex 13:2, 12, 15 and Lev 12:8). On the other hand, various of the speeches/songs in Luke 1—2 are redolent with OT language and are written in the spirit of OT prophecy (cf. Lk 1:46-55, 67-79; 2:29-32). In general, however, Luke's narrative is not structured on the basis of OT citations or allusions, nor does it stress the issue of fulfilled prophecy in the manner of Matthew 1—2.

Over the past twenty years scholars have spent a great deal of energy trying to unravel the mysteries of Jesus' two very different genealogies (see Genealogy). Since at least the urne of Annius of Viterbo in A.D. 1490 it has been traditional to assume that Matthew's genealogy traces Jesus' lineage through Joseph (his legal genealogy), whereas Luke's genealogy traces his lineage through Mary (his natural genealogy).

This conjecture finds some support from the fact that the Matthean birth narrative focuses more on the role of Joseph than of Mary, while Luke's narrative makes Mary the more central figure in the drama. It also comports with the ancient conjecture that Joseph is ultimately the source of much of the Matthean birth narratives, while Mary is the source for most of Luke's material. The theory that Luke presents Jesus' lineage through Mary requires not only that one take the phrase "as was supposed of Joseph" (hòs enomizeto, 3:23a) as a parenthetical remark, but even more awkwardly it requires that the author use the word "son" (huios, 3:23b) to mean both son and grandson in the same breath, and leave out any mention of Mary's name!

Another theory which has gained some currency in recent debate is the view that Matthew presents the royal or legal genealogy, whereas Luke presents David's actual physical descendants. In view of the fact that there were ancient king lists that would only trace the line of succession, and selectively at that, this conjecture is not impossible, but unfortunately there is no way either to prove or disprove this theory. R. P. Nettlehorst has revived the theory that we have two genealogies from Joseph's side of the family, but he reverses one part of the usual conjecture and main- tains that Luke traces the line through Joseph's father while Matthew traces the line through Joseph's maternal grandfather. None of these theories are free of difficulties. Since we do not have enough informa- tion to settle the issue, we can only show which conjectures are more or less probable.

4.1. Comparisons and Contrasts. One cannot help but be impressed with the notable differences in the two genealogies, differences which suggest they were deliberately schematized to serve rather different purposes in their respective Gospels. If so, then it may be counter-productive to treat them in the same manner as one would modern genealogies or try to reconcile the one genealogy with the other.

Some noteworthy differences may be listed. In Matthew (1) the genealogy introduces the Gospel, and in particular the birth narratives, and traces the line down from Abraham through Joseph to Jesus, using the term "begot" (egennisen); (2) there is an artificial division of the names into three groups of fourteen; (3) there is a notable insertion of several women and possibly some brothers; (4) there is omission of various names; (5) there is an awkward circumlocution at the end of the genealogy reflecting the author's belief in a virginal conception.

By contrast Luke's genealogy (1) follows the bap- tism* and introduces the ministry of Jesus and thus, properly speaking, is not part of the birth narratives; (2) repeatedly uses the phrase "the son of" without any verbs, and traces the line from Jesus up to Adam and God; (3) begins with a circumlocution indicating the author's knowledge that Jesus was not really Joseph's son, and in fact omits the article before Joseph's name (which might place Joseph's name outside the actual list); (4) inserts a Rhésa and an extra Kainan into the genealogical list (cf. Gen 10:24; 11:12; and 1 Chron 1:24).

On the surface it would appear that Matthew's genealogy is trying to show Jesus as a true Israelite, and in particular of Davidic descent, while Luke is trying to show that Jesus is truly a human being. This might account for some of the differences in form and content between the genealogies we encounter. In both genealogies, however, the primary point is to say or explain something to the audience about Jesus and his character, not so much about his ancestors (Withington, 1988).

4.2. Theological Purposes. Several features of the Matthean genealogy call for special attention. The Matthean genealogy should be seen in light of the pericope that follows (1:18-25). Taken together this material focuses on Jesus as both son of David (see Son of David) and son of God (see Son of God), themes which are developed elsewhere. Matthew 1:18-25 is probably meant to explain the genealogy and in particular how Jesus could be born of Mary, but not of Joseph, and yet still be in the Davidic line (Stendahl). This means that the genealogy and the pericope that follows it assume, and to some extent attempt to explain, the virginal conception. There seems to be a recognition of the difficulties involved in the nature of Jesus' irregular origins and thus this material may be seen as an attempt at apologetics in light of Matthew's acceptance of the virginal conception. This in part explains the anomaly of including several women* in the genealogy, for it was unusual to list women in a genealogy unless the father was unknown, or when sons from one patriarch came from his union with different wives or if the women were related to or were famous figures (as here).

Matthew's genealogy mentions not only Mary but four other women as well. Various theories have been advanced to explain the presence of women—in particular Tamar, Rahab, Ruth and Bathsheba—in the genealogy of Jesus.

First, it has been conjectured that the author is trying to identify Jesus with Gentiles and sinners, but it is not clear that all these women fit into one or both of these categories.

Second, possibly these women were subjects of controversy in the Jewish debate about Messiah. This is difficult, if not impossible, to prove for all four of these women; and in any case some of the data used to make such a case is later than the NT period.

Third, maybe the author mentions these four women because he wants to show how not only Jesus but other Davidic kings had irregularities in their past and yet were God's anointed ones. The problem with this conjecture is that it would seem not to illuminate and exonerate the Christian stories about Jesus' origins, but cast them and the stories about Jesus' ancestors under the same cloud
Finally, it has been urged that the point of these four women being mentioned is that they were vehicles of God's messianic plan despite their irregular unions. This view is perhaps the least inadequate (Johnson). Thus, it appears our author wishes by this genealogy to call attention to Mary as an instrument of God's messianic plan (and the source of Jesus' humanity) and to show Jesus' indebtedness to women as well as men for his Davidic ancestry.

By contrast Luke's genealogy attempts to place Jesus in the broader context of humanity in general rather than Judaism in particular. This is only natural since Luke is writing for a Gentile audience and wishes to show that Jesus is for them as well. It is worth noting, however, that Jesus is presented as the ideal human who not only is one with all humanity but also grows in wisdom* and stature and is to be seen as the model of how a person should relate to God, others, temp-tation* and other aspects of discipleship.* It is possible that Jesus is being portrayed by Luke as the new Adam, the initiator of a new race of human beings, the difference being that this Adam—unlike the first—is an obedient son of God. Perhaps more importandy, Luke probably added the words "son of God" at the end of a Jewish list he acquired, for it was not Jewish practice to call someone son of God in a genealogy. There is then stress not only on Jesus' full humanity (a son of Adam) but also on his origins ultimately being from God (a son of God).

It will be seen that both in the case of Matthew and Luke these genealogies serve primarily theological and christological purposes and only secondarily historical ones. Our authors were not concerned to present detailed or exhaustive lists of Jesus' actual ancestors, but only to highlight some aspects of his heritage which would best illuminate for their respec-tive audiences Jesus' significance and nature.

5. The Date of Jesus' Birth.

The reckoning of time in antiquity went through a variety of changes until Julius Caesar, on the basis of the Egyptian solar calendar, standardized a 365-day year with an extra day inserted on leap years. Both the church and the Western world followed this method of reckoning time until the reforms of Pope Gregory XIII promulgated on February 24, 1582. Since that time the Gregorian calendar has been followed.

In A.D. 525, when Pope John I asked a Scythian monk named Dionysius to prepare a standard calendar for the Western Church that would be reckoned from the birthdate of Christ, Dionysius relied both on the Julian calendar and on available information about the date of the founding of the city of Rome to compute the birthdate of Christ. In Dionysius' calendar, A.D. 1 was set at 754 A.U.C. (anno urbis condilae, i.e., from the founding of the city of Rome), with Jesus' birthday being set as 25 December 753 A.U.C. Unfortunately, Dionysius miscalculated the birth of Jesus, for the Gospels state that Jesus was born during the reign of Herod the Great, who died before the turn of the era (estimates range from about 4 to 1 B.C.). Thus, historically, we come up with the anomaly of Jesus being born several years B.C.

Several key factors in the Gospels provide help in determining more precisely the birthdate of Jesus (see Chronology): (I) the date of Herod's death; (2) possibly the date of the census of Quirinius which Luke uses as a synchronism (Lk 2:1-2); (3) possibly the date Luke assigns to the beginning of the Baptist's ministry (Lk 3:1) coupled with the reference to Jesus' approximate age (Lk 3:23); and (4) possibly the astral phenomenon the Magi are said to have seen (that phenomenon was the result of a natural occurrence (e.g., a conjunction of planets).

5.1. Herod's Death

In order to reckon the date of Herod the Great's death, evidence that is primarily literary and numismatic must be considered. Josephus tells us that Herod the Great was proclaimed King of Judea by the Romans when Calvinus and Pollio were proconsuls, or in late 40 B.C. (Ant. 14.381-85; J.W. 1.282-85; Tacitus Hist. 5.9). He then adds that Herod (see Herodian Dynasty) reigned for thirty-seven years from the time of that proclamation (Ant. 17.191; J.W. I.665.). There is considerable debate as to whether Josephus was reckoning according to solar years, or following the accession-year chronology (Herod did not gain possession of his domain undl 37 B.C.). There is also the question of whether or not he was counting inclusively, that is, reckoning partial years as whole years.

Most scholars are still persuaded by the work of E. Schürer (cf. Bernegger, Hoehner) that Josephus is correct about the time of Herod's accession and the length of his reign. This would place the death of Herod at about 3 B.C. However, Josephus also tells us that an eclipse of the moon occurred shortly before Herod's death (Ant. 17.167), and in view of the fact that this is the only time Josephus mentions this sort of phenomenon, it is improbable that he fabricated this piece of information. There were no such eclipses in 3 B.C., but there was one on March 12/13, 4 B.C. He also informs us that Passover was celebrated shortly after Herod's death (Ani. 17.213; J.W. 2.10). In 4 B.C. the first day of Passover would have been April II. Thus, it is likely Herod died between March 12 and April 11, 4 B.C. and presumably the discrepancy of one year is accounted for by inclusive reckoning of regnal years. This means that Jesus was born some-time before March of 4 B.C.

The numismatic evidence is complex, but we do know that Herod's first coin was dated "Year 3." This coin was minted perhaps shortly after his final capture of Jerusalem in 37 B.C., thus backdating his reign to the time in 40 B.C. when the Romans proclaimed him to be ruler of Judea (cf. Edmonds). This evidence also places Herod's death at about 3 B.C., but here again the question of inclusive reckoning of years arises, which would seem to allow the possibility of 4 B.C.

5.2. Census under Quirinius. For those who believe that the Gospels are accurate historical records of Jesus' life, one of the most difficult problems in the NT is the census Luke presents in 2:1-2. First, there is no evidence for an empire-wide census being taken during the time of Augustus, and we might expect that such a mammoth undertaking would have been mentioned by one or another of the ancient historians who recorded the period.

Second, Quirinius was sent by Augustus to be governor of Syria (and Judea) in A.D. 6 (not 6 B.C.) and thereafter did take a notable census for the empire. Josephus tells us he visited Judea in 6-7 A.D. to assess the property of the Jews in preparation for the registering and taxing of that property (Ant. 18.1.1 -2.). There is no evidence that he was governor of the region twice or that he undertook a census of the region twice. It has been suggested that Luke may have confused Quirinius with P. Quintilius Varus who was legate of Syria during the period 6-3 B.C. Against this is the fact that Luke was apparently knowledgeable about Latin names and would have known a cognomen (Quirinius) from a mere nomen (Quintilius).

Third, a Roman census would not have required Jews to travel to their ancestral home for registration. In any case, is it probable that the Romans would undertake such a census in a client state that already had its own ruler (Herod)?
In response to these problems various answers have been given. In the first place, if there was a census that affected Judea during the reign of Herod the Great, it would probably proceed along the lines of a Jewish census, not a Roman one. In that case it is plausible that Jews would return to their ancestral homes and that both adults would go (especially if Mary was also of Davidic descent). Second, elsewhere Luke manifests a knowledge of the later census by Quirinius which prompted the revolt of Judas the Galilean in A.D. 6-7 (Acts 5:37). Is it likely that he would have confused this census, which he knew to be a later one, with one during the reign of Herod?

Third, it is not certain that Luke in 2:1 means that Augustus took one enormous census of the whole empire. The language is general and may mean no more than that the various parts of the empire were subject to various censuses during the time of Augustus. What the Greek in fact says is that Caesar decreed that "all of the Roman world be enrolled" (Thorley). Both the present tense of apographó ("to enroll") and the use of pas ("all") suggest that Luke means that Caesar decreed that the enrollment, which had previously been going on in some parts of the empire, should now be extended to all parts, including client states. The Roman historian A. N. Sherwin-White states, "A census or taxation-assessment of the whole provincial empire . . . was certainly accomplished for the first time in history under Augustus" (168-69).

Fourth, there is some evidence of a census of Judea under Saturninus between 9-6 B.C. (cf. Tertullian Adv. Marc. 4.19). We also know that Quirinius undertook more than one census during his governorship, and that he did not scruple to enroll a basically autonomous group such as the Apameans.

Fifth, Luke's precise wording in 2:2 is curious, and could mean either that he is referring to the first or former census that was taken under Quirinius' rule of Syria (which would perhaps imply that this was an earlier census than the one mentioned in Acts 5:37), or it is grammatically possible that prôle means something like "prior to" or "before" in which case Luke is speaking of a census undertaken by someone else prior to the [more famous or infamous] census under Quirinius which led to Jewish revolt Such a comparative use of prôte is not unprecedented, but grammatically there are problems with such a view.

Thus it is more probable that Luke is referring to a census under Quirinius that took place prior to the famous one in A.D. 6-7. If so, we have no clear record outside Luke of such an action by Quirinius, though it is not impossible that it took place. Herod's power was on the wane at the time of Jesus' birth, and a census in preparation for the change of power could well have been forced on Herod since he had fallen into some disfavor with Augustus near the end of his life. We know also that Quirinius had been made consul in 12 B.C. and a person of his rank serving in the East frequently had far-reaching authority and duties. It is thus not improbable that, acting as Caesar's agent, he had Herod take a census. It is also possible he was governor more than once in Syria, though the possibility also remains that Luke may be identifying him by his later and, to his audience, more familiar office. It is less likely that Luke means that Quirinius started a census in 6 B.C. and finished it in 6-7 A.D., for he says that this was the first census the governor took (distinguishing it from some later one). The upshot of all this is that Luke's reference to the census does not suggest a different date for Jesus' birth than does the Matthean evidence.

5.3. John the Baptist. Luke also tells us that John the Baptist* began his ministry during the fifteenth year of Tiberius' reign. Since Augustus died in the summer of A.D. 14 and Tiberius assumed the throne later that year, this would place John's ministry about A.D. 29, though possibly it might be reckoned as early as A.D. 27 (Hoehner). It is uncertain how long it was after John began his ministry that Jesus began his, but both the Lukan narrative (Lk 3) as well as Mark 1:14 suggest that John's ministry came first. Luke then tells us that Jesus was about thirty years old when he began his ministry. The Greek word ἥσει indicates an approximation or round number which would allow for a few years on either side.

If Jesus did begin his ministry by working with or at the same time as the Baptist, as the Johannine tradition suggests (cf. Jn 3:22-30), and if rabbinic tradition is correa in saying that Jesus was age 33-34 when he began his ministry (b. Sanh. 106b), Jesus' ministry may have begun as early as A.D. 29, if not shortly before then. This would mean that Jesus was born about 4 B.C. or perhaps a bit earlier. Both Luke 1 and independendly Matthew 2 are in agreement in placing the birth of Jesus during the reign of Herod, and Luke informs us John was also born under that reign.

5.4. Astral Phenomenon. Those scholars who have insisted that the astral phenomenon should be primary in determining the date of Jesus' birth have had to deal with a multitude of problems. First of all, it is not clear that the First Evangelist intends some sort of purely natural phenomenon. In Matthew 2 it says both that the Magi saw the star at its rising, which presumably is what led them to Jerusalem (whether from the east or west is not clear), and then at 2:9 we are told that when they left Jerusalem "the star . . . went ahead of them until it stopped over the place where the child was." The text seems to suggest that the "star" led them not merely to Bethlehem (and why would they need such leading just for the six-mile trek from Jerusalem to Bethlehem?) but to the precise location of Jesus. This hardly sounds like a normal astral phenomenon, and certainly not one that could be identified with either a conjunction of planets or a comet.

Kepler long ago rejected the theory that it was a conjunction of planets, though there was a notable conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in 7 B.C. in the constellation Pisces, and it is also true that both the Berlin Star Table and the Sippar Star Almanac indicate great interest and close study of planetary movements during 7 B.C. and afterwards (Brown). Modern astronomers have stressed that the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in question was not close enough to appear to be a single star (Boa and Proctor). E. L. Martin's careful and detailed study argues for the year of Herod's death as 1 B.C. and the star being the conjunction of Venus and Jupiter seen from August 12, 3 B.C. onward. He further urges that the Magi did not come to honor Jesus until fifteen months after his birth (on December 25, 2 B.C.) and that at that time Jupiter had stopped over Bethlehem in the meridian position in the constellation of the Virgin. There are, however, many assumptions made in these calculations, and most scholars would reject such a late date for Herod's death (but cf. Thorley). Another theory appeals to the appearance of Halley's comet, which took place in the region in 12 B.C.—a date too early to be correlated with Jesus' birth.

Kepler's own theory that the Magi witnessed a supernova or the birth of a new star is possible, especially since Chinese astronomers did record such a nova for 5/4 B.C. (France). It is interesting that some early Christians thought that only a supernatural explanation of the "star" would suffice, for in the Arabic Infancy Gospel 7 the star is identified with an angel.

In short, it is doubtful that natural astral phenomena can help us pinpoint the time of Jesus' birth. There are various imponderables about the story of the Magi that make calculations almost impossible (e.g., how long after Jesus' birth did the Magi come and honor him?). Most scholars who consider the story of the Magi historically possible would stress that there seems to have been an interval, perhaps over a year, between the time of the birth and the coming of the Magi. Taking all the evidence together it appears that Jesus was born in or before 4
In regard to the day of Jesus' birth, as early as Hippolytus (A.D. 165-235) it was said to be December 25, a date also set by John Chrysostom (AD. 345-407) whose arguments prevailed in the Eastern Church. There is nothing improbable about a mid-winter birth. Luke 2:8 tells us that the shepherds' flocks were kept outside when Jesus was born. This detail might favor a date between March and November when such animals would normally be outside. But the Mishnah (m. segal 7.4) suggests that sheep around Bethlehem might also be outside during the winter months (Hoehner). Therefore, though there is no certainty, it appears that Jesus was born somewhere between 4-6 B.C., perhaps in mid-winter. Both the traditional Western date for Christmas (Dec. 25) and the date observed by the Armenian Church (Jan. 6) are equally possible. The biblical and extra-biblical historical evidence is simply not specific enough to point decisively to either traditional date. The celebration of the nativity is attested in Rome as early as AD. 336 and this celebration also involved recognizing January 6 as Epiphany, the day the Magi visited Jesus.

6. The Location of Jesus' Birth.

Both the First and Third Gospels, probably based on independent sources, inform us that Jesus was born in Bethlehem, the City of David. While it is possible that this location was chosen by the Evangelists because of the prophecy found in Micah 5:2, only the First Evangelist makes anything of this connection, and it is only he that makes very much of Jesus being a or the son of David in his Gospel. It is likely that the reference to Bethlehem, at least in the case of Luke's Gospel, is historical in character. It is also worth pointing out that even in the First Gospel, it appears that the quotations, such as that found in Matthew 2:6, have been worked by the Evangelist into his source material, in which case it is likely on the basis of Matthew 2:1a that the reference to Bethlehem existed in the source used by the First Evangelist (France). In short, the source material led the Evangelist to use the Micah quotation, not vice versa.

The question of the specific location of Jesus' birth is an intriguing one. Matthew 2:11 mentions that the Magi found Jesus in a house (oikos), but this may have transpired some time after the birth itself and in a different location. Later Christian tradition unfortunately has tended to amalgamate the visit of the Shepherds and the Magi, locating both at the site of Jesus' birth. In reality, Matthew says nothing about shepherds and Luke nothing about Magi, and only the former are connected with a scene involving a manger.

Luke 2:7 should be seen in light of the larger context of Luke 2:4-7, which does not suggest that Mary went into labor immediately or even shortly after she and Joseph arrived in Bethlehem. To the contrary, we are told that "while they were there" (not upon arrival) the days were fulfilled and Mary went into labor. This implies that they had been in Bethlehem for some unspecified amount of time prior to Mary going into labor. Thus the familiar image of Mary and Joseph arriving in Bethlehem and being unable to find a place to stay on the night of arrival probably has no basis in the text itself (Bailey).

A second crucial point is how one translates kala-luma in Luke 2:7. The word can mean guest room, house or inn. It can be doubted whether there would have been an inn in Bethlehem in Jesus' day since it was not on any major road, and inns normally were to be found only on major roads, especially the Roman ones (but cf. Jer 41:17, which does not refer to a place in Bethlehem). Furthermore, when Luke wants to speak of a commercial inn he uses pandochei-on; 10:34 refers to an establishment found on the major road between Jerusalem and Jericho. Also, when Luke uses the word kataluma in his Gospel (22:11 and par.; cf. 1 Kings 1:18), it clearly does not mean an inn but a guest room. It is also worth pointing out that the Arabic and Syriac versions of the NT have never translated kataluma as inn.

It becomes more likely that by kataluma Luke means either house or guest room, and the latter translation must have the edge precisely because in the vast majority of ancient Near-Eastern peasant homes for which we have archaeological and literary evidence, the manger was within the home, not in some separate bam. The animals as well as the family slept within one large enclosed space that was divided so that usually the animals would be on a lower level, and the family would sleep on a raised dais (Bailey). In this particular case, we should probably envision Mary and Joseph staying in the home of relatives or friends, a home which was crowded due to the census being taken, a home where Luke tells us there was no longer any room in "the guest room" (noting the definite article before the noun). Consequently, Mary gave birth to her child perhaps in the family room and placed the baby in the stone manger. This means that a good deal of the popular conception of this scene has no basis in the text. In particular, the idea of Mary and Joseph being cast out from civilized accommoda-dons and taking up temporary residence in a barn is probably based on a misunderstanding of the text

There is also a tradition cited in the second century A.D. by Justin Martyr that Joseph and Mary, being unable to find accommodations in Bethlehem, took up quarters in a cave near the village (Dial. Tryph. 79). This is a plausible conjecture, and in fact various peasants did make their homes in caves during the time of Jesus. But Luke suggests neither that the Holy Family took up residence outside the city, nor that they were in a cave (and Luke would hardly have spoken of a cave with a guest room).

7. The Virginal Conception.

Even in the twentieth century the virginal conception is still the subject of a debate which shows no signs of abating (Cranfield, Bostock, Benson). What is at issue is a virginal conception, not a virgin birth, and so the technically correct term will be used in this section (Brown, 1973).

In our discussion of the genre of the birth narratives we noted that any comparison of Matthew 1—2 and Luke 1—2 to pagan divine birth stories leads to the conclusion that the Gospel stories cannot be explained simply on the basis of such comparisons. This is particularly the case in regard to the matter of the virginal conception, for what we find in Matthew and Luke is not the story of some sort of sacred marriage (hieros gamos) or a divine being descending to earth and, in the guise of a man, mating with a human woman, but rather the story of a miraculous conception without aid of any man, divine or other-wise. The Gospel story is rather about how Mary conceived without any form of intercourse through the agency of the Holy Spirit.* As such this story is without precedent either in Jewish or pagan literature, even including the OT (Machen).

It is doubtful that the idea of a virginal conception was part of Jewish messianic expectations in or before the era when the Gospels were written (McHugh). While it may be that Jewish infancy narratives influenced the Evangelists in some respects, they did not derive the idea of the virginal conception from those sources (see Miracle and Miracle Stories).

7.1. The Issue of Historicity. There are also serious problems for those who maintain that the virginal conception is a theological idea without basis in historical fact. It is difficult if not impossible to explain why Christians would create so many problems for themselves and invite the charge of Jesus' illegitimate birth by promulgating such an idea if it had no historical basis. The reality of the charge of illegitimacy was well known in the time of Origen, but it may have existed even in the time the Gospels were written (cf. Jn 8:41; Mk 6:3; Stauffer). It is also evident that both Luke and the First Evangelist felt under some constraint to refer to the virginal conception, even to the point of awkwardly alluding to the concept in their genealogies.

One must also explain why this idea was accepted so widely by Christians in the early second century. Ignatius of Antioch is very matter-of-fact about the idea (Smyrn. 1:1). While it might be argued that at least in the case of Matthew he derived the idea from Isaiah 7:14, even this is unlikely. As we have already pointed out, neither the Hebrew 'almāh nor the Greek parthenos are simply technical terms for a virgo intacta, though certainly the terms may imply or even point to virginity in some cases. The point is that even in the LXX version of Isaiah 7:14 the text itself would not lead one to come up with such an idea, for it would normally be understood to mean that a young woman of marriageable age, who had previously never had a child, would conceive and give birth.

Furthermore, it is not certain that the virginal conception is known only to the First and Third Evangelists. Even if that were true, we would have two likely independent witnesses to the idea. That Paul uses ginomai rather than gennai in Romans 1:3 may reflect a knowledge of the virginal conception, as may several other Pauline texts (Gal 4:4; Phil 2:7; cf. Cranfield). It is also possible that John 1:13 and 6:41-42 reflect a knowledge of this idea. Perhaps more plausible is the conjecture that Mark 6:3 reflects a knowledge that Jesus was not physically the son of Joseph. Although calling a person a son of his mother is not without some precedent in the Bible (cf. 1 Chron 2:16), it is quite unusual and in a patriarchal culture may well have had a pejorative thrust (Russell, Stauffer). Whether or not this material outside the First and Third Gospels reflects a knowledge of the virginal conception, few would dispute that we do have such an idea in both Matthew and Luke (but cf. Bostock).

7.1.1. Matthew. Matthew 1:18-25 may be seen in pan as an explanation of Matthew's genealogical statement about Jesus' birth through Mary in Matthew 1:16. But Matthew 1:18 immediately confronts us with an exegetical difficulty. In the phrase ἐξ ἐντολῆς οὐκ εὑρόντων we find an expression of a limitation. The question is, does the phrase, which literally says "before they came together," mean "before they had marital union," or "before they married and cohabited." The former would imply that Mary and Joseph consummated their marriage after the birth of Jesus; the latter translation does not necessarily connote sexual sharing.

Under normal circumstances in a Jewish setting it is difficult to imagine a Jew or Jewish Christian separating the idea of marriage and its physical consummation, but many scholars, mostly Catholic, will contend that we are not dealing with a normal state of affairs (Laurentin). The point of this verse, however, is to make clear that Joseph could in no way have been responsible for siring Jesus. Jesus is the result of God's creative act in Mary alone. It is interesting that the First Evangelist is only interested in Joseph's conduct until the birth, so that it may be seen that Jesus was born of a virgin as prophecy foretold.

More crucial for our purposes is Matthew 1:25. The textual problem at this point is not major. Only Codex Bobiensis and the Sinaitic Syriac omit the key clause, ouk eginosken autēn heōs ou, probably because certain scribes thought this clause might imply that Mary had other children by Joseph, or at least had sexual relations with him after the birth of Jesus. The verb "to know" is in the imperfect and thus implies the duration of time Joseph did not have sexual relations with Mary. The stress is on what was the case prior to the birth of Jesus, but the phrase "he used not to" or "he was not knowing her until" at least implies that the previously abstained from action later took place. Neither the grammatical nor lexical evidence supports the attempts to take heōs to mean something like "while" or "without" in the case of Matthew 1:25, when it precedes an aorist indicative verb and follows an imperfect. The translation "while" is only possible with a verb in the subjunctive. The meaning of heōs without ou is not relevant here. Thus Mary's virginity ante partum is affirmed here, but her virginity post partum is likely ruled out.

The mention of Jesus' brothers and sisters (e.g., Mk 6:3), who are never called by the Greek word for cousins, would also militate against the possibility of a perpetual virginity. But this idea must in no way be confused with the concept of the virginal conception. Nor should the later Catholic idea of the immaculate conception of Mary by her mother, of which the Gospels know nothing, be confused with the virginal conception by Mary. The First Evangelist simply affirms the virginal conception as a result of the action of the Holy Spirit in Mary but does not go into any detail about the nature of this miracle in the same way Luke does.
7.1.2. Luke. The crux of the Lukan story is found in 1:34-35, but it must be kept in mind that Luke has already told us at 1:27 that Mary was a virgin. Scholars have generally distinguished Mary's "how" question from the "how" question of Zechariah in 1:18. The latter seems to reflect doubt on Zechariah's part, while the former seems to be a request by Mary for expiation as to how the promised event will transpire. It is also true that "how" questions are characteristic of biblical annunciation stories and there is no doubt that our author has shaped this story in light of OT precedents. It is rarely disputed that ginōskō has a sexual connotation here, but the question is how to interpret the present tense—whether as "I have not known before now," "I do not know at present" or "I do not intend to know" (eternal present).

The problems with the theory that Mary here takes a vow to virginity are as follows: (1) Luke portrays Mary as reflecting the normal Jewish mindset concerning marriage and children (1:48); (2) Mary has already entered the process of Jewish marriage; (3) Jewish views of virginity in the relevant period do not support the idea that Jewish women who were engaged might take a vow to virginity; and (4) Luke's audience could hardly have understood our text to mean this without additional information.

One should probably understand Mary's words to mean that she wondered how this conception would transpire in the immediate present or near future since she was still in the betrothal period and had not yet had sexual relations with Joseph. The response of the angel explains that Mary will conceive through the agency of the Holy Spirit. The second verb in verse 35—episkiazō—likely has the meaning of "to overshadow" in the sense of protecting, especially if there is an allusion here to the Shekinah glory cloud of God's divine presence (Lk 9:34). This latter verb is not likely a reference to divine impregnation, but rather divine protection during the encounter with the Holy Spirit which results in conception. It may be that Luke intends for us to see here the beginning of the eschatological reversal of the curse on Eve (Gen 3:16). In any case, one or both of these verbs refer to the virginal conception.

There is nothing in the narrative that follows Luke 1:34-35 to suggest that Mary had anything other than a normal pregnancy and delivery. Indeed, the story in 2:2240 about the trip to the Temple so that Mary could perform the ceremony of purification in fulfillment of the Law (Lev 12:8) suggests that Luke thought Mary had a normal delivery and required ritual cleansing. Luke tells us a bit more than Matthew about the process that resulted in the virginal conception, but basically both writers maintain a discrete silence about the details. They affirm the virginal conception and alter their respective genealogies accordingly (Lk 1:23; Mt 1:16), but they are mainly concerned with the fact that Messiah has come and the significance of the event Only secondarily do they show interest in how his coming was made possible. Furthermore, neither Evangelist ever directly refers to the matter again once the story of the ministry begins. When all is said and done, it is easier to explain the Gospel evidence on the assumption that the virginal conception was an historical event that the Gospel writers tried to explain, rather than to assume it was a theologoume-non.

7.2. The Meaning of the Event. The significance of this event should not be minimized. It indicates not merely that Jesus was God’s Son through the Holy Spirit (Brown, 1973), but that Jesus was a unique person who was the product of both the divine and the human in a manner unlike any others before or since. To be sure, our two authors do not try to address the relationship of a virginal conception to the doctrine of the incarnation of a preexistent Son, but it may be that the author of John 1 later saw that the two concepts were connected (cf. Jn 1:13).

In terms of its theological significance, the virginal conception explains how the incarnation transpired, though Matthew and Luke do not speak of the event in terms of the incarnation of a preexistent being (Fuller). Later theological reflection was also to see in the virginal conception the explanation of how Jesus could be born with a human nature not tainted with original sin. The doctrine of the virginal conception also stresses that Jesus was fully human, participating in the whole human life cycle from womb to tomb.

But perhaps most significantly of all, this concept conveys the fact that Jesus is a miraculous gift to humanity, not initially the product of any normal human activity or process. He is a gift that comes ultimately from God, but comes through Mary in a way that allows one to say that Jesus’ origins are both human and divine. It is clear that if Jesus had indeed been illegitimate, it would hardly have been possible for Luke with any personal integrity to present Jesus’ conception as a greater miracle than that of John the Baptist's (contra Hellwig), nor for Matthew to see in Jesus' conception something so holy that a righteous man like Joseph could be persuaded to accept it and accept Jesus as his legal son and thus as a son of David.

Both narratives collapse without the assumption of a virginal conception.
Furthermore, the arguments of both Evangelists about the theological significance of Jesus' origins are predicated on the assumption by both writers of the historical reality of the virginal conception. Otherwise there would be no need for the sort of apologetics and adjustments of genealogies that we find in these narratives.

8. The Magi and the Shepherds.

Though Christian tradition and art have frequently depicted both shepherds* and Magi visiting the new-born Jesus simultaneously, they are never associated or mentioned in the same breath within the Gospels. Luke betrays no hint of knowing about the Magi, nor does the First Evangelist ever mention shepherds. We may deduce from this that the stories about these different participants came from separate sources.

8.1. The Magi. The traditions about the Magi as we find them in Matthew do not refer to kings, but rather to astrologers and/or wise men, and the text says nothing about there being three of them, nor are they named. The term Magi comes to us by way of the Latin (the plural of Magus) but ultimately goes back to the Greek magos and refers to a magician, sorcerer or one wise in interpreting the stars and/or dreams (hence the translation "wise men"). In ancient Media and Persia these Magi were often associated with the priestly caste, and it has often been assumed in Christian tradition that these men came from Persia to find the Christ.

Other conjectures about the Magi's origins have included various parts of Arabia, and it has even been speculated that they might have come from Asia Minor. This conjecture is based on the phrase "we saw his star in the east" (Mt 2:2); Magi in Persia would presumably have seen his star in the west (Marsh-Edwards). Against the conjecture that the Wise Men came from Asia Minor it seems probable that en ti anatole of Matthew 2:2 means "at its rising" not "in the east," and 2:1 says specifically these Magi are from the east.

The historicity of the Magi has been frequently challenged, and it has been said that their story was composed out of such OT texts as Psalm 72:10-11, Isaiah 60:1-11 and the visit of the Queen of Sheba bearing gifts from Arabia for Solomon. It has even been suggested that the whole story is a midrash on 1 Kings 10. These conjectures in most cases originated because it has been thought that the story in itself was highly improbable. What Persian wise man would come to honor the birth of a Jewish peasant?

But these objections overlook the well-documented intense interest by ancient astrologers in Persia and elsewhere in the connection between astral phenomena and political events and the fact that in A.D. 66 the eastern astrologer Tiridates and other Magi visited Rome (cf. Dio Cassius 63.7; Suetonius, Nero 13). It was also widely believed during this era that stars heralded the birth of human beings destined for greatness (Brown, 1977), and in fact both Suetonius and Tacitus tell us that at the turn of the era there was an expectation of a world-ruler who would come from Judea (Suetonius, Vesp. 4; Tacitus, Ann. 5.13). Furthermore, the gifts brought by the Magi are regularly mentioned in ancient sources as valuable products of Arabia and other eastern countries. There is nothing inherently improbable about the story itself, though doubtless the First Evangelist has shaped his source material to bring out the points he wishes to stress.

Finally, the view that the story is a midrash on various OT texts fails to explain certain salient features in the text Psalm 72:10-11 and Isaiah 60:1-11 are about kings, not Magi, even if later Christian tradition wrongly identified the Magi as kings, and 1 Kings 10 is about a singular queen, not about stargazers. As we noted in our discussion of genre, midrash is not a very apt description of Matthew's narrative material even after he has edited his sources, but it may be useful to describe how he handles his Scriptural quotations and fits them into his source material (France).

The point of including the story about the Wise Men in Matthew's Gospel is probably to show how wise men, even Gentile wise men, sought Jesus out, while a Jewish king who should have known the OT prophecies neither personally sought out nor properly honored the new son of David. Indeed, this story may be part of Matthew's larger agenda of showing how Jesus' own people largely rejected him.

8.2. The Shepherds. Due to their trade, the shepherds would have been viewed as unclean peasants in various Jewish circles. They present fewer historical difficulties to the interpreter than do the Magi. In Luke's schema they represent the sort of simple and marginalized people for whom the birth of a liberating Messiah would be good news indeed (Lk 1:52; 4:18). Historically there is nothing improbable about finding shepherds in the vicinity of Bethlehem. Though it could be argued that Luke has created this scene out of such OT texts as 1 Samuel 16—17, this seems unlikely because there is no attempt here to portray Jesus as some sort of Davidic shepherd. He is seen rather as the world savior whom even the humble poor recognize. The suggestion that Luke created this scene bearing in mind the Tower of the Flock (mentioned in Gen 35:21 and Mic 4:8) and later traditions associating the coming of Messiah with that Tower is also unlikely.

9. Canonical Information about Jesus' Childhood.

Though later apocryphal documents like the Infancy Gospel of Thomas have a good deal to say about the so-called hidden years of Jesus, these documents amount to little more than pious fiction and are generally recognized to be of little or no historical worth (see Gospels [Apocryphal]). In the Gospels themselves there is only one story about what Jesus was like between infancy and adulthood—Luke 2:41-52.

This story has historical value not least because it appears to reflect badly on Jesus' parents, that is, they do not adequately understand him (2:50). In view of the increasingly reverential portrait Christians paint-ed of the Holy Family, it is unlikely that Luke invented this material. In particular, Mary, who is portrayed as a potential disciple in Luke 1—2, is shown to lack full understanding of Jesus and his actions (Luke 1:29, 34; 2:33), though like a good disciple she is reflecting on what she does not understand (2:50-51). Neither here nor earlier does Luke paint an idealized picture of Mary; he shows both her faith and her lack of understanding. These and other factors lead one to doubt that this story should be viewed as essentially legendary in character.

In terms of literary form, this is a pronouncement story (McHugh), and given that it has a less Semitic style and in fact has thirteen Lukanisms, it appears to have come from a different source than Luke's other birth narrative material. It may be that Luke com-posed this story himself on the basis of oral material. The story has no miraculous content which might raise historical difficulties, and a trip to the Temple by a young man shortly before he came of age was customary as part of a Jewish father's obligation to acquaint his son with his religious duties. Nor is there anything improbable about Jesus' family traveling some distance from Jerusalem and expecting Jesus to be amongst the other pilgrims, some of whom would likely have been relatives or fellow residents from Nazareth or the surrounding area. It was customary for Galileans to go up to Jerusalem in rather large parties during the high feast days, not least because of concerns about safety along the roads (Lk 10:30). The story in itself has marks of authenticity since it is about Jesus beginning to disengage from parental authority and following the will of his heavenly Father alone, a motif we find in other authentic Gospel material (Witherington, 1984). It may even be that in 2:19 and 51 Luke is indicating his source for this information (Brown, 1977).

Here as elsewhere in Luke 1—2, Mary is in the foreground and Joseph in the background. Luke 2:41-52 is in some respects rather like John 2:1-12 because the story ends by Jesus doing what Mary wants, without verbally indicating that he would do so. The tensions between the claims of physical and spiritual allegiance are evident when Mary speaks of Jesus' father (Joseph) and Jesus replies in terms of his actual Father (God).

Jesus is portrayed as a sort of child prodigy here, but Luke also wishes to indicate that Jesus grew and matured like other children (2:52). He grew intellectually (wisdom), physically (stature) and spiritually (the grace of God). From this singular story we may gather that Jesus' childhood was in many respects like that of other children of devout parents—it was a period of growth, development and learning. In particular, it was a period of learning about one's faith, and as a youth a time for sorting out God's will from his parents' wishes. Absent in this story are any traces of Jesus the child miracle-worker, which the authors of the apocryphal Gospels liked to stress. Instead, the one truly remarkable aspect about Jesus in this story is what he knows of God, both of his Word and of his will—a knowledge that astounded both teachers and parents.

See also Chronology; Genealogy: Mary's Song: Simeon's Song: Zechariah's Song.

In both the Old and New Testaments blasphemy is, at its root, a word or act detracting from the power and glory* of God.*

1. Background
2. Blasphemy Against the Holy Spirit
3. Jesus Accused of Blasphemy

1. Background.

The Greek noun blasphèmia may be derived from phēmē (a "saying") and a shortened form of blaptò ("injure") or blax ("stupid") or ballò ("throw" or "strike") or blabos ("harm").

1.1. Greek Usage. In Greek literature "to blaspheme" meant to speak ill or abusively rather than to speak well of someone (euphemeò, Philo Migr. Abr. 117; euphēmia, Josephus Ant. 16.2.1 §14; 17.8.4 §200; 2 Cor 6:8). This meaning is also found in (e.g.) 2 Maccabees (10:34; 12:14), Philo (Spec. Leg. 4:197), Josephus (Ufe §232) as well as in the NT (Acts 13:34; 18:6; Rom 14:16; 1 Cor 10:30; Tit 3:2; 1 Pet 4:4). Someone can be said to blaspheme against an idol or false god (Diodorus 2.21.7; Philo Spec. Leg. 1.53; Josephus Ant. 4.8.10 §207; Acts 19:37). Blasphemy is also associated with "bad language" (2 Macc 12:14) or insulting a person (Mt 12:32) as shown by the synonyms òneidizò ("revile," Mt 27:44 par. Mk 15:32 and Lk 23:39) and loidoreò ("to abuse," Jn 9:28; Acts
1.2. Old Testament. In the canonical OT and Apocrypha, blasphemy referred to contemptuous or dishonoring speech or actions against God through denying his ability (2 Kings 19:4, 6, 22; Ps 74:18; Is 37:6), oppressing his people (Is 52:5), gloating over their downfall (Ezek 35:12), killing Israelites (Tob 1:18 [S]), speaking directly against God (Dan 3:29), paying homage to an idol (Is 66:3; contrast Bel 9) or insulting his followers (2 Macc 12:14) or the Temple (1 Macc 7:38). However, the key passage is Leviticus 24:15-16: "Whoever curses God shall bear the sin. One who blasphemes the name of the Lord shall be put to death" (NRSV, cf. Lev 24:11; Ex 20:7).

1.3. Philo and Josephus. Originally the two sentences of Leviticus 24:15-16 probably had identical meanings. But Philo, taking them separately, understood the first to be the lesser offense of cursing a false god, the penalty of death being reserved for naming the Name of the God of Israel (Vit. Mos. 2.203-5; also Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.34 §237; Ant. 4.207). On the greater offense Josephus says: "Let him that blasphemeth God be stoned, then hung for a day, and buried ignominiously and in obscurity" (Ant. 4.8.6 §202; cf. Deut 21:22-23). On the actual nature of the offense of blasphemy, Philo says that if anyone "even ventures to utter his name unreasonably, let him suffer the penalty of death" (Vit. Mos. 2.206). In turn Philo seems to understand the unreasonable utterance of the holy name of God to be treating it as a mere expletive (Vit. Mos. 2.208).

1.4. Rabbinic Judaism. For the rabbis there were also two sins referred to in Leviticus 24:15-16. They understood the first sentence to mean that for cursing God the only sentence necessary was excommunication, for God would exact the penalty (b. Ker. 7b). From its interpretation of the second sentence the Mishnah gives us the only rabbinic definition of blasphemy, and it is similar to that of Philo's: "The blasphemer is not culpable unless he pronounces the Name itself" (m. Sank 7:5).

2. Blasphemy Against the Holy Spirit.

All three Synoptic Gospels record the twin sayings of Jesus that whoever blasphemes or speaks against the Son of man (Mark has "sons of men [i.e., people] will be forgiven"; see Son of Man) will be forgiven (see Forgiveness), but that the person who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) will never be forgiven (Mt 12:31-32 par. Mk 3:28-29 and Lk 12:10; cf. Did. 11.7; Gos. Thom. 44; Gos. Bar. 5:2). These sayings have caused much scholarly debate and anguish among Christians. The Aramaic original of the first saying was probably a broad statement saying that all sins and blasphemies on the part of or against persons (bar Knasa, a generic or collective term) will be forgiven, except blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. By translating the generic singular of the Aramaic with the plurals "the sons of men," Mark means that all people will be forgiven all sins and blasphemies—except blasphemies against the Holy Spirit (Mk 3:28-29). The Q* tradition, probably best represented by Luke 12:10, took the saying to refer to blaspheming against the Son of man, or Jesus, being forgiven. Matthew 12:31-32 is a conflation of Q* and Mark.

The origin of these sayings has been discussed at length. The "Amen, I say to you" sayings (see Amen), such as this one, have been thought to have arisen either from Hellenistic Christian prophets* within the context of worship* or from a Jewish apocalyptic* milieu. However, it is yet to be shown how this unparalleled formula came to be attributed exclusively to Jesus. Indeed, the use of amen in the Gospels is without parallel. In Jewish literature (e.g., Num 5:22; Deut 27:15; Neh 5:13; y. Sota 18b; b. Sebu. 36a) and the remainder of the NT (Rom 1:25; 9:5; 11:36; 15:33; 16:27; 1 Cor 14:16; 16:24; Gal 1:5; Rev 5:14; 7:12; 22:20) it was a response formula assenting to someone else's blessing,* curse, oath,* word or prayer* (though see T. Abr. 8:7). Occasionally it was added to one's own prayer as a concluding hope (Tob 8:8; m. Ta'an. 4:8). However, in all the strata of traditions in the Gospels it is used exclusively to introduce and confirm Jesus' own words. This factor, along with the retention of "amen" in its Semitic form, the unusual Semitism of the phrase "the sons of men," the accompanying sayings associating Jesus' ministry with sinners, and the unprecedented scope of forgiveness, indicates the authenticity of the saying about all sins and blasphemies being forgiven.

The second saying, that of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, appears to contradict the previous saying. However this is an established OT idiom (Gen 2:16-17; Ex 12:10) and is also found elsewhere in the NT (Mt 15:24-32; 25:29; Mk2:17; 9:37; Jn 1:11-12; 7:16). In this way the gravity of the sin that is excepted is emphasized. In light of the harshness and severity of the saying, its authenticity can hardly be doubted.

2.1. The Unforgivable Sin. There has been a great deal of discussion regarding the nature of the unfor-givable sin. For Jesus the ambiguous statement, as reconstructed above, would have meant that an attack on him was pardonable, perhaps because the public mystery of his true mission and identity could mean that it was done innocently (cf. Acts 3:17). However, an attack on the Spirit of God working in him was beyond forgiveness. That would be detracting from the power (see Authority and Power) and majesty of God. In turn, the saying shows that Jesus was conscious of unprecedented spiritual power at work through himself, which he considered to be self-evidently of God.

For Mark the two sayings meant that all sins are forgivable except blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. That is, to have seen the power of his ministry, as in his exorcisms (see Demon, Devil, Satan), and then to say that Jesus had an unclean spirit was an attack on the Holy Spirit. The Spirit's work was thereby attributed not to God but to Satan (Mk 3:22; cf. Is 5:20). There can be no greater sin.

Matthew has a similar perspective, but by deleting the reference to Jesus' contemporaries (Mk 3:30) he makes the sayings more obviously applicable to the early church. Thus for Matthew it may have been forgivable not to recognize the identity of Jesus (cf. 21:32), but there was no excuse for the Christian who did not recognize the work of the Spirit. That would amount to apostasy.

In Luke the saying appears in the context of teaching about the followers of Jesus being called on to defend themselves and their ministries (Lk 12:8-12). To blaspheme against the Holy Spirit would be to deny God and the work of his Spirit in their lives, especially his ability to support them in trying times. In Acts 5:1-5 Luke gives an example of an unpardonable sin against the Holy Spirit.

3. Jesus Accused of Blasphemy.

All the Gospels agree that Jesus claimed or admitted equality with God—or claimed to be the Son of God (see Son of God)—and that this was considered by the Jews to be blasphemous and worthy of the death penalty (Mt 26:63-66; Mk 14:61-65; Lk 22:66-71; Jn 10:31-39; 19:7).

3.1. Blasphemy and God's Prerogative to Forgive. In Mark 2:5 Jesus is reported as saying, "My son, your sins are forgiven" (par. Mt 9:3 and Lk 5:21). This passive expression would probably have been understood as an attempt to avoid pronouncing God's name: "God forgives you." The ambiguity of the statement "your sins are forgiven," which is consistent with Jesus' self-disclosure, could mean that Jesus was merely providing the man with assurance
(cf. Mt 9:2, tharsei, "take heart"), reporting to the man the forgiveness God was offering him (cf. 2 Sam 12:13). However, the Aramaic expression reflected in the present indicative passive, "they are forgiven" (aphientai) means, "your sins are at this moment forgiven." Indeed, the scribes are said to interpret the saying as Jesus himself offering forgiveness: "Can it be that this fellow thus blasphemes? Who can forgive sins but God?" (Mk 2:7 par. Mt 9:3 and Lk 5:21).

In turn Jesus affirms that he was forgiving sins; that is, he did what the scribes considered to be the prerogative of God (Mk 2:10 par. Mt 9:6 and Lk 5:24).

As was seen above, in Jesus' time there was a wide understanding of the nature of blasphemy. On the one hand, according to the narrow rabbinic definition of blasphemy, Jesus would not be guilty before the Law. In the Qumran document known as the Prayer of Nabonidus (4QPrNab), an exorcist is said to pardon the sin of a sick person. On the other hand, a more general definition of blasphemy known to Philo (Vit. Mos. 2.206) would indicate that those who observed Jesus may have thought he had encroached on the prerogative of God. Furthermore, there is a strand of tradition in the OT (Ex 34:6-7; Ps 103:3; 130:4; Is 43:25; 44:22; Dan 9:9), as well as in the Dead Sea Scrolls (1QS 2:9; CD 3:18; 20:34), in which God is clearly the one who forgives. Not even the Messiah (see Christ) was expected to forgive sins, only to be the means whereby God would forgive in the eschaton (Is 53; Jer 31; cf. Tg. Is 53:4-6). The offense, then, was the diminishing of God's majesty and honor by usurping a role considered to be uniquely his alone.

3.2. Jesus Made Himself to be Equal with God. In John's Gospel there are passages where statements by Jesus are said to provoke the Jews to accuse him of blasphemy or even attempt to carry out the death penalty for blasphemy.

3.2.1. John 5:16-18 provides the conclusion to the story of Jesus healing* a lame man at the Bethzatha pool and contains two accusations. The first is that "because he does these things" (hoti tauta epoiei) on the Sabbath* (cf. Jn 9:14; 20:30) the Jews persecute Jesus. The second accusation, of making himself equal to God, arises out of Jesus' response to the first accusation. Jesus' claim to be able to work on the Sabbath is based on his claiming the same right as his Father to work continually, including on the Sabbath (2 Macc 9:12; Ep. Arist. 210; Philo Leg. AU. 1.5-6; Cher. 87-88; Corp. Hern. 11.5, 14; Exod. Rab. 30:6; Gen. Rab. 11:10). The Jews find fault in this not only because he claimed God to be his own Father (patera idion) but in claiming his capacity for common activity with God he also claimed to be equal with God. As in Mark 2:7 (see 3.1. above) the blasphemous act was in usurping the uniqueness or prerogative of God.

3.2.2. In John 8:58 Jesus says, "Before Abraham* was born (genesthai), I am [ego eimi]." In John's Gospel egō eimi represents the name of God. So John portrays the Jews attempting to carry out the death sentence for blasphemy as set out in Leviticus 24:16. The historicity of this claim by Jesus has been brought into serious question by some NT scholars. Nevertheless, John is probably correct in indicating that, prior to trying him for blasphemy before the Sanhedrin,* the Jewish authorities perceived evidence of blasphemy in Jesus' activity and his view of himself.

3.2.3. John 10:33 is the first time the official charge of blasphemy occurs in the Fourth Gospel. It would not be blasphemous for someone to describe Jesus as divine. According to Scripture God's anointed would be called God's Son (2 Sam 7:14; 1 Chron 17:13). What would be blasphemous, according to John, is Jesus himself claiming this divine status for himself; the blasphemy of self-deification. Jesus answers the charge by quoting from Psalm 82:6, thereby showing that it is not blasphemous to refer to people like judges as "gods" through whom the Word of God came. Jesus also says that as he has been given this status (hagiazein) and sent into the world by the Father, it cannot be blasphemous for him to say "I am the Son of God" (10:36). The Jews are not satisfied. Perhaps they feel his answer is beside the point since Jesus is claiming to be more than a son of God in a reduced sense, for John says that they attempted to arrest Jesus (Jn 10:39). Although they were initially unsuccessful, they eventually took him to trial (Jn 19:7).

3.3. Jesus Tried for Blasphemy. Matthew and Mark agree that the charge of blasphemy was involved in the trial of Jesus (Mt 26:57-75 par. Mk 14:53-72; cf. Lk 22:54-71; see Trial of Jesus). Jesus is asked if he is the Messiah (su ei ho Christos; Mt 26:63 par. Mk 14:61 and Lk 22:67). Jesus' two-part answer provokes the charge of blasphemy. In Mark the first part of Jesus' reply was probably "I am" (egō eimi, 14:62, cf. Codex Koridethi-anus [Θ]; Mt 26:63). The fact that Jesus took on a messianic title or identity which only God could bestow and confirm by his blessing may, in itself, have been considered blasphemous (cf. Jn 19:7; Acts 5:34-39). This may have caused Matthew to place the responsibility for the direct answer back on the high priest by having Jesus say, "You have said so" (Mt 26:64), and for Luke to have Jesus evade the answer. In turn both Matthew and Luke have Jesus say, in effect, that God will confirm his messiahship. The second part of Jesus' reply is about the Son of man being seated at the right hand of Power (Lk 22:69; cf. Ps 110:1), and is generally agreed to belong to the reliable traditions about Jesus. In its original Jewish setting this saying was probably meant to emphasize God's approval. This would have compounded the earlier blasphemous act of taking on a messianic title. In Matthew and Mark Jesus' answer concludes with an allusion to Daniel 7:13 which reinforces Jesus' claims of a unique relationship with God. As related in the Mishnah, the appropriate response for the high priest having heard blasphemy is to tear his clothes (cf. m. Sanh. 7:5).

See also Holy Spirit; I AM" Sayings; Son of God; Son of Man; Trial, of Jesus.

C. H. Twelftree

BLESSING AND WOE

The Gospels frequently present "blessing" and "woe" as opposites. But whereas "blessing" indicates a state of happiness or joy associated with the eschatological new day occasioned by the presence and activity of Jesus, "woe" may be used more broadly. A woe may express either sorrow or pity, or a malediction or judgment pronounced on particular individuals or communities for their sins. A woe, like a blessing, may have eschatological connotations.

1. Blessing
2. Woe
1. Blessing.

1.1. Blessings in the Greek World. The word blessed (Gk makarios; synonyms olbios, "fortunate"; eutychës, "blessed with good fortune"; eudaimon, "blessed with a good spirit") was a familiar ascription in the Greek world. It was used of the gods who were not subject to earthly frailties or misfortunes and did not have to toil. It was used of persons who were judged in some way to share the privileged state of the gods. It was ascribed to the dead who had transcended the griefs of this mortal life (Plato Leg. XII.947d); to the rich, who were presumed to be free from care; and to the wise (Menander Frag. 114K: "Blessed is the man who has both mind and money for he employs the latter for what he should"). The Greek blessings reveal what was valued and what was thought to make for earthly happiness: a lovely bride, excellent children, moral rectitude, wisdom, wealth, honor and fame.

1.2. Blessings in the OT. The OT contains forty-five beatitudes, twenty-six of which appear in the Psalms. In the LXX makarios regularly translates the Hebrew 'aire, which means, "Oh the happiness of the one." The OT blessing (or makarism) ascribes happiness to a person or group because of certain praiseworthy religious behaviors or attitudes. They are to be congratulated because they are in the enviable position of having divine approval. Those who are blessed are those who have God* as Lord (Ps 144:15), who fear God (Ps 112:1-3; 128:1-4; Prov 84:12), who trust in God (Ps 84:12), who dwell or take refuge in God (Ps 2:12; 84:4) and who prudently obey God (Ps 119:1-2; Prov 8:32-34; Is 56:2) or heed the counsels of the wise (Sir 50:28). They are judged to be fortunate because it is assumed that God rewards trust in him with worldly well-being. The blessed have a quiver full of sons as heirs (Ps 127:3-5; 112:1-3), a full life and a good wife (Ps 128:1-4; Sir 26:1), prosperity and honor (Ps 1:1-2; 84:12; Job 29:10-11) and live under the protection of God (Ps 41:2; Sir 34:15). The blessing in this literature displays a distinctly hortatory tone because it implies that if one wishes to join the ranks of the happy, one should emulate their virtuous conduct or attitudes.

The connection of the blessing with any eschatological (see Eschatology) hope is rare in the Hebrew Bible, but it does appear (Is 30:18; Dan 12:12). The blessings in non-canonical literature, however, reflect a significant change of focus from how to be happy in this life to how to be happy in the life to come (Tob 13:14-16; Pss. Sol. 4:23; 6:1; 17:44; 18:6; 1 Enoch 58:2; 81:4; 82:4; 2 Enoch 42:6-14; 52:1-16, see also Lk 1:45; Jas 1:12; Rev 14:13; 19:9; 20:6). The blessings are completely future-oriented, and no promise is held out for well-being in this life. It assumes that happiness is to be found only in the sphere of God in the life to come and cannot be found in external circumstances of this present evil age. Therefore, blessedness has become an eschatological concept. It was something that would come in the future with the arrival of the day of salvation and the end of history. Because those who are blessed are usually those in distress, the emphasis is on consolation of the faithful in their present situation of despair rather than on moral exhortation.

1.3. Blessings in Jesus’ Ministry. Makarios appears fifty times in the NT, forty-four of which are beatitudes. Thirteen occur in Matthew; fifteen in Luke; and two in John. The beatitudes normally consist of makarios/ object/hoti clause giving the reason for the ascription. Matthew’s Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount) and Luke’s Sermon on the Plain contain a series of beatitudes with makarios repeated, something that does not occur in the OT. It is widely accepted, however, that the key for understanding the NT beatitudes lies not in their form but in their context and content.

Jesus’ blessings exhibit some distinctive characteristics. First, the state of blessedness is related to the joy* that is occasioned by the presence and activity of Jesus. He ascribes happiness to the poor (see Rich and Poor), hungry, weeping and hated, not because these persons have accomplished anything themselves, but because Jesus’ presence signifies the inauguration of the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) and a new reality for them. Jesus’ ministry and divine blessing are integrally related. Consequently, he ascribes happiness to those who are not scandalized by the manifestation of the kingdom in his ministry but respond to him with faith* (Mt 11:16; see Jn 20:29). He pronounces Peter blessed because Peter is open to God’s revelation of Jesus’ identity—a revelation that eludes flesh and blood (Mt 16:17).

Second, since blessings had become associated with the end time (see Lk 14:15; Rev 19:9; 20:6), Jesus directly pronouncing his listeners as blessed implies that the new day is at hand. Sirach looked back to a golden past and considered those blessed who saw Elijah* (Sir. 48:11). The author of the Psalms of Solomon looked forward to a magnificent future and ascribed blessedness to those who would be born in the days of the Messiah (see Christ) and see the good fortune of Israel and the good things of the Lord (Pss. SoL 17:44; 18:6). In the Gospels Jesus declares that Elijah has already come in John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) and hints that the Messiah is in their midst. Therefore, the long-awaited blessings of the future age are perceived to have broken into the present Jesus directly addresses his disciples* as blessed because they are able to see and hear what the prophets* and the righteous longed to see (Mt 13:16-17; Lk 10:23-24).

Third, as announcements of congratulations, many of the beatitudes are paradoxical, particularly when compared to the practical wisdom* expressed in Greek and OT blessings. The poor, the mourners, the meek, the hungry and the persecuted would not be esteemed as happy by those who prize only earthly well-being; they would be placed in the category of the unfortunate and miserable. By contrast, Jesus announces, "Happy are the unhappy for God will make them happy." Their deliverance is not yet, but they should be fully conscious of divine blessing and favor. Appearances to the contrary, congratulations are in order because Jesus' presence fulfills all meaningful desires for happiness. This condition has nothing to do with the pursuit of happiness or with fortunate external circumstances. It has to do with openness to the gracious activity of God to save his people. As with the prophetic/apocalyptic* blessings, Jesus' ascription of blessing to the poor, the hungry, the weeping and the hated (Lk 6:20-22) provides encouragement for the faithful in times of distress. They can be confident that God will vindicate them.

Fourth, one might also contend that the blessings have the capacity to establish a new existence for the hearer (the connection with Is 61 is noteworthy). They bring forth what they declare.

1.4. The Beatitudes in Luke and Matthew. The series of beatitudes in Luke and Matthew display some noticeable differences. Luke's Beatitudes seem to apply to socioeconomic conditions: the poor, the hungry, the weeping; and they are addressed directly in the second person. Matthew's Beatitudes are considered by some to be more spiritualized or ethicized. Those blessed are the poor in spirit (the meek), the ones hungering and thirsting for righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, and the peacemakers; and they are addressed indirectly in the third person. The Lukan Beatitudes are combined with woes, and this combination emphasizes that a reversal of circumstances will come about: the hungry will become satisfied; the filled will become hungry. No reversal of conditions is implied in Matthew. The merciful will not cease being merciful, the pure in heart will not become less pure when they see God and the peacemakers will not become any less peacemakers. Therefore, the Matthean Beatitudes are said by Dodd, for example, to depict "types of character that have God's approval." This fact suggests that, like the Wisdom blessings, the Matthean Beatitudes are primarily hortatory.

Some scholars regard the Matthean Beatitudes to be entrance requirements for the kingdom instead of eschatological blessings. The Beatitudes have been changed into examples of the God-ordained higher righteousness (see justice, Righteousness) required of disciples. In this sense, the beatitude becomes an implicit imperative, and the blessings are conditional. If one is pure in heart, then one will be blessed.

One cannot ignore the fact that some of Jesus' pronouncements of blessing elsewhere in the Gospels do set up ethical conditions for blessing. For example, only those who hear and keep the Word of God are blessed (Lk 11:28; Jn 13:17). Only those servants who are found watching and doing (Lk 12:37-38, 43; Mt 24:46) and only those who are compassionate toward the poor and the outcast (Lk 14:14; see Mt 25:34) are blessed. These other conditional blessings might support interpreting the Matthean Beatitudes as conditional entrance requirements.

It is argued against this view that the Beatitudes in Matthew need to be seen in the context of Jesus' healing ministry that precedes them (Mt 4:23—5:2). Davies and Allison contend also that the series of beatitudes are separated structurally from the main corpus of imperatives in the rest of the sermon because "... its function is to put grace before imperative, greeting before confrontation, blessing before demand . . ." (440). Only after the comforting words of congratulation in Matthew 5:3-12, pointing to the priority of God's gracious activity, are the hearers then confronted with the charge of greater responsibilities and tasks. One should also note that being persecuted can hardly be an entrance requirement since this is not something that one can attain on one's own and is no virtue in and of itself. The persecuted are proclaimed blessed because Jesus' presence signifies the invasion of a new reality that transcends the troubles of this age. Koch is correct in his conclusion that the poor in spirit, those who mourn, the meek and those who hunger and thirst for righteousness portray different aspects of one attitude toward the world nearing its close—an attitude of lasting patience and hope. To such as these belongs the promise of the supreme blessing of the kingdom of Heaven.

2. Woe.
2.1. Woes in the OT. The OT contains a variety of woe interjections (hōy, ēy; 'y) ranging in tone from an exclamation (Is 1:24; Jer 47:6) to a mourning cry (1 Kings 13:30; Jer 22:18) to an expression of pity (Is 1:4), to an imprecation denoting extreme hostility (Is 33:1; Hab 2:6-19). The LXX translates the woes indiscriminately as ouai, 0 and oimmoi. As blessing it might be classified as a wisdom-type ascription; the woe is a prophetictype ascription. It is the converse of the beatitude. Unlike the beatitude, woes in the OT can be found occurring in a series (Is 5:8-22; Hab 2:6-19). Most of the woes introduce an announcement of doom looming on the horizon for the people; the coming disaster is clearly implied in the woe. The prophets become increasingly bitter in their indictments of the spiritual obduracy of the people and particularly that of the leaders of the people (Zech 11:17). These woes not only warn of imminent calamity, they announce that God's vengeance will befall the subject In keeping with this development the series of woes found in 1 Enoch 93—103 are almost equivalent to curses.

2.2. Woes in the Gospels. In the Gospels the woe can be construed as an expression of sorrow and pity—"Alas!"—or as a malediction akin to a curse. When Jesus utters a woe for the world because of the inevitability of temptations to sin (Mt 18:7), it is essentially a lament and a warning. This woe does not threaten or call down destruction on the world but mourns over the inexorable consequences of sin (see Sinners). Those who succumb to temptation will inevitably find themselves in dire straits. It is quite a different matter for the one causing others to stumble; this woe serves as a stern warning. Those who lead others to sin are in danger of fiery Gehenna (Mt 18:9; see Heaven and Hell). The woe over women who are pregnant at the time of the great tribulation laments the fact that when the cataclysm comes they will be able to flee only with difficulty (Mt 24:19; Mk 13:17; Lk 21:23). Jesus also utters a woe concerning the one who betrays the Son of man (see Son of Man); it would have been better for him not to have been born (Mt 26:24; Mk 14:21; Lk 22:22). Again, this woe is an expression of deep sorrow as well as a warning to the one who by his treachery would cut himself off from the kingdom of God.

The woes Jesus pronounces against the Galilean cities of Chorazin and Bethsaida are not laments but maledictions. These cities stubbornly refused to respond to his mighty works, and consequently Jesus proclaims that the infamous cities of Tyre and Sidon will be better off in the judgment* than they (Mt 11:21-22; Lk 10:13-14). Formally, the two kinds of woe differ. The malediction consists of ouai, the dative case of the second person pronoun and the name of those addressed. The woes expressing "Alas!" are general and conditional. Anyone who might fall into the circumstances described is lamented. The woes pronouncing judgment are directed at specific individuals for specific evil behavior. The Galilean cities and the scribes* and Pharisees* (Mt 23:13-32; Pharisees and lawyers in Lk 11:42-44, 46-53) are condemned for particular behavior and attitudes which are identified by a hoti clause specifying the reason for the denunciation. The immediate context also pertains to the day of judgment (Mt 11:22, 24; 23:32, 38-39). The woe condemns particular persons for their sin and announces that they will be judged for their sins. If one views Jesus' ascribing people blessed as in some way an eschatological pronouncement, and if one considers the woe to be a counterpart to blessing, the woe of judgment might be seen as eschatological as well.

In Matthew 23:13-32 the scribes and Pharisees are proleptically judged for shutting the kingdom of heaven off to others (Mt 23:13), turning converts into double sons of hell (Mt 23:15), teaching falsely (Mt 23:16-24), neglecting the weightier matters of the Law* (Mt 23:25-26), hypocrisy (Mt 23:27-28; see Hypocrite) and a murderous spirit (Mt 23:32). The parallel in Luke 11:42-54 also includes woes on the Pharisees for seeking the first seats in the synagogues* (Lk 11:43) and woes on the lawyers for binding heavy burdens on others (Lk 11:46).

In Luke's Sermon on the Plain a series of woes immediately follow the Beatitudes. Woes can be found linked to blessings in the OT (Is 1:4-5; Eccl 10:16-17; Tob 13:12, 14; I Enoch 5:7; 99:2; 2 Enoch 52; see the blessings connected with curses in Deut 27:15—28:19). These woes in Luke predict a reversal of fortunes as the rich, the well-fed, the laughing and the well-spoken-of will in God's future know only hunger and sadness. Implicit in this denunciation is a condemnation of their self-assurance that derives from a false sense of earthly well-being.

See also Hypocrite; Judgment; Sermon on the Mount.

BLINDNESS AND DEAFNESS

The Gospels, like elsewhere in biblical literature, frequently use the words blindness, deafness, eye and ear in a figurative sense, conveying more than the activity of the body's sense organs. God is made known through words and deeds. To see and hear God's revelation fully requires not only physical sensation but spiritual sensitivity. It requires a personal response of understanding and commitment. Therefore, blindness and deafness can describe the inability to comprehend the spiritual truth inherent within material sights or words. This condition of hardness of heart may be due to religious or moral impairment or due to God's intention.

Salvation is frequently associated with sight in Jewish and Christian literature (Ex 14:13; 2 Chron 20:17; Ps 50:23; 91:16; 119:123; Is 40:5; 42:16-17; 59:11; 1QS 11:2-3; CD 20:34; T. Gad. 5:7; 2 Clem 1:6-7; 9:2). The formula of the frequently quoted Shema emphasizes the equally important role of hearing in revelation: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one" (Deut 6:4). It is a call to discern and obey the will of God. In contrast to God who both "sees" and "hears" (Ex 2:24; 3:7; 9; 12:13; Deut 5:28; Is 37:17; Zech 7:11-13), idols are "blind" and "deaf (Deut 4:28), as are those who worship them (Ps 115:5-6). The OT prophets chasten the Hebrew people for having eyes and ears, and yet not seeing or hearing (Is 6:9-10; 43:8; Jer 5:21; Ezek 12:2). Responsibility for such spiritual blindness and deafness is sometimes said to be borne by God (Deut 29:4; Is 6:9-10) but on the other hand, can be traced to the person's own obduracy. Yet God can overcome this hardness of heart (Is 29:18; 35:4-5; 42:6-7,16; 61:1; see Hardness of Heart).

1. Blindness.

The theme of blindness and sight is significant in Mark's theology, particularly with respect to the disciples.* Mark never calls the disciples "blind," but throughout the Gospel he portrays them as spiritually dull (Mk 4:13, 35-41; 6:52; 7:18; 8:1-10, 14-21, 31-33; 9:1-13, 19, 32; 10:10, 13, 23-32, 35-45). The blindness of the disciples is illustrated by two stories of healings* of the blind. Mark strategically places these stories before and after a major section in which Jesus predicts his suffering and relates it to the nature of true discipleship* (Mk 8:27—10:45).

The healing of the blind man of Bethsaida which is found only in Mark (8:22-26) is a two-part healing (the only one of its type in the NT) that typifies the gradual growth in spiritual sight of the disciples. It is preceded by the second story of Jesus miraculously feeding thousands, after which the disciples still do not understand. (Jesus quotes Is 6:9-10 [or Jer 5:21]; cf. Mk 4:12.) It is immediately followed by (and symbolically tied to) Peter's confession of Jesus as the Christ (Mk 8:27-30), a confession at best incomplete because it refuses to accept the idea of suffering (Mk 8:31-38).

The story forming the end bracket around Mark 8:27—10:45 is the restoring of sight to Bartimaeus (Mk 10:46-52), a story that might better be classified as a calling of a disciple rather than as a miracle story (see Miracles, Miracle Stories). Thus, the section of teaching on the necessity of the true disciple to accept and participate in Jesus' suffering closes with Bartimaeus, a prototypical disciple, whose "faith has healed/saved (sōzō) him" (Mk 10:52). Bartimaeus follows Jesus "in the way," which is the way to the cross. The passion journey to Jerusalem then begins immediately with chapter 11. For Mark salvation is vision. But the vision can only be complete after the crucifixion when the disciples understand the significance of the cross and accept its implications. Until then they are blind.

In John's Gospel verbs of seeing are important and are often employed in conjunction with "believing" (Jn 4:29, 39-42; 9:7, 35-38; 20:8, 29) even in the words of Jesus (6:36; 12:44-46; 14:9-10). John uses five different verbs to express the act of seeing, each of which may carry a slightly different meaning but does not consistently translate a special type of sight.

John records fewer miracles than the Synoptic writers and makes more use of the symbolic possibilities behind miracles. There is only one story of a blind healing in the Gospel of John (Jn 9), but it is a long and carefully crafted portrayal of spiritual blindness. As the drama unfolds, the man born blind reovers not only physical sight but spiritual insight. Three times the man claims not to know who Jesus is (Jn 9:12, 25, 36), but his insight expands progressively, as is shown by the titles he uses of Jesus. First he calls him a "man" (Jn 9:11), then a "prophet"* (Jn 9:17), "Messiah" (Jn 9:22; see Christ), a "man from God" (Jn 9:31-33) and finally "Son of man"* (Jn 9:35) and "Lord"* (Jn 9:38).

The Pharisees*/Jews, on the other hand, who do not believe the man or Jesus, claim three times (Jn 9:16, 24, 29) to know who Jesus is, yet they are depicted as growing in blindness until they finally indict themselves: "What, are we blind, too?" (Jn 9:40). The physical blindness of the man bom blind is not due to sin, says Jesus (Jn 9:3), but the spiritual blindness of the Pharisees/Jews does incur guilt (Jn 9:41). Jesus can describe his mission in terms of bringing sight: "For judgment I have come into this world that those who do not see might see and those who see might become blind" (Jn 9:39). John is critical of faith that is based solely on seeing a miracle or "sign" (Jn 2:23-25; 3:2-3; 4:45-48; 6:26; 7:37). The highest form of faith* is that which does not see and yet believes (Jn 20:29).

In John 9 the theme of sight is interwoven with that of light* (Jn 9:5, 39). The absence of light is another potential cause of blindness. John uses the symbol of light and its opposition to darkness throughout the Gospel (Jn 1:4-13; 3:19-21; 8:12; 9:5; 11:9-10; 12:35-36, 44-46). Jesus is the light of the world, but many people refuse to see and thus choose to walk in darkness: "I have come as light into the world that whoever believes in me may not remain in darkness" (Jn 12:46). For John, as for Mark, seeing is a metaphor for faith or salvation.

Matthew and Luke do not make as much clear symbolic use of Jesus' healings of the blind, although such miracles are undoubtedly understood to point beyond the physical dimension. Both Evangelists see Jesus' healing of the blind and deaf as part of the messianic expectation (Mt 11:1-4 par. Lk 7:18-23; Lk 4:16-21). Luke makes use of the OT theme of blindness/deafness as hardness of heart. Spiritual understanding may be hidden from the eyes (Lk 9:45; 18:34; 19:42; 24:16), but at the end of the Gospel the risen Jesus opens the eyes and minds of the disciples (Lk 24:31, 45) to understand the Scriptures. Luke, unlike John and Mark, emphasizes literal seeing of Jesus' miracles as the proper beginning of faith.

Matthew's most significant figurative use of the term blind is in his vilification of the scribes* and Pharisees (Mt 15:14 and Mt 23) for misconstruing the Law* and true righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness). Blind is used with hypocrite as an indication of the ethical disposition of the Jewish leaders. Other sayings in the Synoptic Gospels also indicate that the eye is involved in moral matters (Mt 5:29 and 18:9 par. Mk 9:47; Mt 6:22-23 par. Lk 11:34-36; Mt 7:3-5 par. Lk 6:41-42; Mt 20:15, literally translated: "Is your eye evil because I am good?"). Only the pure in heart see God (Mt 5:8).

2. Deafness.

Hearing as a spiritual activity is emphasized in the Synoptic Gospels by means of the parable* of the sower and its interpretation (Mk 4; Mt 13; Lk 8). The parable of the sower is the key to all parables. All three Synoptic writers use Isaiah 6:9-10 to explain why Jesus' teaching was not accepted (Mt 13:14-15; Mk 4:10-12; Lk 8:10; cf. Acts 28:26-27). John uses the same OT text with respect to signs rather than parables (Jn 12:40). The efficacy of the parables depends on the nature of the hearers. Jesus often calls upon his hearers to listen carefully: "The one who has ears to hear, let them hear" (Mt 11:15; 13:9, 43 par. Mk 4:9, 23 and Lk 8:8) and other similar injunctions (Mt 15:10; Mk 4:24; 7:14; Lk 6:27; 9:44). Matthew and Luke (following Q*) record the parable of those who hear and do Jesus' words. They are like a house built on a rock. And Luke's Jesus blesses the one who obeys God's word over the one who gave him birth (Lk 11:28).

There is no mention of deafness in John's Gospel, but there are people who do not hear. Verbs of hearing are important and, like verbs of seeing, are often coupled with the idea of "believing" and "living" (Jn 5:24-25; 8:47; 10:27; 12:47; 14:24; 15:3; 18:37). For John, Jesus is the incarnate Logos* The term logos has a range of meaning but can be used in a special sense as revelation of eternal truth to be accepted, a command to be obeyed. Human beings are created by the Logos, meaning that they have the potential to respond to God's word, but in fact they often fail to do so—they are deaf. The word, like the light, has life-giving power (Jn 6:63). Jesus not only speaks the words of life, he is the Word.

See also Hardness of Heart; Light.

BREAD

In biblical times bread was the staple food, a synonym for food itself and even the symbol for that which in any way might sustain physical life* (Deut 8:3). Paradoxically, the ordinariness of bread is the basis of its extraordinary importance in the Gospels. There was little change in the way it was made down to the time of Jesus. Bread was made from the flour of ground wheat or barley. The flour was mixed with salt and water and the dough baked in an oven or on a metal griddle in a leavened or unleavened state. The loaves were of varying shapes and sizes, sometimes flat and round or in the shape of a modern rectangular loaf. The barley loaves (Jn 6:9) were of a lesser quality and were the food of the poor.

1. Terminology
2. The Markan Material and Its Redaction
3. The Q Material
5. The Johannine Material

1. Terminology.

Bread is denoted by a single Hebrew word (lehem) and Greek equivalent (artos). Artos is used twenty-one times each in Mark and Matthew, fifteen times in Luke, twenty-four times in John and ninety-seven times in the NT. Because artos can mean food generally we note also the use of trophe four times in Matthew, once in Luke and John and sixteen times in the NT; brōma once each in Matthew and Mark, twice in Luke, once in John and seventeen times in the NT; and brōsis twice in Matthew, four times in John and eleven times in the NT. Certain other words are associated with artos in particular contexts. The showbread (shewbread), hoi artoi tes protheseōs, is mentioned in Mark 2:26 (par. Mt 12:4 and Lk 6:4) and in Hebrews 9:2. Twelve loaves of unleavened bread made from fine flour were placed on a table in the holy place arranged in two rows. They were a perpetual offering, replaced each Sabbath* when the old loaves were eaten by the priests.* Jesus refers to David who, when he and those with him were hungry, entered the Temple* and ate the showbread which only the priests should eat, thereby illustrating that necessity takes precedence over Sabbath law on the assumption that Sabbath law is of the same order as laws pertaining to the disposal of the showbread (Mk 2:23-28; set Abiathar).

The Feast* of the Unleavened Bread (azuma) is mentioned in Mark 14:1 (par. Lk 22:1) and Mark 14:12 (par. Mt 26:17 and Lk 22:7). The Passover, the first of the seven days of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, falls on the fifteenth day of the month Nisan. Azuma was originally an agricultural festival celebrating the beginning of the harvest. Because of the Exodus it was combined with Passover. Unleavened bread then signified the bread made and eaten in haste. Luke 22:1 states the relation of Passover and azuma imprecisely as if one were the name of the other. In the Synoptics the approach of Passover heralds the passion of Jesus. Unleavened bread was used in ritual because leaven was viewed as a form of corruption inappropriate for holy use.

Manna is not strictly bread. From the time of Josephus* (Ant. 3.1.6) it has seemed certain that the manna provided for the people of Israel during the Exodus was the sap sucked by a scale insect from the tamarisk during the rainy season and dropped in small balls on the ground. This manna sustained the Israelites in the desert and was called "bread from heaven" (Ps 78:24; Jn 6:31, 49, 58) because it was viewed as the gift of divine providence where no natural food was to be found. What was at first intended to indicate simply the divine provision of food came to signify a new kind of bread, heavenly bread.

2. The Markan Material and Its Redaction.

From Mark comes the reference to the showbread (Mk 2:26 par. Mt 12:4 and Lk 6:4). Mark alone mentions the press of the crowd (see People, Crowd) so that Jesus and his disciples were not able to eat bread (Mk 3:20), perhaps omitted by Matthew and Luke because it says that Jesus (amongst others) was not able to eat bread. At the sending out of the Twelve Jesus lists what they were not to take. In Mark 6:8 and Luke 9:3 bread is listed. Matthew 10:9-10 does not mention bread, though the exclusion of it is implied by Jesus' words, "laborers deserve their keep." Matthew correctly interpreted one element of the reasoning underlying the commission in Mark but omits the sense of travelling light because of the urgency of the task.

Mention of bread occurs in the feeding of the 5,000 (Mk 6:37,38, 41, 44; Mt 14:17, 19; Lk 9:13, 16; Jn 6:5, 7, 9, 11, 13) and the feeding of the 4,000 with the ensuing discussion about the leaven of the Pharisees* (Mk 8:4, 5, 6, 14, 16, 17, 19; Mt 15:33, 34, 36; 16:5, 7, 8, 9, 10). Neither Luke nor John refers to this second feeding, though John's account shares characteristics with both stories in Mark and some aspects of the accounts in Matthew and Luke. All Gospels mention the five loaves, but only John specifies that they were barley loaves, perhaps revealing that the boy who donated his own meal was poor. John accentuates the extent of the miracle* by taking Mark's estimate of 200 denarii of bread (Mk 6:37) and having Philip say that such an amount would not be sufficient.

After the feeding the Gospels (except Luke) describe the miraculous sea crossing. Only in Mark (Mk 6:52) does the narrator (Markan redaction) subsequently comment that the disciples did not understand about the bread. According to Matthew and Mark in feeding the 4,000 Jesus made use of seven loaves. Matthew (Mt 16:5-10) follows Mark (Mk 8:14-19) with the discussion of the leaven of the Pharisees in which Jesus recalls the feedings with five and seven loaves and shows that the disciples* do not understand. Matthew alone takes this opportunity (Mt 16:11-12) to show (through Jesus' explanation) that Jesus was not speaking about bread but the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees, and the disciples did subsequently come to understand. Thus Matthew softens Mark's critical picture of the disciples at this point.

Mark 7:2, 5 and Matthew 15:2 record the question of the Pharisees to Jesus concerning his disciples eating bread (food) with unclean (unwashed; see Clean and Unclean) hands in contravention of the tradition of the elders. Jesus says that they have elevated tradition above the commandment* of God,* keeping the tradition but breaking the commandment. In Mark 7:14-23 Jesus denies that what is eaten defiles a person and the narrator concludes, "Thus he declared all foods (brömata) clean" (Mk 7:19). Mark does not use artos (although it can mean food) because he wants to emphasize the inclusion of foods considered unclean. Matthew does not use this saying. Instead he returns to the issue which introduced the discussion and has Jesus conclude "but to eat with unwashed hands does not defile a person" (Mt 15:20). The treatment suggests that Matthew has not abandoned the dietary laws as Mark has, and that the whole discussion was irrelevant to Luke. This reveals something of the life setting (Sitz im Leben) of each Evangelist

Luke also omits the story of the Syrophoenician woman (Mk 7:24-30 par. Mt 15:21-28). In response to the woman's request that he should heal her daughter Jesus replied, "It is not fitting to take the children's bread and to give it to dogs" (Mk 7:27 par. Mt 15:26). Restoring life through healing* (exorcism) is made comparable to the gift of bread. In Mark Jesus introduces this saying with the words "Allow the children first (proton) to be satisfied," implying there will be a time for others. This is missing from Matthew, who makes the healing of the woman's daughter exceptional by having Jesus stress, "O woman, great is your faith" (Mt 15:28). Luke omitted this story, perhaps because it was not appealing to Gentile readers.

At the final supper (see Last Supper) with his disciples Jesus took bread, spoke the words of blessing, broke the bread and gave it to the disciples (Mk 14:22 par. Mt 26:26 and Lk 22:19). The same order of events occurs in the stories of the feedings (Mk 6:41 par. Mt 14:19 and Lk 9:16 and Jn 6:11; Mk 8:6 par. Mt 15:36) suggesting a eucharistic interpretation of the feeding stories. But the pattern of taking bread, giving thanks, breaking the bread and distributing it to the guests did not originate at the Last Supper. Rather, Jesus followed customary Jewish practice attested in the early rabbinic period (see Table Fellowship). As the acting head of the house Jesus took the bread and pronounced the blessing, "Blessed art thou, Lord our God, King of the universe, who brings forth bread from the earth." We are reminded that the grain harvest in Israel was precarious, depending on the rain, dependent on God. The verb used to denote the blessing* is either eulogeō (Mk 6:41 par. Mt 15:35 and Lk 9:16; Mk 14:22 par. Mt 26:26; Lk 24:30) or eucha-ristēō (Mk 8:6 par. Mt 15:36; Lk 22:19; Jn 6:11), which are used here without difference of meaning. What distinguishes the Last Supper from the feeding stories are the words which identified the bread with Jesus' body and the wine* with his blood (Mk 14:22-24).
3. The Q Material.

Mark narrates the story of the temptations of Jesus (see Temptation of Jesus) but does not describe them. In Matthew and Luke (see Q) the second and third temptations are in a different order, but the first temptation concerns turning stones to bread. This ordering of bread first highlights its importance. The words of the tempter (see Demon, Devil, Satan) vary slightly in Matthew (Mt 4:3) and Luke (Lk 4:3), but the messianic character of the temptation is indicated by the introductory words, "If you are son of God . . ." (see Son of God). It was expected that the Messiah (see Christ) would provide bread, just as Moses* had provided manna (see Barrett 288-89 for references). Later, Jesus did provide bread for the crowds that followed him. Here the temptation was to provide bread to satisfy his own physical need. The temptation was to elevate bread to the order of a first priority and make the provision of bread a characteristic of his messiah-ship. That Jesus refused to do this shows a different set of priorities. In both Matthew 4:4 and Luke 4:4 Jesus used the words of Deuteronomy 8:3, "one does not live by bread alone," though only Matthew continues, "but by every word proceeding from the mouth of God." Luke presupposes these words, so he is unlikely to have omitted them and we may suppose that they were added by Matthew. There was more to life than sheer physical survival; life is more than food (Mt 6:25 par. Lk 12:23). Alternatively, by using bread as a symbol for what sustains spiritual/eternal life, a similar point is made (Jn 6:27).

Recognition that there is more to life than bread did not lead to the devaluation of bread. In the prayer* Jesus taught his disciples bread is not the first order of priority. This is reserved for the will of God. Bread came next, "Give us today our daily bread" (Mt 6:11 par. Lk 11:3), even before the petition for forgiveness.* Because the word translated "daily" (eipousios) is unknown elsewhere in the NT, LXX and secular Greek until a single and uncertain use in a fifth century AD. papyrus, the linguistic basis for the translation is uncertain. On the basis of a similar expression (eipousia hèmera) in Acts 7:26, it is argued that the meaning is "bread for tomorrow." J. Jeremias understands it in terms of the tomorrow of eschatolog-ical (see Eschatology) fulfillment when Jesus and his disciples will banquet in the kingdom of God (Mt 26:29; Lk 22:30; see Kingdom of God). But the use of this expression in Proverbs 27:1 shows that the meaning can be the coming day which, from the perspective of the morning, is today. Certainly Matthew did not interpret arton ... epiousion as bread for tomorrow, given the fact that in Matthew 6:34 Jesus says, "Do not be anxious for tomorrow..." But this saying does not come from Q and cannot be used to settle the question of the meaning of arton . . . epiousion there. Ori-gen's suggestion that the phrase should be understood as if it were written ept ten ousian, only shows that it was an unusual expression for which he sought a congenial meaning, "the bread necessary for existence." The daily prayer for daily bread is assumed by K G. Kuhn, who argues that the otherwise unknown expression brings out the underlying Aramaic meaning. While this argument is not essential, it fits well with the view that the prayer is consistent with the rules regarding the gathering of the manna sufficient only for daily needs. If this is correct Matthew 6:34 fits well with the petition in the prayer.

Continuing the theme of petition is the saying of Matthew 7:9 (par. Lk 11:11): "Which one among you if his son asks bread of him shall give him a stone?" The question presupposes that no father would do such a thing. No less can be expected of God (Mt 7:11 par. Lk 11:13). In a context where Matthew and Luke have the same material in the same order and wording there is strong textual evidence for some differences between Matthew 7:9 and Luke 11:11. Very likely the original text of Luke did not mention bread. Luke might have made this change because he had already used the request for bread in 11:5.

4. Luke's Special Material.

Luke records the parable* of the friend who comes at midnight requesting three loaves of bread (Lk 11:5). Even if the householder is unwilling to be disturbed for the sake of a friend, he will respond to need and persistence, thus illustrating the theme of persistence in prayer. Luke 14:1 tells that Jesus was going to "eat bread" on the Sabbath with a ruler who was a Pharisee. "To eat bread" is an idiom for "to have a meal." The same is true in Luke's parable of the great banquet where Jesus pronounced a blessing on those who would "eat bread in the kingdom of God" (Lk 14:15). In the parable where the lost son acknowledged that his father's hired servants "had bread enough and to spare" (Lk 15:17), bread has the general sense of food.

Finally, Luke alone describes the meeting of the risen Jesus with two disciples on the road to Emmaus. At the end of the day Jesus joined the disciples for a meal, and they recognized him when he took the bread, gave thanks, broke it and gave it to them (Lk 24:30). Later it is said that "he was made known to them in the breaking of bread" (Lk 24:35). These actions in themselves are characteristically Jewish, but Luke intends the reader to perceive in them a reflection of the Last Supper leading to the recognition of Jesus.

5. The Johannine Material.

John also narrates the feeding of the five thousand with the five loaves and two fishes. John extends this episode by having the crowd follow Jesus the next day, seeking and finding him. The dialog between Jesus and the crowd leads to a monolog in which Jesus addressed first the Jews, then the mass of disciples and finally the Twelve. The traditional material is developed in terms of the quest for the Messiah. The crowd followed Jesus into the desert because they sought him as a messianic deliverer. The giving of bread in the desert was taken as confirmation, but Jesus' withdrawal demonstrated his rejection of the quest to make him king (Jn 6:14-15). The next day the crowd came again seeking and finding him in a way that at first suggests a successful quest (Jn 6:22, 25-26). Jesus now turned the discussion to the bread which gives eternal life (see Life), the bread which God gives, the bread from heaven (6:23, 26, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 41, 48, 50, 51, 58). Artos is used of food and is interchanged with brōsis (6:27, 55; not brōma as in Jn 4:34) because of the phrase "food and drink" (brōsis and posis) in 6:51-58 where Jesus confronts the Jews with the scandal of his death in terms of his body and blood.

The discussion has turned from the quest for the Messiah to the quest for life, eternal life. This involved the contrast between ordinary physical life which is sustained by loaves of bread, and eternal life understood as a new quality and purpose of life and a life beyond death which is sustained by Jesus, not the Law of Moses.* In this discussion the manna is called the bread from heaven by the crowd for whom it has become a symbol for the Law (6:31, 49, 58 and see Borgen). When Jesus identified himself as the bread of life he claimed that he, rather than the Law, was the source of eternal life. This argument reflects the conflict with the synagogue* which led to the stress on the necessity of eating the true bread (Jesus' body) and drinking his blood, the true drink. Through the use of bread as a symbol John has focussed first on the saving efficacy of belief in Jesus and then drawn out the saving efficacy of his death (see Death of Jesus). Only those who come to believe in him and his saving death find the fulfillment of their quest for life.

John also depicts the meal Jesus shared with his disciples on the night that he was betrayed. In the place of the institution of the Last Supper he describes the washing of the disciples' feet as an acted parable of the service Jesus performs for them. At the supper Jesus spoke of Judas* (who was to betray him) quoting Psalm 41:9, "The one who eats my bread lifted up his heel against me" (Jn 13:18) and drawing attention to the betrayal as an act of treachery.

In the context of the final meal (Jn 21:9-13) Jesus provided bread and fish. The disciples, at Jesus' direction, made a catch of fish, but when they arrived ashore Jesus already had bread and fish prepared for breakfast. It may be that the reader is intended to recall the bread and fish of John 6, "Jesus took the bread and gave it to them, and likewise the fish." Only the reference to giving thanks is missing, but the disciples already knew that it was the Lord (Jn 21:7, 12). This feeding story confirms that the disciples' quest for life has been fulfilled. Bread and fish, not bread and wine, constitute this meal of fulfillment in the quest for life. In Johannine terms water is the comparable drink to symbolize the satisfaction of the thirst for life (Jn 4:13-15; 7:37-39).

See also Life; Table Fellowship; Water; Wlne.

J. Painter

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM

The word bride (Gk nymphē) occurs three times in the Gospels, or four if the variant reading of Matthew 25:1 is accepted, and bridgroom (Gk nymphios) occurs eleven times. Both words occur elsewhere in the NT only in Revelation; nymhe four times (Rev 18:23; 21:2, 9; 22:17) and nymphios once (Rev 18:23). Allowing for parallels in the Gospels and the occurrence of both words in the one pericope, the actual number of passages in which the words occur is five, of which only four call for any comment. The fifth is a passing reference to the bridegroom in John 2:9 (see below).

In Matthew 10:35 and its parallel in Luke 12:53, Jesus speaks of the divisive effect that his coming will have on human society and on families in particular, such that a father will be divided against his son and a son against his father, etc. In this context nymphe is set over against penthera, "mother-in-law" and clearly has the sense of "daughter-in-law." This reflects the distinctively Jewish use of the word. Generally, from Homeric times, nymphe simply meant "bride" or "young wife" and nymphios, correspondingly, "bridegroom" or "young husband." But in Jewish use from the time of LXX the words acquired the additional meaning "daughter-in-law" and "son-in-law" respectively (e.g., nympe LXX Gen 11:31; 38:11, 13, 16, 24; 1 Kings 4:19; nymphios LXX Judges 15:6; 2 Esdras 23:28). This extension of meaning was brought about by Semitic usage, for the Hebrew kalâh (Aram kalthâ) means both bride and (predominantly) daughter-in-law and the Hebrew hâtân (Aram hatnâ) both bridegroom and son-in-law (see Languages of Palestine).

1. Rejoicing at the Bridegroom's Voice.
2. The Arrival of the Bridegroom.

1. Rejoicing at the Bridegroom's Voice.

The only other unquestioned occurrence of nympe (but see below) is in material attributed to John the Baptist* in John 3:29: "He who has the bride is the bridegroom; the friend of the bridegroom (ho philos tou nymphiou), who stands and hears him, rejoices greatly at the bridegroom's voice; therefore this joy of mine is now full." John was expressing his own perception of how he stood in relation to Jesus, whom he had identified as the Christ.* The latter was the central figure in God's saving work (cf. Jn 1:29), as the bridegroom is central to a wedding. John's own role, like the friend of the bridegroom, was ancillary and meaningless without the other (cf. Jn 1:23). Nevertheless, if the wedding metaphor can be pressed, that role was an important one.

At a Jewish wedding the bridegroom was attended by his friends, whom Jesus in his parable* described as "the sons of the bridechamber" (RSV "wedding guests," Mk 2:19 par. Mt 9:15; Lk 5:34), and by one friend in particular, "the friend of the bridegroom," the best man (the expression "best man" actually occurs in Judg 14:20). The friend of the bridegroom had an important role which he sometimes performed before the wedding in the betrothal (cf. 2 Cor 11:2; in Exod Rab. 46.1 on 34:1 the marriage agreement, drawn up at the betrothal, was committed into the hands of the best man) and certainly at the wedding. On the eve of that day (Mt 25:1-13, though unsupported elsewhere, indicates it was after sunset, hence the need for the lights) the two bridal parties assembled, the bridegroom's under the direction of the friend of the bridegroom who acted throughout as master of ceremonies. Thus attended, the bridegroom fetched his betrothed from her father's house where she was waiting with her bridal party. They then proceeded together to the house, usually the bridegroom's, where the wedding feast was to be held, the bride on her arrival retiring to her own chamber.

The next day was marked by celebration and toward the end of that day a meal, in the course of which the marriage was contracted. The celebration might continue after this for a week or more (cf. Judg 14:12; Tob 8:20 and Jn 2:1-11 for the strain this must sometimes have put on the family's resources), but on that night the couple retired together to the bridal chamber to consummate their marriage, superintended by the friend of the bridegroom. Hence "the bridegroom's voice" of John 3:29 is probably the call of the bridegroom for the best man to collect the Signum virginitatis (blood-stained cloth, a sign of the woman's virginity), a practice reflecting the provision of Deuteronomy 22:13-21 (cf. Mt 1:19 for Joseph's refusal to act according to this law). We have, then, in John 3:29 a metaphor drawn from a common incident from the life of that time to express the Baptist's unselfish joy in the coming of Jesus and the latter's ascendancy over him.

But is there more to it than that and does the metaphor merge into allegory? That is, should we see here a deliberate identification of Jesus with the bridegroom and regard "bridegroom" as effectively a title of Jesus? In recording this incident this is probably how the Evangelist understood it, with the church as the bride of Christ according to the Christian development reflected in 2 Corinthians 11:2 and Ephesians 5:25 and the passages from Revelation cited above. But (assuming that we have here an authentic tradition) we should not suppose that the Baptist had gone so far down this track as these later writers. On the other hand, he could hardly have been unaware that in the OT Israel* is regarded as the bride of God (Is 54:5; 62:4-5; Jer 2:2; 3:20; Ezek 16:8; Hos 2:19-20; see Stauffer, 654 for the development of this idea in later Judaism). It is difficult, then, to avoid the conclusion that this not only suggested to him the metaphor, but that it became for him a means of testifying "that God himself was in Christ betrothing his bride to himself afresh" (Murray). Nowhere else, either in the OT or in the later literature to the time of Jesus, is the Messiah represented as the bridegroom (see Jeremias, 1101-1102). If the Baptist did so, it would be a mark of his originality, and Jesus' own use of the imagery may have been influenced by him.

2. The Arrival of the Bridegroom.

Matthew 25:1-13, the parable of the ten virgins, reflects the ritual of the marriage eve as outlined above. At what precise point in that ritual the story comes in depends on which reading of the text is preferred. The betterattested reading has the bridesmaids going out simply "to meet the bridegroom," but some reputable texts add ". . . and the bride." The latter would imply that the ten had gone from the bridegroom's house or that of his parents to meet the couple, the former that they had gone from the bride's house to meet the bridegroom who had come with his attendants to fetch her. In terms of the logic of the imagery, the shorter reading makes the best sense, as the bridesmaids are more likely to have been with the bride and to have gone out from her to meet the bridegroom than to have been waiting somewhere else for them both. The shorter reading is also consistent with the absence of any mention of the bride in the remainder of the parable (cf. w. 5-6). However, the longer text has been defended on the grounds that the words "and the bride" were probably omitted by a copyist because they were felt to be incompatible with the widely held view that Christ, the bridegroom, would come to fetch his bride, the church, and not make his entry with her. But it is doubtful whether a copyist would have been so sensitive to the logic of the allegory. The shorter text should be accepted.

It is still a question whether Jesus intended the parable as an allegory of the bridegroom. Many argue that he did not Thus Jeremias identifies a number of editorial additions, most notably verse 13, which he believes has been borrowed from Mark 13:35 and changes the focus of the parable. It is not about maintaining a watch—all ten of the virgins slept!—but about being prepared. It is not, then, primarily concerned with the Parousia, but with the present Jeremias concludes, "that Matthew 25:1-13 is not an allegory of the heavenly bridegroom, but that Jesus was telling a story about an actual wedding, or rather what immediately preceded the beginning of an actual wedding feast" as an illustration of the importance of the present (the time in which to prepare) "in view of the imminent eschatological crisis" (Jeremias, 1963, 42).

There is some force in this argument. Unquestionably the focus of the parable is on being prepared. But, for all that, we should not be in too great a hurry to dismiss verse 13 as redactional or the possibility that in making his point Jesus also intended his hearers to identify the crisis with his own coming as the heavenly bridegroom. We have already noticed that the OT and later Judaism* provided a background to this idea, as indeed did other teaching of Jesus when he represented the kingdom of God* as a marriage feast and in one instance specifically as the marriage feast of the king's son (Mt 22:1-10). In short, there appears to be no compelling argument that Jesus did not think of himself as the bridegroom and good reason to think that he did.

So also with the parable in Mark 2:19-20 (par. Mt 9:15; Lk 5:34-35). To the accusing question why his disciples* did not fast (see Fasting), Jesus replied with the counter-question "Can the wedding guests fast while the bridegroom is with them? As long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast" On the assumption that Jesus would not have confessed his messiahship in this way at this time, the second clause has been interpreted as simply a paraphrase for "the wedding," in which case the counter-question is a genuine metaphor and perhaps even a secular proverb: "Can one weep at a wedding?" to which the implied answer is no! So then, the disciples could not be expected to fast now that the kingdom of God had come.

On this understanding, the choice of metaphor is due simply to the common comparison of the kingdom with a wedding, and it is only a metaphor. But this means that the following verse must be dismissed as a gloss, for there can be no question that the reference in verse 20 is to Jesus as the bridegroom and to his passion (see Death of Jesus): "The day will come," he declared, "when the bridegroom is taken away from them, and then they will fast in that day." It is better, however, to accept this verse as authentic, recognizing that a good case can be made for Jesus' having been aware of what lay before him and that from time to time he did make veiled allusions to his passion (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). Furthermore, there is the likelihood that he did identify himself with the bridegroom and that, to that extent, these parables were allegorical, although the full development of the allegory with the church as the bride of Christ had to await a later day.

D.J. Williams

BURIAL OF JESUS

The burial of Jesus, an integral component of the earliest kerygma (cf. 1 Cor 15:3-5; Acts 13:26-31), is narrated in all four canonical Gospels (Mt 27:57-61; Mk 15:42-47; Lk 23:50-56; Jn 19:38-42) and in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter 6:23-24 (see Gospels [Apocryphal]). Whether a primitive passion narrative (see Passion Narrative) included a burial account (Pesch) or such an account was appended to the passion story when it was joined to resurrection* and appearance stories (Green, 311-13) is debated. What is clear is that in its present forms, the burial story serves a transitional function—confirming the death of Jesus (see especially Mk 15:44-45; Jn 19:33) and preparing for the empty-tomb episode and resurrection* announcement.

1. Funerary Customs in Antiquity
2. The Growth of the Tradition
3. The Burial Site

1. Funerary Customs in Antiquity.

In order to ascertain more fully the significance of the reports of Jesus' burial in our Gospels it is necessary to set those accounts in historical context In this case two streams of tradition have particular relevance— Roman and Jewish—and, given the character of Jesus' demise, it is especially important that we reflect on attitudes toward the burial of executed criminals.

1.1. Roman Funerary Practice. Funerary rites appropriate to persons of the Roman Empire were determined by one's status in society. For most persons, including both the poor and ordinary people of some means, the corpse was prepared for a period of lying-in-state by washing and anointing* (cf. Acts 9:37). From 400 B.C. into the first century AD, cremation followed, though inhumation increased in popularity after the turn of the era to become the common practice in the second century AD. For all persons burial was the norm, even if in extraordinary circumstances it might consist only of the perfunctory throwing of a little soil on the deceased. Indeed, it was thought that "... to leave a corpse unburied had unpleasant repercussions on the fate of the departed soul" (Toynbee, 43).

Against this backdrop the Roman habit of refusing burial to executed criminals is all the more significant. Speaking of the decision of Pomponius Labeo to commit suicide rather than face trial (AD. mid-30s), Tacitus notes that a person legally condemned forfeited his estate and was debarred from burial (Ann. 6.29). Victims of crucifixion remained on their crosses as a matter of course, left to carrion birds as a continuing deterrent against crimes against the state. On the other hand, Philo reports cases, particularly on the eve of festive occasions, when the crucified were removed and given to their relatives for burial (Flau. 10.83-84).

1.2. Jewish Funerary Practice. The value of proper interment in Jewish tradition is witnessed in many quarters. It is implicit in the prominence given reports of burial in the OT narratives (e.g., Gen 23; 49:29-33; 50:25-26). To be refused burial, to be left exposed as refuse for birds and beasts—this fate is understood as a divine curse (e.g., Deut 28:26; Jer 8:1-2; 16:1-4; Ezek 29:5). Furthermore, Josephus observes that among his people the obligation to share is realized in part by not leaving a corpse unburied (Ag. Ap. 2.29 §211; cf. Tob 1:16-2:10).

In contrast to the Romans the Jewish custom of burying all the dead included extending funerary rites to the executed, even those sentenced to crucifixion, apparently in response to Deuteronomy 21:22-23: "When someone is convicted of a crime punishable by death and is executed, and you hang him on a tree, his corpse must not remain all night upon the tree; you shall bury him that same day, for anyone hung on a tree is under God's curse" (NRSV; cf. Josephus, J. W. 3.8.5 §377; 4.5.2. §317). However, funeral rites extended to criminals were qualitatively different from normal practice. Criminals, as Josephus* puts it with reference to Achan (Josh 7:25-26), were given the ignominious burial proper to the condemned (Ant. 5.1.14 §44; cf. 4.8.6 §202). In practical terms this meant (at least) that executed criminals were denied burial in their family tombs (e.g., 1 Kings 13:21-22; Jer 26:23).

L. Y. Rahmani has gathered evidence, which he dates to the period prior to AD. 70, that after the flesh of the executed had wasted away the bones were gathered and buried in the family tomb (cf. m. Sank 6:5-6; t. Sanh. 9:8). His dating of the practice in the first half of the first century AD. is consistent with the discovery of the bones of one Jehohanan, a victim of crucifixion from the same period, in an ossuary at Giv'at ha-Mivtar. He had been twice buried.

In fact, the practice of both primary and secondary burial in this period is well attested (Rahmani; Meyers; Hachlili) and can be set within the context of what little we know of first-century Jewish burial customs. When death occurred the eyes of the deceased were closed, the mouth bound up, the corpse washed (cf. Gos. Pet. 6:24) and anointed (m. Sanh. 13:5)—perhaps both at the place of death (cf. Jn 19:40) or at the home of the deceased and again at the tomb (cf. Mk 16:1). The warm climate dictated a speedy burial, with the use of spices necessary to counter the stench of decomposition. For the same reason the body might be laid on sand or salt. The deceased were buried in their own clothes or in specially prepared wraps (cf. Mk 15:46; Jn 19:40; Gas. Pet. 6:24). Coffins were used in some cases (cf. Lk 7:14), though it is unclear whether their usage was normal in Jerusalem. When the body was in place, the tomb was closed off by a large rock (the ḡōlēl), held in place by a smaller stone (the dōpēq). After a twelvemonth period of decomposition, the bones were collected and placed in an ossuary. The purpose of this secondary burial seems to have been both psychosocial and theological: to help complete the work of mourning by extending that work to twelve months; and to assure the sinlessness of the deceased by means of the expiation accorded the process of decomposition (Rahmani; Meyers, 91-92).

Of course it was this concern for expiation that was primary in the burial rites of the executed. In the Talmud we read of the criminal: "Both death and [shameful] burial [in the criminals' graveyard] are necessary [for forgiveness], R. Adda b. Ahabah objected: They observe no mourning rites, but grieved for him, for grief is borne only in the heart. But should you think that having been [shamefully] buried, he attains forgiveness, they should observe mourning rites! The decay of the flesh too is necessary [for forgiveness]" (b. Sanh. 47a-47b; cf. also t. Sanh. 9:9; y. Sanh. 6:12). The expiatory effects of decomposition were not restricted to criminals however (m. Mo'ed Qat. 1:5; y. Mo'ed Qat. 1:5; Meyers, 81-82).

1.3. Summary. The few details related by the Evangelists vis-a-vis the pre-burial treatment of Jesus' body are fully consonant with known practices. Two immediate questions arise, however. Although both Roman and Jewish practices allow for Jesus' burial (the former more by concession), one would expect in his case ignominious treatment; is this the case, according to our accounts? Moreover, since Joseph is not depicted as a relative of Jesus, his interest in the body is suspect Not surprisingly, in the development of the narrative tradition of Jesus' burial these two issues have been paramount

2. The Growth of the Tradition.

2.1. Joseph of Arimathea. Although other tradition-historical questions are present (on historical and traditional issues in general, see Blinzler; Broer), the two primary tendencies requiring elucidation are related to the identity of Joseph and the relative honor paid Jesus by the sort of burial he received. As for Joseph, two streams of interpretation are easily discerned. The first has Joseph as a foe, one of the Jews, carrying out the last act of the crime against Jesus. Though Joseph himself is never named as Jesus' enemy, the notion that Jesus' burial was an act of his enemies is embedded in Acts 13:29—"When [the people of Jerusalem and their rulers] had carried out all that was written about him, they took him down from the tree and laid him in a tomb"—and is also attested in John 19:31 (in tension with 19:38) and later in the Gospel of Peter 6:21; Epistula Apostolorum 9a; and Lactantius, Divinae Institutions 4.19.

On the other hand, both Matthew 27:57 ("one discipled by Jesus") and John 19:38 ("who was a disciple of Jesus") portray him in more intimate terms. Throughout Matthew's Gospel a clear distinction is made between Jesus' followers and his detractors, and Matthew's portrayal of Joseph is of a piece with this larger theme. Discipleship* is a major motif of the burial and resurrection narratives (see matheteuō ["to learn as a disciple"]—27:57; 28:19; mathētēs ["disciple"]—27:64; 28:7-8, 13, 16), and Joseph's gracious actions on Jesus' behalf mark him as a disciple. Joseph and Nicodemus appear as secret disciples in John, and it may be that John has presented them thus by way of representing further those who believed but refused to confess their faith publicly "for they loved human praise more than the praise of God" (12:42-43). On the other hand, their actions would have been initiated at no little risk to themselves; Jesus had been executed as an insurrectionist and they might easily have been implicated in treason as well (cf. Sem. 2.11; see Revolutionary Movements). It seems most likely, then, that Jesus' death provided for them the impetus for this more public identification with the Messiah (see Christ).

Mark and Luke are ordinarily taken to provide additional evidence for Joseph's close relationship to Jesus as his disciple,* but the evidence here is more ambiguous than is commonly recognized. It is true that the Second Evangelist describes Joseph as one who was awaiting the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God), but the notation in 12:34 that a friendly scribe* was only "not far from the kingdom" leaves open Joseph's claim to discipleship in Mark. His identification as a member of the Sanhedrin* (note the use of symboulion ["assemble together"] in 15:1 to describe the action of the Sanhedrin, and the parallel use of bouleutēs ["assembly"] in 15:43 to designate the same body) would not suggest his intimacy with Jesus. Indeed, the antagonistic role of the Sanhedrin in the passion story drives to the opposite conclusion. In the end one is left with the conclusion that Joseph undertook his act of service in Mark as an expression of his piety as a Jew, his response to the longstanding Jewish insistence that no corpse be left unburied.

In the same way Luke makes no effort explicitly to identify Joseph as a disciple of Jesus. Like Pilate (see Pontius Pilate), Joseph is exculpated from responsibility for Jesus' execution (23:51). He is further characterized as an exemplary person, representing OT faith at its best—righteous (see Justice, Righteousness) like Zechariah, Elizabeth and Simeon (1:6; 2:25), awaiting the kingdom like Simeon and Anna (2:25, 38). As a rule, Jewish leaders in Luke-Acts are cast as opponents of Jesus and the early community. Joseph is an exception, but not the only one (cf. 8:41-56; 13:31; Acts 5:33-39; 6:7; 15:5).

It is also noteworthy that in all canonical versions of the burial Joseph does not appear to act in concert with the women disciples who witness his work. This fact throws further doubt on whether Joseph was understood to be Jesus' disciple in the earliest tradition.

Joseph, then, was an enigmatic figure, and the tradition has grappled with the question of how to make Joseph's actions understandable to a Christian readership. In the light of the available evidence it seems probable that, historically, his actions were motivated by his response to the Law. As Brown perceives, it is further likely that his service to Jesus was later remembered as "... an honor rendered by one who came to believe that Jesus was the fulfillment of the law" (Brown, 245).

2.2. What Sort of Burial? How could Messiah Jesus receive anything but an honorable, indeed royal, burial? This is a second pressing question shaping the tradition-historical development of the burial account. We have reason to believe from an historical viewpoint that his burial must have been lackluster. It is clear nonetheless that the later Evangelists were unwilling to leave unchanged the rather simple burial story as reported in Mark. Thus Matthew has added to his Markan source that the linen in which Jesus' body was wrapped was clean, the tomb in which he was buried new (27:59-60). Similarly, Luke reports that it was "a tomb wherein no one had yet been laid" (23:53). Both Evangelists thereby underscore the special honor paid Jesus. John, however, far outdistances Matthew and Luke, portraying Jesus' burial as that of a king. Since his arrest Jesus has been presented with greatness and honor, and this theme is continued by the enormous quantity of sweet-smelling spices brought by Nicodemus (cf. 2 Chron 16:14; Josephus, Ant. 17.8.1 §199; Sern. 8:6), his honorable burial according to Jewish custom and the use of a new tomb. Just as the character of Joseph undergoes metamorphosis in the tradition, so the honor shown Jesus by the nature of his burial grows.

2.3. Other Emphases of the Synoptic Evangelists. Matthew alone reports that Joseph is both a disciple and rich (see Rich and Poor). This might seem an oxymoron (cf. 19:21-26), but Matthew appears to be identifying Joseph as a wealthy person exemplary for his willingness to risk himself in costly identification with Jesus. Some see here a further allusion to Jesus' identification as the Isaianic Servant (see Servant of Yahweh), who was "assigned a grave . . . with the rich" (Is 53:9). Matthew is also unique in including an account of the setting of the guard at the tomb (27:62-66), presumably to refute allegations that Jesus' body had been stolen by his followers (cf. Gos. Pet. 8:28—11:49; Craig).

Mark's account continues the major theme of discipleship failure for which his Gospel is noted. In this case the disciples are contrasted with both the faithful women and the disciples of John. The presence of the women is emphasized by their repeated introduction (15:40, 47; 16:1). Their role in the story is clarified by their designation as those who followed and served Jesus (15:41)—the very qualities that mark authentic discipleship (9:35; 10:43). They witness Jesus' death, burial and empty tomb; the apostles,* on the other hand, are conspicuous by their absence. The passion of John the Baptist* (6:14-29) transparently anticipates and parallels that of Jesus (cf. Green, 151). The striking similarities, many of which are linguistic, serve to throw into stark relief one glaring dissimilarity—namely, John's disciples take his body and bury it but Jesus' disciples are nowhere to be seen.

Interestingly, Luke drops any reference to the approaching of Sabbath* at the outset of his story (cf. Mk 15:42). Moreover, he neglects any mention of the purchase of burial materials (cf. Mk 15:46). And he adds the statement "On the sabbath day they rested, according to the commandments" (23:56). Luke thus avoids any suggestion that Joseph or the women engaged in Sabbath-breaking. As at Jesus' birth, so at his burial, the Law is fulfilled (2:21-24).

3. The Burial Site.

The precise location of Jesus' tomb has been the focus of a longstanding debate, with two sites finding most support today. First on the ground floor of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem the traditional tomb is enclosed by a shrine first built in Constantini-an times. So much of the hillside surrounding the tomb has been removed by early masons and pilgrims, however, that very little remains of this site. In the nineteenth century a second site was put forward, now known as Gordon's Calvary, located to the north of the present Old City of Jerusalem. Here one gains a good picture of the sort of tomb Jesus would have been buried in: a forecourt before a cave, the mouth of which could be covered by a large, disk-shaped stone set in a groove cut in the rock beneath it; following this is the entrance to the burial chamber, a stone step and central pit tall enough to allow one to stand erect in the chamber, with stone benches carved into the bedrock on three sides of the chamber for interment (Smith). On the testimony of the Fourth Gospel it is presumed that Jesus would have been buried in a garden in close proximity to Golgotha (Jn 19:41), and this has encouraged support of Gordon's site, situated as it is in a well-tended garden. Other archaeological evidence has cast doubt on this site, however, while reaffirming the correctness of the traditional site of the Holy Sepulchre.

See also Archeology and Geography; Death of Jesus.

J. B. Green
CAESAR AUGUSTUS. See Birth of Jesus; Chronology; Rome; Taxes

CAIAPHAS. See Trial of Jesus.

CANON

In a Christian context the canon is the list of those writings which are acknowledged by the church* as documents of the divine revelation. More generally the word has come to mean the list of writings comprised in the sacred scriptures of any religious body. The Creek word kanōn ("rule") was probably borrowed from the Phoenician equivalent of Hebrew qāneh ("reed," "rod"). From its primary sense, "rod," it came to be used of a measuring rod or rule, and then of the series of graduated marks on a measuring rod, indicating units of length. From the sense of "series" was derived the meaning "list." The use of the word to denote the list of biblical books is first attested in Athanasius (A.D. 367). Before that, "canon" had already been used in the church for the "rule" of faith, the standard by which the adequacy or inadequacy of statements of Christian belief was assessed.

Strictly speaking, one should use the term canon only with reference to a closed list of authoritative writings, "to which nothing may be added and from which nothing may be taken away" (a recurring expression) but one may speak of an incipient canon or a canon in process of formation.

1. The OT Canon in the Gospels
2. Gospel Origins
3. The Fourfold Gospel
4. The Gospels in the Second Century
5. The Gospels in the NT Canon
6. Canon Criticism
1. The OT Canon in the Gospels.

While the relation of the Gospels to the NT canon is of paramount importance, the Gospels themselves bear witness to an already existing canon of Holy Scripture. All four of them not only presuppose the divine authority of the OT writings but claim that those writings were uniquely "fulfilled" in the gospel events (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology).

Mark begins by telling how John the Baptist* came "as it is written in the prophet Isaiah" (Mk 1:2) and describes toward the end how Jesus submitted to his captors with the words: "Let the Scriptures be fulfilled" (Mk 14:49). Matthew, who generally reproduces Mark's emphasis in this regard, adds his own introductory formula twelve times: "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet" (Mt 1:22, etc., with variations). Luke's nativity narrative (see Birth of Jesus) is full of OT echoes, and in his resurrection* account he tells how Jesus reminded the twelve disciples* of his earlier insistence "that everything must be fulfilled which was written concerning me in the Law,* the Prophets and the Psalms," special emphasis being laid on the necessity "that the Christ should suffer and on the third day rise from the dead, and that repentance* and forgiveness* of sins should be proclaimed in his name to all the nations . . ." (Lk 24:44-48). John remarks repeatedly that Jesus' fulfillment of OT prophecy was not really understood by his disciples until after his resurrection; he tells moreover how Jesus on the cross ensured that every last prophecy of his passion* should be fulfilled (Jn 19:28-30).

The OT writings are referred to as "the Scriptures," sometimes as "the Law and the Prophets" (Mt 22:40) or "Moses* and the Prophets" (Lk 16:29), once as "the Law, the Prophets and the Psalms" (Lk 24:44). This last formula, whether it comes from Luke or from Jesus, could denote the traditional threefold division of the Hebrew Bible (the Psalms standing for the "Writings" as a whole, at the head of which they stand), but it need not

In the traditional division of the Hebrew Bible (Law, Prophets, Writings), the Law comprised the five books of Moses; the Prophets comprised the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the Twelve so-called Minor Prophets); the Writings comprised Psalms, Proverbs, Job, followed by the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther (a group designated the five Megilloth, or "scrolls"), and lastly Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles. This arrangement yielded a total of twenty-four books.

In the last decade of the first century, Josephus* followed a different arrangement and achieved a total of twenty-two books (corresponding to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet). He probably reckoned Ruth as an appendix to Judges and Lamentations as an appendix to Jeremiah (Ag. Ap. 1.38-41).

What were the limits of "the Scriptures" acknowledged by Jesus and his disciples? That they included the Law and the Prophets (both former and latter) is clear. They also included the Psalms and some at least of the other Writings. Daniel is referred to in Matthew 24:15 as "Daniel the prophet" (as he is also in the Qumran text 4QFlor 2.3).

Whether or not the corpus of Hebrew Scripture had been formally "closed" by Jesus' time cannot be proved, and it is not of prime importance to the student of the Gospels. One piece of evidence suggests that the Bible known to Jesus ended, as the Hebrew Bible traditionally does, with Chronicles. This is his reference to the roll of martyrs as beginning with Abel, whose murder is related in Genesis 4:8, and ending with Zechariah, who is most probably Zecha-riah the son of Jehoiada, stoned to death in the Temple court according to 2 Chronicles 24:24. This saying occurs in both Luke 11:50-51, and Matthew 23:35—even if Matthew calls Zechariah "the son of Berechiah" (cf. Zech 1:1)—so it is earlier than either of these Gospels, being assignable to the Q* material. There is no good reason to doubt that it is an authentic utterance of Jesus, whatever its implications may be for the limits of the canon in his day.

There is no clear evidence in the Gospels of a work outside the Hebrew Bible as we know it being quoted as authoritative. In Luke 11:49 the quotation introduced by the words "Therefore thus says the Wisdom of God" has been thought to come from a wisdom or apocalyptic writing, but its source must remain a matter of speculation. It is possible that the wording of Matthew may here and there (e.g., Mt 19:28; 24:31) reflect that of the Parables of Enoch (1 Enoch 37-71); but there is no evidence that Jesus himself knew any of the Enoch literature, and it is totally improbable that he was in any way indebted to it

The Christian church started off, then, with a body of sacred writings, known to us as the canon of the OT. But these sacred writings, vested with supreme authority in the primitive church, were the Scriptures as interpreted and fulfilled by Jesus. It avails nothing to possess a sacred book if one cannot understand it. But the early Christians believed that the key to its understanding had been put into their hands: they could understand it as people of an earlier generation could not. Even the prophets, they held, did not immediately comprehend their own oracles: they "searched and enquired" in their endeavor to ascertain "what person or time was indicated by the Spirit of Christ within them when he testified in advance about the sufferings which lay in store for Christ and the glories that were to follow these things" (1 Pet 1:10,11). But those who lived in the age of fulfillment had no need to "search and enquire," for they knew: the person was Jesus; the time was now.

The key could not be inferior in authority to the lock which it fitted: the record of Jesus' records and deeds stood from the beginning on the same level as the record of God's mighty acts of earlier days and of his speaking through the prophets. Indeed, Jesus and the message of life proclaimed in his name were found to be the sum and substance of the OT revelation.

So long as eyewitnesses remained alive to bear witness to what they had seen and heard, the need for a written record of their testimony was perhaps not greatly felt; but as the first Christian generation came to an end the first Gospel* writings began to appear and soon circulated among the churches. Our canonical Gospels* probably belong to the period c. A.D. 65-100. At first each of them will have had a limited circulation in its own locality. Mark's Gospel may well have been produced in Rome* for the strengthening of Christians there, who were in a state of shock after the suddenness and ferocity of the Neronian persecution. But not long after its appearance in Rome a copy appears to have been taken to Alexandria and gladly accepted by the church of that city (this possibly lies behind the tradition which associates John Mark with the inception of Alexandrian Christianity). In Anti-och, at the end of the first Christian century and beginning of the second, Matthew seems to have been known as "the gospel": This is indicated by references in Ignatius and the Didache.

But with free communication among the churches, those in one area soon became aware of Gospel writings cherished by churches elsewhere, and they found their store of knowledge enriched as they read those others in addition to the one they originally knew. So, probably quite early in the second century, the fourfold Gospel began to circulate among the churches in place of a single Gospel writing.

3. The Fourfold Gospel.

Why should there be a fourfold Gospel and not a single one? The fact was that (in the providence of God, a Christian might say) there were four Gospel writings in circulation early in the second century, each of them acknowledged by its readers as carrying apostolic authority (which need not imply apostolic authorship) and no one of them (certainly not Marcion's edition of Luke; see 4.1) worthy to be preferred over the others by the churches. The Gospel writings which explicitly (and falsely) claim apostolic authorship did not begin to appear until after mid-century (see Gospels [Apocryphal]). The idea of a unified Gospel writing might have seemed superficially attractive, but when such a work was produced (see 4.2) its inadequacies were apparent. The circulation of the fourfold Gospel was evidently facilitated by the early Christian adoption of the codex form of book in preference to the scroll. It would not have been convenient to have the fourfold Gospel written on one scroll, but it could easily be accommodated in a single codex. It is not certain that Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia early in the second century, knew a Gospel collection. He certainly knew three of the canonical Gospels, and it may be purely accidental that his knowledge of all four is not now attested. According to fragments of his work preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15, 16), he claims the authority of one whom he calls "the elder" for the statement that Mark wrote down what he remembered of Peter's preaching, and adds (possibly, but not explicitly, on the same authority) that Matthew compiled the oracles of the Lord "in the Hebrew speech" and that everyone translated his work as best he could. According to the so-called anti-Marcionite prolog to the Fourth Gospel, he said that John produced his Gospel "while still in the body."

The fourfold Gospel, in fact, is one of two Christian collections which began to circulate among the churches in the first half of the second century, the other being the corpus of Pauline letters. When the four Gospel writings were collected into the fourfold Gospel, the original sequel to the Gospel of Luke, the Acts of the Apostles, was detached from that Gospel and left to embark on a career of its own. But a key role was soon found for it. So long as the fourfold Gospel and the Pauline collection circulated separately, one can hardly speak of a canon, even in embryo. The bringing together of the two collections into one was facilitated by the existence of Acts, the hinge which joined the two. The fourfold Gospel and the Pauline corpus, without Acts, resembled, in A. Harnack's words, "an edifice of two wings without the central structure, and therefore incomplete and uninhabitable" (History of Dogma II [1896] 48, n. 2). But Acts provided the central structure of an edifice which now took on the shape of the canon as we have received it.

4.1. Marcion. The first Christian canon of which we have definite knowledge was Marcion's edition of the Greek NT, published at Rome about A.D. 144. Marcion, who came from Sinope in Asia Minor, repudiated the authority of the OT for the church and presented his disciples with a corpus of Holy Scripture comprising two divisions—The Gospel and The Apostle. The latter was an edition often letters of Paul (the nine to churches and one to Philemon); the former was an edition of the Gospel of Luke, expurgated in conformity with Marcion's theological presuppositions.

Marcion may have preferred Luke's record because of that evangelist's traditional association with Paul. Paul, in Marcion's eyes, was the only faithful apostle of Jesus. He knew other Gospels than Luke, but rejected them because they were ascribed, directly or indirectly, to members of the Twelve who (he maintained) allowed the pure gospel of Christ to be adulterated with Jewish ideas. In editing Luke's Gospel he carefully removed material which acknowledged the authority of the OT or suggested that Jesus and his message bore any relation to what had gone before. Jesus, the heavenly revealer of the previously unknown Father, appeared without earthly antecedents; he was not the Jewish Messiah* foretold by the OT prophets. Marcion's Gospel accordingly began with Luke 3:1a and went on immediately to Luke 4:31: "In the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar Jesus came down to Capernaum"—down directly from heaven, that is to say.

Marcion on principle excluded the narrative of Jesus' birth and boyhood (Lk 1:26-56; 2:1-52) and his genealogy* (Lk 3:23-37), for Jesus had no human descent. He excluded all reference to John the Baptist's birth and ministry, with the baptism* of Jesus (Lk 1:5-25, 57-60; 3:2-22), for Jesus could have had no forerunner; he excluded the Temptation* narrative (Lk 4:1-12) because, apart from anything else, Jesus is represented there as appealing to the authority of the OT, and the same reason provided sufficient ground for excluding Jesus' preaching at Nazareth, in which he claims to fulfill an OT prophecy (Lk 4:16-30). Also excluded were the words "The old is good" (Lk 5:39), which might imply some approval of the OT order, the reference to Jesus' family (Lk 8:19), and the description of Zacchaeus as a son of Abraham* (Lk 19:9).

But contemporaries of Marcion freely acknowledged other Gospels than Luke's. Of one of these contemporaries, Valentinus (founder of a leading gnostic school), Tertullian remarked half a century later that, while Marcion nullified Holy Scripture by excising what did not meet with his approval, Valentinus nullified it by misinterpretation, although he seemed to use the entire New Testament (Tertullian, De praescr., 38). This testimony is largely confirmed by the earliest Valentinian writings, which cite Matthew and John as authoritative in addition to Luke.

4.2. Catholic Reaction. The promulgation of Marcion's canon stimulated ecclesiastical authorities in Rome and elsewhere to define the NT canon more specifically. Justin Martyr (c. 160) wrote a treatise, Against Marcion, which unfortunately has not survived. In his surviving works he speaks of the "memoirs of Peter," possibly the Gospel of Mark (Dial. Tryph. 106.3), and of the "memoirs of the apostles" which, he says, were called "gospels" and were read in church along with the compositions of the prophets (Apol.1, 66.3; 67.3).

Justin's disciple Tatian (c. 170) produced a new edition of the fourfold Gospel by unstitching the sections of its four component parts and then rearranging them so as to form one continuous narrative. This edition, the Diatessaron ("harmony of four"), proved very popular, especially in Tatian's native Assyria, where the Syriac-speaking church was most unwilling to abandon it at the beginning of the fifth century in favor of a new Syriac version of the four separate Gospels. The Gospel of John provided the framework into which Tatian fitted the contents of the other three. Even if here and there Tatian amplified his narrative with material from a fifth document (such as the Gospel according to the Hebrews), his Diatessaron bears clear enough witness to the distinctive authority of the four "canonical" Gospels.

The most important reply to Marcion was made by Tertullian in his five-volume Adversus Marcionem (Against Marcion, c. 207), our principal source of information about Marcion's canon, factual if vituperative. By the time Tertullian wrote, the general shape of the catholic canon (or, as he preferred to call it the instrumentum) was complete.

The catholic response to Marcion presented a canon comprising four Gospel writings, not one only, and thirteen Pauline epistles, not ten only, with epistles by other "apostolic men" and the Revelation of John, while Acts served as the hinge joining the fourfold Gospel to the other writings. Two witnesses to this catholic canon toward the end of the second century are Irenaeus and the Muratorian list. Irenaeus (c. 180) gives no list of NT books, but it is plain from his extant works that he recognized and appealed to the four Gospels, Acts, the Pauline epistles, some General Epistles and Revelation—in fact to twenty-two out of the twenty-seven books of our NT.

His remarks on the Gospels are of special interest. He reproduces the account of their origin which he had received:

> Matthew published among the Hebrews a gospel in writing also in their own speech, while Peter and Paul were preaching the gospel and founding the church in Rome. After their departure Mark in his turn, Peter's disciple and interpreter, delivered to us in writing the content of Peter's preaching. Luke also, the follower of Paul, set down in a book the gospel preached by him [Paul], Then John, the Lord's disciple who leaned back on his bosom, published his gospel while he was living at Ephesus in Asia. *(Haer. 3.1.1, quoted by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.8.2-4)*

That is what Irenaeus received by tradition, but he adds an original argument to show that there must be four Gospels, but no more:

> As there are four quarters of the world in which we live, and four universal winds, and as the church is dispersed over all the earth, and the Gospel is the pillar and base of the church, so it is natural that it should have four pillars, breathing immortality from every quarter and kindling human life anew. Clearly therefore the Word, ... having been made manifest to the human race, has given us the gospel in fourfold form, but held together by one Spirit" (Haer. 3.11.8)

Either by the time of Irenaeus the fourfold shape of the Gospel was as much taken for granted in the Catholic church as the four winds of heaven, or Irenaeus is at pains to exclude the idea that there were other Gospel writings equally worthy of acceptance as authoritative.

Then, having referred to the divine Word in OT terms as "enthroned on the cherubim" (cf. 1 Sam 4:4; Ps 80.1), Irenaeus recalls that the cherubim, as described in Ezekiel 1:10; 10:14 (cf. the variation in Rev 4:7), had four faces apiece—the faces of a lion, an ox (or calf), a human being and an eagle—and relates the four Gospels to these four faces, John to the eagle, Luke to the ox, Matthew to the human being and Mark to the lion, pointing respectively to Christ's royalty and deity, to his sacrifice, to his humanity and to his endowment with the Spirit of prophecy.

The Muratorian list (so called after L. A. Muratori, who discovered and published it in 1740) is a list of writings acknowledged apparently in the Roman church toward the end of the second century. It comprises practically the same NT books as those attested by Irenaeus, with the addition of jude and the strange omission of 1 Peter. It is defective at the beginning, but since its first complete sentence names Luke as "the third book of the gospel" and "John, one of the disciples," is said to have written "the fourth Gospel," it is a reasonable inference that Matthew and Mark were listed as the first and second.

Its account of the origins of the Gospels has no historical value but it indicates how questions about their authority were being answered at the time. As for the third Gospel:

After the ascension of Christ, Luke the physician, whom Paul had taken along as a legal expert, wrote [the record] down in his own name in accordance with [Paul's] opinion. He himself, however, never saw the Lord in the flesh and therefore, as far as he could follow [the source of events], began to tell it from the nativity of John.

This last remark may suggest an anti-Marcionite emphasis, since Marcion omitted all reference to John the Baptist from his edition of the Gospel. For the rest, an attempt is made to claim for Luke's record the apostolic authority of Paul. A Roman governor had on his provincial staff a legal expert (iuris studiosus, the term used here), who drafted official documents "in the name" and "in accordance with the opinion" of his superior; so Luke (it is implied) composed his record in his own name but in accordance with Paul's opinion.
The Muratorian account of the Fourth Gospel has this to say:

Encouraged by his fellow-disciples and bishops, John said, "Fast along with me three days from today, and whatever may be revealed to each, let us relate it to one another." The same night it was revealed to Andrew, one of the apostles, that John in his own name should write everything down, and that they should all revise it. Therefore, although the various books of the Gospel begin in different ways, it makes no difference to the faith of believers, since in them all everything has been declared by one primary Spirit, concerning our Lord's nativity, passion and resurrection, his association with his disciples and his twofold advent—the first in humility, when he was despised, which is past; his second resplendent, in royal power, his coming again. It is no wonder, then, that John should so constantly present the several details in his letters also, saying of himself, "What we have seen with our eyes and heard with our ears and our hands have handled, these things have we written." For in this way he claims to be not only a spectator but a hearer, and also a writer in order of the wonderful facts about our Lord.

The tale about John's fellow-disciples may reflect a tradition that others in addition to John were involved in the publication of his Gospel; compare the attestation at the end of the Gospel (probably by members of the Johannine community): "we know that his testimony is true" (Jn 21:24). The insistence that all four of the Gospels maintain the same traditional faith may betray an awareness of some who were unhappy about the Fourth Gospel because of its differences from the other three. The emphasis on the eyewitness testimony of this Gospel is confirmed by the assurance in 1 John 1:1 that the Johannine teaching is based on firsthand experience

At the end of the Muratorian list any writings proceeding from "the Asian founder of the Cataphrygians" are rejected, along with other heretical works. The Cataphrygians are the Montanists, founded by Montanus around AD. 155. They claimed that the gift of prophecy had been revived among them, and that their inspired utterances should be equally venerated with the sacred Scriptures. Their contention that the Paraclete promises of John 14—16 (see Holy Spirit) had been fulfilled by the rise of their movement caused some of their orthodox opponents to look skeptically on the Fourth Gospel. Outstanding among these was Gaius, a learned Roman churchman (c. 180), whose arguments against the apostolic authority of this Gospel were taken seriously enough for Hippolytus to publish a refutation of them a generation later.

5. The Gospels in the NT Canon.

5.1. Canonical and Uncanonical Gospels. Contemporary with Irenaeus and the compiler of the Muratorian list was Clement of Alexandria. Clement shows a degree of tolerance toward uncanonical gospels and other writings not readily matched among orthodox Christian fathers, but he sets the four canonical Gospels on a plane by themselves. According to the "elders" he says:

The first Gospels to be written were those with genealogies [Matthew and Luke]. The Gospel according to Mark took shape as follows: Peter had publicly proclaimed the word at Rome and told forth the gospel by the Spirit. Then those present, many in number, besought Mark, as one who had accompanied Peter for a long time and remembered what he had said, to make a written record of what he had said. Mark did this, and communicated his Gospel to those who made the request of him. When Peter came to know of it, he neither vigorously forbade it nor advocated it. Last of all John (according to the tradition), aware that the "bodily" facts had been set forth in the [other] Gospels, yielded to the exhortation of his friends and, divinely carried along by the Spirit composed a "spiritual" Gospel, (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 6.14.5-7)

Clement had received the fourfold Gospel and accepted its contents as especially authoritative, but he had no objection to citing other gospels when he thought fit. He knew, for example, that the Gospel according to the Egyptians was not one of "the four Gospels that have been handed down to us," but he quoted it at least four times (see Gospels [Apocryphal]).

The Gospel according to the Egyptians was apparently popular among the Gentile Christians of Alexandria, as the Gospel according to the Hebrews was among the Jewish Christians. The latter bore some relation to Matthew's Gospel, but included some uncanonical material; the former had more of a gnostic emphasis.

Most of the so-called apocryphal Gospels belong to the period when the distinctiveness of the fourfold Gospel was becoming increasingly recognized. One of the earliest, the Gospel of Thomas, is a compilation of 114 sayings ascribed to Jesus, issued in Greek around 120. Fragments from its Greek text were included among the first Oxyrhynchus papyri to be published. The complete text of a fourth-century Coptic version was found among the Nag Hammadi papyri about 1945.

Some apocryphal Gospels were designed to supply details about the life and activities of Jesus which the canonical four did not give. This is particularly so with the so-called Infancy Gospels—the Protevangelium of James, for example, which relates Mary's conception, birth and upbringing and goes on to tell how she gave birth to Jesus; and the Infancy Gospel of Thomas, which tells of Jesus' boyhood, portraying him as a juvenile prodigy.

These and other Gospels lay explicit claim to the authority of an apostle or other close associate of Jesus (unlike the canonical Gospels, which are Strictly anonymous works). The Gospel of Peter is extant in its passion narrative, which gives a docetic account of Jesus' crucifixion; it was current in parts of Syria at the end of the second century. The Gospel of Nicodemus (also known as the Acts of Pilate) narrates Jesus' trial, death and resurrection, and in particular his "harrowing of hell."

Other Gospels expound various forms of gnosticism, such as the Gospel of Philip and the Apocryphon of John, which record revelations said to have been given by the risen Jesus. An Egyptian gnostic work of the mid-third century, Pistis Sophia ("Faith Wisdom"), tells how Jesus continued to live with his disciples for eleven or twelve years after his resurrection and imparted to them much teaching about salvation, mostly in reply to questions asked—especially by Mary Magdalene.

5.2. Alexandrian Fathers. Origen, the greatest Christian scholar of his age, had no objection to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, but listed the Gospel according to the Egyptians, together with other gnosticizing Gospels and Acts, among the "false" books. He acknowledged the four canonical Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the Pauline epistles and Hebrews, 1 Peter, 1 John and Revelation as "undisputed" books.

The fourfold Gospel, in Origen's view, is to be received as the first fruits of all the Scriptures; for it the Law of Moses and the rest of the OT prepared the way. "For it was after the fruits of the prophets who prophesied until the Lord Jesus that the perfect Word blossomed." Even Acts and the epistles are not on the same level of inspiration as the Gospels. And if the Gospels are the first fruits of all Scripture, John is the first fruits of the four Gospels (Comm.Joh., 1.4-6).

The authority of John's Gospel was stressed also by Origen's disciple Dionysius, who was bishop of Alexandria from 247/8 until 265. He concluded on stylistic grounds that the Gospel and the Revelation of John could not have come from the same author. Therefore, since Revelation was written by another John, a holy and inspired man indeed, such a non-apostolic writing could not be accorded the same degree of authority as the apostolic Gospel.

Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria 328-373, is the first writer to list as "canonical" (his own word) exactly the twenty-seven books of the NT as we know it. He gives the four Gospels pride of place at the head of his list (issued in 367). There are some books not in the canon which, he says, are helpful for the instruction of recent converts, but there are others, written by heretics and falsely claiming ancient authority, which should be totally ignored.

The order in which Athanasius lists the Gospels (Matthew-Mark-Luke-John) is at least as early as Irenaeus and (it appears) the Muratorian canon. It may be based on what was believed to be the chronological order of their composition; it has been for centuries the traditional order. Clement of Alexandria, as has been said, gives the order Matthew-Luke-Mark-John. The Old Latin witnesses prefer the order Matthew-John-Luke-Mark (giving priority to the two which bear apostolic names). Occasionally the order John-Matthew-Luke-Mark appears (John coming first perhaps because of its opening words "In the beginning").

6. Canon Criticism.

Canon criticism, or canonical criticism, is not a variety of criticism of the same order as form criticism* or redaction criticism.* It denotes that approach to the books of the Bible which treats them not as individual documents but as components of the completed corpus of Holy Scripture. One important aspect of this approach is more aptly called canonical exegesis. Canonical exegesis endeavors to determine what a given passage means not only in the immediate context of its date, authorship and setting but in the wider context of the canon in which it was ultimately incorporated. This is a valid exegetical quest, but it presupposes the completion of the canonizing process.

Since the Christian canon comprises OT and NT together, it is necessary to consider the approach to the OT in the Gospels, the relation of each of the four Gospels to the fourfold Gospel, and the relation of the Gospels to the NT and to the whole Bible.

6.1. The OT in the Gospels. The books of the OT are treated in the Gospels as one literary corpus. Within this corpus individual authors may be identified—Moses as the giver of the Law (Mk 10:3-4; Jn 5:45-47; etc.) and, among other writers, Isaiah and David especially (Mk 1:2; 12:35-37; etc.). Jeremiah and Daniel are cited by name in Matthew (see Mt 2:17; 24:15). The story of Jonah (see Sign of Jonah) is referred to (Mt 12:39-41, etc.), but the book which bears his name is not mentioned. Whether individual authors are named or not, however, they share the same divine authority, for all of them spoke by the Spirit (Mk 12:36; Lk 4:18), and the substance of their ministry was the coming Savior: Jesus is the one "of whom Moses in the law and also the prophets wrote" (Jn 1:45).

It is difficult to distinguish in this regard the teaching of Jesus from the evangelists' application, but for the present purpose it makes little practical difference. Sometimes the identity of the OT writer is relevant to the application: It is of the essence of the argument in Mark 12:35-37, for example, that Psalm 110:1 should have been spoken by David himself. In the same way, the recognition of Moses as the lawgiver is common ground in those debates between Jesus and the scribes* in the Fourth Gospel where they claim to be exponents, even disciples, of Moses and charge Jesus with breaking the law that Moses gave.

But it is only rarely that the OT author's identity is so important: what matters is that the voice of God is heard in those writings. It was not an issue of great moment that a prophecy from Malachi should be attributed to Isaiah in Mark 1:2 or one from Zechariah to Jeremiah in Matthew 27:9-10 (in both places the quotations were probably taken from "testimony" collections in which texts from a variety of OT writers were linked together under one rubric); what was really of moment was that the words were those of the Spirit of prophecy.

6.2. The Gospels and the Fourfold Gospel. Mark intends his readers to bear in mind that the one to whom the words and deeds in his record of Jesus' ministry are ascribed is the Son of God,* although this "messianic secret" (see Messiah) is not publicly proclaimed until the centurion declares it at the moment of Jesus' death (Mk 15:39; see Death of Jesus). The reader of the Fourth Gospel is not allowed to forget that the words and deeds which it records are those of the incarnate Word (see Logos). But in canonical criticism, where the fourfold Gospel is the context of each individual Gospel passage, the christological insights of Mark and John (as well as of Matthew and Luke) may control the understanding of any one of those passages.

Traditionally, the predominant control has been exercised by the Johannine christology. Calvin said that he was accustomed to treat the Gospel of John as the key which unlocked the meaning of the other three (Commentary on John, 1553, Introduction). So too William Temple could say of the evangelists' witness to Christ: "Let the Synoptists repeat for us as closely as they can the very words He spoke; but let St John tune our ears to hear them" (Readings in St. John's Gospel [London: Macmillan, 1939], xxxii). Calvin and Temple were in effect practicing canonical criticism: To them the fourfold Gospel was a canonical entity, of which each part could best be understood in the light of the others, and especially in the light of the final component.

This canonical approach requires that each Gospel be treated first as a composition in its own right; it cannot be effectively undertaken until the literary interrelationships of the four have been explored. It could not be undertaken with a "harmony" of the Gospels in which the individuality of the several evangelists was submerged. Such a "harmony" is not a canonical document. At all costs the study of the Gospels must not provide any ground for Harnack's complaint that the canonizing process "works like whitewash; it hides the original colours and obliterates all the contours" (The Origin of the New Testament, 141).

A canonical approach which can "do justice to the integrity of the fourfold Gospel corpus" without infringing the canons of historical or literary criticism is recommended by B. S. Childs in a chapter entitled "A Canonical Harmony of the Gospels" (The New Testament as Canon, 157-209). Such an approach, if thoroughly developed, can enrich our understanding of the aim and achievement of each Evangelist in relation to the consentient testimony not only of the fourfold Gospel but of all Sacred Scripture to Jesus as Son of God and Savior of the world.

See also Gospels (Apocryphal); John, Gospel of; Luke, Gospel of; Mark, Gospel of; Matthew, Gospel of, Synoptic Problem; Textual Criticism; Tradition Criticism.

Bibliography. J. Barr, Holy Scripture: Canon, Authority, Criticism

F. F. Bruce

CENSUS. See BIRTH OF JESUS.

CENTURION. See MILITARY.

CHILD, CHILDREN

"And those who ate were about five thousand, not counting women and children" (Mt 14:21; cf. 15:38). The additional mention of the women and children in Matthew's version of the miraculous feedings certainly has the effect of augmenting the scope of the miracle.* It expresses also the Evangelist's conviction that women and children belong to the people of God* and are recipients of the divine grace revealed in Jesus. At the same time, however, it is important to note that their mention presupposes a patriarchal social structure in which the male household head held precedence and the identity and roles of women and children were defined in relation to him.

So we ought not to come to the Gospels expecting too much of what they might have to say about the child and children. (1) Like the Bible as a whole, the Gospels are products of their time and (patriarchal) social setting. (2) Again, like the Bible as a whole, the Gospels were written by male adults for male adults and their dependents, who included children. This helps to explain why much of the biblical (and Gospel) material on children in relation to morality has to do with the obligation upon children of obedience to their parents, in accordance with the fifth commandment. Elsewhere, as we shall see, the child and children are used in metaphorical ways to express what is incumbent, religiously and spiritually, upon adults. (3) The discovery of childhood as a recognized developmental stage of importance in its own right is a modern phenomenon, as P. Ariès (1962) and others have shown. And Robert Raikes' Sunday schools for children were not begun in England until the late-eighteenth century. In other words, the modern, Western fascination with children and the modern sentimentalizing of childhood ought not to be read back into the Gospels.

1. Jesus
2. The Gospels

1. Jesus

1.1. Jesus As a Child. It is worth pointing out that two of the four canonical Gospels have no material whatsoever on Jesus as a child. For Mark and John it is Jesus' adult public ministry, culminating in his death* and resurrection,* which constitutes "the gospel" (and, for John, Jesus' incarnation). And in none of the Gospels does the adult Jesus refer directly to his own childhood in his teaching. Matthew and Luke contain birth and infancy narratives, and in Luke 2:41-51 there is a story about "the boy (ho pais) Jesus" at the age of twelve attending the Passover with his parents in Jerusalem and revealing in the Temple* signs of his great wisdom.* On strictly critical grounds, however, it is impossible to establish the historical value of this material (Brown; see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). Many scholars today would argue that this tradition may be more influenced by post-Easter faith than by historical incident, bearing witness that Jesus, the son of Mary and Joseph, was also the Son of God (cf. Mt 1:18-23; Lk 1:30-35; 3:23-38; see Birth of Jesus).
Yet the Gospel stories stand in contrast with those which come to us from the mid-second century onwards—the (apocryphal) stories about Jesus' "hidden years" prior to his baptism (see Gospels [Apocryphal]). The earliest and most important of these are the so-called Protevangelium of James and the Infancy Gospel of Thomas. These stories are pious fictions produced, in the absence of controlling canonical tradition, for the purpose of satisfying curiosity and defending christological dogma. As O. Cullmann puts it: "The further away in time we get from the roots, the more unrestrained becomes the application to Jesus of what is recounted about the birth and infancy of sons of the gods and children of supernatural origin" (366).

1.2. Jesus and Children. There are several noteworthy Gospel traditions relevant to the study of Jesus' attitude to children, with Mark 9:33-37 and 10:13-16 (and pars.) being particularly noteworthy. These have received attention in the commentaries and in the works of, among others, S. Légasse (1969), G. Krause (1973) and H.-R Weber (1979). Useful too are historical studies of the position of children in Judaism* and in the Greco-Roman world of the first century, among which those of W. Barclay (1959), R. de Vaux (1961), A. Oepke (1967), B. Rawson (1986) and T. Wiedemann (1989) are important.

It is necessary, however, to approach these famous texts about children with certain prior observations in mind. First, it is worth noting that Jesus himself did not marry and had no children of his own. Like Paul after him, and contrary to the prevailing social expectations of the time, Jesus understood his vocation as requiring the renunciation of marital and family* ties (Mt 19:11-12; cf. 1 Cor 7:7). Second, Jesus called on his disciples to subordinate their own familial obligations for his sake. This included obligations to children: "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his own father and mother and wife and children (ta tekna) and brothers and sisters ... he cannot be my disciple" (Lk 14:26 par. Mt 10:37; cf. Mk 10:29-30). Third, Jesus warned his disciples* of serious enmities between parents and their children on his account (Mk 13:12 par. Mt 10:21 and Lk 21:16). Fourth, Jesus is nowhere depicted as a teacher of children, except in so far as they were present in the crowds of men and women who thronged to hear him. Children at play provide the stuff of one of Jesus' parables* (Mt 11:16-19 par. Lk 7:31-35), but the parable itself is addressed to adults. Finally, and more generally, children per se were not at the heart of Jesus' priorities. What was central was the prophetic summons of Israel* to repentance and a renewed obedience to the will of God in view of the imminent coming of God. As part of this, children are expected to obey their parents in accordance with the commandments* (e.g., Mk 7:9-13; 10:19). Similarly, the numerous accounts of the miraculous healing of children (e.g., the healing* of Jairus' twelve-year-old daughter in Mk 5:21-43) are expressions of the power and character of God's coming rule already at work through Jesus (see Miracles, Miracle Stories).

Commentators agree that the sayings of Jesus about children have a complex tradition history. The tendency of the tradition is to develop the metaphorical potential of the child for teaching about Christian discipleship * As H.-R. Weber says, "Already Mark, Matthew and Luke seem to have been more interested in what a child symbolizes than in Jesus' attitude to actual children" (49). But it may be that Weber is looking for something which is not there, and that for Jesus, as well as for the Evangelists, it was the child as metaphor which was most important in his teaching. Nonetheless, several findings are highly probable.

1.2.1. The Kingdom Belongs to Such As These. Jesus held that children have a share in the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God). The saying of Jesus in verse 14 of Mark 10:13-14,16 makes this clear. In this episode Jesus countermands the disciples, welcomes the children and, as a sign of blessing (reminiscent, perhaps, of the blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh by Jacob in Gen 48; see Blessing and Woe), lays his hands upon them. We would be surprised to discover otherwise concerning the attitude of Jesus. The covenantal religion of Israel embraced children. The teaching of the rabbis did likewise (cf. Str-B, 1.786). And the Essenes augmented their ranks by adopting male children (Josephus J.W. 2.120).

1.2.2. Receiving the Kingdom As a Child. Jesus taught that the kingdom of God was to be received "as a child (hōs paidion)" (Mk 10:15 par. Mt 18:3 and Lk 18:17; cf. Jn 3:3, 5). Here, in a surprising and powerful simile, Jesus makes the child the model for receiving or entering the kingdom. Many suggestions have been made as to precisely how the child is a model (e.g., Best, 1986, 94-97). For Matthew it meant humility (18:4). But the very quality of the saying as metaphor suggests that a variety of meanings is possible and legitimate.
Nevertheless, it is most unlikely that the Gnostic interpretation in terms of sexual innocence, in Gospel of Thomas 22 (cf. 37), bears any resemblance to the understanding of Jesus.

1.2.3. Welcoming Little Children. Jesus placed special importance on receiving with kindness and hospitality the least important members of society: children (see Mercy). This seems to be the sense underlying the heavily reworked tradition of Mark 9:33-37 and parallels. According to Best, "The so-called shaliach principle is employed here to suggest that Jesus is encountered and helped when the child, who is the least of all humans, is encountered and helped" (1981, 80).

2. The Gospels.

Study of the history of the Gospel tradition shows that the stories and sayings about children were very important for the first followers of Jesus in their various attempts to work out what it meant to be God's new covenant people in the period after Jesus' death and resurrection. Invariably, the child becomes a metaphor of discipleship, a way of talking about God and the shared life of faith* in the light of Christ

2.1. The Gospel of Matthew. The material on children in Matthew is understood best in relation to the Evangelist's emphasis on God as the heavenly Father, on Jesus as the Son of God (see Son of God) and on believers as both children of God and brothers and sisters of one another. It relates also to the priority in Matthean ethics of the virtue of humility as the basis for life together as the people of God (see Ethics of Jesus).

The birth and infancy narratives (Mt 1—2) are a good case in point. Here in 1:18-25 Jesus is portrayed as the divinely begotten Son (huios). But he is also the vulnerable child (paidion) who, with his equally vulnerable mother (2:11, 13-14, 20-21), is threatened from the beginning by the (Jewish) powers-that-be, and watched over by his heavenly Father working through angelic intermediaries (see Angels). So the coming of Jesus the Son is in weakness and humility, the very qualities which mark him out as the true king of Israel (cf. 2:2,6,8,11) and which subsequently form the center of his teaching (e.g., 5:3-12; 11:29) and lifestyle (cf. 21:5).

In that teaching the figure of the child is prominent. First it expresses a doctrine of revelation and election. The Father and the Son are made known to the least likely, to "babes" (nēpioi, 11:25-26); those, that is, who recognize their weakness and utter dependence upon divine grace and accept the invitation of Jesus as the Wisdom* of God (11:27-29). Second, it expresses a requirement of membership in the kingdom of God: radical humility (18:1-4; cf. 5:3-5). Third, it provides a way of talking about pastoral care in the Christian community (18:5-14): the leaders of the church* are to avoid at all costs (antinomian) teaching or behavior which would lead the "little ones" (*mikroi) to stray from the narrow path of righteousness (*see Justice, Righteousness). Fourth, it expresses a concern for persecuted followers of Christ and, in particular, early Christian missionaries. This seems to be the sense of the reference to "these little ones" in 10:42, as also of the reference to "the least (*elachisloi) of these my brethren" in 25:40 (cf. 25:45).

When Jesus comes to the Temple after his triumphal entry into Jerusalem (*see Triumphal Entry), it is not surprising, therefore, that those who rejoice at the arrival in Zion of the Son of David (*see Son of David) are children (*paidia, 21:15; cf. the reference to *nēpioi and *thēlazontes in 21:16 - Ps 8:3 LXX). It is they who represent God's new covenant people and inherit the kingdom of God.

2.2. The Gospel of Mark. In contrast with Matthew the theology of Mark is less anthropomorphic and the Gospel of Mark is less explicitly ecclesiological and ethical in its orientation. The picture of God as the loving heavenly Father who cares for his Son and for his children on earth as they are obedient to him is much more muted in Mark. Prominent instead is an emphasis on the sovereignty and transcendence of God, the mystery of the divine purpose especially in relation to suffering, and the imperative of faith and watchfulness in the midst of darkness (e.g., Mk 4; 13). Nevertheless, God is depicted as Father and Jesus as the Son (e.g., 1:11; 9:7; 13:32; 14:36; 15:39), while those who do God's will are identified as the spiritual family of Jesus (3:35).

It is significant that the main teaching about children in Mark's Gospel (i.e., 9:33-37; 10:13-16) comes in the central section, 8:27—10:45, where the focus is on the nature of discipleship of the Christ who is to be crucified and raised. Here the child is a metaphor of discipleship (cf. 10:24b), and this is appropriate in a Gospel which emphasizes so strongly that divine power is revealed in weakness and that true greatness lies in becoming last of all for Jesus' sake (e.g., 8:34-35; 12:41-44). It is hardly coincidental that Mark has two stories in which Jesus heals children (5:21-43; 9:14-29), and that both take the form of a raising from death in response to the power of Jesus. For Mark death and resurrection constitute "the way (*hodos)" of Jesus himself and of all who would follow him.

In 9:33-37, as Best (1981) points out, several sayings have been brought together and placed at the head of a longer block of teaching of the disciples "in the house" (9:33-50). In this context the Jesus of Mark seems to be saying that true greatness is shown in being a servant of all (see Service), even to the point of being able to welcome unimportant outsiders—a child (9:36-37), an anonymous exorcist (9:38-41)—into the fellowship.

The material in 10:13-16 is also part of a larger block of tradition relevant to Christian discipleship (10:1-31), dealing successively with marriage and divorce (10:2-12), children (10:13-16) and property (10:17-31). The second section clearly affirms the legitimate place of children in the Christian fellowship. As with the anonymous exorcist, they are not to be "forbidden" (cf. kōluein in 9:39 and 10:14). Rather, Jesus welcomes them in the most demonstrative way by "taking them in his arms" (cf. enkalizesthai in 9:36 and 10:16) and blessing them. Particularly important for Mark, though, is the saying in 10:15 where childlike receiving is a metaphor of faith (cf. Légasse, 189ff; and, for a Jungian interpretation, see Via, 128-133). The possible import of the tradition for Christian liturgical practice, and for infant baptism in particular, seems not to have been a concern of this Evangelist (so Best 1986, 92-94, contra Jeremias, 48ff.).

2.3. The Gospel of Luke. Traditions about children play an important part in expressing what Luke believed about God, the good news of salvation* and how to live the life of Christian faith. These traditions are suggestive of a Christian community ethos which, in partial contrast to the Markan ethos, is more optimistic and world-affirming.

First, the stories of the two miraculous births (Lk 1—2) show that the God of biblical faith is at work again bringing salvation to his people. In a dramatic and powerful narrative, the birth of sons to Elizabeth and Mary is a new beginning in salvation history and the fulfillment of God's covenant promise. Hence, their arrival is marked by prophetic and angelic witness, miraculous signs and outbursts of joy. Even the unborn infant (brephos) John leaps for joy at the coming of Mary (1:41, 44), the one who is to give birth to the Son of God (1:32, 35).

Second, the stories of Jesus' presentation at the Temple (2:22-40) and his pilgrimage to the Temple as a boy of twelve (2:41-51) fulfill an important apologetic function, showing that even as a child Jesus revealed those divine qualities which marked him out as the fulfillment of Israel's hopes and as the savior of the world (2:40, 52). The latter episode not only highlights Jesus' divine sonship (2:49), but also its potential cost for Jesus' natural kin (2:48-50;
Third, children in Luke exemplify the Evangelist's emphasis on the gracious mercy of God toward the poor, the weak and the marginal (see Rich and Poor). Witness the birth of a son to a barren woman (1:7, 25) and to a lowly "handmaidens (doulē, 1:48); the revelation of the babe (brephos) to shepherds* from the countryside (2:8-14); the identification of the children (tekna) of Wisdom as including tax* collectors and sinnen* (9:34-35; cf. 9:29-30); the miraculous healing of a man's "only (monogenes, so Luke) son," which moves everyone to wonder at "the majesty of God" (9:37-43); and the parable of the two sons (15:11-32).

Finally, Luke's theology of divine grace toward the poor has an ethical and social corollary (see Beck). It is noteworthy that in Luke's version of the tradition about true greatness (9:46-48), Jesus identifies closely with the child (paidion) by putting him "by his side" and, in a more concrete way than in Mark and Matthew, says that, "Whoever receives this child (touto to paidion) . . . receives me." Similarly, in Luke's redaction of Mark 10:13-16 it is not children (paidia) but "even infants (kai ta brephē)" who are brought to Jesus and whom he calls (18:15-17). God's mercy toward the weak is conveyed in Jesus' mercy toward the weak also, and this is the example which disciples of Jesus are to foldisticly low (cf. 22:26).

2.4. The Fourth Gospel. Even more than in the Synoptics, child-related material in John is almost entirely metaphorical. It is also distinctly scarce, as the word-statistics in H.-R. Weber's study (56) show. Missing is the Q* parable about the children playing. Missing, likewise, are the stories of Jesus blessing the children and teaching his disciples to "receive" children and to become "like a child." There are no birth or infancy narratives. Stories of children being healed by Jesus are reduced to one (Jn 4:46-54).

This is not to suggest that the Fourth Evangelist deliberately omits material about children, only that his principal concerns lie elsewhere and that his conceptual framework is distinctive. So, for instance, John's interest is more in Jesus' revelatory discourses in Samaria and Judea than in his public ministry among the people (including the children) of Galilee.* Again, the teaching of the Johannine Jesus is predominantly about himself rather than about entry into the kingdom of God or the ethics of the kingdom of God, where (from a Synoptic viewpoint) sayings about children are particularly important.
Oepke (653) makes the important observation that in the Fourth Gospel a consistent linguistic distinction is maintained between Jesus as the Son of God (ho huios tou theou) and believers as the children of God (ta tekna tou theou) (as in Jn 1:12; 11:52; cf. 1 Jn 3:1-2, 10; 5:2). The strong Pauline eschatological and ecclesiological doctrine that sonship is something which believers share with Christ (e.g., Gal 4:6-7; Rom 8:14-17, 23, 29; 9:4) is absent. This reflects the fact that the central (and highly polemical) focus of this Gospel is christological: Jesus is the unique Son who comes from the Father to reveal his glory* to the world.

So believers are "children of God." This has several connotations, as M. de Jonge shows also. First God is the source of their life (1:12-13; 3:3-16). Second, and conversely, believers belong no longer to the devil nor to those (including "the Jews") whose father he is (8:39-47; cf. 1 Jn 3:4-12). Third, salvation is universal, available to all who are born anew/from above (1:12-13; 3:4-16; see New Birth). Fourth, the believer's relationship with the Father is mediated by the Son and dependent upon obedience to the Son (14:6-17). Interestingly, Jesus does not teach his disciples to pray "Our Father...." Instead he says, "Whatever you ask in my name, I will do it . . ." (14:13). Fifth, God's children are to love one another (13:33-35, noting tekna at v. 33). So there is a horizontal dimension to being a child of God which, though rather muted in John's Gospel, comes strongly to the fore in the distinctly ecclesiological concerns of the epistles (e.g., 1 Jn 2:1,12-13,18; 3:1-2, 7,10).

See also Family; Son of God; Women.

S. C. Barton

CHILDHOOD OF JESUS. See BIRTH OF JESUS

CHREIA/APHORISM

A chreia (pl. chreiai) is "a saying or act that is well-aimed or apt expressed concisely, attributed to a person, and regarded as useful for living" (Hock-O'Neil, 26). Chreiai originated in the Socratic and Cynic philosophical circles (fourth century B.C.) to express the wit of philosophers, kings and military commanders. Chreiai were common to both oral and written expression in the Greco-Roman world and were often placed in written collections. An example of a chreia is: "Diogenes the philosopher, on being asked by someone how he could become famous, responded: 'By worrying as little as possible about fame' " (Hock-O'Neil, 85). The Gospels contain numerous chreiai of Jesus and the early Church, and thus a knowledge of chreiai is important for interpreting the Gospels.

The chreia was the basis of one of the many types of rhetorical exercises described in the Progymnas-mata, the rhetorical textbooks written from the first through the fifth centuries A.D. In the educational system of the Roman Empire these were the curricula for post-secondary education and preparation for rhetorical instruction and public life. The Progymnas-mata give us most of our information about the chreia and include those of Aelius Theon of Alexandria (first century), Hermogenes (third century) and Aphthoni-us (fourth century). When discussing chreiai in the New Testament the Progymnasmata of Theon is generally used. His Progymnasmata is the oldest surviving handbook, contains the most elaborate discussion and is roughly contemporary with the books of the New Testament (mid to late first century A.D.).

1. Classification
1. Classification.

In Theon chreiai are classified in the three broad categories of sayings, action and mixed. Of these three categories, the action chreia is rare and consists of active or passive action in either the situation prompting the action or the response to the situation. The mixed chreia contains both speech and action, either in the situation prompting the speech or action, or the response to the situation or both: "And he [Jesus] entered the Temple* and began to drive out those who sold, saying to them, 'It is written, 'My house shall be a house of prayer*'; but you have made it a den of robbers' " (Lk 19:45-46 RSV).

The sayings chreia may be broken down into three types: statement, response and double. The statement type usually begins with a finite verb in a formula like "he said" or "he used to say." It can be subdivided again into those with or without a specified situation mentioned as having prompted the saying. An example of a statement-sayings chreia with a situation mentioned is: "Now after John was arrested, Jesus came into Galilee,* preaching the gospel* of God,* and saying, 'The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God* is at hand; repent,* and believe in the gospel' " (Mk 1:14-15 RSV).

The response-sayings chreia usually begins with a participle in a formula like "on seeing" or "on being asked." It is of four kinds, all of which are preceded by a speech or reference to a speech in the situation. A question in the situation is involved in three of the four kinds. The question may require only a yes or no answer, more information than a yes or no answer or an explanation in addition to the answer to the question (usually beginning with "for" [gar] or "because" [hoti]). In the fourth kind a remark rather than a question is the situation for a simple response (usually beginning with "to the one who" [pros ton]). An example of a response-sayings chreia needing more information than a yes or no answer is: "And the multitudes asked him [John the Baptist*], 'What then shall we do?' And he answered them, 'He who has two coats, let him share with him who has none; and he who has food, let him do likewise" (Lk 3:10-11 RSV).
In the double chreia, each of two sayings could stand independently. Usually the latter rebuts the former, as in: "Then Jesus came from Galilee to the Jordan to John, to be baptized by him. John would have prevented him, saying, 'I need to be baptized by you, and do you come to me?' [chreia 1]. But Jesus answered him, 'Let it be so now; for thus it is fitting for us to fulfil all righteousness.' Then he consented" [chreia 2] (Mt 3:13-15 RSV).

2. Manner of Presentation.

Chreia can also be described by their manner of presentation or the formal features of the saying itself. They may be presented as a wish, a maxim, an explanation, a double entendre, a syllogism, an enthymeme (an incomplete syllogism); they may be presented symbolically, figuratively, with wit, with an example, with change of subject or in a combination of any of these. An example of a chreia as a maxim is John 4:43-44: "After the two days he [Jesus] departed to Galilee. For Jesus himself testified that a prophet* has no honor in his own country" (Jn 4:43-44 RSV). A chreia with wit is: "Then Peter came up and said to him, 'Lord, how often shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him. As many as seven times?' Jesus said to him, 'I do not say to you seven times, but seventy times seven' " (Mt 18:21-22 RSV).

The chreiai and their elaboration were the building blocks of the argumentation, or at times the entire content, of oral and written expression. In the Progymnasmata, the meaning of the saying or action in the chreia could be worked out (ergasia) as a training exercise in rhetorical composition. According to Theon there were eight topics for the working out of a chreia: recitation (in the same or similar words), inflection (in all the numbers and cases of the language), commentary (append a positive statement), objection (append a negative statement which is the antithesis of the previous positive statement), expansion (recite with greater length), condensation (put in a more concise form), refutation (cite as impossible or false) and/or confirmation (with an argument) (Hock-O'Neil, 95-107).

The Progymnasmata of Hermogenes includes an elaboration (ergasia) exercise for the chreia in eight topics which treat the chreia as a thesis to be supported: praise of the author, the chreia, rationale, statement from the opposite, analogy, example, citation of an authority (or judgment) and exhortation (Hock-O'Neil, 177). These topics correspond to the standard elements of both an individual argument and the outline of the ancient speech as a whole. This basic outline was used from the first century B.C. onwards. In the Gospels the sayings, actions and situations of chreiai are often expanded with elements of these exercises. For example, Mark 10:13-16 presents an elaborated chreia, found in a more condensed form in Matthew 19:13-15.

4. Literary Distinctions.

The chreia can be a saying or an action, is attributed to a specific person and gives personal or collective wisdom which may or may not be useful for daily living. It needs to be distinguished from other literary forms in the Gospels, especially the maxim, aphorism and pronouncement story. The maxim \((gnōmē)\) is always a saying, is not attributed to a specific person and always gives collective wisdom useful for daily living. A maxim attributed to a person becomes a chreia. An aphorism is a succinct and pointed statement of a principle, or general truth. It is always a saying, is attributed to a specific person and may or may not give collective wisdom useful for daily living. The aphorism may be the sayings component of a chreia, such as "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God" (Mk 10:25 RSV). A pronouncement story is a brief narrative ending with a pronouncement by someone in response to a saying or observation. A chreia and a pronouncement story are often the same, the latter being an expanded version of the former.

5. Chreiai and the Gospels.

As our discussion has indicated, chreiai in concise as well as expanded versions are the literary forms of the sayings and actions of Jesus used in the composition of the Gospels. Scholarship has been aware of the chreiai, but only recently has it utilized knowledge of them to analyze the internal rhetoric of the Gospels. This was partly due to Dibelius's assumption that the content and construction of the chreiai differed from the Gospel tradition; an understanding reached with a restrictive conception of chreiai that was ignorant of schemes for the manipulation and elaboration of chreiai. The inaccessibility of the texts of the \textit{Progym-nasmata}, only recently made widely available, has also hindered the study of the Gospels in light of the chreiai and contributed to this major weakness in form criticism.*

The works of Plutarch and Diogenes Laertius show that chreiai were expanded for use in biographies. The Gospels share many features of ancient biography and, not unexpectedly, a portion of the Gospels and pronouncement stories can be explained as expanded chreiai (see Gospel [Genre]).

Knowledge of chreiai helps us better to understand the formation, transmission and development of the traditions underlying the Gospels. It also provides new explanations of the composition of the units of the Gospels. From a study of chreiai in the Gospels it can be concluded that the Gospel writers were familiar with the chreia form and able to use the progymnasmatic techniques of their composition as taught by rhetoricians. Collections of the chreiai of Jesus and others were available to them, but whether they were in an oral or written form—or both—is uncertain.

See also Form Criticism; Rhetorical Criticism.

D.F.Watson

CHRIST
The Greek word translated "christ" (christos) appears 531 times in the NT (Nestle-Aland 26th ed.), and "Christ" is one of the most familiar terms by which Jesus is known, both in the NT and in subsequent Christian tradition. All the canonical Gospels (see Canon) apply the term to Jesus, but each has its own interesting variation in the way Jesus is presented as "Christ". The use of "Christ" in the Gospels reflects both the Jewish origins (see Judaism) of Christianity and the distinctive modifications of Jewish tradition that characterize early Christian faith. For all the Evangelists Jesus is "the Christ," the Messiah of Israel's* hope. But they also reflect the conviction that Jesus is also the Son of God* and bears a significance that suggests divinity or is at least divine-like. Moreover, Jesus' crucifixion is presented as a decisive aspect of his messianic work, although there seems to have been no Jewish precedent for seeing Messiah's work as involving his own violent death (see Death of Jesus).

In order to deal with the use of the term in the canonical Gospels, we must address related questions as well, especially the background of the term and the associated eschatological expectations of ancient Judaism, as well as the use of the term "Christ" in early Christianity prior to the Gospels.

1. Derivation, Meaning and Background
2. NT Usage Outside the Gospels
3. "Christ" in the Four Gospels
4. Conclusion

1. Derivation, Meaning and Background.

The term "christ" is an anglicized form of the Greek word christos, originally an adjective meaning "anointed (with ointment or oil)" from the verb chriō (to anoint or smear with oil or ointment). Christos had no special religious significance in Greek culture prior to the influence of ancient Jewish and Christian usage (on the history of the term, see Grundmann et al.). In ancient Greek-speaking Jewish and Christian circles christos translates the Hebrew term māšiah (about forty-five times in the LXX), which likewise means "anointed (with oil)" but carries a special significance owing to the Israelite practice of anointing with oil a person installed in a special office, such as king or priest (e.g., 1 Sam 9:15-16; 10:1, Saul; 16:3, 12-13, David; Ex 28:41, Aaron and his sons; 1 Chron 29:22, Zadok and Solomon). In such settings the anointing signified that the person was commissioned and approved (by God and the people) for the special office or task. The term māšīah is especially significant in some OT passages in connection with the Israelite king (e.g., 1 Sam 24:6; 2 Sam 1:14; cf. Ps 2:2), where the term seems to be a royal title ("the Lord's anointed," etc.) and it appears that the religious connotation is emphasized.

In postexilic OT texts one finds the hope for a renewed (Davidic) monarchy, often pictured with grandiose dimensions and qualities (e.g., Hag 2:20-23; Zech 9:9-10; 12:7—13:1). Out of this hope, but probably not until sometime in the Hellenistic period (after 331 B.C.), Jews came to use māšīah (and the Greek equivalent, christos) as a designation for a future agent ("messiah") to be sent by God, usually to restore Israel's independence and righteousness.* Recent research suggests, however, that ancient Jewish eschatological expectations of deliverance and sanctification of the elect did not always include the explicit or prominent anticipation of a "messiah," and there seems to have been some variation in the ways "messiah" figures were pictured (e.g., Neusner-Green-Frerichs, de Jonge).

In the Qumran texts, for example (150 B.C.—A.D. 70; see Dead Sea Scrolls), we find what appears to be an expectation of two "anointed" figures (e.g., 1QS 9:10-11; CD 12:22-23) who would preside over the elect in the future: a "messiah of Israel" (probably a royal figure) and a "messiah of Aaron" (a priestly figure). For the Qumran community, the latter figure was apparently seen as outranking the royal "messiah" (see S. Talmon in Neusner-Green-Frerichs). In the Psalms of Solomon (late first century B.C.), however, hope for the restoration of Israel is tied to God's raising up a descendant of David as "the Lord's anointed one" (christos kyriou, 17:32; 18:7), and the messianism here is of a purely royal variety. I Enoch conveys still another image, in which the messianic figure ("the elect one," "the son of man") is pictured in quite exalted terms in heavenly glory and seems to be identified as Enoch (cf. Gen 5:21-24). It is not entirely clear whether this is another type of messianism or if royal/messianic imagery has been appropriated here to describe another type of exalted figure connected with hopes for eschatological salvation.*

We cannot discuss further here the details of pre-Christian Jewish eschatological hopes and the diversity of messianic expectations. It must be emphasized, however, that in the Jewish texts the expectations and speculations about messiah(s) are tied to and overshadowed by other aspirations, such as freedom of the Jewish people from Gentile* domination, and/or the triumph of a particular religious vision of the divine will (e.g., at Qumran), and/or a more general longing for God's kingdom or triumph over unrighteousness and injustice. That is, Jewish hope for messiah(s) was never the center of religious concern for its own sake, but functioned as part of the attempt to project God's eschatological triumph and the realization of aspirations connected with God's triumph. This contrasts with the way the person of Jesus quickly became central and vital in early Christian devotion.

In the NT something like the royal messianism of the Psalms of Solomon seems to be the Jewish messianic expectation most often alluded to and presupposed in relating Jesus to the Jewish religious background. This suggests that the idea of a divinely appointed royal agent who would deliver and purify the nation may have been reasonably well known in Jewish circles (e.g., Acts 2:30-36), though it is not so clear how widely embraced such a hope was.

2. NT Usage Outside the Gospels.

It is worth noting the distribution of the term chrestos in the NT. Of the 531 occurrences of the term, 383 are in the Pauline corpus, and 270 of these are in the seven letters whose authorship is virtually undisputed today (Rom, 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal, Phil, 1 Thess, Philem). In some other NT writings, likewise, use of chrestos is quite frequent for their size: 1 Peter (22); 1 John (8); Jude (6). But in some larger writings the term is not comparatively frequent: Heb (12); Rev (7).
Given their size, the Gospels (especially the Synoptics) do not use chrestos very frequently: Matthew (16); Mark (7); Luke (12, plus 25 occurrences in Acts);
John (19).

This quick glimpse of the distribution of chrestos in the NT shows three things. First, the variation in the frequency of the term may indicate differences in the importance attached to it by the different NT authors. However, the differing subject matter and purposes of the individual authors may also have accounted for the frequency variation. Second, the heavy concentration of occurrences of chrestos in Paul's letters (the earliest NT writings) suggests that the term very early became an important part of the vocabulary of Christian faith. Third, the strikingly small share of the total NT occurrences of chrestos in the Gospels, and the variation among the Gospels in the number of uses of chrestos, make it appropriate to question the meaning and role of the term in these specific writings. Before we discuss in detail the Gospels' use of chrestos, however, it will be helpful to comment further on the Christian use of christos prior to the Gospels.

2.1. Pre-Gospel Use. The Gospels are commonly dated approximately A.D. 65-100, several decades after the beginning of the Christian movement. For tracing the use of christos in the earlier decades, our most important evidence is found in the undisputed letters of Paul, which are generally dated approximately A.D. 50-60, and constitute the earliest surviving Christian writings. Several important studies of Paul's use of christos are available (e.g., Kramer, Dahl, Hengel), and we cannot discuss all the issues addressed in these studies. It is necessary here only to review some matters relevant to the use of christos in the Gospels.

First we may compare Paul's use of christos with his use of other key christological titles in these writings. Occurrences of christos in the seven undisputed letters constitute fifty-one per cent of the total NT occurrences of the term (seventy-two per cent of occurrences are in the writings attributed to Paul in the NT). We might compare the distribution of kyrios ("Lord"): 719 occurrences in the NT, 189 (twenty-six per cent) in the undisputed Pauline letters; and the distribution of "Son/Son of God/his Son": 105 occurrences in the NT, fifteen times (fourteen per cent) in these Pauline letters. Two things relevant to christos are evident: (1) christos is by far Paul's favorite of early Christian titles for Jesus; (2) on the basis of the early date of Paul's letters, we may conclude that in the earliest years of the Christian movement christos quickly became a prominent Christian title for Jesus.

Close examination of christos in Paul's letters, however, shows that he uses the term almost as a name, or as part of the name for Jesus, and not characteristically as a title. Thus, for example, in Paul christos usually appears in the following formulae: "Christ Jesus," "Jesus Christ," "the Lord Jesus Christ" and sometimes simply "Christ." This has led some to ask whether or how well Paul connected the term christos to an understanding of Jesus as "messiah," and to what degree christos was for Paul, like a name, simply a way of referring to Jesus. In answering this question, several factors are important.

First, it is clear that christos was not immediately meaningful as a religious term to ancient Gentiles unfamiliar with Jewish messianic expectations. For example, evidence indicates that christos was often understood by pagans to be the name chrestos ("useful"), a common Greek name, especially for slaves (e.g., Suetonius, Claudius 25.4). This being so, it is worth asking how easily Paul's Gentile converts would have understood or appreciated a presentation of Jesus as the Messiah.

Second, however, it is likely that Paul, as a Jew familiar with his ancestral tradition (Gal 1:13-14), knew the significance of christos in connection with Jewish messianic expectations. In all likelihood, the term christos began to be used with reference to Jesus among Jewish Christians even before Paul's apostolic mission. Christos must have been appropriated by Jewish Christians from Greek-speaking Jewish circles where it functioned as the translation for mašiah. Otherwise, it is impossible to account for the emergence of christos as a title for Jesus. Paul's frequent and easy use of the term reflects a well-established Christian usage and is strong evidence that christos was a part of the religious vocabulary of Christian groups within the very first few years (AD. 30-50).

Third, although in Paul's letters christos functions syntactically more characteristically as a quasi-name for Jesus than a title (as in "the Christ"), it appears that the term retains in Paul something of its messianic connotation. This is so not only in explicit passages such as Romans 9:5, with its reference to Jesus as "the Christ" (ho christos), but also in the wider pattern of Paul's usage. As Kramer has shown, Paul characteristically uses christos (either alone or in connection with "Jesus") in passages that refer to Jesus' death and resurrection* (e.g., 1 Cor 15; Rom 3:23; 5:6-7; Gal 3:13), and it is likely that these passages reflect Paul's familiarity with and emphasis on the early Christian conviction that Jesus' crucifixion was part of his mission as the "Messiah." (Hahn's view, 161-62, that the earliest Christian affirmation of Jesus as Messiah was exclusively in connection with the hope of his eschatological return does not do justice to this close connection between the term christos and Jesus' death and resurrection in Paul, the earliest evidence of Christian usage we possess.)

Thus, although Paul's letters do not seem to emphasize or make explicit the messianic connotation of the term "Christ" they provide evidence that the term derived from circles of Jewish Christians where this connotation was emphasized and that the proclamation of Jesus as Messiah was a part of the earliest faith of Christianity. Paul's use of christos almost as a name for Jesus has been taken by some scholars as suggesting that among his Gentile converts the term's association with Jewish messianic expectations was not emphasized. But as the Gospels demonstrate, the claim that Jesus is the Messiah remained a part of early Christian faith well after the Christian movement grew beyond its initial stage as a sea of ancient Judaism. As will be shown in the next sections, although early Christians modified the connotation of the term christos in light of Jesus' death and their experience of his resurrected glory,* the term retained something of its sense as designating Jesus as the "Messiah," the divinely designated agent of salvation.

2.2. Use of "Christos" in Other NT Writings. In the many occurrences of christos in the writings in the Pauline NT corpus whose authorship is disputed or widely doubted among scholars (often called "deutero-Pauline" letters: Eph, Col, 2 Thess, 1 Tim, 2 Tim, Titus), the usage is basically like that found in the undisputed Pauline letters. However, the use of the term in NT writings outside the Pauline corpus and the Gospels is relevant to understanding the background for the use of christos in the Gospels. For example, 1 Peter uses the term twenty-two times, often in connection with the theme of suffering—both of Christ and/or of Christians: the OT prophets predicted Christ's sufferings (1:11); Christ's redemptive suffering is mentioned several times (e.g., 2:21; 3:18; 4:1; 5:1); and Christians share in Christ's sufferings (4:13). This connection between the term christos and suffering probably reflects the early Christian emphasis mentioned earlier—Jesus' crucifixion was a messianic event. It also shows how the idea of Jesus the suffering Messiah was used to inspire Christians to endure sufferings in his name.

In Revelation, along with more formulaic uses of christos ("Jesus Christ," e.g., 1:1-2, 5), there are interesting passages where the term is used as a title, "messiah" (e.g., 11:15 "our Lord and his Christ"; 12:10 "the authority of his Christ"). These passages portray the eschatological triumph of God in terms drawn from Jewish messianic expectation and thus confirm the continuing awareness in Christian circles of the late first century A.D. that "Christ" is a messianic designation.

Likewise, in 1 John 2:22 and 5:1, the confession that Jesus is "the Christ" reflects the messianic claim. But this same document shows the emergence of distinctively Christian doctrinal disputes about the reality or importance of Jesus' human nature (e.g., 4:2, "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh"), and the author coins the term "antichrist" to describe those whose christology he finds seriously inadequate (2:22). In 1 John we see again how christos can function both to designate Jesus in messianic terms and also almost as a name for Jesus.

This brief survey of uses of christos in NT writings other than the Gospels gives us a general understanding of the first-century Christian background of the term that is presupposed as familiar to the readers of the Gospels. With this background in mind, we are now able to discuss in comparatively greater detail how the individual Evangelists use the term in their stories of Jesus.

As we have indicated already, each Evangelist applies christos to Jesus, but does so with particular nuances and emphases. We shall therefore discuss their usage individually; and, accepting commonly held scholarly opinion, we shall deal with the Evangelists in their probable chronological order (see Synoptic Problem).

Modern scholarly investigation of NT christology has expended a great deal of effort in analyzing the use of christological titles in the Gospels and in the other NT writings (e.g., Hahn). In spite of this, certain disagreements remain in contemporary discussions, making a survey such as this a difficult enterprise. To some degree conclusions about one particular title, such as christos, are connected with conclusions about the Evangelists' use of the other titles, and this will be reflected in the following discussion.

3.1. Mark. The earliest of the canonical Gospels, Mark, shows the complexity of applying the term christos to Jesus. In varying ways this complexity characterizes all four Evangelists.

From the opening words in 1:1, the author indicates familiarity and acceptance of the term as applied to Jesus ("the gospel of Jesus Christ"), and at various other points the author uses the term as a way of referring to Jesus. For example, in 9:41 a reward is promised to anyone who gives a cup of water to Jesus' disciples
"because you are Christ's" (cf. Mt 10:42).

The warning in 13:21-22 about the coming times of crisis when some will say,
"Look, here is the Christ!," and the caution about "false Christs" implicitly show that for Mark the title belongs properly to Jesus alone, whose coming with glory will need no such announcement (13:26-27). Christos is used as a title here, and this passage insists that the only genuine fulfillment of the messianic hopes—falsely appropriated by deceivers-will be Jesus' appearance as "the Son of Man* coming in clouds with great glory." The warning about deceivers probably reflects a conflict between early Christian claims about Jesus as Messiah and other messianic hopes circulating among Jewish groups. (Cf. 13:6, which refers to deceivers who claim "I am he!" The variation in some manuscripts, "I am the Christ," is probably a scribal harmonization with the form of the saying in Mt 24:5. Scholars debate whether the significance of "I am he" is a messianic claim or a claim to divinity alluding to God's self-description; see the discussion of 14:61-62 below.)

In several other passages, however, christos is used with a certain reserve or subtlety that has generated scholarly debate over Mark's intent. Perhaps the most familiar of these is 8:29-30, where Peter acclaims Jesus as "the Christ" (ho christos) and is immediately ordered by Jesus "to tell no one about him" (cf. Mt 16:16-20; Lk 9:20-21). Believing that Jesus did not see himself as the Messiah, some scholars have suggested that Jesus' original response to Peter's acclamation was the rebuke "Get behind me, Satan!" in 8:33, and that Jesus rejected the messianic appellation altogether. In this view, Mark recast the incident, introducing the command to secrecy (8:30) and making Jesus' rebuke apply to Peter's rejection of Jesus' sufferings (8:31-33). There are, then, two issues: Jesus' own attitude toward the appellation "messiah" and Mark's treatment of the messiah/christos term there. The latter question is the primary concern before us, but a few comments about the authenticity of the Markan scene are relevant as well.

The speculative attempt to reconstruct the original dialog between Peter and Jesus as described above is probably ill-conceived. There is little basis for regarding Jesus' command to silence in 8:30 as Markan invention while holding Jesus' rebuke of Peter in 8:33 as authentically from Jesus. On the one hand, both function quite well as redactional elements (see Redaction Criticism) in the scene, and both can be explained as deriving from Mark's editorial purpose (Lk 9:20-22 does not include Jesus' rebuke of Peter). On the other hand, both statements can equally well be attributed to Jesus. If Jesus did predict his own rejection and death (not so unlikely in view of the ancient Jewish tradition of Israel's rejection of prophets and the martyrdom of John the Baptist* with whom Jesus associated himself), Peter's negative response is thoroughly understandable, as is Jesus' rebuke of Peter in 8:33 (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). And the notion that Jesus could not possibly have seen himself in messianic terms rests to some degree on the assumption that "messiah" carried a single meaning, having to do with a Davidic, royal figure with subdetymilitary intentions. With such a figure, it is widely thought, Jesus cannot be compared and he could not have thought of himself in this fashion.
But the diversity evident in ancient Jewish messianic speculations (e.g., Smith, Neusner-Green-Frerichs, de Jonge) suggests that Jesus may have rejected this or that form of messianic speculation while understanding his mission in the light of his own definition of messiahship. Therefore, Jesus could have ordered silence about the use of the Messiah/Christ title among his disciples because the term did not itself communicate clearly his own vision of his task and was subject to what he considered severe misunderstandings. In light of this, the command to silence in 8:30 can be as plausibly authentic a saying as Jesus' rebuke of Peter in 8:33.

Debates about what Jesus himself may or may not have felt about the term "messiah" ( christos ) are thus more complicated than even some scholars recognize. Determining Mark's intention is comparatively easier, though still not without problems. In view of Mark's use of christos in the passages examined already, we must conclude that Mark intends Peter's acclamation of Jesus as "Christ" to be taken at least in some sense positively. Jesus' command in 8:30 is to say nothing about him to others; it is not a rejection of the term christos outright. Yet 8:30-33 indicates a reserve about the term, and the reason seems to be that none of the pre-Christian definitions of christos prepare one to understand Jesus' mission, as is shown by Peter's reaction to Jesus' prediction of his suffering. Thus 8:29-33 hints that the term christos achieves its proper meaning as a title for Jesus in light of his divinely mandated sufferings (the divine necessity indicated by the "must suffer" of 8:31). That is, this passage suggests that Jesus is the Christ, but cannot be so identified apart from an appreciation of his crucifixion as central to his messianic task.

The appearance of the title "Christ" in 8:27-30 must also be seen in the light of the overall narrative of Mark. At various points earlier in Mark others have asked about Jesus (1:27; 2:7; 4:41; 6:2-3) or have offered identifications of him (1:24; 3:22; 5:7; 6:14-16). In 8:27-30, however, Jesus himself poses the question of his identity and demands a response from the Twelve, which has the effect of making explicit the simmering question of his true significance. Consequently, 8:27-30 is a turning-point in Mark. Jesus' question is to be dealt with in light of the preceding narratives of his ministry, and gathers up all that has gone before it in Mark. Structurally his question also anticipates the question of the priest in 14:61, which is the climax of the Jewish trial and rejection of Jesus (see Trial of Jesus). In the latter episode Jesus is asked about his identity, and the messianic acclamation of Peter is also affirmed by Jesus himself.
In 14:61-62 the chief priest asks Jesus, "Are you the Christ, the son of the Blessed One?" Jesus responds affirmatively, "I am" (ego amī), and then predicts his own vindication at God's "right hand." The Markan form of Jesus' reply is more emphatic than the parallels (cf. Mt 26:64; Lk 22:70; the variants in some Markan manuscripts are probably scribal harmonizations with these parallels). The "I am," a possible allusion to the self-descriptive language of God in the OT (e.g., Is 43:10, 13), may also have been intended by Mark to hint at Jesus' transcendent significance.

This is made even more likely by the allusion here to the glorification of the "son of man" in Daniel 7:13-14. Jesus' full reply to the priest's question asserts that, though he does not seem to fit some messianic expectations (such as the royal-Davidic model mentioned in 12:35), he is rightfully christos and his status will be vindicated directly in glorious dimensions. Contrary to the views of some earlier scholars, the phrase "the son of man" (v. 62) is not a title for a well-known figure in Jewish eschatological speculation (see, e.g., Casey) and was not intended by Mark as a preferred title in place of christos (see esp. Kingsbury, 1983). For Mark, Jesus is the Christ (Messiah), the Son of God (see Son of God), and the allusion to the Danielic scene of divine triumph serves to make it clear that "the son of man," rejected by the Jewish leaders, will in fact be vindicated as christos and divine Son in heavenly glory (see Son of Man).

Another much-discussed passage is 12:35-37 (cf. Mt 22:41-45; Lk 20:41-44). Jesus' question about how the Christ can be the Son of David* is of course not a theoretical question. The reader is expected to understand that the question really (albeit somewhat obliquely) has to do with Jesus' true identity and significance. And the point of 12:35-37 is to indicate the inadequacy of "Son of David" as the category for understanding who the Christ is, for David calls him "Lord" (Gk kyrios; Heb. "dōnāy), suggesting that the Christ is far superior to David. That is, David is not an adequate model for the work or person of the Christ Here again, christos is implicitly accepted as a title for Jesus, but one popular understanding of the term (attributed to "the scribes," v. 35) is found inadequate. In light of the places where God addresses Jesus as the divine Son (1:11; 9:7), as well as other indications of Jesus' divine-like significance in Mark (e.g., stilling the storm in 4:35-41, esp. the disciples' awe-filled question in v. 41), the reader is expected to see that Jesus "the Christ" is far greater than the commonly accepted notions of the Messiah.

The final occurrence of Christos in Mark is in 15:32, where observers of Jesus' crucifixion mockingly address him as "the Christ, the king of Israel." This is one of many examples of Markan irony (especially frequent in the passion account), and is one of several places where the question of whether Jesus is the king of Israel or king of the Jews appears in the narrative of the trial and crucifixion (cf. 15:2, 9, 12, 18-20, 26; see Juel). The Markan irony in the mockery of Jesus as "the Christ" in 15:32 is that, contrary to the mockers, Jesus is "the Christ, the king of Israel," though his ultimate vindication lies by way of his crucifixion and apparent failure. The pagan form of the mockery, in the title attached to the cross ("The King of the Jews"), gives the charge for which Jesus was executed, but is also an ironic truth: Jesus really is the rightful "king," rejected both by pagan and Jewish leaders.

It is interesting to note the distribution of uses of christos in Mark. The occurrences of christos are concentrated in the second half of the book, where the shadow of Jesus' coming death looms over the narrative. After the opening words in 1:1, christos does not appear in Mark until 8:29-30, in a complex of material that combines Jesus' explicit question about his significance with the first prediction of his sufferings (the variants in 1:34 are probably scribal harmonizations with Lk 4:41). Thereafter, aside from 9:41, christos appears in the material describing Jesus' final confrontation with Jewish authorities in Jerusalem, which culminates in his execution. The true stature of "the Christ" is the one teasing question Jesus asks in a list of questions debated in 11:27—12:40. Jesus' discourse about the future (13:5-37) includes the prominent reference to "false Christs," who are to be distinguished from the true Christ, Jesus. In the Jewish trial the question whether Jesus is the Christ culminates the interrogation. And in the crucifixion account the mocking acclamation of Jesus as "the Christ" is the final ironic indignity heaped upon Jesus by his tormentors. Mark uses christos sparingly, but every occurrence is significant.

Thus, although Mark affirms other christological titles for Jesus (especially important is "Son of God" and its variations in 1:1, 11, 24, 34; 3:11-12; 5:7; 9:7; 15:39; see, e.g., Kingsbury, 1983), christos too is an important term in Mark's acclamation of Jesus. The cluster of uses of christos in the accounts of Jesus' final conflict with the Jewish religious establishment their rejection of him and his execution at the hands of the Roman ruler reflects two things: (1) the close link in early Christian proclamation and in Mark between the term christos and Jesus' death, and (2) the recognition that the Christian identification of Jesus as christos involves a claim with special reference to Jewish religious hopes and beliefs.
Mark insists that christos receives its true meaning as a title for Jesus only in light of Jesus himself, his divinely ordained suffering and his transcendent significance as "Son of God." And Mark shows that the identification of Jesus as christos involves a claim that challenged the Jewish religious leadership, both for its handling of Jesus in his own ministry and for its continued negative response to the early Christian proclamation about Jesus.

The clustering of uses of christos in the final chapters of the story of Jesus is found also in Matthew and Luke, as we shall see. Thus, Mark was either influential in this matter and/or with the other Synoptics reflected the association of christos with references to Jesus' death. But unlike the other Evangelists, Mark's use of christos is almost entirely confined to the passion material, making the association of the term with the death of Jesus more emphatic.

3.2. Matthew. With some ninety per cent of Mark appearing also in Matthew, it is not surprising that a considerable number of the Markan uses of christos reappear in Matthew. But there are also noteworthy distinctives in Matthew's use of the term, including his pattern of usage.

First, there is a cluster of occurrences of christos early in the book. The opening words of Matthew (1:1) refer to "Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham." This illustrates the Judaic flavor of Matthew's account and prefigures the way Matthew will connect Jesus to the history and religious hopes of Israel in the material that follows. The Judaic quality of Matthew's presentation of Jesus is evident also in 1:16, which concludes Jesus' genealogy by referring to him simply as "the Christ" The connection between Jesus and Israel is illustrated in 1:17, which portrays Israel's history in three stages, culminating with "the Christ"

Matthew's emphasis on the royal connotations of the term "Christ" is indicated in 2:1-4, where the Magi ask about the birth of the "king of the Jews" and Herod responds by inquiring about OT prophecies of the birthplace of "the Christ"

But following this cluster of occurrences, christos does not appear in Matthew until 11:2, where the imprisoned Baptist hears of "the deeds of the Christ" the works of Jesus (cf. Lk 7:18). This phrase may refer retrospectively to the entire preceding narrative of Jesus' ministry (Mt 1 — 10). If so, it gives an explicitly messianic coloring to the whole.
Matthew's affirmation of the christos title is also evident in the next occurrence of the term in 16:16, where Peter acclaims Jesus as "the Christ the Son of the living God." This forms Matthew's parallel to Mark 8:29. The second part of the acclamation both expands Mark's simpler form and makes each of the two titles interpret the other. That is, "Son of the living God" underscores Jesus' exalted status, and "the Christ" emphasizes that this divine Son fulfills all messianic hopes. Matthew 16:20 retains from Mark 8:30 Jesus' command to secrecy, but the order to silence concerning the christos title is more explicit in Matthew than in Mark. As in Mark, there is a cluster of occurrences of christos in the chapters concerning Jesus' final days in Jerusalem. Matthew 22:41-45 presents the question about the Christ as Son of David (discussed above), and like Mark makes the question the climax of a series of debates between Jesus and his critics. But in a saying unique to Matthew (23:10), the disciples are told that their true "master" (kathēgetēs) is "the Christ" This reflects Matthew's emphasis that "the Christ" is the authoritative teacher of the community, a theme most evident in the large blocks of teaching material in this Gospel (chaps. 5—7, 10, 13,18,23-25).

The remaining occurrences in Matthew appear in passages paralleled in Mark. But the Matthean form of the passages generally make more explicit the theme of Jesus' messianic status. In 24:5 the deceivers' false claim, which conflicts with Jesus' rightful status, is directly messianic; "I am the Christ" (cf. 24:23; Mk 13:6, "I am"). In 26:63-64 the priest's question as to whether Jesus claims to be "the Christ the Son of God" is introduced with a solemn adjuration; and though Jesus' response appears less direct ("You have said so"), it is to be taken as a positive reply. This is confirmed in 26:68 by the distinctively Matthean form of the taunt by Jesus' tormentors, "Prophesy to us, you Christ!" (cf. Mk 14:65; Lk 22:64). And finally, in a uniquely Matthean wording, Pilate twice asks what the Jews wish him to do with "Jesus who is called Christ" (27:17,23), making the question of Jesus' messiahship quite explicit.

It is clear that christos is a major christological title for Matthew. In comparison with Mark, the title seems more prominent and important an item of religious vocabulary in Matthew. "Christ" appears in Matthew over twice as many times as in Mark and in passages where the term is lacking in the Markan parallel. Further, there is a more explicit connection between christos and Israel in Matthew, a feature particularly evident in the nativity account Like Mark, however, Matthew has a cluster of occurrences in the material describing Jesus' final conflict with the Jewish leaders and his execution. And, like Mark, for Matthew it is Jesus who defines the term "Christ/Messiah" rather than it being defined by others. Jewish expectations about Messiah are not adequate for considering Jesus' messianic claims. Thus, Jesus the Christ is "Son of the living God," and his rejection and crucifixion form an important part of his messianic mission, both of these claims constituting significant modifications of pre-Christian messianic speculation.

3.3. Luke. In considering the use of christos in Luke, we must also take account of the second volume of the author's work, the Acts of the Apostles, which we shall briefly examine first (see also Fitzmyer, 197-200).

3.3.1. Usage in Acts. A little over half (thirteen) of the twenty-five occurrences of christos in Acts are in formulaic references to Jesus: "Jesus Christ" (2:38; 3:6; 4:10; 8:12; 9:34; 10:36, 48; 16:18), "Christ Jesus" (18:5; 24:24), "the Lord Jesus Christ" (11:17; 15:26; 28:31). Aside from 4:26, where christos appears in a quotation from Psalm 2:2, the other eleven occurrences are in descriptions of Christians attempting to persuade Jews that Jesus is "the Christ," that is, they attempt to present Jesus as the fulfillment of messianic hopes. In these cases, the term is used as a title and obviously derives its meaning from the context of Jewish expectations of a messiah. Some of the Acts passages reflect the attempt to deal with Jesus' sufferings as the fulfillment of OT texts interpreted as messianic prophecies (2:31; 3:18; 17:3; 26:23). Other passages describe a more general claim that Jesus is the Messiah (2:36; 3:20; 5:42; 8:5; 9:22; 18:28).

Acts claims to present the preaching of the earliest decades of Christianity. This, plus the peculiar wording of some passages in Acts, has led some scholars to argue that from this book we can reconstruct early forms of Christian faith in the book that are distinguishable from more mature forms in other NT writings. Sometimes these suggestions focus on 2:36, where God is said to have "made him [Jesus] both Lord and Christ," or on 3:20, which describes Jesus as "the Christ appointed for you [Israel]." In the former passage, it is suggested, we may have a remnant of an early adoptionist type of christology in which Jesus is seen as being appointed Messiah at his resurrection. In the latter passage some have found a remnant of the view of Jesus as a kind of Messiah-designate, who will exercise his office only in the future when he is sent to preside in the eschatological restoration of Israel. Scholars proposing these suggestions believe that we may be able to see traces of the development and change in the earliest Christian understanding of Jesus as Messiah.
The author of Acts certainly did not embrace either of the forms of christology just described. Luke's birth narrative (Luke 1—2), for example, shows that the author regarded Jesus as Messiah from the time of his miraculous conception onward (see Birth of Jesus). And it is questionable that he would have incorporated christological views in tension with his own in his account of early Christianity without indicating that they were deficient. This does not settle fully the question of the original meaning of the statements, but it suggests that the author of Acts did not understand the statements the way some modern scholars have.

In fact, nothing in either passage conveys the christological views some attribute to them. The titles "Lord and Christ" (kyrios and christos) in Acts 2:36 represent quite an exalted view of Jesus, and the passage simply asserts that Jesus holds such an exalted status by God's will. Nothing demands the conclusion that Jesus was made Messiah only at his baptism or resurrection. It is anachronistic to read an adoptionist christology into this passage. Similarly, 3:20 simply urges that, in spite of its rejection of Jesus, Israel may yet partake in the fulfillment of messianic hopes by recognizing in Jesus its only true Messiah. We certainly have here a reflection of the eschatological orientation of early Christian faith, which included the conviction that Jesus the Messiah would be vindicated on a grand scale in a future triumph of God's purposes. But, again, nothing in Acts 3:20 requires the conclusion that it preserves traces of a purely futurist understanding of Jesus' messiahship. The passages can be read as reflecting some sort of adoptionist or purely futurist messianism only by first presuming what must first be demonstrated—that such views must have characterized the earliest Christian circles. But our constructions of early christologies must surely rest on more than presumptions.

In sum, the use of christos in Acts reflects three characteristics: (1) "Christ" is part of the common namelike designation of Jesus in early Christian circles; (2) the term was also used as a title when the author wished to make explicit the claim that Jesus was the fulfillment of Israel's hopes for God's redemption; (3) the author shows special concern to insist that Jesus' crucifixion was predicted in the OT and does not disqualified Jesus from being Messiah (see Death of Jesus; Typology).

3.3.2. Usage in the Gospel. The frequent use of christos as a title in Acts is to be set alongside the consistent use of the term in this way in all twelve occurrences in Luke's Gospel. The one possible exception is 2:11, where the angel announces the birth of "a Savior, who is Christ the Lord" [christos kyrios]. But even here it is probable that the author uses the term as a title, "the Christ, the Lord" (cf. Acts 2:36; assuming that the variant attested in some versions, "the Lord's Christ" [christos kyriou], is not the original reading).

Certainly in all other occurrences of christos in Luke the term is used as a title (Messiah) and Jesus is explicitly connected with ancient Jewish messianic hopes. This connection is evident in 2:26, where we are introduced to Simeon, who awaited the "consolation of Israel" and had been promised by God that he would live to see "the Lord's Christ" (see Simeon's Song). Likewise, in 3:15 the Baptist is asked if he is "the Christ," and replies by contrasting himself with the "mightier" one coming after him. In 4:41 the demons'* knowledge of Jesus has to do explicitly with his messianic status: "they knew that he [Jesus] was the Christ" (cf. Mk 1:34). Thereafter, christos does not appear until 9:20 in Peter's acclamation of Jesus as "The Christ of God," a more Judaic-sounding acclamation than the versions in Matthew 16:16 and Mark 8:29. (Note also the Jewish mockery of Jesus in Luke 23:35.)

As with the other Synoptics, Luke also presents a clustering of occurrences of christos in the material describing Jesus' final days of conflict in Jerusalem. There is Jesus' question about Messiah being thought of as David's son (20:41), an issue we have dealt with earlier in our discussion of Mark. Unlike Matthew and Mark, in Luke 21:8 Jesus' prediction of deceivers does not explicitly mention false messiahs, but refers only to those who will say, "I am he!" In the Jewish trial, however, the priest demands simply whether Jesus claims to be "the Christ" (22:67), and the following question, "Are you the Son of God, then?" (22:70) should also be taken as an inquiry about Jesus' messianic claim. Jesus' response, "You say that I am," seems less direct than the Markan version (14:62), but is no doubt to be taken as an affirmation. As we have seen, Luke clearly presents Jesus as Messiah. This emphasis is further borne out in the Lukan version of the charges against Jesus before Pilate in 23:2, which includes the statement that Jesus claimed to be "Christ a king." Luke thereby links the Jewish and Roman trials as considerations of Jesus' messiahship. For, in spite of Pilate's statement that he found Jesus innocent of any of the charges against him (23:13-16, 22), the mockery by both Jews and Romans (23:35-37) and the inscription on the cross (23:38) make Jesus' execution a rejection of his messianic claim.

The final Lukan affirmations of Jesus' messiahship appear in 24:26-27 and 44-47, where the risen Jesus identifies himself as "the Christ" whose sufferings and subsequent glory are predicted in the OT. At the same time, these passages also show that Jesus' messianic status involves a significant departure from more familiar Jewish messianic expectations, especially in light of his crucifixion. Even Jesus' disciples are pictured as ill-prepared for his execution ("O foolish men, and slow of heart to believe," 24:25), and the risen Jesus must "open their minds" to read the OT so as to see that all was predicted (24:27,45).

Thus, as with the other Synoptics, in Luke the claim that Jesus is "Christ" is not simply an identification of him with Jewish expectations but is a redefinition of the meaning of messiahship. And this redefinition is based almost entirely on the story of Jesus, producing a distinctively Christian notion of "the Christ" Luke emphasizes the sufferings of "the Christ" as the divinely predicted completion and core of his earthly work, issuing in the proclamation of forgiveness to Israel and the world (24:47) recounted in Acts (e.g., 1:8).

Like Matthew, Luke emphatically links Jesus with the OT and Israel. This is reflected in the pattern of occurrences of christos in both Gospels. Both Matthew and Luke have important occurrences in their nativity narratives as well as the cluster of occurrences in their final chapters, and both nativity accounts make Jesus' birth the fulfillment of Israelite hopes. To be sure, both Matthew and Luke also make Jesus' messiahship a crisis for Israel, and portray the Jewish rejection of Jesus as a failure to embrace Israel's true king. Modern scholarship has given much attention to the critique of the Jews in these Gospels. In light of the way Christian societies have treated Jews over the centuries, this critique has an uncomfortable ring to it. But the strongly negative portrayal of Jewish opponents of Jesus in the Gospels did not arise from simple maliciousness. It reflects how deeply important to early Christians was the conviction that Jesus was "the Christ" the Messiah understood to have been promised by God in the OT and pictured in various ways (inaccurately, in the eyes of early Christians) in ancient Jewish tradition. For the Christians whose faith is reflected in the Gospels, Jesus was certainly much more than the Messiah of any Jewish expectation, but they never surrendered the claim that Jesus was also the true Messiah.

3.4. John. The profound redefinition of messiahship in early Christianity and the tension with Jewish messianic traditions is nowhere more evident than in John. Of the nineteen occurrences of christos in John, only two are formulaic ("Jesus Christ" 1:17; 17:3). In all other occurrences christos is used as a title and Jewish messianic expectations are either mentioned or alluded to. Although there is much more to the christology of John than the claim that Jesus is the Messiah, the comparatively greater frequency of chritos in John and the emphatic way the term functions in the narrative make it clear that Jesus' messiahship is a major feature of the author's faith.

Perhaps most important for assessing the significance of chritos in John is 20:31, where the author explicitly gives his purpose as seeking to promote belief that "Jesus is the Christ the Son of God." On the one hand, the acclamation of Jesus as "the Christ" forms a central part of the author's own summary of Christian faith, one of the two titles the author chooses here to portray Jesus. On the other hand, "the Christ" is also "the Son of God," and John regards Jesus' divine sonship as the key christological category, involving the understanding of Jesus as preexistent and sharing richly in divine glory (e.g., 17:1-5). Thus, 20:31 reflects the claims that Jesus is the Messiah and that this Messiah is much more exalted than Jewish messianic speculations characteristically allowed. Though these claims are also reflected in varying ways in the other canonical Gospels, in John they are asserted with particular force.

Much more than the other Evangelists, John uses Jewish messianic speculations as a foil for the presentation of Jesus. In 1:19-28 he introduces us to Jewish speculations, where Jewish authorities interrogate the Baptist as to whether he claims to be "the Christ," Elijah* or "the prophet"-—and to each he answers negatively. The Baptist acclaims Jesus as "the Lamb of God" (1:29, 35) and "the Son of God" (1:34), but these titles must be read in connection with 3:25-30, where the Baptist again denies that he himself is "the Christ" and applies the title to Jesus. The author presents the Baptist as a true witness to Jesus, and the Baptist's acclamations refer both to Jesus' divine sonship and his messianic status.

The implied messianism in the Baptist's acclamation of Jesus is confirmed in the narratives reporting the responses to Jesus by, among others, the followers of the Baptist. In 1:41 Andrew refers to Jesus as "the Messiah" (messias), and this transliterated Aramaic term is translated by the author as chritos. In 1:45 Philip describes Jesus as the one predicted in "the law and also the prophets." That the Messiah is in mind is confirmed shortly in the guileless Nathaniel's acclamation of Jesus as "the Son of God ... the King of Israel" (1:49). As Jesus' response to Nathaniel suggests (1:50-51), these disciples do not realize the fullness of Jesus' person and status, but John intends us to see that their acclamations of Jesus in messianic categories are correct as far as they go.
In 7:25-44 Jewish messianic speculations are played off against the messianic identity of Jesus. The crowd wonders if the authorities secretly think that Jesus is "the Christ" (7:26), but some find difficulty reconciling this interpretation of Jesus with a tradition that "when the Christ appears, no one will know where he comes from" (7:27, a messianic tradition not otherwise clearly attested). In 7:31 there is an allusion to the Messiah as one who performs signs, and Jesus' signs are taken by some as suggesting Jesus' messiahship. A little later we read (7:40-44) that while some conclude that Jesus is "the Christ," others have difficulty reconciling Jesus' Galilean background with traditions that Messiah will come from Bethlehem and be a descendant of David.

Again, in 12:34 the crowd refers to a tradition that "the Christ remains forever" and questions how this can be reconciled with Jesus' prediction that he will be "lifted up." And the Samaritan* woman alludes to a tradition that Messiah "will show us all things" (4:25), finding in Jesus' uncanny knowledge of her life a suggestion that he may be "the Christ" (4:29).

The accuracy of John's references to Jewish messianic traditions is an interesting question that cannot detain us here. Some of these traditions are not otherwise clearly attested, but recent research suggests that John includes some material of Palestinian provenance and these references to Jewish messianic traditions may be more valuable than some have recognized (see, e.g., M. de Jonge, 1972/73).

More germane to the present discussion is the question of what the author's point is in these passages. In brief, it seems that John is utilizing irony in the passages where the Jews cannot reconcile Jesus and their messianic traditions. The Jews unwittingly show that they do not properly understand their own traditions and/or do not really know enough about Jesus whom they think they know and can dismiss so easily. Thus, in light of passages such as 1:1-18 and 6:41-45, the reader sees that the Jews do not really know where Jesus comes from (heaven) and that Jesus does fulfill the tradition about Messiah's origin being unknown. Similarly, in 12:34 the Son of man who is to be "lifted up" does also "remain forever," for he has come down from heaven and ascends back to heavenly glory with God, thus fulfilling the messianic tradition invoked here. We are probably to take 7:40-42 as ironic also—John expects his readers to know the Christian tradition that Jesus was born in Bethlehem and so fulfills what "the Scripture said" about the birthplace of the Messiah.
The interplay between Jewish messianism and the early Christian redefinition is also evidenced in 10:22-39. Here "the Jews" ask Jesus directly if he claims to be "the Christ" (10:34), and Jesus' response is an indirect affirmation (10:25-39). But Jesus also quickly employs the Father/Son language to describe his status, and its offensiveness to the Jews (10:33, 39) shows that it is intended to connote much more than a simple identification of Jesus as the Messiah of Jewish expectation. In this incident the Jews' problem is not their difficulty fitting what they know of Jesus rejecting Jesus. Jesus flees the crowd's attempt to make into some specific messianic tradition, but an inability him king "by force" (6:15) after the bread miracle; but to accept the claim that Jesus the Messiah is the Son of God who shares in divinity with the Father (10:37-38)

Other passages confirm that christos is an important christological title in John and that the author wishes to present Jesus as the true Messiah. In 9:22 it is the confession of Jesus as "the Christ" that leads to synagogue expulsion, a passage commonly thought today to reflect the christological controversies between the Johannine Christians and the Jewish authorities of their own day. In a manner unique among the Gospel writers, John twice links the term christos explicitly with the Semitic term "Messiah" (messias, 1:41; 4:25). The Fourth Evangelist considers Jewish definitions of the Messiah inadequate, but he does not surrender the basic category in portraying Jesus.

Within the Lazarus episode, structurally important as the seventh and climactic "sign" in John, Martha's acclamation of Jesus as "the Christ the Son of God" (11:27) both affirms Jesus' preceding self-description as "the resurrection and the life" and corresponds to the Evangelist's own description of the proper Christian confession in 20:31.

The tension between Jewish messianic traditions and the Johannine understanding of Jesus has led some scholars to suggest that christos was not such a major christological title for John (e.g., Maloney). Certainly, the Johannine view of Jesus as "the Son of God" is the key to the author's christology and the controlling motif in his presentation of Jesus. It is as "the Son" that Jesus' true transcendent significance is best disclosed. But John does not consider christos an inadequate title. Rather, he considers Jewish messianic speculations inadequate for a proper understanding of who Messiah is, and he regards the Jewish authorities as incapable of accepting the proper definition of Messiah and the divine Son. John does not reject christos as a christological title in favor of others, such as "Son of man" or "Son of God." He demands the recognition that Jesus, the divine Son and the Son of man, is "the Christ." He reflects a redefinition of "the Christ" category in light of Jesus' divine significance, and prefers the combination of "Christ" and "Son of God" as the way of confessing Jesus properly.

For John, Jesus is more than the messianic king of Israel, but he is the messianic king, albeit of such a transcendent stature as not imagined by "the Jews." This view of Jesus as Messiah is precisely why the author so sharply criticizes the Jewish authorities for rejecting Jesus. Jesus flees the crowd's attempt to make him king "by force" (6:15) after the bread miracle; but this should not be taken as a total rejection of the royal-messianic office, for other passages show that John affirms Jesus as the true king. For example, at Jesus' last entry into Jerusalem, the crowd greets Jesus as "the King of Israel" (12:13). In this event John sees the fulfillment of Zechariah 9:9, with its prediction of Zion's king coming to the city (12:14-16). Thus, however shallow the crowd's understanding as they acclaim Jesus king, the Evangelist sees the royal title as proper to Jesus.

The intertwining of the author's views of Jesus as royal Messiah and as transcendent Son of God appears also in the passion narrative* In 18:33-38 Pilate asks Jesus if he claims to be "king of the Jews," the Roman interpretation of the messianic claim, Jesus' response comprises a rejection of ordinary earthly kingship but an affirmation of his higher kingship and a consequent mission to "bear witness to the truth" of God. Subsequently, the author continues to weave together the theme of Jesus' kingship and his divine sonship. Several times Jesus is referred to contemptuously by the Romans as "king" (18:39; 19:3, 14-15), and in 19:19-22 the kingship theme is emphasized in the uniquely Johannine account of Pilate's (see Pontius Pilate) refusal to remove the title on the cross. The charges against Jesus in John are a combination of the messianic and transcendent aspects of his christology. In 19:12 "the Jews" accuse Jesus of making himself a king against Caesar, but in 19:7 Jesus is accused of blasphemy for making himself "the Son of God." Though the Jewish and Roman opponents of Jesus are ignorant of the ironic truth of their mockeries and charges, the reader of John is to see the greater truth of Jesus' divine sonship and royal status.

Unlike the Synoptic Gospels, where christos is almost entirely confined to the passion and nativity accounts (Mt and Lk), in John christos appears throughout the whole book, suggesting the title's importance for the Fourth Gospel.
Uniquely, John makes it clear that the Baptist is not Messiah and has the Baptist endorse Jesus as Messiah. John is also unique in having Jesus' first disciples acclaim him in a variety of messianic terms. Jesus is recognized as Messiah by the Samaritan woman, and at several points John portrays the inability of "the Jews" to recognize Jesus' messiahship. All these data make it evident that the author believes Jesus to be the true Messiah and considers Jesus' messianic significance an important feature of Christian faith.

John does not play off one christological title against another. He uses an abundance of honorific titles—many more than the other Evangelists—to describe Jesus (e.g., the several "I am" formulas; see "I Am" Sayings). "Son of man" is not a preferred alternative to "Christ" (contra Maloney). The Son of man, who has actually come down from heaven, is "the Christ, the Son of God"—this is the heart of John's faith.

4. Conclusion.

Modern scholarship has been criticized justly for depending too heavily on studies of the NT christological titles in its attempt to determine the nature of NT christology. No treatment of any or all the titles can disclose fully the christological faith of the NT writers. But titles such as "Christ" are significant indications of the faith of authors such as the four Evangelists. In all four Gospels, "Christ" is an important way of referring to Jesus. One can say that "Christ" is for the Evangelists an essential christological term. But they all show an awareness that early Christian faith involved both an appropriation and a major adaptation of the significance of the term as applied to Jesus.

In varying ways two major modifications of the Messiah category are reflected in the Gospels: (1) The crucifixion of Jesus was both a major obstacle to Jewish acceptance of Jesus as Messiah, requiring justification from the OT, and also the event that demanded of the early Christian circles a reformulation of the nature of the Messiah and his work; and (2) the early Christian conviction about the transcendent significance or nature of Jesus makes the Messiah much more exalted in nature and more centrally important for religious life than Jewish tradition was characteristically prepared to grant. (It would be anachronistic to read back into the Gospels the details of the "two nature" christology of later centuries. But only a shallow reading of the Gospels can fail to note the exalted, even transcendent, role and qualities attributed to Jesus in differing ways by each of the Evangelists.)

In the modifications of the Messiah category and the dogged insistence on retaining "Christ" as a title for Jesus in the four Gospels, we see something of the essence of early Christian faith, a religious movement that emerged initially as a distinctive development of the pre-Christian biblical tradition. In this development Jesus became "the Christ" for all nations and not just for Israel. But the Gospels show that early Christians tied their confession of Jesus as "the Christ" to the biblical heritage and to Israel's hopes for a redeemer. However much "Christ" became part of the name-formula for referring to Jesus, for the Evangelists the term retained a connection with ancient visions of God's decisive eschatological intervention on behalf of his people. For the Evangelists the Jewish rejection of Jesus was their rejection of Israel's Messiah.

As perhaps no other christological title, the Evangelists' use of "Christ" shows the Jewish roots of Christian faith and the innovation this faith represented.

See also Servant of Yahweh, Son of David, Son of God; Son of Man.

L.W. Hurtado

CHRISTOLOGY. See Christ; Logos; Son of David; Son of God; Son of Man; Wisdom.

CHRONOLOGY

A chronology of Jesus' life gives a framework of his ministry.

1. Birth of Jesus
2. Commencement of Jesus' Ministry
3. Duration of Jesus' Ministry
4. Death of Jesus
5. Summary

1. Birth of Jesus.

The early Christians were not as concerned with the date as they were with the fact of Jesus' birth (see Birth of Jesus). Both the year and time of year can only be approximately determined.

1.1. Year of Jesus' Birth. In attempting to pinpoint the year of his birth, one must look at it in relationship to Herod's death and the census of Quiriniius.

1.1.1. Herod the Great's Death As the Terminus ad Quern. According to Matthew 2:1 and Luke 1:5 Jesus' birth came before Herod's death (see Herodian Dynasty). According to Josephus an eclipse of the moon occurred shortly before Herod's death (Ant. 17.6.4 §167). This is the only eclipse mentioned by Josephus,* and this occurred on March 12/13, 4 B.C. After Herod's death Josephus mentions that the Passover (see Feasts) was celebrated, the first day of which would have occurred on April 11, 4 B.C. Hence, Herod's death would have occurred between March 12 and April 11, and thus Jesus' birth would have been no later than March/April 4 B.C.

1.1.2. Census of Quirinius as the Terminus a Quo. According to Luke 2:1-5 the census of Quirinius was taken just before Jesus' birth and hence Jesus could not have been born before the census. The date of this census is difficult to pinpoint. Although no Roman historian specifically mentions this census, there were periodic censuses. Furthermore, Luke was not confusing this with the one held in AD. 6 because that was just after the deposition of Herod's son Archelaus, whereas the context of the birth narrative of Jesus was in the days of Herod the Great. Trying to synchronize Quirinius's governorship of Syria with the time just before Herod's death proves difficult. Some suggest that he was governor not only in AD. 6, but also from 11/10 to 8/7 B.C. Others suggest that this census took place before Quirinius was governor in A.D. 6/7, and some think that Quirinius had been proconsul of Syria and Cilicia during the last years of Herod the Great under the legates Saturninus and Varus. Regardless of what construct one may propose, it is not improbable that Quirinius was involved with a census during the last years of Nero. Toward the end of his reign Herod fell out of favor with Rome* (c. 8/ 7 B.C.). This was followed by his sons engaging in an intense struggle for the throne at a time when Herod was extremely ill. All of these factors would allow for the Roman government to take a census in his land in order to assess the situation before his death. Although it is difficult to pinpoint the exact year of the census, it was probably sometime between 6 and 4 B.C.

1.1.3. Star of the Magi. Some think that Jesus' birth must have occurred around 6 B.C. because Herod killed children up to two years of age (Mt 2:16) and that the star of the magi (Mt 2:2) can be identified with the confluence of planets at approximately 7 or 6 B.C. However, it is difficult to identify the star of the magi in this way because there was also a conjunction of the planets in 5 and 4 B.C. Also, the description that the star "stood over where the child was" in Bethlehem seems not to indicate a natural confluence of planets but a supernatural phenomenon. Furthermore, the account of Herod killing male children up to two years old in an effort to assure the death of Jesus was characteristic of Herod's paranoia regarding a successor to his throne. It is conceivable that Herod and the magi thought that Jesus had been born when the magi first saw the star in the East possibly a year or two before their audience with Herod. Although the appearance of the star does not give additional evidence for chronology, it is reasonable to see the magi's discussion with Herod as occurring toward the end of his life, possibly 5 or 4 B.C.

1.2. Date of Jesus' Birth. The traditional date of Christ's birth for the Western Church has been December 25, while the Eastern Church has observed a January 6 date. The account of shepherds attending their flocks during the night (Lk 2:8) does not make a midwinter date improbable.

1.3. Conclusion. With the census of Quirinius having occurred sometime during the period 6-4 B.C., and Herod's death having occurred in the spring of 4 B.C., it seems likely that Jesus was born in December 5 B.C. or January 4 B.C.

2. Commencement of Jesus' Ministry.

Except for the account of Jesus' visit to the Temple* when he was twelve year old (Lk 2:41-51), the Gospels do not provide chronological data until the beginning of his ministry.

2.1. Commencement of John the Baptist's Ministry. Luke 3:1-3 specifically states that John the Baptist's (see John the Baptist) ministry began in the fifteenth year of Tiberius. Although there has been debate about how this is to be reckoned, the most natural way to calculate it would be on the basis of either the Julian calendar used by Rome, making it the fifteenth year from January 1 to December 31, A.D. 29, or to reckon it from the beginning of Tiberius' reign (the normal Roman method), which would place it during the period August 19, A.D. 28 to August 18, A.D. 29. Using either one of these calendars, the fifteenth year of Tiberius would have occurred sometime between August 19, AD. 28 and December 31, AD. 29. Hence, John the Baptist's ministry began sometime during this period.

2.2. Commencement of Jesus' Ministry. The Gospels give the impression that not long after the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry, Jesus was baptized and began his ministry. If Jesus were born in the winter of 5/4 B.C. and baptized in the summer or autumn of A.D. 29, he would have been around thirty-two years of age, with his thirty-third birthday approaching in December, 29 or January, 30. This fits well with Luke's statement that Jesus was about (hōsei) thirty years of age when he began his ministry (3:23).

2.3. First Passover of Jesus' Ministry. The first recorded visit of Jesus to Jerusalem after his baptism* is found in John 2:13—3:21. John records that on that occasion the Jews spoke of the Herodian Temple having been constructed forty-six years ago (Jn 2:20). Josephus states that Temple construction began in Herod's eighteenth year (Josephus Ant. 15.11.1 §380), which coincides with the arrival of Augustus in Syria (Josephus Ant. 15.10.3 §354), and according to Dio Cassius this occurred in the spring or summer of 20 B.C. (Dio Cassius 54.7.4-6). Herod's eighteenth year would have been from Nisan 1, 20 B.C. to Nisan 1,19 B.C. There were two stages in building the Temple: the first was the inner sanctuary, called the naos, located within the priests' court. This sanctuary was completed by the priests (see Priest and Priesthood) in one year and six months (Josephus Ant. 15.11.6 §421). The second stage included the whole Temple area, including the three courts, and was called the hieron. This was not completed until A.D. 63. This distinction is maintained by Josephus and the NT writers. In discussing the Temple with Jesus, the Jews were referring to the naos as having stood for forty-six years. If the construction of the naos began in 20/19 B.C. and was completed in one and a half years (i.e., in 18/17 B.C.), forty-six years would bring the date to the year A.D. 29/30. Consequently, Jesus' first Passover was the spring of A.D. 30.

2.4. Conclusion. The fifteenth year of Tiberius, A.D. 28-29, marked the commencement of John the Baptist's ministry. If John began his ministry in the early part of AD. 29 and Jesus was baptized in the summer or autumn of that same year, he would have been thirty-two-years old. Jesus' first Passover in A.D. 30 would have been four to nine months after he began his ministry, which was forty-six years after the naos was completed. Therefore, Jesus began his ministry sometime in the summer or autumn of AD. 29.

3. Duration of Jesus' Ministry.

Facts relating to the length of Jesus' ministry are gathered primarily from John. John mentions three Passovers (Jn 2:13; 6:4; 11:55). However, there needs to be an additional year of his ministry between the Passovers of John 2:13 and 6:4. The Passover of 6:4 took place around the time Jesus fed the five thousand, the only miracle mentioned in all four Gospels. Previous to this feeding miracle* the Synoptic Gospels mention the disciples plucking grain in Galilee* (Mt 12:1 ; Mk 2:23; 116:1 ), and this must have taken place after the Passover of John 2:13. The reason for this is that the Passover of John 2:13 occurred shortly after Jesus' baptism and the locale of his ministry was in Judea, whereas the plucking of the grain occurred a considerable time after Jesus' baptism and the locale of his ministry was in Galilee. Therefore, the plucking of the grain would fit well around the Passover between the Passovers recorded in John 2:13 and 6:4.

John provides two other indications of time that would indicate an additional year between these two Passovers. First, after the Passover of John 2:13 Jesus ministered in Judea and then went to Samaria. There he mentioned that there were four months until harvest (Jn 4:35), which would mean the following January/February. While some would read this as a proverbial statement, it seems best to take this as a literal chronological reference. The second time-note is in John 5:1 where there is mention of another feast. Although not specified, some interpreters understand it to be another Passover, although it more likely refers to the Feast of Tabernacles. These two time-notes would substantiate that there was another Passover between those of John 2:13 and 6:4. This would make a total of four Passovers during Jesus' public ministry, and hence his ministry would have been 3 1/2 to 3 3/4. years in length.

4. Death of Jesus.

In determining the date of the death of Jesus (see Death of Jesus), it is necessary to discuss the day, as well as the year, of his death.

4.1. Day of Jesus' Death. In discussing the date of Jesus' death, we need to determine the day of the week and the day of the Jewish month.

4.1.1. Day of the Week. Traditionally, Jesus is thought to have died on the Friday of passion week. In Matthew 12:40 Jesus says: "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale; so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." From this evidence some conclude Jesus could not have died on Friday; Jesus may have died on Wednesday or Thursday, thus allowing for three days and three nights. However, when one recognizes that the Jews reckoned a part of a day as a whole day, Jesus' death on Friday does not present a real problem. Furthermore, the NT repeatedly refers to Jesus' resurrection as having occurred on the third day (not the fourth day; e.g., Mt 16:21; 17:23; Lk 9:22; 18:33; Acts 10:40; 1 Cor 15:4). Moreover, the Gospels specifically mention the day before the Sabbath* (Friday) as the day of his death (Mt 27:62; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:54; Jn 19:14, 31, 42). Therefore, both scripturally and traditionally, it seems best to accept Friday as the day of Jesus' death. The passion week can be charted as follows:

4.1.2. Day of the Month. All the Gospels state that Jesus ate the Last Supper* the day before his crucifixion (Mt 26:20; Mk 14:17; Lk 22:14; Jn 13:2; cf. also 1 Cor 11:23). The Synoptic Gospels (Mt 26:17; Mk 14:12; Lk 22:7-8) portray the Last Supper as the Passover meal celebrated on Thursday evening Nisan 14, with Jesus crucified the following day, namely, Friday Nisan 15. On the other hand, John states that the Jews who took Jesus to the praetorium did not enter it "in order that they might not be defiled but might eat the Passover" (Jn 18:28) and that Jesus' trial was on the "day of preparation for the Passover" and not after eating the Passover (Jn 19:14). This means that Jesus' Last Supper (which occurred on Thursday night Nisan 13) was not a Passover and that Jesus was tried and crucified on Friday, Nisan 14, just before the Jews ate their Passover.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Day</th>
<th>Event</th>
<th>Scripture</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Saturday</td>
<td>Arrived at Bethany</td>
<td>Jn 12:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sunday</td>
<td>Crowd came to see Jesus</td>
<td>Jn 12:9-11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monday</td>
<td>Triumphal Entry</td>
<td>Mt 21:1-9; Mk 11:1-10; Lk 19:28-44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tuesday</td>
<td>Cursed Fig Tree</td>
<td>Mt 21:18-19; Mk 11:12-14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tuesday</td>
<td>Cleansed Temple</td>
<td>Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:15-17; Lk 19:45-46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wednesday</td>
<td>Fig Tree Withered</td>
<td>Mt 21:20-22; Mk 11:20-26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wednesday</td>
<td>Temple Controversy</td>
<td>Mt 21:23-23:39; Mk 11:27—12:44; Lk 20:1—21:4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wednesday</td>
<td>Olivet Discourse</td>
<td>Mt 24:1—25:46; Mk 13:1-37; Lk 21:5-36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thursday</td>
<td>Last Supper</td>
<td>Mt 26:20-30; Mk 14:17-26; Lk 22:14-30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thursday</td>
<td>Betrayed and Arrested</td>
<td>Mt 26:47-56; Mk 14:43-52; Lk 22:47-53; Jn 18:2-12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thursday</td>
<td>Tried by Annas and Caiaphas</td>
<td>Mt 26:57-75; Mk 14:53-72; Lk 22:54-65; Jn 18:13-27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Friday</td>
<td>Tried by Sanhedrin</td>
<td>Mt 27:1; Mk 15:1; Lk 22:66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Friday</td>
<td>Tried by Pilate, Herod</td>
<td>Mt 27:2-30; Mk 15:2-19; Lk 23:1-25; Jn 18:28—19:16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Friday</td>
<td>Crucified and Buried</td>
<td>Mt 27:31-60; Mk 15:20-46; Lk 23:54-64; Jn 19:16-42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saturday</td>
<td>Dead in Tomb</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sunday</td>
<td>Resurrected</td>
<td>Mt 28:1-15; Mk 16:1-8; Lk 24:1-35</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Several theories have been proposed in the attempt to reconcile the Synoptics and John. Some think that the Last Supper was not a Passover meal but a meal the night before the Passover (Jn 13:1, 29). However, the Synoptics explicitly state that the Last Supper was a Passover (Mt 26:2,17-19; Mk 14:1,12,14,16; Lk 22:1, 7-8, 13, 15). In trying to harmonize the accounts some have proposed that Jesus and his disciples* had a private Passover. However, the Passover lamb had to be slaughtered within the Temple precincts and the priests would not have allowed the slaughter of the Paschal lamb for a private Passover. Others think that they celebrated it according to the Qumran calendar, but there is no evidence that Jesus and his disciples followed the Qumran calendar. Some think it was celebrated on two consecutive days because it would have been impossible to slay all the Passover lambs on one day. Finally, it may be that different calendars were in use during the period. On the one hand, the Synoptic Gospels followed the method of the Galileans and the Pharisees.* By this reckoning the day was measured from sunrise to sunrise, with Jesus and his disciples having their Paschal lamb slaughtered in the late afternoon of Thursday, Nisan 14, and eating the Passover with unleavened bread later that evening. On the other hand, John's Gospel followed the method of the Judeans in reckoning the day from sunset to sunset. Thus, the Judean Jews had the Paschal lamb slaughtered in the late afternoon of Friday Nisan 14, and ate the Passover with the unleavened bread that night, which by then had become Nisan 15. Thus, Jesus had eaten the Passover meal when his enemies, who had not yet celebrated the Passover, arrested him.

4.2. Year of Jesus' Death. The year of Jesus' death can be narrowed by several considerations.

4.2.1. Officials of the Trial. The three officials involved in the trial were Caiaphas the high priest (Mt 26:3, 57; Jn 11:49-53; 18:13-14), who began his office in A.D. 18 and was deposed at the Passover of AD. 37 (Josephus Ant. 18.2.2 §35; 4.3 §90-95); Pilate (see Pontius Pilate), prefect of Judea (Mt 27:2-26; Mk 15:1-15; Lk 23:1-25; Jn 18:28-19:16; Acts 3:13; 4:27; 13:28; 1 Tim 6:13) from AD. 26 to 36 (Josephus Ant. 18.4.2 §89); and Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Lk 23:6-12) from 4 B.C. until A.D. 39 (Josephus Ant. 18.7.1-2 §§240-56; 19.8.2 §351). Thus Jesus' trial must have occurred between AD. 26 and 36.

4.2.2. Contributions of Astronomy. Having concluded that Jesus' death occurred on Friday Nisan 14, and sometime between A.D. 26 and 36, astronomical evidence narrows the possibilities to AD. 27, 30, 33 and 36. Of these dates, A.D. 27 is the least likely astronomically, and it has been debated whether Nisan 14 fell on a Friday in AD. 30. The AD. 33 date presents the least problem astronomically.

4.2.3. Ministry of Christ. Having discussed the ministry of Jesus, it is safe to eliminate A.D. 27 and 36 because neither fits within the framework of his ministry. The year AD. 30 is accepted by many, but it presents real difficulty if one accepts the commencement of John the Baptist's ministry occurring in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, AD. 29 (Lk 3:1-3), for this would mean that Jesus' ministry could not have lasted more than one year. Again A.D. 33 seems to fit the evidence best.

4.2.4. Confirmation of History. Pilate is portrayed by his contemporary Philo (Leg. Gai. 301-2) and later by Josephus (Ant. 18.3.1. §§55-59; J.W. 2.9.2-4 §§167-77) as one who was greedy, inflexible and cruel, and who resorted to robbery and oppression, a portrait not out of keeping with Luke 13:1. However, during Jesus' trial, Pilate is seen as one who was readily submissive to the pressures of the religious leaders who were demanding that Jesus be handed over to them.

How can such a change be explained? It must be understood that Pilate was probably appointed by Sejanus, a trusted friend of Tiberius as well as the prefect of the Praetorian Guard. A dedicated anti-Semitic, Sejanus wanted to exterminate the Jewish race (Philo Flau. 1; Leg. Gai. 159-61). When Pilate made trouble for the Jews in Palestine, Sejanus accepted his actions and did not report it to Tiberius. However, when Sejanus was deposed and executed by Tiberius on October 18, A.D. 31, Pilate no longer had protection in Rome. In fact, it is most likely that Herod Antipas reported his causing a riot, probably at the Feast of Tabernacles in AD. 32 (Philo Leg. Gai. 299-305). In light of this precedent we can understand why, when in the midst of a trial it was witnessed that Jesus stirred up trouble in Judea and Galilee (Lk 23:5), Pilate was eager to allow Herod Antipas to try Jesus (Lk 23:6-12).

In this context a trial date of AD. 33 makes good sense for three reasons: (1) Pilate, on hearing that Jesus caused trouble in Galilee, handed Jesus over to Herod Antipas. Though this was not required by Roman law, it would have been calculated to avoid a further report from Herod to the emperor. (2) The lack of progression in the trial account of Luke 23:6-12 makes sense if Herod Antipas did not want to make a judgment that Pilate might use against him. (3) Luke 23:12 states that Pilate and Herod Antipas were friends from that day onward, which would be inaccurate if the crucifixion were in A.D. 30 because they were clearly at odds with each other in A.D. 32. Hence, a date of A.D. 33 best fits the historical evidence.

4.3. Conclusion. Having discussed the day of the week and month as well as the year of his death, we conclude that the evidence points to Jesus' dying on Friday Nisan 14/April 3, A.D. 33.

5. Summary.

The birth, life and death of Jesus can be charted as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Event</th>
<th>Date</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Jesus' Birth</td>
<td>Winter 5/4 B.C.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Herod the Great's Death</td>
<td>March/April 4 B.C.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commencement of the Baptist's Ministry</td>
<td>A.D. 29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commencement of Jesus' Ministry</td>
<td>Summer/Autumn A.D 29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus' First Passover (Jn 2:13)</td>
<td>April 7, A.D. 30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus' Second Passover</td>
<td>April 25, A.D. 31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus at Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 5:1)</td>
<td>October 21-28, A.D. 31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus' Third Passover (Jn 6:4)</td>
<td>April 13/14, A.D. 32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus at Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7:2,10)</td>
<td>September 10-17, A.D. 32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus at Feast of Dedication (Jn 10:22-39)</td>
<td>December 18, A.D. 32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus' Death</td>
<td>Friday, April 3, A.D. 33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus' Resurrection</td>
<td>Sunday, April 5, A.D. 33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus' Ascension (Acts 1)</td>
<td>Thursday, May 14. AD 33</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

H. W. Hoehner

CHURCH

The mission of Jesus was concerned with the creation of a community which formed the basis of the church that developed after Easter and Pentecost.

1. The Problem
2. The Kingdom of God and Community
3. The ekklēsia Sayings
4. Jesus and the Structures of the Church
5. Continuity between the Church and Jesus

1. The Problem.

The four Gospels were produced in Christian communities by persons who believed that the existence of these groups was the proper consequence of the coming of Jesus. Inevitably they reflect to some extent the nature, life and interests of the churches in which they were produced. The actual word "church" (Gk ekklēsia) is found in Matthew 16:18 and 18:17. The latter passage describes a procedure to be followed if a person's "brother" sins against him; if the matter cannot be setded privately or by a small group, it is to be brought before "the church," and we may presume that this practice was followed in communities known to Matthew. In the former passage Jesus promises that he will build his church "on this rock [Gk petra]" having previously said to Peter: "You are Peter [Gk petros, 'rock']." These, however, are the only two uses of the term in all four Gospels, and this infrequency of usage, combined with a suspicion that the texts may indeed represent primarily the theology and practice of groups known to Matthew, has caused doubts whether these sayings attributed to Jesus truly represent his words or even his mind.

Some scholars would go even further and deny that Jesus intended the church. They are not suggesting that Jesus thought purely in individualistic terms. Rather their position is determined by an understanding of his teaching which holds that his mind was dominated by the imminent end of the world and the coming of the kingdom of God*—a "thorough-going" eschatology* which affected the entirety of his thinking and, in particular, left no time for the development of an organized community. Thus C. K Barrett suggests that "beyond the time of suffering he envisaged no period of continuing history, in which a Church organized in this world might find a place, but an apocalyptic act of vindication" (p. 87; see Apocalyptic Teaching). To be sure, events proved Jesus to be wrong: "Jesus foretold the kingdom, and it was the Church that came" (A. Loisy, quoted by Barrett, p. 68) sums up crisply what happened according to this view. Such a denial that Jesus expected the church does not rest merely on a critical examination of two texts but on a total interpretation of the eschatology of Jesus.

A less radical view is presented by E. Schweizer, who allows that Jesus called disciples but claims that he did nothing to create a group distinguishable from the rest of the world. Schweizer here takes a remarkably existentialist view of the mission of Jesus, a view that seems to be shaped by his genuine concern to warn against thinking that belonging to a particular group can insulate a person from a real meeting with Jesus.

2. The Kingdom of God and Community.

Two factors may lead us to see things differently. The first is that a different interpretation of the eschatology of Jesus is possible and indeed preferable and is widely held. Jesus, it can be claimed, saw the fulfillment of the hope of the coming of the kingdom of God happening during his ministry and looked forward to its future consummation at an unspecified point in the future. If this point be granted, then a different understanding becomes possible. The second factor is that the original question may have been wrongly put, or at least wrongly focussed. It is more appropriate to ask what intention Jesus may have had with respect to community.

2.1. Community. The concept of the kingdom of God implies a community. While it has been emphasized almost ad nauseam that the primary concept is that of the sovereignty or kingship or actual rule of God and not of a territory ruled by a king, it must be also emphasized that kingship cannot be exercised in the abstract but only over a people. The concept of the kingship of God implies both the existence of a group of people who own him as king and the establishment of a realm of people within which his gracious power is manifested. Past scholarship rightly reacted against the tendency to identify the kingdom of God with the empirical, visible church (and above all to identify the rule of God with the exercise of authority by church leaders), but this reaction has obscured the fact that there is a community of people who own God as king (however imperfectly they may obey him) and in whom his gracious power is at work.

2.2. Israel. Jesus' message was directed toward Israel* and was concerned with the renewal of Israel, i.e., of the people of God. The goal was the renewal of the people as a community and not simply the repentance of individuals, although the path to the former lay through the latter. This point has been emphasized by B. F. Meyer. Jesus used imagery which spoke of Israel as a vineyard which needed new tenants to care for it He prophesied doom in collective terms for those who did not respond to his message. He expressed concern for the lost sheep* of the house of Israel and might almost have been suspected of a concern for Israel to the exclusion of the Gentiles.* His concern is expressed for people in that they are "daughters of Abraham" or "sons of Abraham" (Lk 13:16; 19:9; see Abraham).

An important text (Mt 19:28/Lk 22:29-30) promises that the Twelve (see Disciples) will sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (see Judgment). This text, which seems particularly time-bound to modern readers, probably refers to the Twelve sharing in judgment on the unbelieving people of Israel in association with Jesus rather than to some kind of rule over a reconstituted ethnic Israel. The language is symbolical, but the symbolism points to some kind of community which corresponds to the twelve tribes of Israel. Jesus is saying in the strongest way possible that the old Israel is coming under judgment, and that the judgment will be in the hands of those who have been called by him as his close disciples. The implication is that there will be what we may call a new Israel.

2.3. Discipleship. Jesus called people to be his disciples. Here we have to make a distinction between the group of the Twelve who were specially called to be associated with him in his mission (and who came to be known as apostles) and the much wider group who did not in every case travel from place to place with him. Some of the sayings about discipleship* may be particularly directed to the former group, but nevertheless the concept of "following Jesus" is part of the message addressed to all who sought eternal life or a place in the kingdom of God.

2.4. Communal Images. It is, then, not surprising that various communal images are found in the teaching of Jesus. The disciples form the "little flock" (Lk 12:32). They are likened to a "city" (Mt 5:14), to a planted field (Mt 13:24; 15:13) or to a group of wedding guests (Mk 2:19). In an important saying Jesus speaks of his disciples as members of his family* (Mk 3:34-35) and he both regards their relationship to him as somehow replacing his normal kinship relationships and also requires them to have a love for him greater than for their kin (Mk 10:29-30). Within this grouping the disciples are to regard themselves as brothers (Mt 23:8).

3. The Ékklēsia Sayings.

In the light of this argument it becomes credible that Jesus did speak of the disciples as constituting an ékklēsia. This term could be the translation-equivalent of more than one Hebrew or Aramaic word (see Languages of Palestine). It can refer to a local group of pious people, equivalent to a "synagogue"* (a synagogue is first of all a group of people and only secondarily the place where they meet).

3.1. Matthew 18:17. The saying in Matthew 18:17 can be taken in this way. It could admittedly make sense in the lifetime of Jesus as an isolated saying regarding discipline within a Jewish community (notice how Jesus assumes that his hearers offer sacrifices at the Temple, Mt 5:23-24). In this setting it would not be surprising for pious Jews to regard recalcitrant brothers "like a Gentile or tax-collector."

However, Matthew certainly thought that Jesus was addressing disciples, for the pericope goes on to assume the hearers meet together "in my name" (Mt 18:20), which is precisely what "church" signifies. The saying presupposes that the disciples constitute such a group, which implies some kind of organization, and to which there is no other reference in the teaching of Jesus. Nothing anywhere else indicates that he organized his disciples (whether the Twelve or a wider group) in this kind of way.

Further, this is an extraordinary statement on the lips of Jesus in view of his positive attitude to tax-collectors (cf. Mk 2:15-17). It is not surprising that many commentators would regard this pericope as a creation of the early church and as reflecting a narrowly Jewish-Christian church with an exclusive attitude toward Gentiles and tax-collectors (see Taxes).

One difficulty with this view is that elsewhere Matthew shows the same positive attitude to tax-collectors as we find in the other Gospels (Mt 9:10-11; 11:19; 21:31-32). Clearly the saying refers to some kind of breaking off of relations with the unrepentant offender, and the problem is simply whether Jesus or his followers (who knew his attitude to tax-collectors and sinners*) could have used this form of expression to make the point. The solution may be that Jesus is deliberately using shocking language: so dreadful is it that within the community of disciples a person should persist in sin that his fellow-disciples should treat him just as the Jews treated tax-collectors and sinners. This interpretation frees Matthew from an almost unbelievable inconsistency. Jesus' language is startling and liable to misinterpretation—as it often has been.

The reference to the ekklēsia still remains strange. However, if Jesus expected persecution for his followers, he may well have foreseen their exclusion from the synagogues and their consequent organization into their own groups. Matthew's readers would have had no difficulty with the saying since they would assume that Jesus was speaking prophetically of the local church and they would read it in the light of the previous use of the term in Matthew 16.

3.2. Matthew 16:18. This passage creates less difficulty. It has been shown that the language used here corresponds to that used at Qumran where God appointed the Teacher of Righteousness to build for himself a congregation (ēdā) (4QpPs37.III:16; see Dead Sea Scrolls). Several factors are significant for understanding this passage.

First, Jesus creates a (new) "congregation" which is evidently a special group within Judaism. This fits in with the self-consciousness of the Qumran community who saw themselves in the same way. Second, whereas at Qumran God creates a congregation for himself, Jesus speaks of building "my congregation," thus apparently himself taking the place of God. More precisely, Jesus speaks as the Messiah (see Christ) and "my congregation" means "the congregation of me, the Messiah." Such a community may be seen in the concept of the "remnant" in the Old Testament and especially in the "saints of the Most High" who are represented by the Son of Man as their leader.

Third, the congregation is built on "this rock," which is generally taken to refer to Peter who has just been mentioned. The fact that the saying uses the feminine form petra is attributed to the fact that the masculine form petros signifies a "[lump of] stone" rather than a large expanse of rock which might serve as a foundation for a building. On this view it is Peter—as the one to whom God has revealed that Jesus is the Messiah and who confesses him as such—upon whom the congregation is built. However, it has been argued by C. Caragounis that the two Greek words do not necessarily refer to the same entity, that the Aramaic word underlying petra is not necessarily that which underlies petros and that the focus of the passage suggests that the foundation of the church is the content of Peter's confession that Jesus is the Messiah.

Finally, that Jesus is speaking on a cosmic scale is apparent from the references to the opposition from the "gates of Hades" and to the keys of the kingdom of God. This is the divinely instituted community of the end time against which the full force of evil is pitted.

All this material shows that Jesus proclaimed the rule of God and urged people to return to God in repentance and obedience, that he called them to be his own disciples and to constitute the ekklēsia of the Messiah, that he saw them as the children of God called to live together as brothers and sisters. It may surely be affirmed that here we have the essence of the church.

4. Jesus and the Structures of the Church.

The argument so far is based on the classical presentation by R. N. Flew. He detected five elements in the mission of Jesus which encapsulate the idea of the church: (1) the disciples as the nucleus of the new Israel; (2) the ethical teaching (see Ethics of Jesus) given to them and the power of the Spirit*; (3) the conception of Messiahship and the consequent allegiance; (4) the message as constitutive of a community; (5) the mission of the new community.

Each of these elements can be traced as part of the constitution of the church after Easter and leave no doubt that we are justified in thinking of the church as part of the purpose of Jesus. But to what extent did Jesus prepare for or anticipate other features of the church as it later developed?

4.1. The place of the Twelve. The Twelve appear primarily as Jesus' companions and colleagues in his mission. Some kind of authority is given to them in Matthew 16 and 18. The promises made to Peter are repeated to all of the disciples in Matthew 18. They will make decisions which will be ratified by God. They will be able to act in concert in prayer* and see their prayers answered. In this situation some kind of leadership is envisaged. But the horizon is limited to their lifetime, and nothing is said about leadership in the future except in the eschatological symbolism of Matthew 19:28 (par. Luke 22:29-30).

4.2. Baptism. The question of baptism* as an initiation rite does not arise in the Synoptic Gospels. When it is discussed in John it is as an expression of repentance and a type of Spirit-baptism rather than as entry to a community, although the latter need not be excluded. According to John the disciples practiced baptism during the lifetime of Jesus.

4.3. Lord's Supper. The Lord's Supper is established by Jesus as a memorial to him which is to be continued by his followers, but no instructions are given regarding the details of how it is to be conducted or by whom (see Last Supper).

5. Continuity between the Church and Jesus.

According to Luke, soon after the resurrection* the disciples met together and engaged in: teaching by the apostles, fellowship, breaking of bread and prayers (Acts 2:42-47). All four of these items have their roots in the lifetime of Jesus.

First, the position of the apostles is that of those who teach on Jesus' behalf. The accounts of the calling and mission of the Twelve and the Seventy(-two) indicate that Jesus taught them and prepared them for mission (see Gentiles).
The Gospels generally indicate that Jesus gave special teaching to the disciples over against his general teaching to the crowds. Second, the concept and practice of fellowship may reflect the common life of the inner group of disciples of Jesus. The concept of brotherhood within the community is reflected in Matthew 23:8. Third, the practice of the breaking of bread is linked to the common meals of the disciples with Jesus and to the Last Supper. Fourth, the prayers of the post-resurrection community reflect the example and instruction of Jesus to them.

To these items we may add a fifth, the ongoing mission which continues the public teaching of Jesus with its challenge to Israel to repent (see Repentance). Thus there is significant continuity between Jesus and the church.

See also Eschatology; Israel; Kingdom of God

I. H. Marshall

CITIES OF PALESTINE. See Archeology and Geography

CLEAN AND UNECLEAN

Distinctions between what is to be considered ritually clean and unclean are established in Pentateuchal Law.* With some sources of uncleanness, contact is prohibited; with others, procedures for cleansing from incurred defilement are laid down. While observance of the fundamental rules was routine among pious Jews of the Second Temple Period, certain religious groups were in part characterized by particular and expanded interpretations, and meticulous observance, of the relevant laws. In the Gospels the indifference shown by Jesus and his disciples* on matters of ritual purity provokes queries from Pharisees*

Conversely, Jesus perceives the Pharisees as showing an exaggerated concern for ritual purity while neglecting the more fundamental demands of ethics* and piety.

1. The Laws of Ritual Purity
2. The Practice of Ritual Purity
3. Ritual Purity in the Gospels
4. Conclusion

1. The Laws of Ritual Purity.

Pentateuchal Law prohibits the Israelites from incurring certain kinds of uncleanness. Transgression of these laws would make impossible Yahweh's continued presence in the midst of his people (cf. Lev 15:31) and would result in the pollution of the land (Num 35:33; Deut 21:23) and the expulsion of its people (Lev 18:24-30; 20:22). The language of defilement is used indiscriminately in matters ranging from sexual morality to rules of diet Thus the apodictic law of Leviticus 18 forbids sexual intercourse with certain near relatives, with women during their menstrual periods, with the wife of another, with members of the same sex and with beasts. Such acts are said to bring defilement to the perpetrators and even to the land, if the guilty are not isolated from the rest of the people. Similarly, according to Leviticus 19:31 consulting a medium or wizard brings defilement and must be avoided. Children are not to be offered "to Molech," lest Yahweh's sanctuary be defiled (20:1-3; cf. 18:21).
Leviticus 11 forbids the Israelites to eat meat declared "unclean" (cf. also Deut 14): To do so would defile a people intended to be holy as Yahweh their God* is holy (11:44-45). Blood is not to be eaten (7:27; 17:10-14). Moreover, priests* are governed by special laws of purity which must not be transgressed (Lev 21—22) lest the sanctuary be profaned (21:12, 23; cf. 22:2, 32).

In all these cases defilement can and must simply be avoided. Other texts, however, describe types of uncleanness—often involving accidental or even unavoidable defilement—together with procedures for cleansing. Thus, while Leviticus 11 prohibits both eating and touching the carcasses of unclean animals (11:8,11), for the latter act procedures of cleansing are set forth (11:24-25,27-28). Contact with or eating from the carcass of a permitted animal results in uncleanness which can be cleansed (11:39-40). A woman* at the time of menstruation and after the birth of a child is unclean for a period; rites of purification are prescribed (Lev 12; 15:19-24). The same applies to those with particular skin conditions (Lev 13:1 — 14:32), those who experience various bodily emissions (Lev 15), and those in contact or present in the same tent with a corpse (Num 19:11-19).

Varying degrees of severity accompany the different types of defilement. This is reflected not simply in the different lengths of the period before cleansing is possible and the different rites prescribed for the cleansing, but also in the fact that some types of incurred uncleanness, but not others, may be transmitted further. Contact with an animal carcass renders one unclean, but the uncleanness simply passes with the coming of evening (Lev 11:24, 27). Those who carry such a carcass must wash their garments, but they too become clean in the evening (11:25, 28). A period of purification lasting forty days is prescribed for a woman who gives birth to a son; for a daughter the period is eighty days (Lev 12). More complicated rites of cleansing are prescribed for those whose defiling skin conditions have healed (Lev 14:1-32). In the case of those experiencing various discharges from the body, the uncleanness spreads to those who touch them and even to those who touch a bed or chair on which the affected party has sat (Lev 15:4-12, 20-24, 26-27).

As noted, certain types of food were not to be eaten (Lev 11; Deut 14). Permitted foods can, however, be made unclean through contact with a source of defilement; also susceptible are household utensils (Lev 11:32-38; 15:12; Num 19:15).

These laws are stated without explanation. Rules to assist in the classification of animals as clean or unclean are indeed given (Lev 11:3, 9, 20-21, etc.), but no reason why, for example, those beasts which do not "chew the cud" or "part the hoof" should be considered unclean. The absence of indications in the text has left the field open for speculation, and many types of rationale have been proposed: hygienic, allegorical (i.e., the forbidden creatures represent particular vices) and cultic (i.e., animals significant in foreign cultic practices are to be avoided) among others. In addition to the lack of textual support, it should be noted that none of these explanations covers all cases.

A more comprehensive solution is attempted by M. Douglas. The laws of purity cannot be understood apart from the commandment to be holy with which they are associated (e.g., Lev 11:44). Holiness implies wholeness and completeness, freedom from physical deformity (e.g., Lev 21:17-21) and bodily discharge (Lev 15), and adherence to right order (hence the laws of sexual morality and condemnation of such confusions of creation's order as are mentioned in Lev 18:23; 19:19). Underlying the declaration of some animals as clean and others as unclean, Douglas believes, is the understanding that some creatures conform to their place in the created order while others do not (e.g., eels live in the water but, contrary to the norm for such creatures, do not swim; the norm for four-legged creatures of the earth is that they hop, jump or walk, not fly). The latter are declared unclean.

Whether or not Douglas has correctly uncovered the rationale behind particulars of the purity laws is of lesser significance. Jews of our period conformed to the laws because they were commanded by Yahweh, not because they agreed upon or even perceived a rationale behind them. But Douglas is undoubtedly correct in seeing the requirement of holiness as the context within which the laws of purity have their place.

Yahweh chose to live in the midst of his people. His presence brings them glory* and protection but also threatens and imperils them: Yahweh is a consuming fire (Deut 4:24), and those among whom he lives risk his wrath when they transgress his will. A number of stories illustrate the theme; the provoking wrongs are both ritual and moral (Lev 10:1-3; Num 11:1-3, 33; 16:31-35, 41-50; 21:4-9; 25:1-9; 2 Sam 6:6-8; etc.). What is unclean is an abomination to Yahweh and will not be tolerated. Thus it is incumbent upon the priests to teach the people the distinction between the clean and the unclean (Lev 10:10-11), and incumbent upon the people to observe the distinction and to purify themselves of whatever defilements they may incur. The unclean are not to be permitted in the courtyard of the sanctuary (Lev 12:4; 2 Chron 23:19; 26:21; cf. Lev 15:31; Num 19:13, 20). Indeed, the opening chapters of Numbers present a detailed scheme for the camp of the Israelite tribes in the wilderness which reflects these notions of purity. In the center is Yah-weh's sanctuary. In the circle next to the tabernacle are the priests (3:38) and the Levite clans (1:53), that is, those who have been sanctified by Yahweh to serve in his sanctuary (3:5-10). Then, in a circle further removed from the tabernacle, lie the camps of the lay tribes of Israelites (Num 2). The unclean are banished outside the camp to prevent its defilement (Num 5:1-3; cf. also Deut 23:9-14).
2. The Practice of Ritual Purity.

The vision of purity which so dominates parts of the Pentateuch is much less evident in the remainder of the OT. Occasional references probably indicate that observance of certain basic rules could normally be assumed (e.g., 1 Sam 20:26; 2 Sam 11:4); and the sense that foreign lands were unclean, and that to die outside Israel would therefore be a loss, was probably general (cf. 1 Sam 26:19-20; Hos 9:3; Amos 7:17). On the other hand, the historical books of the so-called Deuteronomistic history (Joshua—2 Kings), while explaining the disasters that befell the people of Israel and Judah for their unfaithfulness to Yahweh, do not include violations of purity laws among the wrongs, and even countenance without comment the presence of foreign mercenaries in the courtyard of Yahweh's Temple* (2 Kings 11:4-12; the parallel version in 2 Chron 23:1-11 reflects the postexilic sensitivity to the need for purity). Prophets like Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and Jeremiah find fault on many counts with their contemporaries: idolatry and pride, immorality and deceit abuses of justice and oppression of the needy. . . . But observance of purity laws figures neither in their vision of what should have been in their own day nor in that of what will be in the future when wrongs are set right. The language of "uncleanness," when used, generally relates to moral issues (e.g., Is 1:15-16, 18; 4:4; 6:5; Jer 3:2; 13:27). It is in the book of Ezekiel the priest that concerns for ritual purity become more apparent, particularly in the visions of what the sanctuary and community would be like after the exile (Ezek 40—48). Pre-exilic laxity is denounced; hereafter, the sanctity of the Temple is to be Strictly preserved (44:5-9,23,25-27; 45:3-5; etc.).

Otherwise it is largely in postexilic literature that issues of ritual purity play a significant role. Chronicles, in retelling the stories of Samuel-Kings, often betrays a sensitivity lacking in the earlier accounts to the need to keep the sanctuary and its environs free from incursions by foreigners and Israelites who are ritually impure (cf. e.g., 2 Chron 8:11 and 1 Kings 9:24; 2 Chron 23:19 and 2 Kings 11:18; 2 Chron 24:8 and 2 Kings 12:9; 2 Chron 26:16-21 and 2 Kings 15:5; and see 2 Chron 30:17-19). Texts from Ezra (2:62-63; 6:20-21), Nehemiah (7:64-65; 12:30, 45; 13:4-9, 22, 30), Daniel (1:8), Haggai (2:10-14) and Zechariah (14:20-21) may be cited as illustrations of a growing perception of the need to observe standards of ritual purity. Telling too are passages in apocryphal books like Tobit (1:10-12; 2:9), Judith (11:12-15; 12:2, 19) and the additions to Esther (14:15-17).

At the turn of the era observance of the fundamental requirements was normal among Jews. Jews were known throughout the ancient world for their refusal to eat pork and other unclean foods (cf. Acts 10:14). As a rule Jews would not eat with Gentiles* (cf. Acts 10:28; 11:3; Gal 2:12-13). Lepers (see Leprosy) were isolated from the community (cf. Lk 17:12). Mothers of newborn children observed the prescribed rites of purification (cf. Lk 2:22). Josephus* relates that Herod was hard-pressed to find Jews who would reside on the defiled soil of Tiberias (Ant. 18.2.3 §§36-38). John's Gospel indicates that Jews took into account the need for purification when travelling to Jerusalem to keep a feast* (11:55; cf. Josephus J.W. 1.11.6 §229; Acts 21:24-27) and notes that water* for purification was available at a wedding feast (2:6).

It was particularly among sectarian groups, however, that observance of purity laws was rigorous and consistent. The Essenes, as described by Josephus, were careful to eat their meals in a state of ritual purity. They immersed (J.W. 2.8.5 §129) before eating food prepared by priests (i.e., to guarantee its purity, Ant. 18.1.5 §22) which was reserved for full members of the party (J.W 2.8.7 §139); members swore an oath not to eat the food of non-members (J.W. 2.8.8 §143). The same concern is evident in the Dead Sea Scrolls (see Dead Sea Scrolls). Members of the Qumran sect could not eat or drink anything belonging to non-members (1QS 5:16). Nonmembers were forbidden to "enter the water (i.e., of purification) in order to touch the purity (i.e., the pure food) of the holy men" (1QS 5:13). Partaking of the pure food (1QS 6:16-17) and drink (1QS 6:20-21) of the community was not immediately permitted those who decided to join the sect, but was reserved for those at a more advanced stage of initiation.

These requirements go beyond biblical Law, where ritual purity was not prescribed for the eating of ordinary meals (cf. Lev 14:46-47; Deut 12:15, 22; 15:22). But Scripture does require purity of priests consuming dedicated foods (Lev 22:3-9) as well as of lay Israelites eating their portion of peace offerings (Lev 7:19-21). It was by extension of these laws (perhaps with an eye to the declaration that all Israel is a "kingdom of priests," Ex 19:6) that sectarians ate ordinary meals in a state of purity.

Rabbinic texts speak of "associates" who made a similar commitment (t. Dem. 2:2). Many scholars identify the "associates" with the Pharisees known to us from Josephus and the NT. The evidence for this claim, however, falls short of proof. Nonetheless, it is clear from the importance placed on issues of ritual purity in rabbinic texts relating to the pre-70 period, from a number of Gospel texts, and from Josephus's insistence that the Pharisees were the most scrupulous of the parties in their observance of the ancestral laws, that Pharisees too were meticulous in their interpretation and observance of purity regulations. A few details will be noted in the discussion of Gospel texts.

3.1. The Gospel of Mark. If the details of a couple incidents in the Gospel be pressed, Jesus incurred ritual defilement, according to OT laws, though the Gospel texts themselves do not mention it. According to Mark 5:27 he was touched by a woman with a "flow of blood." Such a touch, by the laws of Leviticus 15:25-30, conveyed uncleanness. A still more severe defilement was conveyed, by the laws of Numbers 19, when Jesus entered a house in which a dead body was present (Mk 5:39-40; cf. Num 19:14) and when he touched a corpse (Mk 5:41; cf. Num 19:11). On the other hand, it is likely that "Simon the leper," in whose house Jesus ate, according to Mark 14:3, was now cured of the skin condition which still served to identify him. Given the observance of basic requirements of purity among Jews of the period, it is hard to conceive a leper entertaining guests in his house during the time of his uncleanness.

The significance of such incidents should not be exaggerated. As we have noted, many kinds of defilement could scarcely be avoided; incurring them did not involve any defiance of biblical Law, provided that steps were taken for purification in cases where these were prescribed. And indeed, according to Mark 1:44, Jesus once told a cured leper to carry out the prescribed rites, though the reason for the observance ("as a witness to them") is ambiguous. Possibly the witness is to Jesus' faithful observance of the Law; more likely is the notion that the demonstration of divine power seen in the healing of the leper serves as a witness against those who refuse to heed Jesus.

According to Mark 2:15-17 Jesus ate with "tax collectors and sinners" (see Taxes; Sinner) and was criticized by the scribes* of the Pharisees for doing so (see Table Fellowship). Was ritual purity the issue? "Tax collectors and (notorious) sinners" were hardly among those specially observant of purity regulations. Hence those who were committed to eating ordinary food in a state of ritual purity would not themselves eat in such company. It certainly follows that Jesus for his part had not made that kind of commitment, and it is quite conceivable that those for whom rigorous maintenance of purity was an ideal would fault him for failing to do so. But the force of the passage suggests that something more basic was at issue. Jesus is, after all, not being criticized for eating with ordinary people who failed to observe special standards of purity. The point of the charge is that he is associating with notorious sinners, those living in open defiance of the basic laws of Judaism,* those whom the righteous avoided so as not to appear to condone, or be affected by, their behavior (cf. Ps 1:1; Prov 28:7; m. ’Abot 1:7; etc.). Suitably, Jesus' reply addresses this latter issue, not questions of purity. To be sure, his companions are sinners; but just as it is the sick to whom the physician must attend, so sinners may appropriately be sought out for the message of God's kingdom (Mk 2:17; see Kingdom of God).

Purity clearly is the issue in Mark 7:1-23. According to verses 1-5, Pharisees and scribes observe that some of Jesus' disciples eat with unwashed hands and (after a parenthesis in which the Evangelist explains Jewish concerns for purity to his readers) ask Jesus why his followers do not adhere to "the tradition of the elders"* in this matter. Jesus replies first by attacking those who keep this "human tradition" and set aside God's word in the process (7:6-13), then by addressing the issue of ritual purity in a general maxim (7:15). Finally, the maxim is explained in private to the disciples (7:17-23).

The early history of Jewish handwashing at mealtimes is largely unknown. The presence of the pericope in Mark's (and Matthew's) Gospel can only be explained on the assumption that some Jews at least had adopted the custom in the pre-70 period. And in fact this seems to have been the case with the "associates" (t. Dem. 2:11). Moreover, Tosepta Demai 2:10 indicates that some non-associates followed the practices of the associates in private. This, as Alon suggests, might especially apply to so simple a matter as handwashing. Indeed, it is more likely that a widespread custom (perhaps introduced into Palestine by Hellenistic influence) was in time assimilated into, and adopted as part of, Pharisaic purity regulations than that popular observance followed a decree from the sages. Note that John 2:6 also appears to assume that handwashing before meals was customary among Jews.

According to Mark 7:3, 5 such handwashing was required by the "tradition of the elders." Its neglect is thus seen as a violation, not of scriptural Law, but of the extrabiblical tradition programmatically adopted by the Pharisees (Josephus Ant. 13.10.6 §297). That such handwashing was a pan of the Pharisaic tradition in the time of Jesus cannot be confirmed from other sources (unless, as many assume, the regulations governing the associates were a part of that tradition); but it is at least not inconsistent with what we do know.
For handwashing to be required as a purification ritual before each meal, hands must be both regarded as susceptible to defilement not affecting the rest of the body (otherwise the washing of hands only would serve no purpose) and routinely assumed to be so defiled. The former condition could readily be derived from texts like Leviticus 15:11; and rabbinic tradition (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) does assume the uncleanness of hands (because they are "fidgety," i.e., liable to touch what is unclean) and dates the declaration of their uncleanness to Hillel and Shammai (b. šabb. 14b). On the other hand, according to the careful distinctions worked out in rabbinic texts, the degree of uncleanness normally affecting hands (second degree, m. Yad. 3:1) is not sufficient to defile ordinary food. Such distinctions may not have been fully worked out in the pre-70 period. In any case, the attempt to preserve ritual cleanness in the eating of ordinary food was probably understood as an extension of the laws governing the eating of dedicated foods: Meals in the home were treated as though they were sacred meals in the Temple. Mark 7 indicates that there were Jews in pre-70 Palestine who washed their hands before eating as a part of this larger endeavor. It also indicates that Jesus and his disciples were not among them.

Such handwashing was done, according to Mark 7:3, either with a "handful" of water or by pouring water over "cupped" hands: The Greek term pygmē is ambiguous. Mark 7:4 speaks of other purificatory rites. A cleansing by immersion after returning from the market is not known in rabbinic literature, though the preconditions for such a view to be held by a scrupulous Jew are found in Torah. The purification of 7:4a may, however, refer again to the hands. The cleansing of vessels (7:4b) will be considered below.

In Mark's account the question asked Jesus is met with a broad attack, in two parts, on the Pharisaic tradition as a whole. First, Isaiah 29:13 is cited as condemning such adherence to the "human precepts." Second, an example is given by which adherence to the tradition results in the violation of a fundamental command of the Word of God (7:9-13). The replies are suitable enough in the context, since the question of handwashing does indeed raise the issue of the validity of extrabiblical tradition. They do not, however, relate directly to ritual purity.

Mark 7:15 does relate directly, though its force may be differently construed. On the face of it the saying denies that eating can render one unclean. So fundamental a claim would undercut the issue of handwashing by declaring pointless the whole enterprise of ritual purity. Not just Pharisaic tradition, but biblical laws on the subject as well would be set aside. Those who think this interpretation self-evident must either deny the origin of the saying with Jesus or explain why the early church (with exceptions like Paul; cf. Rom 14:14) missed the point and debated the issue. On the other hand, the statement need not mean more than that moral impurity is a more serious matter and one more worthy of careful attention than ritual impurity. (See, e.g., Mk 9:37; Mt 10:20; Jn 12:44; Acts 5:4, where apparent denials of one claim in order to affirm another in fact mean "not so much" the former "as" the latter.) On such an understanding the maxim leaves open the issue whether laws of ritual purity have any point, but it does bring into question the priorities of those who rigorously pursue them. Such an emphasis is consistent with the precedence assigned throughout the Jesus tradition to ethical and humanitarian concerns over matters of religious observance.

In Mark 7:18-23 the maxim is interpreted. An indifferent attitude toward matters of ritual purity is justified by noting that what enters the body leaves it as well—without entering the "heart" The "heart" is seen as the source of true (moral) uncleanness. A parenthesis at the end of verse 19 ("pronouncing all foods clean"), presumably added by the Evangelist understands the discussion to mean that all foods may be eaten.

In sum, Mark's Gospel does not share the vision which inspired the pursuit of ritual purity. For Mark's Cendle readers Jewish purity concerns are foreign (7:3-4) and irrelevant, representing in part a human tradition which has come to displace fundamental aspects of the divine will, and in part divine commands belonging to an old order now set aside with the dawning of the new age.

3.2. The Gospel of Matthew. In Matthew's Gospel Jesus does not do away with OT laws (see 5:17-19), though he does reinterpret them (5:21-48), declare that all the Law and the Prophets "depend on" the love commandments* (22:3740), and insist that God is more concerned with justice (see Justice, Righteousness), mercy* and faith* (the "weightier matters of the Law") than with the meticulous observance of ritual demands (23:23; cf. 9:13; 12:7). Suitably, then, Matthew's Gospel (15:1-20) contains a parallel to the handwashing dispute in Mark, with its maxim declaring that moral uncleanness rather than ritual truly matters. But the implication that all foods are clean (Mk 7:19) is not drawn, and only scribal regulations are explicitly set aside (15:20).

In the series of woes pronounced against the scribes and Pharisees, their purgification of vessels is addressed (23:25-26). Several OT texts speak of the possibility of household vessels becoming unclean and prescribe procedures for their cleansing (Lev 11:32-38; 15:12; Num 19:15, 18). It is not surprising, then, that Pharisees were concerned with the cleanness of vessels. Indeed, rabbinic texts provide some evidence that, for assessments of ritual cleanness, a distinction was made between the outside and the inside of a vessel (perhaps based on the reference to a vessel's "inside" in Lev 11:33) in the period before 70 (e.g., Sipra to Lev 11:33). According to the Jerusalem Talmud (y. Ber. 8:2), Shammaites believed that an uncleanness which affected the outside of a vessel could contaminate the inside, whereas Hillelites denied this.

The Shammaite position, which would require attention to be paid to the cleanness of the outside of a vessel, is perhaps assumed in the charge of Matthew 23:25-26: Pharisees cleanse the outside of vessels, the insides of which are full of extortion and greed. The latter claim could mean that the vessels contain what has been gained by extortion and greed. More likely, the "inside" of the vessel is used metaphorically for the scribes and Pharisees themselves, who are perceived as sinful in their hearts for all their concern for the cleanness of cups. On this understanding, the metaphor continues in verse 26, and the point is that if the Pharisees would see that their hearts were clean, they would not need to concern themselves with external (ritual) purity. The pointlessness of observing laws of ritual purity without practicing moral righteousness is thus a crucial theme in Matthew, though it is not suggested that regulations of purity are simply to be abandoned.

For Luke it is important that the parents of Jesus observed the Mosaic Law (2:22-24, 27; cf. 1:6), and he relates that they went to Jerusalem to observe the rites connected with a mother's purification after the birth of a child (2:22; cf. Lev 12; only the mother needed to be purified, though Luke, on the most probable reading, speaks loosely of "their purification"). The sacrifice mentioned in Luke 2:24 is that for the purification of a mother who is poor (Lev 12:8), though the preceding verses actually combine with purification the notion of the child's dedication (2:22; cf. 1 Sam 1:24-28) and the redemption of the firstborn son (2:23; cf. Ex 13:2; 34:19-20; Num 18:15-16).

Luke has no direct parallel to the Markan handwashing controversy. On the other hand, according to Luke 11:37-38 Jesus' own failure to wash (presumably his hands, though Booth thinks an immersion is intended) before a meal provoked the wonder of his Pharisaic host Jesus' reply in 11:39-41 appears to be a variant of the saying in Matthew 23:25-26. In Luke's version the Pharisees themselves (rather than the vessels) are said to be full of rapacity and evil. Verse 40 has no parallel in Matthew and is capable of quite different meanings: "Did not he (God) who made the outside (i.e., material things or perhaps the human body) make the inside (i.e., the heart) as well (i.e., ought not one to be at least as concerned for the purity of the latter as the former)?" or (less likely), "The one who has dealt with (i.e., cleansed) the outside has not (thereby) dealt with (cleansed) the inside." Luke 11:41, like Matthew 23:26, tells the Pharisees that by pursuing something other than laws of ritual purity, they would in fact find all things "clean." In Luke they are directed to give alms.

3.4. The Gospel of John. Ritual purity is not an issue in John (though see 3:25). The purification of pilgrims before a festival in Jerusalem is noted in 11:55. Doubtless John sees the changing of water (set aside for rites of purification) into wine by Jesus as symbolic of the transition from the old age to the new (2:1-11). And Johannine irony is present in the note that those attempting to secure the execution of God's Son carefully avoided incurring ritual defilement (18:28).

4. Conclusion.

The vision of a people submissive to God's rule and fit for his presence was central to much Second Temple Jewish piety. Adherence to laws of ritual purity must be seen in this context. It must not be assumed either that such adherence marked a merely external conformity to a code or that it necessarily displaced moral and ethical concerns. The Qumran texts provide an eloquent and contemporary witness to the compatibility of ritual and moral scruples (e.g., 1QS 3:4-12), and the evident intention of various groups to extend the laws of ritual purity designed for the Temple to the Jewish home speaks for a profound longing for the divine presence and a lively sense that only the pure might experience it. It is a vision inspired by the laws of the Pentateuch and implemented by an expanded observance of its terms.

On the other hand, in Jesus' vision of Israel's calling and responsibility, the rigorous pursuit of ritual purity had no evident place. His mealtime association with disreputable people is among the best-attested aspects of his public career. Explicit statements to that effect are supported by a number of sayings and parables* intended to defend such activity (Mk 2:14-17; Mt 11:19; 21:28-32; Lk 15:1-32; 19:1-10), and the language of Matthew 11:19 was hardly the invention of the early church. As we have noted, the attacks on Jesus' association with sinners are not based on considerations of purity. Nonetheless, it is self-evident that no one eating meals in such company could share the vision of those dedicated to preserving ritual purity at their meals.

Moreover, the explicit statements on the issue of purity attributed to Jesus must substantially represent his position, cohering as they do not only with each other but also with sayings regarding Sabbath observance (Mk 2:25-28; 3:4; Mt 12:11-12; etc.), meticulous tithing (Mt 23:23) and the bringing of gifts to the Temple (Mt 5:23-24). Time and again the Jesus of the Gospels accuses his contemporaries of expressing their piety in religious observances like these while neglecting "weightier" moral and humanitarian concerns which alone truly matter. To this positive evidence must be added the absence within the Jesus tradition of any suggestion that Jesus' followers (largely drawn from among less-observant Jews) should adopt and adhere to an interpretation of the biblical laws of ritual purity. Unlike the Pharisees (and others), Jesus did not see Israel's task as the accurate interpretation and careful implementation of all aspects of biblical law.

Much of this is reminiscent of the pre-exilic prophets. There too we find attacks on contemporary expressions of religiosity as mere covers for social abuses. Indeed, the same ambiguity arises in the prophetic denunciations of sacrifices and offerings, festivals and songs as in Jesus' denunciation of tithing and purity practices. While the words at times suggest that the cultic and ritual aspects of religion have no place whatever in a world of ideal piety, the point is rather the condemnation of wrongs than the advocacy of a religion without cult (cf. Amos 5:21-26; Is 1:10-17; Jer 7:21-24; etc.). Still, no more than Jesus does Amos or Hosea, Isaiah or Jeremiah see a contemporary need for new interpretation or expanded observance of ritual requirements. Such matters will care for themselves when justice and mercy find adequate expression.

The negative role played by laws of purity in the Gospels is thus in part the result of an attack (like that in the pre-exilic prophets) on religiosity combined with perceived abuses. But to this must be added Jesus' conviction that a new age had dawned, that God was intervening in a new way for the salvation* of his people and the establishment of his rule. In a sense the coming of the kingdom represented the culmination of earlier sacred history ("the Law and the Prophets") and the fulfillment of hopes and promises there expressed. At the same time the "new wine*" could not be contained in "old wineskins" (Mk 2:22), aspects of the old piety were now out of season (e.g., Mk 2:19) and the proclamation of the kingdom, which must be brought without encumbrances to "sinners" and "righteous" alike, demanded from both a response of commitment and faith. Jesus' deliberate overriding of purity concerns is both explained in part by the thrust of his message and is part of the explanation why that message found little response among those with a different vision.

See also Judaism; Law; Pharisees; Rabbinic Traditions and Writings; Sinners; Table Fellowship.

S. Westerholm

CLEANSING OF THE TEMPLE. See Temple; Temple Cleansing.

COMFORTER. See Holy Spirit

COMMANDMENT
In all four Gospels the unmistakable basis of the ethical teaching of Jesus is "the commandment" or "the commandments" of God.* In this respect, Jesus in the Gospels is no different from any other Jewish teacher.* The question for the student of the Gospels is, What did Jesus mean by "the commandments?" Did he mean all the commands of God recorded in the Hebrew Bible, or was he referring more specifically to the Ten Commandments, or Decalog (Ex 20:1-17; Deut 5:6-16), or to his own twofold command to love* God and neighbor (Mt 22:34-40 par. Mk 12:28-34 and Lk 10:25-28), or to his own ethical* teaching in general (see Ethics of Jesus)?

These questions can be answered only from a careful survey of the New Testament terminology for "commandment" and from the evidence of each Gospel.

1. Terminology
2. Commandment in the Synoptic Gospels and Jesus
3. Commandment in the Gospel of John

1. Terminology.

The dominant Greek word in the NT for "command," in the sense of a commandment from God, is entolē, with sixty-seven occurrences. Of these, all but three (Lk 15:29; Col 4:10; Tit 1:14) refer specifically to divine commandments. In this respect the NT follows the terminology of the LXX, where entolē is used 245 times. Approximately 160 of these render the Hebrew miswā, ordinarily translated as "command" or "commandment" in English. Forty-two other instances of entolē in the LXX have no Hebrew equivalent because they are in the apocryphal books, and about forty render various other Hebrew words such as piqqudim, "directions" or "orders"; dābār, "word"; hōq, "rule" or "prescription"; huqqā, "statute"; and torn, "teaching" or "law."

2. Commandment in the Synoptic Gospels and Jesus.

There are sixteen occurrences of entolē in the synoptic Gospels: six in Matthew, six in Mark and four in Luke. Eleven are found in just three passages: (1) the debate over ritual defilement (Mk 7:1-23 par. Mt 15:1-20, specifically Mk 7:8-13 and Mt 15:3-6); (2) the question of a rich man to Jesus (Mk 10:17-22 par. Mt 19:16-22 par. Lk 18:18-23; cf. LK 10:25-28); (3) the question about the "first," or "great," commandment (Mk 12:28-34 par. Mt 22:34-40; cf. Lk 10:25-28).

Of the five remaining instances, three are incidental (Lk 1:6; 15:29; 23:56), while two (Mk 10:5 and Mt 5:19) require separate treatment. Luke 1:6 refers very generally to Zechariah and Elizabeth "walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless" (all quotations within article are from RSV unless otherwise noted). This reference contributes to the larger Lukan schema in which the lasting value of the Mosaic Law* is upheld. Luke 23:56 mentions explicitly the keeping of the Sabbath* as "according to the commandment," while Luke 15:29 mentions the "commands" of a human father to his son in the context of a parable* (only by treating the parable as an allegory is it possible to see in it a reference to the commandments of God). Mark 10:5 will be treated as a postscript to Mark 7:8-13, while Matthew 5:19 will be discussed last.

2.1. The Debate over Ritual Defilement. According to Mark, Jesus responds to the Pharisees'* criticism that his disciples* do not wash before eating by contrasting "the commandment of God" with "your tradition" (Mk 7:8-9). He then illustrates "the commandment of God" with a reference to "honor your father and your mother" from the Decalogue (Ex 20:12; Deut 5:16) and its corollary in Exodus 21:17, "He who speaks evil of father or mother, let him surely die." This is introduced as something that "Moses* said" (7:10). As Mark sees it, what "Moses said" is also "the commandment of God," which is the same as "the word of God" (7:13). Though Jesus does not explicitly refer here to the commandment or word of God as something written, he does firmly deny that the oral tradition of the Pharisees handed down from the elders* (cf. M. Pirqe 'Abot 1.1) is faithful to it.

Later in his Gospel Mark views the authority of Moses somewhat differently. When asked about divorce, Jesus inquires in return, "What did Moses command you?" (Mk 10:3). The Pharisees reply, "Moses allowed a man to write a certificate of divorce* and to put his wife away." Then Jesus says, "For your hardness of heart he wrote you this commandment" (10:5; see Hardness of Heart). The verb "command" (entellō) and the noun "commandment" (entolē) are used here for what was in fact a concession and not a command. Jesus then subordinates the "commandment" of Moses to the provision of God at creation that "a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one" (Mk 10:7-8; cf. Gen 2:24). In this instance the word of Moses is no longer viewed as "the commandment of God," for the coming of Jesus has introduced a new era with new possibilities for faithfulness.

Matthew's account of the debate is much the same as Mark's except that Jesus' answer to the Pharisees mocks the form of their own charge against his disciples (Mt 15:2-3: "Why do your disciples transgress the traditions of the elders? . . . And why do you transgress the commandment of God for the sake of your traditions?") and in place of the expression "For Moses said" (Mk 7:3) Matthew substitutes "For God said" (Mt 15:4 NIV). Thus he avoids equating Moses's words with the words of God. Luke lacks the exchange altogether.

2.2. The Question of the Rich Man. In Mark the inquirer is simply "someone" or "a man" (Mk 10:17). He is a "rich man" because in the course of the story it comes out that he "had great possessions" (10:22). When he asks Jesus, "Good Teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" (10:17), Jesus replies, as any Jewish teacher might, "Why do you call me good? No one is good but God alone. You know the commandments" (10:18-19a). Jesus then lists six commandments from the Decalog: ' 'Do not kill, Do not commit adultery, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Do not defraud, Honor your father and your mother' " (10:19b; cf. Ex 20:12-16; Deut 5:16-20).

The only one of these commandments not explicit in the Decalog is "Do not defraud," and Mark's choice of this expression—implicit either in "Do not steal" or in the concluding, unexpressed command not to "covet"—may have been dictated by the awareness that the questioner was in fact a man of wealth (cf. 10:22). "Honor your father and your mother" has been shifted to the end, possibly for emphasis (cf. the emphasis given it in Mk 7:10; also Eph 6:2) and to anticipate the man's response that he has obeyed these commandments "from my youth" (10:20). The first three commandments have been omitted, perhaps because they are implicit in the phrase "God alone" in Mark 10:18, while Jesus' position on the Sabbath commandment is already on record in Mark 2:27-28. Not content merely to repeat the Decalog, Jesus in Mark's Gospel selects from it and—at least to a limited degree—interprets it

The rich man complies with the request to drop the adjective "good" in addressing Jesus. "Teacher," he says, "all these I have observed from my youth" (10:20). His obedience to the commandments is almost but not quite, enough. Mark comments that Jesus "loved" the man for his obedience—that is, he showed him love, probably with an embrace—but Jesus continued, "You lack one thing: go, sell what you have, and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. And come follow me." Those who seriously undertake to follow Jesus can do so only by divesting themselves of the baggage of material possessions and "traveling light" To them is promised eternal life, here called "treasure in heaven" in contrast to the material possessions they had given up. Ironically, it is an invitation, not a command, that finally drives the rich man away (Mk 10:22).

Luke follows Mark rather closely, supplying only the additional information that the man is a "ruler" or magistrate of some kind. Matthew's modifications in the story, though small, are more substantial. Instead of "Good Teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" (Mk 10:17; cf. Lk 18:18), the man asks, "Teacher, what good deed must I do to inherit eternal life? (Mt 19:16). Jesus' answer, accordingly, is also different: "Why do you ask me about what is good?" (Mt 19:17). Matthew avoids Mark's implication that Jesus does not want to be called "good." "One there is who is good," Jesus continues. "If you would enter life, keep the commandments" (19:17). He pauses and the rich man asks him, "Which?" Jesus enumerates "the commandments" in the same way as in Mark, except that he omits "Do not defraud" and substitutes another not found explicitly in the Decalog, "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Mt 19:19). Instead of interpreting "You shall not covet" as "Do not defraud," Jesus in Matthew states the last commandment positively. "You shall not covet your neighbor's house; you shall not covet your neighbor's wife ... or anything that is your neighbor's" (Ex 20:17; cf. Deut 5:21) has become simply "Love your neighbor as yourself" (cf. Lev 19:18). With this he anticipates the second of two "great commandments" in Matthew 22:39.

Mark's rich man, though not a "ruler," has become a rich "young man" in Matthew (19:20), and Matthew furthers this impression by omitting the phrase "from my youth" (Mk 10:20; cf. Lk 18:21). Matthew also omits (this time with Luke) the reference in Mark to a show of affection on Jesus' part (Mk 10:21). Finally, the terminology of "lacking" something is attributed in Matthew to the young man himself. Instead of being told, "One thing you lack" (Mk 10:21; cf. Lk 18:22), the young man asks Jesus, "What do I still lack?" (Mt 19:20). Jesus replies, "If you would be perfect go, sell what you possess and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me" (19:21). The condition laid down is the same as in the other two Gospels except that to Matthew it is the condition for being "perfect," or "complete" (cf. Mt 5:48), not simply for inheriting eternal life.*

2.3. The Question about the "First, " or "Great, " Commandment. According to Mark, a scribe* asked Jesus, "Which commandment is the first of all?" (Mk 12:28). For once Jesus makes no reference to any specific commandment of the Decalogue. Instead, he answers with a quotation of the Jewish confession known as the Shema, based on Deuteronomy 6:4-5: "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is one; and you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength" (Mk 12:29-30). Then, significantly, he answers another question that has not been asked. Combining Deuteronomy 6:4-5 with Leviticus 19:18b, he adds, "The second is this, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' There is no other commandment greater than these" (12:31).

The scribe had asked for one "first" commandment, but in reply Jesus gave him two. The implication is that love for God and love for one's neighbor cannot be separated. The scribe accepts the reformulation of his question and immediately echoes what Jesus had just said: To love God with all one's heart and understanding and strength and to love one's neighbor as oneself is "much more than whole burnt offerings and sacrifices" (Mk 12:3, 33). Because the scribe has "answered wisely," Jesus tells him, "You are not far from the kingdom of God" (12:34a; see Kingdom of God). But how far is "not far"? Neither Jesus nor Mark explicitly answers that question. Just as in Mark 10:21, obedience to the commandments is almost—but not quite—sufficient for salvation. Despite Jesus' warm commendation of the inquiring scribe, Mark concludes with the remark that "after that no one dared to ask him any question" (12:34b), and in the verses that immediately follow, Jesus' critique of the scribes continues (Mk 12:35-37, 38-40).

In Matthew, the questioner is a "lawyer" rather than a "scribe"; he is further identified as a Pharisee, and he asks Jesus the question "to test him" (Mt 22:34-35). "Teacher," he asks, "which is the great commandment in the law?" (22:36). The answer is much the same as in Mark except that the first part of the Shema, "Hear O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is one" (Mk 12:29; cf. Deut 6:4), is omitted, and the "great and first commandment" is stated more briefly: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your soul and with all your mind" (22:37-38). Jesus adds that "a second is like it, You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (22:39). As in Mark, one commandment is asked for, and Jesus gives two: "On these two commandments depend all the law and the prophets" (22:40). Nothing is said in Matthew about the questioner's response, nor does Jesus tell him he is "not far from the kingdom of God." Moreover, the series of adversarial questions from Jewish religious leaders does not end here, as in Mark, but only after one more exchange (Mt 22:46).

In Luke there is no mention of "commandments" or any question of which is the first or greatest. Instead, a lawyer asks Jesus the same question the rich ruler will ask later: "Teacher, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" (Lk 10:25). Unlike the ruler, he asks this only "to put him to the test" (cf. the lawyer in Mt 22:35). "What is written in the law?" Jesus asks in return, "How do you read?" (10:26). The lawyer himself mentions love for God and neighbor, but without calling these "commandments" or identifying them as "first" and "second" (10:27). Jesus commends him for this answer, even though Luke comments negatively on his motives in asking, "Who is my neighbor?" (10:29). Jesus' parable of the merciful Samaritan (10:30-37) demonstrates that the "neighbor" is none other than the enemy. The "first," or "great commandment" (though these words are never used) turns out to be the love of enemies. Jesus has already made this clear in Luke 6:27-36, while in Matthew 5:43-48 it is also love for enemies that makes a disciple "perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect" (5:48; cf. 19:21).

2.4. The "Least" of the Commandments. Throughout the Synoptic tradition Jesus combines a profound respect for the ancient commandments of the Law (especially the Decalog) with new and radical words of his own that are never called "commandments." Yet these words of Jesus focus or reinterpret the commandments of the Law. For this reason it is difficult to be sure what is meant in Matthew 5:19, where it is not a question of the "greatest" but of the "least" of the commandments.

Jesus warns his disciples that "whoever relaxes one of the least of these commandments and teaches men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven; but he who does them and teaches them shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." By "these commandments" does he mean the commandments "in the law," as in Matthew 22:36, or does he mean his own commands, presumably those that will follow almost immediately in the Sermon on the Mount* (i.e., Mt 5:21-48 and chapters 6—7)? The latter are never called "commandments" in Matthew (or in any of the Gospels). The closest Matthew comes to referring to Jesus' teachings as "commandments" (entolai) is at the very end of his Gospel, where after his resurrection* Jesus tells the disciples to teach the Gentiles* to obey "all that I have commanded you" (28:20; Gk, panta hosa enrleilamēn humin).

Although it is possible that Matthew is presupposing already in 5:19 the post-resurrection notion of teaching the "commandments" of Jesus, the context does not support it. Jesus has just spoken of "the law and the Prophets" (5:17) or simply "the Law" (5:18), both with reference to the Hebrew Scriptures. Therefore the phrase "these commandments" in the next verse probably refers to the commandments of Scripture. The "least of these" is equivalent to "any of these" (cf. the "least of these my brethren" in Mt 25:40, 45) and might appear to stand in a long Jewish tradition that resisted all distinctions between major and minor commandments in the Law (see e.g., Pirqe 'Abot 4.2, "Run to fulfill the lightest duty even as the weightiest"; also James 2:10; see 2. above).

Yet this appearance is deceptive, for Matthew intends just the opposite. Later in his Gospel, Jesus will say, "On these two commandments [i.e., love for God and love for neighbor] depend all the law and the prophets" (22:40). It is precisely by obeying the two great commandments that a person obeys all the commandments, even the "least" (cf. the so-called Golden Rule of Mt 7:12: "So whatever you wish that men would do to you, do so to them; for this is the law and the prophets").

2.5. The Historical Jesus. How much of this material goes back to Jesus? In view of the tendency in the Christian church to identify Jesus with God and the commandments of God with Jesus' commandments, it is likely that for Jesus himself "the commandments" referred consistently to the commands of God in the Hebrew Scriptures, just as they did for most Jewish teachers. The Gospel writers would have had no reason to read this emphasis back into the teaching of Jesus. Yet the Synoptics also testify that Jesus did not hesitate to select, summarize or combine these ancient commands in order to undermine the prevailing interpretations and rationalizations of his time. Their unanimous testimony cannot be easily discounted.

Throughout the Synoptic tradition, wherever Jesus speaks of commandments, there is always the hint of "something more" that is needed to make a person righteous before God, whether it is loving an enemy or selling one's possessions to give to the poor. Only Luke tells the story of the servant who comes in from working in the field and is given no rest, but is told to prepare supper for the master. Yet this story is the unspoken presupposition of all Jesus' teaching: "So you also, when you have done all that is commanded you [panta ta diatathenta], say, 'We are unworthy servants; we have only done what was our duty' " (Lk 17:10).

Of the ten occurrences of the noun entolē in John's Gospel, four refer to a "command" (Jn 10:18; 12:49-50) or "commands" (Jn 15:10b) given to Jesus by God the Father (cf. the use of the verb entellomai in 14:31). Five occurrences refer to a "command" (Jn 13:34; 15:12) or "commands" (Jn 14:15, 21; 15:10a) given by Jesus to his disciples (cf. the use of the verb in 15:14, 17). One occurrence refers to "orders" given by the Pharisees to inform them of Jesus' whereabouts (Jn 11:57). Nowhere in John is entolē used to refer to the "commandments" of the Hebrew Scriptures (the verb entellomai is so used only in John 8:5, a passage not originally a part of John's Gospel). The contrast in the use of "commandment" between the Synoptics and John could hardly be more striking.

The point of departure for "the commandments" in John's Gospel is not the Decalog, but the sending of Jesus the Son into the world: "For this reason the Father loves me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord. I have power [exousial to lay it down, and I have power to take it again; this charge [*entolē, "commandment"] I have received from my Father" (Jn 10:17, 18b). At the end of his public ministry Jesus concludes, "For I have not spoken on my own.... the Father who sent me has himself given me commandment what to say and what to speak. And I know that his commandment is eternal life. What I say, therefore, I say as the Father has bidden me" (Jn 12:49-50; cf. 15:10).

In the latter half of John's Gospel, the emphasis shifts to the commands given by Jesus to his disciples: "A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another; even as I have loved you, that you also love one another" (Jn 13:34; cf. 15:12, 17). "Love of neighbor" or "love of enemy" in the Synoptic tradition has given way in the Gospel of John to love of "one another" in the sense of brother or sister in the community of faith (cf. 1 Jn 4:20—5:3). Love for God with "all the heart, soul, mind and strength" has given way to love for Jesus.

In his farewell discourse* Jesus himself takes the place that belonged to God in the "first" or "great" commandment in the Synoptic tradition: "If you love me, you will keep my commandments" (Jn 14:15); "He who has my commandments and keeps them, he it is who loves me" (14:21); "If you keep my commandments, you will abide in my love, just as I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in his love" (15:10). Because of the charge or "commandment" he himself has received from God, Jesus in John's Gospel takes the place of God in the piety and practice of Christians. The "commandments" are no longer simply the ancient commandments of God, but "my commandments," the commands of Jesus himself: "You are my friends if you do what I command you" (15:14); "This I command you, that you love one another" (15:17).

John takes up where the Synoptics leave off. After his resurrection in Matthew, Jesus told the disciples, "All authority [exousia] in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations . . . teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, to the close of the age" (Mt 28:18-20). The "commandments" in the Gospel of John are seen from this same post-resurrection standpoint, as Jesus tells his followers again and again (in different words) to "observe all that I have commanded you."

See also Ethics of Jesus; Justice, Righteousness; Law; Love.

J. R Michaels

CONFLICT, CONFLICT STORIES. See Death of Jesus; Demon, Devil, Satan; Disciples; Form Criticism; Pharisees.

COSMOS. See World.
CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY. See Form Criticism; Gospels (Historical Reliability); Tradition Criticism.

CROSS. See Death of Jesus

CROWD. See People, Crowd

CRUCIFIXION. See Death of Jesus; Trial of Jesus.

CUP. See Last Supper; Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection; Wine
DAVID. See Son of David

DAY OF THE LORD. See Eschatology

DEAD SEA SCROLLS

In 1947 a Bedouin shepherd, following a stray into a cave along the shores of the Dead Sea, chanced upon the first of a group of ancient manuscripts which have revolutionized biblical studies and the study of ancient Judaism.* The seven major scrolls which emerged from that cave were only the beginning. Following their discovery, Bedouin and scholars competed to explore the caves of the region in hopes of new manuscript discoveries. Eventually, a total of eleven caves yielded literary texts, now known as the Dead Sea Scrolls (DSS). Approximately 800 separate manuscripts, many very fragmentary, came to light in the course of these explorations. The nearby site of Qumran, hitherto regarded as an ancient fortress, was also excavated during five campaigns between 1951-56, and scholars came to believe that the site was connected to the caves and the scrolls.

Publication of the discoveries was at first comparatively rapid by scholarly standards. Six of the seven scrolls from the first discovery, now known as Cave 1, were completely published within seven years. The sixth, the Genesis Apocryphon, appeared in a partial edition in 1956. The great bulk of the discoveries were early consigned to an international editorial team consisting of six scholars from Europe and the United States. This team succeeded in publishing substantial portions of the DSS in a series of volumes. Discoveries in the Judaeans Desert (of Jordan appears on some volumes). Five such volumes appeared in the decade spanning the late 1950s to the late 1960s. Since that time, however, even with occasional preliminary editions, the rate of publication has slowed substantially. Volume six of the series appeared in 1977, volume seven in 1982, and volume eight bears a publication date of 1989. At the present time, estimates of the percentage of the material which remains unpublished range between forty and sixty per cent The reasons for the nonpublication of so much vital material after forty years are various, some of them legitimate (the fragmentary nature of many of the scrolls, death of original team members, the demands of academic responsibilities) and some suggesting scandalous scholarly conduct. Recent plans are to have an expanded group of approximately twenty-five scholars publish the remaining material by the year 2000. The discussion which follows is obviously limited by this situation, and it is necessary at the outset to recognize the tentative nature of the analysis which follows in light of unknown possible correlations among the unpublished texts.

1. Description of Contents
2. Interpretation of the Finds
3. The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Gospels

1. Description of Contents.

1.1. Biblical Materials. The biblical scrolls recovered from the caves number several hundred; 122 come from Cave 4 alone. These scrolls include copies of every book of the Hebrew Bible with the exception of the book of Esther. The most frequently attested books are Genesis, Exodus, Deuteronomy, Isaiah and Psalms—this last book numbering some thirty copies.

The biblical scrolls from Qumran have had a tremendous impact on the study of the Hebrew Bible, both with regard to textual criticism and with regard to what was once known as higher criticism. Their importance for textual criticism is obvious when one considers that prior to their discovery the oldest manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible dated from the tenth century. Thus the DSS lifted the curtain to a period over a millennium earlier in the formation of the text.

With regard to matters of criticism, perhaps a discussion of the manuscript known as 11QPs$^2$ can serve as a typical example of the rich applications the scrolls make possible. It contains forty-one of the biblical psalms as well as apocryphal psalms 151, 154 and 155. It also contains three previously unknown psalms, a portion of Ecclesiasticus chapter 51, and a ten-line supplement enumerating the total of David's writings (3,600). The date of the composition of the three unknown psalms is disputed by scholars, but is probably the late Persian or early Hellenistic period. The text of Ecclesiasticus 51 differs markedly from that previously known from the Septuagint and other early versions. Its presence in a collection of psalmic material attributed entirely to David is intriguing. The attribution is a premier example of the tendency in Second Temple Judaism to ascribe poetic writings of unknown authorship to David. Also it appears to confirm the long-held suspicion that Jesus ben Sira did not write that portion of Ecclesiasticus.

But this manuscript of the book of Psalms raises much broader issues as well. The order of the psalms in IIQPs\(^2\) is substantially different from the order in the Masoretic Text. At least once (Ps 145) it evidences a different form of the canonical psalm. Certain groupings of psalms, such as the Songs of Ascent and the Passover Hallel—viewed as units by the Masoretic Text—appear scattered throughout the Qumran text. In addition to IIQP\(^2\) several other non-Masoretic psalters have turned up among the DSS, as have other copies of the above-mentioned apocryphal psalms. These facts suggest that the Psalter as we know it was perhaps only one variant in use among the Jews at the time of Jesus. Taken together with other similar evidence, this scroll may indicate that the third division of the canon, the Writings, was still in flux at the time.

1.2. Non-Biblical Materials. The vast majority of manuscripts from the caves near Qumran are non-biblical texts. Many of these works were entirely unknown prior to the discoveries; others were known to scholars only by name or through reference in ancient literature. Since the diversity of the scrolls does not lend itself to a single classificatory scheme, what follows is organized according to these broad categories: major (i.e., lengthy) texts, interpretive texts, apocryphal and pseudepigraphic texts, liturgical texts and so-called magical texts.

1.2.1. Major Texts.

Damascus Covenant. This work, also known as the Zadokite Fragments, came to light even before the discovery of the Qumran texts. S. Schechter discovered two fragmentary exemplars of it in the Cairo genizah at the end of the nineteenth century. Fragments of it have subsequently turned up among the DSS, being found in Caves 4, 5 and 6. The documents which Schechter found consist of three fragments, representing two versions or recensions, which he designated A and B. The two fragments of A correspond to two very different portions of the document—called respectively the Admonition and the Laws. Basically, the Admonition encompasses so-called historical summaries and the establishment of a new covenant community, while the Laws consist of halakic regulations for a communal life lived out in "camps." Of particular interest are the mentions of a "Teacher of Righteousness," a "Spouter of Lies" and an "Interpreter of the Law," along with the messiah(s) of Israel and Aaron.

The Discipline Scroll. A document that is often compared with the Damascus Covenant, particularly in terms of halakah (ḥălakah, lit, "the way," meaning a guide for living; see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings), is the Discipline Scroll (1QS, also known as the Manual of Discipline). The Discipline Scroll is an enigmatic text whose present form is the result of a process of editing and redaction, such that distinct literary units can be isolated. The text presents a number of difficulties since we lack the historical and sociological context to understand many of the references. In addition to this, the paleography and the rough Hebrew syntax combine to make very different translations possible. Emendations have been widely proposed—for example, the standard study by P. Wemberg-Møller proposes 63 emendations.

In addition to the principal text, two so-called appendices have been discovered. The first, known as the Messianic Rule (1QS\(^2\)), is two columns long and deals with the "last days." Its actual connection with the principal text is unclear, for although it apparently originally belonged to the same scroll from Cave 1, it was written by another scribe* and differs both in concept and terminology. It discusses the education of children* raised in the community, the stages of progression within the community according to age and ability, and procedures for the communal meal presided over by priests* and the "messiah of Israel." The second appendix has been called the Rule of Benediction (IQS\(^b\)) and is very poorly preserved. It consists of several blessings pronounced by the maškil ("wise leader") over the community, the priests and the prince. Like the Messianic Rule it has a definite eschatological setting.

The War Scroll. This scroll consists of nineteen badly deteriorated columns. It was originally somewhat longer, although there is no way to gauge just how much longer. It seems to have been intended as a manual to guide the "Sons of Light" in the final eschatological war, in which they would face, and eventually vanquish, the "Sons of Darkness." Nevertheless, the text is essentially a theological, not a military, composition.

Among the topics it treats are: preliminary preparations for the war; rules for the sounding and inscription of trumpets used to guide the course of the battle; the dimensions and inscriptions of shields and standards used; the battle array, including who may and may not participate in the conflict; the role of the priests and Levites; and the ebb and flow of the final battle against the Kittim (probably the Romans).

The Dead Sea Scrolls

A listing of some significant texts with their abbreviations
The weapons and tactics which the scroll describes suggest Roman, rather than Greek, military strategy, thus enabling the dating of the text to be narrowed to the later decades of the first century B.C. Literary analysis further suggests that the text as we now have it is considerably expanded and reworked, perhaps utilizing as its kernel a work based on Daniel 11:40—12:3. This literary hypothesis of expansion is supported by the discovery of fragments of six exemplars of this work in Cave 4. These fragments provide evidence of various recensions of portions of the War Scroll, some differing rather markedly from the manuscript from cave 1.

The Hymns. The composition known as the Hymns, or 1Q Ḥôdāyôṯ, consists of eighteen partial columns and sixty-six numbered fragments, as published in the editio princeps. Subsequently, two additional fragments have been identified. The fact that none of the columns is complete has led to differing divisions of the text and, consequently, differing reckonings as to the number of hymns it contains. The situation is further complicated by five manuscripts from Cave 4; these fill in lacunae in the manuscript from cave 1 but also show the order of hymns to have been variable. The copies of the text date from the first century A.D.

All the hymns or psalms begin "I thank thee, Lord" or "Blessed art thou, O Lord," and many thus fit the type known to form-critics as psalms of individual thanksgiving. Deviations from the biblical models, however, are sufficient to make the genre of these compositions a moot point in scholarship on the DSS. Also debated is the identity of the author(s), and whether this question can legitimately be asked of the texts. Bound up with this matter is the question of what function the writings served within the community that produced or employed them. Another interesting aspect of the hymns is their midway position between the psalmic literature of the Hebrew Bible and that of later Judaism, including the NT.

The Temple Scroll. The most recently published of the major DSS is known as the Temple Scroll (11IQTemple; also 1lQTorah). Sixty-seven columns, in varying degrees of fragmentation, are comprised by the nineteen parchment sheets. The scroll is twenty-eight feet when unwound—making it the longest of the DSS. A study of the writing indicates that two scribes labored to produce this copy. The scroll is an amalgam of biblical and extrabiblical ordinances and descriptions concerned with a temple,* its services and its festivals (see Feasts). After a lost beginning, the first well-preserved columns describe the temple building with its key installations. From there the text proceeds to detail various festivals, sacrifices and procedures, the temple courtyards and laws of impurity (see Clean and Unclean), finishing with nonsequential extracts from the Deuteronomic Code (Deut 12—26). Among the most striking literary features of the scroll is its change of biblical quotations attributed to Moses from third to first person. This has the effect of making Moses seem to be at once the author and addressee of the text. In addition, scriptural portions may be conflated, emended or glossed.

The New Jerusalem Text. A text that is related to the Temple Scroll, although not major, may conveniently be brought into the discussion here. This is the Aramaic text known as the New Jerusalem, attested by copies from Caves 1, 2, 4, 5 and 11. The text comprises a vision in which the author ("Ezekiel"?) is shown various buildings, streets and gates; in each case measurements both in cubits and reeds are provided. The description is very schematic, and many measurements are unrealistically large. Evidently inspired by Ezekiel 48:16-17, the city described is approximately 18x13 miles in size.

The Copper Scroll. Perhaps no DSS has occasioned greater difficulties in reading and interpretation than the Copper Scroll. This is the only text inscribed on copper, and unlike all but a few it was written in early Mishnaic Hebrew rather than in archaizing Late Biblical Hebrew (see Languages of Palestine).

Basically, the twelve columns consist of a series of topographic descriptions or toponyms, often followed by the instruction to dig a specified depth. Then follows a specified weight or amount of money, precious vessels or the like. At first glance the amounts seem incredible. Various interpretations of this document about buried treasure include Milik's thesis that it represents a "folkloristic treasure trove" that is not to be attributed to the Qumran community. In this view it was only coincidentally found, along with the materials of that group in Cave 3, being removed somewhat from the other deposits of that cave. This suggests two independent deposits; the Copper Scroll belonged to the second, around A.D. 100. This position has gained significant support. Others believe the contents described in the scroll are of an actual treasure, probably associated with the Jerusalem Temple—but even those who agree on this point dispute the text's dating. Apart from the problem of the scroll's origin, there are major problems in merely reading the letters of the error-filled document. However deciphered, it also seems to contain many new Hebrew terms and unknown toponyms. The Copper Scroll occupies a central position in the question of who wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls.

1.2.2. Interpretive Texts.

Pesharim. Among the most fascinating of the Hebrew texts discovered in the Caves are those known as the pesharim (pēšarim, pi. of pēšer, meaning "solution" or "interpretation"). These are usually grouped into two categories—thematic and continuous. Thematic pesharim consist of selected portions of the Hebrew Bible with interpretive comments, and are organized around a central theme or idea. In contrast, continuous pesharim comment verse by verse on a portion of the Hebrew Bible, usually the prophets, but sometimes so-called prophetic psalms. At least fifteen, perhaps eighteen, texts belonging to this latter category have been identified.

Continuous pesharim purport to be mysterious explications of divine truth from Scripture, a truth revealed only to the author and his group. These commentaries are unconcerned with the literal sense of the text, instead using metaphor, paronomasia and development of key words or phrases to unmask the hidden significance of a given biblical portion. The most complete of these pesharim is the commentary on Habakkuk. This pesher preserves thirteen almost-complete columns, providing the text of Habakkuk along with commentary.

Also relatively complete is the pesher known as 4Q171, which preserves the text of Psalms 37:7-40; 45:1-2 and possibly 60:8-9. Psalm 37 is a psalm of personal tribulation, offering the righteous hope in spite of the evident prosperity of the wicked. The author of the pesher has interpreted the psalm in terms of his community's enemies and eschatological justification.

From a historical vantage point the pesher on Nahum, 4Q169, may be the most important of the pesharim. The author, though mixing historical and eschatological descriptions, mentions a "Demetrius, King of Greece," and refers to a Jewish ruler who crucified great numbers of his opponents. References to these persons and events are preserved in the writings of Josephus,* leading some scholars to identify Demetrius as Demetrius III Eucaerus (95-88 B.C.) and the Jewish ruler as Alexander Jannaeus (103-76 B.C.). Other fragmentary pesher commentaries are known on Micah, Zephaniah, Isaiah and certain Psalms.

Of the thematic pesharim, none has aroused more profound interest than the text known as 11Q Melchizedek. Fourteen fragments preserve the remains of three columns. This manuscript comments on isolated OT texts, in particular Leviticus 25:9-10,13; Deuteronomy 15:2; and Isaiah 61:1. The events connected with these biblical texts are portrayed as taking place in "the end of days," which is further identified as the "tenth Jubilee." According to the text Melchizedek will free those who belong to his "inheritance" and (if suggested restorations are followed) "atone for their iniquities." He will further exact God's vengeance upon Belial and those of his "lot" The text presents a conception of Melchizedek that is approximately contemporary with that of Hebrews 7, connecting him with divine judgment, a day of atonement and a primary role among God's angels. Also of interest is Melchizedek’s possible identification with the archangel Michael, which would represent a combination of OT figures and motifs in a single person reminiscent of the way Jesus is characterized by the NT.

Three additional thematic pesharim are important. The first of these is known as 4Q Ordinances. This pesher is halakic and quite revealing in terms of biblical interpretation. The author interprets Exodus 30:11-16 (the traditional basis for the annual Temple tax required of all male Jews) as referring only to a onetime payment. Leviticus 25:39-46, which prohibits the purchase of fellow Israelites as slaves, is here understood to ban also the sale of a Jew to Gentiles.*

The second thematic pesher is 4Q Florilegium. Here four large fragments have been joined to form two columns, leaving twenty-three extra, unjoined sections. The author combines quotations from 2 Samuel 7.10-14; Exodus 15:17-18; Amos 9:11; Psalm 1:1; Isaiah 8:11; Ezekiel 37:23 (uncertain) and Psalm 2:1 with interpretative comments. All of these verses are related to the "end of days," when God will order that a new "temple of Adam" be built. Therein men will perform sacrifices and the "deeds of the Torah," free from outside harassment or impurity. Prominent in the text are references to the "Shoot of David" and the "Interpreter of the Law," terms familiar from other Qumran texts.

The third thematic pesher, 4Q Testimonia, has (perhaps falsely) furnished many scholars with the basic substance of Qumran messianic expectation. The text is a catena of quotations from Deuteronomy 5:28-29; 18:18-19; Numbers 24:15-17; Deuteronomy 33:8-11; Joshua 6:26 and an extrabiblical literary work known as 4Q Psalms of Joshua. These are arranged in the body of the text into four groups, each set off by a scribal device. One reason this text is important is because it furnishes explicit evidence for the existence, long posited, of testimonia or florilegia (collections of proof-texts) in pre-Christian Judaism.

Targumim. To date there are three Aramaic targumim (targûnim, plural of targûm, meaning "translation" or "interpretation"; see Targums) among the DSS. Of these by far the longest and most complete is the targum to Job from Cave 11. The significance of this text is considerable, since it represents the only incontestably pre-Christian targum of any appreciable length. The surviving text includes portions of chapters 17 through 42, with the last six chapters the least damaged. On the whole, despite slight additions, subtractions and dislocations, the Hebrew text on which the scroll was based seems to have been essentially the Masoretic Text. Even the supposedly disordered third cycle of debates (22:1—31:40) and the Hymn to Wisdom (28:1—28:28, often regarded as an interpolation), are here and in the same problematic order as in the Masoretic Text. The most radical divergence from the Hebrew text probably reflecting a different original, occurs after 42:8-11: verses 12 through 17 are missing and were evidently never a part of the targum.

The other two targumim are extremely fragmentary. The first contains an Aramaic translation of Leviticus 16:12-15, 18-21, and it is not certain that these fragments were part of a targum at all. It is equally conceivable that they may have come from a liturgical work which quoted these verses. If, nevertheless, they do represent portions of a targum, then we have for the first time a pre-Christian targum to a book of the Pentateuch. The translation of the Hebrew is literal (unexpanded). Finally, 4Q157 preserves only portions of Job 3:5-9 and 4:16—5:4, reflecting a text virtually identical to the Masoretic Text.

1.2.3. Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphic Texts. Included among the DSS are manuscripts of nonbiblical books that were known before the discoveries at the caves and which are part of the Pseudepigrapha. Apocryphal books attested at Qumran include Tobit and Ecclesiasticus (also known as Sirach). Pseudepigraphic works include the Testament of Levi (in Aramaic), a portion of the Testament of Naphtali (in Hebrew), Enoch and Jubilees. Jubilees seems to have been popular, to judge by the fourteen or fifteen manuscripts thus far identified. Portions have been discovered in Caves 2, 3, 4 and 11. Not surprisingly, previously unknown texts that can now be classified as pseudepigraphic were also unearthed. Among these are the Psalms of Joshua mentioned above and a Daniel cycle.

Enoch. In 1976 Milik published his long-awaited book on the fragments of Enoch, which were discovered in Cave 4. The book contains most (but not all) of the Aramaic texts forming parts of different sections from 1 Enoch. Thus it includes seven fragmentary manuscripts (4Q En[ar-g]) that preserve among them parts of the Book of Watchers, the Book of Dreams and the Episde of Enoch. Also included in the book are four other manuscripts (4Q Enastr[d-d]) that point to a vastly expanded recension of what is known in 1 Enoch as the Astronomical Book. Additionally, portions of a literature clearly related to 1 Enoch, but previously unknown, are included under the title Book of Giants (4Q En Giants^a^ e). Significant by its absence from the Qumran fragments is the so-called Book of Parables, which uses the term "son of man," an important self-designation of Jesus (see Son of Man).

Genesis Apocryphon. One of the pseudepigraphic texts that surfaced among the DSS was the otherwise unknown Genesis Apocryphon. Dated around the turn of the eras, it presents the patriarchs of Genesis telling their own stories. In so doing it is closely dependent on the biblical stories, with frequent expansions derived from unknown midrashic sources. Columns 1 through 5 originally concerned the birth of Noah; 6 through 17 dealt with the flood and the postdiluvian division of the earth among Noah's sons; 18 through 22, where the text breaks off, spoke of Abram according to Genesis 11 through 15.

Most scholars regard the Genesis Apocryphon as a midrashic composition, while recognizing features more akin to the known targumim. It is thus related to intertestamental works, such as Jubilees, which are often called "rewritten Bible." The primary importance of the text lies perhaps in its language. As one of the longest Aramaic texts from Qumran, it is of special significance in the effort to recover the form of Palestinian Aramaic used at the time of Jesus. The language is of a form transitional between the book of Daniel and the targumim, antedating as well the materials from the Wadi Murabba'at, Wadi Seiyal and Wadi Habra.

Prayer of Nabonidus. Fragments of an Aramaic pseudepigraphon known as the Prayer of Nabonidus were found in Cave 4. The fragments make up two incomplete columns, including the beginning of column 1. As the name suggests, the text is ostensibly a prayer delivered by the last king of Babylon, Nabonidus. It tells the story of the king's seven-year period of illness—a time when he prayed to "the gods of silver and gold" for a cure. At length a Jewish "exorcist" delivered him, and in gratitude the king wrote this prayer. The parallels with the fourth chapter of Daniel and the story of Nebuchadnezzar's madness are patent leading many scholars to conclude that in this text we have remnants of the popular traditions from which the Aramaic portions of Daniel were derived. Such literature had the twofold purpose of warning the Jews not to turn to paganism and of preaching to the Gentiles about the folly of idol worship.

The Daniel Cycle. The prayer of Nabonidus is evidently just one part of a Daniel cycle, a group that apparently included at least five additional works. Three of these (pseudo-Daniel a, b and c) seem to contain an apocalyptic overview of Jewish history, narrated by Daniel. The fourth, yet unpublished, work is a recounting of a dream in which four trees (or their "angels") speak to the author. Each tree represents a kingdom (compare Dan 2 and 7), the first of which is identified as Babylon and the second as Persia. Depending on its date, this work (known in two exemplars) could have a bearing on the interpretation (or history of interpretation) of the fourth kingdom mentioned in Daniel 2 and 7. Another text from this Daniel cycle is known as 4Q Ps DanA\(^2\) (4Q243; also designated 4Q246). This fragmentary but striking work preserves the phrases "son of God" and "son of the Most High," as well as phraseology reminiscent of Luke 1:32 and 1:35 (see Son of God).

Words of Moses. The Words of Moses seems to be a sort of apocryphon to Deuteronomy. God speaks to Moses, who in turn relays the commands to the people, evidently via Eleazar and Joshua. At one point the text requires the appointment of officials (perhaps priests) "to clarify ... all these words of the Torah." Another example of haggadic explanation occurs in the third column (3:8-10), where the date of the Day of Atonement is explained by reason that "your fathers were wandering in the desert until the tenth day of the month."

Book of Mysteries. Another tantalizing pseudepigraphon is the Book of Mysteries. Of the thirteen remaining fragments, only the first is complete enough to comprehend. This fragment contains two poetic distichs, cast as oracles, while the rhetorical, rather eloquent, prose that follows each distich provides "signs" by which the truth of the oracles is to be proved. Of particular interest is the appearance in the text (unfortunately in broken context) of the phrase razê peša'. This phrase is probably the Hebrew equivalent of the Greek mystênon tês anomias ("mystery of lawlessness") of 2 Thessalonians 2:7.

1.2.4. Liturgical Texts. Among the texts from Qumran many are liturgical (see Worship). One of the most interesting of these is known as the Angelic Liturgy. The composition is partially preserved in six manuscripts from Cave 4, as well as in fragments from Cave 11 and Masada. The author describes heaven as a complicated temple consisting of seven sanctuaries attended by seven chief prince-priests, their deputies and seven angelic priesthoods. Also included are the praise offerings that the angels* offer up on the Sabbath.* Altogether the work comprised thirteen compositions, one for each of the first thirteen Sabbaths of the year. The text is of importance for the study of angelology (see Angels), Second Temple liturgical song and the investigation of early Jewish mysticism. A striking phrase in the first hymn states that the angelic priests, by their heavenly cultus, "atone for those who turn from sin." It is possible to interpret this statement to imply that the earthly temple cultus is really not essential; here then is an important witness to a conception of Judaism that is not temple-centered (at least in a physical sense). Such ideas, of course, are the starting point both for Christianity and rabbinic Judaism.

An equally noteworthy liturgical opus is known as the Words of the Luminaries. Fragmentary remaining instructions show that the compositions contained in this manuscript were intended for use on given days of the week. The mood of these compositions is with one exception penitential; hence they may appropriately be classed tah"nûnim (confessional prayers reflecting such biblical passages as Dan 9:4-19). The instructions evidence that these tah"nûnim were used liturgically, as in later Judaism. The single evident exception to the somber tone of the Words of the Luminaries is a composition written for the Sabbath. This prayer* is appropriately full of praise rather than contrition.

Among many that might be singled out, two further liturgically oriented works can be mentioned here. One is 4Q Lamentations. The text is comprised of five fragments, the order of which is still uncertain. As the name implies, it is a lament or series of laments over the city of Jerusalem, whose imagery is achieved chiefly by allusion to Lamentations, Isaiah and Jeremiah. It is possible that the work was occasioned by a destruction of Jerusalem that happened at the time of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (compare 1 Macc 1:29-32). Alternatively, it may be merely a poetic reminiscence of the famous razing by the forces of Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C. The second text contains vocabulary strikingly similar to that of the Rule of Benediction, and is known as HQ Berachot. Its four fragments speak of blessings upon the "congregation" in eschatological terms borrowed from the prophets.

Another group of documents from Qumran that are in a broad sense related to liturgy and worship are the phylacteries. A number of these have surfaced from Caves 1, 4, 5, 8 and an unidentified cave. These phylacteries (which are head tʻpîlîn) are instructive not only regarding the content of the portions of Scripture contained and their order but also have noteworthy textual variants. Four tʻpîlîn were discovered in their capsules. This fortune enabled scholars to investigate several technical points that are treated extensively in rabbinic literature—such matters as the shape of the capsule, the nature of the leather for scriptural portions and the type of thread with which the capsules are tied.

The order of the scriptural portions in the te'hillin has been a matter of heated discussion in the history of Judaism. In the early medieval period the most famous controversy on this subject occurred between Rashi and Rabbenu Tam. The Qumran te'hillin are not strictly in the order for which either man argued. The fact that some te'hillin (arm te'hillin from Cave 8 are arranged according to Rashi's system, while others from the approximately contemporary finds at Murabba'at accord with the position of Rabbenu Tam, suggests that both systems were used concurrently in first-century Palestine.

The contents of the te'hillin published so far often add additional scriptural verses to the classical portion, but the added verses differ among the various examples. No clear rationale has been adduced to explain these additions. Noteworthy perhaps is that 1Q13, 4Qa and XQPhyl3 all contain the Decalog (Deut 5:1-21), which is not included in rabbinic phylacteries. Thus the phylacteries from Qumran raise many questions about the halakah governing their production at this point in the history of Judaism.

1.2.5. "Magical" Documents. The breadth of material included among the DSS is demonstrated by a group of documents which might be categorized as magical. One zodiac from Cave 4 is known to exist (4Q Zodiac) but has not been published. It may be identical with an unpublished brontologion (predicting events using thunder), which comprises two fragmentary columns. Somewhat more can be said about the document known as 4Q Cryptic. This is an encoded series of horoscopes in which the author used a mixture of alphabets and wrote from left to right, the opposite of the usual direction for Hebrew. The text describes three people in reference to their astrological birth signs; this in turn is related to their physical and spiritual qualities. There are terminological parallels with the Manual of Discipline. Such texts indicate that astrological ideas had been assimilated very early and quite deeply by the Jews, in spite of the clear connection they apparently had with idolatry for the authors of the Hebrew Bible (for example, Is 47:13-14; Jer 10:1-3). This type of interest was more typical of popular Jewish religion in this period than has often been realized.

Another zodiacal document, known as 4QMess ar, has been called a messianic horoscope. This very poorly preserved text contains the Aramaic phrase bhyr ‘lh’, the equivalent of the Greek phrase ho eklektos tou theou (the elect of God) witnessed by some manuscripts of John 1:34. It is not certain, however, that this phrase is intended in a messianic sense. It occurs as part of a description of an unborn child, who is ascribed wisdom and precocious intellect. He is also to have a long life, and the success of his plans is assured by his position as the "elect of God." The description of the child is clearly influenced by biblical descriptions of Solomon, and the text has no clear astronomical terminology. It might therefore better be considered an example of physiognomic literature, of which there are many Greco-Roman examples. It may actually describe the birth of Noah (compare 1 Enoch 106).

2. Interpretation of the Finds.

The majority of scholars identify the DSS as the products of an ancient Jewish sect known as the Essenes. For this identification they rely on a combination of external and internal evidence. The external evidence consists of a passage from Pliny the Elder and the archeology of the site of Qumran. In the course of a travelog Pliny describes the Essenes as living along the shores of the Dead Sea somewhere north of En Gedi. This description could fit Qumran. Archeology further indicates that the site was in use at approximately the time the ancient source describes. Structures found at Qumran have been identified as functional for such a community, and include what have been understood to be a potter's shop and communal dining hall. Three inkwells and other materials construed as evidence of scribal activity suggest to many scholars that the scrolls found in the nearby caves had their origins in a reputed scriptorium on the site.

Internal evidence consists of a comparison between passages describing the Essenes in Philo and Josephus and the contents of texts such as 1QS and CD. All agree in describing or presupposing a communal organization. Similarities include novitiate periods, communal regulations, strict observance of the Sabbath vis à vis rabbinic law, and certain legal positions such as the transmission of ritual impurity by oil.

But there are significant difficulties involved with the identification of the DSS as the products of an Essene community living at Qumran. Many of these problems have been pointed out by N. Golb in postulating his "Jerusalem hypothesis." The source upon which Pliny relies, for example, postdates the First Revolt. Therefore, it presumably describes a community living on the shores of the Dead Sea after A.D. 70, while archeology suggests that use of Qumran (except by the Romans) ceased before that The agreements between the classical sources' descriptions of Essene life and certain DSS texts are balanced, if not outweighed, by significant disagreements. And the vast majority of the DSS have no obvious relation to those descriptions at all, whether to agree or to disagree. Many have no obvious relation to one another—not what one would expect if they are all the products of a small sectarian community. Further, hundreds of different hands can be identified among the texts. This fact implies a multiplicity of scribes, of course, and even more striking, very few of the scribes so far identified copied out more than one text. How can these data be explained other than to posit an origin for the majority of the texts elsewhere than at Qumran?

An equally disturbing problem for the hypothesis of an Essene scriptorium (the identification of which has always been problematic, given the lack of ancient parallels) at Qumran is the lack of autographic and documentary texts among the scrolls. The scrolls include only one contract, if that, which is anomalous in comparison with what both other Judean manuscript discoveries and common sense would have predicted. And only one of the scrolls is an original—the hundreds of others are all scribal copies. The one autograph, the Copper Scroll, points back to Jerusalem by its list of treasures and its toponyms. It is thus not unreasonable, in light of the problems with the Essene hypothesis, to suggest a Jerusalem origin for all or most of the DSS. If such a view is correct, then the potential significance of the scrolls for an understanding of Judaism at the time of Jesus, and of the Gospels as products of that milieu, increases by orders of magnitude. For on this interpretation, the DSS represent the product of a wider portion of society than the Essene hypothesis stipulates. The question of how much wider remains a problem to be determined by literary analysis and must, of course, await the publication of the remaining texts before it can receive a definitive answer.

Although the Jerusalem hypothesis is not yet widely accepted, more and more scholars are coming to realize that a substantial proportion of the DSS are not sectarian products. One recent estimate, by a scholar familiar with all the unpublished materials, suggests that only twenty per cent are thus closely related. It would seem, then, that the explanatory power of the Essene hypothesis is weakening as more and more of the evidence comes to light. Indeed, recent discussion of an unpublished halakic letter, 4QMMT, has attributed it to the Sadducean sect; by any reckoning, the Essene orthodoxy is beginning to break up. What will replace it remains to be seen, of course, but a reasonable optimism would expect a more nuanced and historically satisfying understanding of the scrolls. The result for students of the NT will be the need for a great deal of reevaluation. Indeed, much NT scholarship already lags behind the new developments in scrolls studies rather badly, relying on the outdated analyses written in the first two decades of Qumran research.

3. The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Gospels.

As stated, NT scholarship in relation to the DSS is best described as outdated.
For example, no book is more often quoted in this regard than the volume edited that rather than produce a new series of essays on relations between Qumran studies and the NT, the book simply continues to be reprinted. Similarly, the two-volume work by H. Braun, Qumran und das Neue Testament, is now outdated. Both these works still contain useful material, but it is necessary to use them very cautiously, because so much has happened in DSS studies since they were written.

An illustration of the potential for new understandings may be found in the letter alluded to above, the unpublished 4QMMT. Though it is unpublished, underground copies circulate widely, and it has been described in print more than once. The letter (if such it is—neither opening nor closing formulae are preserved) discusses a series of about twenty legal topics upon which the text's authors and the Temple authorities disagree. In this fact alone its significance for NT studies is enormous, for until now we really had no factual statement about what was going on in the Temple of Jesus' day (some scholars do date the text to the Maccabean period, but such an early dating is highly problematic because of the letter's language and contents). Josephus's descriptions of the Temple cultus are difficult to use with confidence, because he apparently often describes things the way they ought to have been (as he understood the relevant OT texts) rather than the way they really were. This fact becomes apparent when comparing the theoretical descriptions of his Antiquities with the historical narratives of his War and Vita; not infrequently they disagree. The Tannaitic legal discussions are likewise often idealizing (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). With MMT we can discover what was really happening, at least with regard to the topics upon which it touches. For example, the authors oppose allowing offerings by Gentiles. It will be recalled that the First Revolt with Rome was partly fueled by just such sentiments, as Eleazar bar Ananias seized control of the Temple and refused to allow any more sacrifices on behalf of Gentiles.
Another insight from MMT consists in the manner of its halakic argument. Repeatedly its authors precede their legal positions with the phrases "\(2\) naḥnû ḥôšeḇîm, "\(2\) naḥnû ḏômrim," "we believe, we say." The formal identity with Matthew's depiction of Jesus' legal arguments in the Sermon on the Mount ("You have heard ... but I say") is patent (see Sermon on the Mount). Presumably, therefore, Matthew has preserved a common first-century rhetorical structure heretofore unparalleled in early Jewish materials.

Moving to more general considerations, perhaps the most interesting relationship between the Gospels and the NT concerns their principal personage. The Gospels focus, of course, on Jesus of Nazareth; correspondingly, a small group of the DSS focus on an enigmatic figure known as the Teacher of Righteousness (\(môrêh\ hasṣeḏeq\). The parallels are particularly striking in comparing the Matthean portrait of Jesus with the Teacher, for in both cases the men are depicted as a new Moses.* The Teacher is viewed both before and after his arrival—that is to say, there existed a group which anticipated the arrival of a Mosaic figure who would deliver a new Law when he came. At a certain point in time, a man emerged from the group who claimed to be this new Moses. Not all of the group received him, and the community split over the issue of his leadership. We possess the texts which describe the predicted figure and, also, later texts written after his arrival. The Teacher of Righteousness did indeed present the requisite new Law— the Temple Scroll. It was expected that the eschaton would dawn at this point, and when it did not, considerable reinterpretation was necessary. This situation also appears in our texts. Little is clear as to the continued existence of the group as years passed and the expected irruption of eschatological times still delayed. The texts do describe the death of the Teacher, but this may have been an expected event prior to the end, since Moses also died before entering the promised land.

Present scholarly consensus places the appearance of the Teacher in the mid- to late-second century B.G. He apparently had a conflict with the nascent Hasmonenean hegemony, perhaps represented by Jonathan Maccabee (161-143 B.C.). The last historical event to which the scrolls refer is the conquest of Jerusalem by Ptolemy in 63 B.C. This is a rather curious situation if the Essene hypothesis is correct for that theory as usually presented requires that the group continued for 125 years beyond Ptolemy—125 years of silence. In this context one should note R Eisenman's dating of the pertinent texts to the first century AD.

Many other points of contact between the Gospels and the DSS, both conceptual and linguistic, will have been evident in the preceding discussion. A true assessment of the relationship must await full publication of the scrolls.

See also Judaism.

M. O. Wise.

Deafness. See Blindness and Deafness; Hardness of Heart.

Death of Jesus

The crucifixion of Jesus under Pontius Pilate* is among the most historically certain and theologically pregnant events of Jesus' life.

1. Crucifixion in the Ancient World
2. The Crucifixion of Jesus
3. Why Was Jesus Crucified?
4. The Death of Jesus in the Gospel of Matthew
5. The Death of Jesus in the Gospel of Mark
6. The Death of Jesus in the Gospel of Luke
7. The Death of Jesus in the Gospel of John

In spite of its cruelty as a form of punishment, crucifixion was practiced throughout the ancient world. It was employed as a method of execution (or, in some cases, impalement after death) among the Persians, Indians, Assyrians and others, and later among the Greeks and Romans. Some evidence suggests crucifixion was used as a mode of execution by Jews before the time of Herod the Great (Josephus, J.W. 1.4.6 §§97-98; Ant. 13.14.2 §§379-383; IIQTemple 64:6-13).

1.1. Crucifixion: A Cruel Practice. Among the torturous penalties noted in the literature of antiquity, crucifixion was particularly heinous. The act itself damaged no vital organs, nor did it result in excessive bleeding. Hence, death came slowly, sometimes after several days, through shock or a painful process of asphyxiation as the muscles used in breathing suffered increasing fatigue. Often, as a further disgrace, the person was denied burial and the body was left on the cross to serve as carrion for the birds or to rot.

Crucifixion was quintessentially a public affair. Naked and affixed to a stake, cross or tree, the victim was subjected to savage ridicule by frequent passers-by, while the general populace was given a grim reminder of the fate of those who assert themselves against the authority of the state.

Descriptions of the act of crucifixion are rare in the extant literature of antiquity. This is not due to the infrequency of the practice, but rather to literary-aesthetic considerations. Members of the cultured literary elite were hesitant to dwell long on this horrific, brutal act Indeed, even the passion narratives (see Passion Narrative) of our Gospels, which Hengel regards as the most detailed descriptions of their kind (Hengel 1977, 25), are remarkably brief in their recounting of the actual act of crucifixion. Eschewing all details, they simply report, "They crucified him" (Mt 27:35; Mk 15:25; Lk 23:33; Jn 19:18).

Even where we find descriptions it is obvious that no standard form of crucifixion was uniformly practiced. In fact, the accounts are not always clear even on whether the crucifixion took place before or after the victim's death. Nor is it evident in each case whether the victim was bound or nailed to the stake, or whether a crossbeam was always used. In the Roman world, however, the form of crucifixion was apparently more uniform: it included a flogging beforehand, and victims often carried the crossbeam to the place of crucifixion, where they were nailed or bound to the cross with arms extended, raised up, and perhaps seated on a sedicula, or small wooden peg (Hengel 1977, 22-32).

On the other hand, even in the Roman world the procedure was subject to variation, depending on the whims of the executioners. For example, in his eyewitness account of the Roman siege of Jerusalem, Josephus* observes how hundreds of Jewish prisoners were "scourged and subjected to torture of every description . . . , and then crucified opposite the city walls." Hoping that the gruesome sight might induce the Jews to surrender the city, Titus, the Roman commander, gave his soldiers freedom to continue the crucifixions as they pleased. "The soldiers out of rage and hatred amused themselves by nailing their prisoners in different positions . . . ." (Josephus, JW. 5.11.1 §§449-451).

Archeological evidence related to the practice of crucifixion in first-century Palestine is even more sparse. In 1968 an ossuary was discovered in a buried cave at Giv'at ha-Mivtar in northern Jerusalem. It contained the bones of an adult male who had died by crucifixion during the period between the onset of the first century A.D. and the mid-60s. Initial study of the skeletal remains indicated that a nail had been driven through each of his forearms, and his heel bones had been pierced by a single iron nail. The latter nail was found still embedded in what investigators took to be the heel bones of both feet. Wood fragments found at both ends of the nail indicated that the nail first passed through a small wooden plaque, then through the victim's feet, and then into a vertical, olivewood beam. apparently as a coup de grâce, his shins had been broken intentionally.

Zias and Sekeles recently re-evaluated the skeletal remains of the ossuary, together with related photographs, casts and radiographs. On this basis they proposed a number of amendments to earlier findings. Most importantly, they determined that the still-intact iron nail had passed from the right side to the left of the right heel bone (calcaneum) only. A different picture of the crucified man results, for on this reconstruction the feet were not anchored with one nail, but the victim apparently straddled the upright beam. Moreover, finding no clear evidence of traumatic injury to the bones of the forearm or hands, they propose the victim was tied to the crossbeam, not nailed. Finally, they questioned whether the bones of the lower limbs had been broken prior to death.

Although this discovery adds archeological evidence to literary descriptions of crucifixion, it is nevertheless clear that the paucity of direct anthropological evidence of this nature restricts the certainty one might attach to its interpretation.

1.2. Crucifixion: A Military and Political Punishment. As a rule, Roman citizens were spared from this form of execution, though in extreme occasions (e.g., high treason) death by crucifixion might be imposed. More generally among the Romans, crucifixion was a penalty reserved for those of lower status —namely, dangerous criminals, slaves and the populace of foreign provinces.
Among these peoples crucifixion served as a means of asserting Roman authority and maintaining law and order. Thus, in the province of Judea it proved to be a generally effective weapon against resistance to Roman occupation (see Rome).

1.3. Crucifixion: Interpretive Stigma. In his important survey of the treatment of crucifixion in ancient literature, Hengel queries whether, outside early Christianity, death by crucifixion was ever interpreted in a positive manner.
Within the Gentile world, he finds in Stoicism the use of crucifixion as a metaphor "for the suffering from which the wise man can free himself only by death, which delivers the soul from the body to which it is tied" (Hengel 1977, 88; cf. pp. 64-68). However, beyond this the cruelty of the cross seems to have forbidden any positive interpretation or metaphorical use of death by crucifixion.

If this was true for the Gentile world, it was even more so for the Jewish.
Inasmuch as the use of crucifixion by the Romans as a deterrent against Jewish nationalism was widespread, we might have anticipated that the cross would come to serve as a symbol for martyrdom. However, in addition to the humiliation and brutality associated with this form of execution, for Jews an additional, profoundly religious obstacle existed.
Already by the time of the first century AD., the victim of crucifixion was understood in terms of Deuteronomy 21:22-23—specifically, "anyone who is hung on a tree is under the curse of God." In its own context this passage refers to the public display of the corpse of an executed criminal. But the NT gives evidence that this meaning was expanded considerably within the early church to include persons who had been crucified. This is seen in the verbal allusions to Deuteronomy 21:22-23 (e.g., Acts 5:30; 13:29; 1 Pet 2:24) and Paul's explicit citation of Deuteronomy 21:23 in Galatians 3:13. Apart from and prior to Christianity, evidence from the Qumran literature (4QpNah 3—4.1.7-8; 11QTemple 64:6-13) as well as from the writings of the first-century Alexandrian Jew Philo (Spec. Leg. 3.152; Post C 61; Somn. 2.213) attests that victims of crucifixion could be understood this way within Judaism.* Thus, the cross could not be interpreted positively as a symbol of the Jewish resistance.

2. The Crucifixion of Jesus.

The crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth under Pontius Pilate is well attested in Christian and non-Christian sources (see Jesus in Non-Christian Sources). It is reported in the four canonical Gospels in the midst of remarkably full passion accounts, and referred to as an historical event throughout the NT (especially in Paul). The Latin historian Tacitus mentions Jesus' death in The Annals: "Christus ... had undergone the death penalty in the reign of Tiberius, by sentence of the procurator Pontius Pilate" (15.44). In a text whose authenticity is under suspicion, Josephus recalls that Pilate condemned Jesus to be crucified (Josephus Ant. 18.3.3 §§63-64). For these and other reasons, the historicity of the death of Jesus on the cross is beyond doubt (Green 1988,1). However, numerous problems revolve around (1) our ability to date the crucifixion, (2) the historicity of some details recorded in the crucifixion accounts themselves and (3) the interpretation of Jesus' death by Jesus and his first followers.

2.1. The Date of Jesus' Crucifixion. All four Gospels narrate the execution of Jesus on a Friday—that is, on the day before the Sabbath* (Mt 27:57, 62; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:54; Jn 19:31,42). The major chronological issue, therefore (see Chronology), revolves around the relation of this Friday to Passover (see Feasts). Assuming the Jewish reckoning of the day from sunset to sunset, the Passover feast would have been eaten on the evening of 15 Nisan. The Synoptic Gospels (e.g., Mk 14:12-16) recount the Last Supper* as a Passover meal on Thursday evening, 15 Nisan. Hence, in their reckoning the day of Jesus' arrest trial* and death was 15 Nisan, the day of Passover. John's Gospel, on the other hand dates the death of Jesus on 14 Nisan, the day of preparation for Passover (13:1-4; 18:28; 19:14,31).

If we take these conclusions to the relevant astronomical data and assume Jesus was crucified around A.D. 30, we come up with the following options: According to the Johannine reckoning, Jesus was executed on April 3, A.D. 33 or April 7, AD. 30; according to the Synoptic reckoning, A.D. 27 and 34 would be the probable years. Should we adopt the Johannine reckoning or the Synoptic?

Three avenues for solving this dilemma have been proposed. Some scholars argue that the Synoptics have preserved the correct chronology,* and that John has revised the tradition in order to portray Jesus more fully as the Passover Lamb (see Lamb of God). It is true that John has a theological concern of this nature (cf. 1:29, 36; 18:28; 19:14, 31, 36-37); however, recent redaction-critical study (see Redaction Criticism) has determined the high probability that the Johannine chronology actually came to him in his passion tradition (Dauer, 133-136, 140-142). Others have argued that the Synoptic account is tendentious, resulting from Mark's creative attempt to portray the Last Supper as a Passover meal. This argument fails to consider the tightly integrated character of the Passover elements in the Synoptic tradition, as well as the degree to which even John's narrative of the Last Supper is paschal in character (Green 1988, 113-116).

Third, many have attempted to harmonize the Synoptic and Johannine chronologies. Two of these theories are particularly noteworthy. First, some have championed the view that Galileans (like Jesus and his disciples) and Pharisees* reckoned the day from sunrise to sunrise, unlike the Judeans and Sadducees who reckoned the day from sunset to sunset Hence, the Passover meal (Last Supper) was celebrated on Thursday evening 14 Nisan by Jesus, his disciples and other Galileans. The Judeans shared the Passover meal on Friday evening 15 Nisan. Others have found more plausible the theory that the Passover was celebrated on two different days in the year of the crucifixion, due to the disparity between the Pharisaic and Sadducean calendars. Both views require two consecutive days of Passover sacrifices, a possibility for which we have no clear evidence. At the same time, we can imagine this being allowed in order to maintain peace among the different groups within first-century Judaism. (See the review in Marshall, 57-75, 184-185.)
In the end, we are left with the conclusion that Jesus was crucified on 14 Nisan—that is, April 7 A.D. 30 or April 3, A.D. 33. The later date is corroborated by Pilate's need to appease the Jews in order to be "Caesar's friend" (Jn 19:12) and his new friendship with Herod (cf. Lk 23:12)—both of which are best understood in connection with Pilate's changing policies toward the Jews after A.D. 32 (Hoehner, 71-114; see Chronology). However, a date in A.D. 33 raises other problems inasmuch as it compresses the available time for the subsequent Christian movement and the Pauline mission.

2.2. The Crucifixion Accounts. Like the rest of the passion story, the crucifixion of Jesus is not recounted merely to chronicle what happened. This event Jesus' execution on a cross, was of such a scandalous nature that it cried out for interpretation and legitimization. The result is a tightly woven tapestry combining both elements—event and interpretation—with the latter largely dependent on references to the OT (see Old Testament in the Gospels). Thus, Jesus' garments are divided (Ps 22:18), he is crucified with two criminals (Is 53:12), he is mocked (Ps 22:7; 70:3) and taunted (Ps 42:10), he is offered wine* (Ps 69:21; Prov 31:6), he cries out from the cross (Ps 22:1; 31:5), he is acclaimed as God's Son (cf. Wis 2, 4—5) or as the Righteous One (Is 53:11 ), and is thus vindicated after maltreatment (Is 52:13-15; 53:10-12). The crucifixion narratives demonstrate in story form that Christ* died "according to the Scriptures" (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

Some scholars continue the now outdated practice of trying to peel back the layers of theological interpretation in order to arrive at the story's historical kernel. Reported events, however, by virtue of their being reported, are always interpreted events. Hence, although the task of determining the historical plausibility of these narrated events remains an important one, attempts to sunder theology from history are misguided.

2.2.1. Crucifixion Traditions. Most scholars assume that Matthew's only narrative source for the crucifixion was Mark. In all likelihood, the Fourth Evangelist used his own, non-Markan source (Dauer; Green 1988, 105-134). In the past commentators largely worked with the hypothesis that Luke's account was for the most part also independent of the Markan narrative (e.g., Taylor). More recently, however, greater emphasis has been placed on Luke's creative shaping of the Markan story (e.g., Matera, 150-220; Neyrey).

Several lines of evidence point to Luke's use of early, non-Markan tradition for his account of Jesus' crucifixion, however, though scholars disagree on the nature of that traditional material (Green 1988, 86-101). First, Luke includes significant material not found in Mark which, under close literary analysis, does not appear to have come from Luke's creative pen. This material includes Jesus' warning to Jerusalem in 23:27-31, Jesus' intercessory prayer* from the cross in 23:34a, Jesus' interaction with the crucified criminals in 23:39-43, and Luke's description of the repentance of the multitudes (see People, Crowd) in 23:48.

Second, in some cases Luke narrates actions also reported in Mark, but in ways sufficiently different so as to suggest his use of alternative traditional material. One example of this phenomenon appears in the use of Psalm 22:7 in the record of the mockery of Jesus by the passers-by. Interestingly, Mark 15:29-30 betrays the influence of the latter half of Psalm 22:7 ("shaking their heads"), while Luke 23:35 has been influenced by the first half of Psalm 22:7 ("seeing . . . they mocked"). This suggests the significance of Psalm 22:7 in the early passion tradition, and indicates that this tradition came to Mark and Luke independently. Other noteworthy examples include the reports of Jesus' last words from the cross (see below) and the confession of the centurion.

Third, some aspects of the Lukan narrative that depart from Mark are paralleled in other sources. Thus, for example, the reaction of the crowds in Luke 23:48 is similar to that found in Gos. Pet 7:25 ("Then the Jews* and the elders* and the priests,* perceiving what great evil they had done to themselves, began to lament and to say, 'Woe on our sins, the judgment and the end of Israel* is drawn nigh.' "). Finally, the linguistic and syntactic deviations from Mark's account in Luke are not easily explained on the basis of Luke's creativity alone.

Evidence of this character has suggested to some that Luke knew a second, connected passion narrative; to others that he was familiar with a series of disparate non-Markan traditions, whether oral or written. It is plausible that three roughly parallel early crucifixion accounts are represented in our canonical Gospels. This speaks in favor of the antiquity of the tradition, which may have been a part of a larger, early passion narrative.

2.2.2. History and Interpretation in the Crucifixion. Turning to the accounts themselves, we see that they all agree in having Jesus led away to the place of crucifixion. The mention of the name of Simon of Cyrene serves no theological purpose, though his being drafted to carry the cross is reminiscent of Jesus' words about discipleship* ("taking up the cross," Mk 8:34). Simon is missing altogether from the Johannine narrative, probably as a result of John's overall attempt to indicate how, even in his passion, Jesus is master of his own fate. Others, however, see in Jesus' carrying "his own cross" (Jn 19:17) a reference to the Akedah—that is, the attempt by John to develop a parallel between Jesus' passion and the binding of Isaac (see Gen 22:6, where the wood was placed on Isaac by his father).

A number of other aspects of Jesus' crucifixion deserve brief discussion.

The Location of Golgotha. All of the Gospels mention that Golgotha was the place of Jesus' execution. Matthew, Mark and John translate the Aramaic gûlgaltâ (Hebrew, gulgôlā) as "Place of the Skull." Luke, who avoids Aramaic place names, has "Skull," a more accurate translation. Many attempts have been made to explain the meaning of this place reference: A hill in the shape of a skull? A rocky mound on which no vegetation could grow?

The precise location of Golgotha is disputed, though our knowledge of crucifixion in the Roman world and the Gospel accounts themselves suggest its location outside the walls of Jerusalem (Jn 19:20; cf. Heb 13:12) in a public place, perhaps near a busy road (e.g., Mk 15:29, 40). According to John 19:41, the site of Jesus' crucifixion was in close proximity to his borrowed tomb.

Strong circumstantial evidence supports the location of Golgotha in the area on which now stands the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, located within the Old City of Jerusalem. According to archeological findings in the 1960s, interpreted in tandem with Josephus's description of the city's fortifications, this site would have been well outside the city walls. Before the expansion of the city it was a quarry into which a number of tombs had been cut.

Before modern investigators realized the more narrow perimeter of the city walls as it was in the first third of the first century A.D., they focused their searches on the area to the north of the Old City. There they located a rocky hill whose stony face appeared to resemble a skull. Kenyon notes that the present shape of the hill is due largely to subsequent quarrying, however.

Jesus' Prayer. Only Luke records that, following his crucifixion, Jesus prayed on behalf of those responsible for his death (23:34). This prayer is missing from a number of important manuscripts, presumably because some later copyists were uncomfortable with this portrait of Jesus extending mercy to his Jewish opponents (see Textual Criticism). The major themes of the prayer—forgiveness* and ignorance—are important in Luke-Acts (cf. Lk 1:77; 7:47-50; Acts 2:38; 3:17; 5:31; 10:43; 13:27, 38; 14:16); furthermore, its presence is important to the structure of the passion story, which narrates a saying of Jesus in each major section. Some scholars regard the prayer as having been created by Luke on the basis of the similar request of Stephen in Acts 7:60. But why should Stephen provide the model for Jesus, and not vice versa? Moreover, Jesus' request for the exoneration of his persecutors accords well with what we otherwise know of Jesus' teaching on one's attitude to hostility (e.g., Mt 5:44; see Love; see further, Lohse, 129-130).

The Division of Jesus' Clothing. The evangelists agree in their narration of the division of Jesus' clothing among the soldiers. Some evidence suggests this distribution of the victim's clothing happened as a matter of course in antiquity, but the language of Psalm 22:18 has clearly influenced the way this event has been reported.

The Inscription on the Cross. The inscription on the cross is reported by all the Gospels with remarkable consistency, each noting that it was as "The King of the Jews" that Jesus was executed. Historically, this notice would have marked Jesus as a messianic pretender to the throne. No doubt Jesus' first followers saw in this charge an ironic proclamation of the true identity of Jesus, and this has been further emphasized in the Johannine elaboration of this report (19:19-22).

In the past it was common to assert that an inscription of this kind was normally affixed to the cross in a Roman crucifixion. Recent re-examination of the available evidence reveals the opposite. Prior to their execution condemned persons might be required to display publicly the charge under which they had been sentenced to death, but the inscription reported by the Gospels is without parallel. For this reason the historical veracity of this measure should not be questioned. As Harvey has observed: "The first historians of Jesus' death can therefore have been under no compulsion to invent [such a notice]" (Harvey, 13).

The Mocking. Mark, Matthew and Luke agree that the Jewish leaders mocked Jesus on the cross, though Luke goes on to add that the soldiers joined in the derision (cf. Mk 15:16-20). In short, they insist, if Jesus were who he said he was, he would not be in this shameful, awful predicament The historicity of the general contours of this account is almost certain for three reasons. First it is consistent with what we know of Roman custom, which locates the act of crucifixion in the public arena precisely in order to foster this son of derision. Second, it dovetails well with what we know of attitudes toward death in late Judaism, as suggested by a text like Psalm 22:7-8 or Wisdom 2:18, 20. Those who have a special relationship with God will not undergo shameful death. Third, the content of the mockery parodies the charges leading to Jesus' execution.

Jesus' Last Words. A more difficult issue is raised by Jesus' last words on the cross, reported variously as follows:

Mark 15:34, citing Psalm 22:1: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?"

Luke 23:46, citing Psalm 31:5: "Father, into your hands I commit my spirit"

John 19:30: "It is finished."

The case for the historicity of the Markan version (followed by Mt 27:46) is strongest though a number of modern interpreters argue that the quotation of Psalm 22:1 in Mark 15:34 is Mark's way of providing the content of the wordless shout in Mark 15:37. Aside from the fact that this would require Mark's narration of only one cry instead of two, the most prominent obstacle to this thesis is the offensiveness of Psalm 22:1 on the lips of Jesus. This is also the strongest argument favoring its authenticity. Assuming Luke had Mark's Gospel as a source for Jesus' passion, he clearly bypassed this cry of dereliction in his account. Also, in some manuscripts of Mark 15:34, "forsaken" has been replaced by "reproached," with the result that the force of the psalmic citation has been weakened dramatically. These provide literary evidence for the offensiveness of this citation in the early church.

Some have suggested that the use of Psalm 22:1 here was intended to call to mind the vindication of the Righteous One, promised in the psalm when read as a whole. In first-century Judaism, was the citation of the opening of a psalm designed to recall the psalm in its entirety? Evidence for this phenomenon is very late. We are left with the starkness of Jesus' cry from the cross, a starkness that speaks pointedly for its historicity. Who would invent for Jesus so scandalous an outburst?

What then, of the quotation of Psalm 31:5 in the Lukan account? Has Luke simply substituted one psalmic citation for another? Three lines of evidence converge to suggest that Luke is not independently responsible for the use of Psalm 31:5 in this context (Green 1988, 97-98). First, we see an interesting coincidence of language when moving from Luke 23:46 to the way in which both Matthew and John report Jesus' death. Luke, in the words of the psalm, reports that Jesus "commits his spirit" while Matthew 27:50 records that Jesus "yielded up his spirit" and John 19:30 has it that Jesus "delivered up his spirit." Luke is the only writer who actually cites Psalm 31:5 here, but these parallels suggest the common use of a very old tradition rooted in the psalm.

Second, even though Luke elsewhere consistently employs the Greek Old Testament (LXX), here his citation is drawn from the Hebrew text (MT). Luke, who gives no indication that he knew Hebrew, seems to have borrowed this material from a source which had already translated the Hebrew text into Greek (see Languages of Palestine).

Finally, some scholars have suggested that the allusions to Psalm 31:5 in Acts 7:59 and 1 Peter 4:19 indicate the general use of the psalm in dangerous settings. It may even have been used as an evening benediction in late Judaism. This speaks to the appropriateness of Psalm 31:5 in the final moments of Jesus' passion, and leaves open the possibility of the saying's authenticity.

2.3. Jesus' Crucifixion as Interpretive Problem. "The chief priests and our rulers delivered him up to the death sentence. They crucified him, but we had hoped he was about to redeem Israel" (Lk 24:20-21). By not explicitly identifying, the "they" responsible for the crucifixion in this text, Luke continues his strategy of exonerating the Roman authorities while inculpating the Jewish leadership. The dashed hopes of Jesus' followers are the real point at issue here, however. With these words, Cleopas and his friend voice their shock and discouragement over Jesus' death. They also strike at the root of the interpretive problem raised by a crucified Messiah (see Christ).

It is true that Christian apologetic found in Isaiah 52:13—53:12 a prophecy of the suffering Messiah (e.g., Acts 3:13-18; 1 Pet 2:21-24; see later, Athanasius, "On the Incarnation"). But first-century Jewish messianic expectation focused pre-eminently on a royal, glorious Son of David.* The Isaianic passage never mentions the Messiah, and late Judaism did not turn to this passage to fill in its portrait of the expected deliverer (see Servant of Yahweh).

If the notion of a "suffering Messiah" runs counter to what we know of messianic speculation in the first century, how much more an oxymoron a "crucified Messiah" must have seemed. After all, according to current interpretation of Deuteronomy 21:22-23, a victim of crucifixion was cursed of God. Yet, the "Messiah" is literally "God's Anointed." Clearly, the cross of Christ presented a conspicuous enigma—it cried out for reinterpretation.

Some regard the resurrection* of Jesus as the crucial key to overturning the ignominy of the cross. Its role in authenticating Jesus' mission in spite of the cross should not be downplayed. At the same time, we would be gravely mistaken were we to assume the cross of Christ carried no significance apart from the resurrection. In fact one might better say that the resurrection authenticated the mission and message of Jesus, including the message of his death on a cross. As we shall see, the Gospels present the cross as the culmination of his mission (cf., e.g., Mk 10:45; Lk 24:25-27; Jn 12:23-28). At this point, it will be worthwhile to reflect briefly on two closely related questions —namely, how Jesus understood his death and how it was interpreted by the earliest churches.

Combining his own creative reflection on the development of atonement theology in earliest Christianity with his synthesis of traditional scholarship on the subject, Hengel has argued that the interpretation of Jesus' death as a vicarious, atoning sacrifice stems from Jesus' own understanding of his death. His point of departure is the Pauline material and pre-Pauline traditions that ensure that the interpretation of Jesus' death as a saving event can be traced back at least as far back as the earliest Greek-speaking Christian communities (e.g., Rom 4:25; 1 Cor 15:3-5; Gal 2:20-21).

Pushing further, Hengel insists that in order to understand the crucifixion of Jesus as the execution of the Messiah, Jewish Christians would have had to attribute to that death overwhelmingly positive significance. The interpretive categories offered by major currents of modern scholarship, Jesus as "righteous sufferer" and "prophet-martyr," are rejected by Hengel as inadequate for this purpose. The only satisfactory answer is that the first disciples, too, understood Jesus' death as an atoning sacrifice.

Pushing still further, Hengel traces this interpretation back to the ransom saying* and Jesus' words at the Last Supper (Mk 10:45; 14:24). Thus, Jesus anticipated his death and understood himself in his death as fulfilling the role of the Suffering Servant of the Lord (Is 52:13—53:12). Hengel concludes, "It was not primarily their own theological reflections, but above all the interpretive sayings of Jesus at the Last Supper which showed them how to understand his death properly" (Hengel 1981, 73; cf. Lohse).

Against this reconstruction, some will take issue with Hengel's acceptance of the authenticity of the ransom sayings attributed to Jesus in Mark 10:45 and 14:24. At the same time, it is worth noting that a growing number of scholars are admitting the probability that Jesus anticipated his execution by Roman authorities. He could scarcely have done otherwise given the content of his message (see below). To admit this, however, is to admit its corollary—namely, the probability that Jesus reflected on the relation of his mission and his death. For example, why did Jesus inquire of his disciples, "Who do you say that I am?" (Mt 16:13-26; Mk 8:27-38; Lk 9:18-26)? Did his interest lie solely in soliciting from them a confession of his identity? Understood in its context, Jesus' inquiry and subsequent teaching on the suffering of the Son of man* can be taken only as his attempt to relate in the most intimate way his execution and mission. Jesus thus regarded his imminent death as somehow integral to his mission, to bring redemption to Israel and the nations (see Gentiles; see Meyer, 216-219).

A more pressing concern to be raised against Hengel's study is its claim to have recovered the one, earliest interpretation of Jesus' death. He is not alone in this pitfall, however. In spite of the rich variety of imagery employed in the NT for coming to terms with Jesus' death, the history of reflection on the cross is littered with attempts to discern its significance in narrow terms. In reality, just as the crucifixion of Jesus is the most historically certain of the events of Jesus' life, it is also the most widely interpreted.

Another perspective on Jesus' death with a claim to having been rooted in Jesus' own understanding has been outlined by Allison. He undertakes an interesting survey of the expectation of a final, great tribulation in Jewish literature. From this he is able to show that the notion of a great tribulation was often associated with the coming of the eschatological era of salvation, but not according to any fixed model. Working backward from the passion accounts of our Gospels, he discovers that Jesus' death marked the beginning of the fulfillment of eschatological expectation, that the death of Jesus belongs to the messianic woes that mark the birth of the new era.

This crisis-oriented interpretation is suggested by several events of the passion —including darkness at noon (Mk 15:33), the rending of the Temple curtain (Mk 15:38) and the resurrection of the holy ones (Mt 27:51-53). Allison also sifts through the Gospels to discover evidence that Jesus himself understood his ministry in terms of the eschatological distress (e.g., Mt 11:12-13; Lk 12:49-53). Accordingly. "...Jesus foresaw for himself suffering, death, and vindication in the eschatological drama, which he took to be already unfolding" (Allison, 142). In short, Jesus' death and resurrection marked the dawning of the great Day of the Lord (see Eschatology).

These are only two more focused interpretations of Jesus' execution that lay good claim to having arisen out of Jesus' own understanding of his mission and death. Even more fundamental than these is the overarching reality that Jesus' suffering and death were recognized and proclaimed for their centrality to God's redemptive plan. The enigma of a crucified Messiah begged for interpretation. Taking their cues from Jesus' own understanding, those first disciples saw in the cross the fulfillment of God's purpose.

3. Why Was Jesus Crucified?

For the most recent chapter in the quest of the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus) a central question is, Why was Jesus crucified? Of course, on one level this query is answered easily enough. Historical data outside the Gospels points clearly to the reality that, in a Roman province like Judea, an execution of this kind could be carried out only under the orders of the Roman procurator. Moreover, as we have seen, crucifixion was used in the Roman provinces above all as a deterrent against sedition. By inference, then, we might conclude that Jesus was crucified under Pontius Pilate as an insurrectionist. This inference is supported by the Gospels themselves, for there the issue put before Pilate is clearly one of sedition.

In the only explicit record of the charges brought against Jesus, Luke 23:2, 5 reads, "We have found this man subverting our nation, opposing the payment of taxes to Caesar, and saying of himself that he is the Christ.... He stirs up the people throughout Judea by his teaching . . . ." Pilate's question to Jesus, reported in all four Gospels, is equally unambiguous in its political edge: "Are you the king of the Jews?" (Mt 27:11; Mk 15:2; Lk 23:3; Jn 18:33). Finally, Jesus is executed alongside two insurrectionists, and the inscription on the cross declares this to have been his crime as well.
Jesus, then, was executed for sedition. But rather than answering our initial question, this conclusion only sharpens it. We are left puzzled by the possible nexus between what we know of Jesus' life and the rationale for this death sentence. "The portrait of Jesus, as it is presented to us not only in the gospels but throughout the New Testament is utterly irreconcilable with this explanation of his death" (Harvey, 14; see pp. 11-35; Sanders, 294-318).

Indeed, at his arrest Jesus protests that he is not leading a rebellion against the state (Mt 26:55; Mk 14:48; Lk 22:52). Moreover, Jesus' followers were not rounded up and summarily executed, as one would have expected had Jesus been leading an insurrectionist movement (cf., e.g., Josephus Ant. 20.5.1 — 20.8.10 §§97-188; J.W. §§2.12.3-2.14.1 §§232-272). Furthermore, after Jesus' death his disciples were allowed to form a community in Jerusalem, an unthinkable development had they been known as a seditious party. Finally, had Jesus taught political resistance against Rome, we might imagine that his followers would have involved themselves in aggressive opposition against the state subsequent to his death. We are left, therefore, with a most enigmatic set of circumstances.

One scholar who has taken this problem seriously is E. P. Sanders. He tries to solve this puzzle with special reference to Jesus' physical demonstration against the Temple (Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:15-17; Lk 19:45-46). This act Sanders insists, was not intended as a cleansing of the Temple, but as a portent of its destruction (see Temple Cleansing; Destruction of Jerusalem). This, he argues, was Jesus' last public act after which was put in motion the decisive plot against his life. Set within the context of Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God* and his capacity to excite the hopes of the people, this act against the Temple was sufficient to bring Jesus to the attention of the Romans as a political threat. He was executed, then, at the behest of the Jewish leadership as a dangerous man, but not as an actual leader of an insurgent party.

Although plausible in its own way, Sanders' reconstruction of the rationale for Jesus' execution overlooks important aspects of the Gospel accounts. He is simply unable to come to terms with the role of the Jewish leaders in the process of Jesus' passion. In fact, his hypothesis leaves little room at all for the contribution of the Jews to this action, since, in his mind, the Jesus-Jewish (Pharisaic) conflict recorded in the Gospels is anachronistic. Moreover, his attempt to discount the material recorded in the Gospels which intervenes between the Temple action and the onset of the passion story fails to convince. Although we can believe the Temple action was a significant causal factor in Jesus' arrest and condemnation, it seems unlikely that it was the immediate cause.

Harvey, on the other hand, argues that the Jewish leaders did hand Jesus over to Roman authority, but only after their failure to cope effectively with this Jew whom they regarded as a threat to general peace and security. In this regard, Harvey is drawn to the Lukan account according to which Jesus was not found guilty or condemned as deserving death by the Jewish leaders (Lk 22:66-71; Acts 13:27-28; cf. Jn 18:19-23). Harvey therefore concludes that the Sanhedrin* held an informal hearing, the purpose of which was to decide whether, and on what grounds, to hand Jesus over to Pilate. What is lacking from Harvey's account is any discussion of why the Sanhedrin might have regarded Jesus as a threat (see Trial of Jesus).

A hint in this direction is provided by John 11:45-53. Here the Sanhedrin, meeting informally, initiates a plot against Jesus because they fear reprisals from Rome: "If we allow Jesus to go on like this, everyone will believe in him and the Romans will come and destroy both our Temple and our nation" (Jn 11:48). In fact in the decades before the Jewish War Palestine was the scene of repeated liberation movements, and Rome's repeated response was to kill both the leaders of such movements and their followers (see Revolutionary Movements).

At this point, Sanders is certainly correct: Jesus would have posed no immediate threat had it not been for his following. At the same time, we need not follow Sanders in aborting completely the record of Jesus-Jewish hostility recorded in the Gospels. First-century Judaism was marked by conflict—both internally, among the various forms of Judaism existing at the time, and externally, with Rome. Jesus' mission, construed in broad terms as the restoration of Israel in the context of the coming of God's universal rule, must have posed a threat within the social and power matrix of first-century Judaism. No less, of course, Jesus' proclamation of the eschatological kingdom would have posed a political threat to those most supportive of the present order, including the Roman authorities themselves. Even though Jesus presented no threat of a violent military takeover, his message of liberation and his growing popularity nevertheless made him a dangerous political risk (see Liberation Hermeneutics; Sociological Analysis of the Gospels). This threat heightened by Jesus' activity subsequent to his arrival in Jerusalem for Passover, led to his execution.
4. The Death of Jesus in the Gospel of Matthew

Any treatment of Jesus' death in the First Gospel must move beyond the boundaries of Matthew's passion narrative. Regardless of the tradition-history (see Tradition Criticism) of the passion story, it is now carefully integrated into the Gospel as a whole. We will discuss Matthew's portrayal of Jesus' death under four headings: (1) the rejection of Jesus and the gospel, (2) the death of Jesus and Matthew's christology, (3) the way of the cross and (4) the death of Jesus and the new era of salvation.

4.1. The Rejection of Jesus and the Gospel. Matthew's tragic account of Israel's rejection of God's Messiah provides the central drama of his Gospel. This theme reaches its climax in 27:25, where the Jews accept full responsibility for Jesus' execution: "His blood be on us and our children!" Its roots lie deep in Matthew's narrative of Jesus' life and ministry, and can be traced back to the story of Herod and the Magi from the East (see Birth of Jesus).

Matthew 2:1-12 is framed in such a way as to spodight the character of the various responses to the birth of Jesus. The importance of this story and the reactions it describes lies in its position as the first story wherein the birth of Jesus is made public, and in the reader's awareness of Jesus' identity as "Immanuel," the one who would save his people from their sins (1:21-23). How would Herod, king of the Jews, respond to the news of the birth of this king of the Jews?

Having discovered the place of Messiah's birth, the Magi go to Bethlehem to worship him. Herod, however, and with him the chief priests and teachers of the Law,* knew the town of the Messiah's birth but did not go to welcome him or pay him homage. Quite the contrary, Herod's troubled spirit gives way to malice, and he orders the deaths of the male children in the area of Bethlehem. Against Herod's plans for Jesus' premature death, God repeatedly intervenes to protect the child (2:12-13, 22). But the die is cast; Jesus' rejection and violent death are clearly foreshadowed.

Although with the onset of Jesus' mission the crowds respond favorably to his message (e.g., 7:28-29), contained in that message are portents of the coming crisis: "Blessed are those who are persecuted for the sake of righteousness" (5:10; cf. 5:44). No doubt for Matthew, Jesus, who was committed to the way of righteousness, was the ultimate exemplar of these words. Jesus did not seek death, but he recognized that a life of righteousness* was a life lived contrary to the conventions of his world. Only persecution could result.

The seemingly inevitable change in attitude toward Jesus is prefigured by the introduction of John the Baptist* in 11:1-19. Jesus compares his own fate with that of the imprisoned John: just as they rejected John, so will they reject Jesus. This motif is consummated in 14:1-12, where Matthew narrates the decapitation of John. The parallels between the executions of John and Jesus are striking. In each story, the plot against the protagonist is forestalled by his popularity (14:3-5; 21:45-46; 26:3-5). Both indicate that the Roman ruler in each case was reluctant to carry out the execution, but gave in to external pressure (14:9-10; 27:11-26). After his death disciples of John came, took his body, and buried it (14:12); likewise, after Jesus' death a disciple of Jesus came, took his body and buried it (27:57-60). These verbal and conceptual similarities mark the execution of John as an anticipatory allusion to the similar fate of Jesus.

Between the introduction of John in 11:1 and his reappearance in 14:1 lie additional portraiture of hostility and rejection. In 12:1-13 a conflict arises between Jesus and the Pharisees over appropriate behavior on the Sabbath. This leads to the first mention of a Jewish plot against Jesus in 12:14. Additional records of conflict follow: in 12:24-32 where Jesus is accused by the Pharisees of casting out demons* by Beelzebub; in 12:38-42 where the Pharisees and teachers of the Law, compared to an evil and adulterous generation, ask for a miraculous sign; and in 13:53-58 where Jesus is rejected even by his own townspeople.

In the midst of this section marked by hostility and the anticipation of Israel's final rejection of Jesus, Matthew introduces a counterpoint: Jesus is the Spirit-anointed Servant chosen by God (12:17-21, citing Is 42:1-4). If he is rejected by Israel, it is as a result of his obedience to his divine mission. During Jesus' public ministry the Pharisees and teachers of the Law appear routinely as his opponents. With the opening of the passion narrative in 26:1-5, the chief priests (see Priests and Priesthood) and the elders assume this role. They, in turn, enter into a contract with one of Jesus' disciples (26:14-16), then incite the crowds against Jesus. Finally, this progressive circle of hostility reaches its climax: they "all" (pas) call for his death (27:25).

Thus, the cross casts its shadow across the entirety of Matthew's Gospel. Its cruel reality is present by way of anticipation and threat in the motifs of hostility and rejection. Jesus' death is Israel's ultimate rejection of God's Messiah.

4.2. The Death of Jesus and Matthew's Christology. Matthew's christological interests are manifest already in his introduction of Jesus as Messiah, Son of David and Son of Abraham (see Abraham) in 1:1. The subsequent record of Jesus' genealogy* (1:2-18) accentuates his identity as the Messiah.

Also evident early on, and of central importance to Matthew's christology, is his portrayal of Jesus' solidarity with God's people and God's purpose. As the genealogical record shows, Jesus' coming is rooted deeply in the history of God's dealings with Israel (1:1-18). The story of Jesus' birth, with its parallels to Israel's past adds to this theme. He is born in the midst of hostility, forced into exile and brought out of Egypt into the land of Israel (2:1-23). Matthew's employment of OT quotations to signify Jesus as the consummation of OT promise (e.g., 1:22-23; 2:15-18) also fits into this scheme, rooting Jesus solidly in the history of Israel and divine promise (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology). Jesus' mission thus reveals God's will and is inexorably intertwined with the pain and hope of Israel.

Jesus was crucified as a messianic pretender, but this would not have kept Matthew's readers from perceiving a deeper significance in the repeated recital of this charge (26:63; 27:11, 17, 22, 27-31, 37). Unwittingly and ironically, the high priest Pilate and the soldiers all proclaim the true identity of Jesus. Yet for this interpretive twist to occur, titles like "Messiah" and "king of the Jews" must have been filled with new content for somehow, in this context they must be correlated with the death of Jesus.

Not surprisingly, then, "Christ" is interpreted alongside other christological images in the passion story. Chief among these are "Son of God" and "Servant." The association of Christ and Son of God in the passion account is clearest in the request of the high priest, "Tell us if you are the Christ the Son of God" (26:63). Also pertinent is the mockery of Jesus on the cross, where Son of God and King of the Jews are set in apposition (27:40, 42-43). The crucial question, then, concerns what significance we should attach to this usage. For the first clue to this riddle, we turn to the Gethsemane* episode, for here Jesus addresses God in prayer as "my Father" (26:39, 42; see Abba). This prayer is above all an act of submission to God. As Son of God, Jesus responds to the will of God with complete, unreserved obedience.
Likewise, in the arrest scene Jesus makes reference to "my Father" (26:53). In this context Jesus' authority* as God's Son occupies center stage, but he does not exercise this power (see Authority and Power) as a means of escape. To have done so would have been to depart from his own teaching (5:44) and from God's will (26:54,56).

A similar motif appears in the Son of God reference in 27:40. In their mockery of Jesus, the passers-by say, "Come down from the cross, if you are the Son of God," and in doing so model the form of the temptations presented Jesus by the devil in 4:3, 6: "If you are the Son of God ...." The inference in each case is that, as the Son of God, Jesus could do what his tempters request of him. To do so, however, would be to deny the character of obedience to God inherent in his sonship (see Temptation of Jesus).

In short, to refer to Jesus as Son of God is to speak pointedly of his fidelity to his mission, of his total obedience to God. This motif is also highlighted by Matthew's portrayal of Jesus as Servant in the passion account. The repeated references to Jesus' silence (26:63; 27:14) and innocence (27:4, 18-19, 23-24) indicate Jesus' passion is the fulfillment of his role as God's Servant in ways that underscore his faithfulness to the divine mission (cf. Is 53:7,11).

On the other hand, with the Servant motif Matthew expands the theological field of his portrayal of the passion. This is evident in Jesus' interpretive words at the Last Supper, where terminology such as "on behalf of" and "poured out for many" are reminiscent of the work of the Servant in Isaiah 52:13—53:12. These sayings interpret Jesus' death as efficacious, thus showing how Jesus would "save his people from their sins" (1:21). And this helps us appreciate the significance of the taunt in 27:42: "He saved others, but he cannot save himself!" Jesus' mission is salvific, but he can open the way of salvation only by the sacrifice of his life (cf. 16:25).

Commentators have often noted the heightened christology of Matthew's passion account when compared with Mark's. At the outset, Jesus announces his imminent execution (26:1-2). He declares the arrival of the appointed time (26:18). He prophesies his betrayal and identifies his betrayer (26:21, 25). He opens the way for Judas (see Judas Iscariot) to perform his act of betrayal (26:50). He declares his capacity to escape his fate miraculously (26:53). Jesus is presented as one who has power and is in control of the events of his passion. And this is where Matthew's christological portrait comes into focus. Jesus does not exercise his power as Messiah, Son of God to escape from death, but not because he lacks royal status or authority. Rather, Jesus exercises that power in unexpected ways; in obedience to God and in pouring out his life for others.

The story of Jesus' death in Matthew is thus the story of his fidelity to God, his faithfulness to his mission and his willing solidarity with the pain and hope of his people.

4.3. The Way of the Cross. The degree to which the cross is understood by Matthew as the ultimate expression of Jesus' mission is nowhere better seen than in the series of passion predictions in 16:21-27; 17:22-23 and 20:17-28. In these Jesus characterizes his mission as a journey to Jerusalem, and thus to Golgotha.

The first is framed by Peter's confession of Jesus as "the Christ, the Son of the Living God" (16:16) and Peter's rebuke of Jesus following his announcement of imminent suffering. Clearly, Jesus' self-understanding, embracing the "divine must" (dei) of his passion, departs from more common messianic expectations, even among his disciples. Jesus, however, is convinced that suffering lies at the heart of his mission as Christ, Son of God, and even extends this definition to his view of discipleship. Like him, Jesus' disciples are faced with the challenge to lose their lives.

Even though Jesus' disciples have "little faith" (e.g., 14:31; 17:20), they are unable to comprehend the way of the cross. After the second passion prediction* they are "filled with grief" (17:23). And in the context of the third they seem to miss Jesus' whole point by concerning themselves with positions of eminence and authority. In the passion story itself their failure is sealed by their fearful abandonment of Jesus at his arrest (26:56). Their faithless behavior is accentuated by the actions of less well-known characters. The woman who anoints Jesus at Bethany (26:6-13), Joseph of Arimathea (27:57-60) and the faithful women at the cross and tomb (27:55-56, 61)—these are examples of persons in the passion narrative who are set in bold relief by their authentic responses to the good news (see Gospel).

For apprehending the way of the cross, the importance of the final passion prediction cannot be overestimated. Here Jesus' ministry of service and redemption is cast in the language of sacrificial death: "... the Son of Man did not come to be served but to serve and to give his life a ransom for many" (20:28; see Ransom Saying). With this terminology, building on Matthew's earlier presentation of Jesus as the Suffering Servant (cf. 8:17; 12:17-21), the cross is set squarely at the center of Jesus' life and work.

4.4. The Death of Jesus and the New Era of Salvation. Israel's rejection of Jesus and his message does not signify the end of the story for Matthew. Even in his predictions of suffering and death, Jesus' eyes focus also on resurrection (16:21; 17:23; 20:19). Likewise, his interpretive words at the Last Supper, so centered on his passion, anticipate his future in the kingdom of God (26:29). And in 26:32 he predicts his resurrection and future role in reconstituting the scattered band of disciples. Even without turning to the resurrection narrative itself, in the tearing of the Temple curtain, the earthquake and the confession by the centurion, we have testimony of Jesus' vindication in spite of his rejection by Israel (27:51-54).

With mention of the centurion's confession, we open a further arena of discussion. In both subtle and transparent ways, Matthew proclaims the passing of the kingdom of God from Israel to "a people who will produce its fruit" (21:43). In his mind this reorientation of the kingdom is related directly to the crisis of rejection, Israel's delivering the Messiah over to be crucified. For example, we may observe the shift in Jesus' role as savior. In 1:21, "he will save his people from their sins," but in 26:28 his blood "is poured out for many (i.e., "all") for the forgiveness of sins." The time of Israel's ultimate rejection of Jesus is a time of death, but death leads to life, a new era of salvation for "the nations" (28:18-20).

The newness of this era is marked in a different way by the interpretive sayings of Jesus at the Last Supper. By his use of the words "covenant" and "forgiveness of sins" in the same breath (26:28), Jesus interprets his mission against the backdrop of Jeremiah 31:31-34. "The time is coming," Jeremiah proclaims, when the Lord will make a "new covenant." That time has come, according to Jesus. In his death he inaugurates the new order of salvation.

Here again is evidence that for Jesus death was no unexpected event unrelated to his life and work. In his death Jesus' obedience to God is manifest, and in this the cross is comprehended as the heart of his mission to open the way of salvation to all

5. The Death of Jesus in the Gospel of Mark.
The oft-cited judgment of a century ago that Mark's Gospel is a passion narrative with an extended introduction highlights the prominence of Jesus' death for Mark. It fails, however, to come to terms with the theological and literary nexus between Jesus' life and death. In fact, Mark represents Jesus' ministry as a relentless progression of events whose climax is Golgotha. In the cross Jesus is revealed as the Son of God who obtains salvation for the new community of faith—a community called to follow him in sacrificial discipleship.

5.1. The Death of Jesus and Mark's Christology. Who is Jesus? This query constitutes an important leitmotif for the Second Gospel. Although we are informed at the outset that Jesus is Messiah and Son of God (1:1-15), the characters of Mark's account do not share this insight (e.g., 5:41) and, in any case, we are well into the narrative before it becomes clear what these christological titles mean. Mark wants to instruct his audience about the true nature of Jesus, and he does so by means of a narrative oriented around the cross.

Anticipatory allusions to Jesus' passion dot the landscape of the Gospel of Mark, demonstrating the intimate relation between Jesus' identity and his suffering. Already in 2:19-20 Jesus intimates his sudden, unexpected, puzzling death. Elsewhere, religious and political authorities plot his death (3:6; 11:18; 12:12), and Jesus himself prophetically announces his rejection and death (8:31; 9:12, 31; 10:32-34, 38-39, 45). As in Matthew's parallel (see above, 4.1.), so in Mark 6:14-29 the story of John's passion prefigures Jesus' suffering and death.

The link between Jesus' death and his identity is nowhere better seen than in the crucifixion account itself, for Mark understands the moment of Jesus' death as the moment of divine revelation. Only in his death can Jesus be fully appreciated. This is the significance of the confession of the centurion, the only human throughout the Gospel to recognize Jesus as God's Son (15:39). In the crucifixion story Mark expressly notes that it is only as the centurion sees Jesus' dying breath that he makes his confession. That is, in the cross Jesus is recognized rightly as the Son of God. In the body of the Gospel God acclaims Jesus as God's Son at the inauguration of his mission at his baptism* (1:9-11) and in the brief revelation of Jesus' glory at the Transfiguration* (9:2-8). The relationship between these three events in Jesus' career emphasizes the centrality of Jesus' death to the mission for which he was ordained by God.

This understanding, focused on Jesus' status as Son of God, is paralleled in Mark's portrait of Jesus, Son of man. Indeed, it is precisely as Son of man that Jesus will suffer rejection and death (e.g., 8:31; 14:21). As Son of man, Jesus' divine mission is consummated as he gives his life in service to humanity as a ransom for many (10:45). As Son of man, he also anticipates his vindication and glory* (e.g., 8:38; 14:62).

What is the significance of the crucified Son of God for Mark? Of the aforementioned anticipatory references, the most consequential for interpreting the meaning of Jesus' death are the three passion predictions* (8:31; 9:31; 10:32-34) and the ransom saying* (10:45). These underscore the centrality of the cross to God's redemptive plan, Jesus' obedience in taking up the cross (cf. 14:32-49) and so place Jesus' crucifixion at the heart of his divine mission. This interpretation is manifest not only in the "divine must" theme of the predictions (dei), but also in the later, repeated association of passion events with OT promise. The cross of Christ brings to consummation God's revealed will, as in 14:21 where we should probably not think of any one text or set of texts but of OT promise as a whole. On the other hand, specific OT texts are fulfilled in Jesus' passion (e.g., Zech 13:7, cited in Mk 14:27). More prominent are the numerous ways in which Jesus is presented typologically as the Suffering Servant and Suffering Righteous One (see Servant of Yahweh; Typology).

How Jesus' death functions as the center of God's redemptive plan comes to light in two Markan texts: 10:45 and 14:24. The significance of the former is indicated by its position at the close of the central section of Mark's Gospel, 8:22 —10:52, just before the triumphal entry.* In this section, which boldly outlines the correlation between the way of the Christ and that of his disciples, the ransom-saying is hardly ancillary to Mark's message, as some have argued. The latter text serves as the climax of the Last Supper scene. In both cases Jesus' death is interpreted as salvific. In this ultimate act of service, Jesus lays down his life as an atoning sacrifice for the salvation of humanity. The irony of the scene of mockery at the cross may be understood along these lines: It is by refusing to save himself that he is able to save others (15:31; cf. 8:35).

The irony of Mark's passion story is even more pervasive, extending through the appearance of Jesus before the Sanhedrin (e.g., even as Jesus is being mocked as a false prophet, his prophecy concerning Peter's denial is fulfilled [14:65-72]) and on to the crucifixion account. Paramount in this regard is the sixfold use of "king" with reference to Jesus (15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32) combined with the threefold mockery of Jesus on the cross (15:29-32). Condemned as a pretender to the throne, Jesus ironically does have royal status, but not as one might have anticipated. His obedience to the divine mission expressed pre-eminently in the cross—this is a portent of his royal status that will be evident to all following his vindication and coming as the glorious Son of man.

5.2. The Way of the Cross. Golgotha is not only the ultimate expression of the Christ's mission for Mark. For disciples, too, there is a via dolorosa, a way of the cross.

5.2.1. "Take up the Cross." Mark 8:22—10:52 renders transparent the meeting of christology and discipleship around the cross. This section is framed by two healing* miracles.* The first (8:22-26) serves as a parable*: The disciples understand Jesus only vaguely; they need a fuller, sharper vision of Christ's identity. Heretofore they have become cognizant of his power, his victory over evil forces of all kinds. Though Peter confesses him as Christ, he is unprepared for subsequent talk of suffering and death (8:27-33). Yet for Jesus messiahship can be understood fully only within the matrix of the suffering Son of man. What is more, according to Jesus, if the way of the Christ is the way of suffering, so is the way of discipleship (8:34).

Prior to the second healing story (10:46-52), Jesus for the third time (10:32-45) announces his upcoming passion: Jesus and his disciples are on the way (hodos) to Jerusalem, the place of betrayal and death. Apparently still believing that "Christ" signifies "glorious king," James and John express their desire for seats of honor in the coming kingdom. Jesus redirects their thoughts to suffering and calamity, intimating that they would share his fate. Discipleship signifies a service best exemplified in the death of Jesus. Interestingly, like the healing account in 8:22-26, the subsequent story of Bartimaeus can be read as a parable. Faithful, persistent Bartimaeus, first found sitting by the way (hodos), having been healed by Jesus, now sees clearly and follows Jesus on the way (hodos). The invitation to follow Jesus is an invitation to take the way of the cross.

5.2.2. The Suffering of the Community. This motif is continued and deepened in the relationship Mark draws between the suffering of the community (Mark 13) and the suffering of the Messiah (Mark 14—15). The signs of tribulation are paralleled in Jesus'
On a literary level, these parallels tie together the fate of Jesus and his disciples; they are of profound theological importance too. On the one hand, they signify that the suffering of the disciples is a participation in the suffering of the Christ. On the other, they indicate the cosmic ramifications of this suffering. The cross of Christ is the turning point in history, the birthing of a new age, the coming of the kingdom of God into the world. This gives added gravity to the sufferings of Jesus' disciples. Like him, they will suffer rejection. Indeed, Mark's intended audience seems already to have found itself in a situation of persecution. This juxtaposition of images in Mark 13—15 affirms that their suffering, too, is a part of the divine plan; that their pain is a part of the process by which the kingdom of God is breaking into the world.

5.2.3. Discipleship Failure and the New Community. Mark's Gospel repeatedly intimates the failure of the hardhearted disciples (6:52) to understand the significance of Jesus' mission. Their failure reaches its acme in 14.50-52 where they abandon Jesus to the arresting party in Gethsemane. It is true that Jesus anticipates their rehabilitation (14:27-28), but the intervening narrative provides unexpected tableaus of faithfulness. In a deliberate contrast with the actions of the Jewish leaders and Judas ("one of the Twelve"!), the anonymous woman anoints Jesus for burial (14:1-11). Simon of Cyrene becomes a model disciple who "takes up the cross" (15:21; cf. 8:34), and a group of women disciples stand by faithfully at Jesus' death (15:40-41).

Even more important for their role in Mark's theology of Jesus' passion are the rending of the Temple veil (15:38) and the confession of the centurion. Together, these narrated events reveal Jesus' identity, as we have seen, but they also speak to the theme of discipleship. The first, drawing on the Temple material found earlier in the Second Gospel, demonstrates that Jesus is the Messiah who destroys the Temple and reconstitutes it as the community of the faithful. The importance of the latter in this context lies in the fact that it is precisely a Gentile centurion who makes the confession of Jesus as Son of God. A more emphatic word about the universal implications of Jesus' death could hardly be found.

The Third Evangelist leaves his readers in no doubt as to the centrality of Jesus' death for his Gospel. He sets the stage for Jesus' passion above all by highlighting his narrative of Jesus' life as a tale of conflict. In addition, throughout Luke-Acts he sounds the cadence: "the Christ must suffer!" What is less transparent is the meaning of Jesus' death for Luke.

6.1. The Rejection of the Messiah. Luke characterizes Jesus' life as a story of conflict and rejection—ominously predicted by Simeon (2:34-35; see Simeon's Song), paradigmatically represented by Jesus' opposition at Nazareth (4:16-30), tragically fulfilled in Pilate's handing Jesus over to the will of the chief priests and Jewish public (23:25). On one level this portrait is nothing more than what one would have expected. For Luke, Jesus is a prophet* (cf. e.g., 4:24; 7:16, 39; 24:19; Acts 3:17-26; 7:37), and rejection and death are the lot of all the prophets (cf. Neh 9:26; Lk 4:24; 6:23; 11:47-51; 13:33-34; Acts 7:52). In Luke, Jesus the prophet attracted opposition especially by his concern for a brand of justice* at odds with that practiced by the religious leadership and by his concomitant openness to outcasts through table fellowship* (Karris). In the Gospel of Luke, Jesus' primary opponents appear to be the religious leadership in Jerusalem, and among them the chief priests are singled out for special development. Contrasting with their malevolence is the relatively benign political leadership. In each of the canonical Gospels we find that the major share of blame for the death of Jesus is attributed to the Jews (especially the Jewish leaders) rather than to the Romans. This is especially clear in Luke's Gospel, where Jesus' innocence is declared by Pilate three times and confirmed by Herod (23:4, 14-15, 22).

The Lukan motif of conflict is not limited to Jesus' interaction with the human characters of the Gospel, however. The divine anointing of Jesus for his mission is set within the immediate context of temptation by the devil (3:21—4:13), and the subsequent narrative demonstrates the continual cosmic dimensions of opposition against Jesus (e.g., 13:10-17). With the onset of the passion story, supernatural conflict moves again to center court: Satan enters Judas (22:3; cf. 22:31) and Jesus' struggle on the Mount of Olives as throughout his mission is colored in eschatological, cosmic hues (22:53; cf. peirasmos, "struggle," in 4:13; 8:13:22:28,40, 46).

Against this backdrop it is surely significant that Luke does not set the disciples over against Jesus as they are in the other Synoptics. Although Judas does betray Jesus, he does so under the power of Satan (22:3; see Demon, Devil), likewise, Peter's denial is related to Satan's influence (22:31-34). In recounting Jesus' arrest, Luke is conspicuously silent about the disciples, with the result that their fate is left open; they do not abandon Jesus, as in Matthew and Mark. Indeed, the disciples are "with" Jesus in a way not paralleled in the other Synoptic Gospels (22:28). This has important repercussions for our reading of the link between Jesus' crucifixion and discipleship, a theme to which we will return shortly.

6.2. "The Christ Must Suffer!" It is true that Luke inherited from Mark an emphasis on the necessity of Jesus' passion (e.g., Mk 8:31). On the other hand, in Luke Jesus evinces a purposefulness about the cross that is without parallel in the Synoptic Gospels. Not only does he "set his face to go up to Jerusalem" (9:51), the place of rejection and death (18:31-32), but also, with the onset of his passion, he exercises a surprising prescience regarding the details of his betrayal, arrest and death. More so than in the other Synoptics, here Jesus is in control of the events of his passion.

When Jesus foretells his suffering and rejection, he notes their necessity in salvation-historical terms (dei). This characterization is continued even after the passion account by means of showing how the crucified Jesus could be the Messiah of God. "Was it not necessary for the Christ to suffer these things and to enter into his glory?" (Lk 24:25-27). Phrases of this kind appear again and again in Luke-Acts.

Students of Luke-Acts have long been aware of the gravity of the that of Jesus' death for Luke. Noting that the weight of Luke's theological interest falls on Jesus' resurrection and exaltation, however, they have puzzled over the meaning of the cross. In what way is the death of Jesus crucial to God's redemptive purpose? On this theological problem Luke has seemed less than clear. Indeed, according to many interpreters, to the question Why did Jesus have to die? Luke seems only to answer, Because God willed it!

6.2.1. The Death of Jesus and Lukan Soteriology. In the past many commentators have assumed Luke attributed to Jesus' death the salvific meaning found elsewhere in the NT. Thus Luke, like the other NT writers, affirmed that "Jesus died for our sins." More recent scholarship has reacted against this reading, insisting that Luke must be read on his own terms and not within the theological categories of the Pauline theology of the cross. Accordingly, students of Luke have pointed out that: (1) Luke neglects to recount the ransom logion in his parallel to Mark 10:41-45 (Lk 22:24-27); (2) the sermons in Acts do not draw a direct line between the cross and forgiveness* of sins; and (3) material in Luke-Acts borrowed from Isaiah 52:13—53:12 fails to mention the vicarious, atoning significance of the Servant's death (e.g., Lk 22:37; Acts 8:32-33; see Servant of Yahweh).

Of course, the eucharistic words of Jesus (22:19-20) do root human salvation in the death of Jesus (see Last Supper). However, noting their absence in some textual witnesses, a number of scholars have postulated that they were missing from Luke's original text (cf. RSV [some editions], NEB). Others, who accept their originality to the Lukan narrative, are nevertheless impressed with how non-Lukan these verses appear linguistically. As in Acts 20:28 (the only other passage in the Lukan corpus that clearly bases human salvation in the death of Jesus), Luke appears to be repeating ancient terminology without making its theology his own.

A conclusion of this sort is confirmed by those passages in which Luke makes transparent his understanding of the means of salvation. In Acts 2:33; 5:30-31 and 10:43 we discern Luke's concern to show that the means of salvation is the exaltation of Jesus. Of these three passages, 5:30-31 is of particular interest for two reasons. First, it is here that the logic is most clear: as a result of his exaltation Jesus is enthroned as Prince and Savior and in these capacities is able to offer salvation. Second, this text underscores again the necessity of Jesus' death for salvation history.

Clearly the death of Jesus has positive significance for Luke, but just as clearly that significance is not centered on an interpretation of the cross as a vicarious sacrifice. How then might this significance be understood?
6.2.2. The Death of Jesus: A Martyrdom? The interpretation of Jesus' death as a martyrdom has enjoyed widespread support in this century (see Beck). This view exploits the connections between the Lukan passion and the literature of martyrdom in late Judaism. Common themes include the presence of supernatural conflict and divine help, the innocence and endurance of the victim and the portrait of the martyr's death as exemplary for the faithful.

Although this interpretation attributes positive significance to the death of Jesus in Luke and makes good on a number of important aspects of the Lukan portrayal, it has come under serious scrutiny in recent years. First, it has been questioned how far Luke actually anticipated Jesus' disciples would be asked to follow in Jesus' steps. Thus, the call to take up the cross (Mk 8:34) has become in Luke a call to a lifestyle marked by the cross ("day by day," 9:23), not a reference to impending persecution. Second, a number of details integral to martyr tales are missing from Luke, most notably the horrific detail in descriptions of the means of death. Moreover, in Luke, Jesus, unlike the martyrs of Jewish literature, appears as one who struggles with the prospect of death (Lk 22:39-46). Third, as has become clear from continued study of the religious background of the first century, the themes of the martyrological literature are not in every case unique to that corpus. Thus, one might postulate that Luke and the literature of martyrdom drew from a common world of thought. Finally, it has become evident that the notion of Jesus as martyr fails to do justice to the richness of Luke's mural of Jesus' passion. Although it may be one among other Lukan concerns, by itself it falls short as a summary of Luke's theology of Jesus' death.

6.3. From the Suffering Righteous One to the Suffering Servant. Other students of Luke have noted the repeated evidences of Jesus' innocence in Luke 23 and the many parallels between Jesus and the Suffering Righteous One in the Psalms and Book of Wisdom. On this basis they have postulated for Luke an interpretation of Jesus' passion as the suffering and death of God's Righteous Sufferer who goes to his death in spite of his innocence but is subsequendy vindicated by God. This view makes sense of the innocence motif in the passion story, dovetails well with the "contrast formulae" in the speeches in Acts (e.g., "you put Jesus to death, but God raised him from the dead," 2:23-24) and demonstrates in Jesus' life how God overturns injustice—an important theme in Luke-Acts.

At the same time, it is clear that even this interpretation is insufficient to grasp the heart of Luke's understanding of Jesus' death, for it fails to explain the divine necessity of the cross in salvation-historical terms. A more successful interpretive model focuses on the Suffering Servant of Isaiah, which is a clearer embodiment of the OT Righteous Sufferer (Green, 1990).

That Luke is interested more pointedly in the Suffering Servant is manifest in the passion story itself, and elsewhere in his two-part work. In the passion story (1) Jesus cites Isaiah 53:12 as a general allusion to his suffering and death, thus communicating that in his passion he fulfills the role of the Suffering Servant; (2) Jesus is repeatedly declared innocent and acclaimed by the centurion as a "righteous man," an allusion to Isaiah 53:11 (cf. the conjunction of dikaios ["righteous"] and Jesus' suffering in Acts 3:13-14, where Jesus' passion is described in words borrowed from Is 52:13—53:12); (3) Jesus refuses to speak in his own self-defense (23:9; Is 53:7); and (4) in his mockery, Jesus is called "the Chosen One," a designation for God's Servant (23:35; Is 42:1). Outside the passion story, numerous references to Jesus' role as the Servant appear, the most explicit in the citation of Isaiah 53:7-8 in Acts 8:32-33 and the prophetic reference to Jesus' mission by Simeon in words borrowed from Isaiah 49:6 (2:32).

The significance of the identification of Jesus' passion as that of the Suffering Servant for Luke is threelfold. First, it indicates how Luke can emphasize the salvation-historical necessity of the cross and spotlight Jesus' exaltation or vindication as the salvific event The Isaianic portrayal of the Suffering Servant holds together these twin motifs, particularly in Isaiah 53:11, where, following his suffering, God's Righteous One will justify many. In other words, Luke's characterization of Jesus as the Servant indicates the necessity of his death and the salvific import of his vindication.

Second, Luke's emphasis on the Servant provides a framework for drawing out the universal implications of Jesus' mission. That Jesus would be "a light for revelation to the Gentiles" was predicted by Simeon (2:32; Is 49:6), so it is noteworthy that at Jesus' death he was acclaimed as the Righteous One by a Gentile. However, the importance of Jesus' death is not only for the Gentile, but also for the Jew (e.g., 23:34, 48) and the criminal (23:43). That is, in Jesus' death one finds the culmination of a life lived for others, including outsiders (see Gentiles).

Third, by portraying Jesus' career, and especially his death and exaltation, as that of the Suffering Servant, Luke demonstrates in the ultimate manner his understanding of the way of salvation. Already in the lives of Elizabeth and Zechariah, Luke shows that God's salvation comes through a pattern of reversal (Lk 1). For Luke the inbreaking of the kingdom of God marks a transposition of roles as the God who is faithful vindicates the faithful. The career of Jesus illustrates this theme of reversal for he is the innocent Servant who suffers unto death but is raised up and designated Prince and Savior. By putting aside thoughts of self-glorification and obediently adopting the role of the servant (cf. 12:37; 22:25-27), Jesus embodies the righteousness, humiliation and lowliness of the Servant. The cross is the consequence, but God overturned this humiliation, vindicating his Servant exalting him and in so doing opened the way of repentance and forgiveness. For Luke this is the way of salvation, and this is the way of discipleship.

7. The Death of Jesus in the Gospel of John

Until relatively recent years, students of the Fourth Gospel downplayed the importance of the passion for John's presentation of Jesus. Some even posited a theological chasm between chapters 17 and 18 of John, suggesting that Jesus' trial and execution had no place in the portrayal of the glorious Jesus found elsewhere in the Fourth Gospel. Happily, this view has begun to fall into disfavor among Johannine scholars, as studies have (1) recognized the numerous allusions to the passion in the earlier sections of the Gospel (cf. 2:12-22; 3:14) and the fact that eight chapters of the Gospel are related to the passion (12—19), and (2) begun to demonstrate anew the integration of the cross into the totality of John's christology. We will discuss the meaning of Jesus' death for John first by mentioning two subsidiary themes—the sovereignty of Jesus in the passion account and Jesus' death as sacrifice—then by noting how the cross relates to the journey of the Son of God from incarnation* to exaltation.

7.1. Jesus, Sovereign King. When turning from the Synoptic versions to the Johannine account of Jesus' suffering and death, one is immediately struck with the majesty of Jesus in John. He has long known his betrayer (6:70) and actually sets in motion the act of betrayal (13:27). In the arrest scene it is neither Judas nor the arresting party that is in charge, but Jesus himself, revealing himself as the "I Am" (egō eimi) and negotiating the release of his disciples (18:1-11) (see I Am Sayings). In his hearing before Pilate he is presented as king and even takes the role of judge (18:28—19:16). Requiring no assistance, he bears his own cross (19:17). He cares for his mother from the cross (19:25-27) and, before the soldiers can perform the coup de grâce, breaking his legs to speed his death, he dies of his own accord (19:20-33).

In this manner John demonstrates the truth of Jesus' words, "No one takes my life from me, but I lay it down of my own volition" (10:18). Clearly John is concerned to relate Jesus' passion to his larger representation of Jesus' glorious sojourn on earth (cf. Jn 1:14b) as a self-giving act.

7.2. Jesus' Death: Life for the World. Though it is not the linchpin for John's understanding of the death of Jesus, the sacrificial significance of the cross is nevertheless important to his Gospel. This motif initially appears in 1:29, 36, where the forgiveness of sins is related to the appellation "Lamb of God." Though Lamb of God is capable of other nuances as well, it is at least associated with the theological world of the Passover lamb (see Lamb of God). This is suggested not only by the atonement theology resident in 1:29, but also by John's clear attempts to portray Jesus' death as a Passover sacrifice in the passion story. In this regard the following details may be noted: the time of Jesus' death coincided with the time of the paschal sacrifice (Jn 19:14; cf. 18:28); the hysop and basin are present at the cross (19:29; Ex 12:22); seeing the blood flow from the side of Jesus is emphasized (19:35; Ex 12:13); and the soldiers do not break Jesus' legs (19:31-37; Ex 12:46). This emphasis on Passover is probably related to the extended discourse on Jesus as the bread* of life (6:25-59): Whoever partakes of Jesus' flesh and blood will have life.*

Similarly, John 3:16 links the Incarnation of God's Son to the offer of life. The language of atonement found more pervasively in Paul also has a place in the Johannine narrative. Thus, hyper ("on behalf of") is used in John to underscore the redemptive nature of the cross in 6:51; 10:11, 15; 11:50-52; 18:14. Finally, John understands the footwashing at Jesus' final meal with his disciples not only as a demonstration of exemplary behavior, but also as a symbol of Jesus' salvific death (13:8-11).

7.3. Crucifixion and Exaltation. In terms of the integration of Jesus' death with the Johannine christology as a whole, the most pervasive motif is that of "raising up" or "exaltation." This, we are repeatedly informed, is the fate of Jesus the Son of man (3:14-15; 8:28; 12:32-33). Clearly, this "being lifted up" (hypsoō, 3:14; 8:28; 12:32) has a double meaning. On the one hand, it is associated in John's schema with the terminology of glorification (see Glory). On the other, in 8:28 we read that the Jews will be the agents of Jesus' "lifting up," and in 12:32-33 John notes that "lifting up" is a metaphor for the way Jesus will be put to death (cf. 18:32).

John therefore sees some intimate connection between Jesus' crucifixion and his exaltation, and this suggests that Jesus' death must be set within the larger Johannine portrait of Jesus' earthly career. For the Fourth Evangelist, the life of the Son of God is best understood as a journey: He comes from his préexistent state in heaven,* dwells among women and men, then returns to heaven. He who descended from glory must ascend to glory (e.g., 3:13, 31; 6:38; 8:23; 13:1-3).

How is his passion related to this christological movement? It is the means by which he returns to the Father. That is, John overcomes the scandal of the cross by interpreting it in terms of Jesus' exaltation. This reading is encouraged by the fact that in those places where the reference to the "lifting up" of Jesus is clearest—3:14; 8:28; 12:32-34—John has developed the larger theme of the Son's journey from and return to God. In this way the cross is interpreted by the journey motif as the means by which the Son of man left the world below to return to the world above (Nicholson).

What is more, Jesus' death, understood as a lifting up (3:14), appears as the ultimate expression of love, the gift of God (3:16). Indeed, Jesus' own love for his followers reaches its acme in his sacrificial service and death (13:1; 15:13).

See also Burial of Jesus; Gethsemane. Passion Narrative; Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection, Ransom Saying

J. B. Green

DEBTOR. See SINNER
DEFILEMENT. See Clean and Unclean

DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN

For Jesus and the Gospel writers the Devil, or Satan, is the chief enemy of Jesus and the establishing of the kingdom of God.* In his ministry, especially in his exorcisms, Jesus engages in the first stage of the defeat of Satan in casting out his evil minions. Jesus' complete defeat of the Devil and his demons is expected in the eschaton.

1. Background
2. Terminology
3. Exorcism in the NT World
4. Jesus and the Demonic
5. Emphases of the Gospel Writers

1. Background.

Israel's* confidence in the sovereignty of Yahweh was not conducive to the development of a consistent demonology. In the OT the satyrs, or "hairy ones" (Lev 17:7; 2 Chron 11:15; Is 13:21; 34:14); the šēḏîm (Deut 32:17; Ps 106:37); the horse leech or vampire (Prov 30:15); Azazel (Lev 16:8, 10, 26; cf. / Enoch 10:8) and Lilith (RSV = night hag. Is 34:14), a demon cited in Akkadian sources, thought to be found in desolate places with the unclean owl and kite, may all have been understood to be evil spiritual beings. Both good and evil spiritual beings were from and under the control of Yahweh (1 Kings 22:21-23 [par. 2 Chron 18:20-23]; 1 Sam 16:14-23).

It was probably due to Persian influence that Jews began to speculate on the origin of demons (Jub. 2:2; 4:22; 1 Enoch 6:1—7:6; cf. m. 'Abot 5:6), and the belief developed that evil spiritual beings were more independent of God than those who performed positive functions for him (Job 1—2). The Essenes at Qumran believed that everyone was ruled either by the Prince of Light* or the Angel* of Darkness whom God had created. But this dualism was only secondary in that, in the first place, it was God who created both these spirits and designed humans to live under them (1QS 3:13—4:26).

In Greek thought the word daimonion was used in a variety of ways: for a deity (Philo Vit. Mos. 1.276), a lesser deity (Plutarch Rom. 51), a divine power or unknown supernatural force (Josephus J.W. 1.69), the human element in touch with the divine (Galen De Placitis 5.6.4) and an intermediary between humans and the gods (Corp. Herrn. XVI.18). Josephus,* for example, made no arbitrary distinction between good and evil demons: a demon could give good fortune as well as cause death (Ant. 16.76; J.W. 1.556). It was the activities of a demon that determined its nature (Ant. 13.415; 16.210;/ W. 1.628). When a demon overtook a person and caused sickness or frenzy and was life-threatening, it was thought necessary to expel it (J.W. 7.185). The demons were popularly thought to be the spirits of the dead (J.W. 1.599, 607; 6.47; Lucian Philops. 29; Pliny Nat. Hist. 18.118).

2. Terminology.

The Gospels use a variety of terms, often interchangeable, for the Devil and evil spirits.

2.1. Devil. The Greeks used diabolos for a slanderer (Xenophon Agesilaus 11.5), and the LXX used it to translate šātān ("adversary") in the sense of accusing people and attempting to separate them from God (1 Chron 21:1; Job 1:6-2:7; Ps 108:6 [LXX]; Zech 3:1-2). In the Gospels he is portrayed as the adversary of Jesus (Mt 4:1-11; par. Lk 4:1-13), the enemy of his work (Mt 13:39) and the chief of the demons (Mt 25:41). Mark does not use the term. John uses it at 6:70; 8:44 and 13:2. In Matthew and Luke Devil is used interchangeably with Satan (cf. Mt 4:1,5,8,11 and 4:10; Mk 4:15 and Lk 8:12).

2.2. Satan. The English transliteration of the Greek satanas (Mk 1:13; Lk 22:3), in turn, is a transliteration of the Hebrew šātān(see 2.1. above and llQPs²19:15). In the intertestamental literature the name occurs in the form mašṭēmāh (1QM 13:4, 11 Jub. 10:8). In the Gospels it is used as a synonym for the Devil (cf. Mt 4:1, 10; Lk 13:16), the arch-demon (Mk 3:23, 26 [par. Mt 12:26; Lk 11:18]; cf. Lk 10:18) and, notably on one occasion, in the sense of a testing adversary (Lk 22:31; cf. Job 1) as well as in the sense of attempting to separate people from God (Mk 4:15; 8:33 [par. Mt 16:23]).
2.3. Beelzebul. In the NT beelzeboul (beezeboul), in some manuscripts, represents an assimilation of I to the z) occurs only in Matthew 10:25; 12:24 (par. Mk 3:22; Lk 11:15); Matthew 12:27 (par. Lk 11:18,19). The Vulgate and Syriac versions have attempted to explain the term by correcting it to beelzebub, the god of Ekron (2 Kings 1:2–3, 6, 16; Josephus Ant. 19.9). However, perhaps coined on the spot by Jesus’ critics, the term is probably derived from the Hebrew words ba’al ("lord," Hos 2:18), used mostly of local manifestations of the Canaanite fertility god who was the chief adversary of the Israelite religion (1 Kings 18:16–40), and zəḇul ("exalted dwelling," 1 Kings 8:13). The meaning "lord of heaven" for the prince of demons (Mt 12:24) would have been well understood as a euphemism for Satan in light of the LXX substituting "demons" for "idols" in Psalm 96:5 [95:5].

2.5. Demons. The word is also used only once in the LXX, in some manuscripts, at Isaiah 65:11 to translate the Hebrew gad, the god of fortune of the Syrians. Only at Matthew 8:31 is daimōn used in the NT for an evil spirit. Otherwise, daimonion is used in the Gospels: eleven times in Matthew, thirteen in Mark, twenty-three in Luke and six in John.

2.6. Spirits. In line with the development of the use of pneuma for either good or bad spiritual beings, the Synoptic writers use the word not only of the Holy Spirit* but with the qualifications of ponēros ("evil," Mt 12:45 [par. Lk 11:26, ponēroteros]; Lk 7:21; 8:2; cf. lQapGen 20:16-17) and akathartos ("unclean," Mk 6:7 [par. Mt 10:1 ]), for demons (Mk 1:23 [par. Lk 4:33]; Mk 1:26 [par. Lk 4:35]; Mk 3:11 [par. Lk 4:41; 6:18]; Mk 5:2 [par. Mt 8:28; Lk 8:27]; Mk 5:13 [par. Lk 8:33]; Mk 7:25 [par. Mt 15:22]).

2.7. Legion. The word legion (Diodorus Siculus 26.5), meaning "many," was borrowed from the Latin legio (Plutarch Rom. 13.1; Otho 12.3) and is used in the NT only of the number of angels at Jesus’ disposal (Mt 26:53) and in the story of the Gadarene demoniac (Mk 5:9 [par. Lk 8:30]) where it suggests a multiform
2.8. Demon Possession. In the OT there is the belief that evil spiritual beings can torment people (1 Sam 16:14-23) so that protection from their harm was sought (Ps 91). The Dead Sea Scrolls retell the story of Abraham, saying that during the night the Most High God sent a spirit to scourge Pharaoh and all his household (IQapGen 20). Josephus believed that people could be possessed or "overtaken" (lamban-omenos) by demons causing frenzy (J.W. 3.485; 7.120, 389), suffocation and strangling (Ant. 6.166). Philo believed that invisible living beings hovered in the air, and that evil spirits among them could be breathed in, or might take over, fill or descend into a person, causing disastrous pestilences (Philo Gig. 6-31).

In harmony with beliefs of that day, the Gospels depict demons causing convulsions, loud screaming, a change of voice or character, chaotic and unpredictable behavior, preternatural strength and an indifference to pain. Notably, a disturbance is caused by and in the sufferer when confronted by Jesus (Mk 1:21-28; 5:1-20; 7:24-30; 9:14-29 and par.). Also, the demon-possessed were considered to have special insight into the identity of Jesus (Mk 1:24; 3:11; cf. Acts 16:17).

3. Exorcism in the NT World.

At the time of Jesus and the writing of the Gospels the destructive work of demons in human life was combat-ted in a number of ways. One way is illustrated in the Magical Papyri (PGM V.99-171), the story of Eleazar (Josephus Ant. 8.46-49), the Jewish exorcists of Matthew 12:27 (par. Lk 11:19), the so-called strange exorcist (Mk 9:38-39 [par. Lk 9:49-50]), the sons of Sceva (Acts 19:11-20) and the rabbinic material (Pesiq. R. 40b) where exorcism was thought to be successful because of what was said and done by the exorcist. However, while Apollonius of Tyana (Philos-stratus Vit. Ap. 4.20) and rabbis Simeon and Hanina ben Dosa (b. Pesah 112b) attained legendary status, and stories of them contain legendary details, they were historical figures of the period who were thought to be successful because of who they were. In the case of the rabbis their charismatic presence was seen to arise out of a special relationship with God (b. Pesah. 112b). Between these two extremes of understanding and methods of exorcism, the retelling of the story of Abraham in Genesis Apocryphon 20 shows that an exorcism could be regarded successful because of the personal force of the healer as well as what he said or did.

In the mendicant priests and soothsayers of Plato's Republic (364B-365A), the sons of Sceva, the sorcerers known to Celsus (Origens Contra Cels. 1.68), Apollonius of Tyana and particularly the Cynics (Diogenes Laertius Vit. 6.101; Lucian Peregrinus 10-11), we can see that the peripatetic philosopher-healer would have been a familiar sight in the time of Jesus and the Evangelists.

4. Jesus and the Demonic.

Despite the relative importance of exorcism to Jesus and the Gospel writers, there are only four longer exorcism stories of Jesus in the Gospels (Mk 1:21-28; 5:1-20; 7:24-30; 9:14-29), a very brief report of an exorcism (Mt 9:32-34 and 12:22 [par. Lk 11:14]) and a number of references and sayings on Jesus' dealing with the demons (Mk 1:32-34, 39; 3:7-12 and parallels; cf. Acts 10:38).

4.1. The Demoniacs. The four stories of Jesus dealing with the demons and demoniacs show that such people might sometimes, but not always, have been socially rootless, perhaps driven to the margins of society by their behavior or the economic situation in Palestine. Nevertheless, Jesus can be seen dealing with a range of people, not just the disadvantaged or the wealthy.

The story of the demoniac with an unclean spirit in the Capernaum synagogue* (Mk 1:21-28) portrays a man in the mainstream of Jewish society and participating in the religious life of his community. The chaotic and unpredictable character of the demoniac could mean that at times the man showed no adverse symptoms of his condition. Or it may have been thought the demon only revealed itself when confronted by a spiritual enemy.

Also, the epileptic boy appears to have remained with his family and to have been sufficiently controllable for him to accompany his father to see the disciples* of Jesus (Mk 9:14-29). The Syrophoenician woman's demonized daughter also remained in a family situation (Mk 7:24-30). However, the woman did not bring her daughter out of the home. Perhaps the girl was a danger to the public, or too sick to move or terrified of leaving home. The woman, being Hellenized, may have been from the leading stratum of society and found her daughter's sickness an embarrassment, for the demon-possessed were the focus of ridicule (cf. Philo Flau. 36, 40). And, if being cared for at home is sign of wealth, we perhaps have here, as in the story of the epileptic boy, some evidence that these families may have had some financial means above the average.

The story of the Gadarene demoniac reveals a different picture (Mk 5:1-20). The man lived on the margins of society among the tombs, perhaps living in burial caves (see Num 19:11,16; lIQTemple 48:11-13; 49:5-21; 50:3-8 and Acts of Andrew 6). To be "unclean" meant he would have been thought to be rejected by God (cf. m. Kelim; Is 35:8), unable to enter the Temple or participate in worship or religious meals. That there had been an unsuccessful attempt to restrain the Gadarene demoniac (Mk 5:3-4) shows that chaining was one way violent demoniacs were dealt with.

4.2. Was Jesus an Exorcist? Although the view is occasionally advanced that Jesus was not an exorcist, or that it was an insignificant aspect of his ministry, there is ample evidence that he had a reputation for being extremely successful in expelling evil spirits from people. First, the exorcism stories associated with Jesus in the Gospels (see 4.1. above), which recent research has shown belong to the bedrock of reliable data about the historical Jesus, are the most compelling evidence of Jesus being an exorcist

Second, there are sayings of and about Jesus that presume his ministry of exorcism and which are also generally regarded to belong to the bedrock of historical material: the charge that Jesus cast out demons by Beelzebul (Mk 3:22 [par. Mt 9:34 and 12:24; Lk 11:15]); the saying that Jesus exorcised by the Spirit or finger of God (Mt 12:28 [par. Lk 11:20]) and the parable of the strong man, which is a picture of exorcism (Mk 3:27 [par. Mt 12:29; Lk 11:21-22]; cf. Gos. Thom. 35). It is difficult to be certain of the origin of Jesus' warning to Herod in which exorcism is mentioned: "Go tell that fox, 'Behold, I cast out demons and perform cures today and tomorrow, and the third day I finish my course ...' " (Lk 13:32). But it is likely to be authentic, for it is difficult to see why such a situation and saying should be constructed.

Third, in the NT era the names of exorcists with high reputations were used by other exorcists in their healing* incantations (Pseudo-Philo [LAB] 60; Josephus Ant. 8.46-49). The NT carries a number of reports of this happening in relation to Jesus, showing that he had a high reputation as an exorcist. There is the pericope about the strange exorcist using the name of Jesus (Mk 9:38; par. Lk 9:49) and the seventy disciples are said to return with the report: "Lord, even the demons are subject to us in your name!" (Lk 10:17). Then, in Acts 16:18 Paul is depicted as using the name of Jesus Christ to perform an exorcism.
Fourth, there is evidence outside the NT that Jesus cast out demons. For example, the Magical Papyri have the now-famous incantation intended for use by exorcists: "I adjure you by the god of the Hebrews, Jesu,..." (PGM IV.3019-3020). Also, in that the use of Jesus’ name for healing was censured by the Jews, we probably have further evidence that Jesus was at least considered a powerful healer by them (t. ḫul. 2:22-23; y. Šabb. 14.4.14d; y. 'Abod. Zar. 2:2.40d-41a; b. 'Abod. Zar. 27b).

4.3. Jesus' Methods of Dealing with the Demons. From the Gospel records it is clear that Jesus showed no interest in the demonic apart from his battle against the Devil and his minions.

4.3.1. Familiar Techniques. In dealing with the demons, historical investigation shows that Jesus’ technique involved a number of features. First, there was an initial dramatic confrontation between Jesus and the demon(iac). For example, in Mark 1:23 the man screams out when he meets Jesus in the Capernaum synagogue so that it is suddenly obvious that he is a demoniac (cf. Mk 5:6-7; 7:25; 9:20). The historical reliability of this feature in the story is all but assured by the existence of this feature in other literature (Philostratus Vit. Ap. 4.20) and the Gospel writers show no consistent use of it.

In two stories the demon(iac)s speak in their initial confrontation with Jesus: "What have we to do with you, Jesus of Nazareth? Have you come to destroy us? I know who you are, the Holy One of God!" (Mk 1:24) and "What have I to do with you, Jesus, son of the Most High God? I adjure you by God not to torment me" (Mk 5:7). This material is probably historically reliable, for it is unlikely that those responsible for transmitting the Gospel traditions would create the idea of the demons declaring Jesus' messiahship. The parallels to the question "What have I (or we) to do with you" (Judg 11:12; 1 Kings 17:18; 2 Sam 16:5-14; Josephus Ant. 7.265; Philo Deus Imm. 138) show that the demons are seeking to defend themselves against Jesus. Parallels found outside the Gospels to the demons saying they know who Jesus is, show they are seeking to gain control over a spiritual enemy (Acts 19:15; PGM VIII.6-7, 13). The knowledge the demons have of Jesus may be supernatural or it may indicate—as the names used for Jesus suggest—he was recognized to be an exorcist in the Jewish tradition where healers such as Jesus often relied on God as a source of power-authority. So, in turn, the demons attempted to disarm Jesus by exposing his allegiance and special relationship with God (Ps 106:16; Sir 45:6; b. Pes. 112b). To say "I adjure (horkizō) you by God . . ." was a way of attempting to bind or put a curse upon a person and thus compel them to do or say something (Josh 6:26; 1 Kings 22:16; 2 Chron 18:15; Mt 26:63; PGM IV.3019).

Second, the stories in the Gospels show Jesus using a number of formulae to expel the demons. In Mark 1:25 Jesus says to the demon "Be quiet. .." (phthmōò). This command is not so much for silence, but, in view of its use in the period as an incantational restriction, Jesus is seeking to bind the demon (P. Oslo 1.161-162). In three stories Jesus is reported as saying: "Come out of [him]" (Mk 1:25; 5:8; 9:25). This command is the basic method found in common to all kinds of exorcists we know in the NT period (Lucian Philops. 11 and 16; Philostratus Vit. Ap. 4.20; PGM IV.1243-1249). In Mark 5:9 Jesus asks the demon "What is your name?" This verse suggests that Jesus had already commanded the demon to come out of the man, but in response the demon had tried to fend off Jesus' attack by using a formula to bind (horkizō) Jesus (see 4.3.2. below). So, apparently being initially unsuccessful (cf. Mk 8:22-26), Jesus uses another way of overcoming the demon by asking its name, thereby disarming it (cf. PGM IV.3037-3079). In this category, the importance of an exorcist knowing the name of the demon (cf. Philostratus Vit. Ap. 4.20), comes Jesus' request in Mark 9:21-22 for the history of the lad's illness. Some ancient exorcists had difficulty in getting demons to speak (PGM IV.3039-3041). Jesus seems to have experienced no such difficulty (Mk 1:23-25; 5:5-7). In Mark 9:25 Jesus commands the demon not to return to the person (cf. Mt 12:43-45; par. Luke 11:24-26). The idea of demons returning to people is extremely old and well documented in the NT period (Josephus Ant. 8.46-49; Philostratus Vit. Ap. 4.20; PGM IV.1254, 3024-3025). In the face of Jesus' attempt to cast them out, the demons plead for leniency in the story of the Gadarene demoniac (Mk 5:10-12; cf. 1 Enoch 12—14; Jub. 10). The request not to be sent out of the area coincides with the contemporary notion that demons were especially associated with particular regions (cf. Tob 8:3).

Third, Jesus is reported as transferring demons from a person to some pigs (Mk 5:13). It is sometimes said that the pigs episode was the proof offered by Jesus for the success of his exorcism. However, against this view it is to be noted that the demons were probably thought to have been transferred from the man to the pigs and then to the sea. Also, it was sometimes thought appropriate to transfer the demons from the sufferer to some object like a pebble, a piece of wood, a pot or some water in order to effect a cure. These objects, thought to contain the demons, were thrown away or destroyed to effect and perhaps signify the demon's departure from the situation. Further, the proof of the cure in the story in Mark 5 is not the destruction of the pigs but the people seeing the cured man "sitting there, clothed and in his right mind" (5:15). Thus, rather than as a proof of cure, the pigs episode was probably understood as an integral part of the cure.

Fourth, on one occasion Jesus is said to perform an exorcism from a distance (Mk 7:24-30). There is nothing in the pericope that necessitates a healing from a distance—the daughter could have accompanied the woman, perhaps on a stretcher (cf. Mk 2:3; 9:14-29). Nor are the elements of the story which make it an exorcism from a distance generally thought to be the product of Christian redaction. On the other hand, there are other stories of this kind from the same milieu as the Gospels (Philostratus Vit. Ap. 3.38; b. Ber. 34b). No literary links are to be found between these and the Jesus story, but they do both have in common the motif of healing at a distance. We can be reasonably confident then that Jesus, like other exorcists of his period, was known as an exorcist able to heal from a distance.

Fifth, violence is involved in the reports of Jesus' dealings with the demons. The drowning of the pigs in Mark 5:11-13 is perhaps the best example. In Mark 1:26 the demon is said to convulse the man, and in Mark 9:26 the demon also apparently convulses the boy and leaves him as dead. Two reasons indicate that this aspect of the reports of Jesus' exorcisms is most probably historically reliable. On the one hand, there are stories outside the NT showing similar violence, yet they are sufficiently different to show that there is no dependence on them by the NT writers (Josephus Ant. 8.49; Philostratus Vit. Ap 4.20). On the other hand, Mark shows no consistent use of, nor interest in, this violence.

4.3.2. Unfamiliar Techniques. Alongside these aspects of Jesus' exorcisms, which were common to other exorcists of the period, there were other features of his technique less familiar to his observers.

First, when Jesus expelled demons he did not use mechanical devices. A feature common to many other exorcists' technique was the aid of some apparatus, device or feature of speech. In Tobit 8:3 incense is burned to expel the demon; in Jubilees 10:10 and 12 medicines are used; in the Genesis Apocryphon 20 Abraham lays hands on the Pharaoh; Eleazar uses a finger ring and bowl of water (Josephus Ant. 8.46-49); David is said to use music (Josephus Ant. 6.166); in the Babylonian Talmud amulets, palm tree prickles, wood chips, ashes, pitch, cumin, dog’s hair and thread are used; Lucian tells of the use of iron rings and the Magical Papyri tells of exorcists using amulets, olive branches, marjoram and special sounds.

All this seems extremely remote from: "Be bound, and come out of him" (Mk 1:25) or "You dumb and deaf spirit, I command you, come out of him, and never enter him again" (Mk 9:25). The only thing near a mechanical aid was the use of the herd of pigs. However, the pigs were not used to exorcise the demons but to provide a habitat for the expelled demons. In this simple, unaided word of command to the demons Jesus was operating in a way similar to some of the rabbis (b. Me’il. 17b) and Apollonius of Tyana (Philostratus Vit. Ap. 4.20).

Second, unlike even some of the Jewish holy men, Jesus is not reported as praying (see Prayer) when he performed an exorcism. Even though Hanina ben Dosa did not use incantations he, like the Abraham of the Qumran Scrolls, prayed to remove the demon (b. Ber. 34b; cf. b. Ta’an. 24b; lQapGen 20). Thus, like Apollonius (Philostratus Vit. Ap. 4.20) and some of the rabbis (b. Me’il. 17b), rather than praying Jesus is said to use simple, recognizable formulae, relying on his own resources to defeat the offending demons.

Third, and related to the previous point, Jesus did not invoke any power-authority. One frequent source of power-authority was a powerful name (cf. PGM IV.3019). The name of Solomon is often used and, in Acts 19:13, the sons of Sceva try using Jesus’ name, as does the strange exorcist (Mk 9:38-39; par. Luke 9:49-50). In the light of Matthew 12:28 (par. Lk 11:20), where Jesus declares his source of power-authority to be the Spirit (Luke has "finger") of God, we might expect that in dealing with the demons Jesus would call on the Spirit (or "finger") of God. But he does not. Like some of the rabbis (b. Me’il. 17b) and Apollonius (Philostratus Vit. Ap. 4.20), Jesus appeared to rely on his own charismatic personal force to subdue and expel the demons.

Fourth, an element of contemporary exorcistic technique that Jesus did not use was the command horkizō (Aramaic, shb’). In the context of dealing with demons, horkizō meant "to charge," "adjure" or "bind" someone by another being, usually a superior power, in order to carry out the wishes of the exorcist (Mk 5:7; Acts 19:13; cf. 1 Thess 5:27). Jesus apparently neither acknowledged the use of a source of power-authority nor used the accompanying command horkizō. Instead, Jesus says T (egō, Aramaic, "nā) command you . . . " (Mk 9:25).
The emphatic egō is relatively infrequent on the lips of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels, and it is not consist-ently used in the words of Jesus to the demons (only at Mk 9:25). This suggests that the early church is not responsible for it in Mark 9:25. There is no known use of egō in contemporary incantations of adjuration by an exorcist and so it is probable that its use by Jesus is significant in understanding him as an exorcist. That is, along with no direct declaration of his source of power-authority being the Holy Spirit and the use of egō, Jesus deliberately drew attention to himself and his own resources in his ability to expel demons. Nevertheless, although Jesus believed that he was operating out of his own resources, at the same time he believed that it was God who was to be seen as operative in his activity.

4.4. Jesus’ Understanding of His Exorcisms. Although his reply to John the Baptist* (Mt 11:2-6) does not allow the conclusion that the exorcism of demons was the key to Jesus’ ministry, it was at least one of the most important aspects of his ministry (Mt 12:28 [par. Lk 11:20]).

It is in the collection of sayings usually called the Beelzebul Controversy that we discover most about how Jesus understood his exorcisms (Mk 3:22-27 [par. Mt 9:32-34 and 12:22-30; Lk 11:14-23]). In turn, the probably authentic saying "If by the Spirit (Luke has "finger") of God that I cast out demons then the kingdom of God has come upon you" tells us most about Jesus’ understanding of his exorcisms. With due regard for the difficulty of establishing the exact nuance of what Jesus may have said, taking account of the emphatic "I," which is most likely a reflection of the Aramaic, this verse shows that Jesus believed that where the Spirit was operating in him there was the coming of the kingdom of God (see 4.3.2. above; see Kingdom of God).

For Jesus his ministry of exorcism was not preparatory to the kingdom, nor a sign of the kingdom nor an indication that the kingdom had arrived, nor even an illustration of the kingdom, but actually the kingdom of God itself in operation.

The parable* of the strong man (Mt 12:29 [par. Mk 3:27; Lk 11:21-22]) shows that Jesus believed that in his exorcisms he was binding Satan in order to plunder his property—those hitherto held by Satan. In pre-Christian literature there is the expectation that the Messiah (see Christ) would do battle with Satan, but Jesus is the first to make a specific connection between the relatively ordinary events of exorcism and the defeat of Satan, between exorcism and eschatology. However, there are sayings which assume the continuing existence of Satan and his final defeat in the final judgment and are generally agreed to contain significant traces of authentic Jesus tradition (e.g., Mt 13:24-30). This tension is resolved in the light of Isaiah 24:21-22 and I Enoch 10:4-6 where the defeat of Satan or evil is expected to take place in two stages. Thus, Jesus probably believed that his exorcisms were the first stage of the binding of Satan and the final defeat would take place in the final judgment (Mt 13:30).

The Synoptic Evangelists share similar views on the Devil and demons and Jesus' dealings with them. The Fourth Gospel has a unique contribution to make on this theme.

5.1. The Gospel of Matthew. There is a variety of names used for the Devil in Matthew (see 1. above). The "Devil," his most common name (4:1, 5, 8, 11; 13:39; 25:41), used interchangeably with "Satan" (4:10; 12:26; 16:23) and at the head of an army of evil demons (12:24; 25:41), is the archenemy of God and the ministry of Jesus. In 4:13 the term "the Tempter" (ho peirazos; also in 1 Thess 3:5) conveys the idea of the Devil putting Jesus to the test.

Matthew's view of Jesus as an exorcist is distinctive among the Synoptic Evangelists. Most notable is Matthew's playing down the role of exorcism in Jesus' ministry. Thus, Matthew leaves out Mark's programmatic story of the demoniac in the synagogue (Mk 1:21-28) and does not include an exorcism story until 8:24-34. Yet, for Matthew, Jesus' dealing with demons is important in revealing the significance of Jesus. The passage 12:22-30 (cf. 9:32-34) gathers up much of what Matthew says elsewhere on the topic. In this pericope Matthew has introduced the idea that the demoniac was blind (cf. 9:32-34; Lk 11:14) to highlight the messianic significance of Jesus' exorcisms (Is 42:7,16; 29:18 [32:3]; 35:5; 42:18-20; 43:8; 61:1 [LXX]). The crowd is said to perceive this, for the people respond: "Can this be the Son of David?"

Following the brief exorcism story is the Pharisees' accusation that Jesus was empowered by the Prince of Demons (12:24), which is answered in part in the parable of the strong man (12:29). This parable shows that Matthew believed that in his exorcisms Jesus engaged in the first part of Satan's defeat. The explanation of the parable of the wheat and the weeds (13:36-43) shows that he also believed that Jesus would be involved in the second and final stage of the defeat of Satan (cf. 8:29). The eschatological significance of Jesus' exorcisms is spelled out in the well-known saying "But if I in the Spirit of God cast out demons, then has come upon you the kingdom of God" (12:28). This significance given to the exorcisms is also seen in the way Matthew retells the exorcism stories. That is, Matthew removes the idea of a demon binding or putting a supernatural restriction on Jesus (horkizō, 8:29; par. Mk 5:7). The earliest manuscripts have very little punctuation, so in 8:29 Matthew may have intended the demoniacs to declare rather than ask: "You have come here to torment us before the time." In "come" (erchomai) Matthew is probably alluding to the coming of God's kingdom and his anointed messenger (6:10; 16:28). In saying that the torment is "before time" (pro kairō)—that is, before the final judgment*— Matthew is saying that in Jesus the eschatological torture of the demons has already begun. The powerful status of Jesus is also seen in this story where the dialog between Jesus and the demoniac is reduced so that all that remains is the simple authoritative command "Go"—the only time Matthew mentions Jesus' words to demons.

From Matthew's perspective the Son of God (see Son of God) does not need to use complicated techniques. And in the healing of the epileptic boy Jesus suffers no ignorance of the patient's history (7:17-18) and is instantly and completely successful (17:18; cf. Mk 9:24-27). In the story of the healing of the Canaanite woman's daughter, the woman kneels or worships (proskuneō) Jesus and initially addresses him: "Have mercy on me, O Lord, Son of David." She goes on to address Jesus as "Lord" three times (15:21-28; Mk 7:24-30). In short, for Matthew Jesus' successful dealings with the demons reveal Jesus to be the Son of David or of God (see Son of David).

5.2. The Gospel of Mark. Mark uses the word Satan for the Devil. Satan's key function is to deflect Jesus from his mission, as in the Temptation story (1:13) and through Peter's rebuke, which Mark identifies with Satan speaking (8:33). If Mark intends the sower (4:3, 14) to be Jesus then, again, Satan is depicted as destroying the work of Jesus through taking away the word planted in people (4:15). As in the other Synoptic Gospels, Satan is the archdemon, also called Beelzebul, whose minions, or himself directly, possess people (3:22-27).

Mark uses the word demon thirteen times and unclean spirit eleven times, and sometimes synonymously (cf. 3:22, 30; 7:25-26). "Demons" are only mentioned in the context of exorcism (1:34, 39; 3:15). They cause people to convulse and cry out (1:26), to have preternatural strength, to injure themselves (5:3-5), they throw people down, cause foaming at the mouth, grinding of the teeth (9:18) and provoke people to destroy themselves (9:22). Demons are able to enter animals as well (5:11-13).

One of the questions addressed in Mark's Gospel is the identity of Jesus (1:27; 2:7; 4:41; 6:1-6,14-16,49-50, 54; 8:27-28). Mark asserts from the beginning (1:1), and has God confirm (1:11), that Jesus is the Son of God. Then, throughout the first part of his story, Mark shows the human characters ignorant of Jesus' true identity. Yet through the cries of the demons, Mark is able to remind his readers who Jesus is (1:24-25, 34; 3:11-12; 5:7).

From Mark's perspective the importance of Jesus' dealing with the demons can be gauged by noting that one of Jesus' first public acts is an exorcism. And of his thirteen healing stories the largest single category is that of exorcism (1:21-28; 5:1-20; 7:24-30; 9:14-29). Then Mark heightens the importance of Jesus' exorcisms through the summaries of Jesus' ministry (1:32-34; 3:11-12).

Mark portrays Jesus using techniques that would have been familiar to his readers from their knowledge of other exorcists. Jesus "rebukes" (epitimaō, 1:25; 3:12; 9:25), "muzzles" (phimoō, 1:25-26) and "commands" (epitassō, 9:25) that demons never enter a person again. Jesus uses the supposed power in a name to gain ascendency over a demon (5:9), transfers demons from one habitat to another (5:12-13) and exorcises from a distance (7:24-29). In confronting the demons Jesus is empowered by the Spirit and is doing battle against Satan (3:22-30). Through the exorcisms (1:24, 27) and confrontations with the demons (1:34; 3:11-12, 23-27; 5:7) and the demonic (4:41) the Jesus of Mark is shown to be the Son of God (3:11; 5:7).

5.3. The Gospel of Luke. The name Devil in Luke is not used of the false accuser of the pre-Christian Greek literature but is used interchangeably with Satan. In Luke 11:15-19 Beelzebul is used of the archevil demon standing in opposition to the mission of Jesus.

encounters Luke believed that Jesus was dealing with Satan (11:14-23; 13:11, 16; cf. 10:17-18). Like Mark, Luke depicts Satan or the Devil as attempting to destroy the work of Jesus, but Luke more clearly shows the Devil as the enemy of the early church too (Lk 8:11-12; Acts 6:7; 13:5).

The most direct attack by Satan on Jesus since the Temptation comes when Satan enters into Judas so that Judas goes away to betray Jesus (22:3-4). Luke extends Satan's attack to demand the disciples' surrender (Lk 22:31-32; cf. 2 Sam 15:20-21; Job 1:6-12). In this episode Luke expresses his view that the power of Satan is limited in contrast to the authority of Jesus' prayer for his followers. Satan is able to "shake in a sieve" (siniazō) but not totally destroy Peter and the disciples.

In the story of the return of the seventy (-two) disciples Luke relates a vision of Jesus which can be translated: "I have been seeing Satan falling like lightning from heaven" (10:18). Luke is emphasizing that the eschatological expectation of Satan's downfall was already taking place, that it was an ongoing process and linked to the exorcistic ministry of the church. In the Beelzebul pericope Luke has already associated exorcism and the destruction of Satan.

Unlike the Fourth Gospel, the cross is not associated with the defeat of Satan, though the crucifixion is a battle with Satan (Luke 22:53; see Death of Jesus). The stories of demonic activity in Acts show that Luke did not believe that Satan had been finally defeated in the Temptation, in his exorcisms, or in the death and resurrection* of Jesus. It would seem that Luke maintained the view of Jesus (see 4.4. above) that the ministry of Jesus was the first stage in the defeat of Satan, the final stage to be in the eschaton (cf. 8:31).

Although the first three healing stories in Luke picture Jesus dealing with demons (4:31-37, 38-41), he broadens Mark's view of the early stages of the ministry of Jesus to emphasize his healing and teaching (4:18). Jesus' exorcisms reveal him as "the Son of God" and Messiah (4:41; 9:35, 37) and are performed in the power of the Spirit, for in the early part of Luke Jesus' sonship is linked with the coming of the Spirit (1:35; 3:22; 4:3, 9; cf. 4:18 and 31-37). This connection between being empowered by the Spirit, healing—particularly exorcism—and christology is obviously important to Luke for he draws attention to it in a summary of Jesus' ministry in Acts 10:38 (cf. Lk 4:43).

Unlike Mark, Luke sustains the impression that exorcism remained an important and integral part of Jesus' ministry (cf. 7:21 and Mt 11:4; Lk 13:32). In Acts 10:36-39 Luke gives his description of the importance and place of exorcism in Jesus' ministry showing that Jesus was an exorcist because of the Holy Spirit; in other words, that God was with him and that exorcism was the work of God.

Thus, in retelling the exorcism stories, Luke heightens the ability and authority* of Jesus. For example, in the healing of the demoniac in the synagogue the demon does not cry out after Jesus' command of submission (Mk 1:26; par. Lk 4:35). In the healing of the epileptic boy Jesus asks no questions; he lacks no knowledge (Lk 9:37-43; cf. Mk 9:16, 21). In Mark this healing seems to be in two stages—the demon leaves the boy as dead so that he has to be raised—but in Luke Jesus is immediately successful (9:42). Luke faithfully reflects the tradition he receives from Mark and does not question that Jesus, with few variations, used the same techniques as his contemporaries.

The practice of an exorcist standing over the patient has its roots in ancient Babylonian healings, and in the NT period it is directly paralleled in the Magical Papyri (e.g., PGM IV.745, 1229, 2735) where the focus of attention in healing was often directed toward the head. This story, in which he says the woman had a spirit of infirmity and was bound by Satan, blurs the distinction between healing in general and exorcism and, in effect, gives all sickness a demonic and cosmic dimension; in all healing God's adversary is being subdued.

5.4. The Gospel of John. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus is accused of being in league with the Devil (Mt 12:22-30; par. Mk 3:20-27; Lk 11:14-23). In John's Gospel Jesus faces the less serious charge of being possessed by a demon (7:20).
Nevertheless, for Jesus to be possessed meant that he was thought to be mad (10:20-21) and a Samaritan (8:48-49,52), in that he was putting forth heretical or unacceptable and unbelievable opinions (cf. Justin Apol. 26.1-5; Origen Contra Cels 6.11).

As in the Synoptic Gospels, the Devil is portrayed as attempting to destroy Jesus and his mission. Judas the betrayer is called a devil (6:70), and Satan is said to direct and enter Judas (13:2, 27). As in the Qumran literature (see 1. above), people are depicted as children belonging either to God or the Devil. In 8:44 the Devil is contrasted with Jesus. The Devil is said to control his "children" (cf. 1 Jn 3:8), to be a murderer from the beginning (cf. Wis 2:24; contrast the "Word" in Jn 1), to contain no truth and to be the father of lies. In the death and resurrection, or "hour" (12:23-36) of Jesus, the Devil, or Ruler of this World, is judged and brought down (12:31; 14:30; 16:11). However, the Devil remains sufficiently powerful for Jesus to pray that his followers would be kept from tou ponêrou ("the evil," 17:15), probably meaning the Evil One (cf. 1 Jn 2:13, 14; 3:12; 5:18, 19) until the judgment on the last day (12:48).

The Fourth Gospel (as well as the epistles and Apocalypse of John) says nothing about exorcism or of Jesus being an exorcist In light of the evidence that Jesus was an exorcist (see 4.2. above), it does not seem reasonable to suggest that the authors) of the Johannine material knew nothing of the tradition that Jesus was an exorcist. Rather, the Johannine literature probably suppresses or ignores this tradition. Can this be explained?

It has been thought that John was embarrassed about portraying Jesus as a man of this time, using the healing techniques of his contemporaries. However, this cannot be the case, for John is happy to include other techniques familiar to other healers: healing from a distance (4:46-54) and the use of spittle (9:1-7).

Rather, a number of aspects of Johannine theology have probably contributed to the suppression of Jesus' association with exorcism. First is the Johannine notion of the function of Jesus' miracles (see Miracles and Miracle Stories). The end of an earlier edition of the Gospel than we now have spelled out the Johannine understanding of the role of the miracles of Jesus as follows: "Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name" (20:30-31). In other words, for John the miracles are considered so to reveal the identity of Jesus that the readers would conclude that he was the Christ. So not only did John choose spectacular miracles, but miracles which were thought to be the work of God, like the turning of water into wine. By contrast, to associate Jesus with the relatively common healing of exorcism performed by many other healers would have appeared banal.

A second factor which may have contributed to the Johannine material not mentioning Jesus being an exorcist may be linked with the playing down of the theme of the kingdom of God. In the Synoptic Gospels exorcism and the kingdom of God are so closely associated that for John to exclude one probably meant that he felt obliged to exclude the other.
Third, in the Synoptic Gospels the defeat of Satan is linked with Jesus' exorcisms. In John the defeat of Satan is linked with the cross (Jn 14:30; 16:11). This shift in Johannine theology probably carried with it the need to remove reference to exorcisms, which other Christians had associated with the defeat of Satan. Probably for these reasons the Johannine material omits the tradition that Jesus was an exorcist.

See also Healing; Temptation.

DEMYTHOLOGIZING. See MYTH.

DESERT. See MOUNTAIN AND WILDERNESS.

DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM

1. The Jewish War
2. The Destruction of Jerusalem
3. The Gospels and the Destruction of Jerusalem

1. The Jewish War.

The destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 brought to a climax a war between the Romans (see Rome) and the Jews of Palestine. The war has become known as the Jewish War following the lead of the first-century Jewish historian Flavius Josephus (see Josephus), who referred to his seven-volume history of events leading up to the fall of Jerusalem as peri tou loudaikou polemou ("concerning the Jewish War," Life 74 §412).

1.1. Events Precipitating the War. After many years of tension under Roman rule, several crucial events directly led to the outbreak of the war. On the one hand, the policies and cruelty of the Roman procurator Florus (A.D. 64-66) set the stage for the war (Josephus Ant. 20.11.1 §257; Tacitus Hist. 5.10.1). First, he antagonized the Jews by siding with the Greeks (see Hellenism) in several incidents during 66 in a longstanding, civil-rights conflict between the Jews and Greeks of Caesarea. Then in the summer of 66 he took seventeen talents from the sacrosanct Temple* treasury to allay governmental expenses (Josephus J.W. 2.14.6 §293) and compounded the offense by having Roman troops sack part of the city, scourge and crucify prisoners in reaction to the resulting public protest (J.W. 2.14.6-8 §§296-308). When he later moved two cohorts (c. 1200 men) to Jerusalem, crowds prevented them from reaching the Roman garrison at the Antonia in a confrontation that resulted in a stampede that left many dead (J.W. 2.15.5 §§325-28).

On the other hand, in response to Florus's activities the Jews laid the "foundation for the war" by stopping sacrifices for Gentiles* and thus the twice-daily sacrifices for the emperor's welfare (J.W. 2.17.2 §409). This was an act of rebellion. The sacrifices represented a special concession from the Romans to the Jews in lieu of their participating in the rituals of emperor worship (J.W. 2.17.3 §§415-16). Florus's activities in Jerusalem gave rise to a group of insurgents in Jerusalem (see Revolutionary Movements) who captured the Antonia and massacred the Roman garrison there in August of 66. Later, they attacked Herod's palace and the camp of Florus's cohort, and massacred the Roman forces after they had agreed to surrender in exchange for safe passage (J.W. 2.17.7-8 §§430-40). With the Roman fortress of Masada having already fallen to a rebel force (J.W. 2.17.2 §408), the revolt spread to other attacks against the Romans and the taking of the Herodian fortresses of Cypros near Jericho and Machaeros in Perea (J.W. 2.18.6 §§484-86).

1.2. The Course of the War. After the Jews' successful attack and massacre of the Roman forces in Jerusalem, the capture of the surrounding fortresses in early fall of 66 and the outbreaks of violence in Caesarea, the Decapolis and Syrian cities (J.W. 2.18.1-5 §§457-80), it was time for Rome's intervention. Cestius Gallus, the Syrian legate, assembled an army of 30,000 and moved on the province on Rome's behalf. He took control of Galilee* with little resistance (J.W. 2.18.11 §§510-12) and then marched on Jerusalem, eventually making his camp a mile to the north on Ml Scopus in November of 66 (J.W. 2.19.4 §§527-28). Though victory was in his grasp, Cestius, for some inexplicable reason, abandoned the siege after about a week (J.W. 2.19.6-7 §§538-40). Withdrawing his forces in retreat, he suffered nearly 5,000 casualties and the loss of valuable military supplies to the Jews (J.W. 2.19.7-9 §§540-55).

During the winter months of 66/67 the Jews made preparation for the inevitable attack by Rome in the spring by setting up a revolutionary government throughout the province. The peace party led by the high priests, having greater influence on the populace than the rebel leaders, initially took control and selected the ex-high priest Ananus as commander of the forces (J.W. 2.20.3 §§562-64). The revolutionary government divided the territory into six districts (Idumea, Perea, Jericho, western Judea, northeastern Judea, Galilee) and set up military governors to establish civil administration and prepare for war (J.W. 2.20.3-4 §§562-68). Josephus was made the military governor of Galilee (J.W. 2.20.4 §568; Life 7 §29). Many distinguished inhabitants, however, took the occasion to leave Jerusalem as if it were a "sinking ship" (J.W. 2.20.1 §556).

In the spring of 67 the Roman general Vespasian, sent by Nero, and his son Titus arrived with an army of nearly 60,000 men (J.W. 3.4.2 §69). Using friendly Sepphoris as a base in Galilee, Vespasian encountered little resistance in that district except from the fortified places where most of the resistance had moved. His first sustained opposition came from the hilltop fortress Jotapata under Josephus' command. After a seven-week siege it fell in July 67 (J.W. 3.7.5-31 §§150-288; 3.7.33-36 §§316-39). Josephus surrendered and was taken prisoner (J.W. 3.8.8 §392; cf. 4.10.7 §§622-29). Then the Roman forces took the port of Joppa (J.W; 3.9.7-8 §§445-61) in late July to protect the supply routes, Tiberias in August (J.W. 3.9.2-4 §§414-31), Tarichaeae in September (J.W. 3.10.1-5 §§462-502), the fortress of Gamala in October after a four-week siege (J.W. 4.1.3-7 §§11-53; 4.1.9-10 §§62-83) and finally Gischala. There the rebel leader John of Gischala escaped for Jerusalem with his band of followers (J.W. 4.2.1-5 §§84-120). Having subdued the district of Galilee, Vespasian set up garrisons throughout the area during the winter months to maintain control.

Military activities resumed in the spring of 68. In March Vespasian took the district of Perea, except for the fortress Machaeros, when the wealthy surrendered the capital, Gadara (J.W. 4.8.3 §413). He then moved through western Judea with little resistance and took Idumea (J.W. 4.8.2 §§443-48). Jericho capitulated on his arrival in June (J.W. 4.8.1-2 §§450-51), leaving him with control of almost all the province of Judea. He then set up strategic military camps to prepare for the attack on Jerusalem (J.W. 4.9.1 §§486-90).

The actual siege of Jerusalem, however, was delayed for nearly two years. First came the news of Nero's death in June 68. Since a military command terminated with the death of the emperor who had given it Vespasian waited for word from the new emperor (J.W. 4.9.2 §§497-98). But no word came out of the ensuing political turmoil in Rome, with Galba's accession and assassination in January 69, then Otho's accession and assassination in April 69, followed by Vitellius' struggle for power. In June of 69, still having received no official word, Vespasian resumed military action on his own and consolidated his gains in Judea, only to break off the activities in July when he was proclaimed emperor by the Roman forces in the East (J.W. 4.10.4, 6 §601, §§616-20). After consolidating his strength in the East in the spring of 70 he left Alexandria, Egypt, for Rome and placed Titus in charge of taking Jerusalem (J.W. 4.11.5 §658).

2. The Destruction of Jerusalem.
Josephus, our primary source of information about the war, describes the isolation, surrounding, siege and fall of Jerusalem in The Jewish War books 4—6. It is a period of political turmoil in Rome, a change of Roman command in Judea and a disastrous civil war among the Jews within the walls of Jerusalem. The city eventually fell to the Romans but more as a result of Jewish self-destruction than Roman military power.

2.1. Civil War. The city was torn by internal power struggles almost from the beginning of the war. On the one hand, the political forces were divided between extremists and moderates, a war party and a peace party. On the other hand, the extremists themselves were divided not only from the moderates but among themselves.

Initially, after the successful rout of Cestius, the moderates had gained control of Jerusalem under the leadership of the ex-high priest Ananus. By the end of 67, however, the war party led by Eleazar son of Simon, who had distinguished himself in the attack on the retiring Cestius, and a group around him which Josephus called the "Zealots" (J.W. 2.8.13 §§160-61), gained strength from numerous other extremists and brigands who had moved to Jerusalem after Vespasian's invasion of Galilee (J.W. 4.3.3 §§135-36).

Joined by these extremist forces Eleazar and his band began terrorizing the moderates and attacking the authority of the high priests (J.W. 4.3.4-6 §§138-50). They seized the Temple and replaced the high priest with a priest chosen by lot (J.W. 4.3.6 §§147-50). Ananus, supported by a public aroused by the sacrilege, regained the outer courts and pinned Eleazar and the Zealots inside (J.W. 4.3.11-12 §§193-207). The Zealots, however, were encouraged by John of Gischala, who had come to Jerusalem after being routed from Gischala by Titus (J.W. 4.2.4 §106; 4.3.1-3 §§121-28, §§135-37) and was supposedly on the side of Ananus and the moderates, to seek help from the Idumeans (J.W. 4.4.1 §§224-32). Eventually, a large Idumean force entered the city under cover of a severe storm (J.W. 4.4.6-7 §§288-304), linked up with the Zealots by retaking the outer courts and killing the ex-high priest Ananus (J.W. 4.5.1-2 §§305-17). The Zealots then went on such a brutal rampage, attacking supporters of the moderates, that the majority of the Idumean force broke with Eleazar and returned home. Others went over to John of Gischala and his band (J.W. 4.5§5-6.1 §§345-65). The extremists had gained control of the city.
Chronology of Events Leading to the Destruction of Jerusalem

66 August Jewish insurgents capture Antonia; Cestius, Syrian legate, attacks Jerusalem and retreats.

67 Spring-Fall Roman army under Vespasian subdues Galilee.

67-68 Winter Zealot party formed under Eleazar controls Jerusalem.

69 Spring Turmoil within Jerusalem with three parties vying for power.

June Vespasian resumes campaign.

July Vespasian proclaimed emperor and departs.

70 Spring Command given to Titus, Vespasian's son.

May Titus breaches Agrippa's wall.

August Titus takes and burns the Temple.

September Jerusalem sacked and burned.

The Zealots under Eleazar, however, soon split with John of Gischala because of his desire for absolute power (J.W; 4.7.1 §§389-90; 5.1.2 §§5-8). In the spring of 69 these two rival groups were joined by a third led by Simon bar Giora from Gerasa. Simon had first moved to Masada after losing his command in northeastern Judea in 67 (J.W. 4.9.3 §§503-8). When he learned about Ananus' death, he gathered a force from the refugees of the Zealot's brutal campaign in Jerusalem, along with some Idumeans, and pitched camp outside Jerusalem (J.W. 4.9.8 §§538-44). From there he was admitted into the city by the remainder of the moderates and a populace wearied of the brutality of John and the Zealots (J.W. 4.9.11 §§573-76).

In the struggle that followed Simon became the "master of Jerusalem" (J. W. 4.9.12 §577), with an army of nearly 15,000 that controlled most of the city. John occupied the outer courts of the Temple and part of the Lower City of Jerusalem with 6,000 men. The Zealots held the inner Temple with 2400 (J.W. 5.6.1 §§248-51). During Titus' siege of Jerusalem in the spring of 70, John used the opening of the Temple during the Passover to storm the inner courts and force the Zealots to join him against Simon (J.W. 5.3.1 §§98-105). Only as Titus was about to breach the walls did he reluctantly agree to recognize and work with Simon in defense of the city (J.W. 5.7.4 §§278-79). Meanwhile, the civil war had not only cost unity and hundreds of lives, but the vital stores of grain had been destroyed by fire during the internal conflict (J.W. 5.1.4-5 §§22-28). According to Josephus, the ensuing famine alone cost over 600,000 lives (J.W. 5.13.7 §569).

2.2. The Fall of Jerusalem. In the spring of 70 Titus took command of the Roman forces. During Passover of 70 he moved his troops closer to the city walls and began his assault from the north. In May he breached Agrippa's wall after nearly two weeks of attack (J. W. 5.6.4-7.2 §§275-302).

When the Jewish resistance appeared to slow the preparations for the siege of the second north wall and the Antonia, Titus threw up a four-mile circumvallation around the city with troops stationed at posts along the wall to prevent provisions from reaching the famine-starved inhabitants (J.W. 5.12.2 §§502-11). On more than one occasion Josephus noted the impossibility of escape from the city, a condition that existed even prior to the building of the Roman wall around it (J.W. 4.9.1 §490). Attempted escape from the city meant death either from the rebels on the inside or from the Romans on the outside (J. W. 4.9.10 §§564-65; 5.13.4 §551; 6.6.2 §323).

In July Titus broke through the second north wall and the Antonia, and moved his forces into position to attack the north and west Temple fortifications. He managed to get control of the outer courts on the ninth of August and took the inner courts on the tenth, plundering the Temple, setting it on fire and slaughtering thousands (J.W. 6.4.7—5.2 §§260-85). John's troops, who had held the Temple and the Lower City, escaped to the Upper City (J. W. 6.5.1 §277). In celebration the Romans desecrated the Jewish sanctuary by offering a sacrifice to their standards in the outer court (J.W. 6.6.1 §316).

In September Titus ordered the burning and sacking of the city (J.W. 6.6.3 §354). After taking the Lower City, his forces took the Upper City, breaching it in less than a day and gaining control of Herod's palace and towers (J.W. 6.8.4 §§392-99). John, who along with Simon had escaped into underground passages, eventually surrendered (J.W. 6.9.5 §433). Simon was captured attempting to tunnel his way out (J.W. 7.2.1 §§26-33). Titus then had the Temple and city walls razed "to the ground," except for Herod's three towers and a part of the west wall, which he left standing to show the "character and strength" of the city J.W. 6.9.1 §413; 7.1.1 §§1-4). Since it was too late in the year to sail to Rome, he waited until the spring to return with his spoils from the Temple and nearly 100,000 prisoners, including Simon and John, to join Vespasian in a triumphal march in Rome in 71 (J.W. 7.5.3-6 §§121-57).

The fall and destruction of Jerusalem effectively ended the Jewish War. The only resistance remained in the fortresses of Herodian, Machaeros and Masada. Their reductions followed in 71-73, with Masada, commanded by Eleazar son of Jair (J.W. 7.8.1 §253), the last to fall (J.W. 7.8.5-9.2 §§304406).

All four Gospels have Jesus making reference to a future destruction of the Temple (Mt 24:2; Mk 13:2; Lk 21:6; cf. Mt 26:61; Mk 14:38; Jn 2:19), an event that of necessity would seem to assume the fall of Jerusalem. Furthermore, the warning against the "abomination of desolation" in the Olivet Discourse (Mk 13:14; cf. Dan 12:11) has often been interpreted as referring to the Roman desecrating presence in one form or another in the Temple during the war.

Despite those who would attribute these references to the influence of hindsight, nothing in either of the references to the fate of Jerusalem or the Temple corresponds so closely to the events as to necessitate the sayings being created in the light of the events of 66—70. Luke's description of the siege and razing of Jerusalem (19:43-44; 21:20) reflects the normal strategy for taking a fortified city in the ancient world (e.g., Jer 6:3, 6). Neither reference contains any distinctive feature of the destruction of Jerusalem such as the barricading of the city with a four-mile wall, the disastrous civil war and famine from within, or the fall of the Temple. Some elements actually conflict with the information given by Josephus. For example, the Roman presence and wall leaves the warning against entering and the summons to flee the city (21:20) without a historical reference point. Furthermore, the Roman presence in the Temple could hardly have represented the "abomination of desolation" (Mk 13:14). Rome breached the Temple at the climax of the war, a fact that again makes the call for those in Judea to flee anachronistic: by that time they had been conquered and under control of Roman forces for nearly two years. The frequent use of OT prophetic imagery in these passages indicates that these sayings were prophecies of impending judgment The events of 70 may have given poignancy to Luke's sayings in 19:43-44 and 21:20, but the underlying prophecy of the coming destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple ultimately have their roots in Jesus' ministry.

See also Apocalyptic Teaching: Revolutionary Movements: Temple

DEVIL. See DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN.

DIASPORA. See GENTILES; HELLENISM.

DISCIPLES

The first-century Greco-Roman world displayed a variety of religious, philosophical and political leaders, each of whom had followers committed to their cause, teaching and beliefs. While several different terms designated these followers, disciple was one of the most commonly used. It also became the most commonly used term to designate the followers of Jesus, to the extent that in Jesus' so-called Great Commission the objective of the world-wide mission was to "make disciples" of all nations (Mt 28:19; see Gentiles).
1. Terminology and Concept

The English word disciple normally designates a "follower," "adherent" or "student" of a great master, religious leader or teacher.* Disciple is the word used most commonly to translate the Greek word mathētēs and the Hebrew words talmid and limmûd.

1.1. OT Background.

Disciple terminology is strikingly scarce in the OT, but other evidence points to master-disciple relationships within the national life of Israel.* The single occurrence of talmîḏ in the OT (mathētēs does not occur in the LXX) indicates a student or apprentice in musical instruction (1 Chron 25:8). The prophet Isaiah refers to the group gathered around him as "my disciples" (Is 8:16; limmûday), and their relationship is characterized by an educational process accentuating speaking and listening (Is 50:4; limmûḏim). The term limmûḏim was used to specify the "disciples" of Yahweh (Is 54:13), indicating that limmûḏim could be disciples of both Yahweh and a human master.

In spite of the relative absence of disciple terminology and explicit teaching on discipleship, the nature of the prophetic ministry (the prophets associated with Samuel, 1 Sam 19:20-24; the sons of the prophets associated with Elisha, 2 Kings 4:1, 38; 9:1), the writing prophets (Jeremiah and Baruch, Jer 36:32), the scribes (Ezra, Ezra 7:6, 11) and the wisdom tradition (Prov 22:17; 25:1; wise counselors, Jer 18:18) provide compelling evidence for the existence of master-disciple relationships within the social structure of Israel. Each of these institutions was involved in the process of communicating the revelation of Yahweh (prophecy,* law,* wisdom*) and the suggested intimacy of the relationship indicates mutual support in the task of revealing the word of the Lord to the nation.

1.2. Greek-Speaking World.

In the earliest classical Greek literature, mathētēs was used in three ways: in a general sense (in morphological relation to the verb mannhanein, "to learn") of "learner" (Isocrates Panath. 16.7); with a technical sense of "adherent" to a great teacher, teaching or master (Xenophon Mem. 1.6.3.4); and with a more restricted sense of an "institutional pupil" of the Sophists (Demosthenes Lacrit. 35.41.7). Socrates (and those opposed to the Sophists) resisted using mathētēs for his followers in order to avoid Sophistic misassociations (Plato Soph. 233.B.6-C.6), but he used the term freely to refer to "learners" (Plato Crat. 428.B.4) and "adherents" (Plato Symp. 197.B.1) where there was no danger of misunderstanding. In the Hellenistic (see Hellenism) period at the time of Jesus mathētēs continued to be used with general connotations of a "learner" (Diodorus Bib. Hist. 23.2.1.13, 26), but it was used more regularly to refer to an "adherent" (Dio Chrysostom Regno 1.38.6). The type of adherence was determined by the master, ranging from being the follower of a great thinker and master of the past like Socrates (Dio Chrysostom De Homero. 1.2), to being the pupil of a philosopher like Pythagoras (Diodorus Bib. Hist. 12. 20. 1. 3), to being the devotee of a religious master like Epicurus (Plutarch Non Posse Suav. 1100A6).

1.3. Judaism at the Time of Jesus. Within Judaism* of the first century several different types of individuals were called "disciples," using the essentially equivalent terms mathētēs and talmiḏ. The terms designated adherents or followers who were committed to a recognized leader, teacher or movement; relationships running the spectrum from philosophical (Philo Sacr. 7.4; 64.10; 79.10) to technical (rabbinical scribes; m. 'Abot 1:1; b. Šabb. 31a) to sectarian (Pharisees* in Josephus, Ant. 13.289; 15.3, 370) to revolutionary (Zealot-like nationalists in Midr. Šir Haširim Zūta; see Revolutionary Movements). Apart from the disciples of Jesus, the Gospels present us with "disciples of the Pharisees" (Mt 22:15-16; Mk 2:18) who possibly belonged to one of the academic institutions; "disciples of John the Baptist" (Mk 2:18), the courageous men and women who had left the status quo of Jewish society to follow the eschatological prophet John the Baptist*; and the "disciples of Moses" (Jn 9:24-29), who were Jews focused on their privileged position as those to whom God had revealed himself through Moses.*

2. Disciples of Jesus.

2.1. First Followers. From the beginning of his public ministry, Jesus had followers. His first followers, according to the Johannine tradition, were originally disciples of John the Baptist. Since the Baptist's ministry prepared the way for Jesus, it is natural that some of John's disciples would make the transition to following Jesus. The first followers were Andrew and another unnamed disciple (likely the apostle John). Andrew, convinced that Jesus was the Messiah (see Christ), brought his brother, Simon Peter, to Jesus. Philip, another person from the same hometown as Andrew and Peter, was next called by Jesus, and he in turn brought Nathanael to Jesus (cf. Jn 1:35-49). These first followers were likely the "disciples" (2:2) who next traveled with Jesus to the wedding celebration at Cana, experienced the first miraculous sign and believed in Jesus.

This early movement to follow Jesus gained momentum as the news of Jesus traveled through social relationships in a relatively localized area. Since Jesus focused his ministry in the Galilee* region, the early disciples were drawn from an existing network of relatives (e.g., the brothers: Andrew and Simon Peter; John and James), business partners (e.g., Peter and Andrew were partners in the fishing industry with James and John, Lk 5:10), neighbors and acquaintances (most of the twelve disciples were from Capernaum and Bethsaida).

The Jesus movement accelerated rapidly. In the early stages of his ministry a great company of disciples attached themselves to Jesus (Lk 6:17; 10:1; Jn 6:60). Jesus appealed to the multitude of people and a groundswell of followers came after him to become his disciples. But the early company of disciples was apparently a mixed sort. In John's Gospel there is a unique record of disciples who had followed Jesus for some period of time, but after a discourse by Jesus which they found particularly hard to accept (cf. Jn 6:60), John writes, "As a result of this many of his disciples were going away to the things they left behind, and were no longer walking with him" (Jn 6:66). The expressions "going away to the things left behind" and "no longer walking with him" mark the return of these disciples to their old lives before they had begun to follow Jesus. In John's usage the expressions indicate that these disciples were following Jesus because he was an exciting new miracle worker* and teacher (cf. Jn 2:23-25). They had made some kind of a commitment to Jesus, but when his teaching did not conform to their expectations they left him. They were only loosely attached to the movement.

2.2. The Disciples and the Crowds. Two groups were in attendance for much of Jesus' ministry: the disciples and the "crowds," or "multitudes" (hoi ochloi; see People, Crowd). The disciples were those who obeyed Jesus' call to follow him. The crowds were those to whom Jesus continued to offer a call. The crowds were basically a neutral though curious group who were not attached in any serious way to Jesus. Although they followed Jesus (Mt 4:25), the crowds did not exhibit the twin prerequisites of discipleship*: paying the cost and committing themselves to the cause. They followed only in a physical sense, never in the truest sense of devoting themselves to following Jesus. They were the people of Israel of Jesus’ day who were the object of Jesus' evangelistic ministry. They flocked to him for healing* (Mt 15:29-31) and teaching (Mt 5:28-29), but could not understand (Mt 13:10-17) because they were not true believers. At different times they were either positively or negatively oriented toward him. They were amazed at his teaching (Mt 7:28; 21:9-10) and shouted "Hosanna!" at his entry into Jerusalem, but at other times laughed at him (Mt 9:23-25), came to arrest him (Mt 26:47), were led astray by the chief priests (see Priest Priesthood) and elders* (Mt 27:20) and in the end accepted responsibility for his death (Mt 27:24; see Death of Jesus).

The objective of Jesus’ ministry among the crowd was to make them disciples. As he taught and preached to them, individuals were moved to faith and began to serve Jesus as Lord (Mt 8:18-21; 17:14-15; 19:16-22). Out of this neutral group referred to as the "crowd" came both disciples and opponents of Jesus. Making disciples from among the crowd was the object of Jesus' ministry in Israel (Mt 9:35-38), and the worldwide commission he gave to his disciples before he ascended was for them to make disciples of the nations (Mt 28:18).

2.3. The Twelve Disciples and Other Disciples. The four Evangelists witness that in the midst of the ebb and flow of the popularity of the Jesus movement a core of twelve disciples were called by Jesus. Modern scholarship is widely agreed that Matthew and Mark (at least from Mk 3:13 par. Mt. 10:1) generally identify the terms disciple and the Twelve with one another (e.g., Meye, Luz), though not to the extent of implying that the term "disciple" should be limited to the Twelve (contra Strecker). Mark gives evidence of disciples outside the circle of the Twelve (Hengel), and Matthew specifically speaks of them (Mt 8:19, 21) and alludes to a wider circle of disciples (Mt 10:24-25, 42), even acknowledging through the verb mathēteuō the discipleship of Joseph of Arimathea (Mt 27:57; Przybylski, 109; see Burial of Jesus). Matthew and Mark have literary and theological purposes for generally identifying the disciples and the Twelve, but they are in agreement with Luke and John who more clearly speak of other disciples of Jesus. Luke seems to indicate that Jesus chose the Twelve from among a much larger number of disciples (cf. Lk 6:13,17).
"Following Jesus" is a technical expression for going after him as his disciple. Some disciples physically followed Jesus in his itinerant ministry (e.g., the Twelve), while a wider group of disciples followed Jesus in a more figurative sense (e.g., Joseph of Arimathea, Jn 19:38). Following Jesus meant togetherness with him while traveling on the Way, but that following could be manifested in either a physical or figurative sense. The difference between the Twelve and the broader group of disciples is the role to which they were called. The Twelve were called to be coworkers with Jesus, and leaving all to follow Jesus was a necessary sacrifice in order to join with him in the proclamation of the kingdom (cf. Mt 10:1-15) and train for their future role in the church* (cf. Mt 19:23-30).

2.4. The Women Who Followed Jesus. The Gospels and Acts give prominent place to various women who were disciples of Jesus. These women were part of the wider group of disciples around Jesus, but some of them physically accompanied Jesus during his itinerancy. Luke tells of a preaching tour through Galilee during which Jesus and the Twelve "with him" were accompanied by several women who had been healed by Jesus and were now contributing to the support of Jesus and the Twelve (Lk 8:1-3). While parallels can be found for women* supporting rabbis* and their disciples out of their own money, property or foodstuffs, the wording in Luke 8 indicates that these women were themselves disciples of Jesus (e.g., "with him" [syn autō] expresses discipleship in Luke's Gospel and seems in this case to apply to the women; cf. Lk 8:38; 9:18; 22:56). Women disciples of a great master was an unusual occurrence in Palestine of the first century, as even the early disciples' reaction to Jesus' interaction with the Samaritan* woman reveals (Jn 4:27), yet these women exhibited the twin characteristics of Jesus' disciples—they had paid the cost and were committed to him. This same group of women followed Jesus up to Jerusalem, attended the crucifixion and were the first ones to arrive at the empty tomb (Lk 23:49, 55; 24:9; see Resurrection).

Later, in the book of Acts, we find many women who had significant roles in the early church. Luke uses the feminine form of the word for disciple [mathētria, Acts 9:36] in a casual way, so indicating that women believers were commonly called "disciples."

3. The Twelve.

The four Gospels unanimously testify to the core of Twelve who were called by Jesus into a special relationship with him. Although the Twelve are disciples, examples of what it means to be a believer in Jesus, they also are designated as "apostles."* In the introduction to the list of the Twelve, Luke states that Jesus "called his disciples to him, and chose twelve of them, whom he also named apostles" (Lk 6:13). This is a clue to the role of the Twelve: not only are they Jesus' disciples (committed followers), but they are also in training to be his apostles (commissioned representatives). Although Acts and the Pauline letters evidence more specific uses of the term "apostle," both "apos-de" and "disciple" are applied to the Twelve in the Gospels. As "disciples" the Twelve are set aside as the examples of what Jesus accomplishes in his followers; as apostles the Twelve are set aside as the leaders within the new movement to come, the church.* (See Discipleship).

The chart on page 179 lists the Twelve as they are found in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

The Twelve displayed a remarkable diversity in background, including businessmen (Peter, Andrew, James and John), a tax collector (Matthew; see Taxes), and a zealous revolutionary (Simon the Zealot).

Within the Twelve is a recognizable division of groups of four. The first name of each of the groups remains the same in all of the lists (the first, fifth and ninth place is occupied, respectively, by Peter, Philip and James of Alphaeus). The order of the names within the groups varies, except for the first name. The sequence of the groups is the same in each list. This grouping suggests that the Twelve were organized into smaller units, each with a leader.

The first group is composed of those two pairs of brothers who were the first called—Peter, Andrew, James and John (Mt 4:18-22 par.), commonly called the "inner circle." This inner circle accompanied Jesus on special occasions such as the healing of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5:37 par.) and the Transfiguration* (Mk 9:2 par.); they were the audience of the Olivet Discourse (Mk 13:3; see Apocalyptic Teaching) and were with Jesus during his agony in the Garden of Gethsemane* (Mt 26:37 par.).

The Twelve are normally mentioned as a group, with only occasional focus on individuals. Peter is the most familiar of the apostles to NT readers, with his name mentioned 210 times in the NT. The name of Paul is mentioned 162 times. The combined appearances of the names of all the other apostles totals only 142 times. Not much is known about the individual lives of the Twelve except what can be gathered from the scant biblical data and from some statements of the early church fathers.

The Twelve as they are found in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Simon, called Peter, first</td>
<td>Simon, named Peter</td>
<td>Simon, named Peter</td>
<td>Peter</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Andrew, brother of Peter</td>
<td>James son of Zebedee</td>
<td>Andrew, brother of Peter</td>
<td>John</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>James son of Zebedee</td>
<td>John, brother of James</td>
<td>James</td>
<td>James</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John, brother of James</td>
<td>Andrew</td>
<td>John</td>
<td>Andrew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philip</td>
<td>Philip</td>
<td>Philip</td>
<td>Philip</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bartholomew</td>
<td>Bartholomew</td>
<td>Bartholomew</td>
<td>Thomas</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thomas</td>
<td>Matthew</td>
<td>Matthew</td>
<td>Bartholomew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Matthew the tax collector</td>
<td>Thomas</td>
<td>Thomas</td>
<td>Matthew</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>James son of Alphaeus</td>
<td>James son of Alphaeus</td>
<td>James son of Alphaeus</td>
<td>James son of Alphaeus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thaddaeus (or Lebbaeus)</td>
<td>Thaddaeus</td>
<td>Simon, called the Zealot</td>
<td>Simon the Zealot</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Simon the Cananean</td>
<td>Simon the Cananean</td>
<td>Judas son of James</td>
<td>Judas son of James</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Judas Iscariot the betrayer</td>
<td>Judas Iscariot the betrayer</td>
<td>Judas Iscariot the betrayer</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

3.1. Simon Peter. Simon, later called Peter, was a native of Galilee, where he grew up making his living as a fisherman along with his father and his brother, Andrew. After being called to follow Jesus, Peter soon became the most prominent of the disciples. Peter occurs first in all of the lists, indicating his place of leadership within the Twelve. In the Gospels he regularly functions as the spokesman for the Twelve (e.g., Mt 14:28; 15:15; 18:21; 26:35, 40; Mk 8:29; 9:5; 10:28; Jn 6:68), and during the days of the early church Peter fulfilled Jesus' prediction that he would play a foundational role as the rock of the church and holder of the keys of the kingdom of heaven (Mt 16:17-19; cf. Acts 1:8; 2:14-41; 8:14-25; 10:34-48). Peter is called "first" (e.g., Mt 10:2) in the sense that he was first among equals (primus inter pares) as the leader of the Twelve. (See Discipleship.)

3.2. Andrew. Andrew is best known as the brother of Simon Peter. Originally a disciple of John the Baptist, Andrew is the first follower of Jesus to be identified by name. He immediately went to tell his brother Peter about Jesus (cf. Jn. 1:35-42). Later he and Peter left their fishing business to follow Jesus in his earthly ministry, and he became part of the inner circle around Jesus (Mk 1:16 and par.; 1:29; 13:3). It was Andrew who brought to Jesus the boy with the loaves and fishes in John's account of the feeding of the five thousand (Jn 6:8: see Miracles and Miracle Stories), and, again in John, Andrew with Philip brought the inquisitive Greeks to Jesus (Jn 12:22).

3.3. James and John (Sons of Zebedee). James and John, the sons of Zebedee, were also from Bethsaida. They were from a family of some wealth (see Rich and Poor) and influence, probably derived from a profitable fishing trade (cf. Mk 1:20; Lk 5:10; Jn 18:15). They were called "the sons of thunder" (Mk 3:17), quite likely because of their fiery temperament (Mk 9:38-41; Lk 9:51-54), which may explain their aggressive ambition (Mk 10:35-45; as well as their mother's, Mt 20:20-21). James and John, along with Peter and Andrew (all fishing partners, cf. Lk 5:10), were called to follow Jesus in his earthly ministry (Mk 1:19-20 par.) and became part of the inner circle around Jesus. James is distinguished as the first apostolic martyr, a victim of the sword during the persecution undertaken by Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:2).

An unnamed disciple of Jesus, known as "one of the disciples, whom Jesus loved," is referred to only in John's Gospel (Jn 13:23; 19:26-27; 20:2; 21:7, 20; 21:4 [possibly 1:40, 18:15 and 19:35]), and is also said to be connected with the authorship of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 21:20-24). Proposals for the identity of the beloved disciple include: (1) he was not a real person but a symbolic figure; (2) Lazarus; (3) John Mark; (4) an unknown Jerusalem disciple of Jesus connected with the high priest; (5) the apostle John, the son of Zebedee; (6) disciples of the apostle John; and (7) an unnamed woman disciple of Jesus. Notwithstanding vigorous scholarly support for the competing proposals, the internal evidence from the Fourth Gospel (particularly those disciples close to Jesus in the scenes in which he appears), plus the external evidence from early church fathers such as Irenaeus (Han. III.1.1) and Polycrates (cited in Eusebius Hist. Eul. III.31.3; also V.24.2-3) weigh most heavily in favor of the apostle John, the son of Zebedee, as being the "beloved disciple."

"The Beloved Disciple" is the only one of the Twelve recorded to have witnessed the crucifixion, along with several women disciples. After the crucifixion he took Jesus' mother into his own home (Jn 19:25-27). He was the first of the Twelve to see the empty tomb and was one of the early leaders of the church, one of those recognized by Paul as a "pillar of the church" (Gal 2:9).

3.4. Philip. Philip was also from Bethsaida. He appears to have been a disciple of John the Baptist before Jesus called him (Jn 1:43-44). Philip and Andrew often occur together in the listings of the Twelve (Mk 3:18; Acts 1:13—the only two Greek names) and in the rare incidents in which they are mentioned by name (Jn 6:8; 12:22). In John he is depicted as having a clear understanding of OT expectations concerning Messiah as well as a missionary heart (Jn 1:43-46; 12:21-22), yet he also exhibited defective spiritual insight (Jn 6:5-7; 14:7-9).

3.5. Bartholomew. Bartholomew appears in all four lists of the twelve disciples, but he is otherwise unmentioned in the NT. From the ninth century onward Bartholomew has been frequently identified with Nathanael. This is based on the conjecture that Nathanael's surname was Bartholomew, so that his full name would have been Nathanael Bar-Tholami. Since the Synoptic Gospels never mention Nathanael, while John never mentions Bartholomew, the juxtaposition of the names Philip and Bartholomew in the Synoptic lists of the Twelve (not in the list in Acts) suggests the close relationship between Philip and Nathanael depicted in John 1:43-51. All of Nathanael's companions are apostles (Jn 1:35-51), he appears as a member of a group of apostles (Jn 21:1-2) and Christ's promise to him suggests an apostolic function (Jn 1:50-1).

If the identification of Bartholomew with Nathanael is correct, Philip brought Bartholomew (Nathanael), a native of Cana of Galilee (Jn 21:2), to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah (Jn 1:45-46). A true Israelite, without guile, Nathanael gave a profound declaration of the messianic identity of Jesus. Jesus, in turn, stated that Nathanael would see even greater demonstrations of messianism (Jn 1:47-51).

If the identification of Bartholomew with Nathanael is incorrect, then we have no other NT information about Bartholomew other than the four lists.

3.6. Thomas. Thomas the "twin" (didymus; Jn 11:16; 20:24; 21:2), known popularly as "doubting Thomas" because of his misgivings concerning Jesus' resurrection (Jn 20:24) and his imperception of Jesus' destiny (Jn 14:5), is otherwise portrayed in the Gospels as a strong figure. His courage stands out when he urges the other disciples to travel with Jesus to Judea so that they might die with him (Jn 11:16). His faithfulness is revealed when he gathers with some of the other disciples in Galilee after the resurrection (Jn 21:2), and his spiritual insight is demonstrated in his confession of Jesus as Lord* and God* (Jn 20:28), one of the most profound declarations of Jesus' deity in the NT.

3.7. Matthew. Matthew, while employed as a tax collector, was called to follow Jesus (Mt 9:9). When recounting the call Mark and Luke refer to him as Levi, suggesting that this tax collector had two names, Matthew Levi, originating either from birth or from the time of his conversion. His tax collector’s booth was probably located on one of the main trade highways near Capernaum, where he collected tolls for Herod Antipas from the commercial traffic traveling through this area (see Taxes). After his call Matthew immediately followed Jesus and arranged a banquet for him at his home (see Table Fellowship), to which were invited a large crowd of tax collectors and sinners* (Lk 5:29-30). Little else is known of Matthew Levi, except for the widely attested tradition from the second century on that he was the author of the Gospel according to Matthew (see Matthew, Gospel According to).

3.8. James (Son of Alphaeus). Apart from his name appearing in the four NT lists, James the son of Alphaeus is otherwise unmentioned. He is usually identified with "James the younger," the son of Mary and the brother of Joses (Mk 15:40; cf. Mt 27:56). If so, the designation "younger or less" (Gk ho mikros) distinguishes him from James the brother of Jesus and James the son of Zebedee, referring to his younger age, smaller stature or lesser renown. His mother, Mary, was in attendance at the crucifixion and the discovery of the empty tomb (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40; 16:1; Lk 24:10).

3.9. Thaddaeus/Judas of James. Thaddaeus (some texts have Lebbaeus, or conflations) is mentioned in the third group of disciples by Matthew (Mt 10:3) and Mark (Mk 3:18), while Luke refers to "Judas the son of James" (lit Judas of James) in his two lists (Lk 6:16; Acts 1:13). The uniformity of the rest of the names from list to list assures us that these names refer to the same person. Judas is probably the given name and Thaddaeus is a nickname or place name. The NT records only one incident about this person: his question to Jesus during the message to the disciples after the Last Supper* (Jn 14:22).

3.10. Simon the Zealot. In addition to Simon Peter there was a disciple known as Simon the Cananaean (Mt 10:4; Mk 3:18; a Greek transliteration of the Aramaic word for "zeal" or "zealot" [qan'ānā']) or Simon the Zealot (Lk 6:15; Acts 1:13). The expression indicates that this Simon was a zealous nationalist prior to his call to follow Jesus, and may indicate some of his ongoing temperament. Later, the term zealot was used to designate the religiously motivated Jewish revolutionaries who were active in guerilla-type warfare in the period leading up to A.D. 70 and the destruction of Jerusalem (see Revolutionary Movements).
3.11. Judas Iscariot. "Iscariot" most likely identifies this Judas's place of origin, especially since his father is described as "Simon Iscariot" (Jn 6:71; 13:2, 26). Judas Iscariot* was the treasurer for the apostolic band (Jn 12:4-6; 13:29). Since this office was not usually given to one known to be greedy and irresponsible, we may assume that he displayed positive characteristics recognizable by the others. However, John tells us that during his time as treasurer Judas had become a thief, pilfering from the treasury funds (Jn 12:6).

The event for which Judas is best known is his betrayal of Jesus. Both Luke and John portray him as under the direction of Satan (Lk 22:3; Jn 13:2; see Demon, Devil, Satan). His greed, which prompted him to steal (Jn 12:4-6), may have motivated him to betray Jesus for the paltry amount of thirty pieces of silver, possibly only a partial payment of the agreed-on sum (Mt 26:14-6; Mk 14:10-11; Lk 22:3-6). The treacherous act which took place at the Last Supper apparently came as a surprise to all except Jesus (Mt 26:20-25; Mk 14:17-21). Securing a band of soldiers from the chief priests and Pharisees (Jn 18:3), Judas led them to where Jesus was alone with the disciples in the Garden of Gethsemane, away from the crowds, and kissed Jesus to identify him for the soldiers (Mt 26:47-56; Mk 14:43-52; Lk 22:47-53; Jn 18:2-12).

When Jesus was officially condemned to death, Judas was filled with remorse and returned the pieces of silver to the priests, who used the blood money to purchase a burial plot for strangers. Then Judas went and committed suicide (cf. Mt 27:3-10; Acts 1:18-19). After Jesus' ascension Judas was replaced in the circle of the Twelve by Matthias, about whom nothing else is known (Acts 1:26).

4. The Early Church.

The term mathētēs is used regularly in Luke-Acts to designate the person who has placed his faith in Jesus Christ. In Luke 6:13, 17 reference is made to a great multitude of disciples. These disciples of Jesus were convinced believers in Jesus' messiahship and are set in contrast with the "great throng of people" (v. 17) who could be termed "the curious." This can be compared with Luke's usage of mathētēs in Acts, where he speaks of the multitude of believers (Acts 4:32) and the multitude of "disciples" (Acts 6:2). In Luke's writings the expressions "those who believe" and "the disciples" signify the same group of people (cf. Acts 6:7; 9:26; 11:26; 14:21-22). As Acts records, by the time of the early church the term disciple had become synonymous with the true believer—all those who confessed Jesus as Messiah—or, as they were first called at Antioch, "Christians" (Christianoi, Acts 11:26).

See also Apostle; Discipleship; Judas Iscariot.

M.J. Wilkins

DISCIPLESHIP

The scene of disciples* following Jesus around during his earthly ministry dominates the Gospel* panorama. That vision of discipleship demands our attention, both on an historical as well as a personal level. Discipleship can be narrowly understood in terms of the historical master-disciple relationship (see Disciples). It can also be understood more broadly as Christian experience, and what that way of life entails. To understand fully the Gospel portrait of discipleship, one must keep in view (1) the moment within the ministry of Jesus in which the challenge of discipleship is given to and lived out by the disciples, and (2) the moment within the church's* life when the would-be disciple is tested.

Our purpose is first to study the four Gospel records of Jesus and his disciples in order to appreciate the unique perspective of discipleship intended by each evangelist for his community. Then the Gospel records will be viewed together in order to gain the broadest perspective of Jesus' form of discipleship. In this way the view of Jesus and his historical disciples will be clarified, and the call of discipleship to the church heard more distinctly.

1. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers
2. Jesus' Form of Discipleship

1. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers.

1.1. Matthew: Examples with a Commission. Matthew views the disciples of Jesus from alternating perspectives. At times he specifies that the disciples are with Jesus, while parallel passages in Mark and Luke do not (9:19). In other instances he excludes them from those who are accompanying Jesus while the Synoptic parallels portray them as present (12:15). At times Matthew purposely projects a very positive picture of the disciples by including the term "disciples" when it is absent in the parallels (12:49), but at other times he includes the term in such a way that the disciples are singled out for negative associations not specified in the parallels (26:56). At times Matthew omits reference to the disciples sharing guilt with Peter (16:23), yet on other occasions they are specified as sharing in his guilt (14:31). At times it appears that Matthew purposely carries forward the traditional association of the disciples with the apostolic title "the Twelve" (10:1), but on other occasions he implies a wider circle of disciples (8:21; 27:57).

1.1.1. Understanding Jesus' Teaching. Matthew has arranged his disciple material to accentuate Jesus as the effective teacher* of his disciples. Each of the major discourses is primarily directed to the disciples (5:1; 10:1; 13:10, 36; 18:1; 23:1; 24:1-3), and teaching segments are often transformed into explicit discipleship-teaching pericopae by including the term "disciple" (8:21, 23; 9:27; 10:42; 12:49; 13:10; 15:23; 16:5; 17:6; 17:10; 18:1; 19:10; 21:20; 24:3; 26:8, 40, 45). On at least three occasions the teaching of Jesus leads to an explicit statement that the disciples understand (16:12; 17:13; 13:52), whereas Mark says that the disciples do not understand (cf. Mk 6:52; 8:21; 9:10, 32). Some scholars take this contrast between the understanding of the disciples in Matthew and the lack of understanding in Mark to mean that Matthew has idealized the disciples by omitting or toning down anything derogatory about them. On the contrary, although he does not focus on the disciples' failure (e.g., 8:25; 13:16; 14:23), Matthew explicitly tells of their deficient faith* (14:31; 16:8, 22-23; 17:20) and does in fact present negative aspects of the disciples (e.g., 26:8, 56). Instead of idealizing, the theme of the disciples' understanding accentuates Jesus' teaching and his role as an effective teacher.

1.1.2. Examples of Christian Existence. Matthew has not intended the disciples to be an idealistic paradigm. He shows both positive and negative traits. The positive aspect, which is especially present in the discipleship teachings, shows what will happen to true disciples who fully obey and follow Jesus. The negative traits show what can happen to disciples who do not identify with Jesus in his obedience to the will of the Father (e.g., they stumble, 16:23; flee, 26:56; fall asleep, 26:40, 45; and act in brash boldness, 26:35). Portrayed both positively and negatively (15:23; 16:5-12; 17:6-7; 16:19; 19:13-15), the disciples become examples of imperfect followers of Jesus who are taught and who advance to understanding and solidarity with Jesus. And, as an example for Matthew's church, they provide a very practical and realistic display of what it means to be called a disciple (28:16,18).

1.1.3. With Jesus or against Him. Three groups—Jesus' disciples, the crowds (see People, Crowd) and the Jewish leaders—provide a background for Matthew's story of Jesus. The Jewish leaders are the antagonists, the ones responsible for Jesus' crucifixion (see Death of Jesus). The crowds are a basically neutral group who are the object of Jesus' ministry of preaching, teaching and healing,* but as a group they do not exercise faith in him. Although some scholars suggest that the disciples are pictured in relationship to the crowds as true versus false believers in the church, or idealized believers who rise above the masses in the church, or the priestly class in the church serving the lay people, Matthew pictures the disciples as Jesus' true followers, true believers and the crowds as the mass of people who are the object of Jesus' saving ministry. Jesus' objective amidst the crowd is to make them disciples. The sign of faith is their departure from the crowd and calling Jesus "Lord" (8:18-21; 17:14-5; 19:16-22).
From Matthew's perspective the disciples are "with" Jesus, the Jewish leaders are "against" Jesus and the crowds must make a decision to be either with him or against him (cf. 12:30; Mk 9:40; Lk 9:50—the saying in Matthew is more restrictive). At first the crowds are amazed at Jesus' teaching (7:28-29) and miracles* (9:8), and receive Jesus' compassionate attention (9:35-38; 14:13-14), apparently siding with Jesus. But they increasingly demonstrate hardness of heart (cf. 13:2-3; 10-17; 34-36; set Hardness of Heart), until at the end the Jewish leaders persuade the crowds to ask for the death of Jesus (27:15-25). Only the disciples are "with" Jesus as his followers after the resurrection. *

The crowds of Israel* had their opportunity to become disciples during Jesus' earthly mission (9:35—10:15; 14:14-19; 15:29-36). After his resurrection Jesus sends the disciples to the larger crowd, the nations, to make disciples of them (28:16-20; see Gentile).

1.1.4. Simon Peter. Since the disciples function in Matthew's Gospel as an example—both positive and negative—of what it means to be a disciple, the portrait of Simon Peter in Matthew's Gospel provides a personalized example of discipleship for Matthew's church. The focus in Matthew is on Jesus who calls, instructs and sends out disciples to make more of what he has made them to be. But Matthew presents the disciples as a nameless, faceless, collective unity. Peter stands out in sharp relief against this backdrop of anonymity, being the only named disciple to become the focus of special attention. He functions as an example much like the disciples do as a group. In his strengths and in his weaknesses he can be an example to Matthew's church; so Matthew accentuates the truly human element in Peter. The church would find much in common with Peter's typically human characteristics. In his likeness to ordinary believers with their highs and lows, he provides a means for instructing the church in the path of discipleship.

Peter likewise serves this function for the leaders of Matthew's church. In his success and failure as a leader, Peter provides an instructive case study for the leadership of Matthew's church. In several instances the questions and responses Peter voices to Jesus on behalf of the disciples were issues that still spoke to the church of Matthew's day (e.g., 15:15; 17:24-25; 18:21). As Jesus instructs Peter, instruction is provided for the church. The focus is on Jesus, who promised to Peter, "I will build my church" and who had called him, corrected him and instructed him. As Jesus worked with and through Peter, so he would with the church.
1.1.5. A Manual on Discipleship. Matthew's Gospel is, at least in part, a manual on discipleship. In the process of handing on his tradition concerning the disciples, Matthew exalts Jesus as the supreme Lord* and teacher of the historical disciples and the post-resurrection community. Although the disciples are susceptible to incomprehension (as in Mark), Matthew emphasizes that Jesus' teaching brings understanding. A number of factors point to Matthew's intention to provide in his Gospel resources for discipleship: (1) the major discourses are directed at least in pan to the disciples; (2) most of the sayings directed to the disciples are in fact teaching on discipleship; (3) the disciples are portrayed in a positive yet realistic light; and (4) the disciples are called, trained and commissioned to carry out their climactic mandate to "make disciples" (28:19). The goal of the believer's life of faith is made clear, and the disciple is outfitted to make more disciples.

1.2. Mark Servants of the Redemptive Servant.

1.2.1. Conflicting Profiles. Because Mark reveals such conflicting profiles of the disciples, Mark's portrait of them is perhaps the most ambiguous among the Gospel accounts. On the one hand, the disciples receive a positive portrayal when they are introduced as being specially selected and commissioned with authority* by Jesus (1:16-20; 3:13-19) to hear the secrets of the kingdom (4:10-12; see Kingdom of God) and to promote his ministry (3:14-15; 6:7-13, 35). Empowered by Jesus for ministry in Israel, the disciples do as Jesus does: they preach, heal and exorcise demons (see Demon, Devil, Satan). On the other hand, the disciples are painted in unflattering colors when, despite their enlightenment by God and empowerment by Jesus, they are shown to be uncomprehending. They do not understand Jesus' parabolic teaching (4:13; 7:17-18; see Parable), do not grasp Jesus' true identity as the Son of God (see Son of God) who calms the seas (4:35-41; 6:45-52) and do not perceive Jesus' Potential to feed the multitudes miraculously (6:34-44: 8:1-10). More critically, the disciples do not truly comprehend the nature of Jesus' ministry or teaching (8:14-21), which in essence involves the way to the cross (8:31-33; 9:30-32) through servanthood (10:32-45; see Service). This incomprehension eventually leads Judas to betray him (14:43-46), the disciples to forsake him (14:50) and Peter to deny him (14:54, 66-72).

What does Mark intend in portraying the disciple in this manner? Some understand Mark's motives to be polemical (e.g., J. Tyson; T. J. Weeden; E. Trocmé, W. H. Kelber): the disciples are literary figures who represent a faction of the church against which the Evangelist engages in polemic. The incomprehension of the disciples is evidence that they are opposed to Jesus and his program. Mark's church is to recognize the failings of the disciples and be warned of their opponents within the church. But a more nuanced line of interpretation recognizes Mark's intent to be pastoral (e.g., R. Meye, E. Best, E. Focant, F. Matera): The evangelist employs the obtuseness of the disciples to instruct his community about the meaning of authentic discipleship. Although Mark has the highest regard for the disciples, he uses their failures to instruct his community. Thus Mark deals with a fact of history: during Jesus' earthly life the disciples did not completely understand him. Mark uses the historical disciples to show his readers how difficult it is to grasp the mystery of Jesus and the cross. Those passages which stress the incomprehension of the disciples instruct Mark's church about the necessity of "thinking God's thoughts rather than human thoughts" (e.g., 8:33). The resurrection scene provides fulfillment of Jesus' predictions (9:9; 14:28) and obligates the reader to project a reconciliation of the disciples and Peter with Jesus, since they will see him in Galilee* just as he told them (16:7). The summons to Galilee provides the assurance that Peter and the disciples, in spite of denying and forsaking Jesus, have not been rejected by the risen Lord.

1.2.2. Servanthood. Mark introduces his Gospel as "the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." Through the development of his plot Mark contrasts two fundamentally opposing points of view concerning his Gospel (see Gospel [Good News]) message: "thinking the things of God" and "thinking the things of humankind" (cf. 8:33). The disciples' response to Jesus is a major portion of the plot. The disciples had been specially called to follow Jesus and respond to him as the one effectively proclaiming the "gospel of God." They were given the mystery of the kingdom; they experienced in their own lives God's redeeming activity. Privy to special instruction, they were even empowered to act in Jesus' name to preach the gospel, to heal, to exorcise and to teach. Yet they misunderstood. They became confused and afraid. When adversity set in, the disciples reflected little faith and much hardness of heart. This confusion ate away at their fundamental perception of who Jesus was, as well as the implications of Jesus' identity for the life of discipleship (Guelich).

Although Jesus has come as God's promised, Spirit-anointed, royal Son to herald and inaugurate the kingdom, Mark writes to correct those who would look to the glory of the final consummation of the kingdom instead of its vulnerable beginnings. The kingdom is here in hidden fashion, and Jesus the Messiah (see Christ), Son of God (1:1), must be understood in terms of suffering and the cross (8:31-33; 9:30-32; 10:32-34; see Predictions of Jesus' Death and Resurrection). The pivotal pronouncement of servanthood in Mark 10:45 (see Ransom Saying) declares the essence of Jesus' ministry. By comprehending this, the disciples will comprehend the essence of discipleship as servanthood, including their motivation, position, ambition, expectations and example (note the crucial placement of the servanthood passages at 9:33-37 and 10:35-45, within the larger discipleship section of 8:27—10:45). The disciple who is privileged to be a member of Jesus' kingdom is a servant, which means thinking God's thoughts (8:31-33), pursuing the life of the cross (8:34-38) through the message (9:1-8) and example of Jesus (9:9-32) and, hence, rejecting status (9:33-37), exclusivism (9:38—10:16) and the treasures of this world (10:17-31). The disciples in Mark's Gospel are privileged members of the kingdom of God, and their incomprehension comes from their worldly expectations. Discipleship instruction directs them to think God's way, the way of suffering and the cross through servanthood.

1.3.1. Lukan Distinctives. Detecting the Lukan understanding of discipleship requires taking into consideration literary usage in both the Gospel and Acts, as well as comparing Luke's Gospel with the other Synoptics.

In Acts disciple (6:1-2, 7; 9:10, 26; 11:26; 14:21-22; 15:10; 16:1) is used as a synonym for believers in Christ (cf. "believers," 4:32; "disciples," 6:2). Disciples were all those who confessed Jesus as Messiah. The term is employed as a synonym for "Christians" (11:26; 26:28), "saints" (9:13, 32, 41) and "Nazarenes" (24:5). The usage in Luke's Gospel foreshadows that in Acts (Lk 6:13; 8:9; 9:54; 10:23; 11:1; 14:26; 19:37,39). The great multitude of disciples in Luke 6:13, 17 is distinguished from the "great throng of people" (6:17). In contrast with the crowds, who could be termed "the curious," the disciples were convinced believers in Jesus.

The picture of the disciples in Luke's Gospel bears many similarities to those found in Matthew and Mark, but differences occur as well. The most notable differences are: (1) the accounts of the calling of Jesus' first followers (5:1-11; Mk 2:16-18; Mt 4:18-22); (2) mention of a large number of disciples never encountered in Matthew or Mark (6:13, 17, 19; 19:37-39); (3) Jesus sending out not only the Twelve (cf. 9:1-6; Mk 6:6-13; Mt 10:5-15) but also Seventy(-two)
1.3.2. Followers on the Way. Following Jesus is synonymous with discipleship, but Luke depicts the phenomenon in a unique manner: the disciples of Jesus are followers on the Way. Luke's geographical perspective, with Jerusalem at the center, concentrates on Jesus as he journeys the road to Jerusalem for the passion (9:51; see Passion Narrative) with the disciples traveling along with him (9:57). For Luke, salvation itself is "the way" (hē hodos), a pattern of life revealed by God. This idea of salvation* as a "way" leads in time to calling the Christian community "the Way" (Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22), an early designation or title for the organized community of disciples, which eventually is known as "the church." From the Lukan perspective, disciples must enter into and stride along that Way in the footsteps of their Master.

1.3.3. Entrance to the Way. Both in his Gospel and the Acts Luke emphasizes that entrance into the Way of salvation and discipleship is found through faith alone (7:50; 8:48; 17:19; cf. Acts 10:43; 13:38-39; 16:31). More so than the other Evangelists, Luke stresses that true faith is characterized by "counting the cost," both positively and negatively, of what the life of discipleship entails. To count the cost negatively means to recognize that one enters into the life of discipleship through detachment from all other allegiances and through giving total allegiance to Jesus as Master. A key passage is Luke 14:25-33, where Jesus addresses the crowds about the conditions of entrance into discipleship. The crowds have not yet begun to follow Jesus and, before they make a commitment, Jesus tells them that they must count the cost Nothing else may pre-empt the disciple's focus of allegiance on Jesus: neither family* (14:26), nor wealth (12:13-21; 16:10-13, 14-16, 19-31; see Rich and Poor), nor one's own life* (14:26) nor anything at all (14:33). Entrance into the way of discipleship means entering the narrow gate to salvation (13:22-30) to follow after Jesus alone (14:27; 9:23).

To count the cost positively means to recognize that love for God—undivided loyalty to him—is at the center of faith. A key passage is Luke 10:25-37, where a lawyer came to Jesus asking about obtaining eternal life. The lawyer rightly understood that to obtain eternal life one's heart, soul, mind and strength must be focused on loving God, and that the practical demonstration of love* for God is loving one's neighbor as oneself. Counting the cost in the positive sense means to recognize that love for God and neighbor is the evidence that one has made unqualified commitment to Jesus and his Way.

1.3.4. Traveling along the Way. Discipleship begins upon entering the Way of salvation; it advances as one travels along the Way. Luke specifies that self-denial, taking up the cross and following Jesus not only characterizes entrance into the Way but life on the Way. With the addition of "each day" to the cross-bearing proclamation, the Lukan Jesus calls for daily self-denial, daily bearing one's cross and daily following in the footsteps of the Master (cf. 9:23; Mk 8:34). Life on the Way involves being doers of the Word (11:27-28), because not all who are walking on the Way truly belong to the Way. Public statements of commitment must be judged by the fruit of one's life (6:43-49; 19:11-27). That fruit consists, at least in part, in loving and doing good to others (6:17-36), proper stewardship of material possessions (6:35; 8:3), servanthood (22:24-30), prayer* (10:2; 11:1; 18:1-8) and testimony to the Way (9:1-6; 10:1-12, 17-20; 12:8-12; 14:23-24; 24:44-49).

Luke accents the cost of following Jesus on the Way. When understood within the context of their first century social and religious setting, these demands allow us to see that Jesus was calling for a distinct form of discipleship. Becoming Jesus' disciple was not a vocational change, nor a political attachment, nor even a new stirring of God; it was being faced with the eternal decision of whether one would follow Jesus as the Way to eternal life. Any other attachment, whether familial or religious or economic, was substituting another god for Jesus. Entrance to the Way and life on the Way are both had through following Jesus in discipleship.

1.4. John: Believers Marked by Jesus.

1.4.1 Recognition and Belief. Recent scholarly investigations into the meaning and nature of discipleship from the Johannine perspective have employed a variety of methodologies. But there is a general agreement concerning three fundamental aspects of discipleship within the Johannine community (cf. Segovia).
The central characteristic of the disciple is belief or acceptance of Jesus' claims vis-a-vis the Father. The disciples, particularly the Twelve (6:67, 70; 13:18; 15:16,19; cf. 6:64, 66), are characteristically those who from the beginning recognize, acclaim and believe Jesus for who he truly is (1:41, 45, 49; 6:69; 13:13; 20:28-31; 21:7, 12; cf. 20:31). In John's Gospel "Jesus' disciples" appear for the first time at the beginning of Jesus' public ministry, the wedding at Cana (2:2). After the first of Jesus' signs and the manifestation of his glory* the disciples believed in him. This kind of belief somehow differs in quality from the belief of others who observe his miraculous signs in Jerusalem. Jesus regards their belief as deficient and does not entrust himself to them (2:23-25).

Belief is portrayed as necessitating and undergoing a process of gradual understanding and perception. The disciples' lack complete understanding of "the hour" of Jesus' ministry (2:21-22; 4:27, 33; 6:60; 9:2; 10:6; 11:8, 11-15; 12:16; 13:36; 14:5, 8, 22; 16:17-18), but through Jesus' ministry and teaching (6:67-71; 9:2-7; 11:5-45), the resurrection appearances (20:8-10, 17-18, 19-21) and the reception of the Spirit* (20:19-23), the disciples finally comprehend Jesus' full status as the Son of God.

A sustained and deliberate contrast is drawn between believers and unbelievers, between disciples and non-disciples. The non-disciple, the unbeliever, is a part of the unbelieving "world."* Although by definition the category "world" includes anyone who rejects Jesus' claims, in the Johannine narrative (and Farewell Discourse*) it becomes practically synonymous with that of "the Jews" and thus gives rise to a very specific contrast between the believing disciples and the unbelieving Jews (1:10-11; 3:19; 7:4, 7; 8:23; 12:31; 14:17, 19, 22,27,30-31; 18:36).

1.4.2. Deficient Belief. Among those who observed Jesus' signs and heard his teaching were those who responded with deficient belief. A festival crowd at the beginning of Jesus' ministry observed the signs he performed and believed in him. Yet Jesus would not entrust himself to them (2:23-25), recognizing in them a failure to believe fully. After a discourse which many of his disciples found particularly hard to accept (6:60), Jesus condemned the disciples for their unbelief (6:64). John then writes, "As a result of this many of his disciples were going away to the things they left behind, and were no longer walking with him" (6:66). These disciples apparently were following Jesus because he was an exciting new miracle-worker and teacher and, as in John 2:23-25, Jesus recognized the deficiency of their belief. They had made some kind of a commitment to Jesus, but when his teaching did not conform to their expectations, they left him.

1.4.3. Marks of Belief. Once this group of Jesus' disciples turns away, Simon Peter steps forward to give a clear statement of what it means for the Twelve to follow Jesus: "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life. We believe and know that you are the Holy One of God" (6:68-69). From this point on in John's Gospel the word disciple is used only of those who profess to believe on Jesus for eternal life (see Life). To truly believe is to pass beyond mere curiosity and to become convinced of the truth of Jesus' words for the meaning and purpose of life. Further, John records three sayings of Jesus which test the reality of the belief of the disciples, three marks of belief which will result in the observable life of a disciple. Inner belief will cause such a radical change that the external life will bear evidence of that belief.

The first mark of the true disciple is "abiding in Jesus' word." Although certain Jews believed in Jesus, the ensuing context indicates the nature of their belief: they needed to be set free from sin (cf. 8:32 with 8:33-36), they were seeking to kill him (8:37), their father was the Devil (8:2-44), they were not of God (8:47) and they tried to stone Jesus (8:59). These Jews had deficient faith similar to those encountered in John 2:23-25. True discipleship, true belief, will be evidenced by abiding in Jesus' words. This means passing beyond mere curiosity and becoming convinced of the truth of Jesus' words for the meaning and purpose of life (cf. 6:66-69). The evidence of true belief is seen in disciples who cling to Jesus' word as the truth for every area of life. True disciples are freed through Jesus' liberating word from bondage to sin.

Love for each other, as Jesus has loved them, is the second identifying mark of the true disciple-believer (13:34-35). The love of disciples for each other shows that they are Jesus' disciples and do not belong to the world of humanity. Since the contrast is between the world and disciples, all disciples are included. Love is not proof of superior commitment; love of other disciples is evidence that one is a believer.

The third mark of the disciple is a life that bears fruit Jesus states, "This is to my Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples" (15:8). The true believer-disciple will bear fruit because true life is in the branch (see Vine). The unbeliever will not bear fruit, because branches which have no life cannot bear fruit. Eventually non-fruitbearing branches will be broken off and cast into the fire (15:6)—a picture consistent with other portrayals of the final destiny of unbelievers (see Judgment).

2. Jesus’ Form of Discipleship.

Jesus’ ministry of calling, training and sending out disciples stands as a captivating historical phenomenon. While there have been numerous recent attempts at classifying his ministry according to other types of social/religious movements of the first century (e.g., as a wandering charismatic, Zealot brigand, Cynic philosopher, Qumran/Essene separatist, Jewish rabbi,* apocalyptic* scribe,* Israelite prophet* figure) which have probably revealed some authentic parallel characteristics, Jesus' particular form of discipleship still defies classification. Nonetheless, looking back on the Evangelists' portraits of discipleship, some points become clear.

2.1. Called by Jesus.

2.1.1. Responding to the Call to Life. Although discipleship was a voluntary matter with other types of master-disciple relationships of the first century, with Jesus the initiative lay with his call (Mk 1:17; 2:14; Mt 4:19; 9:9; cf. Lk 5:10-11, 27-28) and his choice (Jn 15:16) of those who would be his disciples. The response to the call involves recognition and belief in Jesus’ identity (Jn 2:11; 6:68-69), obedience to his summons (Mk 1:18, 20) and counting the cost of full allegiance to him (Lk 14:25-28; Mt 19:23-30). His calling is the beginning of something new. It means losing one's old life (Mk 8:34-37; Lk 9:23-25) and finding new life in the family of God through obeying the will of the Father (Mt 12:46-50).

2.1.2. The Group of Disciples. We should distinguish between the disciples in a narrow sense—especially those Twelve who literally followed Jesus around—and a broader group of adherents and sympathizers. The latter was comprised of, among others, the common masses of people (Lk 6:13), a variety of men and women (Lk 8:2-3; 23:49, 55; 24:13, 18, 33), tax collectors (Lk 19:1-10), scribes (Mt 8:18-21) and religious leaders (Jn 19:38-42; Mt 27:57). The term "disciple" designates one as a believer in Jesus; all true believers are disciples (cf. Acts 4:32 with 6:2). The Twelve were distinguished from the larger group by referring to them as "apostles" (Lk 6:13). The Twelve were both disciples by virtue of being believers and apostles because they were commissioned leaders (Mt 10:1-
2.1.3. Counting the Cost. In Jesus' lifetime the call to be a disciple meant to count the cost of allegiance to Jesus; but this took various forms. The Twelve were called to leave all—including family, profession and property—and follow Jesus in his itinerant ministry. This was their training for their future role in the community (cf. Mt 19:23-30). Apparently others besides the Twelve were also called to this itinerancy (cf. Jn 6:66; Lk 8:2-3; 23:49, 55). But while all disciples were called to count the cost of their allegiance (Lk 14:25-33; Mt 8:18-22), leaving everything and following Jesus around was not intended for all (e.g., Mk 5:18-19). Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea apparently became followers of Jesus sometime during his ministry (cf. Jn 3:1-14; 19:38-42), yet they presumably remained within the religious establishment and retained their wealth. When demonstration of their faith and allegiance to Jesus was required, they came forward to claim the body of Jesus (Mt 27:57-60; see Burial of Jesus).

2.1.4. Jesus Breaks through Religious Barriers. Unlike some of the sectarians within Judaism,* Jesus broke through the barriers which separated the clean from the unclean (see Clean and Unclean), the obedient from the sinful. He summoned the fisherman as well as the tax collector (see Taxes) and, in the opinion of some, even a zealous revolutionary (see Revolutionary Movements). A decisive factor is that Jesus called to himself those who, in the eyes of sectarians, did not seem to enjoy the necessary qualifications for fellowship with him (Mt 9:9-13; Mk 2:13-17). In calling the despised to himself, in sitting down to a meal with tax collectors (see Table Fellowship), Jesus demonstrates that they have been adopted into fellowship with God.

2.2. Following Jesus.

2.2.1. Attachment to Jesus. During Jesus' earthly ministry the disciple was to "follow" Jesus, an allegiance to his person which is regarded as the decisive act whether it is a literal or figurative attachment Jewish disciples would follow their master around, often literally imitating him. The goal of Jewish disciples was someday to become masters, or rabbis, themselves and to have their own disciples who would follow them. But Jesus' disciples were to remain disciples of their Master and teacher and to follow him only (cf. Mt 23:1-12). By the time of the Evangelists, the word "disciple" (mathētēs), although still carrying connotations of "learner," generally meant "adherent." Even though it is probable that Jesus' disciples memorized much of his teaching and passed it on as the tradition of the church, the disciples were committed more to his person than to his teaching. Following Jesus means togetherness with him and service to him while traveling on the Way.

2.2.2. Continuing to Count the Cost. Even as entrance to the Way of following Jesus required the would-be disciple to count the cost, so traveling on the Way requires disciples to count the cost (Mk 8:34). The disciples must daily deny themselves, take up the cross and follow Jesus (Lk 9:23). It is possible for one not to be a true part of the Way while externally traveling with Jesus (e.g., Judas). Therefore, the challenge is directed not only to the crowd but also to the disciples (cf. Mk 8:34-9:1; Mt 10:37-39; 16:24-26; Lk 9:23-27).

2.2.3. Becoming Like Jesus. Jesus declared that to be a disciple is to become like the Master (Mt 10:24-25; Lk 6:40). Becoming like Jesus includes going out with the same message, ministry and compassion (Mt 10:5-15), practicing the same religious and social traditions (Mk 2:18-22; Mt 12:1-8), belonging to the same family of obedience (Mt 12:46-49); exercising the same servanthood (Mk 10:42-45, par. Mt 20:26-28; Jn 13:12-17), experiencing the same suffering (Mt 10:16-25; Mk 10:38-39).

2.2.4. Growing in Discipleship. The Evangelists unanimously testify to the imperfections of the disciples, both of the larger group and of the Twelve. At the same time they testify to the growth of the disciples. The Evangelists give a realistic portrayal of good and bad traits in the disciples, yet they also show how Jesus taught them (Mk 4:10-12), corrected them (Mt 16:5-12), admonished them (Mt 17:19-20), supported them (Lk 22:31-34), comforted them (Jn 20:19-22) and restored them (Jn 21:15-19). In turn the disciples could become examples of what Jesus desires to do for the church (Mt 28:19-20). H. Kvalbein correctly declares that "it is basically wrong to think of the 'disciples' as models for some special or 'higher quality' Christians among other Christians." All of those who truly believed were called disciples in Jesus' day, and they are examples of how every Christian today should grow in discipleship.

2.3. Commissioned by Jesus. Through the Great Commission of Matthew 28:16-20 Jesus focuses his followers on the ongoing importance of discipleship through the ages.

2.3.1. Make Disciples. Jesus committed his earthly ministry to "making disciples" within Israel (cf. Jn 4:1), and he commissioned his disciples to "make disciples" among the nations (Mt 28:16-20; see Gentiles). The obvious meaning of "making disciples" is to proclaim the gospel message among those who have not yet received forgiveness of sins (Lk 24:46-47; Jn 20:21; see Forgiveness of Sins). The command finds remarkable verbal fulfillment in the activities of the early church (e.g., Acts 14:21), where disciples went from Jerusalem to Judea, to Samaria (see Samaritans), to the ends of the earth proclaiming the message of Jesus and making disciples. In the early church to believe in the gospel message was to become a disciple (cf. Acts 4.32 with 6:2). The injunction of the Great Commission is given at least to the eleven remaining disciples (cf. Mt 28:16), but in their own role as disciples they are paradigms for all disciples. As Jesus addresses the disciples and commands them to "make disciples of all the nations," Jesus is telling them to continue the work he began with them.

2.3.2. Baptizing and Teaching Disciples to Obey. The imperative (mathêteusate) implies both the call to discipleship and the process of becoming a disciple. Even as men and women are called from among the nations to start life as a disciple, they must in turn "follow" the Lord through baptism* and through obedience to Jesus' teaching. The participles "baptizing" (baptizontes) and "teaching" (didaskontes) describe activities through which the new disciple grows in discipleship. Growth in discipleship includes both identification with Jesus' death and resurrection (baptism) and obedience to all that Jesus had commanded the disciples in his earthly ministry (teaching).

2.3.3. Jesus with His Disciples. Jesus concludes the commission with the crucial element of discipleship: the presence of the Master ("And surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age," Mt 28:20). As the new disciple is baptized and taught to observe all that Jesus commanded, Jesus is present. Both those obeying the command and those responding are comforted by the awareness that the risen Jesus will continue to fashion all his disciples. The Master is always present for his disciples to follow.

See also Apostle; Disciples; Sermon on the Mount.

DIVINE MAN THEIOS ANÈR

In NT scholarship the term Divine Man, or its Greek form Theios Arēr, designates an alleged type of religiophilosophical hero, legendary or historical, which was more or less indigenous to Greece or at least Hellenism and whose representatives were characterized by moral virtue, wisdom and/or miraculous power so that they were held to be divine. As commonly used, the term excludes the traditional Greek gods (except Asclepius, who was believed to have lived a humanlike existence on earth before his death and apotheosis). Rather, it encompasses figures who in spite of their divinity were still regarded as humans.

1. History-of-Religions and Form-Critical Research
2. Scholarly Developments of the Theios Anēr Concept
3. The Ongoing Application of the Theios Anēr in Gospel Criticism
4. Critique

The roots of the Theios Arm as an analytical concept lie in the history-of-religions school of the early twentieth century. To explain the successful spread of various eastern cults in the Hellenistic era, R. Reitzenstein appealed to itinerant prophets whose characteristics of holiness, wisdom, miracle-working power and superhuman status bound them together as a type: the Theios Anthrōpos (Divine Human). The result of such studies was that early Christianity was firmly situated in its larger cultural and religious matrix (see Hellenism).

The early form critics (see Form Criticism) used the Theios Anēr to elucidate the origin and christology of the Gospel miracle stories (see Miracles and Miracle Stories). They argued that most of the miracle stories were formulated, if not created outright, by Gentile Christians in order to magnify and win converts for Jesus, the superior Theios Anēr. (Although the expression Theios Anthrōpos does not occur in the Gospels, or for that matter in the NT, the title Son of God was viewed as its equivalent) From the beginning of the application of the Theios Anēr type to Gospel—and particularly Synoptic—studies, the implications for the historicity of the miracle stories have been very negative.

Aside from the problem generally posed by the so-called nature miracles, it has been frequently maintained that the historicity of most of these accounts is quite doubtful. Not only were they formulated by Gentile Christians removed by time and probably distance from the ministry of Jesus and the life of the earliest Jewish church in Jerusalem, but these same Christians were also under pressure to make Jesus successful in competition with Hellenistic, pagan religious heroes.

In many ways the account of the origin and Sitz im Leben (life setting) of the miracle stories offered by the form-critical school was difficult to contradict. Scholars of comparative religion (e.g., L Bieler) continued to document parallels between the Jesus portrayed in the miracle stories (and in certain other Gospel traditions recounting miraculous events, e.g., birth,* baptism,* transfiguration,* passion and resurrection* narratives) and various divine-human miracle workers of repute in the Hellenistic world, such as Asclepius, Pythagoras and Apollonius of Tyana. Such parallels include types of miraculous actions (e.g., exorcisms,* healings,* raisings from the dead, control of the elements) and motifs appearing in the stories (e.g., ridicule of the miracle worker; a patient's previous unsuccessful attempts to find a cure; miracle performed by touch, words, and/or spittle; and immediate occurrence of the miracle).

In addition, one could show a definite similarity in the form or structure between the Gospel stories and those with so-called Divine Men as their subjects. Repeatedly these stories are constituted by three principal elements: (1) a description of the distress or problem that the miracle worker will rectify, (2) a description of the miracle-producing action and (3) a conclusion, which at least confirms the miracle worker's success.

2. Scholarly Developments of the Theios Anēr Concept

Twentieth-century scholars who have found the Theios Anēr to be a useful analytic category have offered several proposals for its relevance to understanding the Gospels.

2.1. The Hellenistic-Jewish Milieu. Early on, for example, scholars pointed to Diaspora or Hellenistic Judaism as the cultural/religious medium through which the Theios Anēr type came to influence the early church's presentation of Jesus. Hellenistic-Jewish Christians, so the argument runs, found it natural to portray Jesus as a Theios Anēr in their attempt to defend and advance their new faith, since previously they had used precisely the same strategy in their efforts to promote OT heroes, especially Moses. This hypothesis, however, was carefully reviewed by C. Holladay, who analyzed three representatives of Hellenistic Judaism—Josephus, Philo and Artapanus—in order to observe how these authors presented Jewish heroes in their apologetic and propagandists efforts. He concluded that, at least in the sources he studied, there is no evidence that in order to glorify Judaism* or win converts Hellenized Jews tended to divinize their heroes or to amplify their thaumaturgical activities. Holladay's work has forced a major reassessment of the theory that the Theios Anēr concept was mediated to early Christianity via Hellenistic Judaism, and in fact has resulted in dampened enthusiasm for Theios Anēr as an interpretative tool.

2.2. Pre-Canonical Miracle Collections. On another front, there has been significant interest in the question of whether the Gospels made use of written or at least more or less fixed oral collections of miracle stories, and if so whether their christological orientation is appropriately described as Theios Anēr. It is frequently held that behind the Fourth Gospel lies a written collection of Jesus' signs, frequently referred to as the Semeia Source, which originally ended with John 20:30-31 (see John, Gospel of). Partially influenced by this hypothesis, others have suggested that one or more similar collections were incorporated into the earliest Synoptic Gospel, Mark. In the U.S.A, at any rate, scholars have tended to single out the miracles of 4:35—6:44; 6:45—8:10 as having been derived from two rather parallel (both begin with a sea miracle and end with a feeding miracle) collections of Jesus' miracles.

Those who find the arguments for such pre-canonical miracle collections cogent frequently describe them as expressive of a Theios Anēr christology. Moreover, some even suggest that the circles in which these miracle collections were developed and committed to writing possessed a theological outlook uninformed or at least uninterested in what came to be the heart of the gospel message: Jesus Christ, crucified as an expiatory sacrifice inaugurating a new covenant and raised and exalted to heaven by God, who thus vindicated him and inaugurated the first stage of the resurrection of the dead. G. Corrington has gone so far as to argue that the Markan linkage between Jesus' miracles and his authority*/status as Son of man*/ Messiah* (particularly in Mk 2:1-12) represents a secondary development. In the miracle catenae at Mark's disposal, the miracles simply aimed to document the divine power possessed by Jesus, in other words, that he was a Theios Ann.

However, this entire line of approach is marred by precarious speculation and unproven assumptions. Various Gospel scholars remain skeptical of the possibility of isolating fixed miracle collections behind Mark, and the diversity of results among those who have attempted to isolate these collections erodes confidence in the enterprise. Moreover, even if Mark utilized such collections, (1) it requires a blind leap to conclude that those who first formulated and used them had no use for the saving value of Jesus' death and the eschatological significance of his resurrection, and (2) precise determination of the extent of Markan redactional activity will remain problematic since the miracle stories (and versions of them) that Mark heard and/or read remain inaccessible to us.

2.3. Aretalogy and Gospel Genre. The Theios Anēr concept has also figured in the debate over the genre of the Gospels. Some have claimed that this genre, far from being unique, can be described as the aretalogy of a Theios Anēr, a genre with representatives predating Mark. Early on, the Greek word aretalogia referred to a rendition of a god's virtues, mighty deeds and miracles. Eventually, it is argued, the term was broadened to encompass a similar recounting of a Theios Anēr's wonders. In the modern era, however, a few scholars have applied the term to include such glorifying biographical works as Philo's Life of Moses and Philostratus's Life of Apollonius of Tyana. Such "aretalogies," so the theory goes, demonstrate the literary model adopted by the Gospels, which seek to promote their Theios Ann, Jesus. This view, however, has failed to gain substantial support because the extant "Lives" (1) are not called aretalogies and (2) vary rather considerably among themselves in form, content and function (see Gospel [Genre]).

2.4. Markan Christology. Up until about thirty years ago, those who employed the Theios Anēr as an analytic tool in Gospel studies believed that the Evangelists essentially synthesized the portrait of Jesus as a Theios Ann found in the miracle traditions with the perspective found in the sayings source Q and the passion and resurrection narratives (see Passion Narratives). However, T. Weeden, anticipated by others, argued that Mark was actually a polemic against interlopers in the Markan community who brought with them a Theios Anēr christology and the traditions which expressed it, principally the miracle stories. According to Weeden, such stories, which of course figure prominently in the first half of Mark, only appear to promote a Thews Anēr interpretation of Jesus: "The theios-Anēr position is set up only to be discredited by Jesus once the disciples confess to that position" (164). Now the way was clear to compare Mark with Paul, who himself, according to the prior research of D. Georgi, had done battle with earlier proponents of a Theios Anēr christology at Corinth (see especially 2 Cor 10-13).

Initially, Weeden's work engendered considerable support, particularly in North America. But by the early 1980s J. D. Kingsbury was able to chronicle a growing disenchantment with it. Increasing doubt about the viability of the Thews Anēr concept and its relationship to the Son of God* title, a growing tendency in Gospel studies to give priority to literary criticism* rather than tradition-critical (see Tradition Criticism) or history-of-religions considerations, and the sheer mass of miracles present in Mark (including several in the second half) have converged to undermine Weeden's thesis (see Mark, Gospel of).

3. The Ongoing Application of Theios Anēr in Gospel Criticism.

In spite of these trends, the Theios Anēr continues to live in Gospel studies, as the contributions by H. D. Betz and Corrington show. In broad outline they are in agreement: Theios Anēr is a valid and useful category and well describes the christological orientation of certain pre-canonical traditions, especially the miracle stories. Mark made use of many such traditions, but critically reinterpreted them by means of the messianic secret the passion narrative, the historicizing of the Jesus materials, an emphasis on eschatology (Betz) and/or by transforming the miracles into proofs of Jesus' authority as Son of man/Messiah (Corrington). Matthew has likewise critically adapted these Theios Anēr materials, primarily by stressing that Jesus' miracles fulfilled the OT prophecies (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology). On the other hand, Luke's christological outlook is very similar—if not identical—to the collection of miracle stories and traditions employed by Mark (and John). In John the miracles become "signs" of the epiphany of the Logos* in Jesus.

However, such continuing employment of the Theios Anēr as a typical Hellenistic figure during the NT era ought to be reconsidered. Among so-called divine-human miracle workers of repute in the Hellenistic era, there was an extreme amount of diversity. Their divinity was expressed in a wide variety of (sometimes conflicting) ways, although the terms Thews Anēr and/ or huios theou ("Son of God") were very rarely applied to them. Equally diverse were the kinds of miracles they purportedly performed and the social roles they played (kings, seers, shamans, hero physicians). D. Tiede and, even more so, E. Gallagher have demonstrated the diversity of criteria according to which these figures were judged to be divine. In the face of the precious little homogeneity that exists among the motley assortment of figures to whom Hellenistic sources attribute both divinity and miraculous power, and in view of a rich tradition of miracle-working in Jewish tradition (Moses,* Elijah,* Elisha, the Josephan "sign prophets," etc.; see Revolutionary Movements), the so-called Theios Anēr type hardly seems to offer a useful tool for evaluating christological trends in either pre-canonical or canonical traditions.

Aside from the question of whether it is desirable to continue speaking of a Theios Anēr type, it certainly is legitimate to ask whether the Gospel miracle traditions, in their christology, their themes and motifs, and/or their structure, have been influenced by Hellenistic ideas and concepts (1) which were associated, rarely or frequently, with miracle workers (gods or divine humans) and (2) which would have been alien to the culture and possibly to the religious sensibilities of the early Jewish church. While one might expect a certain amount of assimilation to occur, the evidence makes it very difficult to conclude confidently that this has happened in any given case.

In light of the tendency of Palestinian Judaism to assimilate exalted biblical, eschatological and/or angelic figures to God (e.g., Moses, Melchizedek, Yahoel) and in light of Christ's heavenly status in early Christianity, we can hardly deny the christology of the miracle stories to the early Aramaic-speaking church. In addition, Palestinian-Jewish parallels—or at least closely related conceptions—exist for all of the themes and motifs that have been dubbed "Hellenistic." Finally, the "miracle story form" is not an arbitrary pattern indigenous to Hellenistic culture but naturally results when one recites, in logico-chronological fashion, a miracle of salvation* or deliverance. Not only can one find examples in the OT (e.g., 2 Kings 6:1-7), but one can also demonstrate that such narratives would have performed valuable functions among the earliest believers (inter alia they glorify and authenticate Jesus' divine authority and messianic status). All of this strongly militates against a confident relegation of much of the Gospel miracle tradition to a secondary or tertiary stage of development.

See also Demon, Devil, Satan; Heilinc; Miracles and Miracle Stories; Prophets and Prophecy.

B. L Blackburn
DIVORCE

1. The Sources
2. A Summary of Various Interpretations
3. Defining the Terms
4. The History of Jesus' Divorce Teachings
5. Conclusion

1. The Sources.

Within the NT there are five important passages which deal with Jesus' teaching on divorce: Matthew 5:32; 19:3-9; Mark 10:2-12; Luke 16:18 and 1 Corinthians 7:10-15. These five passages fall into three groups.

1.1. Matthew 5:32 and Luke 16:18. These two passages resemble each other in being isolated sayings lacking a specific historical setting and context in the life of Jesus. Their content is also similar. Both have two parts. The first states that the man who divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery (Luke) or causes his wife to commit adultery (Matthew), and the second states that whoever marries a divorced woman commits adultery. The major difference between these two accounts is Matthew's famous "except on the ground of unchastity" clause.

1.2. Matthew 19:3-9 and Mark 10:2-12. These two passages also resemble each other and both appear in the same place in the narrative of Jesus' life. Their content and wording are also quite similar. Both state that a man who divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery. The main differences between them is that Matthew once again has an exception clause—"except for unchastity," and Mark has "and if she divorces her husband and marries another, she commits adultery" (Mk 10:12).

1.3. 1 Corinthians 7:10-15. The earliest of these five passages is 1 Corinthians 7:10-15. Here Paul introduces Jesus' saying on divorce in 7:10 by the words, "To the married I give charge, not I but the Lord. . . ." In so doing Paul makes clear that the command which follows comes from the Lord; it is an utterance spoken by the Lord Jesus during his earthly ministry. Jesus said that a wife should not "separate herself" from her husband and that a husband should not "send away" his wife. The difference in these two terms should not be pressed. Both mean to "divorce," but they describe this from two different perspectives. This saying in 7:10-11 resembles the Markan saying in that it envisions the possibility of a wife divorcing her husband. Paul, however, parenthetically tempers the ideal of marriage with the possibility of a separation without remarriage. To Jesus' saying Paul adds an additional apostolic command in 7:12-15 which entertains a new situation in which an unbelieving spouse leaves the believing partner. Paul urges the believer to continue the marriage if the unbelieving partner consents, but if the unbeliever desires to separate—that is, to divorce—then so be it. The believer is not "bound." Thus Paul adds to the ideal of continued marriage the realization that the believer really cannot do anything if his or her unbelieving mate chooses to divorce.

As might be expected there are a number of textual variants associated with these texts. The majority seek to make one saying conform more exactly to another. Some variants involve changes, such as making the first part of Matthew 5:32 into a conditional clause in order to match the latter part of the verse. Others seek to make the two exception clauses in Matthew 5:32 (parektos logou porneias) and 19:9 (me epi porneia) identical. In general, however, no substantive issue of interpretation is affected by these variants.

In discussing the various interpretations concerning Jesus' teaching on divorce, one must not lose sight of the great unanimity that exists in this area. All exegetes agree that Jesus saw divorce as a tragedy. Any divorce denotes a failure of the divine purpose, for those God joined together in marriage should not be separated. Thus there is no so-called good divorce, and the discussion that follows must be understood in this light.

2.1. Divorce in the Case of Unchastity Is Permitted, but Sot Remarriage.
This was the view of the majority of the early church fathers. Exegetical support is found in the placement of the exception clause in Matthew 19:9. "Except for unchastity" is interpreted as modifying only the verb "divorces" and not the verb "marries." Thus the text is interpreted, "Whoever divorces his wife except for unchastity commits adultery and the one who remarries [without exception] commits adultery." The purpose of the exception clause is not to permit remarriage in cases of unchastity but simply to say that in such a situation, divorce, in the sense of separation from bed and board, is not adultery. (This idea of divorce as separation only, once thought of as unknown in Judaism, may be alluded to in the Dead Sea Scrolls,* for in lIQTemple 56:17-19; 57:17-19 and CD 4:20-21 polygamy and remarriage after divorce appear to be forbidden.) Divorce is permissible in cases of unchastity, but not remarriage. Matthew 19:9 is therefore understood as making two separate propositions involving two different persons: (1) The person who divorces, except for unchastity, commits adultery; (2) the person who remarries always commits adultery. Matthew 5:32 is interpreted similarly.

There are several problems with this interpretation. One is that the parallels in Mark 10:9 and Luke 16:18 envision one person rather than two—"whoever divorces . . . and remarries . . . commits adultery." If Matthew 19:9 truly refers to two different persons, one would expect a plural verb "they commit adultery" rather than "he commits adultery." Elsewhere when the Evangelist seeks to designate two separate people in such a sentence, he demonstrates this by repeating the relative clause (cf. Mt 5:22, "whoever insults . . . and whoever says . . ."); 20:26-27, "whoever would be . . . and whoever would be . . ."). If Matthew wanted to express this view, he could easily have written "whoever divorces . . . commits adultery, and whoever remarries . . . commits adultery" or at least "whoever divorces . . . and whoever remarries [they not he] commit adultery."

It should also be noted that according to this interpretation the man who divorces his wife, except for unchastity, commits adultery. Yet how can a divorce except for unchastity be considered adultery? One can argue such a divorce is wrong, forbidden, sinful, evil, etc. But how is it adultery? How can divorce, understood in this interpretation as separation of bed and board, be adultery? Unless divorce assumes remarriage, it is difficult to perceive how divorce is adultery, for barring a radical redefinition, adultery involves some kind of sexual union. (Even in Mt 5:28 adultery is still connected with "lust") On the other hand, to assume that divorce involves remarriage refutes this interpretation which requires that divorce must be understood as separation apart from remarriage.

Another problem with this view is that the word divorce is understood in two different ways. In 19:9 it refers to separation alone. Yet in 19:3 and 8 divorce is understood in the sense that the Pharisees* understood this term, and they clearly believed that divorce included the right to remarry, for divorce was usually performed by saying "You are free to marry any man" (Git. ix.3). This is assumed in Mark 10:11-12 where "divorce and remarry" are paired, and in 10:9 where "put asunder," which is a synonym for divorce, is defined in 10:11-12 as divorcing and remarrying. This is also assumed in Deuteronomy 24:1-4 where the remarrying of the divorced person is discussed. Divorce without remarriage is, of course, possible, but in the setting of the NT it is more hypothetical than actual. Remarriage is assumed. Thus, it is only reasonable to assume that "divorce" in Matthew 19:9 should be understood in a similar way as in 19:3 and 8: "putting away with the right to remarry." If Jesus and/or Matthew wanted to indicate a use of this term different from that assumed by the questioners about divorce, they would have had to indicate this clearly. This they did not do.

2.2. Divorce and Remarriage Are Permitted in Cases of Unchastity and Desertion. This interpretation is associated with Erasmus and is the view of the Protestant Reformers. Many evangelicals hold this view today. According to this interpretation both divorce and remarriage are permissible in the case of unchastity. Support is found in the context of the Jewish audiences of Jesus and Matthew, because for them divorce meant not only separation from a wife but the right to remarriage. For the Pharisees divorce was assumed to include the right of remarriage. If Jesus or Matthew excluded the right to remarry from divorce and if they sought to communicate this to their audiences, they would have had to make this clear. Since they did not do so, we must assume that they understood the term divorce in the same way their audiences did.

Paul also seems to support this view in 1 Corinthians 7:12-15 where he may be giving a second exception. Paul states that when a believer is deserted by an unbelieving partner, the believer "is not bound" (7:15). Is Paul referring here to being bound in marriage, that the believer is no longer bound to the deserting partner but is now free to remarry? Or is he referring to no longer being bound to seek to maintain the marriage (7:12-14)? In 1 Corinthians 7:39 Paul states that a wife is "bound" to her husband as long as he lives, but if he dies she is free to marry in the Lord. Although the word bound used here is not identical with that used in 7:15, they are related. The subject being discussed is also the same—remarriage. In Romans 7:3 Paul also says that when a husband dies the wife is "free" to remarry. In light of the fact that similar terms are used in 1 Corinthians 7:39 and Romans 7:3 with regard to the right to remarry, it is probable that not being "bound" in the case of desertion by an unbeliever means being free to remarry. Understood in this way, Paul then teaches that remarriage is permissible when a believer is deserted by his or her unbelieving mate.
The major difficulty with this interpretation is the fact that the parallel accounts in Mark and Luke lack an exception clause. While it is logically correct to say that Mark and Luke by omitting the exception clause do not preclude it, the simple reading of Mark and/ or Luke gives the impression that no divorce or remarriage is possible. However, if Jesus is using exaggerated language here to emphasize his point against a hostile audience (see 4.1. below), his omission of any qualification may be understandable.

2.3. Divorce of Unlawful Marriages Is Permitted. In this interpretation "unchastity" is understood to refer to some marital flaw which in essence nullifies the marriage. One such view sees unchastity as referring to incestuous marriage, such as that described in Leviticus 18:6-18; 20:17 and Deuteronomy 27:22 (cf. also 1 lQTemple 57:11-19; CD 4:20; 5:8-11). NT support is seen in 1 Corinthians 5:1 where unchastity is used to describe the incestuous relationship of a man living with his stepmother. The unchastity of Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25 is also frequently interpreted as referring to an illicit marital union involving incest. A similar interpretation sees unchastity as referring to premarital unfaithfulness by the wife during the engagement period as described in Deuteronomy 22:20-21. In this case, as in an incestuous marriage, no true marriage has taken place. What occurs is not so much a divorce as an annulment. In both these instances unchastity is understood as annulling a non-marriage. Thus there is no compromising of Jesus' absolute forbidding of divorce, for no true marriage relationship is being ended.

One other variation of this interpretation sees unchastity as involving intermarriage between a Jew and a Gentile,* such as is prohibited in Deuteronomy 7:1-5. This relationship is seen as a form of fornication in Jubilees 30:7, 10, and especially 30:11. Paul's teaching in 1 Corinthians 7:12-15, however, would argue against such an interpretation, for there the believer is told not to separate from his or her unbelieving mate if the mate is willing to continue the relationship.

The main problem with this view involves interpreting unchastity as meaning incest or premarital infidelity. As we shall see in the next section, unchastity (i.e., porneia) has too broad a range of meaning to be interpreted so narrowly. It may indeed include these narrow meanings, but it cannot be restricted to them.

2.4. Unchastity Is Not an Exception. This unusual interpretation is called "the preteritive view." According to this view the exception clause is not to be interpreted as an exception at all. It is to be interpreted "completely apart from the question of unchastity" rather than "except in the case of unchastity." In other words, Jesus is maintaining that all divorce and remarriage is adultery and that he simply does not want to discuss the case of unchastity. It is irrelevant to the issue. Thus the term except is understood as prescinding adultery from consideration. According to this view the Matthean exceptions are not exceptions at all, so that Matthew holds the same view on divorce as found in Mark and Luke. The result is a harmonization of all four Gospel accounts.

Grammatically, however, this is a very difficult interpretation to defend. The "except" (mē epi) found in Matthew 19:9 usually means "except for" and separates something from a larger entity. The natural way of interpreting me epi is "X is... except in the case of Y." Thus, the most natural way of interpreting Matthew 19:9 is "divorce and remarriage (X) is adultery except in the case of unchastity (Y)." It is most unnatural to interpret me epi in the preteritive sense, and no one would favor such an interpretation if exegetical rather than harmonistic considerations were the primary concern.

2.5. Matthew Has Interpreted Jesus'Saying by Means of an Exception Clause. This interpretation sees Matthew's exception clauses as exegetical additions which the Evangelist has appended to Jesus' divorce sayings. In so doing he has taken Jesus' original teaching beyond what Jesus actually said for the sake of applying them to the situation of his audience. This traditio-historical approach (see Tradition History) to the exception clauses can be viewed from various perspectives. For some, Matthew is seen as having corrupted the original teaching of Jesus in order to make it more palatable for his readers.

On the other hand, Matthew can also be seen as an inspired interpreter of Jesus who possessed the mind of Christ. According to this understanding, Matthew, led by the Spirit (Jn 16:13, 15), has interpreted Jesus' words and shown that Mark 10:11-12 and Luke 16:18 are overstatements addressed to a hostile audience and that Jesus did not intend in a single sentence to establish a law which would cover every conceivable situation. This view receives support from 1 Corinthians 7:15 if this verse is interpreted as giving another exception.

The strength of this view is that it deals forthrightly with the grammar and recognizes the exception clauses as real exceptions not mentioned in Mark, Luke and 1 Corinthians. It is less prone to those harmonistic attempts which do violence to the text and claim that the exception clauses are not real exceptions.
The weakness of this view is that it either sees Matthew as contradicting Jesus' teaching or it sees in Jesus' teaching an overstatement in which universal language is used to teach a non-universal truth (see 4.1. below).

3. Defining the Terms.

In seeking to understand Jesus' teaching on divorce, the interpretation of the two exception clauses plays a pivotal role. Yet, as already seen in the previous section, unanimity is lacking as to exactly what the terms unchastity and except mean. Along with this there is confusion as to what the term divorce means. Without an accurate understanding of these terms, a correct interpretation of the divorce saying is impossible.

It is clear from its use in the NT and the Septuagint that "unchastity," or poneia, can refer to a number of unlawful sexual acts. It can refer to incest (1 Cor 5:1; and possibly Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25); adultery (in Jer 3:9 adultery and poneia appear in synonymous parallelism); prostitution (Mt 21:31-32; Lk 15:30; 1 Cor 6:13-18); sexual immorality in general (Mk 7:21-22/Mt 15:19; 1 Cor 6:9-11; 7:2); and even as a metaphor for idolatry (Rev 17:1-5, 15-16). It has been pointed out that poneia cannot be equated with "adultery" because there is a separate Greek word for adultery—moicheia—and because in Mark 7:21-22/Matthew 15:19; 1 Corinthians 6:9 and Hebrews 13:4 porneia is distinguished from moicheia. But while there is a distinction between the two words, it is one of specificity. Moicheia is a specific term and means adultery; porneia is a much more inclusive term and means any unlawful sexual act These terms are not synonyms, but poneia includes moicheia. In other words "adultery" is a subspecies of "unchastity" which, unless qualified, refers to sexual immorality in general.

Because "unchastity" in Matthew 5:32 and 19:9 is unqualified, it cannot be limited to incest sexual unfaithfulness during the engagement period or even adultery. It refers to any and all unlawful sexual activity. Unless qualified, Matthew's audience would have interpreted this term broadly as "sexual immorality" and included not only adultery, incest premarital infidelity, but also homosexuality (Lev 18:22), bestiality (Lev 18:23) and any other sexual conduct condemned in the OT.

It has been objected that since adultery was punishable by stoning, unchastity as a cause for divorce could not refer to adultery because stoning the guilty parties to death would make divorce superfluous. Yet, although the OT and the rabbinic materials (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) speak of putting an adulterer to death, the degree to which this was literally carried out is uncertain. The historicity of the narrative materials which speak of this possibility, such as Susanna and the non-canonical John 7:53—8:11, is open to question. It appears that whereas in theory adulterers were to be put to death by stoning (or burning), in practice other penalties were frequently imposed (cf. Prov 6:33-35; Hos 2:3, 10; Ezek 16:37-39; 23:29). Thus Joseph sought not Mary's stoning but divorce, when he thought her guilty of adultery (Mt 1:19; cf. also Sota 4.3).

Attempts to interpret "except" in Matthew 19:9 in a preteritive manner have already been described (see 2.4. above). With an absence of any exegetical grounds for choosing this rare and unusual interpretation, this attempt must be rejected. "Except" must be understood as excluding one group from the general statement "whoever divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery." That group consists of those who divorce and remarry in light of the unchastity of their original partner.

The final term which must be defined is divorce. Does divorce assume the right to remarry or does it assume only the right to put away one's wife and be separate—a separation from bed and board? That divorce can be conceived of without subsequent remarriage is clear. One is not obligated to remarry upon divorce. The expression "divorce and remarry" in all four Gospel accounts indicates this. Yet whereas divorce and remarriage are separate activities, did the common understanding of the term divorce assume the right to remarry? This question, based upon evidence from rabbinic literature, is to be answered in the affirmative.

The essential part of a Jewish bill of divorce consisted of the words "You are free to marry any man" (Git 9.3). This is clearly Matthew's understanding in 5:32, for how does divorcing a woman make (not "stigmatize") her an adulteress? It is because "divorce" assumes that the divorced woman will exercise her right to remarry. Thus, whereas remarriage was not a necessary part of a divorce, the right to remarry was. Jesus could, of course, have redefined "divorce" and excluded the right to remarry. But because his audience had asked him about the right to divorce and remarry, if he wished to convey a different meaning of divorce which excludes the right to remarry, he would have had to make this clear to his audience. This is especially true in that he is trying in Mark 10:2-12 and parallels to clarify a pharisaic misinterpretation. Since he did redefine the meaning of divorce, we must assume that he meant by "divorce" what his audience meant. (Note how in 1 Cor 7:11 Paul defines what he means by separation in 1 Cor 7:10.) As a result, although the later church distinction between divorce with the right to remarry and divorce in the sense of separation may not have been unknown in Judaism,* this was not the normal way Jesus' (or Matthew's) audience thought. "Divorce" therefore in our texts should be understood as assuming the right to remarry.

4. The History of Jesus' Divorce Teachings.

4.1. The Ipsissima Verba of Jesus. In seeking to reconstruct exactly what Jesus said concerning divorce, we are fortunate in having multiple sources: Mark 10:2-12/Matthew 19:3-9; Luke 16:18/Matthew 5:32 and 1 Corinthians 7:10-11. There is no need to question the general setting of Jesus' divorce saying in Mark 10:2-12/Matthew 19:3-9, for this fits well the debate among the Pharisees concerning the grounds for divorce. Whereas the school of Shammai limited divorce to unchastity (or at least indecent conduct) because of their interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1, the school of Hillel was much more liberal and permitted divorce even for burning the husband's supper. Rabbi Akiba went even further and permitted divorce if a husband found a more attractive woman (Git. 9.10). Thus the question "Is it lawful to divorce one's wife?" (Mk 10:2) fits well the situation of Jesus' day. It is quite likely that the question was a hostile one as well (Mk 10:2, "tested him"). There is also no reason to doubt that Deuteronomy 24:1, which was the center of the rabbinic discussion, was alluded to or that Jesus referred to Genesis 1:27 and 2:24.

Concerning the actual saying itself, the exception clause is best understood as a Matthean interpretative addition to help show his Jewish-Christian readers that Jesus was not seeking in his divorce statement "to abolish the law*" (Mt 5:17). Neither Mark, Luke nor Paul mention it. Thus we have three separate sources (Mark, Q,* Paul) which witness to Jesus' teaching on divorce and yet lack an exception clause. Also, the more difficult nature of their form of Jesus' teaching argues in favor of the exception clause being secondary. Why would Mark, Luke and Paul choose to omit it?

The original form of Jesus' saying was probably "Whoever divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery." If we omit the exception clause, we find this in Mark 10:10b, Luke 16:18a and Matthew 19:9a. Paul states this in a different form in 1 Corinthians 7:11b when he says "the husband should not divorce his wife." Matthew 5:32a, which assumes that the divorced woman will remarry, is a logical implication of this, but its authenticity is doubtful. The expression "against her" in Mark 10:11 is most probably an interpretative comment by the Evangelist.

The authenticity of Mark 10:12, "and if she divorces her husband and marries another, she commits adultery," is usually denied because it supposedly reflects a Greco-Roman milieu where women could divorce their husbands, whereas Jewish wives could not. Therefore, Jesus could not have uttered this saying. It is now evident that Jewish women were at certain times and places able to divorce their husbands, although this was rare. Josephus* reflects the practice of mainstream Judaism when he states, "... it is (only) the man who is permitted ... to do this [divorce]... " (Ant. 15.7.10 §259). More important however, is the fact that according to Mark 6:17-18 the most famous marriage in Galilee* was the marriage of Herod Antipas and Herodias, who had divorced her husband, Philip (see Herodian Dynasty). Thus, according to this passage and its parallels, there existed in Galilee a glaring example of a woman who divorced her husband, and in fact John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) lost his life because he said to Herod "It is not lawful to have your brother's wife" (Mk 6:18). This indicates that Jesus could have taught concerning a woman divorcing her husband. (Some difficulties exist between the Synoptic accounts and Josephus Ant. 18.5.1-2 §§109-119.) The fact that Paul alludes to this possibility in his quotation of Jesus' divorce saying (1 Cor 7:10) lends support to the case for its authenticity.
Its omission in the Lukan and Matthean parallels, on the other hand, weakens the case. Absolute certainty as to the authenticity or inauthenticity of Mark 10:12 is unwarranted, but all things considered, it is more likely that it is an interpretative comment which brings out a legitimate consequence of Jesus' teaching.

It is not impossible that Jesus uttered Matthew 5:32b/Luke 16:18b, "and he who marries a divorced woman commits adultery," for Jesus could very well have uttered several variant sayings on divorce at different times and places in his ministry. Yet if every variant saying on divorce is assumed to be a different saying of Jesus, we shall have at least six different authentic sayings of Jesus:
Mark 10:12/Luke 16:18a; Matthew 19:9; 1 Corinthians 7:11b; Mark 10:12/ 1 Corinthians 7:10b; Matthew 5:32a and Matthew 5:32b/Luke 16:18b. It seems much more likely that some of these sayings, such as Matthew 5:32a and Matthew 5:32b/Luke 16:18b are interpretations-apostolic and therefore authoritative interpretations—of Jesus' teaching on divorce. All appear to be legitimate implications of Jesus' teaching on divorce.

The authenticity of Jesus' teaching on divorce in Mark 10:10b/Luke 16:18a/Matthew 19:9a is supported not only by the multiple attestation of Mark, Q and Paul in 1 Corinthians 7:11b but by the criterion of coherence, for this divorce saying fits well other sayings in which Jesus heightens or overrides an OT teaching (see Old Testament in the Gospels). It also fits other passages in which Jesus is asked a hostile question by his audience (cf. Mk 11:27-33; 12:13-17, 18-27). In addition, this teaching may also fit in part the criterion of dissimilarity, for Jesus' teaching on divorce conflicts sharply with normal Jewish practice as typified by Hillel and even Shammai. (How familiar Jesus' audience was with the Qumran community's teaching on this subject is hard to assess.)

Having established that Jesus taught that divorce and remarriage were adultery, we must now proceed to interpret these words. Most interpretations have treated Jesus' words as if they were the objective, referential language of jurisprudence seeking to convey a legal precept Yet Mark 10:2 indicates that the question was asked in a hostile setting. Thus Jesus' words are perhaps better interpreted as expressive or commissive language which contain an emotive quality. Much of Jesus' teaching was uttered in such a context, and it is not surprising that his answers frequently contain hyperbole and overstatement (cf. Mt 5:23-24, 29-30, 34-36, 40; Mk 7:15). Thus Jesus, in his great concern to show that divorce destroys God's purpose in marriage and in light of the loose attitude of his audience toward divorce, expressed the will of God without exception. "God hates divorce! All divorce is wrong!" (cf. Mal 2:16a). The very question of the Pharisees, "When is divorce permissible?" witnesses to a decidedly wrong focus. This may at times be a legitimate question, and later Matthew and Paul would deal with that question, but in this particular instance Jesus used emotive and exaggerated language to emphasize the divine ideal and purpose in marriage.

4.2. The Markan Contribution. The main contribution of Mark to Jesus' teaching involves his development of its universal implications. He does this by the addition of "against her" in 10:11 but above all by his repeating of the divorce saying from the perspective of the woman in 10:12.

4.3. The Matthean Contribution. In both 5:32 and 19:9 Matthew has added an exception clause to Jesus' teaching which permits both divorce and remarriage in instances of unchastity. In so doing he reveals that he does not interpret Jesus' teaching as conflicting with the Law (Mt 5:17) or as an attempt to set down a legal principle to cover all circumstances. Like Paul, he believes that as an authoritative spokesman for his Lord he can help bring out the meaning of Jesus' teaching with regard to the specific case of unchastity. Does Matthew teach that divorce is mandatory in the case of unchastity? There may be an allusion to this in Matthew 1:19 where "being a just man" is best interpreted as a causal participial phrase explaining why Joseph was going to divorce Mary (see Birth of Jesus). The rabbinic literature seems to require divorce in such instances (cf. Sota 5.1). Yet the OT example of Hosea, the lack of any clear command in the NT and the great emphasis on forgiving one another (see Forgiveness of Sins), argues strongly against any interpretation which would make divorce mandatory in cases of adultery.

The placement of Jesus' teaching concerning being a eunuch for the kingdom of heaven (Mt 19:10-12) is frequently seen as the Evangelist's interpretation of the preceding teaching on divorce. Thus, being a eunuch for the kingdom of heaven means that divorced believers cannot remarry and must become as eunuchs. Has Matthew placed 19:10-12 at this point because he sees it as supporting an absolute prohibition of remarriage? There are several reasons to question this interpretation. For one, we have already concluded that according to the general norms of language, Matthew 19:9 and 5:32 permit divorce and remarriage in the case of unchastity. Second, verse 12 concludes with the understanding that not everyone is "able to receive this," and in verse 11 Jesus states that "not everyone can receive this precept but only those to whom it is given." It is difficult to assume that "those to whom it is given" refers to any and all Christians in contrast to unbelievers. This teaching looks more like gospel advice concerning marriage than a mandatory requirement that divorced believers not remarry. Simply being a divorced believer does not enable one to receive this precept. It is better therefore to understand "this word" in 9:11 as referring to the saying in 19:10 concerning marriage in general rather than to the sayings in 19:4-9 concerning divorce and remarriage and in 19:10 concerning marriage. The placement of 19:10-12 after 19:3-9 is best seen as due to topical considerations—that is, they both deal with marriage—rather than due to a specific attempt to interpret 19:3-9 by means of 19:10-12.

4.4. The Lukan Contribution. Due to the brevity of the divorce saying in Luke and its traditional nature it is difficult to find within it any uniquely Lukan emphasis. Some attempts have been made to arrive at a Lukan emphasis by means of the context in which this saying is placed. Is the Evangelist trying to demonstrate the abiding validity of the Law (16:16)? Is this teaching directed by Luke against the Pharisees because of their love of money (16:14)? Has Luke simply listed it with other pharisaic vices (16:14-17)? At this time it is difficult to single out a particular Lukan contribution with regard to the divorce saying.

4.5. The Pauline Contribution. In 1 Corinthians 7:12-15 Paul introduces an issue concerning divorce that does not surface elsewhere. He explicitly states in 7:12 that what follows is not a teaching of the historical Jesus ("I say, not the Lord"), although he believes that what he says is equally authoritative. Paul gives an exception to Jesus' teaching in 7:15 which allows for remarriage in the case of desertion by an unbelieving partner. In such cases the deserted believer is "not bound." This most probably means "free to remarry." This interpretation fits well with Paul's general view that "because of the temptation to immorality, each man should have his own wife and each woman her own husband" (7:2). A deserted wife or husband still faces this same problem. If "it is better to marry than to be aflame with passion" (7:9), and if "not all men [and women] can receive this precept [of being a eunuch with respect to marriage], but only those to whom it is given" (Mt 19:11), how do these words help a deserted man or woman if they cannot remarry? Being free to remarry—"not being bound"—resolves this problem.

5. Conclusion.

The particular interpretation of Jesus' teaching on divorce and the history of its tradition suggested above is not without its own difficulty. Its strongest point is that it takes the two exception clauses in Matthew and 1 Corinthians seriously. It requires that we see Jesus' statement on divorce as containing elements of exaggeration for effect. This does not in any sense mean that one can multiply ad infinitum other exceptions which permit divorce and remarriage. On the other hand, it does raise the question of whether there may be other exceptions. Nevertheless, if Jesus used exaggeration in his divorce saying, this means that in his thinking God's hatred of divorce was so great that he could only express his conviction on this subject by means of exaggerated language. Rather than lessening the importance of Jesus' teaching on this subject exaggerated language heightens it. The evil of divorce is so great that Jesus could only express himself on this subject by means of exaggeration.
In light of this, it is difficult to counsel a Christian that divorce is an option for them. Clearly the burden of proof weighs heavily on anyone considering divorce, for God hates divorce. Divorce is never good, for it witnesses to a failure of the divine purpose. Yet there may be occasions when divorce is the lesser evil. According to the interpretation given above, it is permissible (not mandatory) in the case of sexual infidelity and desertion. Such an action, however, should be considered as drastic as when a surgeon must amputate a limb or cut out a cancer intertwined with one's vital organs. Are there other possible occasions when divorce is a lesser evil? From the standpoint of the Gospels such a question must be asked fearfully, knowing God's hatred for divorce and the fact that one shall one day need to justify any such action before him. But as an example, one might consider the case of a wife who suffers great physical abuse from her husband and is eventually murdered by him. Would divorce have been a lesser evil?

One particular problem that this interpretation faces is found in Matthew 5:32b/Luke 16:18b: "whoever marries a divorced woman commits adultery." In Luke this is a very difficult saying, for it appears to punish the innocent party—the wife who has been divorced by her husband. Furthermore, in the socioeconomic environment of Jesus' day, what was a woman* to do? Remarriage seems a far more desirable alternative than various other options. The Matthean version is not as difficult to interpret for here the woman who has been divorced appears to be the woman divorced in the earlier part of the verse for unchastity. Defining marriage to an adulteress as adultery is not difficult. Luke, however, gives the impression that the divorced woman is innocent and wronged. The sin seems to lie with the man who divorced her. It may be, however, that the whole issue of determining who is innocent is irrelevant because Jesus was simply seeking to emphasize the wrongness of all divorce.

See also Ethics of Jesus; Law; Women.

DOMINICAL SAYINGS. See FORM CRITICISM; GOSPELS (HISTORICAL RELIABILITY); TRADITION CRITICISM

DREAMS

A sequence of thoughts or images occurring during sleep. Dreams have been the subject of intense interest and critical reflection from time immemorial. Modern concepts of dreams are indebted to Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), who established the basic principles which guide modern dream research. Scripture, however, nowhere reflects an interest in the psychoanalysis of dreams.

The major references to dreams in the Bible, including the Gospels, are those instances in which dreams functioned as vehicles of divine revelation. These references appear in three major clusters: the early patriarchal period (Gen 20—41), the life of Daniel (Dan 1—7), and the infancy narrative of Matthew's Gospel (Mt 1—2; see Birth of Jesus). As it was commonly held in the ancient world, the Jews believed that God communicated his will through dreams (Num 12:6: "I [the LORD] speak to him in dreams" [NIV]).

The references to dreams in the Gospels are limited to the six occurrences in Matthew. Significantly, each occurrence concerns the person of Jesus. Through dreams Mary's conception was explained to Joseph (1:20); the wise men were warned not to return to Herod* (2:12); Joseph was told to flee with his family to Egypt (2:13); Joseph was warned against settling in Judea (2:22); and Pontius Pilate's* wife was convicted on Jesus' account (27:19). That all of these accounts are from the hand of the Evangelist is suggested by the use of the stereotypical phrase kaṭ’ onar, "in a dream," occurring in each of these passages.

These dreams recorded in Matthew are of two basic subtypes. The dreams of the infancy narrative were given for guidance and were clearly supernatural, while the source of the dream of Pilate's wife is less clear; it may point to disturbed mental activity, or it may have been a supernatural sign of Jesus' righteousness.* In Matthew, however, the dream of Pilate's wife plays no less important a role than those of Joseph and the wise men. The concerns are essentially the same in both subtypes: questions of destiny, security, personal well-being, etc. Hence, the dream of Pilate's wife serves to reinforce with the others the basic Matthean theme that Jesus is God's chosen one. The very fact that we should be given a glimpse of her emotional torment, a torment so severe that she felt it necessary to interrupt her husband while he was sitting "on the judge's seat" (27:19), clearly reinforces Matthew's stress on Jesus' innocence and the treachery of his opposition.

The details of the dreams in the infancy narrative follow a relatively meaningful sequence. One can argue that these details play an important part in the purpose of Matthew to show the divine care exercised in the life of Jesus. First there was God's directive that Joseph take Mary as his wife and thus establish a home with a father and mother in which Jesus would be protected from the charge of illegitimacy (1:19-23). This is followed by a dream in which the wise men who worshiped Jesus as "king" are instructed to return to their country, without first reporting back to Herod (2:12). There can be little doubt that Matthew intends thereby to show God's particular provision for the infant Jesus in the face of life-threatening danger.

This theme of divine protection extends to the third nativity dream, recorded in 2:13. In commanding the holy family to seek refuge from Herod in a Roman province of some one million Jews, God takes sovereign action to preserve the infant from the massacre in Bethlehem and (potentially) in other towns of Judea. In addition, it was the function of this dream to make possible the fulfillment of Hosea 11:1, cited in Matthew 2:15: "Out of Egypt I called my son" (NIV). In Matthew's chronicling of the events surrounding the nativity of Jesus, there can be little doubt that this prediction-fulfillment motif anticipates the opposition to Jesus throughout his life, culminating in his death in Jerusalem under the eyes of another Herod (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

The final two revelatory dreams, recounted in 2:19-23, continue the theme of divine preservation. Joseph is informed that the enemies of Jesus are dead and that he is to return "to the land of Israel" (2:20). But since Joseph was probably intent on raising the child in Bethlehem, the city of David, he was guided by a fifth and final dream to settle instead in despised Galilee.* Once again, Scripture is fulfilled: By settling the family in Galilee Joseph ensures that Jesus will be called (pejoratively) "a Nazarene"* (2:23).

From Matthew's perspective, then, Jesus, the newborn child of Mary, is himself the King of the Jews. Accordingly, asserts Matthew, through dreams God intervenes in human history to make known his divine purposes for this child and to protect him.

A final issue is raised by the fact that an "angel* of the Lord" is mentioned in connection with four of the five dreams in the infancy narrative (1:20, 24; 2:13, 19). It is not clear whether we are to think merely of angels or more specifically of a manifestation of Yahweh. The lack of precise data with regard to the identity of this figure has given rise to various conclusions. Without question the angel of the Lord is to be identified in some way with God, yet he appears to be distinguished from God. Perhaps the best view is to see the angel of the Lord as a self-manifestation of Yahweh in a form that would communicate his presence and concern to those to whom he appeared.

See also Angels; Apocalyptic.

DA. Black

DRUNKENNESS. See Wine
ELDER

Originally the Hebrew lāqēn meant a "bearded one," or older member of a family, and the term is used frequently in the Bible for those who are older in years. However, the term elder most frequently refers to the ruling head of the family or clan. In Jesus' day these were predominantly the aristocratic leaders of the Jewish patrician families. They served in local village councils and alongside the Pharisees* and Sadducees in the Sanhedrin,* the great council of the Jews in Jerusalem.

1. OT Background
2. Post-Exilic and Intertestamental Developments
3. The Judaism of Jesus' Day
4. The Emphases of the Evangelists

1. OT Background

The institutional office of elder derived from the earliest history of the nation when families and clans controlled the politics of the Hebrews. As heads of the major families the elders naturally became the leaders of the clans and formed councils to lead the tribes. Yet there was no instance when they were the sole authority, for they always represented the people under the leadership of divinely appointed leaders such as Moses (Ex 3:16, 18; 18:12). At Sinai "seventy of the elders of Israel" were convened to ratify the covenant (Ex 24:1, 9), an event celebrated by later Jews as constituting also the divine commission of the office of elder. In Numbers 11:16-17, 24-25, which was clearly an anointing ceremony, we read of the Spirit being placed on them and their prophesying. Henceforth they shared Moses' burdens and assisted him in his office.

Deuteronomy speaks of the legal responsibilities of the elders: the local administration of justice (Deut 19:11-13), functioning as civil judges at the city gates which were the ancient courtrooms (Deut 22:15; 25:7), and adjudicating in family squabbles (Deut 21:18-21; 22:13-21). After the settlement in Canaan the elders became a ruling class with not only judicial but political and military powers (1 Sam 4:3; 8:4-9). During the monarchy their authority was lessened by the creation of a centralized government with its civil service. But the elders as local rulers still exercised considerable influence and acted as buffers against dictatorial tendencies on the part of the monarchy. Saul sought their favor (1 Sam 15:30), and both David (2 Sam 3:17; 5:3) and Rehoboam (1 Kings 12:6-8) turned to the elders when seeking the throne. There was always tension between the elders and the king, since their spheres of authority overlapped; but the elders still adjudicated both legal and religious matters among the people.

2. Post-Exilic and Intertestamental Developments.

During the exile both the monarchy and the tribal structure of Israel collapsed, and the elders gained even more authority than before. In exilic communities (Jer 29:1) and in Palestine (Ezek 8:1; 14:1) elders were quite prominent. Yet there was a difference, for now it was not clans or tribes but individual families that had risen to leadership. During the post-exilic period these families became an aristocracy, and their elders wielded great influence. In Ezra 5:9; 6:6-15 they were the primary instigators of the rebuilding of the Temple, and both Darius and the Persian governor Tattenai worked with them. Town elders continued to exercise power (cf. Ezra 10:14; cf. the "family heads" of 10:16), and Nehemiah had many running battles with these "nobles and officials" (Neh 5:7; 7:5), but it was the aristocratic family which increasingly gained the upper hand.

During the intertestamental period these family heads and elders slowly took control of the apparatus of state and began meeting as a council to rule the nation, becoming the precursor of the Sanhedrin. It may be that the earliest form was the "company" of twelve chieftains mentioned in Ezra 2:2 and Nehemi-ah
7:7, possibly representing symbolically the twelve tribes. Under Hellenistic rule this council, called the Gerousia, had wide-ranging powers, since the Greeks allowed their subject peoples to govern their own internal affairs. At some point there came to be seventy (or seventy-one if one counts the high priest) members (cf. m. Sank 1:6, Josephus J.W. 2.18.6 §482), and the council consisted of elders and aristocratic priests, with the high priest at the head (see Priest, Priesthood). During the reign of the Hasmoneans, however, the makeup of the Gerousia was altered again. Their powers were reduced due to the monarchical tendencies of the rulers, and there was a growing influx of scribal (Pharisaic) leaders, with the result that the power structure was divided into nobility (elders and priests) and lay (scribes) factions. This continued into the NT period.

Two further restrictions of the Sanhedrin's (and therefore the elder's) authority occurred in the fifty years prior to Jesus. Under the Roman governor Gabinius (57-55 B.C.) Palestine was divided into five synechiae, and for ten years the Sanhedrin had jurisdiction over only the three in Judea, approximately a third of its former territory. The old lines of authority were reinstated under Hyrcanus II (47 B.C.), but that too was short-lived, for Herod the Great began his reign by executing forty-five members of the Sanhedrin who had supported Antigonus (Josephus Ant. 15.1.2 §6) and forcing the nobility to submit During this time, however, the elders continued to serve as heads of influential families and as community leaders. Moreover, the "council of elders" represented the nation in its dealings with the Greeks and Romans and also performed judicial functions at home. At Qumran there was no apparent office, but elders as the heads of families were second in order to the priests in both judicial and halachic authority, and a council of twelve lay and three priestly members ruled the community (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

3. The Judaism of Jesus' Day.

In the first century the presbyteroi ("elders") primarily served a community function. Their duties are described in the Mishnaic tractate Sanhedrin, although the extent to which it depicts pre-A.D. 70 Judaism is greatly debated (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Both in Judea and in diasporic communities there appear to have been a council of seven elders which functioned primarily at the civic level and an executive committee of three archontes ("rulers")—the head of the synagogue, the minister of the congregation and the collector of alms—which functioned mainly at the synagogue level (cf. Judith 6:15-17; 7:9-10).
However, there was no clear distinction between civic and religious life in Jewish communities, and the two groups together controlled the daily life of the Jewish people. In cosmopolitan cities with a mixed population and special synagogues (e.g., Rome), there may have been separate councils of elders for synagogue and community; but in the average Jewish community the same group of elders ruled over both civic and synagogue affairs, and often the archontes were chosen from among the elders.

The presbyteroi exercised full jurisdiction over civic as well as religious life. They decided what type of disciplinary action was appropriate, whether flogging or—most serious of all—the ban or excommunication. While the elders did not control synagogue worship (that was under the jurisdiction of the archontes), they did take the seats of honor and officially enforced the Law. They also administered both village and synagogue affairs, making decisions in a wide variety of situations. Often the president of the synagogue was an elder, and the office went beyond the hereditary leaders of the noble families to encompass elected lay leaders of the community (probably chosen annually).

Corresponding to the local councils was the supreme Gerousia, or Sanhedrin, in Jerusalem. There the term elder was used generally to describe all the members (cf. the presbyterion, or "council of the elders," in Lk 22:66; Acts 22:5) or specifically to refer to the lay leaders that constituted the third and least influential group (with the Sadducees and Pharisees) in the Sanhedrin, the lay nobility. A third use of the term denotes the scribes as interpreters of the Law (cf. the "tradition of the elders" in Mk 7:3, 5 and pars.). This latter use became predominant in the post-A.D. 70 period, when it was used for the scribal scholars who developed the tannaitic tradition.

4. The Emphases of the Evangelists.

Presbyteros as a title in the Gospels occurs only in the passion predictions (see Predictions and Jesus Passion and Resurrection) and in the passion narratives themselves (see Passion Narrative). It always (apart from Lk 7:3, in which the "elders" of a synagogue attest to the piety of a centurion) refers to the lay members of the Sanhedrin and in every case except the first passion prediction (Mk 8:31 and pars., where it may stress their juridical function) occurs after mention of the "chief priests." This is probably due to the greater influence of the priestly members in the Sanhedrin.
Mark retains the complete list of "chief priests, elders, scribes" which constituted the Sanhedrin, with this order in Mk 14:53 and 15:1 (so linking the elders with the priestly faction, the normal political alignment) but with the "scribes" named before the elders in Mk 11:27 and 14:43 (probably due to the greater political influence of the scribes in the first century).

Matthew, in spite of his greater interest in the Sanhedrin's involvement in the passion events (eleven references in contrast with five in Mark, three in Luke and none in John), usually omits mentioning the "scribes" (cf. Mt 21:23 par. Mk 11:27; 26:3; Mt 26:47 par. Mk 14:43; Mt 27:1 par. Mk 15:1; Mt 27:3, 12, 20; and 28:12; though he includes them in Mt 16:21; Mt 26:57 par. Mk 14:53; Mt 27:41) perhaps in order to depict the elders more generally as representatives of the nation as a whole (note presbyteroi tou laou ["elders of the people"] in Mt 21:23; 26:3, 47; 27:1).

John shows no interest in the elders and mentions only the "chief priests and Pharisees" (Jn 18:3; cf. "chief priests and officers" in Jn 19:6). Elsewhere, he uses only the plural "they" for the Sanhedrin (cf. Jn 18:28-31) or refers even more generally to "the Jews" (Jn 18:38; 19:14).

See also Judaism; Pharisee; Sanhedrin; Scribe; Syna Cocue.

ELIJAH AND ELISHA

Elijah and Elisha were two great prophets (see Prophets and Prophecy) of Israel* The memory of their ministries and miraculous activity led to the expectation that the period of the end would bring a rebirth of their divinely inspired labor. Each of these figures can be examined with reference to the OT, Judaism and the NT. In particular, Elijah is portrayed as a witness, as one whose pattern of ministry is repeated, and as one who returns.

1. Elijah.

1.1. Elijah in the OT. Elijah was a major prophetic figure in Israel during the ninth century B.C. (1 Kings 17-19; 21:17-29; 2 Kings 1:2-16; 2:1-12). He is best remembered for his call to reform at Mt Carmel, his miraculous work and his rapture to heaven.* In Malachi 4:5-6 (MT 3:23-24) the prophet promises Elijah's return to reconcile fathers and sons before the Day of the Lord. This promise of Elijah's return also alludes to Malachi 3:1 and the messenger who goes before the Lord. This aspect of Malachi's prophecy influenced both Judaism and the Gospels.

1.2. Elijah in Ancient Judaism. Elijah appears in many texts of ancient Judaism* as a great figure who will return. In Sirach (48:1-12) he is called a prophet-like-fire, whose word flamed like a torch, and he is expected to return to allay divine wrath, to reconcile father and son, and to restore Jacob (48:1,10). 1 Enoch 89:52 (cf. 90:31) figuratively refers to Elijah as a spared sheep. 1 Maccabees 2:58 notes his zeal for the Law and that he was taken up alive to heaven. In addition, the prophet to come mentioned in 1 Maccabees 4:46 and 14:41 may refer to Elijah. Josephus,* in his retelling of the history of the Jewish people, summarizes Elijah's career (Ant. 8.13.1-8 §§316-62). And 4 Ezra (6:26; cf. 7:109) speaks of the apocalyptic* return of the men who were taken up to heaven without tasting death (e.g., Enoch, Moses [in Jewish tradition] and Elijah). The Mishnah tractate 'Edduyot (8:7) declares Elijah's future role as a judge who settles disputes and declares which families are clean. In Sotah (9:15) he is responsible for the resurrection of the dead. So in Judaism the return of Elijah signals the arrival of the time of fulfillment, calls the people to reconciliation and brings judgment* (cf. also As. Mos. 2:14; perhaps 1QS 9:11; m. B. Mes 1:8; 3:4).

Recent scholarship has debated whether ancient Judaism conceived of the return of Elijah prior to the coming of Messiah (see Christ). M. Faierstein argues that such a concept did not exist and the old scholarly consensus to the contrary must be abandoned. One text that clearly makes such a connection is Targum Pseudo-Jonathan (Deut 30:4), but the date of this tradition is difficult to establish and may post-date the Judaism of Jesus' time. A talmudic text ( 'Erub. 43a-b) also makes this connection, but it is considered too late to be of value (third century A.D.).

D. Allison has argued that the presence within Judaism of an association between the coming of Elijah and the coming of Messiah would best explain the question in Mark 9:11, "Why do the teachers of the Law* say that Elijah must come first?" If this were a Christian development, how did it come to be attributed to the scribes*? Indeed, the problem of Elijah coming first seems to pose a real difficulty arising from the environment of the disciples* or the early church. Allison also regards the Talmudic evidence as significant in showing that such a view was circulating in Judaism, despite the fact, one might add, that Christians had identified this figure with John the Baptist (see John the Baptist). Allison's most important point is that the logic of Jewish eschatology* demands a connection between the coming of Elijah and the coming of Messiah. If one believed that the Messiah's coming would be associated with the arrival of the Day of the Lord (as is witnessed within first-century Judaism), it would follow that Malachi's prophecy of Elijah appearing before the last days would be read as an event preceding the coming of Messiah.

J. Fitzmyer (1985), in defending Faierstein, regards Mark 9:9-11 as a non-messianic text But in doing so he argues that "Son of man" (see Son of Man) is not a messianic title. The disciples are not asking why Elijah must precede the Messiah, but why he must precede the "rising from the dead" or "the rising of the Son of man from the dead." However, while the title "Son of man" is distinct from "Messiah," the function of the two figures is sufficiently related that Fitzmyer's distinction is not decisive. Fitzmyer also challenges the appeal to the Talmud, questioning whether the evidence is even derived from the third century A.D. (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) and is clearly Palestinian in origin
(the possibility remaining that it is fourth-fifth century and Babylonian in origin). This challenge passes by the force of Allison's argument, which notes the presence of a tradition within at least a sector of Judaism, which persisted despite its use in Christian apologetic. Fitzmyer also rejects Allison's appeal to logic in his ordering of first-century eschatological belief. Though he acknowledges that "some first-century Jews did believe in the coming of Messiahs" (e.g., 1QS 9:1; T. Levi 18:1-9; T. Jud. 24:1-6), Fitzmyer argues that none of these texts explicitly links Messiah's coming to the Day of the Lord. But it may be argued that a Messiah who comes and exercises decisive judgment with the Lord is bringing that Day, even if the exact phrase is not used (Pss. Sol. 17-18; 1QM 19:2-8; 4Q161-64). In sum, though the evidence is not as overwhelming as many have assumed, the probability remains that at least some within early Judaism understood the coming of Elijah as an event preceding the arrival of Messiah.

1.3. Elijah in the NT. Elijah is the fourth most frequently cited OT figure in the NT (Moses, eighty times; Abraham, seventy-three times; David, fifty-nine times; Elijah, twenty-nine times). All but two of these references are in the Gospels (Rom 11:2; Jas 5:17). Only two of these citations are in John (1:21, 25). The remaining twenty-five references within the Synoptics are widely distributed, though most appear in at least two of the Synoptics. One text is unique to Matthew (11:14). Two are unique to Luke (1:17; 4:25-26). Some passages are shared by all of the Synoptics (Mt 16:14 par. Mk 8:28 and Lk 9:19; Mt 17:3-4,10-12 par. Mk 9:4-5, 11-13 and Lk 9:30, 33). Some material is shared by Mark and Matthew (Mk 15:35-36 par. Mt 27:47, 49) and one passage by Mark and Luke (Mk 6:15 par. Lk 9:8). Allusions to Malachi also appear (Mk 1:2-3; Mt 10:11; Lk 7:27), as do references to a ministry of fire (Mt 3:11; Lk 9:54; 12:49), recalling Elijah's ministry of judgment at Mt Carmel (1 Kings 18) and his calling fire down on the messengers of King Ahaziah (2 Kings 1).

1.4. The Three Emphases of the NT. The Elijah passages divide into three emphases: the witness, the figure "like Elijah" and the hope of a coming Elijah. The first two emphases are in all three Synoptics, while the last is limited to Matthew and Mark.

1.4.1. The Witness. All three Synoptics depict Elijah as a witness at the Transfiguration* (Mt 17; Mk 9; Lk 9) where he appears with Moses* and speaks with Jesus. The mountain (see Mountain and Wilderness) setting suggests a revelatory moment, as does the heavenly endorsement of Jesus as the "prophet to be heard," the prophet-like-Moses (Deut 18:15,18). Elijah appears to represent the time of Jewish hope as a witness to this event (Liefeld). Luke alone speaks of their conversation as being about Jesus' exodus (9:31, "ten exodon autou"), his death (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection* in Jerusalem.

1.4.2. "Like Elijah." Numerous passages speak of the figure "like Elijah." Several texts speak of John the Baptist in this light either by appealing to the imagery of Malachi 3:1 (Mk 1:2-3; Mt 10:11; Lk 7:27), by Jesus' remarks (Mt 11:14; 17:10-13 par.) or by angelic proclamation (Lk 1:17). The Fourth Gospel (Jn 1:21, 27) notes John's explicit denial that he is this figure. This evidence led J. A. T. Robinson to argue that the association of Elijah with John was the work of Jesus and the church, while John saw Jesus as Elijah, not Messiah. But the popular view that Jesus is Elijah (Mt 16:14 par.) is clearly meant to be understood as speculation, not something from John. John's hesitation to accept the Elijah identification may well be a result of his recognizing that Elijah was yet to come; he did not wish to be perceived as the final manifestation of Elijah hope (Mt 17:10-12; cf. Rev 11:3). Luke's unique and careful wording of John coming in "the spirit" of Elijah might suggest the same conclusion (1:17). If John is an Elijah-like figure, his testimony as a forerunner and his baptism of Jesus is a form of divine attestation to be placed alongside the voice from heaven. Jesus' ministry also led to his being associated with Elijah. He explicitly compares his ministry to the period of Elijah in Luke 4:25-26. The people think he might be Elijah, and this view reaches the ears of Herod (Mk 6:15; Lk 9:8). This is popular speculation brought about by Jesus' miracles (see Miracles and Miracle Stories). However, the prophetic picture of Jesus preferred by the early church was the portrait of the prophet-like-Moses (Acts 3:12-26). Jesus' ministry is not that of Elijah, though Jesus' miracles, involving a variety of people and races, bear resemblance to those of the prophet One other connection exists between Elijah and Jesus. At the cross, Jesus cries out in the language of Psalm 22, but those listening to him think he is calling on Elijah for help (Mt 27:47, 49; Mk 15:35-36). In this instance Elijah is portrayed as one who comes to the aid of the pious.

1.4.3. Future Elijah. The hope of a future Elijah seems to be reflected in Matthew 17:10-11 and Mark 9:11-12. The difficulty lies in the fact that Jesus responds to the issue of scribal belief that Elijah must come first by commenting that Elijah has already come in John. Is Jesus saying John completely fulfills the expectation of Elijah? Or is Jesus saying that Elijah is a type which appears now in John and will reappear again before the Day of the Lord? This "already/not yet" tension is common in the NT and may very well lie behind this saying of Jesus (Wink). In short, Elijah is a prophet whose presence suggests the end time, whether in his return at the end or in the ministry of John the Baptist.

1.5. The So-Called Double Elijah Theme and the Lukan Portrait of Jesus and Elijah. Fitzmyer has argued that Luke has a "double Elijah" motif. Jesus denies that he is Elijah and applies the ascription to John the Baptist, even though the Baptist thinks that Jesus is Elijah. The theme of denial reappears when Jesus rejects a ministry of judgment (Lk 9:54-56). On the other hand, Luke implicitly compares Jesus' ministry to that of Elijah (Lk 4:25-27; 7:16; 9:8, 19, 62). However, Luke 3:16 and 7:19 refer to Jesus as "the one to come," thereby depicting Jesus as messianic, not prophetic (cf. "one to come" in Lk 13:35 and 19:38). So John is not portrayed as expecting Jesus to be Elijah. In addition, Luke 7:16; 9:8 and 9:19 are confessions by the people, which are later shown to be inadequate (Lk 9:18-20). The parallel between Jesus' call to discipleship*—utilizing the imagery of putting hand to plow and not looking back (Lk 9:62)—and prophetic calls to allegiance is not surprising, given the prophetic character of Jesus' ministry.

In sum, the prophetic character of Jesus' ministry does allow comparisons to the great prophet Elijah, even though the two are not identified. Jesus' prophetic activity signals the presence of the eschaton, but he is not Elijah, the prophet of the eschaton, since Jesus is not the forerunner but "the one to come." For Luke the messenger of Malachi 3 is only John the Baptist and does not include Jesus (Lk 1:17; 7:27; contra Fitzmyer). Jesus parallels Elijah only in his eschatological activity.

Another suggested point of Elijah typology* is the call to rain down fire from heaven (Lk 9:54; cf. 2 Kings 1:10, 12, 14). Taken together with the reference to Jesus' being "received up" (Lk 9:51; cf. 2 Kings 2:9,10,11), these features are said to suggest an Elijah typology (Evans). Yet a third link is the refusal by Jesus to allow the newly called disciple to bid his family goodbye before setting out on the path of discipleship, an act distinctly unlike Elijah's permission for Elisha to tell his family* farewell (Lk 9:62; 1 Kings 19:20). Evans argues that by introducing this motif and omitting the material found in Mark 1:6 and 9:9-13, Luke begins his travel section (9:51—19:44) by framing his portrayal of Jesus as the "new Elijah." But it may be argued that Jesus' refusal to bring down fire from heaven (9:51-56) severs the connection, while the parallel of being "taken up to heaven" (Lk 9:51) only reflects that Jesus is specially blessed in his reception.
None of these allusions require the conclusion that Jesus is identified as the "new Elijah." The refusal to allow the disciple to bid farewell to his family shows the greater urgency of the era of Jesus. Jesus is not Elijah; he is more than Elijah. Luke's typology is one of "times" not "persons." There is allusion to Elijah's ministry in Luke, but it serves to cast Jesus' ministry in relief against the background of the great prophet of old. The time of salvation* has come, and it is a time which demands response.

2. Elisha.

2.1. Elisha in the OT and Ancient Judaism. Next to Elijah, Elisha stands as a second great DroDhet of the ninth century. 1 Kings 19:15-21 relates his call, but most of his ministry is recounted in 2 Kings 2—13. He is seen as Elijah's protégé, having been called by him and seen Elijah's rapture by a chariot of fire. Elisha's ministry involved not only prophetic declaration, but miraculous activity extending to raising the Shunamite's son from the dead (2 Kings 4:18-37, a miracle paralleling that of Elijah in 1 Kings 17:17-24), multiplying loaves (2 Kings 4:42-44) and healing Naaman of leprosy* (2 Kings 5:1-27).

There is only one brief intertestamental reference to Elisha, and it summarizes his career (Sir 48:12-14). It notes his presence at Elijah's departure, the inability of rulers to subdue him and his performance of miraculous deeds.

2.2. Elisha in the NT. In the one direct Gospel reference to Elisha, he is mentioned with Elijah as sharing a period of miraculous ministry—a time like that of Jesus (Lk 4:27). Jesus mentions the Naaman incident, which pictures a ministry to Gentiles* in a period of Israelite rejection, as a warning not to reject him as Israel had rejected Elisha (and Elijah).

Numerous events in Jesus' ministry bear similarity with the prophetic activity of Elisha. Jesus' ministry was introduced by a predecessor. He ministered in Galilee* and Samaria, a ministry that included a concern for the poor (see Rich and Poor) and outcast. Most of all, his miracles are similar to Elisha's. Jesus heals (see Healing) ten lepers (Lk 17:11,19), multiplies the loaves (Mt 14:13-21 par.; Mt 15:29-39; Jn 6:1-15) and raises a widow's only son (Lk 7:11-17, where Luke's language actually recalls Elijah's healing in 1 Kings 17:23). These connections show Jesus functioning at a level equal to and surpassing one of the most powerful of the OT prophets.
One final connection between Jesus and Elisha is the description of the call to the four disciples (Mt 4:18-22 par.). The description of the disciples immediately leaving their nets to follow him recalls the narrative of Elisha's call in 1 Kings 19:19-21, since it is similar in form. These called disciples pick up the mantle of Jesus, just as Elisha had done with the mantle of Elijah.

See also John the Baptist; Transfiguration; Typology.

D. L Bock

EMPEROR (ROMAN). See Rome

ESCHATOLOGY

The word refers to teaching about the last things, specifically to history's consummation and the events directly associated with it. Characteristic of the Gospels is the note of eschatological fulfillment and the focus of eschatological hope in the person of Jesus. Perhaps the pre-eminent contribution of modern NT scholarship has been the demonstration that eschatology lies at the heart of Jesus' message and indeed at the heart of all the NT.
1. The Message of Jesus

Against the once popular view of the kingdom of God as an evolving society, J. Weiss and A. Schweitzer argued around the turn of the century that Jesus expected history's near end. On their view, Jesus was a preacher of repentance* in the face of impending judgment.* Largely in response to this picture of Jesus as a mistaken apocalyptic visionary, C. H. Dodd developed his theory of "realized eschatology." According to Dodd, Jesus believed that the prophecies of the OT had already met fulfillment, that the "Day of the Lord" had arrived. Most contemporary scholars now think of Weiss and Schweitzer on the one hand and of Dodd on the other as representing two extremes, between which a third position commends itself. Jesus did believe that the kingdom of God had, in some sense, already come. At the same time he spoke of eschatological events still to occur. The phrase "already and not yet" is now a commonplace of scholarship (see Kingdom of God).

1.1. The Future. Jesus' future expectations were drawn first from the well of OT and Jewish tradition. He anticipated the resurrection* of the dead (Mk 12:18-27) and a great judgment (Lk 10:13-15; 11:31-32). He thought in terms of rewards for the righteous (Lk 6:20-23) and recompense for the wicked (Lk 6:46-49). He expected the end to be heralded by trouble for the saints (Lk 12:49-53) and, perhaps, by upheavals in nature (Mk 13:24-25). Exactly how Jesus imagined the coming aeon—whether as an earthly, millennia kingdom, or as an old-world-made-new, or as a completely new world—is unclear.

Jesus' major contribution to eschatology was christological. He made response to himself a criterion for judgment (Lk 12:8-9). He also probably identified his own fate with that of the Son of man* in Daniel 7 and conceived of himself as the messianic Son of David.* The fact that he chose twelve disciples*—a symbol of the restoration of the twelve tribes of Israel*—and stood above that group as its leader itself implies that he thought of himself as Israel's king.

1.2. The Present. Jesus did not relegate God's reign to the future. He explicitly announced its presence (Lk 11:20) and indirectly indicated its arrival by speaking of the defeat of Satan (Lk 10:18; 11:22), a secret presence (Mk 4:11-12, 26-29), new wine* (Mk 2:22), and a joy* opposed to fasting* (Mk 2:18-20). Although controversial, it is probable that Luke 17:20-21, in which the kingdom is "in your midst" refers to Jesus himself. His presence meant the presence of the kingdom.

1.3. The Relationship between Present and Future. Traditionally Christians have thought that the OT prophesies two messianic advents and that Jesus fulfilled certain OT prophecies at his first coming and will fulfill others at his second coming. But the distinction between two advents cannot be found in the OT and is foreign to Jewish eschatology. It is not likely that Jesus thought in terms of or spoke about two messianic advents. More probably the end time was for him constituted by a sequence of events, some of which had already occurred. The formulation "eschatology in the process of realization" (Jeremias, 230) is apt. The Messiah (see Christ) had appeared. Many prophecies had been fulfilled (Lk 17:18-23). But there had not been fulfillment without remainder. Much was left to unfold, particularly the Son of man's eschatological suffering and vindication (Mk 9:31).

1.4. When? According to the modern consensus, Jesus thought the eschatological judgment to be near. Recent attempts to deny this do not persuade. It must nonetheless be emphasized that Jesus rejected the type of chronological speculation found in some of the apocalypses (Lk 17:20-21) and plainly confessed his ignorance of the end's date (Mk 13:32). Further, Mark 13:20 (possibly dominical) and Luke 13:6-9 (probably dominical) assume that the day or hour of the consummation is not set in concrete, that its arrival is partly contingent upon divine grace and human response. In addition, Luke 10:13-15 and other texts reflect bitter disappointment over Jewish failure. How such disappointment affected Jesus' eschatological convictions we do not know; but the general failure of Israel to welcome the Messiah (something unforeseen by the tradition) cannot but have made for second thoughts about what the future held. Jesus' expectations were probably more contingent and indeterminate than many have supposed (see Apocalyptic Teaching; Destruction of Jerusalem).

2. The Gospel Writers.

All four Gospels reflect the "already and not yet" pattern, but Matthew's eschatology is more realized than Mark's, and John's even more so. Luke's views are much harder to characterize.

2.1. Mark. The author of Mark, like Jesus before him, thought of eschatology as in the process of realization. For him, however, Jesus had suffered, died and risen, and this meant that the eschatological tribulation and the general resurrection had already commenced.

2.1.1. The Future. What Mark expected is found primarily in Mark 13. Here we have a Christian version of what is found so often in Jewish pictures of the end (see Apocalyptic). There will be a time of trial and difficulty. False prophets will arise (13:5-6). There will be wars, earthquakes and famines (13:7-8). The faithful will suffer (13:9-13). Palestine will be afflicted with dangers (13:14-23). The heavens will show great signs (13:24-25). And then God's eschatological agent (Jesus) will appear (13:26-27).

2.1.2. The Past. Jesus inaugurated the time of eschatological fulfillment (1:14-15). Especially noteworthy are the significant correlations between Mark 13 (about the end of the age) and Mark 14—15 (about the end of Jesus). Compare 15:33 (darkness at the crucifixion) with 13:24 (darkness at the end); 15:38 (the Temple veil torn) with 13:2 (the Temple will be destroyed); 14:34, 37 (Jesus tells his disciples to "watch" then comes [erchetai] and finds [heuriskei] them sleeping [katheudontas]) with 13:35-36 ("watch lest the master come [elthôn] and find [heure] you sleeping" [katheudontas]); 14:10, 18, 21, 41 (Jesus is "delivered up") with 13:9 (the disciples will be "delivered up"); 14:53-65 (Jesus appears before a council of Jewish elders) with 13:9 (the disciples will appear before Jewish councils); 14:65 (Jesus is beaten) with 13:9 (the disciples will be beaten); 15:1-15 (Jesus before Pilate) with 13:9 (the disciples will stand before governors and kings). The meaning of these and other parallels, as well as of those between Mark 13 and Zechariah 9—14 (a little apocalypse) is plain: Jesus' end belongs to the eschatological drama (see Death of Jesus).

2.1.3. The Present. If the end began with the end of Jesus, then the period between the crucifixion and the Parousia must be eschatological time. The present (characterized by Mk 13:5-13) is conceptualized as the tribulation attendant upon the new age. That is, the sufferings of Jesus and of his church together constitute the labor pains after which the new world comes.

2.1.4. When? Mark 9:1 ("some standing here will not taste death before they see that the kingdom of God has come with power") may be taken to imply that Mark expected things to wind up shortly. But many scholars refer 9:1 to the Transfiguration* or the resurrection* or (less plausibly) the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (see Destruction of Jerusalem). Apart from 9:1 it seems probable that, given his view of the present, Mark did not reckon with history going on for any great period of time (cf. 13:30). Yet 13:32 means that no certainty surrounded the issue.

2.2. Matthew. Matthew's views on eschatology are very close to Mark's.

2.2.1. The Future. Almost everything that can be said about Mark's expectations holds equally for Matthew (if one does not follow the few who have thought Mt 24 to be a realized apocalypse fulfilled in A.D. 70). The one outstanding difference is a concentration on Jesus' role as the Son of man in the final judgment (13:41; 16:28; 25:31; etc.). Also, if krinontes in 19:28 means "ruling," the verse implies the eschatological salvation* of Israel (an idea not clearly present in Mark).

2.2.2. The Past. The emphasis on realized eschatology can be seen from two facts in particular First, Matthew sprinkled his narrative with so-called formula quotations (1:23; 2:15,18; etc.). These constantly remind readers that Jesus fulfilled the eschatological hopes and messianic expectations of Judaism.* Second, 27:51b-53 (unique to Matthew) recounts that Jesus was not the only one to rise from the dead: so did many saints. Thus the Messiah's vindication cannot be viewed in isolation. Rather, Jesus' resurrection inaugurated the general resurrection. Compare the pre-Pauline confession in Romans 1:3-4, which literally proclaims that Jesus was designated Son of God* by "(the) resurrection of the dead" (the Greek is the technical term for the general resurrection).

2.2.3. The Present. In Matthew, as in Mark, the present is eschatological time. Note especially that certain end-time prophecies of Mark 13 have been transferred to Matthew 10, with the result that the Christian mission draws to itself the language of eschatological tribulation. Also indicative of Matthew's outlook is the key promise of the Messiah's perpetual supporting presence (1:23; 18:20; 28:20). This brings to realization a Jewish eschatological expectation: God would be "with" his people especially in the latter days (Zech 8:23; Jub. 1:17,26; etc.). So the present is simultaneously the age of tribulation and the age of the kingdom's presence—precisely the view of Jesus.

2.2.4 When? There is no indication that Matthew held the consummation to be imminent. But his constant dwelling on eschatology and his conception of the present imply that he expected the end to come sooner rather than later.

2.3. Luke Luke's convictions—which must be reconstructed with the help of both Luke and Acts—are not easily determined. One fact, however, has seemed clear to many: Luke was especially conscious of the expanding interval of time between the first and second advents.

2.3.1. The Future. Luke believed that Jesus would return in the same way that he left (Acts 1:11), and that this event would open that day on which God judges the world by Jesus Christ (Acts 17:31). The Third Evangelist also believed in the general resurrection (Lk 20:27-40; Acts 24:15), but exactly how he envisaged the coming "times of refreshing" and "the restitution of all things" (Acts 3:19-21) is disputed.

2.3.2. The Past. Luke did not carry forward the connection between Jesus' end and the eschaton. Perhaps he shied away from some aspects of realized eschatology because it also characterized groups he perceived as heretical (proto-Gnostics?). Alternatively, many have urged that his perspective was due to a conception of salvation-history. H. Conzelmann claimed that in Luke-Acts history is divided into three stages: the period of Israel, the period of Jesus, the period of the church.* On this scheme the Jesus event, despite its fulfillment of OT prophecies, belongs to the past and is not properly eschatological. Several recent studies, however, have questioned Conzelmann and denied that Luke drove a wedge between history and eschatology. The issue demands further investigation.

2.3.3. The Present. "Eschatology in the process of realization" does not so obviously characterize Luke, and according to Conzelmann the time of the church is the time before the end, not part of the end. Present and future have been compartmentalized (cf the "before all this" of 21:12). It is just possible, however, that Luke recognized the eschatological content of such texts as Luke 1:32-33; 2:38; and Acts 2:17-21 and equated the church age with the inaugurated messianic kingdom (cf. 1 Cor 15:20-28).

2.3.4. When? Some have thought Luke held no near expectation, others that he thought the end very near. The disagreement is created by the existence in Luke-Acts of two different groups of texts. In one the end appears at hand (e.g., Lk 3:9; 18:7-8; 21:31-32), in the other there is an awareness of the delay of the Parousia (e.g., Lk 12:45; 19:11). Rather than dismissing one group in favor of the other it seems best to take Acts 1:7 ("It is not for you to know times or seasons") seriously and surmise that Luke thought the time of the end an open question.

2.4. John. One of the distinctive features of the Fourth Gospel is its great emphasis on realized eschatology.

2.4.1. The Future. Very little is said about the eschatological future. There is a yet outstanding "last day" (6:39), which will feature the resurrection (5:28-29; 6:39-40); but other specifics are lacking. Also, there is no hint at all as to when the last day will arrive.

2.4.2. The Past. John, like Mark and Matthew, associated the end of Jesus with end-time themes. In his gospel the death of Jesus is "the judgment of this world" (12:31). The crucifixion brings about the casting out of the devil (16:11; see Demon, Devil) and is associated with the destruction of "the son of perdition" (17:12; cf. 2 Thess 2:3). Moreover, in John the Son of man already has authority (5:27; cf. Dan 7:13-14), already judges (9:35-39; 12:30-34) and is already lifted up and exalted (3:14). One is tempted to say that in John, Jesus himself is the eschaton, its real content. When Jesus came, the end came.

2.4.3. The Present. In Johannine thought eternal life (6:47), living water (4:14), bread from heaven (6:25-34), divine sonship (1:12) and even the resurrection (5:25)—all things traditionally associated with the eschaton—may be experienced now. Although there is in all this more continuity with the other Gospels than often assumed, the constant emphasis on the realization of eschatological hopes dominates the Fourth Gospel. C. H. Dodd exaggerated only a little when he wrote of John: "All that the church hoped for in the second coming of Christ is already given in its present experience of Christ through the Spirit" (Dodd, 121).

3. Contemporary Interpretation.

The theological problems posed by eschatology are numerous and complex. Was Jesus wrong in his imminent expectation? Should eschatological language be translated into existentialist categories? Can Christians, after 2,000 years, still look forward to the Parousia? Adequate answers must take into account at least four considerations. First, the gospel prophecies were never intended to be understood with unimaginative literalness. Just as it is misguided to mine Genesis for scientific data about the physical universe, so too is it wrong to turn the similes and metaphors of NT eschatology into information about future cosmo-logical states.

Second, if it is the end which determines the meaning of what has gone before, then those preoccupied with the meaning of history and human existence must be preoccupied with history's conclusion and its relationship to the present. This explains the focus of the gospels. To grasp the significance of the here and now requires that vision be pulled from the present and cast toward the future. Third, salvation-history is not a predetermined scheme. It is rather a dynamic relationship between God and his people. The Lord of the Gospels can shorten the interim period (Mk 13:20) or lengthen it (Lk 13:6-9). His grace means that history is open and that there can be no eschatological timetable. True prophecy accordingly does not so much depict the future as isolate one possible course of events, one which can be communicated either as a warning which may or may not be heeded, or as a promise whose conditions may or may not be met.

Finally, the heart of eschatology is not when or what but who, not a schedule or a plan but a person. The Gospels move us to contemplate the future not by giving us a blueprint but by relating all to Jesus, Messiah and Son of man.

See also Apocalyptic; Apocalyptic Teaching Judgment.

D. C. Allison, Jr.
ETHICS OF JESUS

Biblical thought may generally be divided into two categories: theology and ethics. Theology is the attempt to understand God and his dealings with this world, while ethics is the human conduct which flows from that understanding. In Judaism* ethics was originally identified with the Law,* which was a gracious guide to the nation whose heart was to be in harmony with the God who was both its Father and king. In time, however, ethics degenerated for many into a preoccupation with outward acts, with no necessary corresponding inner loyalty to God. In Jesus' teaching we see a return to the radical belief in God as Father and king, a belief which for him pervades all areas of human life—social, intellectual, spiritual and moral. Other topics, such as eschatology,* rewards, punishments (see Heaven and Hell) and the Law itself, must be understood in the light of that central conviction.

1. Ethics, Eschatology and the Kingdom
2. Ethics and the Presence of the Kingdom
3. Ethics and Rewards
4. Ethics and the Law
5. Conclusion

1. Ethics, Eschatology and the Kingdom.

The relationship of ethics to the topics of eschatology and the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) is one of the most convoluted and confusing chapters in modern Gospel study. Much discussion has centered on the meaning and role of the so-called eschatological sections of the Gospels (see Apocalyptic Teaching; Eschatology) and their relationship to Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom. The modern discussion, unfortunately, has bogged down almost from the beginning as the result of three critical misunderstandings.
The first misunderstanding has been to go back to the usage of the OT or of the first-century Aramaic language (see Languages of Palestine), and from these backgrounds to try to fix limits on what the phrase "the kingdom of God" could have meant for Jesus. But Jesus spent a great deal of time explaining what he meant by the kingdom, and if so, it follows that he did not mean what his contemporaries meant by it.

The second misunderstanding, closely related to the first, is to attempt to make, as G. Dalman has done, a subtle distinction between the kingdom as "reign" rather than "realm." That it could not be both is hardly evident from Jesus' teaching. Even in English the word kingdom does service for both, and certainly few kings have ever exercised kingship without also having a realm over which to exercise it. We shall find ourselves in some difficulty if, when we hear Jesus talk of entering the kingdom of God, there is no realm into which his followers can enter. Few would believe that Jesus invited men and women to enter into the kingship of God—to share his sovereignty with him. What he invited was entry into that sphere of territory where God's kingly rule would be operating over them (see Church).

The third misunderstanding has been to ask whether the kingdom is present or future. Again, Jesus' teaching does not yield to such reductive reasoning. For him the kingdom is past, present and future.

1.1. The Modern Debate. The modern debate concerning the interrelationship of ethics, eschatology and the kingdom began in 1906 with A. Schweitzer's epochal work The Quest of the Historical Jesus. Schweitzer, having effectively dismissed all previous attempts to reconstruct the life of Jesus, then produced his own attempt, which was even more implausible than the ones he had rejected. Showing a complete disregard for critical method, Schweitzer declared that Jesus expected the coming of a "Son of man," other than himself, during his own ministry or during the mission of the Twelve, and that when that hope failed to materialize, he changed course and brought about his own crucifixion in order to force God's hand (see Historical Jesus).

While this reconstruction was to win few enthusiasts, it had an unfortunate aftermath. What Schweitzer had erected was a colossal blunder—the "end-of-the-world Jesus"—which has, despite the arguments of critics from C. H. Dodd onward, weighed heavy on the ground of NT study. And perhaps what is most disturbing is that all that was needed to bring down the structure was the wrecking ball of accurate description.

But lack of exegetical accuracy was not the only difficulty with Schweitzer's theory. Another was its failure to accommodate ethical teaching to the question of eschatology. Having insisted with J. Weiss that eschatology was the indispensable framework for the interpretation of NT teaching, he was then faced with the ethical teaching of the Gospels, which he declared to be an "interim ethic" (Interimsethik)—an ethic of impractical idealism which could never have been designed for a long period. It was possible for Jesus to talk in this way only because he believed that the interval between his preaching and the end of the world was so short that he could afford to be impractical. That view of the ethics of Jesus was soon met not only with blanket incredulity but substantial arguments to the contrary. In the ethical teaching of Jesus (as in the ethics of the whole NT), the sanctions for the teaching are only in very rare cases the expectation of a future crisis. The reasons are nearly always based on what God has done, on the character of God himself, on the character of Jesus or on the nature of the Christian revelation. They are certainly not based on any final crisis.

Another writer to deal extensively with the question of the kingdom and eschatology was R. Bultmann. Reacting to Schweitzer, Bultmann observed that a teacher who believed that the end of the world was close would hardly have devoted so much of his time to arguments about the Jewish Law and how one should live in this world. Bultmann's answer was to understand both eschatology and ethics existentially; while it cannot be denied that Jesus had an apocalyptic* belief in the near end of the world, modern men and women who reject such primitive thinking can still see in the eschatological announcement and ethical demand the critical moment when they confront God.* Bultmann's approach has been heavily criticized, even by his own pupils. In addition to replacing a first-century Jewish framework with a modern philosophical one, his position was fatally stricken by an uncritical acceptance of the notion that first-century people accepted with naive literalness their images of God and the universe. It is now recognized that figures such as Jesus and Paul were as aware of the metaphorical nature of their language as are sophisticated moderns like Bultmann (see Myth).

Yet another major contributor to the debate was C. H. Dodd. According to Dodd's influential The Parables of the Kingdom (1941), Jesus proclaimed that the kingdom had arrived fully in his preaching, and that all future elements were realized in the present (hence, "realized eschatology"). Statements about the future were actually symbols for the present. Dodd's denuding of the kingdom of all futurity prompted a quick reaction, with some critics accusing him of being a Platonist. Dodd subsequently revised his views so as to account for future kingdom references in Jesus' teaching.

Other writers have proposed varying solutions to the problem of how present and future cohere in the teaching of Jesus. W. G. Kümmel suggested that Jesus understood the kingdom as the ultimate end of history, but that it was present in a proleptic manner in his own life and work. J. Jeremias produced a view almost indistinguishable from Dodd's, while G. E. Ladd tried to maintain an equal balance between present and future. On the whole most recent writers have viewed Jesus' eschatology as lying somewhere between thoroughgoing (e.g., Schweitzer) and realized (e.g., Dodd), with each element variously weighted.

2. Ethics and the Presence of the Kingdom.

As noted above, any attempt to limit the kingdom in Jesus' teaching to either present or future is to be rejected. Both elements are present in the Gospels—although, as we shall see, the present aspects far outweigh the future as the backdrop for Jesus' ethical pronouncements.

Those passages which indicate that the kingdom of God is in some sense still to come are, of course, not difficult to trace. Mark occasionally uses "the kingdom of God" to refer to that eternal life* beyond the grave which is the goal of the process (9:47; 14:25). In another sense Jesus is a king who has not yet entered his royal status (10:37), whose coronation occurs only when the places on his right and his left are occupied by those to whom they have been assigned (15:17,27). Luke's version of the Lord's Prayer (see Prayer) contains the phrase "your kingdom come" (Lk 11:2)—although Matthew adds the gloss, "your will be done on earth, as it is in heaven" (6:10), which shows that for him God's reign is active on earth so long as there are human agents to do his will. In Mark 14:25 (par. Mt 26:29 and Lk 22:18) Jesus says, "I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine* until I drink it new in the kingdom of God," while Matthew 7:21-22 and 25:34 depict the kingdom as the final reward of the righteous (for other future references, cf., e.g., Mt 16:28; Mk 10:30; Lk 18:30).

But by far the overall tenor of Jesus' teaching supports Dodd's contention that for Jesus the kingdom was already substantially present. There are in fact eight possible ways to understand the kingdom in the ministry of Jesus, all of which, in various ways, illuminate Dodd's emphasis on the presence of the kingdom.

2.1. The Kingdom Is Present As the Fulfillment of Prophecy. Here the primary text is Mark 1:15: "The time has come, the kingdom of God has drawn near (ēngiken), repent and believe the Gospel." What is most significant in this passage is that the first two verbs are in the perfect (i.e., past) tense. Mark could well have used the present "the time is coming, the kingdom is drawing near." Something appears to have happened for Jesus to speak in this way. The verb engiken, furthermore, while it is related to the adjective engus. "near," must in Mark 1:15 mean "has arrived." For the Hebrews the expressions "draw near" or "bring near" were simply idiomatic expressions for "arrive" or "put". The former usage is well known from Lamentations 4:18 (LXX): there engiken ho kairos hēmōn, eplērōthēsan hm hēmerai hēmōn, parestin ho kairos hēmōn means "our end drew near, our days were numbered, for our end had come." "Draw near" (ēngiken) and "have come" (parestin) are synonymous expressions (cf. also Ezek 7:3-12 LXX). The latter usage appears also in (e.g.) Leviticus 2:8, where to bring a sacrifice "near" to the altar means to place it upon the altar—not to drop it halfway between the altar and the Tabernacle entrance.

Two other points in regard to Mark 1:15 need to be noted. First, "The time has fully come." What time? Clearly the time proclaimed in OT prophecy. Second, "Repent and believe the gospel." But what is the gospel? Clearly it is an announcement (see Gospel [Good News]). The word euangelion is often translated as "good news"; but regularly in the LXX it means, simply, "news" (Heb l/sōrā). And any Jew who believed that at the end of time God would bring in an eschatological kingdom would have found little "news" in being told that this was still true and that nothing had subsequently altered the picture. If Jesus is proclaiming news, it is because he has something new to say.

The one context in the OT where we find the term euangelion frequently in use is in the prophecies of Isaiah 40—66. To the prophet "the good news" is the proclamation "Behold your God." And when we come to Isaiah 52:7—"How lovely on the mountain are the feet of the herald who comes to proclaim the prosperity and bring good news"—we find a news of deliverance which calls to Zion, "Your God reigns" (52:8). In Isaiah 40—66 the good news is that God has arrived; he has come upon the scene of history to make his presence felt. Above all, he has come to assert his kingly power: "Your God has taken up the power of government and is reigning over his world." And if we can accept this as the character of the Isaian prophecy, it would be perverse to argue that Jesus was echoing the prophecy in his declaration without also insisting that he was proclaiming, "Your God is here; your God reigns."

But what could such kingly power mean in the time of Jesus? It is seldom considered that this question might equally have been asked in 545 B.C. At that time outward appearances hardly justified the idea that God's primal reign of justice* had already begun. Jerusalem was in ruins, its leaders were in exile, and most were reluctant to return to Palestine to rebuild a ruined city. The prophet was idealizing, proclaiming that the sovereign reign of God is a reality even in these depressing circumstances, inviting Israel* to respond and be ready to receive their God. And if a prophet can do that five-and-a-half centuries before Jesus, there is no reason why Jesus should not have proclaimed also that in this hostile, unrepentant and beleaguered world, the kingdom of God has become a present reality.

2.2. The Kingdom Is Present As a Divine Power Breaking in upon the Kingdom of Satan and Overthrowing the Power of Satan in the World. This point is made with special clarity in Jesus' response to the claim that he drives out demons by the authority of Beelzebul (see Demon, Devil, Satan): "If I by the finger of God cast out demons, the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Lk 11:20; Mt 12:28). What is most interesting about this inbreaking is that it is not conditional upon belief. In Luke's version of the proclamation of the missionaries to the cities of Galilee,* the message is "the kingdom of God has arrived..." (ēngiken ... he basileia tou theou, Lk 10:9). Elsewhere (Lk 16:16), the kingdom is being proclaimed (euangelizetai, present tense) and people are taking it by force (biaietai, present tense). We are clearly dealing with an explosion of activity which cannot be easily defined or categorized, but which is impacting the current state of affairs.

2.3. The Kingdom Is Present As a Small Beginning with Great Potential. In the three parables* of growth (the mustard seed, the seed growing secretly, and the leaven, Mk 4:26-32; Mt 13:33; Lk 17:31), the kingdom has arrived, but in small, unexpected ways. It is like the mustard seed: One may not think much of it at the moment, but it has immense potential. It is like a little leaven which is put into the loaf and causes it to expand. It is like a seed which is put into the soil and produces its fruit The kingdom is here. Do you find it hard to believe? Wait for the results. Do not be downhearted, nor take much notice of circumstances which appear to belie this gospel announcement What is small now will have considerable results later. Under this heading we might also add (although with some tentativeness) the mysterious saying of Mark 9:1: "There are some standing by who will not taste death until they see the kingdom having come with power."

The parables of growth entice us to draw distinctions between the coming of the kingdom, the kingdom arriving as a present reality and its future coming with power (see Authority and Power). It is, of course, extremely difficult to determine what Jesus intended by the "kingdom coming with power"—and what Mark thought he intended. But one meaning which may be ruled out in both instances is the Parousia. Our concern here, however, is the contrast between the coming of the kingdom incognito and its open coming with power in the future.

2.4. The Kingdom Is Present As an Opportunity Requiring Resolute Action. Here the parables of the pearl and of the treasure in the field (Mt 13:44-46) are especially noteworthy. In the second, as is so often the case in the parables of Jesus, we are not to ask niggling questions about the morality of the transaction. As with the parable of the unjust steward (Lk 16:1-9), the point of comparison is the need for resolute and determined action in the face of a crisis. Here is an opportunity which will not occur again; it is an opportunity to be grasped, even at the sacrifice of all else.

2.5. The Kingdom Is Present A Call to Responsibility and Labor. In the parable of the two sons (Mt 21:28-31) a man says to one son, "Go, work in the vineyard," to which the son responds yes—but does not go. The other son is asked the same thing, and says no—but goes. "Which did the will of his father?" The appended comment from Jesus is, "Yes, and prostitutes* and tax* collectors are going into the kingdom ahead of you Pharisees." Here, the willing but disobedient son of the parable is applicable to the Pharisees. Unlike them, prostitutes and tax collectors are already entering the kingdom (see Sinner).

2.6. The Kingdom Is Present As a Way of Life Which Demands Total Obedience to God and Complete Self-Sacrifice. This theme appears in Matthew 5:26-33; Mark 8:34-37 and Mark 10:17-23. In the latter passage the hearer fails to follow Jesus and Jesus' response is, "How hard it is for the rich to enter the kingdom of God!" Following Jesus and entering the kingdom are equated. In Luke 9:57-62 (par. Mt 8:18-22) the three claimants to discipleship* each want to be included among Jesus' disciples. Again, when Jesus says that the last one is not fit for the kingdom, the natural implication is that being a disciple* of Jesus and entering the kingdom are different ways of describing the same thing. One could possibly hold that the kingdom is the transcendent, everlasting kingdom for which one qualifies by being a disciple here on earth. But this would not be the natural way of taking the words. Those who become disciples of Jesus enter the service of the kingdom, and only those who are prepared to undergo drastic sacrifice are fit for the kingdom.

Luke 12:31-32 is the end of a passage which in very similar words is recorded by Matthew in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6:34; see Sermon on the Mount). Luke's version, "But seek his kingdom and these things shall be added to you," is especially intriguing. What does he mean by "seeking his kingdom"? Is this a lifelong quest which ends only at death or at the Parousia? Or is it following Jesus in such a way that the present claims of the kingdom are put above all others? This passage raises the same question as the previous one. There are proper things which ought to be done, but in any ethical scheme there must also be a hierarchy of values, with following Jesus/entering the kingdom taking priority over all other claims.

2.7. The Kingdom Is Present As a Call to New Life and Service. In Jesus' teaching the paidion sayings (Mk 10:13-16 par. Mt 19:13-15 and Lk 18:15-17; Matt 18:3), which stress the necessity of being like a child (see Child, Children), must be taken in tandem with the servant sayings (Lk 22:26; Mk 10:43 par. Mt 20:26; see Chilton and McDonald)—the most obvious point of contact being the Greek root pais, which may mean either "child" or "servant" Yet the comparison moves beyond mere lexical likeness. Children embody a lack of self-consciousness and a newness of life, with their only point of reference being trust in the parent Servants are likewise single-minded; they are concerned solely with serving the master. For Jesus the call of the kingdom is a call to newness and a job to be done, not a summons to spiritual self-awareness or an introverted search for salvation.*

2.8. The Kingdom Is Present Not Only As a Challenge to Individuals But As a Challenge to the Nation. In Luke 12:32 we read, "Fear not little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." We will miss the national character of this saying (as well as that of the complementary passage in Mk 6:34 where Jesus observes that "the people were like sheep without a shepherd") if we are unfamiliar with the OT picture of the nation as a flock and the king as the shepherd (see Shepherd, Sheep). The classic text is Ezekiel 34, where the shepherds of Israel (the national leaders) are abandoning the flock. God answers, "I will be shepherd of my flock, I will make them lie down, I will seek the lost I will bring back the strayed . . . and I will set up over them one shepherd, my servant David" (34:15-27). It is the anointed king who is the shepherd of the flock. When Jesus addresses his disciples in this manner his language cannot but carry messianic and national overtones.

That much of Jesus' teaching is a political challenge to the nation of Israel* is central to an accurate appreciation of his ethical teaching (Caird, Borg). In this regard the common distinction between "personal" and "social" in the ethics of Jesus is somewhat misleading. Israel had always been intended to be a community of "the one and the many," in which what affects the smallest member affects the whole—and vice versa. Social and personal dimensions could never ultimately be separated, and it is only a divorce of Jesus from his Jewish context which enables such a distinction to continue to flourish.

Recent opinion which stresses the role of politics in Jesus' disputes with the Pharisees point out that both sides of the debate were asking the same question: "What does it mean for Israel to be the holy nation of God?" For centuries the Jews had been preoccupied with questions concerning their national destiny as the chosen people, and especially with their undeserved suffering at the hands of the Gentile* empires. But when God would bring his kingdom of justice and peace* to earth, the tables would be turned, and Israel would reign over all.

Jesus does not challenge the close connection between Israel's destiny and its election, but for him God's sovereignty is the primary consideration. If God were truly their king they would know that they had been chosen not as vessels of vengeance but as a beacon light, pointing the way of salvation for all. Suffering and service,* not nationalism and pride, was to constitute their corporate life, a role Jesus acted out in his own experience and which he encouraged in his friends. In his understanding even paying taxes* to Caesar (Mk 12:17; Mt 22:21; Lk 20:25) was not incompatible with giving a full and uncompromising obedience to God.

Herein has lain yet another mistake in interpreting the ethical teaching of Jesus. His comment regarding paying taxes to Caesar has been used by some (e.g., Martin Luther) to establish a complex theory that God has set up two realms, the divine and the secular, each with its own clearly defined aegis. Jesus' point was not intended to be put to this use. Far from establishing any elaborate theology, Jesus was answering a simple question of ethics. How far must I go in this world in trying to live with my enemies? The implications of his teaching can, of course, be drawn out and applied to a later age, but this should not be allowed to replace its original and sublimely simple meaning: insofar as it does not conflict with your duty to God, do all you can to live at peace with your adversaries (cf. also Mt 5:41, where "the extra mile" probably refers to the right of a Roman soldier to impress a Jewish native to carry his pack for a limited distance).

Ultimately, then, Jesus is confronting the Jews with a challenge: first let them learn what it means for God to rule over them; then perhaps they will know what place they will have in God's ultimate plan for the earth.

3. Ethics and Rewards.

In the light of what we have said above, the presence of the kingdom in Jesus' teaching may now be regarded as a datum from which other features of that teaching may be construed. And one of the most frequently discussed issues arising from Jesus' statements about the kingdom concerns the role of rewards and punishments. Both themes are well attested in the teaching of Jesus (for rewards cf., e.g., Mt 6:4, 6, 18; 16:27; for punishment cf., e.g., Mt 5:22, 29, 30; 7:19; 10:28; 13:49-50; 18:6; 25:30). To students of ethics both elements have always appeared as a difficulty; to do things out of a fear of punishment or hope of reward is not regarded as the highest of ethical motivations (see Heaven and Hell).

To this it must be admitted that there is an element of pragmatism in the ethical teaching of Jesus: "By their fruits you shall know them" (Mt 7:20 par. Lk 6:44). He judges by results, which was very different from the religion of most Pharisees.* They obeyed the Law not because it was sensible or reasonable or leads to desirable consequences, but simply because it was commanded. It was sheer, naked obedience. The rabbis could then take the view that all of the commandments are equal, since each gives equal opportunity to obey the will of God.

Jesus, on the other hand, distinguished between the Law's weightier and lesser matters (see Law). Sometimes it has been charged that his teaching on reward has the effect of making ethics prudential—it is nothing more than enlightened self-interest. To do good for the sake of gain is mercenary, even if that gain is spiritual.

What significance, then, do the elements of judgment and reward have in the teaching of Jesus. This question may be treated under seven heads:

3.1. Jesus Distinguished between Two Types of Reward. "Do not announce your good deeds with a flourish of trumpets. Those who do already have their reward" (apechousin ton misthon, Mt 6:2). The Greek verb apexhō was the word ordinarily used on a receipt, meaning "paid in full." Hence, for Jesus outward acts do, of themselves, carry a certain recompense (here, worldly recognition). But there is a deeper, more satisfying type of reward which Jesus advocates, and this reflects his pervasive distinction between that which is arbitrary and that which is proper. Arbitrary rewards have nothing to do with the nature of the activity being rewarded (e.g., "practice the piano two hours a day and you will get a new bicycle"); proper rewards are intrinsic to the activity itself (e.g., "practice the piano two hours a day and one day you will be able to play Mozart"). For Jesus the joys of the kingdom are the result of being a certain kind of person.

3.2. Jesus Encouraged Disinterested Goodness. Some deeds are to be done out of the uncalculating goodness of the heart "If one in authority makes you go one mile, go with him two" (Mt 5:41). "When you are having guests for lunch or supper, do not invite your friends, your brothers or other relations, or your rich neighbors; they will only ask you back again, and so you will be repaid. But when you give a party, ask the poor, the crippled, the lame and the blind. That is the way to find happiness, because they have no means of repaying you" (Lk 14:12-14 REB). Disinterested goodness does not expect to be repaid. It is true that Luke has Jesus add, "You will be repaid on that day when the good rise from the dead" (Lk 14:14 REB), but there are no grounds for understanding this to mean anything extrinsic to the activity. We might paraphrase Jesus as saying: "If you do good out of the uncalculating goodness of your heart, then in the resurrection* you will have the reward of being confirmed as the sort of person who enjoys doing good out of the uncalculating goodness of your heart"

3.3. Acts Art the Fruit of Character. This is more radical than anything we have yet encountered. Those who have a legal religion are told what to do; and the Pharisees on the whole believed that ethics consisted mainly in taking the Law and doing what it says. According to Jesus, if you are the wrong sort of person you cannot do what you are told. First make the tree good, then the acts will follow (Mt 7:16-20). Good is the fruit which grows spontaneously on the tree of good character, an emphasis that profoundly deepens the quality of human ethics by insisting that it has to do not with acts but with what one is.

What one is determines what one does—a theory opposed not only to Pharisaism but also to classical Greek ethics, especially those of Aristotle. According to Aristotle, habit is the product of constantly doing the right thing; if one does it long enough, it becomes habitual, and one ends up being good. Aristotle and the Pharisees could agree that goodness is achieved by doing right until it becomes a habit Jesus declares this to be impossible; only a good tree can produce good fruit (a point to be elaborated later by Paul in Rom 7:4-6 and Gal 5:22-23). Jesus looked for people who would not merely do good but be good, who enjoy goodness and for whom goodness is its own reward. This ethical point has a profound theological element within it as appears in the parable of the sheep and the goats (Mt 25:32-34). The reward for good conduct is the invitation "enter into the joy* of your Lord." The ultimate reward is being the kind of person who can enjoy God. The true end of human beings is to glorify God and enjoy him forever, an idea which would then raise for Jesus' hearers a question: are they the sort of people who would enjoy God?

3.4. Good Ads Issuing from Good Character Is the Kind of Ethic Contained in the Beatitudes. Jesus' repeated words "Blessed are those . . ." suggest that the proper end of men and women is bliss. The Beatitudes (Mt 5:3-12; Lk 6:20-26) describe in a variety of ways how eternal bliss can be anticipated here and now by living the life of the kingdom (set Sermon on the Mount). "Blessed are the poor in spirit" (Mt 5:3; cf. Lk 6:20, "Blessed are you poor"). Some of the verb tenses are future, but it is clear that this bliss is to be anticipated in the present

With that Aristotle certainly would have agreed. In the tenth book of Ethics he sums up ethical obligation with the phrase "as far as possible here and now to live the life of heaven." But in the Beatitudes Jesus has turned normal human ethics upside down. The whole of Aristotle's ten books of Ethics is concerned with the nature of happiness; the true end of men and women is to be happy. As we have just seen, Jesus does not disagree with this. But of what does true happiness consist? "Wealth, joy, satisfaction and popularity" are the usual worldly answers. Jesus, however, addresses those for whom such temporal prizes have failed to satisfy. Wealth? "Blessed are you poor." Joy? "Blessed are you who mourn." Satisfaction? "Blessed are you who are hungry." Popularity? "Blessed are you when people hate you" (Lk 6:20-22). And if Jesus pronounces his benediction on these antitheses of worldly goals, it is because it is precisely the poor, the mourning, the hungry and the persecuted who are most open to receive the better gifts of God.

The above point is most easily grasped in the beatitude about the hungry (Lk 6:21; Mt 5:6). When is it blessed to be hungry? Just before dinner. Why is it blessed to be hungry? Because Jesus comes to announce the messianic banquet (set Table Fellowship). It is ready, and blessed are those who are hungry for it, who come to it with the most need for its unimaginable bounty. Undeterred by the bogus satisfactions of the present age, they are those who hunger for the banquet which only God has to offer.

3.5. Jesus Repudiated Any Idea of Moral Contract. Here the principal witness is Matthew's parable of the laborers in the vineyard (Mt 20:1-16). Some work the full day, others work only one hour. And when the owner pays them all the same day's wage, he meets the expected complaint by saying, "You contracted with me for one denarius, and I paid you the contract money; so what are you grumbling about?" The modern answer, of course, would be "differential." But the point of the parable is that God does not operate according to contracts. He pays men and women what they need, not what they have earned. So also the parable of Luke 17:7-10: Is the master grateful to the servant for carrying out orders? If one reckons in terms of duty done, then duty to God is unlimited; no matter how far one goes, enough has never been done. But the intention of this is not to load the human psyche with an impossible task, only to explode the notion that God deals with people in such a way. There is no such thing as a moral contract.

It follows that the Sermon on the Mount and the Beatitudes in particular, must not be regarded as new Law but as descriptive of life in the kingdom. So also in Mark 10:17-27, the story of the rich man who wanted to enter the kingdom of God. "What must I do to inherit eternal life?" he asks. The first thing he learns is that this is not the right question. If it is a matter of doing, it will mean unlimited demands. The disciples wonder, "Who then can be saved?" If the privileged cannot, what hope have the underprivileged? Jesus does not respond, "Oh, how easy it is for the underprivileged!" Rather, he says that with humans it is impossible, but not with God. With God all things are possible. Jesus thus undermines the whole contract system under which the man was operating.

The rewards that Jesus offers are open precisely to those who recognize that they cannot earn them, a point made most forcibly by the parable of the Pharisee and the publican (Lk 18:9-14). If obedience is possible, it is only because it is God's gift Jesus requires unlimited obedience, but he also says, "Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom" (Lk 12:32). It is for this reason that Jesus constantly emphasizes the calling of the downtrodden. They are the ones to whom he offers the free gift of God. For Jesus the ethical requirements of the Gospel are possible not because men and women are capable of doing them. They are possible because with God all things are possible.

3.6. For Jesus, God Is the Ultimate Reward. In Luke 10 we find a number of judgments* pronounced on the cities of Galilee, and while these statements probably refer to imminent historical crises (Caird, Borg), they carry an implication for the theme in general. The last judgment means confronting God. Jesus' ethical principles are determined by his extraordinary affirmation that life, here and hereafter, is to be lived in the presence of God. It is from that central claim that all the statements about reward issue; God himself is the ultimate reward. For those who disregard the gospel of the kingdom, whose selfish horizons are bounded completely by this world, the presence of God would be far more terrifying than anything to be found in the lake of fire. But for those who practice the presence of God in this life, the vision of God in the next (Mt 5:8) is the final and fitting conclusion to their journey.

3.7. The Law of the Kingdom h the Law of Love, and Those Who Love Reap the Reward of Being Like the Father of Love. The great commandment "You shall love* your neighbor as yourself" (Lev 19:18), is repeated by Jesus as the sum total of the Law (Mk 12:28-31 par. Mt 22:34-40 and Lk 10:25-29; cf. Rom 13:10), but he weds it to Deuteronomy 6:4 ("You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and all your soul and all your mind," Mt 22:37; Mk 12:30). This double command stands at the head of Jesus' ethical teaching as its quintessence. The uniting of the two commandments prevents love in Jesus' teaching from being misunderstood as a simple humanistic desire directed blindly at others, or a narcissistic preoccupation with oneself. For Jesus love of others and of oneself is possible only if one first loves the God of Israel with all one's being.

The so-called Golden Rule (Mt 7:12; Lk 6:31) is found in other religions and philosophies, albeit in a negative form. The Rabbi Hillel, for example, said, "What you do not wish done to you, do not to others; this is the Law, and all the rest is commentary." Inaction, on the other hand, is regarded by most ethicists as an unacceptable standard. It is hardly comparable with an ethic of unlimited concern and action on behalf of others. G. B. Caird has put it as follows: "The Pharisees, in their passionate devotion to the Law, attempted to make it applicable to every vicissitude of daily life; and their method was to spell out in detail the exact reference of its terms, so as to define the precise limits of their liability. The question 'who is my neighbor?' is a request for definition; and the answer of Jesus frustrates the lawyer's desire to define his liability (Lk 10:29). . . . The righteousness which exceeds that of the Pharisees demands a positive commitment to the well-being of others; it is an ethic of unlimited liability" (Caird 1985, 24).

Luke's version, "You must be merciful" (6:36; see Mercy), is amplified by Matthew into the form "You must be perfect" (5:48). A great deal of commentary has been expended on Matthew's interpretation, which is often portrayed as an impossible ideal. In the OT, however, to be perfect is a human virtue indicating total loyalty (compare the "purity of heart" of Mt 5:8, which S. Kierkegaard once defined as "to will one thing"). Mercy, on the other hand, is the very nature of the God of Israel.

The law of non-retaliation (Mt 5:38-42) appears to be a reversal of the lex talionis of Exodus 21:24 ("an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth"), Leviticus 24:20 and Deuteronomy 19:21, and thus has implications for Jesus' view of the Law (see 4. below). Some commentators, furthermore, have pointed out that to refuse to resist evil, even to encourage it (implied by turning the other cheek, inviting another blow), has often seemed unrealistic, if not outright immoral (cf. Dungen). On this two things may be said:

First "love" in Jesus' command does not mean that Christians should have the same feeling for a Nero or a Hider that they have for their family or friends. What Jesus requires is the unnatural act of putting others first, an act which will not be frustrated even by the abuse and hatred of an antagonist This is the very nature of God. He does not return evil for evil (Mt 5:43-45; Lk 6:27-31); he expects no compensation (Mt 5:46-48; Lk 6:32-36); he does not prematurely condemn (Mt 7:1-5; Lk 6:37-38; cf. 1 Cor 13:4-7). Those, on the other hand, who harbor hatred in their hearts are guilty in God's eyes of murder (Mt 5:21-26), a precept the world cannot accept While those who retaliate think that they have heroically resisted aggression, in fact they have made a complete surrender to evil. "Where before there was one under the control of evil, now there are two. Evil propagates by contagion. It can be contained and defeated only when hatred, insult and injury are absorbed and neutralized by love” (Caird 1968,104).

Second, "turn the other cheek" is almost certainly an aphorism (see Chreia/Aphorism). Aphorisms are a common feature of human speech, and at times they are mutually contradictory (e.g., "Penny wise, pound foolish"; "look after the pennies, and the pounds will take care of themselves"). Such sayings are true of a certain person or situation. Elsewhere, Jesus implies that it is legitimate to resist evil. Rather than accepting the teaching of the Pharisees, for instance, he repudiates them for the wrongs they have committed against the people of the land (Lk 11; Mt 23). When struck on the cheek at his trial (Jn 18:22-23; see Trial of Jesus), Jesus is not seen to accept the affront quietly or to encourage another blow, but protests against its injustice. In Matthew 18:15-17 wrongs committed within the church are to be confronted and resolved, with the possible punishment of excommunication. It would seem that there are some instances in the Gospels where it is right and proper to remonstrate with an evildoer rather than let evil go unchecked.

4. Ethics and the Law.

Granted that this is the tone of Jesus' ethical teaching, what then becomes of the Law? It is sometimes said that Jesus intended to found a new Torah, or at least that Matthew held this view of Jesus' teaching. In fact both impressions are false. The evidence that for Matthew Jesus is a new lawgiver is limited mainly to the arrangement of his teaching in five lengthy discourses, the first of which is given on a mountain, and the six so-called antitheses of Matthew 5:21-48. But over against these must be set other passages, particularly Matthew 5:17-20, which few will question enshrines Matthew's view of the Law and ethics (see Matthew, Gospel of).

The debate concerns whether, and to what extent Matthew 5:17-20 represents Jesus' view. Much depends on the interpretation of almost every word of every sentence. What is meant, for instance, by "fulfilling" the Law or by possessing a "righteousness beyond that of the Scribes* and Pharisees," or by keeping "the least of these commandments*"? Such things could, of course, mean "to obey," to keep the Law in its entirety. But this would make Jesus a martinet a legalist par excellence. This reading is ruled out entirely both by the overall impression of Jesus' life and by Matthew's intention in his succeeding chapters to depict Jesus as setting aside parts of the Law (at least the ritual parts concerning cleanness and uncleanness), and introducing drastic modifications of other parts. Or, on the other hand, "fulfilling the Law" could indicate a penetration into the depths of the intention of the Law, fulfilling its spirit rather than the details of its outward aas (see 4.7. below).

The great objection to the latter interpretation remains the "jot" (iota) and "tittle" (keraia) of verse 18. On the surface this appears to indicate a meticulous and literalistic legalism. But such an idea contradicts the manner in which Jesus behaves in the rest of the Gospels. There he is often attacked by the Pharisees precisely because he is not a legalist One way out of the dilemma is to claim that Matthew 5:17-20 is Matthew's teaching, not that of Jesus. But this is unlikely insofar as we find the same tension preserved in Luke. In Luke 16:16-18 are three verses wedged between two Lukan parables commonly attributed to the Q* source (see Synoptic Problem), but which make an odd sequence. But it does not take long to see the connecting link: all three concern the Law. The first (v. 16) affirms that the Law has passed away, the second (v. 17) that the Law can never pass away, while the third (v. 18) demands a radical obedience which even the Pharisees did not require. Thus by most canons of Gospel criticism these Lukan verses provide some justification for thinking that Matthew 5:17-20 is not peculiarly Matthean. The only sense in which they can be seen as such is that Matthew may have found them isolated in his source and put them together in his own interesting juxtaposition. But there is no longer any reason to doubt that Matthew could here be representing the viewpoint of Jesus.

Another passage which undermines the conception that Matthew represents Jesus as a new lawgiver is Matthew 23:2-3. Here the denunciation of the Pharisees opens with a sanction of Moses' teaching. "The Scribes and Pharisees sit upon the seat of Moses.* Everything they tell you to do, do and observe. But do not do according to their works, for they say and do not do." But considering once again that in the Gospels Jesus spends much of his time engaging in debate with the Pharisees precisely over their respective interpretations of the Law, this instruction seems odd at the very least.

We are therefore faced all the way through with a mystery, a paradoxical nature of Jesus' teaching. Part of the explanation may lie in the nature of the Jewish Law. In addition to being the religious charter of the nation, the Torah was the civil and criminal code, and the Pharisees were its lawyers. In this case Matthew 5:20; 23:2-3 and Luke 16:17 probably raise the same questions as does Paul's advice in Romans 13:1-4: The civil powers are ordained by God; therefore, accept their authority.

If, then, there are indications that Jesus was in fact not a new lawgiver, what could he have been doing? The easiest way to understand his approach is to recognize that he is drawing a number of subtle distinctions. We may begin with his treatment of the Sabbath.

4.1. The Sabbath. There is little doubt that the breaking of the Sabbath by Jesus was one of the principal sources of friction with the Pharisees. In justice, however, it is important to realize what the Sabbath meant to them. The Sabbath was the outward symbol of the covenant with Israel (Ex 31:12-17). In the Diaspora the Sabbath was the primary bulwark against the assimilation of the Jews into the culture and religion of pagan society, and any threat to the Sabbath was a threat to the very existence of Israel. The Pharisees therefore had a legitimate cause for which they were fighting.

In light of this it comes as a surprise that in the Gospels Jesus is seen to break the Sabbath deliberately, an act which undermines both Pharisaic and Mishnaic concerns. The Pharisees in particular were zealous to obey all 613 commandments in their everyday life, and, unlike the backward-looking and conservative Sadducees, they were progressive in their earnest desire to understand what the Law means.

This desire is especially seen in the Pharisaic concern with defining "work." In the Mishnah, for example, work is broken down into thirty-nine different activities (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). This in turn gave rise to some very important disputes, such as whether a doctor may work on the Sabbath. Doctors, it was decided, could work on the Sabbath if death were imminent but in other cases they must desist (cf. Mk 1:32, where the people waited until the end of the Sabbath at sunset before presenting the sick to Jesus for healing*).

Jesus apparently had no such reservations. The Gospels relate four accounts in which he invited the wrath of the Pharisees by healing on the Sabbath, and in none of the four cases can the sick person be said to be in any immediate danger. One had a withered hand (Mk 3:1-6); two were paralytics, one for eighteen years (Lk 13:10-17), the other for thirty-eight (Jn 5:2-18); and one had dropsy (Lk 14:1-6). The Pharisee's claim that in each case the cure could have been delayed one more day seems justified. And yet in all four cases Jesus goes on the offensive, choosing the Sabbath as the right day for such merciful interventions.
The gravamen of the Pharisees' complaint was that Jesus was setting himself above the Sabbath, and therefore changing the Law of Moses. Jesus' answer to this charge is found in his comment after he healed the woman who had been paralyzed: "Was it not necessary that this woman, a daughter of Abraham* whom Satan has bound for eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the Sabbath day?" (Lk 13:16). In Mark's three passion predictions (Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:32-34) the important word dei, "it is necessary," is used to denote a divine necessity for Jesus' death laid down for him in Scripture. There was also a divine necessity for healing on the Sabbath, insofar as the Sabbath was divinely ordained to be for Israel a foretaste of the kingdom of God. By healing those bound by the kingdom of Satan, Jesus had enabled the kingdom of God to break in upon human life (Lk 11:20; Mk 3:27). Thus, since the Sabbath was a foretaste of the kingdom, there was no better day for him to perform his acts of mercy. Since the kingdom had arrived, the Son of man (see Son of Man) was Lord* of the Sabbath (Mk 2:28).

When Jesus' disciples pluck ears of grain on the Sabbath (Mk 2:23-28), it therefore comes as no surprise that Jesus should appeal to David's example in 1 Samuel 21:1-6, with the added comment that "the Sabbath was made for humankind, not humankind for the Sabbath" (Mk 2:27). This indicates something which for Jesus the Pharisees had missed—the humanitarian purpose of the Sabbath in Deuteronomy. To interpret it in an antihumanitarian fashion is to misinterpret it. Matthew 12:5-7 makes the same case. If the kingdom has arrived, all this activity is justified. The Pharisees, of course, do not accept that the kingdom has arrived. Here it would appear that the author of Hebrews has faithfully represented Jesus' teaching by seeing the Sabbath as a shadow of that rest which remains for the people of God when they enter the kingdom (cf. Heb 4). The followers of Jesus live in a constant Sabbath rest insofar as they live in the kingdom. They are the weary and heavy-laden who have found rest (Mt 11:28).

4.2. Divorce. Another example of Jesus' approach to the Law was his treatment of divorce.* But any discussion of this issue will be complicated if one compares Mark and Matthew on the subject. We cannot here elaborate the problem, except to say that there are good grounds for assuming that Mark is right to say that Jesus did not allow divorce among his followers on any pretext, and that something has gone wrong in our extant version of Matthew, in which mi epi pomeia indicates an exception (Mt 19:9; cf. Mk 10:2-12; see Banks, Guelich, Mohrlang).
The occasion of Jesus' teaching was a question about the interpretation of the Mosaic Law found in Deuteronomy 24:1-2, where a man is allowed to divorce his wife if some "unseemly thing" (Heb erwat dābār) is found in her. On the basis of this law the conservative followers of Rabbi Shammai permitted divorce only for proven adultery, the liberal followers of Rabbi Hillel allowed it if the husband disliked his wife's cooking, and Rabbi Akiba allowed it even if a man would see a woman more beautiful than his wife.

Jesus' response to all of this is that divorce was allowed by Moses—but only because of the hardness of the human heart. It was never the will of God, only permitted. Rather than abolishing the Law, Jesus moves to another passage, Genesis 2—a weightier passage than Deuteronomy. Genesis 2 was Torah as much as Deuteronomy 24. But it reveals God's intention not merely as Lawgiver but as Creator. There is a law of God built into creation—lifelong fidelity—to which Deuteronomy is but an afterthought If Jesus goes on to say that remarriage after divorce is adultery, it would not represent for him new legislation. Where there is hardness of heart divorce is inevitable and lawful. But where the kingdom has been preached, where men and women have accepted the invitation to enter the kingdom, putting themselves under God's kingly reign, it now becomes possible to deal with hardness of heart (see Hardness of Heart); it is now possible to attain to the purposes of the Creator. In the kingdom divorce is not so much forbidden as it is unnecessary. There is now another way of dealing with it.

4.3. Tithing Mint and Herb. Jesus' concentration on "the weightier matters" of the Law is also seen in one of his "woes" to the Pharisees recorded in Matthew 23:23 (par. Lk 11:42). The Pharisees "pay tithes on mint and dill and herb, but have no care for the weightier matters of the Law, justice and the love of God. These you should have done, without neglecting the others." For the Jews who paid agricultural tithes, some produce fell into the category of the uncertain. Should one tithe on garden vegetables such as lettuce? Maybe. Parsley and mint? Probably not, but pay the tithe anyhow; you might be inadvertently breaking the Law. Herein is illustrated the Pharisaic principle of "putting a hedge around the Law"—not to protect it, but to provide a margin of safety. Whatever one thinks is right to do, go a little bit further. Any commandment is an opportunity to show one's obedience. The more trivial the commandment the more disinterested and altruistic the obedience. For Jesus this kind of scrupulous observance of pettifogging possibilities will only lead in the end to a neglect of the cardinal principles. It is psychologically inevitable that such concerns concentrate on the manageable—the visual, perceptible things—to the neglect of "the weightier matters."

4.4. Other Legal Matters: Oaths, Murder. So far we have seen no evidence of Jesus rescinding the Law. In Matthew and Luke it is clear that a superficial obedience to the Decalog is in view, and that this is not radical obedience to the purposes of God. Such radical obedience is the righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness) which exceeds that of the Scribes and Pharisees (Mt 5:20). How extreme Jesus is on this point is further seen from a study of the other antitheses. The one which best illustrates the change he is introducing is the third, on peijury (Mt 5:33-37).

Here all swearing is forbidden (see Oaths, Swearing) with the stunning conclusion, "Let your speech be Yes, Yes, No, No; anything more than this comes from the evil one" (Mt 5:37). If this seems more than a little inhibiting, it is because we miss the point. What Jesus meant is clearly seen in the only parallel to this logion in the NT, James 5:12. There the form is "let your Yes be Yes, and your No, No." A yes must always mean yes; a no must always mean no. The reason an oath is said to come from the Devil is the implication which lies behind it If one is not on oath, he or she is free to tell lies. Jesus therefore demands an honesty so radical, so universal, that one's word is always true, whether on oath or not.

The taking of oaths then becomes not merely irrelevant but dangerous; it undermines the demand for radical honesty. That kind of going behind the letter to the intention appears to form the gravamen of Jesus' complaint Rather than going too far, the Pharisees did not go far enough. The same point is made in the commandment* against murder (Mt 5:21-26). Such a law is to be kept by a fundamental attitude of the heart which would make it impossible even to think of murdering. Behind overt action lies character and motive. One can pass a law against murder and then enforce it But one cannot pass a law against being a murderous person. Law by its very nature can deal only with activities. It can, of course, take account of intention. Today some countries have a law against "loitering with intent." But first one must at least loiter. Jesus has in fact moved out of the realm of law to ethics proper. Ethics has a debt beyond the reach of law.

This is hardly to claim that Jesus was not interested in actions. There are a number of recorded sayings, particularly the one with which the Sermon on the Mount ends (Mt 7:24-27)—the saying of the two houses—in which doing is important. As much as any Pharisee, Jesus requires that ethical principles of character should find their way into action. But at the same time, for him actions are not enough.

We are now in a position to summarize Jesus' teaching about the Law in four propositions: (1) There are weightier matters to the law; (2) one needs to penetrate behind the Law's letter to its original divine intention; (3) one needs to penetrate behind action to character; and (4) it is possible to take this view of the Law because the kingdom has arrived.

4.5. The Role of the Heart. In Mark 10:43-44 (par. Mt 20:25-27) Jesus says, "Among you, whoever wants to be great must be your servant and whoever wants to be first must be the slave of all" (REB). This text can be generalized as one of the major headings of the ethical teaching of Jesus. Among whom? Among you who have entered the kingdom. The ethical teaching of Jesus is the way of the kingdom. His teaching is not to be interpreted prescriptively as commandments to be obeyed as the Jews obeyed the Decalogue. For Jesus ethics are primarily descriptive; they illustrate how men and women will behave in the kingdom. "If you enter the kingdom, this is what you will be taking on—a higher standard of ethical observance than can ever be enforced by law." The reference to the heart (Mk 7:18-23 par. Mt 15:17-20) is especially noteworthy: "It is not what goes in that defiles... it is what comes out; for from within, from the heart comes evil thoughts, fornications, thefts, murders, adulteries and so forth." Mark adds, in effect that by saying this Jesus abrogated the whole Levitical Law regarding cleanness (see Clean and Unclean) and uncleanness (Mk 7:19; cf. Acts 10:10-16). Whatever else Jesus may complete and confirm, he does not keep that part of the Law. It is the heart which is the source of evil, and it is the heart which must be changed, with behavior following spontaneously.

And where for Jesus does the Law and his own example fit into all of this? The tree is known by its fruit (Mt 7:17-20; Lk 6:43-45). Behavior flows from the heart, and if the heart is changed, then with the Law of the OT and the example of Jesus as a guide, men and women can find their way to the practical application of their obedience to the law of love and to the radical demands of the God who is king.

4.6. The Final Split with the Pharisees. Such an interpretation of the Law was bound to bring Jesus and the Pharisees to a final parting of the ways. Here it is wiser to follow Luke's version of the vitriolic "woes" (11:37-52; see Blessing and Woe), which have undergone less editing than Matthew's (23:13-36). For Jesus the Pharisees concentrate on minutiae to the neglect of the weightier matters (Lk 11:42). They are like unmarked graves which men and women walk over without being aware of the contamination they incur (Lk 11:44 par. Mt 23:27)—a comment showing Jesus' deep sense of irony.

The Pharisees attacked Jesus for not avoiding the company of contaminating people; Jesus turns the Pharisees on their heads by telling the crowds, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees" (Mk 11:15). Leaven here is a symbol for silent pervasive, spreading evil. For Jesus the Pharisees were superficial environmentalists: concerned with all kinds of outward pollution, they contain a deeper, more insidious, more virulent form of contamination—that contamination which comes from contact with those who think they know everything about God and his will but do not understand him in the slightest. Self-regarding and apprehensive, the Pharisees fear that the holiness of Israel will be contaminated by what it touches. To Jesus the holiness of God is capable of looking after itself; it is an outgoing power, reaching all who need help. It is incapable of being contaminated, except by selfishness.

But if the Pharisees and Jesus could not close ranks on this crucial point it was also because they had vastly different conceptions of God. To the Pharisees God was a lawgiver who approves of, and rewards, those who keep his Law. To Jesus he was the heavenly Father who loves even his erring children and whose sovereign grace is a dynamic, redemptive force let loose into the world to restore and redeem. Those who took the Pharisaic view of God were relatively few, because in order to please such a deity one would have to be a professional; obeying 613 commandments is a full-time job. How is the layperson to carry such a weight? The Pharisees "load them with intolerable burdens and will not lift a finger to ease the load" (Lk 11:46). For Jesus the Law is the gift of a gracious God, and to interpret it as an intolerable burden is wholly to misunderstand the God from whom it comes. If ordinary men and women break down under the strain of obedience to the Law, then there must be something seriously wrong with that reading of the will of God.

4.7. Fulfilling the Law. If what we have said above constitutes Jesus' approach to the Law, how then can it be said that Jesus fulfills it? Returning to Matthew 5:17, it is probable that the word fulfill here "includes not only an element of discontinuity (that which has now been realized transcends the Law) but an element of continuity as well (that which transcends the Law is nevertheless something to which the Law itself points forward" (Banks). Putting it another way, to say that the teaching of Jesus fulfills the Law is to say that his teaching "fills the Law full"—with new meaning.

5. Conclusion.

The ethical teaching of Jesus may now be summarized under five points.

5.1. The Presence of the Kingdom. On the question of Jesus' expectation of the future, Schweitzer was radically mistaken. But modified forms of his thesis are still with us. Too much attention continues to be paid to the notion that for Jesus the kingdom was focused primarily on some event or events subsequent to the initial proclamation recorded in Mark 1:15. Those who hold this view, of course, will always find deep embarrassment in fitting ethics into their scheme; but that has not stopped them from futurizing the kingdom, even at the expense of robbing Jesus' ethics of their ultimate basis. Jesus, on the other hand, taught that entry into the kingdom was synonymous with entering the life of discipleship—of submitting to the demands of the God who is king. His ethics are dominated by the central burning conviction that God's rule is now actively present in the affairs of individuals, kings and nations.

5.2. The Priority of Character. For Jesus ethics are to some extent realistic and pragmatic. Those who freely receive God's gifts must (1) show them in outward acts, and (2) pass them on to others, lest they become stagnant and die. But ethics are also the fruit of character, a claim which many of the Pharisees, with their exclusive emphasis on outward acts, could not accept. The rewards which Jesus promises are not extrinsic to human character, but point to the building up of a personality which would ultimately be at home in the presence of God.

5.3. The Rediscovered Spirit of the Law. The Law of Israel was understood by Jesus as a gracious provision, given not only by a sovereign king but by a loving Father. To obey his Law meant to be in conformity with the purposes which are built into creation. Jesus, like Paul after him, understood that a rigid obedience to the Law, because of corrupting influences (selfishness, nationalism, pride), had failed to achieve God's primal purposes. Therefore, those who would obey God's will and respond to his love must go behind the letter, back to the Law's original intention.

5.4. The Redefined People of God. What we call the gospel of Jesus was not in the first instance a new religion. It was a call to the nation of Israel, asking it to believe that God's power is always breathtakingly fresh, always ready to break into their history, always an outgoing and transforming power reaching into the lives of those who need help. But in order to receive that power they must also accept a radically different interpretation of what it meant for them to be the chosen people. Going back to the prophecies of Isaiah 40—66, he reminded them of God's kingly reign. Rather than privilege, they had been chosen for responsibility; rather than authority and glory,* they had been chosen for service and suffering; that through them God's kingly power might reach out into the world, overthrowing the forces of evil.

It is in this context that some of Jesus' most powerful ethical statements are to be understood, particularly those which concern love. Rather than hating their national enemies and exulting in their ruin, the Jews were to love them and ask God for their well-being. Instead of avoiding their corrupting contamination, they were to become their friends. And, in perhaps the most uncomfortable statement of all, they were to content themselves with the benevolent administration of Rome. To make friends with Caesar did not mean that they could not also give to God a full and uncompromising obedience.

5.5. The Personal and Communal Dynamic. Finally, too much distinction has been made between the personal and the social in the ethics of Jesus. For him ethics were surely personal, insofar as they flow from each individual's relationship to God. But ethics must also be incorporated into the community of God. If the majority of God's people had not responded to the challenge, Jesus would work through a remnant, as God had done so often in Israel's history. Through Jesus—and subsequently through his followers, whether Jew or Gentile—God's promise to the nations would be fulfilled. The community Jesus founded may be understood truly as a "church," but only if that term is seen as a community of men and women in whom Jesus is personally present, who put one another before themselves and through whom God's redemptive power can reach out into the world, driving out evil and drawing all into a body of individuals who are willing to put themselves under his kingly sovereignty and fatherly love.

See also Commandment; Discipleship; Divorce; Family; Fasting; Forgiveness of Sins; Hypocrite; Judgment; Kingdom of God; Law; Mercy; Oaths and Swearing; Peace; Rich and Poor; Swearing; Sabbath; Sermon on the Mount; Sinner; Taxes.

L D. Hurst

EUCHARIST. See LAST SUPPER.

EVIL SPIRIT. See DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN.

EXALTATION. See ASCENSION OF JESUS; DEATH OF JESUS; GLORY

EXORCISM. See DEMON, DEVIL SATAN
The language of faith ("believe," "trust," "faithful," "reliable," etc.) is essential to human relationships in general, but gains its special biblical connotations from the interaction of God* with humanity, his reliability and our response of trust in him.

1. Faith in the Synoptic Gospels
2. Faith in the Gospel of John

1. Faith in the Synoptic Gospels.

1.1. The Synoptic Tradition in General. By comparison with Paul's letters or the Gospel of John the Synoptic Gospels make relatively little use of the terminology of faith, and their uses of such language do not usually carry the same weight of theological connotation. The most prominent use is in connection with Jesus' miracles,* which are typically performed in response to the faith either of the sufferer (Mk 5:34; 10:52) or, more frequently, of those who request Jesus' aid on behalf of another (Mk 2:5; 9:23-24; Mt 8:10,13; 15:28). Conversely, absence of faith hinders Jesus' miraculous activity (Mk 6:5-6)—though Mark warns us against too tight a connection between faith and healing* by commenting that even in this situation of unbelief Jesus "laid his hands on a few sick people and healed them." Faith in such contexts focuses on a practical trust in the power of Jesus to meet physical need (or, in the case of exorcisms, to bring spiritual deliverance). It is exemplified in the centurion, who recognizes in Jesus a functional authority (see Authority and Power) akin to that of an army officer (Mt 8:8-10). Thus it is not Jesus himself who exercises faith, but those who come to him for help. The correlative to the faith of the suppliant is the authority of Jesus.

Jesus performs miracles in response to faith; his disciples,* by contrast, should be able to achieve similarly miraculous results by the exercise of faith (Mk 11:22-24; Mt 17:19-21). Where Jesus' disciples prove powerless, the cause is traced to "unbelief" (Mk 9:19), or "little faith" (Mt 17:20—see below). But while Jesus responds to faith rather than exercising it himself, it may be significant that Mark describes this miracle-working faith of the disciples as faith in God rather than faith in Jesus (Mk 11:22). The key to the exercise of such faith is not its quantity, but the God to whom it is directed; thus Jesus rejects the notion that faith needs to be "increased" to be effective—even the smallest faith ("like a mustard seed") will see spectacular results (Lk 17:5-6; Mt 17:20).

In the Synoptic tradition the noun pistis ("faith") is used almost exclusively in relation to miracles (see, however, Lk 18:8; 22:32, where it refers rather to the loyalty of disciples). The verb pisteuō ("I believe"), however, while it too occurs prominently in such contexts, is used also without reference to miracles or to physical need, to describe the proper response to the preaching of the gospel* by Jesus (Mk 1:15; Lk 8:12-13) and indeed also to the preaching of John the Baptist* (Mk 11:31; Mt 21:25, 32). Thus "to believe" becomes almost a synonym for "to be a disciple," and this discipleship* is further spelled out in Matthew 18:6 as believing in (eis) Jesus. This verse (and its parallel in Mark 9:42, if the longer reading be accepted) is the only place in the Synoptic tradition where "believing in Jesus" is explicitly mentioned as the basis of a new relationship with God (though see the mocking use of pisteuō ep' auton ["believe in him") in Mt 27:42), but such language is a natural sequel to the use of the language of faith both for the practical recognition of Jesus' supernatural authority and also for the appropriate response to the gospel which he came to proclaim.

1.2. Mark. Mark does not offer a focus on faith which is clearly distinctive from the general Synoptic perspective set out in the previous section. It should be noted, however, that it is only in Mark that Jesus' programmatic announcement of the arrival of the time of fulfillment includes the call to "believe" as well as to "repent." Mark 1:15 is a structurally prominent verse and must be understood as setting out what Mark regards as the main focus of Jesus' Galilean ministry. The call of John the Baptist to repentance* (1:4) is expanded by Jesus into the classic Christian call to conversion, "repent and believe in the gospel." Believing is thus marked out by its link with metanoia ("repentance") as more than either a practical dependence or an intellectual credence. It is a life-changing commitment, the beginning of a new relationship with God.
1.3. Matthew. While Mark refers occasionally to the "unbelief" (apistia) of those who observed Jesus' ministry (Mk 6:6; 9:19, 24; cf. Mt 13:58), in Matthew it is the disciples themselves who are accused of "little faith" (oligopistia: Mt 6:30; 8:26; 14:31; 16:8; 17:20; cf. Lk 12:28). While "little faith" may sound less serious than "unbelief," in Matthew 17:20 it is contrasted with faith even as small as a mustard seed, which can achieve the results which are closed to oligopistia. Practically speaking, therefore, oligopistia amounts to no faith at all; even if the persons concerned are technically "believers," their faith has no value in terms of practical reliance on God. In each use of the language of oligopistia in Matthew the reference is to the need for practical trust in the power of God to provide for the necessities of life, to heal or to deliver from physical danger. To fail in such practical trust is, even in disciples, a mark of an "unbelieving generation" (17:17).

Nonetheless, it is faith which is the essential basis of belonging to the people of God. Matthew's special concern with this question comes into sharp focus in 8:10-13, where the exemplary faith of the Gentile centurion, matched by "no one in Israel," provides the context for Jesus' vision of many coming from east and west to share in the Jewish messianic banquet, while the "sons of the kingdom" themselves are excluded. Participation in the blessings of salvation* is no longer to be on the basis of race, but of a new principle which allows non-Jews (see Gentiles) to sit with the Jewish patriarchs, but at the same time offers no guarantee of salvation for those who were born Jews (see Israel). And that principle is faith, a faith which has in the case of the centurion expressed itself in a remarkable recognition of the unique authority of Jesus.

A similar connotation appears in the story of the Canaanite woman (15:21-28), where an explicit raising of the question of the Jews' exclusive right to the blessings brought by the Messiah leads to Jesus' declaration to this representative of the Jews' traditional enemy, "Great is your faith; your request is granted." Faith produces a new order in which the first are last and the last first. It will be the tax collectors and prostitutes rather than the Jewish religious authorities who go into the kingdom* of God, because it was they who believed God's message through John the Baptist and so found "the way of righteousness" (21:32; see Justice, Righteousness). Faith is not just the key to Jesus' miraculous work, it is also the way into the kingdom of God.

1.4. Luke. If in Matthew there is a tendency to use the terminology of faith more in relation to spiritual salvation, this tendency is more pronounced in Luke.
The familiar pronouncement "Your faith has saved you," which occurs as the climax of several healing stories in each of the Synoptics, occurs also in Luke 7:50 with reference not to physical healing but to the forgiveness* of sins. The link between faith and salvation (in a non-physical sense) is explicit in Luke 8:12, where the devil's (see Demon, Devil) aim is to prevent people from "believing and being saved." In Luke 12:46 the judgment* on the unfaithful servant is to be cut in two and given a place "with the unbelievers," which thus appears to be a synonym for the spiritually lost. Such uses of the terminology of faith prepare the way for the prominent use in Acts of "to believe" as a regular term for becoming and continuing as a disciple.

Faith (or faithfulness—the decision as to which term best represents pistis is sometimes difficult) is therefore a distinctive characteristic of the true people of God. At the beginning of Luke's Gospel we see two contrasting examples of response to the promise of a miraculous birth: Zechariah "did not believe" (1:20), but Mary "believed that what the Lord had spoken to her would be fulfilled" (1:45). As such she is congratulated (makaria) as a paradigm of faith, which for her involves not only intellectual acceptance of God's surprising announcement, but the personal commitment to be herself the means of its fulfillment, with all the upheaval that must involve. It is faith, in something like the same sense, that the Son of man* hopes to find on earth at his coming—the persistent faithfulness of the people of God. And it is such faith that Peter is in danger of losing under the pressure of the events of Jesus' passion (22:32; see Passion Narrative). Faith involves the loyalty of God's people to his will even when such loyalty is costly.

It is well known that the noun pistis does not occur in John's Gospel, while the verb pisteuō occurs nearly 100 times. The reason for this linguistic trait is a matter of speculation. It has been attributed to an increasing use of pistis to designate the body of Christian doctrine, whereas John's interest is rather in the relationship expressed by the verbal form or to the use of pistis in the context of a Pauline faith/works dichotomy, which is "not a live controversy for John" (Painter). At any rate, the verb expresses a vital component in John's understanding of salvation. It summarizes what God requires of his people: "This is the work of God, that you should believe in the one whom he has sent" (6:28-29). And it is used in 21:31 to describe John's main purpose in writing, "that you may believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and that through believing you may have life in his name."

John's usage is distinctive. While he does sometimes use the verb in the normal way, with the simple dative of the person or thing believed, he generally uses one of three other constructions.

(1) The intellectual content of the verb is expressed twelve times by pisteuō with hoti, "believe that..." All these uses (except 9:18) refer to christological conviction, believing that Jesus is the Messiah (see Christ), the Son of God,* has come from God, etc.

(2) In no less than thirty six cases John uses pisteuō eis (literally, "believe into"), and once pisteuō en ("believe in"). This usage is known only in Christian writings, and in the rest of the NT it occurs only ten times (three of which are in 1 John), so it may fairly be regarded as John's special contribution to Christian language. All these uses except two refer to belief "into Jesus," or (in 1:12; 2:23; 3:18) "into the name of Jesus"; the two exceptions are references to belief in God (12:44; 14:1), but in each case this is combined directly with belief in Jesus.

(3) In thirty cases pisteuō is used absolutely, with no explicit indication of the object of belief. Often these uses follow closely on references to believing "into Jesus" (e.g., 3:18; 4:39,41; 6:40, 47; 9:35-38), so that the meaning is not in doubt. In the context of John's overall usage of the verb it can apparently be used absolutely as a shorthand expression for Christian commitment.

Not only is John's linguistic usage distinctive, but the subject-matter of his language about faith is remarkably single-minded. While a few of his uses of pisteuō with the dative refer to God, to Scripture (or Moses*) or to a word spoken, in the vast majority of cases where an object is expressed it is the person of Jesus himself who is the object of faith. This is in striking contrast with the Synoptic usage noted above, where only one passage explicitly mentions believing in Jesus. While faith in the Synoptics is primarily faith in God and is directed principally toward the experience of miraculous power, in John it is faith in Jesus, and its focus is not on miracles and on the meeting of physical need, but on the establishment of a relationship which results in eternal life.

There is, however, a connection between miracles and faith in John. By his first miracle at Cana Jesus "revealed his glory and his disciples believed in him" (2:11; cf 2:23; 4:53). But it is that way round-faith results from the miracle, not vice versa. And even this connection is of limited value—a faith based solely on miracles is superficial and inadequate (2:23-25; 4:48; 6:26-29). Faith which is based on Jesus' "works" is apparently legitimate, but inferior to a faith which needs no such prop (14:10-11; 20:29).

It is interesting to note that John, who stresses so much Jesus' dependence on the Father, does not use the language of faith in this connection. As in the Synoptics, Jesus is not spoken of as believing in God; he is the object, not the subject, of faith.

Believing is the appropriate response to revelation. John's Gospel presents a series of "testimonies" (martyria) to the truth* (alētheia) about Jesus, beginning with the testimony of John the Baptist ("that all might believe through him," 1:7), and including the testimony of other human witnesses, of Scripture, of the words and works of Jesus himself, of the Paraclete (see Holy Spirit) and ultimately of the Father (see Witness). In adducing this impressive range of witnesses to the truth which has been revealed in Jesus, John aims to lead his readers to the faith which is the only appropriate response to such revelation. If in Jesus, the Word (see Logos) incarnate, "truth" has now become visible in the world* (1:14), the only response must be to believe in that truth, and that means to believe in Jesus, and so to find life through his name.

Such "believing" is closely related to "knowing." If to believe is the key to eternal life (3:16 etc.), so also is "to know" (17:3). "Believing" and "knowing" appear as virtual synonyms in 6:69. There is no trace in John of the modern dichotomy between faith and knowledge.

Believing therefore plays a central role in the whole system of John's theology of salvation. It is a response to revelation, and it results in knowledge of the truth. But since that revelation has come to us in a person, who is himself the truth, neither faith nor knowledge can be understood in primarily intellectual terms. The object of believing can only be the person of Jesus himself. John's special expression "believe into" is well adapted to convey this central theme of his theology, which, while the terms used are different is closely related to Paul's language about the incorporation of believers "into" the body of Christ so that they are "in Christ". John's equally striking language about "abiding in" Jesus reinforces the same idea.

See also FORGIVENESS OF SINS; REPENTANCE

R. T. France

FAMILY

The evidence of the NT as a whole suggests that household relations were a subject of major concern in early Christianity. This is because following Jesus, or conversion to the Christian way, was as much a social matter as a personal one. In a culture where individual identity was defined in terms primarily of the household group to which the individual belonged (see Malina), it was inevitable that allegiance to Jesus as "Lord" (Kyrios) would have an effect on family ties and family life. Often the conversion of whole households would occur, and the first Christians developed rules for the right ordering of family life and the exercise of hospitality. Worship* and fellowship normally took place in the homes of local Christian leaders, and the patriarchal authority relations of the household tended to become the model for the roles and relations of church members.

On the other hand, conversion and Christian belonging also threatened the family. The charismatic freedom of early Christian worship, itself the expression of the believers' quite-novel self-understanding as all now children of God through Christ,* seems to have generated anxieties about the potential subversion of normal gender roles and household relations. Sometimes the conversion of one partner in a marriage* (more often the wife) precipitated marital conflict and even divorce (see 1 Cor 7:10-16; see Marriage and Divorce). Some converts apparently adopted an ascetic lifestyle and rejected sexual relations and marital ties altogether. For others the call to itinerant missionary activity necessitated the radical subordination of family ties for the sake of Christ and the gospel.* There is also specific evidence of the persecution of believers by members of their own families. So Christian belonging was not necessarily conducive to strong family ties and a happy family life.

All four Gospels contain material pertinent to the theme of family ties. Very often talk about family ties provides an idiom for saying important things about christology, ecclesiology and the life of faith.*

1. The Gospel of Mark
2. The Gospel of Matthew
4. The Fourth Gospel

1. The Gospel of Mark.

This Gospel is predominantly pessimistic about family ties. The way of Jesus is the way of rejection, suffering and death*; a pattern to be the expectation of followers of Jesus as well (Mk 4:17; 8:34-35; 9:49; 10:30; 13:9-13). This somber mood deeply affects the material on the family. Jesus' relations with his own family are cast in a uniformly negative light. Mark provides no genealogies* or birth narratives, unlike Matthew and Luke (see Birth of Jesus); nor any stories of Jesus' youth at home.

In Mark, Jesus consistently acts independently of his natural kin, and he lives in what appears to be his own (or Peter's??) house in Capernaum (cf. Mk 1:29; 2:1,15; 3:19; 9:33). Instead of the company of his family, Jesus chooses that of the Twelve (Mk 3:13-19); and when his mother and brothers come asking for him, he deliberately distances himself from them and identifies his true family as "whoever does the will of God" (Mk 3:31-35). Significantly, the final mention of Jesus' family is cast in negative terms too, an episode which revolves around the saying of Jesus, "A prophet is not without honor, except in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house" (Mk 6:1-6a). Jesus' kinsfolk play no further part in the Gospel story. They are not rehabilitated at the end. In contrast with the Fourth Gospel, the Jesus of Mark has no special relationship with his mother, and she appears not to be present at the cross (Mk 15:40-41; cf. Jn 19:25-27; see Death of Jesus).

The material in Mark on discipleship* and family ties is consistent with the portrayal of Jesus' own family ties. Those summoned to share the mission of Jesus leave their occupations and families (Mk 1:16-20; 10:28-30) and become dependent on the hospitality of others (Mk 6:10-11). The response of their kinsfolk is likely to be hostile: note the somber redactional qualifier "with persecutions" (meta diōgmōn) in Mark 10:30 and the explicit warning of kinship-sponsored incrimination and persecution in Mark 13:12-13.

This is not to say that Mark is anti-family. There is much evidence to the contrary: (1) foremost is Jesus' prohibition of divorce and remarriage (Mk 10:2-12); (2) Jesus affirms the obligations of the fifth commandment (Mk 7:9-13); (3) Jesus repeatedly and positively receives children (Mk 9:36-37; 10:13-16; see Child, Children); (4) Jesus uses familial terminology to describe those who do God's will (Mk 3:34b, 35); (5) Jesus promises an alternative household and family ties ("one hundredfold") to replace those the missionary disciple has left behind; (6) there are numerous accounts of healing* miracles* involving the restoration of members of a family (Mk 1:30-31; cf. 5:21-43; 7:24-30; 9:14-29).

T.J. Weeden and others have sought to explain the negative portrayal of Jesus' family as part of a polemic by the Evangelist and his community against the leaders (including James, the Lord's brother) of the Jerusalem Church. Other explanations are more persuasive, however. (1) It is very likely that the Markan account preserves accurate historical reminiscence of tension and misunderstanding between the charismatic leader Jesus and his natural kin. (2) In terms of the shape of Mark's narrative, Jesus' rejection by his family in the first half of the story anticipates his rejection by his people as a whole in the climactic second half. (3) Theologically, Mark's deep ambivalence about ties of natural kinship expresses his conviction that there is a new criterion for membership in the people of God: faith in Jesus the Son of God,* not birth or adoption into the Jewish ethnos. (4) Sociologically, as H. C. Kee has shown, the family-ties material conveys the anguish and conflict accompanying membership of the Marcan community, as well as the continuing importance of the household both for its corporate life and for mission.

A central concern of Matthew's Gospel is to express what it means to be the people of God in the light of the coming of the Son of God Theology, christology and ethics are linked together closely, and material about the family or the use of the idiom of household ties is strikingly prevalent For Matthew,
God is preeminently the heavenly Father who is "with us" graciously in the person of Jesus who is his Son. Matthew's story tells of the coming of the Son to call God's sons and daughters in Israel* to repentance because the heavenly kingdom is near (see Kingdom of God). With divine authority* Jesus teaches the true and demanding will of God for his people and chooses a group of disciples (mathētai) to be the nucleus of a renewed nation. The rejection and crucifixion* of Jesus by Israel precipitates a mission to the Gentiles* and the reconstituting of the people of God as the church* (ekklēsia). The material on the family in Matthew is intelligible only against this theological backdrop.

First there is a strong emphasis on spiritual kinship. Jesus displaces Israel as God's true Son, because Jesus teaches and does the Father's will. The remnant in and beyond Israel who obey and follow Jesus become children of God who call God "our Father" (Mt 6:9; see Abba). They also become Jesus' true family (Mt 12:46-50), and the relationship they share with each other in the church (ekklēsia) is characterized most often as a kinship (e.g., Mt 23:8) or as a household (see M. H. Crosby) where God is Father and the followers of Jesus are God's children (Mt 18:1-4; 23:9).

Second, it is implied strongly that following Jesus and belonging to God's household involves itinerant mission work for some at least (see E. Schweizer; see Apostle). This takes priority over ties of natural kinship and the responsibilities of family life (Mt 8:18-27; 10:21-23, 24-25, 34-39). No doubt the pain and conflict this brings are understood by Matthew as part of the cost of choosing the "narrow gate" and "hard way" which leads to life (Mt 7:13-14).

On the other hand, it is true also that the privilege of belonging to God's household brings with it obligations in the realm of family life as part of obedience to the commandments* of God's Son. These include the demand of restraint and control in sexual relations, the prohibition of divorce and the duty of filial piety (Mt 5:27-30, 31-32; 19:3-9, 19). Unique to Matthew is the saying of Jesus which commends celibacy "for the sake of the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 19:12); but this is quite consistent with the strong emphasis in Matthew on the self-denial, discipline and single-mindedness required of followers of Jesus (e.g., Mt 6:24) and exemplified by Jesus himself.

So the material on the family in Matthew contributes significantly to the Evangelist's concern to provide an authoritative basis in the story of Jesus for the formation and development of a new household of faith, a people separate from Israel and shaping its own understanding of life together as children of the heavenly Father.

The theology of Luke's two volumes is dominated by a salvation-history perspective according to which God's plan of salvation began with Israel, was fulfilled in the coming of Jesus and was being brought to fruition in the gathering of Gentiles into the people of God in the church. The material about the family very clearly expresses this theology, along with its implications for the life of faith.

The continuity of salvation history—linking Israel, Jesus and the church—is reflected in the positive portrayal of Jesus' own family. This is quite at odds with the picture in Mark, as some scholars have shown (see Brown et al., and Fitzmyer). Mary, for example, is given more prominence in Luke's writings than in any other NT document (see Birth of Jesus). At the beginning of the story she is the specially favored woman in Israel chosen by God to give birth to his Son, the Davidic Messiah (Lk 1:26-35; see Son of David), and she is the one who proclaims, in the words of the Magnificat, the Lukan gospel of good news to the poor (Lk 1:46-55; see Mary's Song). Together with Joseph she is a witness to the miraculous events and revelatory utterances attending both the birth of Jesus and his presentation at the Temple.* Her bold witness, transparent piety, quiet faith, obedience to Torah and ready acceptance of the will of God make her a model of the true Israelite and the true disciple. This explains her remarkable presence, at the beginning of Luke's second volume, in the upper room (Acts 1:14). Her presence and witness are a guarantee of the salvific continuity between Israel, Jesus and the Church.

It is noteworthy that the brothers of Jesus are also in the upper room. Unlike the Fourth Gospel (Jn 7:5), they are not depicted as unbelievers. More clearly than in Mark and Matthew, Jesus' mother and his brothers are affirmed as "those who hear the word of God and do it" (cf. Lk 8:19-21 with Mk 3:31-35 and Mt 12:46-50). Nor are they included among those of Jesus' own country (patris) who refuse to acknowledge him (cf. Lk 4:24 with Mk 6:4 and Mt 13:57). It appears that Luke is kinder than the other Evangelists to those who surround Jesus. This may be motivated by his desire to present Jesus' brothers, James especially, as leaders of the Jerusalem church (e.g., Acts 15:13) and as witnesses to the truth about him in the period after his ascension.*

Material about family and household life is central also to what the Evangelist wants to say about the life of faith. This may be summarized under two points. First, discipleship to Jesus is a very costly affair. Luke accentuates the radical detachment which is required: from possessions, from family ties and even from one's own spouse (e.g., Lk 9:57-62; 12:51-53; 14:15-24, 25-35; 18:18-30). This compliments Luke's great emphasis on the importance of both conversion in response to the preaching of the "good news" and mission to all nations (Lk 24:47; Acts 1:8), for mission is the means of bringing God's new people into existence.

Second, belonging to God's new people involves household-based expressions of solidarity. As J. Koenig has shown, stories and teaching about households, hospitality and table fellowship* may be found throughout Luke-Acts. He thinks that Luke is trying to foster "cooperative house church mission." P. Esler suggests that the focus on table fellowship is intended primarily to legitimate the development of a common life shared by Jews and Gentiles. Most important, though, is the recognition that for Luke the family and household are not ends in themselves. This corresponds with the force of the boy Jesus' reply to his anxious parents in the Temple: "Did you not know that I must be in my Father's house (en tois tou patros mou)?" (Lk 2:49 RSV).

Central to the message of this Gospel is the revelation of Jesus as the Son of God and savior of the world. His coming into the world provokes division, however. Some believe in him, both from within and without Israel. Others, most poignantly those often referred to as "the Jews" or "the Pharisees,* reject him. The underlying irony of the whole Gospel is that those who should have believed in him do not, and those who seem unlikely recipients of revelation believe. The principal aim of the Gospel is to confirm believers in their faith (Jn 20:30-31) and to provide a basis in the story of Jesus for developing their own identity and life together as God's people.

The family-related material has to be understood against this background. It expresses both the division which Jesus causes and the identity of the elect. Most important for John is the affirmation of Jesus as the Son of God. This establishes his closeness to God who is the Father and his unique authority to reveal the way to the Father (Jn 1:18; 5:17-30; 14:6-7). Whoever "receives" Jesus the Son becomes a child of God (Jn 1:12-13; cf. the use of orphans ['orphan'] in 14:18); and this is a matter not of physical birth into the family of the Jewish people, but of spiritual birth "from above" (anōthen, Jn 3:3, 7). Consequently, Samaritans* and Greeks (see Hellenism) can now belong to the people of God, as well as Jews (Jn 4:4-42; 12:20-26). In fact the true descendants of "our father Abraham" are redefined radically, not as his descendants by blood, but as those who acknowledge Jesus, the pre-existent I Am.* Conversely, those who refuse to believe are redefined in a most polemical way as children of the devil (Jn 8:31-59; see Demon, Devil, Satan).

It is striking that John, unlike Matthew, is sparing in his use of the language of kinship to describe relations between those who are God's children. This may be related to the so-called Johannine individualism and to his distinctive emphasis on the vertical relations between believers and the Son—they are his "friends" or "little children"—and between the Son and the Father. Only after the resurrection* does Jesus refer to the disciples as his "brothers" (Jn 20:17); and from then on, as the Johannine Epistles show, "brother" (adelphos) becomes an important ecclesiological term (Jn 21:23; 1 Jn 2:9-11; 3:10-17). Perhaps its later use, along with much other familial terminology, was intended to counter the Johannine community's schismatic tendencies (see Segovia).

The portrayal of the mother of Jesus deserves special mention. As in Luke-Acts, she is interpreted in a positive light. Only this Gospel has the story of the wedding at Cana (Jn 2:1-11) and the episode at the foot of the cross (Jn 19:26-27). Strikingly, these two stories bracket the whole narrative of Jesus' ministry. Never referred to by her personal name, Jesus' mother functions as a representative figure: "Woman" (Jn 2:4; 19:26). According to R F. Collins, she "symbolizes the one who faithfully awaits the messianic times" and, at the cross, is accepted into the community of salvation, the new family of the church.

As in the Synoptics, the Fourth Gospel represents as well an attempt to deal with the adverse implications of discipleship for family ties. J. L Martyn has shown how in John 9 the story of the man born blind expresses something of the cost of discipleship in John's own day: expulsion from the synagogue* community and rifts between parents and their children (Jn 9:18-23). This parallels Jesus' relations with his brothers. Not only are they distinguished from the disciples (Jn 2:11-12), but the final editorial comment on them in the Gospel is that "his brothers did not believe in him" (Jn 7:5). Their unbelief is representative of the unbelief of "the Jews" and of Jerusalem and Judea as a whole. The prolog puts it in a nutshell: "He came to his own home (ta idia), and his own people (hoi idioi) received him not" (Jn 1:11 RSV).

It is very likely, as W. A Meeks and others have argued, that this christological statement in John 1:11 has a sociological correlate. Just as the Johannine Jesus is a stranger to the world, to the Jews and even to his own family, likewise the Johannine community is radically estranged from the wider society, from the society of the synagogue and from the society of its members' families. The Fourth Gospel's unique emphasis on Jesus as the only way to the Father (Jn 14:6) is the expression of a group developing an alternative society based on the tie of belief in Jesus rather than on ties of natural kinship.

See also CHILDREN.

S. C. Barton

FAREWELL DISCOURSE

1. The Literary Form
2. The Lukan Farewell Discourse (Lk 22:21-38)
The Johannine Farewell Discourse (Jn 13—17)

1. The Literary Form.

1.1. Development and Structure of the Form. The farewell discourse is a literary form known in classical, biblical and pseudepigraphical material (see Form Criticism). The form exists as a pan of larger works and as independent pieces of literature generally called "testaments." The story of the death of Socrates in Plato's Phaedo and his final discussion with his students became the model for death scenes in classical literature (Stauffer, c. 29; Kurz, 253-54). In biblical literature we can find similar addresses attributed to Jacob (Gen 48—49), Moses* (Deut 31—34), Joshua (Josh 23—24) and David (1 Chron 28—29). In the NT we can see this form in Luke 22, John 13-17 and Acts 20:17-38.

The popularity of the genre in biblical and extrabiblical literature is easy to understand. The farewell scene of the great leader gave the writer an opportunity to summarize the achievements and teachings of that person, developing an apology for the life of the person if needed and applying the lessons of the person's life to the problems facing future generations. The origin of the genre is almost certainly in wisdom* literature: the teaching of the father to the sons (Cortés, 67). The purpose of the farewell discourse is always to teach and to instruct. Sometimes the structure may take on an apologetic function, but even here the purpose is to draw distinctions between the teaching of the father figure and the problems at hand in the community. Apocalyptic* visions are easily incorporated into the structure as a more dramatic means of warning and instructing the community. In the context of the impending death of the father or father figure, these teachings are given added gravity and significance as the summing up of the life and purpose of the figure.

The typical structure of a farewell discourse can be summarized:

Reference to approaching death

Gathering of family or disciples

Review of the figure's life
Exhortation

Predictions or prophecies

Blessings, final prayer or final warnings

Death and burial

The order of these items is not inflexible. Structural parts may be repeated or completely omitted (see von Nordheim, 11.85-89). Frequently, but not always, the figure will commission his sons/disciples to carry on his work or will name a successor (see Adam and Eve 50:1; 2 Apoc. Bar. 45:1-2; 1 Enoch 82:1-2; 4 Ezra 14:26, 46).

1.2. Purpose of the Form. The power of the form lies in its ability to focus the exhortation or teaching the author desires to give to the community. The life of the departing person serves both as a model to the community and as a legitimizing figure for the teaching. The context of the last or departing words of a respected person gives added moral power to these teachings. For the NT writers the form was especially pertinent since there was already a definite historical tradition of the Last Supper (see Last Supper). It is not surprising that Luke and John use the form to organize the final teachings of Jesus and stress the points of that teaching relevant to their Gospels (see Redaction Criticism).

2.1. Structure and Composition. The Lukan form of the Last Supper is very different from its Synoptic counterparts. Compared to the other Synoptic accounts, the Lukan account appears to be a composite of traditions. Viewed as a farewell discourse the material follows a recognizable pattern:

Prediction of death (22:21-23)

Exhortation to disciples (22:24-26)

Review of life (22:27)

Promises/prophecies (22:28-30)
Warnings (22:31-34)

Final warning (22:35-38)

It is difficult to know how much of this structure was created by Luke or whether it existed in some form in his sources (Marshall, 808). E. Bammel has suggested that 22:28-30 form the conclusion of Q. The content of these verses suggests that Q was itself a testamentary document (Bammel, 46-50). Therefore, the concept of a testament of Jesus may have been suggested to Luke by his sources. But it is hard to imagine that Luke is not guided by the farewell discourse structure as he handles the traditions he is using. The ties between Luke and Mark in these verses are those common to the Last Supper tradition: the naming of the betrayer (Lk 22:21-23 par. Mk 14:18-21; see Judas Iscariot) and the prediction of Peter's denial (Lk 22:31-34 par. Mk 14:26-31). But even these common traditions seem to be reshaped by the farewell discourse context: the prediction of the betrayal now forms the announcement of Jesus' coming death (see Death of Jesus) and is followed by an exhortation to the disciples.* Similarly, the prediction of Peter's denial is now tied to a future role for Peter in which he will serve as the one who turns and strengthens the faith of the community and so carry on the ministry of Jesus (22:32). The basic principle for composition seems to be the farewell discourse form.

2.2. Jesus As the Departing Master. The role of Jesus in this passage is typical of a farewell discourse. On the one hand he is the example, both of the servant whom the disciples are to emulate (22:27) and the persecuted whose trial the disciples may share (22:35-37). There is also an implicit apologetic note in this material. Jesus' prayer* for Peter shows that he knows and anticipates the failure of the disciples at the time of the crucifixion (22:31-32; cf. Jn 16:32-33) and that he has minimized the effect of this crisis through his prayer and his appointment of Peter as one who will turn and strengthen others after his denial (22:32). In short the scattering of the disciples in the face of persecution does not reflect on Jesus or his ministry but is part of the drama of salvation.*

2.3. The Commissioning of the Disciples. The form of farewell discourse is further evident in the various commissions given the disciples. This is specifically visible in the Q* saying of Luke 22:29. The commission given to Jesus by the Father (see God) is turned over to the disciples: Just as the Father has assigned a kingdom (see Kingdom of God) to Jesus, so also Jesus has assigned a kingdom to the disciples. In particular they can anticipate sharing in the judgment and authority of the kingdom. As the disciples have shared in Jesus' trials (v. 28), they will share in the authority* of the kingdom. It is significant that the word describing this transfer is diatithemai, which can be translated, "to make a covenant, a bequest or to assign." Marshall argues that since God is the subject of the verb here, the idea cannot be "to make a bequest" (Marshall, 816), but in fact the "κακώ...καθώς" ("and I...just as") structure of the saying emphasizes that what the Father has given the Son (see Son of God) is now being turned over to the disciples. The transfer nature of this promise is intentional. The disciples are being recognized as heirs of the promise of the kingdom and of the authority inherent in that kingdom (E. Bammel, 46-47).

What comes before and after this statement serves to modify and define this commission. That which is given to the disciples in the first instance does not represent a transfer of authority (22:25-27) but a transfer of mission, the essence of which is service. Although the disciples will sit on the twelve thrones executing judgment, their fitness for that task is predicated on taking up the humble attitude of a servant. The exhortation of verses 24-27 is necessarily placed before 28-30. Sharing in the exaltation of Jesus requires first sharing in his humility.

Similarly, after the promise of 22:28-30 we find two sobering reminders of the task yet to be done. First is the reminder that the disciples will fail before they succeed. The scattering of the disciples at the crucifixion is viewed by Matthew and Mark as a fulfillment of Scripture (Mt 26:30-35; Mk 14:26-31; cf Jn 16:32; see Old Testament in the Gospels). Two themes are unique to Luke: the suggestion that Jesus' prayer helps them endure this trial and the task that Jesus assigns Peter (22:32). Peter, despite his failure, is implicitly singled out for special leadership. Again, the emphasis is not so much on transfer of authority as on mission. Peter is to care for the disciples much as Jesus has. This anticipates Peter's role in Acts where he will be the leader of the early church, but not the sole possessor of Jesus' authority.

Finally, Jesus anticipates the ongoing mission of the disciples. Luke 22:35-38 functions as a final warning to the community. Looking back to the success of their mission recorded in Luke 10, Jesus warns that the future will be different (22:35-38). In their earlier mission all their needs were met without carrying purses or extra clothing; now they will have to go prepared for struggle. This is not a sign of their personal failure; it was anticipated in Scripture (22:37 quoting Is 53:12). These verses implicitly explain what Jesus meant in 22:28, "You are those who have continued with me in my trials." The glory* of the kingdom is preceded by the struggle. But the disciples, not understanding what Jesus is saying, produce two swords as if Jesus is calling them to battle (cf. Jn 16:29-33).

As a farewell discourse Luke 22:21-38 accomplishes several tasks. It interprets Jesus' ministry as one of service and defends it as one ordained by God* in Scripture. The disciples are promised a triumphant role in the future kingdom of God. However, before this hope is realized they must carry on Jesus' ministry of service—even in the midst of trials. The discourse both warns and exhorts the reader, and the message is legitimized through the role and example of Jesus.

3. The Johannine Farewell Discourse (Jn 13—17).

3.1. Composition and Redaction. The structure of the Johannine farewell discourse is more apparent than that of Luke's Gospel. The section begins with the announcement of Jesus' coming death and departure, "When Jesus knew that his hour had come to depart out of this world to the Father, having loved his own who were in the world, he loved them to the end" (Jn 13:1). The problem in the Johannine material arises in 14:31 where Jesus says, "Rise let us go hence." This is followed by another large block of discourse material in John 15—17, finally followed by the departure of the disciples and Jesus in 18:1.

Various solutions to this problem have been offered. R. Bultmann rearranged the chapters so that 14:31 would connect with 18:1 at the end of the discourse. He further reorganized the sections of the discourse into what he argued is a more understandable format (Bultmann, 460-61). The problem with such a solution is providing a satisfactory explanation for how this order was ever disturbed. What Bultmann does show, however, is the close theological connection between the earlier and later portions of the discourse, especially in the case of John 17.

A second suggestion is that chapters 15—17 represent a second farewell discourse appended to the first by a later writer with different concerns. J. Becker argues that these later chapters concentrate on ec-clesiology, whereas John 14 focuses on christology. Similarly, the negative connotations of "world"* in John 15 and the emphasis on "remaining" (see Abiding) rather than being "in Christ" in these chapters suggests the concerns of the author of 1 John rather than the author of the Gospel. The chief problem with this argument is that it overstates the differences between chapters 14 and 15—17. For example, there are ecclesiological concerns in chapter 14 (especially in terms of the disciples' future work, 14:12-14; the commands to obey, 14:21, 23; and the role of the Spirit 14:15-18,26). In all of these chapters Jesus is placed as the mediator between the Father and the believers (cf. 14:12-24; 15:1-18; 16:4-15; 17:6-19).

The distinctiveness of John 15—17 lies in its greater emphasis on the hatred and opposition in the world. John 14 argues that Jesus has been the obedient servant of the Father (14:9-11) who has revealed the Father to his disciples (14:1-6). The disciples are now called to obedience to continue his work (14:12-24). John 15—17 places greater stress on the hatred of the world (15:18-25; 17:14-16), the distress the disciples must suffer (16:16-33) and the need for the church to endure (15:1-10).

In addition the stress on the role of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) changes somewhat in 16:5-15, emphasizing the Spirit's role in challenging the sin of the world. This contrasts with John 14 where the Spirit reminds the disciples of Jesus' words and provides the ongoing presence of Jesus in believers (14:15-17, 26). It is thus possible to see John 15—17 as an expansion of the farewell discourse which takes up the challenge of increased hostility facing the church (Painter).

The question remains: Are we dealing with one or more than one writer here? R. Brown, among many scholars, seems to argue for a plurality of authors. But a strong case can be made that the same author is at work throughout In most cases the change in historical context serves to explain the differences between the two parts of the discourse. John 17 in particular is so close to John 14 in terms of the themes of the mutual indwelling of the Father in the Son and the Son in the disciples that it is difficult to imagine that the same writer is not at work.

3.2. The Problem of Jesus' Departure. Given the unity of composition and authorship in John 13—17, it is not difficult to trace the structure of the Johannine farewell discourse. Much of the material forms a review of Jesus' life, performing both an apologetic and hortatory function. Jesus is the faithful servant of God who glorifies God (13:32), has done the work of his Father (14:10-12), obeyed the Father (14:31), loved the disciples (15:9) and revealed all things to them (15:15). Most of these themes are repeated in John 17 (17:4, 6, 8,
Jesus is portrayed in these chapters as the faithful servant of God who has been obedient in all things and is justified by God in his glorification. The note of apology is obvious. Jesus' ministry is justified by his absolute obedience to the Father. At the same time Jesus is being held up as an example to the disciples. As he is obedient, so must they obey (14:15-23; 17:6-17).

3.3. Instructions and Warnings. The instructions to the disciples are few and simple: they are to keep the commandments or words of Jesus (14:15, 21, 23; 15:14); believe in the mutual indwelling of Father and Son (14:11); remain in the vine (15:1-7, 9); bear fruit (15:8) and love one another (13:34-35; 15:12, 17). In all these instances, except the commandment* to faith,* they are following the sacrificial model of Jesus who is the obedient servant of God (Jn 15:12-17; see Servant of Yahweh).

With the commandments come certain promises. First is the promise that Jesus will return (14:2-3; 16:16-17, 19-20, 22). Jesus' departure is not the final word. The disciples will share a future with him in the mansions of the Father (14:2-4) and enjoy the presence of the love* and glory of the Father (17:22, 24-25). In the meantime the disciples are promised that they will do the works of Jesus and even greater works than his (14:12). They can do these works because they are promised that the Father will hear and answer the prayers of the disciples (14:13-14; 15:7, 16; 16:23-24) and will dwell in them through the Holy Spirit (14:16-17,21, 23,26; 15:26; 16:7-15).

There is also a note of warning in these discourses, especially in the expansion of 15—17. There is a warning of persecution (15:18-21; 16:2-4; 17:14). This will bring a time of sorrow (16:6, 20-22). But for those that endure, this sorrow will turn to joy (16:22).

3.4. The Successors to the Mission of Jesus. There is a sense in these discourses that Jesus is turning over his ministry and commission to the disciples. This is evident in 14:12 where the promise is given that the disciples will do "greater works" than Jesus; in 15:12 where Jesus tells the disciples that he has "chosen" them so that they might bear fruit; and in 15:18-25 where the disciples are told that they will be hated as Jesus was hated. This theme is seen even more clearly in John 17 where the disciples receive everything that the Father has given the Son: the name (17:6), the words (17:8) and the glory (17:22). Jesus in his prayer specifically commissions the disciples to carry on his ministry, sending them as he was sent (17:18-19) and looking forward to those who will believe in their words as they have believed in his (17:20-26).

The Johannine farewell discourse summarizes the message of the gospel for the faithful community. The discourse serves an apologetic function defending the exalted christology of the community. These discourses also exhort the community to remain unmoved in this faith, practicing love for fellow believers and continuing in the power of the Holy Spirit to do the work that Jesus has given them. The form of the farewell discourse provides an efficient means of focusing the christological and ecclesiological issues in a way that meets the changing needs of the Johannine church.

See also Last Supper; Passion Narrative; Service.

R. W. Paschal, Jr.

FASTING

Fasting is a tangible expression or direct corollary of one's relationship with God rather than a religious discipline. Though he does not prohibit it, Jesus views his own presence at the dawn of the age of salvation* as rendering fasting generally inappropriate.

1. Fasting among the Jews
2. Fasting in the Gospels
3. Fasting in the Early Church

1. Fasting among the Jews.

1.1. In the OT. Jewish meals were never purely physical or social occasions. In addition to accompanying worship,* festivals* and covenant-making, meals embodied central aspects of such activities. Therefore, abstaining from eating and drinking, that is fasting, also generally possessed a religious significance. Occasionally fasting was unavoidable due to lack of food (Ex 34:28; 1 Kings 19:8; Mt 15:32 par. Mk 8:3; 2 Cor 6:5), though mostly it was a byproduct of divine obedience or calling. More often abstinence was personally or corporately chosen because it expressed some deep loss, as in the case of David after the deaths of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam 1:12; cf. 2 Sam 3:35; 1 Kings 21:27; Neh 1:4; Ps 35:13; 69:10; Joel 1:13-15; 2:12-15), or some significant hope, such as Israel in preparation for war against the Philistines (1 Sam 7:6; 2 Sam 12:16-23; Judg 20:26; 2 Chron 20:3). It was a natural accompaniment of or preparation for communicating with God (Deut 9:9; Dan 9:3) or, in the case of the Day of Atonement, a sign of repentance prescribed by God (Lev 16:29-31 ; 23:27-29; Num 29:7). It was also considered to be a religious practice that might be appropriate for those outside Israel (Jn 3:5).

After the exile the number of prescribed (Ezra 8:21; Zech 8:19; cf. 2 Kings 25:1, 3-4, 8-9, 25) and perhaps even unprescribed fasts (e.g., Neh 9:1; Esth 4:1-3, 16-17; Dan 9:2-3) seems to have increased. The emphasis was often on the joyfulfulness of these occasions. Where appropriate, personal distress is also poignantly described (Ps 109:24). Prophetic protests against the hypocritical character of some fasting occur at points (Jer 14:12; Zech 7:5), and in some cases these lead to an equation or redefinition of fasting in terms of such actions as feeding the hungry and combating injustice (Is 58:4-7).

1.2. In Judaism. Fasting continued to have significance in the intertestamental writings and, of particular importance for the Gospels, among various first-century religious groups (see Judaism). Though all observed the three major fasts (i.e., Day of Atonement, New Year and, according to Strack-Billerbeck, 4:77-114, a fast covering prior calamities), differences between such groups expressed themselves partly in varied practices concerning the partaking of or abstaining from food. Sadducees seem to have associated themselves with the Temple* and, therefore, with the traditional fasts. The Qumran community (see Dead Sea Scrolls) also observed the Day of Atonement (1QpHab 11:7). The Pharisees* developed additional fasts, apparently twice a week (Lk 18:12; Did 8.1; and more generally, Pss. Sol. 3:8).

The Gospels give us glimpses of fasting among pious individuals such as Anna the prophetess (Lk 2:37). They also contrast the practice of ascetic groups, such as the disciples of John the Baptist* who were known to fast frequently (Lk 5:33), and Pharisees with the practice of Jesus' followers (Mt 9:14; Mk 2:18).

2. Fasting in the Gospels.

2.1. Jesus and His Disciples' Fasting. When queried about his disciples' practice, Jesus first quotes what is likely a proverbial saying about the inappropriateness of wedding guests fasting while the bridegroom (see Bride, Bridegroom) is in their company (cf. Gos. Thom. 104) or the wedding festival is in progress. Taking up a common symbol for the age of salvation, a wedding celebration, and identifying himself with the bridegroom, though probably not messianically, he explains that fasting will only come into consideration when he is removed from them (Mk 2:19-20 and pars).

The authenticity of this saying has been challenged on the grounds that Jesus would not have spoken allegorically in this fashion, nor would he have predicted his future suffering so early in his ministry or ultimately commend the practice of fasting. However, in an adjacent passage Jesus follows a proverbial saying or scriptural illustration with a direct reference to himself (Mk 2:17). When compared with the more detailed and later predictions of his death (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection), the allusion here is quite general (see Mk 8:31 et al.). And he does not prescribe fasting in the future so much as contrast the present fellowship and joy of the age of salvation being initiated with the future sadness associated with his forceful removal from his disciples (cf. especially the reference to "mourning" rather than "fasting" in Mt 9:15, and more generally cf. Jn 16:16-20). The two parables which follow contrast sharply the conduct of Jesus' disciples with that of John's disciples and the Pharisees (Mk
2.2. Jesus and Fasting in General. Despite the saying of Mark 2:19-20, elsewhere Jesus appears to take for granted that some fasting will continue during his ministry (Mt 6:16-18). In the Sermon on the Mount* he criticizes its ostentatious display. Contrary to the practice of hypocrites,* genuine fasting should be conducted toward God alone and disguised toward others by a joyful, even lavish, appearance. Jesus' reference to fasting here should not be interpreted as an injunction to fast. It is more a recognition of its congruity with prayer* (Mt 6:5-15) and simplicity (Mt 6:19-34) in the lifestyle of his Jewish disciples.*

2.3. Jesus' Own Experience of Fasting. Several times Jesus is described as going without food and drink. He does so during his sojourn in the wilderness (see Mountain and Wilderness) prior to his temptations ( Mt 4:2 and par.; see Temptation of Jesus) when he rises early to pray in a solitary location (Mk 1:35) and as a result of his ministering to those in need (Mk 8:31). On one occasion he declared to his disciples that he had "food" to eat of which they were ignorant, so referring to his fulfillment of his Father's purpose (Jn 4:31-34). Such passages suggest that for Jesus fasting was often a corollary of other activities to which he gave a high priority: spiritual struggle, prayer and evangelism. He does not take up fasting as a discipline in its own right.

There is no evidence that he fasted regularly during the time of his public ministry. His concern that he and his disciples gain sufficient sustenance after extending themselves for other's sake (Mk 2:23) and that people coming to hear him who had missed out on a meal be properly fed (Mk 8:1-13) are also revealing. So too are his associating hospitality with a person's embracing the good news of the kingdom (Lk 19:5-8; see Kingdom of God) and with both his and his disciple's anticipation of the quality of life in the kingdom itself (Lk 22:14-18; see Table Fellowship).

In line with the secondary place accorded fasting by Jesus, the Apostolic Fathers fail to cite any saying or action of Jesus as a justification of fasting as a religious discipline. Though other references to fasting occur on Jesus' lips (Mk 9:29; Mt 17:21), textual critics are now satisfied that this is due to an early gloss. Such additions also exist outside the gospels and indicate the importance of fasting.
among some early Christians (Acts 10:30; 1 Cor 7:5). Even so, with the New Testament epistles there is no reference to fasting among Gentile Christians, not even in passages where ascetic practices are mentioned (e.g., Col 2:15-22). However, Jewish Christians, Paul among them, when enduring physical deprivation (e.g., 2 Cor 6:5; 11:27) or engaging in specific prayer (e.g. Acts 13:3; 14:23) seem to have engaged in fasting as it is found in the Old Testament.

See also Justice, Righteousness; Prayer.

R. Banks

FATHER. See GOD

FAVORABLE YEAR OF THE LORD. See JUBILEE.

FEASTS

The Gospels present Jesus' parents (Lk 2:41) and the adult Jesus (esp. John's Gospel) as Jews who participate in the Jewish feasts. To a limited degree these observances provide the narrative framework for Gospel stories, and in the case of the Last Supper (see Last Supper) the significance of the festival of the Passover provides the interpretive context for understanding Jesus' mission. As the Evangelists assume a basic familiarity with Jewish festival observance, this article will focus primarily on their development and observance within Judaism.*

1. Terminology
2. Feasts in the OT
3. Feasts in Intertestamental Judaism
4. Feasts in the Gospels

1. Terminology.

The biblical terms meaning "feast" are Greek heortē, Hebrew môʾēd, and (with an originally more restricted meaning) Hebrew hag. Heortē is an old Greek word, attested as early as Homer. It means both "festival" and "feast," and appears over twenty-five times in the NT, mostly in the Gospels. Often another word or phrase appears to define specifically which feast is meant, for example: pascha, "Passover"; skēnopē gia, "Tabernacles"; or azymos, "Unleavened Bread." But it is not uncommon for heortē to appear without further definition. In these cases it is necessary to rely on the context to determine which of the several festivals is intended, and it is not always possible to reach a certain conclusion.

The Hebrew term mōʾēd had a rather broad meaning already within the OT. Its etymology connects mōʾēd to a fixed place or a fixed time, and by extension to an assembly at a fixed place or time. But the term occurs in the summarizing Numbers 29:39, a passage that begins by discussing daily sacrifices, Sabbath* offerings and new moons. Accordingly, it does not refer only to feasts, though it can be used for them. The word which does apply only to feasts, and specifically to the annual pilgrimage festivals, is hag. Its etymology is disputed, but whatever the original denotation, within the OT hag refers only to Passover, Weeks (Pentecost) and Tabernacles. In the postbiblical period, however, the two Semitic words came to be more or less interchangeable. Indeed, hag came to designate the new moon and even the festivals of heretics. Thus not much should be made of a particular author's choice of terms in most postbiblical texts.

2. Feasts in the OT.

2.1. Source Texts. The OT was, of course, the source for most elements of festival observance in the time of Jesus. But it includes several different religious calendars. These appear to derive from different geographical regions on the one hand, and from different historical periods on the other. Since scholarship has yet to reach a consensus on which of these explanations may apply to which list, the following discussion makes no particular claims regarding source or date; it simply considers the various accounts in a convenient order.

The shortest calendar is that of Exodus 23:14-17. It refers to three haggim: That of the unleavened bread, that of the harvest, and that of the ingathering. It commands the men of Israel to appear three times per year before the Lord, but makes no stipulation as to where they must go to make that appearance. A second religious calendar within Exodus appears at 34:18-23. Here the number of haggim is the same, but their names are slightly different Many scholars see it as significant that these two festal calendars mention the Feast of Unleavened Bread but say nothing of the Passover. In this view, the connection of Passover and Unleavened Bread in Exodus 12 becomes a secondary historical development.

The calendar of Deuteronomy 16:1-17 is again essentially the same, but it adds in verses 2,11,15 and 16 that the men are to appear "at the place which he will choose." Unlike the calendars of Exodus, then, this calendar suggests a centralized cultus. Also, here Passover and Unleavened Bread are linked. In both the calendars of Exodus and in that of Deuteronomy, which were based on an autumnal new year, no fixed dates for the festivals occur. In the different regions of Israel the agricultural cycle was somewhat different of course, and therefore it is probable that this natural cycle was at first the only regulator of originally agricultural feasts.

With the calendar of Leviticus 23, however, precise dates now appear. Another change is the institution (if such it is) of a vernal new year. While the names of the months previously described were, where given, Canaanite, they now accord with the Babylonian calendar. The implication is that while the previous calendars antedated the Babylonian captivity, Leviticus 23 constitutes later material. But the literary complexion of this chapter of Leviticus is difficult and at least some of the portions seem to be pre-exilic. In addition, the Levitical calendar is much fuller than those already described; it includes the Sabbath, the Feast of the First Sheaf, the Feast of the First Day of the Seventh Month (originally a new year festival?) and the Day of Atonement Clearly, not all of these additions arose late in the history of Israel; Leviticus 23 adds them to the festivals of the "earlier" calendars in part because it is not concerned only with the haggim.

It is possible to see yet another list of feast days in Ezekiel 45:18-25. This text describing the restoration hopes of the exilic prophet, lists two atoning festivals, one for each half of the year. On the first day of the first month (the vernal new year), the people are to offer a sacrifice for their sins, and again on the seventh of that month. The two ceremonies together accomplish the cleansing or expiation of the Temple.* At the beginning of the seventh month, and for the seven following days, another atoning procedure is to take place. The only other festival occasion singled out is the Passover, set for the fourteenth of the first month and here denominated a haį.

Table 1. A Comparison of Festival Calendars
The final festival calendar occurs in Numbers 28—29, often regarded as a sort of commentary on the cycle prescribed by Leviticus. The basic difference between the calendars of Leviticus and Numbers consists in the sacrificial details that the latter provides. Where the occasions are the same, the sacrifices that Numbers 28—29 requires do not agree with those of Ezekiel.
The table on page 236 summarizes several of the more detailed OT calendars alongside that of the intertestamental "new Torah" known as the Temple Scroll (TS; to be discussed below).

2.2. The Three Great Feasts. The pilgrimage times of Passover (with Unleavened Bread), Weeks and Tabernacles were the major landmarks of the religious year in Israel.

By the time of the NT, Passover (pesah) had become the pinnacle occasion, but it had not always been so. A long period of development, often difficult to trace, lies behind the NT reality. In addition to the information that can be extracted from the various religious calendars, liturgical and historical texts contain precious additional facts for tracing such development. Also of great significance are two ostraca and a papyrus text, the "Passover Papyrus," from Elephantine (where lived a group of Jewish mercenaries from c. 600-380 B.C.). These brief allusions aside, nothing more will be said about the problem of historical development within the OT period; but it must be borne in mind that all through the periods of this discussion, practices were not always uniform among celebrants of the major feasts. Thus, even for the NT period one must be leery of relying on a single textual tradition (e.g., the Mishnah or Josephus) as evidence for actual practice.

The Passover was celebrated at the full moon of the first month of a vernal new year. On the tenth day each family chose a year-old lamb. At twilight on the fourteenth day they killed this unblemished animal and spread its blood on the lintel and door posts. The meat was roasted and eaten on the same night, with any remains burnt thereafter. The bones of the lamb were to remain unbroken. Along with the meat, the family was to eat unleavened bread and bitter herbs, all the while dressed for a hasty departure as commemoration of the Exodus from Egypt. On the next day began the Festival of Unleavened Bread, which continued for seven days. From the fifteenth to the twenty-first no leaven was consumed. The first and last days of Unleavened Bread were days of rest and of worship.

Weeks (šāḇû’ôt), the second great feast of the year, was a harvest festival which originally commemorated the wheat harvest specifically. It fell seven weeks after the cutting of the first barley and cereal grains. Starting from the day after the Sabbath on which the first sheaf was presented to Yahweh (at least according to one understanding of the passage in Lev 23), seven complete weeks were counted. One thus arrived at a total of fifty days, whence the Greek name for the feast Pentecost (pentēkostē, lit "fiftieth" [day]). In the ceremony the people offered two loaves made out of the new flour. The loaves were to be leavened—the only instance of such a ritual prescription in the OT. Apparently, the point of the leavened offering was to establish an antithetical connection with the earlier Unleavened Bread.

The third great feast of the religious calendar was the Feast of Tabernacles (also known in the English versions as Booths). The underlying Hebrew is sukkōt, the reference being to the temporary "huts" which were the hallmark of this festival. It is also known as "the feast of Yahweh" (Lev 23:39), and was the most important and best attended of the pilgrimages to the sanctuary. In recognition of this importance, both within the OT (Ezek 45:25) and in postbiblical Hebrew and Aramaic it was sometimes called simply "the feast." This feast also underwent some interesting historical development; that of the postbiblical period will occupy us at some length below. The essence of the biblical prescriptions by the early postexilic period required a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where a feast was kept for seven days. The people were to live in huts to recall that Israel lived in huts after the Exodus from Egypt. Like Weeks, this festival was originally a harvest festival, particularly connected with the produce of the threshing floor and the olive and winepresses. And it was an occasion for great rejoicing. During the NT period community leaders danced in the Temple courtyards, singing and wielding lighted torches.

3. Feasts in Intertestamental Judaism.

By the second century B.C. if not earlier, the biblical prescriptions for the feasts were regarded as established. That is to say, we have no evidence that communities of Jews felt free to disregard any of the relevant passages, and if differences between the biblical calendars were perceived (differences which were originally a result of geographic and temporal distance, as noted above) they were harmonized. Thus the basic biblical prescriptions for a given festival's observance were not at issue. Nevertheless, the inter-testamental period was not one of uniform festival procedures, a point that is important to recall when reading the Cospels. The reasons for this lack of uniformity were many, but for the present purposes we shall be concerned with three: (1) lack of agreement on the proper calendar, (2) disagreements about the proper interpretation of the biblical texts; and (3) continued development, adding to the biblical prescriptions extrabiblical elements.
It was only with the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls (see Dead Sea Scrolls) that scholars came to appreciate the centrality of disagreement about the proper calendar. Books such as Jubilees had already alerted them to the fact that such disagreements existed, and hints of such were also found in rabbinic literature. But the scrolls brought home with a special force just what might be the implications of such divisions among Jewry. For if there were no agreement on the calendar, neither could there be agreement on when the biblical festivals should be celebrated. And if the people should celebrate a festival on the wrong day, had they not actually failed to celebrate the festival at all? At stake were basic issues of adherence to Scripture.

Many of the Dead Sea Scrolls (but not all) presuppose or advocate a solar calendar of 364 days. Significant evidence indicates that the solar calendar was a very early development in Israel, indeed perhaps the original calendar. For example, it seems to underlie the patriarchal journeys of Genesis. It has been well argued (by Jaubert and others) that the solar calendar regulated religious life in the early postexilic years, and further that it was only in the early second century B.C. that its nemesis, the lunar or lunisolar calendar, came to predominate. Perhaps one can see this pivotal change reflected in Daniel 7:25 (speaking of Antiochus IV), "he will plan to alter times and law." If this view is correct, then the lunar calendar was a progressive move while the solar calendar represented the older, conservative position. Even among themselves, advocates of the solar calendar were divided (cf. esp. 1 Enoch 82:5-6): some held that the year should consist of 360 days, some of 364 and others of 365—the variations depending on whether and how one intercalated. Of course, with each different scheme the varieties of festival practice proliferated.

Under the 364-day scheme the festivals did not "wander" as they did in other systems. Every year they would always fall on the same day. In each set of three months, one intercalary day was added, and the serial days aligned with fixed days of the week, as illustrated in Table 2:

Table 2. The 364 Day Calendar
The lunar or lunisolar calendars required much more attention to intercalation. Rabbinic Judaism's system (apparently already in force among many Jews during the intertestamental period) relied on observation of the new moon to decide when months began and ended, and whether a given year should have an extra month added (necessary seven times in every nineteen years).

Groups among the Jews who observed these different calendars would not celebrate the festivals at the same time and might even have been unable to participate together in the cultus—provided, of course, that these differences were not merely theoretical. Some scholars believe that the solar calendar was never practiced and that its various versions represent no more than idealized positions held by certain groups. Perhaps that is correct in certain instances; the Temple Scroll calendar may be an example of one such idealized program. (Not only does this Qumran text stipulate a 364-day calendar, but operating by analogy it adds otherwise-unknown pilgrimage festivals to the biblical requirements.)
Yet it is hard to believe that the radically different perspectives on proper festival observance never burst the bounds of theoretical discussion. And there is evidence that such in fact did happen. For example, Josephus* records that the Sicarii of Masada conducted a raid on En Gedi during Unleavened Bread at one point during the First Revolt (Josephus J.W. 4.7.2 §§4024). Such a raid on the part of fastidious observers of the Law* (as archeology has shown the Sicarii to be) seems unlikely in the extreme, unless they actually observed a ritual calendar different from that of the inhabitants of En Gedi. For the raiders the day of the attack evidently did not fall during the period of the feast.

Thus, different views on the proper calendar meant that festival observance could differ profoundly among various groups of Second Temple Jews. A second factor leading to diverse observances of the festivals was disagreement about just what the biblical texts required. A brief look at problems involved with the Feast of Tabernacles can serve as a representative example here.

Leviticus 23:40 requires of those celebrating Tabernacles that "you shall take up for yourselves on the first day p'ri 'ēṣ hādār kappōt l'mārim wa'nap 'ēṣ 'ēḇōṯ wē'arēḇē nāḥal and you shall rejoice before Yahweh your God." The NASB renders the words left untranslated as "the foliage of beautiful trees, palm branches and boughs of leafy trees and willows of the brook"; but not all intertestamental Jews would have agreed with this interpretation of the phrase.

Later, rabbinic Judaism saw here a reference to four different elements, known as the "four kinds." This understanding is reflected already in Targum Onqelos, which renders the portion "fruits of the tree: citrons and palm branches and myrtle branches and willows of the brook." The much earlier book of Jubilees, however, understands Leviticus rather differently. In chapter 16 of that book, Abraham is said to observe the very first Feast of Tabernacles at Beershe-ba. As part of his observance, he took "branches of leaves and willow from the stream . . . branches of palm trees and fruit of good trees" (Jub. 16:30-31). Thus, the author of Jubilees understood at least one and perhaps two of the elements of the "four kinds" differently from rabbinic Judaism. The "citron" is conspicuous by its absence, being replaced by "fruit of good trees" (• the Hebrew p'ri "ēṣ hādār). And apart from this difference other elements of Abraham's celebration are likewise distinct from later practice.

Still other views existed in the intertestamental years. For example, 2 Maccabees 10:5-7 describes the "festival of purification" which attended the sanctification of the Temple by the men of Judas Maccabees in 164 B.C. This festival was modeled on the Feast of Tabernacles and later became known as Hanukkah. What is particularly interesting is that 2 Maccabees 10:7 states that the Jews celebrated "holding wreathed wands and branches bearing ripe fruit and palm fronds" (trans, by Goldstein). As Goldstein comments, "The Greek words here certainly do not fit the practices of [later] Jews . . . and there is some difficulty even in fitting them to the biblical texts bearing on Tabernacles." Without entering into the technicalities behind his translation (which is perhaps open to question), it is clear that the epitomist of 2 Maccabees, Jonathan of Cyrene (or his source), held a view of Leviticus 23:40 which accords neither with Jubilees nor with rabbinic exegesis. Which understanding was held by which group of Jews and when are questions which we simply cannot yet answer with any precision.

With regard to the third source of division on festival observance, the growth of extrabiblical customs, Tabernacles can continue to serve as an example. To return to Jubilees 16 for a moment: the author comments on the proper observance that "it is ordained forever that . . . they should place crowns on their heads" (Jub. 16:30). Such a commandment does not exist in the Bible. In fact, this "eternal ordinance" is a borrowing from Greek festal customs, although it was probably so well established in Israel by the time of Jubilees that its author—who preaches strenuously against certain Greek customs—was ignorant of its origins. The author's stress on its eternal verity makes it clear that not everyone in Israel accepted the wearing of crowns as a proper observance of Tabernacles.

Another such borrowed custom played a significant role in the history of the intertestamental period. During one Feast of Tabernacles Alexander Jannaeus (ruled 103-76 B.C.) offered sacrifice in his role as high priest (see Priest, Priesthood). The custom was to pour an oblation of water following the sacrifice, but the Pharisees* and Sadducees disagreed on where the liquid should be directed: The Pharisees held that it should be poured on the altar, while their opponents required the water to be poured out on the ground. Jannaeus poured the water on the ground. The people gathered at the festival, being persuaded by the Pharisaic ruling, were enraged and began to pelt the priest-king with their citrons. Thereupon Jannaeus ordered his mercenary soldiers to fall upon the crowd and 6,000 Jews perished (see Josephus Ant. 13.13.5 §§372-73; J.W. 1.88, and cf. b. Sukk. 48b). Ironically, the custom of pouring out an oblation, however directed, is not a biblical one and once again derives apparently from the Greeks. Thus, in attempting to understand the significance of Gospel references to feasts (especially with regard to fine details), one should be aware of the diversity of observance which characterized the Judaism of Jesus' day.

4. Feasts in the Gospels.

Prominent though they were in Jewish religious life, the three major feasts and the customs involved with their observance play a relatively limited role in the Gospels. Seldom do the narratives presume more than a basic familiarity with Jewish festival belief and practice. The one major exception to this generalization is the Passover as it figures in the narratives describing the Last Supper. As has been repeatedly argued, numerous details in all four Gospels point to a setting within the context of the observance of Passover by Jesus and his disciples* (cf., e.g., Jeremias, Marshall); indeed, it is this setting that helps provide the immediate context for understanding Jesus' actions and words (see Last Supper). Outside the Gospels the comparison between Jesus and the paschal lamb is so pervasive (e.g., 1 Cor 5:7; 1 Pet 1:19; Rev 5:6, 9, 12; see Lamb of God) that it almost certainly derives from Jesus and his celebration of the Last Supper.

Particularly with the Gospel of John, knowledge of the calendar of Jewish festivals helps determine the chronology of Jesus' mission. Thus, for example, John narrates three Passover festivals (Jn 2:23; 6:4; 11:55), giving rise to the traditional notion of a three-year public ministry for Jesus. John's concern is not Strictly chronological, however. Thus, his mention of the approaching Passover in John 6:4 is one piece of the larger Exodus typology within his account of the feeding miracle (see Miracles, Miracle Stories), with its emphasis on provision of food, manna in the wilderness and the designation of Jesus as the eschatological prophet* ("like Moses," Deut 18:15-18).

More difficult is the chronology* of the passion week as it relates to Passover observance. This is not the problem of the apparent identification of the Feast of Unleavened Bread and the Passover in Luke 23:1, which reflects the virtual inseparability of these two festivals in current practice. Rather, as is transparent from a comparative reading of the Gospels, the Synoptics seem to have a different chronology of the events of Jesus' final week than one finds in John. Thus the evening during which the Last Supper is celebrated and the time of Jesus' crucifixion—both in relation to the sacrifice of the Passover lambs—are in question. Jaubert has attempted to solve this problem with recourse to John's use of a different calendar than the Synopticists, but her position has won few adherents (see Death of Jesus; Chronology).

Otherwise, the Feast of Passover provides the narrative framework for stories about Jesus. A group of Passover pilgrims may be involved in Jesus' feeding of the multitudes (Mk 6:32-44 and par.; 8:1-21 and par.). One of the three pilgrimage feasts, probably Passover, forms the backdrop for Pilate's violence against Galilean visitors (Lk 13:1-3). Within the context of Luke's concern with portraying the exemplary piety of those involved with Jesus' birth and childhood (e.g., Lk 2:22-24, 25, 27, 36-37, 39; see Birth of Jesus), Jesus' pilgrimage to Jerusalem with his parents ("as was their custom") for the festival of Passover, further illustrates their righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness) before God. The presence of thousands of pilgrims in Jerusalem at Passover also explains the large crowds at Jesus' entry into Jerusalem (see People, Crowd; Triumphal Entry) and at his hearing before Pilate (see Pontius Pilate; Trial of Jesus), the presence of Roman officials at Jerusalem at this time (rather than in Caesarea, Pilate's normal residence), and, perhaps, the recognition of the threat Jesus posed by his prophetic action in the Temple. (To be branded a troublemaker from Galilee and to have the appearance of a large following was to be recognized as a threat to the state. See Temple Cleansing; Death of Jesus.)

The Gospels make no specific reference to the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost. In the NT the term pentēkostē occurs only in 1 Corinthians 16:8; Acts 20:16; and Acts 2:1. This latter usage comes in connection with Luke's account of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) and the birth of the church.* These events apparently took place at the first Pentecost following the crucifixion. Hence, although not occurring within the Gospels themselves, these events are closely linked to the context of the Gospels. As Lohse has noted, the connection has the effect of tying the Jewish festival calendar into the weave of promise and fulfillment, and thus of salvation history.

The term for the Feast of Tabernacles, skēnopēgia, occurs only twice in the NT, in John 5:1 (textual variant) and 7:2. The narrative units that together comprise John 7 are dramatically oriented around the feast so that in verses 1-9 the feast is near, in verses 10-13 Jesus goes up to the festival, in verses 14-36 he is teaching during the festival week, and verses 37-52 narrate what occurred on the last day of the festival. Thus, in John's narrative the Feast of Tabernacles becomes the backdrop for Jesus' self-revelation as the one who brings salvation, drawing on the festival images of outpoured water* (Jn 7:37-38) and light* (cf.
Jn 8:12).

The Fourth Evangelist sometimes qualifies his mention of Passover with the phrase "of the Jews" (Jn 2:13; 6:4; 11:55). On this basis some scholars (e.g., Jeremias) have reasoned that he thus distinguishes between the Jewish Passover and a separate, Christian Passover memorializing Jesus' passion. John's usage elsewhere, however—(e.g.) "Jewish purification rites" (Jn 2:6), "Jewish festival" (Jn 5:1) and "Jewish feast of Tabernacles" (Jn 7:2)—suggests that John is only setting Judaism in general over against Jesus and the Jesus movement.

See also Chronology; Last Supper; Death of Jesus.

M.O. Wise

FEEDING MIRACLES. See Bread; Table Fellowship

FESTIVALS. See Fasts

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS. See Josephus

FLOCK. See Shepherd, Sheep

FOOTWASHING See Service
FORGIVENESS OF SINS

The Greek verb aphiēmi ("forgive"), together with its cognate noun aphesis, is the most frequently used term for forgiveness in the Gospels. The verb has a wide range of meanings, including those of letting people go or dismissing them (e.g., Mk 4:36), divorcing a wife (1 Cor 7:11-13), or leaving a person (Lk 10:30) or a place (Jn 4:3). Forgiveness can also be expressed as remitting (apolyō), pardoning (charizomai) or forgiving (aphiēmi) a debt.

1. Forgiveness in the OT.

In the OT, although there are examples of one human being forgiving another (Gen 50:17; Ex 10:17; 1 Sam 15:25; 25:28; Prov 17:9), the majority of references to the forgiveness of sins have God* as subject It belongs to his nature that he is "a God forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin" (Ex 34:7; cf. Num 14:18-20; Neh 9:17; Ps 130:4; Mic 7:18; Dan 9:9). The OT thus contains many prayers* for God's forgiveness both of individuals (e.g., 2 Kings 5:18; Ps 25:11) and especially of his people Israel* (e.g., 1 Kings 8:30-50; 2 Chron 6:21-39; Ps 79:9). In the psalms the distinction between prayers for individual and corporate forgiveness cannot be drawn sharply, since what were originally prayers of individuals came to be used in corporate worship.*

Yet the OT never represents forgiveness as automatic: It flows from the sovereign freedom of the living God. Thus, although God's forgiveness may be integrated into legal provisions and so be expected in certain situations, especially where sacrifice is involved (Lev 4:20-35; Num 15:25-28), God may on occasions refuse to forgive (Ex 23:21; Deut 29:20; Josh 24:19; 2 Kings 24:4; Is 22:14; Lam 3:42; Hos 1:6; cf. Jer 5:7); a prophet may even pray that God will not forgive his adversaries (Is 2:9; Jer 18:23), and Job asks God in perplexity, "Why do you not pardon my transgression?" (7:21).

2. Forgiveness in the Gospels.

2.1. The Son of Man's Power to Forgive Sins. In both OT and NT God's forgiveness is often referred to in reverent passive expressions. "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven" (Ps 32:1) is clarified by the following verse: "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputes no iniquity" (cf. Deut 21:8; Is 6:7; 33:24; 40:2). Such texts are a clue to the understanding of the Synoptic story of the healing of the lame man (Mk2:1-12 par.). The scribes' indignation ("Who has the power [dynatai] to forgive sins but one, [that is,] God?" v. 7, cf. Lk 5:21), is caused by Jesus' statement "Your sins are forgiven" (v. 5 par., cf. v. 9 par.). Their anger is aroused not because forgiveness of one human being by another was unknown, but because, as the scribes* rightly perceived, the passive formula implied a claim to make performative statements in God's name. If such a statement had not been capable of validation in action ("take up your bed and walk," v. 11), it would indeed have been blasphemous. Jesus' statement that he heals the lame man "in order that you may know that the Son of man has authority [exousia] to forgive sins on earth" (v. 10) makes the claim virtually explicit On one level, the story is full of dramatic irony; on another, it has profound christological significance.

Though less developed, Luke's story of the woman* at the house of Simon the Pharisee* (7:36-50) has some of the same features. Simon's assumption that Jesus claimed to be a prophet but was "not really" one (v. 39) and the guests' unanswered question "Who is this, who even forgives sins?" (v. 49) would have added meaning for early readers of the Gospel. For them Jesus was more than a prophet,* and they were urgently searching for themselves by what names he might most worthily be called.

Closely related to forgiveness are those passages which speak of the remission of a debt The ideas of remission and forgiveness are especially close in the story of the two debtors (Mt 18:23-35). There, as Jesus' final comment makes explicit, the remission of a debt is a parable* of forgiveness in the kingdom of heaven. In the eschatological community inaugurated by Jesus, God's rule has already been established in a newly effective way. Luke 7:41-43 is similar, though a different Greek verb, charizomai, "give freely, remit, pardon," is used. Also in the Lord's Prayer, where Luke 11:4 has "forgive us our sins," Matthew 6:12 has "forgive us our debts," sins being thought of as (metaphorically) incurring indebtedness to God.

2.2. Forgiveness and Community. Such passages illustrate a further principle: God's forgiveness cannot be effectively received except by those who are ready to forgive others. This is given special emphasis in Matthew's version of the Lord's Prayer by being made the subject of a unique comment: "If you do not forgive others, then your Father will not forgive the wrongs you have done" (6:15). The same thought is expressed positively in the previous verse, and in different words in Luke 6:37. There is even a scale of gratitude: the greater the forgiveness, the greater the love* (Lk 7:47).

Jesus' teaching is thus addressed to a community based on the giving and receiving of forgiveness, from which those who refuse to forgive their enemies exclude themselves. Conversely, forgiveness is related to repentance* (Lk 24:47) and faith* in God (Mk 2:5 par.) and may be considered as the removal of barriers to reconciliation. Forgiveness thus remains, as in the OT, divine initiative, but it extends (by implication through Jesus) to the messianic community as a whole, whose members consider one another as brothers and sisters, and as such are to forgive one another without limit (Mt 18:22; cf. Lk 17:3-4). The process is continued when the risen Jesus endows his disciples* with the Holy Spirit* and confers on them as his envoys the power both to forgive sins and to withhold forgiveness (Jn 20:23). The reference here is certainly to discipline within the believing community, not to the refusal to forgive personal wrongs. Jesus' earlier statements about "binding and loosing" to Peter (Mt 16:19) and to the disciples (Mt 18:18) are similar, but probably refer more generally to decisions about what is to be permitted and prohibited within the community rather than to forgiveness alone. In the NT, as in the OT, the forgiveness of sins is not automatic.

2.3. The Unforgivable Sin. This truth is given its most absolute expression in Jesus' saying about the "eternal sin" against the Holy Spirit (Mk 3:28-29 par.), which God (implied) will never forgive. This sin is not defined, and the contrast with forgivable blasphemies* is unclear, since these may be either blasphemies against God or slanders against other human beings. The best clue to the meaning of the saying is probably in Mark's final comment: "(Jesus said this] because they said, 'He has an unclean spirit' " (v. 30). Those who witness Jesus' mighty acts, yet attribute this power to Beelzebul, are calling good evil and so excluding themselves from the sphere in which God is acknowledged as king.

2.4. Forgiveness and the Post-Resurrection Community. Other Gospel sayings, while doubtless rooted in the ministry of the historical Jesus, also point toward the concerns and developing institutions of the primitive church. That church celebrates no animal sacrifices, so there is no exact parallel in the Gospels to the OT link between sacrifice and forgiveness. Yet in Matthew's account of the Last Supper,* the blood of the new covenant is said to be "poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins" (26:28), probably a correct interpretation of Mark's simple "for many" (14:24), since forgiveness was an essential aspect of the new covenant predicted by Jeremiah (31:34; see Ransom
Similarly, at the beginning of the Gospel John's (see John the Baptist) baptism* is said in identical language to be "for the forgiveness of sins" (Mk 1:4; Lk 3:3; cf. Lk 1:77), a phrase used also in the setting of a post-resurrection meal (Lk 24:47) and linked soon after with Christian baptism (Acts 2:38).

The exact relation between the sacraments on the one hand and forgiveness on the other is not spelled out in the Gospels. But the language implies that the purpose and/or the effect of baptism and the Lord's Supper is to claim from God, on the grounds of his promise, forgiveness of the participants' sins. Yet although God's forgiveness becomes effective under his rule and within the believing community, the community itself, and thus the offer of forgiveness, are without bounds. The message of "repentance toward [many manuscripts have 'and'] forgiveness of sins" is to be preached "to all the nations beginning from Jerusalem" (Lk 24:47).

The theme of forgiveness is strongly implied in two Gospel passages from which the language of forgiveness is absent. In John 8:3-11 (not originally part of John's Gospel but bearing all the marks of historical authenticity), Jesus' refusal to condemn the woman taken in adultery is reminiscent of the collocation "judge not... condemn not... forgive" in Luke 6:37. In the parable* of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32), the father is not to be allegorized as an image of God, yet the meeting of the father's acceptance and the son's sorrow (w. 20-21) represents at a deeper level the divine initiative in the forgiveness of sins and the appropriate response of believing repentance.

The Gospel writers, while reflecting the concerns of the post-resurrection communities to which they belonged and for which they wrote, are generally faithful to the historical perspective of the events they record (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). In particular, their accounts are not distorted by dependence on Pauline and other theological reflection (doubtless increasingly influential during the period of the Gospels' composition) about the relation between the death of Christ (see Death of Jesus) and the salvation* of which God's forgiveness is an essential aspect Yet it may be said that the common roots of that reflection may be found in the Gospel records, especially—though not exclusively—in the simple, not yet formulaic, statements that Christ's blood was shed "for you" (11 22:20) and "for many" (hyper pollōn, Mt 14:24; peri pollōn, Mt 26:28) "for the forgiveness of sins."

See also Faith; Repentance; Sinners.

P. Ellingworth

FORM CRITICISM

This method of analysis focuses on the individual, self-contained units of material into which the Gospels may be subdivided. It identifies the different "forms" or subgenres of literature which appear, and it attempts to describe the ways in which these forms developed during the period of time in which they were passed along by word of mouth prior to the writing of the Gospels themselves.

1. The Method
2. Critique
3. Alternatives
4. Criteria of Authenticity

1. The Method.

1.1. Origins. At the beginning of the twentieth century, scholars such as H. Gunkel and J. Wellhausen had already developed form criticism for many portions of the OT. In NT studies source criticism still captured the attention of most By 1920, however, a trio of German scholars was busily researching the oral prehistory of the Gospels. K. L Schmidt M. Dibelius and most notably R. Bultmann pioneered the form criticism of the NT. English-speaking circles were at first relatively skeptical of this new discipline, but by the 1930s and 1940s in Great Britain, V. Taylor and R. H. Lightfoot were cautiously appropriating and advocating many form-critical principles in their work.

The earliest form critics based their study on several foundational presuppositions. All agreed that the teachings of Jesus and the narratives about his life which comprise the Gospels were transmitted orally over a considerable period of time before they were ever written down. They believed that these units of material for the most part circulated independently of one another. They affirmed that the closest parallels to the transmission of the gospel tradition could be found in the oral, folk literature of other ancient, European cultures (ranging as far afield as Iceland and Yugoslavia). They concluded that comparison with these parallels made it highly likely that the final form in which the Gospels appeared could not be trusted to supply a reliable account of what Jesus actually said and did. Rather one had to work backward and remove various accretions and embellishments which had crept into the tradition and so try to recover the original, pure forms. These forms, they believed, were originally short, streamlined and unadorned, and very Jewish in style and milieu.

1.2. Objectives. The original form-critical agenda included three main tasks: classifying the individual pericopes (self-contained units of teaching or narrative) according to form, assigning each form to a Sitz im Leben ("life-situation") in the early church and reconstructing the history of the tradition (see Tradition Criticism).

1.2.1. Analysts of Forms. No universally agreed-upon list of forms exists. At least six major categories appear quite frequently. The first four focus primarily on Jesus' teachings; the last two on the narrative material.

(1) Individual logia, or sayings. These include wisdom or proverbial sayings (e.g., Mt 8:20), prophetic (see Prophets, Prophecy) and apocalyptic* utterances (e.g., Lk 12:54-56), legal sayings and church rules (e.g., Mk 7:6-8), including what are often called "sentences of holy law" (e.g., Mt 18:15-17) and "I-sayings" (e.g., Mt 12:27-28), in which Jesus reveals something about his own identity or mission.

(2) Pronouncement stories. These have also been called apophthegms and paradigms. They are short stories about an action of Jesus whose primary purpose is to lead up to a climactic pronouncement on a given topic (e.g., Mk 2:13-17; 3:31-35; 12:13-17). They are related to the Hellenistic chreiai*—pithy summaries of the actions and teachings of a great figure designed to epitomize some important attribute of that individual. Though given only scant attention in most traditional form criticism, chreia studies have proliferated in recent years. Many pronouncement stories are also conflict or controversy stories, pitting Jesus against his opponents on a crucial topic which divided them.

(3) Parables. These are short, metaphorical narratives, usually fictitious, designed to reveal some aspect of the kingdom of God. Form critics have regularly subdivided them into similitudes (explicit, present-tense comparisons — e.g., Mk 4:30-32), parables proper (past-tense stories — e.g., Mt 25:1-13) and example-stories (narratives built on metonymy rather than metaphor — e.g., Lk 12:16-21). In this century parables have usually been sharply distinguished from allegory, but this distinction is coming under increasing attack.

(4) Speeches. These are longer, connected utterances of Jesus, usually believed to have been constructed out of shorter forms which once circulated independently of each other (e.g., Mt 5-7; Mk 4:1-34; 13:5-37). Speeches may in turn be subdivided into various other categories (e.g., farewell addresses [Jn 14—17] or symposia [Luke 14:1-24]; see Farewell Discourse).

(5) Miracle Stories. These are narratives of the supernatural deeds of Jesus. They divide into two main categories — healing miracles and nature miracles. These may then be subdivided into categories such as reanimations (Lk 7:11-17) or exorcisms (Mk 5:1-20) and rescue miracles (Mk 4:35-41) or gift miracles (Jn 2:1-11).

(6) Other Historical Narratives. Many of these have often been labeled legends or myths, partly because of their content (associating Jesus with God in some way) and partly because not all of each narrative is believed to be historically trustworthy (e.g., Lk 2:1-20; Mt 4:1-11; Mk 16:1-8).

1.2.2. Use in the Early Church. The form critic next tries to determine in which contexts in the life of the early Christian community each of these forms would have been most valued. For example, it is widely accepted that pronouncement stories would have been most used in popular preaching. Miracle stories were probably most significant in Christian apologetic against Greco-Roman beliefs in other divine men (see Divine Man) or primeval heroes. Legends, it is often maintained, were created primarily out of a desire to glorify and exalt Jesus. Sentences of holy law were probably most relevant in setting church disputes. Parables may well have been transmitted during times of popular storytelling. Many forms are not readily associated with just one Sitz im Leben, and most critics agree that this objective is the most speculative of the three.

1.2.3. Writing the Tradition-History. Finally, each form is studied in light of what kinds of changes it most likely underwent during the transmission of the oral tradition. For example, it is usually affirmed that the bulk of the parables was well preserved, but introductions and conclusions were commonly altered as they were applied to new contexts. The pronouncement stories carefully preserved the pronouncements (comparable to the punch line of a joke), but the historical trappings in which they were encased might be altered greatly. Legends usually formed around a historical kernel which was then significantly embellished. Prophetic sayings (and various other forms) were often first spoken by early Christian prophets in the name of the risen Lord and later read back onto the lips of the earthly Jesus (see Prophet, Prophecy).

Form critics also believe that various tendencies of the developing tradition were widely applicable, irrespective of the given form of a pericope. Most of these can be summarized under what Bultmann termed "the law of increasing distinctness": stories became longer, incidental details were added, nameless characters were identified and place names were included. Additional dialog, interpretation, expansion and contemporization all appeared. Reapplication from a Palestinian-Jewish to a Hellenistic-Jewish and eventually to a Hellenistic-Gentile context also greatly transformed the form and content of much of the tradition.

2. Critique.

From the outset of the discipline there were conservative scholars who questioned many of the form critics' conclusions. But for a majority of scholars representing a wide spectrum of theological traditions, form criticism became the single most important modern tool for Gospel analysis. In the 1950s redaction criticism* developed, which has in many ways superseded form criticism during the last thirty years. But most redaction critics, like Gospel scholars specializing in other disciplines, have presupposed most of the methodology and conclusions of form criticism even when they have devoted much of their attention to other questions. In recent years, however, many NT scholars are utilizing forms of literary criticism which point to the carefully wrought unity of the Gospel narratives and calling into question many of the older axioms of traditio-historical development. Each of the three main objectives on the form-critical agenda therefore deserves careful evaluation.

2.1. Analysis of Forms.

2.1.1. Aids to Interpretation. Form criticism can provide guidelines to interpreting individual peri-copes. This objective is probably the most significant and manageable of the three. The Gospels are not monolithic narratives; each section cannot be treated like every other. Interpretation is genre-bound, that is, there are often distinct hermeneutical rules for distinct literary forms. Recognizing that the emphasis in a pronouncement story is on the pronouncement helps the interpreter to avoid stressing peripheral details. For example, the focus of Mark 3:31-35 is not on Jesus' apparent neglect of his family but on his embracing his followers as part of his family. This approach also reveals how often Jesus' pronouncements focused on the radical newness of the kingdom vis-à-vis the prevailing forms of Judaism* of the day (e.g., Mk 2:23-28).

Recent form criticism of the miracle stories has demonstrated how they usually focus on christology and the kingdom—demonstrating who Jesus was and what was the nature of the new society he envisioned. Thus the cursing of the fig tree (Mk 11:12-14, 20-25) was no petulant outburst, nor even primarily a lesson about faith, but a symbolic demonstration of God's impending judgment* on Israel* (comparable to the cleansing of the Temple around which Mark sandwiches this miracle-story—see w. 15-19; see Temple Cleansing). So too Jesus' walking on the water (Mk 6:45-52) was neither a convenient way to get across the lake nor an arbitrary demonstration of his gravity-defying power but a revelation of himself as the Lord of the wind and waves (cf. Ps 107:23-32) and the very "I am" (Yahweh) of Exodus 3:14 (see "I Am" Sayings).

Parable research has probably benefitted the most from form criticism. Only about half of the passages in the Gospels usually called parables are specifically labeled as such by the Evangelists. Sometimes those which are not so labeled are treated differently. For example, the story of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31) has often been viewed as a true story, or at least as giving an accurate description of the afterlife. In light of the structural parallels between this passage and many which are explicitly labeled parallels, both of these views are doubtful. One dare not derive doctrine from the details of a parable unless it can be corroborated by less metaphorical teachings elsewhere in Scripture.

2.1.2. Keys to Gospel Outlines. Classification of the Gospel pericopes by form also enables one to discern the types of structures and outlines which the four Evangelists used. Sometimes they arrange material in chronological order, sometimes in topical order. In several instances they seem to have grouped a series of like forms together. Thus Mark 2:1—3:6 collects together a group of pronouncement stories; 4:35—6:6a comprises a collection of miracles (as does most of Mt8—9); and Matthew 13:1-52 is made up primarily of parable (as is most of Luke 14—16).

2.1.3. Ambiguities. Many passages, however, do not easily fall into one of the primary form-critical categories. Many seem to mix together several forms. For example, Mark 2:1-12 shares features of both a healing miracle and a pronouncement story. Early form critics usually assumed that mixed forms had undergone more complex development and that their historical kernel was therefore less recoverable. But in the ancient world students of rhetoric (see Rhetorical Criticism) regularly claimed that mixed forms were aesthetically pleasing (e.g., Quintillian Inst. Orat. 8.6.4.9), so it is likely that many such forms appeared right at the start of the Gospel tradition. Other form-critical categories seem to combine form and content. An example-story is largely indistinguishable from a parable in form; so too a myth and a historical narrative. Interpretive presuppositions unrelated to pure literary form seem to have influenced several of the form critics' classifications.

2.2. Use in the Early Church. In principle the attempt to assign a Sitz im Leben to each form is well motivated and potentially helpful. If one can discern how the early church used a certain aspect of the Gospel tradition, one may better understand in what contexts today it may be most useful. Occasionally comparative data permit reasonable inferences; Paul's knowledge of Jesus' "words of institution" (1 Cor 11:23-25) suggests that part or all of the story of the Last Supper* (Lk 22:13-38) may have been read or recited during celebrations of the Eucharist, much as it often is today. But in most cases such reconstructions are highly speculative because they are based on what other ancient cultures did in settings that are not always closely parallel to the rise of Christianity.

2.3. Writing the Tradition-History. This objective has perhaps been the focus of the greatest amount of scholarly energy, but it is also laden with the most pitfalls. Most scholars have recognized some of these pitfalls, but few have appreciated their cumulative effect in casting serious doubt on all hypotheses of the development of the tradition which assume that primitive forms underwent substantial modification prior to their inclusion in the written texts of the Gospels.

2.3.1. Tendencies of the Tradition. Several considerations challenge the widely held notion that stories of what Jesus did and said would have been significantly distorted during the period of oral tradition (see section 1.2.3.).

(1) Probably little more than twenty years elapsed between the events described and the first written accounts (c. A.D. 30-50). Eyewitnesses of Jesus' ministry, including hostile ones, could easily have refuted and discredited Christian claims during this period if those claims had been in any way mistaken.

(2) From the outset Jesus' disciples may well have kept private, written notes along the lines of those kept by other rabbis and disciples (see Schürmann). And the fact that they were sent out to preach about Jesus and his message during his lifetime (Mk 6:7-13; Lk 10:1-16) suggests that they would have begun to preserve the tradition early on.

(3) The so-called law of increasing distinctness is extremely misleading. Detailed analyses of the oral traditions of the cultures closest in time and space to ancient Israel, coupled with a comprehensive comparison of Mark with Matthew and Luke, later apocryphal traditions, sayings in the church fathers and textual variants show that no consistent patterns of lengthening or abbreviation prevail (see Sanders). If anything, a slight tendency toward decreasing distinctness occurs with longer forms such as parables, miracle stories and other historical narratives.

Several additional "tendencies" of the tradition prove equally suspect. The various Gospel pericopes probably did not circulate in as much isolation from one another as has often been assumed. For example, the OT, intertestamental literature and rabbinic material demonstrate that parables and other stories often concluded with aphoristic generalizations. These may well have been pan of Jesus' teaching from the outset rather than free-floating sayings which were attached at a later date. Some of the speeches in the Gospels may be compilations of shorter teachings from discrete settings, but most ancient historians and biographers tended to digest and excerpt longer wholes in writing their speeches and narratives. The same may well have occurred for passages like the Sermon on the Mount* or the Olivet Discourse (see Apocalyptic Teaching; see Wenham).

2.3.2. The Delay of the Parousia. Many of the additions to the Gospel tradition postulated by form critics reflect ongoing concerns for church life and behavior. It is often assumed that the earliest kerygma ("proclamation") had no interest in ethical mandates, establishment of church order or teachings about an extended interval between Christ's first and second comings. Form critics usually so stress Jesus' teaching about his imminent return that any details which point to the delay of the Parousia are assumed to be secondary additions to the tradition.

But it is not at all clear that Jesus' teaching was so one-sided or that the early church would have had to modify the tradition in any substantial way as it became increasingly apparent that Christ was not returning as quickly as some might have hoped. After all, the Jews had heard for centuries during the prophetic era that "the Day of the Lord" was "at hand" (e.g., Joel 2:1; Obad 15; Hab 2:3), and yet they had come to grips with the fact that "soon" in God's timing often does not correspond to human expectation. Psalm 90:4 became an influential text both in rabbinic Judaism (cf. 2 Apoc. Bar. 48:12-13; Pirqe R. El. 28) and in early Christianity (2 Pet 3:8-9; see Bauckham).

2.3.3. Early Christian Prophecy. The view that the early church failed to distinguish sayings of early Christian prophets from teachings of the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus; see Boring) must almost certainly be laid to rest (Aune). The evidence on which this hypothesis was originally based was meager enough; more careful, recent studies have shown that it is virtually non-existent.

The closest parallels come from the practices of certain Greco-Roman prophets speaking in the name of mythological gods, especially at oracles or temples of healing. The only NT example which records words of the ascended Lord* spoken directly to his people appears in a context (Rev 2:1-3:22) where he is clearly distinguished from the earthly Jesus. The only examples in the NT of the words of Christian prophets (Acts 11:28; 21:10-11) clearly attribute the Lord's message to a human speaker—Agabus. And in 1 Corinthians 14:29 Paul makes it clear that no prophecy could be accepted that did not conform to the previously revealed Word of God, so even if some sayings crept into the tradition from certain prophets, they would not likely have distorted the original gospel message as is often alleged. The lack of sayings attributed to Jesus on topics of later church controversy (e.g., circumcision or speaking in tongues) further supports the view that Christian prophecy was not confused with the teachings of the historical Jesus.

3. Alternatives.

The lasting legacy of form criticism has been its concern for studying the period of the oral transmission of the Gospel tradition, even if many of its conclusions about that period should be rejected. But two recent schools of thought have proposed alternative models of oral transmission that prove more promising. Each maintains that the early church would have preserved the various units of tradition more carefully than classic form criticism granted. A third approach abandons virtually all attempts to analyze the oral tradition.

3.1. The Guarded Tradition Hypothesis. In the late 1950s and early 1960s two Swedish scholars, H. Riesenfeld and B. Gerhardsson, proposed that Jesus had his disciples memorize his most significant teachings and even certain narratives about what he did. Other ancient Jewish rabbis followed these practices, and memories were cultivated so as to produce prodigious feats of recall—such as memorizing the entire Hebrew Bible. The twelve disciples were viewed as an authoritative circle of leadership which carefully safeguarded the traditions. Paul seems to point to the existence of such a guarded tradition when he speaks of passing on what had been delivered to him (e.g., 1 Cor 11:23; 15:3).

Reaction to this approach was at first largely negative. Other scholars pointed out that Jesus was not simply an ordinary rabbi, that the rabbinic evidence was from later than the first century, that there was scant evidence in the Gospels themselves of any concern to preserve Jesus' teaching and that the numerous differences among Gospel parallels precluded any significant amount of memorization. More recently, however, R. Riesner has advanced the discussion further. In a wide-ranging study of educational practices common to first-century Israel and its neighbors, he concludes that at least six additional arguments support the view that Jesus' followers would have carefully preserved accurate information about him without necessarily memorizing it word-for-word:

1. Jesus' words were received as being on a par with those of the prophets, which are among the portions of the OT usually held to be the most historically reliable. (2) Expectations about the Messiah included seeing him as a teacher of wisdom,* whose words should be safeguarded. (3) Over ninety per cent of Jesus' sayings are couched in quasi-poetic form which would have been easy to remember. (4) Like other rabbis, Jesus seems to have encouraged the practice of memorization before meditation or application (e.g., Mk 9:10; 13:28; Lk 11:1). (5) Mandator elementary education for boys until about the age of twelve (such as Jesus' disciples would have received) almost exclusively involved rote memorization. (6) Almost all teachers in both Greco-Roman and Jewish circles gathered disciples around them to perpetuate their teachings and lifestyle, so however different Jesus was from the rabbis in other ways, he probably resembled them in this respect (see Teacher).

3.2. Flexible Transmission within Fixed Limits. A second alternative to classic form criticism offers a less conservative paradigm for the transmission of the tradition than the memorization hypothesis. Recent studies of oral folklore and sacred history in pre-literate cultures, especially by the anthropologist A Lord, have shown that epic stories of up to 100,000 words in length were often memorized by specially designated storytellers or folk singers. The plot, characters, main events and a sizable number of the details remained constant every time the stories were retold or sung. Members of the community were sufficiently familiar with them to correct the singer if he erred in any crucial way. Yet anywhere from ten to forty percent of the precise wording could vary from one performance to the next, quite like the variation found in the Synoptic Gospels. Lord has suggested that much of these Gospel narratives may reflect the product of a succession of oral performances of the stories they recount. Studies of the Jewish targums* (Aramaic paraphrases of OT texts with explanatory elaborations) from the first centuries of the Common Era suggest that something similar to what Lord has envisioned was practiced in Jewish circles. As a result a growing number of Gospel specialists are adopting more and more of the methods of this newest alternative to form criticism.

W. Kelber has applied Lord's studies to the Gospels and has emphasized the disjunction between orality and literacy. Before traditions are written down in a fixed form, there is no single identifiable, canonical form of any tradition. Each oral performance is somewhat different and not necessarily any further from or closer to the words of the original speaker. It is therefore impossible to recover the earliest form of a Gospel pericope; at best one can speak of an "originating structure." Kelber also pits the written Gospels against the earlier, unwritten forms as the product of a segment of the Christian community which was challenging the authority of the apostles as the guardians of the oral tradition. He sees the textuality of the Gospels as creating a more rigid, fixed way of telling the story of Jesus than was permitted by oral tradition. Although traces of orality still appear in the Gospels, especially Mark, the value of classic form criticism is greatly diminished for this approach.

Yet it appears that in several respects this line of interpretation has relied on too one-sided an appropriation of cultural anthropology. Other studies show that the disjunction between orality and literacy need not be as marked or that cultures may prefer written or unwritten forms for various ideological reasons unrelated to accuracy of preservation. What is more, oral traditions continued to circulate alongside the written texts until at least the mid-second century and were sometimes even preferred by early Christians as more trustworthy. And a more careful investigation of the written traditions of the Gospels (especially variants among manuscripts, canonical parallels and second-century quotations of the Gospels) shows that Kelber has also exaggerated the rigidity of textuality. Study of the oral pre-history of the Gospel traditions therefore remains a crucial prelude to understanding their canonical forms.

3.3. Rhetorical Analysis. K. Berger has recently compiled the most comprehensive treatment of Gospel forms since Bultmann (and goes beyond him by analyzing texts found in all parts of the NT). Unlike most of his predecessors, Berger limits himself almost entirely to classifying forms and identifying their function, believing the reconstruction of any oral prehistory to be beyond the reach of modern scholars, given the limited data available to them. Against W. Schmithals he agrees that there often was a period of oral transmission, and with many conservatives he believes that many traditions were reasonably well preserved. But he affirms that it is usually not possible to move from what is probably true about a group of texts in general to what is likely for any individual passage or form. Berger therefore rejects the comparative-religions approach which seeks analogies in other oral traditions of antiquity. Instead, he focuses exclusively on parallel forms and genres in written texts from the ancient Jewish and Greco-Roman worlds.

Berger's volume falls into four sections. The last three follow, in turn, the three categories of rhetoric most commonly discussed by ancient philosophers: deliberative (or exhortational), epideictic (laudatory or condemnatory) and juridical (or apologetic). The first main section discusses forms which could function in more than one of these three kinds of rhetoric. They include analogical and metaphorical texts, simple statements, speeches, chreia and apophthegms and argumentation.

Under deliberative genres Berger deals with virtue and vice lists, community rules, paraenesis (exhortation), domestic codes, beatitudes, warnings, proverbs and related forms.

As examples of epideictic rhetoric he considers various kinds of lists and catalogs meant to praise or blame, acclamations and doxologies, narrative commentary, reports of martyrdom, symbolic actions, travel narratives, summary statements, miracle stories, hymns and prayers, proclamations, apocalyptic, etiologies, liturgy, encomium, dialog and so on.

As examples of judicial rhetoric Berger examines sayings on holiness or impurity, verdicts and criticisms, eyewitness reports, accusations and apologies.

Berger's use of the ancient threefold division of rhetoric has been widely adopted in recent NT genre criticism, especially of the epistles. Its value for assessing the function of a written text as a whole is undisputed. Its application in analyzing subgenres or forms which are the products of oral tradition (as particularly found in the Gospels) is less clear. Significantly, Berger's first section, which studies forms used in more than one kind of rhetoric, focuses much more on the Gospels than do his other three sections. Here his discussions read much like a summary of the state of the art of more traditional form criticism. Nor is it obvious that the study of the pre-history of Gospel forms should be so totally abandoned. Granted that one must proceed with great caution in an area this susceptible to speculation, the recent alternatives to classic form criticism discussed above suggest that progress can be made in the study of the oral transmission of the Gospel traditions. How this is accomplished for individual passages or forms comprises the next topic of discussion.

For many form critics their most significant task has been to assess the authenticity of the discrete units of Gospel tradition. For some, more authority attaches to those portions which reflect Jesus' ipsissima verba (very own words) or ipsissima vox (very own voice) than to less carefully preserved forms. For others, historical reliability and theological value are entirely separate issues. Either way, numerous criteria have been developed to help form critics sift the more authentic from the less authentic.

4.1. The Individual Criteria. Four principal criteria have been almost universally accepted. (1) The criterion of dissimilarity states that any teaching or action of Jesus which distinguishes him both from the Judaism of his day and from the early Christian church may be accepted as authentic. (2) The criterion of multiple attestation places more confidence in those details which are found in more than one Gospel source (e.g., Mk, Q,* M,* L,* Jn) or in more than one form. (3) The criterion of Palestinian environment or language more readily accepts that which is very Semitic in style or background. (4) The criterion of coherence includes texts which fit well with material already authenticated by one of the other three criteria.

4.2. Critique. A distinction must be made between the positive and negative use of these criteria. Most form critics have assumed that material which could not be authenticated by one of these means must therefore be inauthentic. But this does not follow. The dissimilarity criterion can demonstrate only what is distinctive about Jesus; what he shared with his contemporaries will by definition fail the test. Multiple attestation does increase the confidence one can place in a tradition, but singly attested material may prove equally genuine. The intermingling of Semitic and Hellenistic (see Hellenism) cultures in the first century makes the third criterion very difficult to apply; it is hard to maintain that a Semitic form or style could not have been created in early Christianity or that Jesus could not have utilized Greco-Roman concepts and forms of speech (see Languages of Palestine). Coherence is a very subjective concept. Presumably all of the Gospel material cohered in the minds of the Evangelists; how is any modern scholar to say that apparent inconsistencies are sharp enough to call into question the truthfulness of the accounts?

Beyond these specific criticisms, a major presupposition behind the use of the criteria of authenticity must be called into question. The entire undertaking is usually predicated on the assumption that the Gospel traditions are inherently suspect unless good reasons can be advanced for accepting them. Actually, there are excellent reasons for believing large segments of the Gospels to be historically reliable (totally apart from any presuppositions about the inspiration of Scripture), so that a more positive approach must be adopted (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). The burden of proof must rest with the skeptic who would doubt any portion of the Gospels (see Goetz and Blomberg). Instead of utilizing criteria of authenticity, one ought to assume authenticity and then ask if there are good reasons for denying it (e.g., irreconcilably contradictory accounts). Problems should then be examined one by one and judgments rendered.

4.3. Application. Nevertheless, even for those who adopt a stance of methodical doubt, the criteria may be used to authenticate many key themes and aspects of the Gospel tradition (though it is usually not recognized to what extent this is true). Jesus’ parables are widely held to be authentic; almost no early Christians used the form, while rabbinic parallels almost entirely elucidated Scripture rather than revealing the in-breaking kingdom of God. Key teachings about the kingdom, especially those in which Jesus makes plain that it has arrived (e.g., Mt 12:28) or those which balance present and future hope (e.g., Mk 8:34-38) are similarly distinctive. Other items which pass the dissimilarity test include Jesus’ compassion for the outcasts of society, his frequent conflicts with the Jewish authorities over the interpretation of the Law,* especially the Sabbath* regulations, and his stringent demands for discipleship* (e.g., Mt 8:21-22; Lk 14:26; Mk 10:21).

Another major section of Gospel pericopes includes Jesus’ teachings about the Son of man.* This term was rarely used in Judaism and never appears on the lips of any other NT speaker except Stephen (Acts 7:56). Although it is widely debated, the background for the title is most likely Daniel 7:13, and it probably should be taken as messianic. But it was ambiguous enough that Jesus could invest it with his own meaning and not risk the nationalistic misinterpretations of his role that more widely used titles like Messiah might have invoked. Jesus’ intimate relationship with his Father is another feature of the Gospels widely accepted as authentic. But by the criterion of coherence it is only a small step from this to the use of the title Son of God* as equally authentic (texts like Mt 11:27 may form the bridge).

Illustrations could be multiplied. The significance of most of Jesus’ miracles closely ties in with his authentic kingdom teachings. Jesus’ predictions about establishing his church* (Mt 16:18; 18:17), widely believed to be inauthentic, in fact can be authenticated by a criterion of "necessary explanation." Some kind of promises of this nature must have formed the foundation for Peter's remarkable recovery from his denial to his leadership of the church at Pentecost R Latourelle has maintained that the application of the various criteria can eventually lead to the authentication of Jesus’ baptism,* temptation,* Transfiguration,* call to repentance,* Beatitudes, passion,* crucifixion and resurrection,* commissioning of the apostles* and numerous other details in addition to all of those already mentioned. R. Gruenler has shown that even if one accepts only a handful of Jesus' sayings as authentic (as in the largely skeptical studies of N. Perrin), the uniquely authoritative and self-referential claims implied enable one by the criterion of coherence to validate large numbers of more explicitly christological texts.

See also Gospels (Historical Reliability); Literary Criticism; Redaction Criticism; Synoptic Problem; Rhetorical Criticism; Tradition Criticism

C. L Blomberg

FOURTH PHILOSOPHY. See Revolutionary Movements.
FREEDOM

The Gospels contain few explicit references to freedom. Eleutheria (freedom) does not appear in the Gospels, eleutheros ("free") appears only three times (Mt 17:26; Jn 8:33, 36) and eleutheroō ("set free") appears only twice (Jn 8:32, 36). Thus, most of what the Gospels say about freedom must be inferred from the appearance of the subject in other terms.

Freedom in the Gospels does not refer to the kinds of political and social freedom which so readily occur to modern minds: the freedom of personal self-actualization, the human right to liberty or freedom from social oppression of whatever type. The interest of the Gospel writers lies elsewhere: in the religious and moral freedom Jesus offers to those who follow him. Whether this freedom also results in social or political freedom is an issue debated today but only indirectly addressed in the Gospels. They reflect a highly stratified society which perceived goods as limited (see Poverty and Riches). Increasing one's own goods meant necessarily decreasing the goods of another, something considered dishonorable. It was honorable simply to maintain what one had been given (see Malina). Still, Jesus' own freedom and teachings have profound implications for the freedom of his followers.

To whatever extent the Gospel writers may have been influenced by other ways of thinking about freedom, the freedom they describe is neither the political freedom of individuals or states which was of primary interest to the Greeks, nor the inner philosophical freedom of the Stoics who abandoned themselves to circumstances, nor the freedom which the devout Jew found through observance of the Law, nor the freedom of separation from the material world found in much of gnostic thought.

1. The Freedom of Jesus.

The Gospels simply assume, but do not discuss, the freedom of God. They speak more clearly about the freedom of Jesus which may be suggestively characterized as follows:

Jesus is independent of all parties and groups in Judaism* in his day and free with regard to Jewish traditions (e.g., Sabbath* observance) and many social and religious conventions (e.g., relationships with lepers,* a Samaritan,* women* and sinners*). In other words, Jesus is free to associate with any and all who heed his message, just as God loves* both sinner and saint. "This is why Jesus is the paradigm of freedom from the ideological use of 'God' to sanction either the status quo or efforts to remodel it on the basis of our grievances" (Keck, 79).

Jesus is free to reinterpret the Law* of Moses, as illustrated in his familiar words "But I say to you" (see Commandment). He enjoys the freedom of authority given him by the Father, such as his authority to judge others and to have life* in himself to give to whom he wills (Jn 5:21-29). Thus he is free to lay down his life or to take it again (Jn 10:17-18).

Jesus' freedom, however, does not mean independence. He is sent by the Father and only does what the Father wills (Jn 6:38). His freedom is based on the oneness with the Father established by the Father's loving gift (Jn 17). In turn, Jesus' freedom is a model for the freedom of his followers who gain their freedom through their relationship to him (Jn 8:36).

According to the Gospels humans are both free and not free. The call to repentance and discipleship implies the freedom to respond. Moreover, John's Gospel suggests that persons choose to come, or not to come, to the light* (3:20-21; cf. 5:40). On the other hand, humans are in bondage to sin (cf. Jn 8:34; Lk 4:18) and death else they would not need the gift of life. Often this bondage is characterized in other ways, such as blindness* (Jn 9) and physical affliction (Lk 13:10-12).

2.1. The Synoptics. From the Synoptics we may draw several general observations regarding the freedom of Jesus' disciples.

Although freedom was not a topic in Jesus' teaching, he "articulated (by word and deed) the impingement of God's kingdom in such a way that what occurred can be called liberation" (Keck, 77-78). In John's Gospel a similar articulation occurs in terms of (eternal) life, light and troth* (cf. Jn 8:31-32). In the Synoptics liberation is dramatically realized and illustrated in Jesus' exorcism of demons* and his healings.* These events demonstrate that this freedom is not divisible between body and spirit.

The Gospels' understanding of liberation was shaped by apocalyptic* and implies several things (Keck, 80): (1) freedom is not the result of one's own efforts, but is an event of God's grace; (2) liberation does not happen without a struggle; (3) in the present age no one is wholly free; (4) freedom in the present is proleptic and finite; and (5) grounding freedom in the dialectic of "already" and the "not yet" emancipates us from idolatrous expectations of the relative freedoms which can be won through human struggle (see Eschatology).

As R. Pesch has observed, "Jesus urged freedom on his listeners in provocative words" (Pesch, 58). This is exemplified in Jesus words: "Whoever would save one's life will lose it" (Mk 8:35); "Do not be anxious about your life, what you shall eat..." (Lk 12:22-23); "Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you ..." (Lk 6:27-28).

Freedom is also the subject of many of Jesus' parables* (Pesch, 59). The parable of the soils demonstrates a relaxed attitude in the face of clear failure (Mk 4:3-8). The parables of seed growing mysteriously of its own accord (Mk 4:26-29) or of a barely visible mustard seed growing into a huge shrub (Mk 4:30-32) show an unworried confidence in the power of the kingdom of God. These are expressions of the freedom of the reign of God (see Kingdom of God).

2.2. John's Gospel. John's Gospel (especially 8:31-36) throws a distinctive light on the freedom Jesus offers. For John real freedom comes through knowing the truth, that is, Jesus, the revelation of God (8:31-32, 36). It can be expressed in other symbols and metaphors, such as light which dispels darkness or blindness (Jn 9) and life which frees from death (Jn 11). A gift from Jesus, freedom depends on a continuing relationship with him (8:31). "The disciple will never be free from him without at the same time losing all freedom" (Käsemann, 145).

As with all expressions of salvation* found in the Fourth Gospel, here too the emphasis is on the present experience of freedom. This freedom is rejected by those who (falsely) think they are free already but who are really slaves of sin (8:33-35). Yet the freedom Jesus offers is freedom from sin and death (11:26; 5:24). In turn, Jesus' gift of freedom creates communities of "friends" (philoi, in contrast to douloi, "slaves") of Jesus (15:14-15).

This freedom is not independence from God or Jesus or others who are free. Freedom is only for those who remain in Jesus' word (8:31) and keep his commandments which he has from the Father (15:14), that is, those who love one another (15:12-17). As Keck observes, "... the real measure of the freedom which Jesus confers is the capacity to love, for the degree to which one loves another is the degree to which one is freed from self-protection and self-aggrandizement" (82). It is the Holy Spirit,* who guides them into all truth, that is instrumental in securing the freedom of believers (16:12-15).

See also Liberation Hermeneutics; Life; Light; Salvation.

G. F. Shirbroun

FRUIT OF THE VINE. See VINE. FRUIT OF THE VINE.

FULFILLMENT. See Law. Old Testament in the Gospels. Typology
GALILEE

1. History and Geography
2. Society and Religion
3. Jesus and Galilee

1. History and Geography.

Originally, the Hebrew name haggālîl probably denoted the region around Kadesh northwest of Lake Hula (Josh 21:32; 1 Chron 6:61). Later it referred to the entire region belonging to the tribe of Naphtali, including the eastern portion of Asher and the northern portion of Zebulun and Issachar. The demise of the Northern Kingdom, Israel (722/721 B.C.), brought destruction to the Jewish population and the immigration of pagan foreigners (2 Kings 17:6; Tob 1:2); thus the name "region of the Gentiles" (gālîl haggōyīm) came into use (Is 8:23). During the Macca-bean Revolt many of the remaining Jews were evacuated (1 Macc 5:23). The Hasmonean king Aris-tobulus I conquered Galilee (by now it bore the Greek name Galilaia) in 104/103 B.C., bringing it once more under Jewish domination. He forced the Gentile population to convert to Judaism* (Josephus Ant. 13.11.3 §§318-19). Under Herod the Great (40-4 B.C.) and his son Herod Antipas, who ruled until A.D. 39, Galilee enjoyed prosperous times (see Herodian Dynasty). After the short reign of Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 41-44) it came under direct Roman rule (see Rome). The failure of the procurators led to the growth of the Zealots, a nationalistic, revolutionary movement (see Revolutionary Movements). Finally, the Jewish War broke out (A.D. 66), which was over in Galilee by AD. 68. Not until after the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70; see Destruction of Jerusalem) did Galilee (Tiberias) become the center of rabbinic learning (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings).

At the time of Jesus the borders of Galilee ran as follows (Josephus J.W. 3.3.1 §§35-39): the southern boundary was the north edge of the Plain of Esdraelon. The eastern boundary was the Jordan River from as far north as Lake Hula.
southward through the Sea of Galilee. The northern boundary was Gischala (probably the place of origin of Paul's parents; see Jerome Vir. III.5). The western boundary was Cabul. These borders bounded a territory about forty kilometers in diameter. Any location could be reached in no more than two days' journey. Geographically, Galilee may be divided into three different areas. Lower Galilee in the south consists of a hilly region with occasional plains. Upper Galilee in the north rises to an elevation of 1200 meters; in NT times it was heavily forested and partially impassable. The Jordan Valley and the Sea of Galilee lie c. 200 meters below sea level. Fertile soil, relatively abundant precipitation and a mild climate furnish good conditions for agriculture.

2. Society and Religion.

In Jesus' time Galilee was an intensively worked export area for wheat and olives, but also for wine. The fishing activity on the Sea of Galilee and the dried fish industry in the town of Magdala were of special significance (Josephus J.W. 2.21.4-5 §§608-10; 3.9.7 §§443-45). According to Josephus,* therefore, Galilee was a rich and heavily populated land (J. W. 3.3.2 §§42-43; Vit. 63 §325). The population may be placed at between two and three hundred thousand. Wealth was, however, very unevenly distributed. To be sure, alongside the rich upper class there was a somewhat-larger middle class than was common in ancient times. But the majority of the population was lower-class (tenant farmers, day laborers). In addition to religiously grounded rejection of the Roman ruling class, social need kindled a mood finding expression in revolutionary activity, especially from the second half of the A.D. 40s onward. The inflexibility and fearlessness of the Galileans was proverbial (Josephus J.W. 3.3.2 §41).

In NT times Jews comprised the vast majority of the Galilean population. The view that the area was at that time half-pagan is a modern scientific myth. Josephus refers repeatedly to the piety of the Galileans and their loyalty to the Torah (Malinowski). NT references to the large numbers of synagogues in Galilee confirm this (Mt 4:23; 9:35; Mk 1:39; Lk 4:14-15). These references are supported by archeological findings (GBL III.1507-12). Nevertheless, in addition to the native Aramaic there was very widespread knowledge of Greek; this is already evident from names like Andrew and Philip among Jesus' disciples* (see Languages of Palestine). Inhabitants of Jerusalem regarded Galilee as a backward locale (cf. Acts 2:7), peculiar first of all because of its dialect (Mt 26:73), in which laryngeal sounds were swallowed. Pharisaism (see Pharisee) attracted its adherents mostly from the middle class of the larger Galilean towns. As conservative country folk, however, most Galileans prior to A.D. 70 had reservations about the innovations of the pharisaical Halakah. Occasional disparaging remarks from rabbis indicate that the dislike was mutual (y. šabb 15d).

3. Jesus and Galilee.

Prior to his public ministry Jesus lived in Nazareth, located in Lower Galilee (Mt 2:22-23; 4:12-13; 13:54; Mk 6:1; Lk 4:16). He devoted the first portion of his activity to Galilee (Mt 4:23; Mk 1:14, 39; Lk 4:15-16), especially to the areas of Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum on the northwest bank of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 11:21-24; Lk 10:13-15). Matthew was probably not the first to see in this the fulfillment of the OT prophecy of Isaiah 8:23—9:1 (Mt 4:12-17; Jesus himself performed by this kind of geographical concentration a kind of sign as a covert reference to his messianic claim; see Old Testament in the Gospels). Some Jewish circles expected the inbreaking of the end times to take place in the northern reaches of the promised land (Riesner TynB, 1987). Even if John's Gospel is reliable in reporting Jesus' pilgrimages to Jerusalem, the schematic outline of the Synoptics (first Galilee, then Jerusalem) is justified in locating Jesus' original emphasis in Galilee. Jesus' parables* also testify to an intensive Galilean ministry, for they generally reflect the specific conditions of rural Galilee, as J. Jeremias's work on the parables has effectively demonstrated. Since immediately after the first Easter early Christianity spread primarily into Hellenized cities, this is a remarkable indicator of the reliability of the Synoptic tradition.

After a time of preaching the gospel, Jesus had to recognize that a thoroughgoing conversion of the Galileans was not taking place. He therefore pronounced divine judgment on the chief centers of his Galilean ministry (Mt 11:21-24 par ). The logion found in Luke 13:1-3 belongs here too; it cannot serve as proof that Galilean was another term for Zealot in NT times. After this so-called Galilean crisis, and also due to the growing danger posed by the petty king Herod Antipas (Mt 14:13; cf. Lk 13:31-33), Jesus withdrew with his most loyal disciples into regions outside Galilee's borders. These included the "hills of Tyre" (Mk 7:24) and the Decapolis (Mk 7:31), or Gaulanitis (Mk 8:27). This withdrawal results in tensions which reflect a situation that can be traced back to Hasmonean times and the relations between Galileans and the Gentiles of surrounding areas (Mk 7:24-30; cf. Mk 5:1-20). This is a clear indication that authentic local color is in evidence (Theissen). Both Matthew (Mt 28:16-20) and John (Jn 21) know of appearances of the resurrected (see Resurrection) Jesus in Galilee, and Mark must presuppose the same (Mk 14:28; 16:7). So Jewish-Christian churches may have formed in Galilee immediately after the first Easter (Acts 9:31; cf Str-B 1.159-60).

See also Archeology and Geography.

R Riesner

GEHENNA. See Heaven and Hell.

GENEALOGY

A genealogy is the record of a person's ancestral descent. While the word itself is not found in the Gospels (cf. 1 Tim 1:4; Tit 3:9; Heb 7:6), the only extended examples of genealogies in the NT are in Matthew and Luke and trace the ancestry of Jesus.
As Matthew's and Luke's infancy narratives differ from each other, so do their genealogies: each has a different structure, (somewhat) different contents and different purposes, and each is located in a different place in their respective Gospels.

1. Matthew's Genealogy (Mt 1:1-17)
3. A Comparison of the Genealogies

1. Matthew's Genealogy (Mt 1:1-17).

    1.1. Structure and Placement. Matthew begins his Gospel with a genealogy of Jesus. The title of the genealogy in Matthew 1:1 (which some have argued to be the title of the whole Gospel) hints at its overall structure, naming "Jesus Christ, son of David, son of Abraham." The Greek bibbs geneseōs (cf. Gen 2:4; 5:1 LXX) is literally "book of genesis" or "birth record." Matthew uses the same word (genesis) in Matthew 1:18, seeming to indicate that 1:18-25 is a closer look at the last portion of the genealogy. Similar to many OT genealogies, the cognate verb gennaō ("to beget", "to be the father of") occurs throughout the list. Matthew also uses the related noun genea ("generation") in his unique summary statement (Mt 1:17). This summary statement forming a bracket (inclusio) with the genealogy's "title" (Mt 1:1), recaps its structure, naming Abraham,* David (see Son of David) and Christ.*

    1.1.1. Three Fourteens. The most notable structural characteristic is pointed out by Matthew himself in 1:17: the names in the list are gathered into three groups of fourteen, with significant historical events placed at their junctures. Some have explained this structure as a mnemonic device, based on the number fourteen since it represents the numeric value of David's name in Hebrew (d = 4, v = 6, d = 4). Others see only Matthew's desire to make the list symmetrical with the fourteen names from Abraham to David. Some further explain the symmetry as having apocalyptic* significance: history is in order and the time of the Messiah has come.

    Matthew's desire for symmetry is seen clearly by the fact that he has omitted the names of four Davidic kings from his second grouping: between Joram and Uzziah (Azariah) in Matthew 1:8 come Ahaziah, Jeho-ash (alias Joash) and Amaziah (1 Chron 3:11-12; 2 Kings 8:16—15:7), and between Josiah and Jeconiah (alias Jehoiachin) in Matthew 1:11 comes Eliakim (alias Jehoiakim, 1 Chron 3:15-16). It was not at all uncommon to drop names from a genealogical table (cf. e.g., Ezra 7:1-5; 1 Chron 6:3-15). The term son may refer to a grandson or a descendant even further removed (e.g., Mt 1:1), and the all of Matthew 1:17 is simply a reference to all of the names Matthew mentions, not a statement that his list is all-inclusive. For Matthew's omission of four Davidic kings to be the result of error seems unlikely. Perhaps the best explanation for these selective omissions is that they were all cursed (note the curse of Ahab's family [1 Kings 21:21] extended to the house of Joram to the third or fourth generation [Ex 20:5 et al; cf. 2 Chron 22:7-9; 24:22-24; 25:14-28]; the curse of Jehoiakim (Jer 36:30]; Jeconiah (alias Coniah) was also recipient of such a curse [Jer 22:28-30] but may be included since he appears at a key point in history).

A close counting of Matthew's three groups, however, reveals the third to contain only thirteen sons (including Jesus), an apparent contradiction with Matthew 1:17. Some suggest that Jehoiakim, the omitted father of Jeconiah, is to be assumed; but such an assumption has no basis and, if accepted, would simply make the second group number fifteen, since Matthew is quite clear that Jeconiah—"at the Babylonian deportation"—is the dividing point between groups two and three (Mt 1:11-12). Some suggest placing Jeconiah first in group three and counting David twice—as fourteenth in group one and first in group two—since he is mentioned twice in Matthew 1:6. But if David is to be so counted, there is no reason not to double-count Jeconiah who is also mentioned twice (Mt 1:11-12). This would again result in fifteen sons in the second group.

Perhaps the solution lies in Matthew's departure from the normal "begat" formula at 1:16. There he uses the passive (egennēthē) rather than the active form of the verb with reference to Mary (ex his, "by whom"). Jesus is born of Mary (see Birth of Jesus) and, thus, Mary should be counted as one of the (now) fourteen names in group three. Mary is only one of five women in Matthew's genealogy; why should she alone be counted as a separate "generation"? Simply put the other women shared with their husbands in the procreation of descendants and Matthew counts them and their husbands each as one generation. In the case of Mary and Joseph, however, Joseph clearly had no part in the biological procreation of Jesus; only Mary did. While Joseph is mentioned only as Mary's husband (cf. discussion of textual variants in commentaries), he is still counted since he did indeed serve as Jesus' earthly father. To the objection that Mary and Joseph were really of the same generation comes the simple response that, by his obvious omissions elsewhere, we know Matthew is not concerned with counting all the actual generations.

1.1.2. Other Details. Not only does Matthew omit names in the structuring of his genealogy, he also makes some unusual additions. Specifically, he mentions a brother, Zerah, two other sets of brothers and five women. Along with Judah, the phrase "and his brothers" occurs in Matthew 1:2, perhaps because it was customary to speak of all twelve patriarchs together or because descendants from all twelve tribes were Israelites and would have an equal interest in the Messiah. Zerah may be mentioned because he and Perez were twins and their birth story testifies of God's* reordering of the usual selection of heirs (Gen 38:27-30). Matthew 1:11 uses "and his brothers" again, this time with Jeconiah, perhaps to signal the end of the monarchy and its father-to-son succession of kings.

1.2. Purpose. Recent studies indicate that only rarely do ancient Semitic genealogies intend to preserve strict biological ancestry; rather, genealogies can serve a number of purposes (even simultaneously), such as: to show identity and duty, to demonstrate credentials for power and property, to structure history and to indicate one's character. The value of genealogies in the post-exilic Israelite society is illustrated in Ezra 2:62; 8:1 and Nehemiah 7:5. The omission of certain names in a list does not necessarily make the genealogy inaccurate nor deter it from accomplishing its purpose. Matthew's genealogy structures (Israelite) history in a memorable fashion and rehearses royal Davidic lineage leading up to the birth of Jesus. Beginning his account of Jesus' life with a genealogy is similar to the OT accounts of Noah and Abraham, which are both prefaced with genealogies (Gen 5:1-32 and 11:10-32, respectively).

1.2.1. "Son of David". Matthew's Gospel proclaims Jesus as king and from the beginning sets out to show that Jesus is heir to David's throne. Matthew seems preoccupied with David, mentioning him five times in 1:1-17 (seventeen times total in Matthew; note the titular use of "Son of David" in Mt 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30-31; 21:9, 15; cf. 22:42). Furthermore, Matthew adds the descriptive phrase "the king" only to David's name in 1:6, even though every name in the second group served in that capacity. The three parts of Matthew's genealogy can be viewed in terms of the house of David: the first group being its origin and rise to power, the second group being its decay and downfall, the third group being its quiet restoration by the promised "Son of David." The "king" theme is obvious in Matthew's infancy narrative in 2:1-12 (see Nolan).
Jesus was the fulfillment of the messianic expectation of Israel, and Matthew's genealogy presents his ancestral credentials. Indeed, in reporting the genealogy of "Jesus Christ" Matthew makes the title "Messiah" (Greek: christos; see Christ) part of Jesus' name (Mt 1:1).

1.2.2. Why the Five Women? Another unique feature of Matthew's genealogy is his inclusion of five women*: Tamar (Mt 1:3), Rahab (Mt 1:5), Ruth (Mt 1:5), [Bathsheba] the wife of Uriah (Mt 1:6) and Mary (Mt 1:16). The presence of women's names is taken by some as evidence that Matthew constructed the genealogy rather than reproduce it wholesale from his (OT and/or public) sources. Although not common, the appearance of women in genealogical tables was not unknown (e.g., Gen 22:20-24; 25:1-6; 36:1-14; 1 Chron 2:3-4,18-20,46-47; 3:1-9). It appears, however, that the women in Matthew's record do something more than specify clans or tribes by distinguishing children of wives from those of concubines. Several theories have developed for the purpose of the women in Matthew's genealogy. Mary's place in Matthew's list has been discussed above, and it seems likely that the other four women are to be taken as somehow foreshadowing Mary's unique role.

Jerome proposed that the four OT women were mentioned because they were regarded as terrible sinners so as to presage Jesus' role as savior. Such proposals are unlikely, however, for while Tamar was a seductress, Rahab a prostitute,* and Uriah's wife an adulteress, it is not at all convincing that Ruth was promiscuous. Ironically, rabbinic references to these women are often complimentary. Furthermore, Mary, the fifth woman in the list does not fit into the same category (cf. Lk 1:28-30).

Luther held that Matthew included the four OT women because they were foreigners so as to show that Jesus, the Jewish Messiah, had ties to Gentiles as well. Tamar was an Aramean (Jub. 41:1), Rahab was a Canaanite (Josh 2:1-14), Ruth was a Moabite (Ruth 1:4) and Bathsheba—not directly called a foreigner (and perhaps for this reason not directly named)— was "the wife of Uriah" who was a Hittite (2 Sam 11:3). While somewhat promising—and perhaps a partial motive for Matthew—this theory seems insufficient, again because it does not include Mary, who was not a foreigner. Furthermore, it appears that early Judaism may well have accepted the four OT women as honored proselytes (Rahab and Ruth, Sipre Num 78; Rahab, y her. 2.7, b. Meg. 14b, b. Zebah. 116b; Tamar, b. Meg. 10b, b. Sofa 10a, cf. Gen. Rab. 85.11-12, b 'Abod. Zar. 36b; Bathsheba, cf. b. Sanh. 107a; but see Ruth Rab. 8.1).
R E. Brown recently put forth a plausible two-part explanation for the women in Matthew's genealogy. Each had something odd or extraordinary—even scandalous—about her union with her male partner, and each played an important role in God's plan (some by their own initiative and often at great personal risk). Tamar took scandalous initiative in playing a harlot with Judah, and yet God chose the offspring of that union to bring about the line of David. Rahab, although a harlot, played an important role in the conquest of the promised land (Josh 2:1-21; Heb 11:31; Jas 2:25). Ruth, a forbidden Moabite (Deut 23:3), was married to Boaz at her risky initiative (to Boaz's surprise), and their marriage eventuated the Davidic line (Ruth 3:6-14; 4:13-17). Uriah's wife (Bathsheba) had an adulterous affair with King David and yet, using her initiative, God saw to it that her son, Solomon, became heir to the throne (1 Kings 1:11-31). Even post-biblical Judaism saw the work of the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) in these unusual unions. Divine intervention was certainly part of other marriages represented in Matthew's genealogy (e.g., overcoming the barrenness of Sarah, Rebekah and Rachel), but since those unions were relatively without scandal, they are not mentioned. The four OT women Matthew does mention are those who best foreshadow Mary's role as an "unwed mother" whom God uses in his divine plan. Thus, Matthew may well have included the OT women in his genealogy in order to head off criticism or slander regarding the unique circumstances in which Jesus was born. By their inclusion he is reminding his reader that God often works in unusual ways and through unlikely persons.

Somewhat similar to Brown, A.-J. Levine incorporates the central ideas of the first two theories into a new theory. Levine observes that each of the four OT women, while socioeconomically and religiously powerless, manifests faith when the men in their respective stories do not. Irvine argues that the rest of the Gospel of Matthew continues contrasting the privileged, the elite and the leaders with the excluded, the despised and the poor (see Rich and Poor). Levine herself notes that Mary does not fit the pattern established by the four OT women. In Matthew, unlike his OT counterparts, Joseph is the one who acts in faith.* In this theory Mary and Joseph are contrasted with the examples of previous generations. The only textual evidence for such contrast, however, is the verb change in 1:16, and that applies only to Mary (see above).

M. D. Johnson has suggested another—perhaps more simple—purpose for the women in Matthew's genealogy. The four OT women had been the subject of controversy in Jewish circles concerned with messianic ancestry. By the end of the first century B.C. they were actually glorified in the Pharisaic (see Pharisees) tradition expecting a Davidic Messiah. Perhaps Matthew mentions them to show that, in every respect, Jesus fulfills the Pharisaic expectations for the Messiah. This proposal fits with Matthew's ubiquitous theme of scriptural fulfillment and his argument against the Jewish leaders for their rejection of Jesus.

2.1. Structure and Placement. Luke locates his genealogy of Jesus just after the account of Jesus' baptism and just before his temptation (see Temptation of Jesus) and public ministry. This placement resembles the genealogy of the tribes of Israel and of Moses* in Exodus 6:14-25. Unlike Matthew, Luke uses "the [son] of" formula (cf. 1 Chron 3:10-24; 6:16-30; Ezra 7:1-5; in Luke, however, the word huios, "son," occurs only once at the beginning and is assumed in the rest of the list). He also provides an unstructured, uninterrupted list of seventy-seven names (not counting Jesus), and traces Jesus' ancestry backward in time from Jesus through David through Abraham to "Adam, son of God" (see Ezra 7:1-5). Not only is Luke's list longer than Matthew's, it also contains more names where the two lists overlap: from Abraham to Jesus Matthew includes forty-two names and Luke fifty-six. While Matthew has several uncommon insertions throughout his list (e.g., women, brothers, etc.), Luke makes only one parenthetical remark at the beginning of his list about Jesus "being the son (as was supposed) of Joseph" (ōn huios, has enomizeto, Iōsēph, Lk 3:23; note also the article is missing before Joseph). Other than these few unique features, Luke's genealogy lacks the many peculiarities of Matthew's list and is a simple, linear genealogy.

2.2.1. "Son of Adam, Son of God." Even though no other known biblical or Jewish genealogy culminates in the naming of God, this is not to be used alone as an argument for Jesus' divinity any more than it is for the divinity of Joseph and the others in the list. It is noteworthy, however, that Luke traces Jesus' sonship all the way back to God immediately after his record of the voice from heaven declaring Jesus, "my beloved Son . .." (Lk 3:22). Likewise, after the genealogy Luke records the temptation of Jesus during which the devil asks Jesus if he is the Son of God (Lk 4:3, 9; see Son of God). Interestingly, the only voices in Luke to declare Jesus to be the Son of God are angelic (Lk 1:32, 35; see Angels), demonic (Lk 4:41; 8:28; see Demon, Devil, Satan), Satan's (Lk 4:3, 9) and God's (Lk 3:22; 9:35; cf. 22:70; Acts 9:20). While Jesus as the Son of God is more than a human ascription in Luke, his genealogy seems to underscore Jesus' humanity and his ancestral credentials as God's selected agent.

2.2.2. Universal Ministry. What is clear in Luke-Acts is that the Evangelist saw all peoples—Jews and Gentiles*—as invited into a relationship with God through Jesus. The Jews were the vehicle by which God brought the savior of all humanity into the world. Luke's point is not that all of humanity will be saved, but that salvation* is equally offered to all of humanity. By placing this all-inclusive genealogy at the beginning of Jesus' ministry, Luke indicates that the benefits of Jesus' ministry will be available to all (Lk 24:46-47; Acts 1:8; 13:46-48; 26:23; 28:28).
3. A Comparison of the Genealogies.

Many of the differences between the two NT genealogies have been noted above. This section is devoted to a more pictorial comparison of the genealogies, with their potential OT sources, and then a discussion of plausible solutions for apparent discrepancies between the two NT accounts.

3.1. The OT and the Two ST Genealogies.

Both Matthew’s and Luke's genealogies contain several variations in the spelling of names. These come from variations in the practice of translation (and/or transliteration) of the names from Hebrew to Greek, Greek to English, and Hebrew to English, as well as possible scribal errors and corrections. Some have tried to explain Matthew's rendering of kings Asa and Amon as Asaph (Mt 1:8) and Amos (Mt 1.10), respectively, as an attempt to bring a heritage of wisdom and prophecy to Jesus. It seems best to understand the Shealtiel and Zerubbabel of Luke's record not to be the same as those of Matthew's and the parallel OT records since all the names around them from David to Joseph in Luke's list are of different people (descendants of Nathan rather than Solomon). Levirate law is the best way to understand the unique attribution of Zerubbabel to Shealtiel's brother, Pedaiah, in the MT of 1 Chronicles 3:19 (cf. Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; Neh 12:1; Hag 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 23). Admin (Admin) in Luke 3:33 is often judged a corruption and duplication of Amminadab (Aminadab), but the acceptable practice of omission of names from genealogies must be remembered (likewise for Luke's "extra" mention of Cainan [Kainam] in Lk 3:36; cf. 3:37). Aram (Aram) in Matthew 1:4 and Arni (Ami) in Luke 3:33 are both taken to be variations of Ram in 1 Chronicles 2:9-10 (ram in MT; LXX has both Aram and Ram; Ruth 4:19 LXX has Arann). In table 1 the English spellings are those used in the NASB. The OT genealogies referenced are found in 1 Chronicles 1:1-28 (and Gen 5; 11:10-26); 2:1-15 (and Ruth 4:18-22) and 3:1-17.

3.2. Plausible Solutions to Discrepancies. Why do Matthew and Luke's genealogies differ from one another after David? Up to that point, the lists generally agree with the OT records. No biblical records exist, however, of the names between Zerubbabel and Joseph (nine in Matthew; eighteen in Luke), and, if granted that Luke's Shealtiel and Zerubbabel are different from those in Matthew's, no biblical record exists for the names after Nathan in Luke's list. These portions are problematic; but with this divergence after David, it becomes quite clear that Luke and Matthew are doing two different tasks. Four basic solutions have developed.

Julius Africanus (A.D. 170-245) proposed that both lists give Jesus' legal descent through Joseph: Matthew giving Joseph's natural lineage and Luke giving Joseph's legal lineage (cf. Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 1.7). Africanus explains that Jacob and Eli (alias Heli) were uterine brothers (born of the same mother by different fathers). When Eli died childless, Jacob took the widow as wife to raise up a child in the dead brother's name in accordance with levirate law (Deut 25:5-10). Thus, Joseph was Jacob's natural son (Matthew), but the legal heir to Eli (Luke). Some feel this solution asks for too many happy coincidences.

Several modern scholars also hold that both lists give Jesus' legal descent, reversing the roles of the genealogies in Africanus' solution: Matthew providing Joseph's legal lineage and Luke providing Joseph's natural lineage. This solution struggles, however, against the more natural understanding of Matthew's "begat" formula as indicating a blood relationship between Jacob and Joseph (Mt 1:16).
Annius of Viterbo (c. A.D. 1490), followed by Martin Luther and many today, understand Matthew as giving Joseph's ancestry and Luke as giving Mary's. It suggests that Mary was the brother-less heir to Eli whose estate would then go to Mary's husband. Luke 3:23 is understood as saying, "Jesus, being the descendant (as it was supposed, through Joseph) of Heli." If this were the case, however, it is strange that Luke mentions Joseph instead of Mary, since he everywhere else focuses on Mary in his infancy narrative (Matthew focuses on Joseph). Note also that Luke has some concern to show Joseph to be of Davidic descent (Lk 1:27; 2:4). The Talmudic references to a Miriam, the daughter of "Eli" ('ly bslym, y. hag. 2.77d and y. Sanh. 6.23c) are most likely not references to Mary the mother of Jesus since R Eleazar b. Jose, who claims to have witnessed this Miriam's torture, lived during the second century AD.

Tertullian (De car. 20) and a few modern scholars have suggested that Matthew gives Mary's ancestry and Luke gives Joseph's. Such a solution again strains the natural understanding of Matthew's "begat" formula. Although H. A. Blair has proposed that the text of Matthew 1:16 be amended to read "Jacob begat Joseph, and Joseph begat Mary, of whom was born Jesus who is called the Christ" there is no textual evidence for such a reading.

While Matthew and Luke each have somewhat different purposes for a genealogy of Jesus, both affirm the virginal conception explicitly in their infancy narratives and implicitly in the genealogies as well. A final solution to the intricate issues involved in comparing the two lists may never be found, but enough is known to show that the apparent discrepancies are not insoluble. The most important things to learn from these genealogies are not the names of Jesus' grandfathers (Jacob or Eli or both), but that he is the messianic king by God's providential working (Matthew) and that he is God's agent offering all the world salvation (Luke).

See also Birth of Jesus; Luke, Gospel of; Matthew, Gospel of; Son of David, Son of God; Women.

D. S. Huffman

GENEROSITY. See Benefactor.

GENTILES

The Christian church* is largely Gentile, in spite of the facts that its origins are in a Jew (Jesus Christ), its first leaders were all Jews (the apostles*), and it grew out of Jewish soil (Palestine). Furthermore, the Gentile nature of the church is even more remarkable in light of the fact that Jesus, so far as we know, never intentionally entered Gentile lands for the sake of recruitment and evangelism though his practice is consistent with Paul's Gentile mission (see Scobie). Jesus' hesitations here are further enhanced by some early Christian scruples about ministering to Gentiles (cf. Acts 1-15). The Gentile nature of the church, then, requires historical explanation.

1. Judaism and the Gentiles
2. Jesus and the Gentiles
3. Mark and the Gentiles
4. Matthew and the Gentiles
5. Luke and the Gentiles
6. John and the Gentiles

1. Judaism and the Gentiles.

Scholars have often pointed to active, even aggressive, missionary activity on the part of Jews prior to Jesus and Paul as the impetus for the church becoming Gentile in orientation (but see McKnight). The relationship of Jews to Gentiles, however, was sensitive and at times volatile. On the one hand, there is abundant evidence that Jews integrated themselves into the way of the Gentiles so that Jewish religious ideas would be more comfortable in Gentile lands. Thus, Judaism of the Second Temple period is known for (1) its emphasis on monotheistic universalism (that God is truly one and God of all; cf. Sir. 13:15; 18:13; Philo Demi. 64); (2) its friendliness to Gentiles (Philo Flacc. 94); (3) its apparent permission to Gentiles to participate at various levels (e.g., synagogue attendance) in Judaism (Josephus J.W. 2.412-16); (4) its participation in Hellenistic education (Philo Vit. Mos. 1.23-24; Josephus Ant. 15.373; J.W. 1.602); and (5) its continual intermarriage (Josephus Ant. 2:91-92). At times this assimilation resulted in oven apostasy (Philo Spec. Ug. 1:56-7; Vit. Mos. 2.193-208; Josephus Ag. Ap. 1:180).

Alongside this evidence of integration to Gentile ways, there exists evidence of resistance to Gentile ways. We observe (1) that Jews were intent on separation from Gentiles and paganism because of the Gentile sinfulness (e.g., in exclusive table fellowship customs; Ep. Arist. 139,151,277; CD 11:15; 12:6,9; see Esler, 73-86); (2) that they prohibited Gentile participation in the Temple worship (Josephus J.W. 1.152, 354); (3) that they exhorted Jews not to marry Gentiles (Ezra; Neh; Tob 1:9; 3:10; T. Levi 9:10; 14:6); (4) that they revolted violently when religious reforms were imposed on them (1 Macc); and (5) that the Gentiles would one day be judged and punished by God (Sir 36:1-17; 1 Enoch 48:7-10; 63:1-12; 4 Ezra 7:37-9).

In spite of these negative comments, a persistent feature of Judaism is a positive attitude toward a true proselyte who would forsake paganism and become a Jew, both spiritually and nationally. A notable aspect of Jewish attitudes toward proselytism is that there would be a massive conversion of Gentiles on the Last Day (Tob 13:11; Sir 36:11-7; 1 Enoch 48:4; T. Simeon 7:2; Sib. Or. 5:493-500; 2 Bar 68:5). And this conversion is frequently portrayed in terms of Gentiles flocking to Zion at the last day, not in terms of Jewish missionaries reaching out to Gentiles (cf. Is 19:23; Zech 8:21; Jer 3:17). But it is not the case, as much of recent scholarship has demonstrated, that Judaism as a whole can be categorized as a missionary movement (see McKnight).

2. Jesus and the Gentiles.

Jesus' relationship to and teachings about Gentiles comprises several main lines of thinking. Although Jesus adopted the typical Jewish stance that Gentiles were sinners, he certainly distanced himself from the normal view that Gentiles were doomed to punishment. Furthermore, Jesus evidently knew that his mission was essentially directed toward the Jews and that after his death (see Death of Jesus) and vindication a worldwide mission to the Gentiles would take place. However, such a position did not exclude exceptional Gentiles from experiencing the salvation* of the kingdom (see Kingdom of God) prior to that future.

2.1. Scholarship. Scholars disagree on the authenticity of many sayings of Jesus that deal with the Gentiles. In general, critical scholars who do not believe that Jesus Christ was raised from among the dead also do not believe he commanded a worldwide Gentile mission as reflected in Matthew 28:16-20. Many scholars argue that the negative aspersions made by Jesus and the prohibition of mission to the Gentiles (e.g., Mt 18:17) are authentic and that the positive encounters are, at least in part, the product of early Christian imagination. Others argue that although Jesus was consistently particularistic in viewpoint (ministering to Jews alone), his message naturally was unfolded by the early church into a panoramic vision of Gentile inclusion—but Jesus did not unfold this message himself (Harnack, Bertholet, Goguel). A further development of this view is that Jesus, though he did not have a universal thrust to his ministry, had a vision of the future that included Gentile participation in God's kingdom (with differing nuances, Jeremias, Hahn, Hengel, Senior, Wilson, Scobie). A final view, the one expounded briefly below, is that Jesus' mission was limited to Israel* (during his life), but his intention was to use this particularistic concentration to launch a universal program of Gentile participation, whether at the end of history or immediately after the passion (with differing nuances, Sundkler, Bosch, Manson, Caird).

However difficult it is to synthesize coherently all the Gospel evidence regarding Jesus and the Gentiles, it must be said that "the Gentile factor" is a consistent aspect of the ministry and teaching of Jesus. Gentiles appear in various forms of Jesus' teachings and they come to him at different periods in his ministry and for different reasons. Since the OT predicts a large-scale Gentile participation in God's promises, and since Jesus announces the inaugural fulfillment of those promises in himself, it is reasonable to conclude that the Gentiles were a (even if small) factor in Jesus' kingdom ministry and teachings. It is reasonable to argue that Jesus' particularistic ministry was universal-istic in thrust. Jesus inherited the notion of Gentiles streaming to Zion to worship on the holy mountain (as by centripetal force) and, after his resurrection, commanded his followers to move outward from Jerusalem to the nations for their salvation (as by centrifugal force).
2.2. Gentile Sinners. As a Jew, Jesus recognized that Gentiles were sinners: they greet only their friends (Mt 5:47), pursue material things (Mt 6:32), think God will answer long prayers* (Mt 6:7) and use power to their own advantage (Mk 10:42). On the clear difference between Jews and Gentiles, Jesus and the earliest Christians were agreed: Gentiles were sinners (Gal 2:15; Eph 2:12). This is not to say that Jews could not be sinners; rather, it was a given fact that Gentiles were sinners, and it was the exception when Jews were called "sinners."

2.3. Jesus' Hesitations. This conventional understanding of Gentiles has also been used to explain Jesus' direct prohibition of missionary work among Gentiles: "Go nowhere among the Gentiles, and enter no town of the Samaritans, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:5-6 RSV; see Shepherd and Sheep). At other times Jesus seemed hesitant to minister to Gentiles. At first Jesus attempted to put off the Syro-Phonoecian woman* (Mk 7:27; Mt 15:26), and he seemed to have misgivings about entering the Gentile centurion's home to heal his servant/son (Mt 8:7). Quite possibly the enigmatic saying of Jesus, "Do not give dogs what is holy" (Mt 7:6), ought to be understood as a similar prohibition against evangelizing the Gentiles. However, this hesitation to minister to Gentiles seems to be anchored in other ideas.

2.4. The Elimination of Vengeance. In contrast to much of Judaism at the time, Jesus' message eliminated the expectation of judgment* and vengeance on the Gentiles. In his inaugural sermon in Nazareth, Jesus stated that he was fulfilling the predictions of Isaiah 58 and 61 (see Jubilee). But Jesus stopped quoting Isaiah just prior to the prediction of "the day of the vengeance of our God" (Is 61:2). When John and James asked Jesus to pray for God's judgment to come down immediately on the Samaritan* villages that rejected Jesus, Jesus rebuked them and went on with his ministry (Lk 9:51-56). When Jesus described his ministry to John the Baptist's* disciples, he did so in the terms of the glorious deeds to be accomplished in the kingdom as described by Isaiah 35 and 61 (Lk 7:18-23). But in each of these passages the element of vengeance appears, yet Jesus omitted that element in his use of each passage. When the Roman military force put a Galilean to death, Jesus did not vow retaliation; he exhorted the Israelites to repent (Lk 13:1-5). For Jesus, God's vengeance is on sinners for sin, not on Gentiles for being Gentiles (Lk 18:7). Jesus' message was one of mercy and grace to the Gentiles and thereby stood in contrast with a prevailing expectation of Judaism.

2.5. Ministry to Gentiles. Even if Jesus aligned himself with Jewish castigations of Gentiles as sinners and even if he prohibited Gentile missions, Jesus attracted great numbers of Gentiles (Mk 3:7-12; Mt 15:29-31). Furthermore, he ministered to them and preached the Gospel to them (Mk 5:1-20; 7:24-30; Mt 8:5-13 par. Lk 7:1-10; Jn 4:1-42; 12:20-22). His distance from them is to be explained on a religious basis: He castigates sinners (both Gentiles and Jews) and invites all to repent, whether Jew or Gentile.

Jesus' encounters with Gentiles are instructive for understanding Jesus' relationship with Gentiles. Gentiles approached Jesus; he did not go out of his way to find them. Thus, the Gerasene demoniac (see Demon, Devil, Satan) came to Jesus (Mk 5:2), the centurion sought Jesus out (Mt 8:5; Lk 7:2-7), the Syrophoenician woman searched for Jesus (Mk 7:25) and the Greeks asked to meet with Jesus (Jn 12:20-22). Only once does Jesus initiate a conversation with a non-Jew, the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:1-42). It is clear that Jesus did not initiate the Gentile mission by his own behavior. Jesus' ministry reflected the theme of the Gentiles coming to Israel for salvation (see McKnight). He focussed his efforts on the Jewish nation and its obligation to receive the Messiah (see Christ) of the final days. His emphasis on the Jews, however, did not exclude Gentile participation in the kingdom during his ministry. However, Gentile participation was nonetheless an exception and not the rule.

2.6. The Gentile Future. At several junctures in his ministry Jesus taught that many Gentiles would enter the kingdom of God and be accepted on equal footing with the Jews. For Jesus the present is the time of the Jews; the future is the time of the Gentiles. Though Jesus did not himself begin that mission to the Gentiles, he revealed that the future was wrapped-up with such a concern (Mk 13:10; 14:9; Jn 10:16). Jesus' followers would evangelize the nations as the light of the world (Mt 5:13-16; 24:14). In several parables Jesus alluded to Gentile participation in the kingdom of God (Mk 4:30-32; Mt 22:1-14; 25:31-46; Lk 11:29-32). Jesus seems to have predicted that many Gentiles would flock to Jerusalem and sit in fellowship with the patriarchs (Mt 8:11-12); on the other hand, some scholars argue that for Jesus this prediction concerned only diaspora Jews and not Gentiles (see Allison). In fact the Temple, Jesus says, "will be called a house of prayer for the nations" (Mk 11:17).

The instrument in the future salvation of the Gentiles is the preaching of the gospel* (of the kingdom) by the followers of Jesus, the church (Mk 13:10; 14:9). Jesus predicted that the end would not occur until the message of the kingdom was heard in the Gentile world (Mt 24:14). The lifestyle of the disciples would accompany this proclamation of the Gospel and exhort Gentiles to give glory* to God (Mt 5:13-16; Jn 17:18, 21) If the number seventy-two (or seventy) was chosen by Jesus because it symbolizes the number of Gentile nations (Gen 10; 1 Enoch 89:59-67), then the mission of the Seventy-Two (or Seventy) might prefigure the Gentile mission (see Apostle). And the last words of Jesus, according to Matthew, were those commissioning the disciples of Jesus to make disciples throughout the entire world (Mt 28:16-20).

The future salvation of Gentiles stands in bold contrast to the future judgment on Israelites for rejecting God's Messiah. John the Baptist warned the Jews of this (Lk 3:7-10) and Jesus developed the same theme (Lk 13:28-30; Mt 21:33-46; Jn 8:31-47). The smoke and ashes of Jerusalem in AD. 70 (see Destruction of Jerusalem) memorialized the judgment of God on unbelieving Judaism for its rejection of God's salvation (Mk 13; Lk 21; Mt 23:1-25:46).

Though each Evangelist passes on many of the traditions about Jesus, the relative role the Gentiles play in any particular Gospel is woven into the fabric of that Evangelist's theology. Whereas the Gentiles do not become a major theme in Mark, where they do appear, their role is related to Mark's major ideas (christology, ecclesiology and evangelism). Both Matthew and Luke lay emphasis on the salvation-historical role of the Gentiles. John's emphasis is the universal implications of Jesus as the savior. It is accurate to state that none of the Evangelists has a theology of the Gentiles.

For Mark the Gospel of Jesus Christ, God's Son, is not and cannot be understood until Jesus is comprehended as the crucified Messiah who, through that humiliation, brings salvation to humans. Interestingly, in Mark the first and only human to confess Jesus as God's Son after the crucifixion is a Gentile centurion (Mk 15:39).

Jesus' first priority is to the Jews; then the Gentiles can hear the gospel (7:27). Consequently, the new community of the followers of Jesus includes Gentiles who do and will respond to the gospel about God's Son in faith* (7:24-30; 13:9; 14:10). Accordingly, though many Jews will be excluded for unbelief (4:12; 6:1-6; 7:1-23; 11:12-19; 12:9; 15:11-15), Gentiles will be brought into God's fellowship because of faith (11:17; 12:1-12). Mark 14:28 and 16:7 may indicate the replacement of Galilee for Jerusalem as the locus of God's activity, though more probably a resurrection* appearance is in mind.

Occasionally Mark's literary designs seem to indicate an interest in the Gentiles. What Jesus does to Jews, he also does to Gentiles. As Jesus exorcises among the Jews (1:21-28), so he also exorcises among the Gentiles (5:1-20); as Jews believe, so also do Gentiles (5:18-20; 7:29-30); as the Jews see a feeding miracle* (6:30-44), so also the Gentiles see a similar revelation (8:1-13). Mark also betrays a Gentile (and liberating) concern when he states that food laws are not an end in themselves (7:19).

Matthew both begins and ends his Gospel on a Gentile note (1:1, Abraham* as the father of many nations; 1:1-17, the inclusion of several Gentile women; 28:16-20, the commissioning of the disciples* to go to the Gentiles). One of the major themes of Matthew's Gospel concerns the universal implications of the Gospel of the kingdom of heaven. Many stories and sayings about Gentiles are found only in Matthew (e.g., 1:1-17; 2:1-12; 6:7-8; 12:15-21; 22:1-14; 25:31-46).

4.1. The Kingdom and Universalism. The idea of the kingdom of God shows up in Matthew's emphasis on Gentile participation in the kingdom. Since God is King and ruler of all, and his Messiah is King of the Jews (2:2; 4:8-10,12-16), those who submit to his reign are subjects of the kingdom of God. Some of these subjects are Gentiles (2:1-12; 12:15-21; 28:16-20).

4.2. Gentiles and Israel. The covenantal privilege of the Jews is forfeited through their rejection of the Messiah and, as a consequence, the church, which includes Gentiles, replaces Israel as God's people. Matthew brings these two notions to the fore: the rejection of Messiah by the Jews and salvation going to the Gentiles.

Jesus' priority is to offer the kingdom of God and its blessings to the Jews (10:5-6; 15:21-28), but he warns of judgment at hand if he is rejected (8:11-12; 10:13-15; 11:20-24). And he is rejected (9:1-17; 11:7-19; 12:1-14, 22-45). Consequently, Jesus predicts the destruction of Jerusalem as a judgment on unbelieving Judaism (23:1—25:46). But according to Matthew this idea of replacement has its precursor in Jewish history, throughout which Gentiles have come to the God of Israel for salvation (1:1-17; 12:38-42). Nationalism ends with Jesus (5:43-47; 17:24-27; 22:15-22). The final judgment then includes all nations and all are brought to the same bar of judgment to face the same requirements (25:31-46).

4.3. The Gentile Future and Salvation-History. During this time of ministry, Jesus also predicts a conversion of the Gentiles and their participation in the kingdom (5:13-16; 8:11-12; 10:18; 13:24-30, 36-43; 13:31-32; 21:33-46; 22:1-14; 24:9-14, 29-31; 26:6-13; 28:16-20). Unlike Mark, Matthew seems to make some clear distinctions between periods of history (cf. 21:33-46; 22:14): (1) the time of the Jewish privilege (Abraham to Jesus’ mission, with a probationary extension until the destruction of Jerusalem); (2) the time of Gentile reception (after the passion of, Jesus and especially after the destruction of Jerusalem); and (3) the time of consummation (see Matthew, Gospel of).

In this scheme there is an overlap between the time of the Jews and the time of the Gentiles. Gentiles begin to come to faith before and during Jesus’ ministry and especially after his death through world evangelization. And the Jews continue to hear about the kingdom of God for a generation after the passion. But with the coming of the destruction of Jerusalem, the time of the Jews seems all but over and the driving emphasis after A.D. 70 is the mission to the Gentiles.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>OT Covenant</th>
<th>Jesus</th>
<th>A.D. 70</th>
<th>Consummation</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Time of Jews</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Time of the Gentiles</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

During the time of the Jews, Gentiles do come to faith and enter the kingdom, but only in an exceptional, anticipatory manner (2:1-12; 8:5-13; 15:21-28; 27:54). After the resurrection of Jesus the major focus of preaching shifts from an exclusive concern with the Jews, and after the destruction, preaching to the Gentiles becomes dominant (5:13-16; 8:11-12; 10:18; 21:33-46; 22:1-14; 24:9-14,29-31; 26:6-13). Accordingly, Matthew places the universal mission of the church at the climax of his Gospel (28:16-20).

Along with Matthew, Luke emphasizes universal salvation, in part because it was his intention to write about the growth of the church throughout the Roman Empire. Although some scholars have argued that Luke's Gospel is a Gospel of universalism to the extent that Luke generates the view that the Gentile mission began during Jesus' life, this seems to overstate the evidence. Indeed, S. G. Wilson contends that Luke does not have "any consistent theology of the Gentiles" (239). Consequently, though Luke does show traces of universalism, it is not a dominating theme in his Gospel. While the evidence for Luke's view of the Gentiles is essentially the same as that of Mark and Matthew, contemporary scholarship is actively debating the significance of the Gentiles in Luke-Acts (e.g., Esler; Marshall, 231-34).

For Luke the inauguration of the kingdom of God in Jesus brings in its wake the salvation of persons throughout the entire world. Luke seems to operate with three periods of salvation history: (1) the time of Israel and promise; (2) the time of Jesus and the inauguration of salvation (the time of fulfillment); and (3) the time of the church and the worldwide proclamation of salvation. Even if one disagrees that this simple threefold breakdown of salvation-history accurately represents Luke, Gentile salvation seems to belong predominantly (but not exclusively) to the time of the church and hence it is described in some detail in Luke's second volume, the Acts of the Apostles.

5.1. The Time of Fulfillment in the Savior. The births of John the Baptist and Jesus inaugurate the fulfillment of the promises given to Israel. In turning many of the children of Israel to the Lord, John preaches the good news of salvation (1:16-17, 68, 73, 77). The angel, Mary and others see the same purposes fulfilled in God's salvific work in Jesus (1:32-33, 54-55; 2:25,34,38; 19:9). But the salvation that comes in Jesus is not readily accepted by Israel (2:34; 3:8; 13:6-9; 16:19-31; 19:41-48), and so the time of fulfillment also ushers in salvation for the Gentiles (2:32; 20:9-19). A distinctive emphasis of Luke is that the salvation that extends to the Gentiles is the fulfillment of God's eternal will expressed originally to Israel.

Furthermore, in contact with this line of promise and fulfillment is the occasional connection Luke makes between the Gentiles and the Holy Spirit* Simeon's predictions about the Messiah being a light to the Gentiles are inspired by the Holy Spirit (2:27, 32), and Jesus' announcement in the synagogue at Nazareth associates the Holy Spirit (4:18) with Gentiles (4:26-27). Finally, the mission charge given by Jesus to the disciples to evangelize the world is made possible by the power of God's Spirit (24:44-49).

The actual mission to the Gentiles is the result of the commands given by the risen Lord. Whether seen in the final words of Jesus prior to his ascension* (24:44-49) or in the various commands throughout Acts (Acts 1:8; 9:15-16; 22:6-11, 17-21; 26:12-23), the impetus for the Gentile mission is provided according to Luke by the words of the risen Lord.

5.2. The Future Salvation of the Gentiles. For Luke, as for Matthew, the salvation of the Gentiles belongs to the time after Jesus' passion and vindication. There remains here, as seen in Mark, Matthew and Paul, the priority of Israel (1:16, 68; Acts 3:26; 13:46). Though Simeon predicts that the little Jewish boy will be the Messiah of Israel and a source of great division within Israel, he also prophesies that this Messiah will be "a light of revelation to the Gentiles" (2:32), a ministry that does not take place until the time of the church (Acts). The number of those from among the Gentiles who are saved reverses Jewish expectations: while Jews are not permitted entry into eternal fellowship with God, the Gentiles are (13:28-29). In parabolic form Jesus predicts a Gentile mission that follows the rejection of the Messiah by Israel (14:15-24). After his resurrection Jesus exhorts his disciples to preach repentance and forgiveness (see Forgiveness of Sins) in his name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem (24:47-48; Acts 1:8).

Having emphasized the future salvation of the Gentiles, Luke knows of some exceptions, notably the centurion of Capernaum (7:1-10), the demoniac (8:26-39) and some Samaritans (17:16; cf. 10:33). Luke, more than Matthew and Mark, seems to tone down the presence of the ministry of Jesus in non-Jewish territory (cf. Luke's omission of the tradition found in Mk 6:45; 7:24-31; 8:27). evidently, Luke is trying to show more clearly that the salvation of the Gentiles is not something that gets underway during the time of Jesus. As some have observed, this may be part of Luke's understanding of the geographical plan for the growth of the church (Acts 1:8).

Having emphasized rejection by many Jews and the consequent turning to the Gentiles, Luke speaks also of a temporal limitation to Gentile salvation. According to Luke 21:24 Jerusalem will be sacked by Gentiles and "trodden down by the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled." This suggests either that (1) the city will be dominated for only a limited time and that during this period Gentiles will be converted to the Messiah (cf. Dan 8:13-14; 12:5-13; Mk 13:20; Rom 11:25-27) or that (2) the mission to the Gentiles will run its predestined course, and God will then turn once more to work with the nation of Israel.

5.3. The Laudable Piety of Gentiles. A notable feature in Luke-Acts is the piety of the Gentiles and the unacceptable. This theme begins in the OT (4:16-30) and continues through the time of Jesus and the church. A comparison of Luke's account of the centurion with Matthew's, a story evidently derived from Q,* reveals several distinctive Lukans emphases. In particular, Luke dramatizes the piety of the centurion. The elders* who are sent by the centurion to obtain mercy from Jesus state that the centurion "is worthy to have you do this for him, for he loves our nation, and he built us our synagogue" (7:4-5). Luke describes the centurion Cornelius in similar terms (Acts 10:2, 22; cf. also 8:27). All of this is part of Luke's favorable description of those unacceptable by Jewish standards (4:18; 5:27; 7:11-17,36-50; 15:11-32; 19:2-10).

Though John's treatment of the Gentiles is essentially consistent with that of the Synoptics, his overall theology is markedly different. It is this theology that gives different emphases to his presentation of the Gentiles and the theme of universalism. If the emphasis of the Synoptics is along the plane of salvation-history, whereby the Gentiles occupy a time subsequent to Jesus' passion and resurrection, the emphasis in John is on the present time as a time of Jesus' revelation to the world. It is not that John does not contain a salvation-historical perspective (12:20-23); rather, his emphasis is elsewhere.

6.1. Jesus, the Savior of the World. A major emphasis of John is that Jesus is the "light* of the world,"* an idea that both coheres with the Synoptic tradition and yet gives it fuller interpretation. For John the term "world" can denote the world of the universe (in contrast to the heavenly world, 1:9; 3:17), the world of human beings (12:19) and the world that stands in sin and either remains opposed to the revelation of truth* in Jesus Christ or believes in the Son for eternal life (1:10-12; 7:7; 15:18-19; 17:1-26). This latter sense is in mind where Jesus is described as savior. Accordingly, God loves the world (3:16) and sends his Son to be the savior of the world (3:17; 4:42; 6:33, 51; 11:27; 12:20-23) as well as its judge (9:39). Thus, the Word is "the light of all people" (1:4; cf. also 1:9; 3:17-21; 11:9; 12:46-47) who has come into this world from the Father to reveal the Father and divine truth to those who believe (16:28; 17:18; 18:37).

Jesus is the Lamb of God (see Lamb of God) who bears the sins of the world (1:29; 11:51-52). And Jesus' sacrifice is beneficial for believing Jews as well (11:49-51; 18:14).

In another set of contrasts, Jesus is the light of the world (8:12; 9:5) who brings the light of revelation to a world of darkness (3:16-21; 12:33-36). Jesus also is portrayed as the Good Shepherd (see Shepherd and Sheep) who has a flock that is larger than Israel (10:11, 16) or as the bread* of God that comes down from heaven to give life to the world (6:33, 51).

John's description of Jesus as the savior of the world is distinctive. Though it remains consistent with the universal implications of Jesus' ministry in the Synoptics, it is nonetheless more christologically focused. If the Synoptics emphasize the universal dimensions of God's kingdom inaugurated in Jesus, John emphasizes that Jesus Christ, the Word (see Logos) from the Father, is the light of the world who brings salvation to that world through his death (12:20-23). Thus John is completely consistent with the Synoptic tradition in showing that the Gentile mission does not belong to the earthly life of Jesus; rather, the mission to the Gentiles is future (12:20-23; 16:8-10; 17:18, 20-23; 20:21-23).

6.2. The Gentile Mission and the Holy Spirit. Like Luke (24:48-49; Acts 1:8), John connects the Gentile mission with the Holy Spirit. Thus when the Holy Spirit (the Paraclete; see Holy Spirit) comes, he will convince the world of sin, righteousness and judgment (16:8-10; see Justice, Righteousness). After his resurrection Jesus imparts his peace,* commissions the disciples and breathes the Holy Spirit on them (20:21-23; cf. 15:26-27). And yet this mission is the mission of Jesus (17:18; 20:21). These texts show the integral connection between the mission of Jesus, the Holy Spirit and the disciples' mission to the world (Burge).
6.3. The Gentiles, the Jews and Faith. An unremitting evaluation of the Jews as unbelieving punctuates John's Gospel (e.g., 1:11; 2:13-22; 4:19-26; 12:37-43), a theme generated by the opposition the Jews maintain toward Jesus (e.g., 5:16, 18, 39-47; 7:1-5, 25-36). The consequence of Jewish rejection of Jesus is judgment (3:18; 5:25-30; 12:48). In effect a secondary consequence of rejection is that eternal life is granted to the Gentiles (12:19). In John's Gospel salvation is by faith and this salvation is granted to anyone who believes, whether Jew or Gentile (3:36; 4:39; 8:24). Thus Jewish unbelief amounts to a turning to the Gentiles (8:31-59; 10:16). Though the Gentile mission is still future, John's presentation of the necessity of faith and the unbelief of the Jews places all people on the same level. The effect is a presentation of Jesus as the savior of the world.

6.4. Gentile Encounters. The first Gentile Jesus encounters in John's Gospel is the Samaritan woman. She learns that Jesus, the living water, brings a spiritual salvation that is acquired by faith. Moreover, even though this salvation is from the Jews (4:1-42), it breaks down racial and religious boundaries. Immediately following his encounter with the Samaritan woman, Jesus heals an official's son (4:46-54). If this is a variant report of the centurion's servant found in Matthew 8:5-12 and Luke 7:1-10, then the official is a Gentile. The Johannine Jesus' only other encounter with Gentiles is with the Greeks (12:20-22). As if to highlight the interest of the Greeks as a sign that the eschatological day of salvation for Gentiles has arrived, Jesus says, "The hour has come for the Son of man to be glorified" (12:23).

See also Anti-Semitism; Judaism.

S. McKnight

GEOGRAPHY. See Archeology and Geography

GETHSEMANE

According to the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, the site where Jesus prayed in lonely anguish before his arrest (Mt 26:36; Mk 14:32). The word is a transliteration of the Hebrew/Aramaic gat šēmen, "oil press," presumably used here to refer to an olive grove on the slope of the Mount of Olives (Mt 26:30; Mk 14:26). John 18:1 speaks of a garden across the Kidron Valley from the city of Jerusalem. Luke places the incident on the Mount of Olives. All refer to the same general location. According to the Synoptic Gospels, it was here, immediately following his vigil, that Jesus was publicly betrayed by Judas* and arrested.

1. Gethsemane in the Gospels of Matthew and Mark
3. The Gethsemane Tradition in the Gospel of John and in the Episde to the Hebrews
4. The Historicity of the Gethsemane Tradition

Because the First and Second Evangelists present the Gethsemane episode in similar ways, Matthew 26:36-46 and Mark 14:32-42 will be treated together. Matthew's sole dependence on the Second Gospel for this story is widely assumed.

Over the past seventy years, the prehistory of the Markan version of the Gethsemane story has been subjected to extravagant analyses (see Feldmeier, 65-140; Holleran, 10745). Many scholars, struck by the duplication of almost every detail in the Markan story, have been persuaded that two primitive sources underlie Mark 14:32-42 (e.g., Barbour, Holleran, Stanley). On the other hand, the thesis that the Markan story constitutes a very old, pre-Markan traditional unit has recently found new support, though some have come to regard the scene as a Markan creation almost in its entirety. The debate has led to little by way of a critical consensus. However, the number of independent witnesses to this tradition (see below) suggests a complex tradition-history (see Tradition Criticism).

Central to Matthew's and Mark's accounts is the concrete unfolding of the divine plan anticipated in the earlier passion predictions (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). Although human agents are involved in these fateful events (e.g., Judas Iscariot, Pontius Pilate,* the Jewish leaders), God is the primary actor. This interpretation comes to the fore above all in the portrait of Jesus' prayer* as a process of discerning and submitting to God's will. It is also present in the reference to the "cup," signifying divine judgment (cf. Mk 10:38-39 par. Mt 20:22-23; Mk 14:27 par. Mt 26:31; Ps 75:8; Is 51:17, 22; Jer 25:15-38; Ezek 23:31-34); and to the "hour," signifying God's appointed time for Jesus' passion.

Related to this theme, though also emphasizing Jesus' obedience, is the conjunction of Mark's Son of man* and Son of God* christologies in this pericope. "Son of man" has been central to Mark's presentation of Jesus' anticipated suffering (8:31; 9:12, 31; 10:33-34): "the Son of man will be delivered up." Now, "the Son of man is delivered up into the hands of sinners" (14:41). Jesus' status as Son of God was affirmed by the Evangelist in 1:1, then proclaimed by God at Jesus' baptism* (1:10-11) and Transfiguration* (9:7). In addressing his prayer to "Abba* Father" (14:36), Jesus acknowledges his intimate, Father-Son relationship with God. Significantly, this affirmation comes to the fore in the face of suffering and death. Hence, "Son of God" must be understood in Mark against the backdrop of the "must" (dei) of the suffering of the Son of man. It is as God's obedient Son that Jesus, Son of man, embraces death, God's will (see Death of Jesus).

Closely related to the theme of Jesus' obedience is that of discipleship* failure. Throughout the Second Gospel, the disciples* have demonstrated their incapacity to grasp the identity of Jesus and the implications of God's redemptive plan (e.g., 8:32; 9:32; 10:32). Now, as Jesus struggles with God's will, the disciples evidence their continued lack of understanding by their inability to stay awake (and by their subsequent abandonment, 14:50-52).

Jesus' acknowledged intimacy with God ("Abba," 14:36) highlights a further, central theme, one which gives clearer definition to the intended meaning of the "cup" in 14:36. As Feldmeier has seen, Gethsemane functions as the crisis in the passion narrative, indeed in the life of the Son of God. Here, for the first time, Jesus experiences the silence of God, a divine estrangement that comes to expression finally in Jesus' cry of dereliction from the cross (15:34). Gethsemane, then, does not so much demonstrate Jesus' anguish in the face of death as his fear of being abandoned by God. The humanity of Jesus could hardly be emphasized more acutely.

Noting Matthew's wording of Jesus' command to his disciples in 26:36, "Sit here (autou), while I go yonder and pray," some interpreters raise the possibility that Matthew is consciously alluding to the story of Abraham* and Isaac (cf. Gen 22:5). There, in a story widely regarded for its portrait of profound faith, the servants of Abraham are given similar instructions. With this allusion Jesus' faith in the midst of his anguish is emphasized all the more.

Both Mark and Matthew underscore the paraenetic value of Jesus' words and actions in this scene. In his prayer Jesus exemplifies the appropriate response to eschatological crisis. Jesus' command "Watch!" recalls the content of his final discourse in both Gospels. In Matthew's Gospel disciples are to keep watch—like the owner of the house (24:42-44) and the wise maidens (25:13). In Mark the connection is even more accentuated (cf. 13:5, 9, 23, 33-37), especially by the following highly suggestive verbal parallels:

13:36: elthōn . . . heurē. . . katheudontas (coming ... he finds ... sleeping)

14:37: erchetai . . . heuriskei. . . katheudontas (he comes ... he finds ... sleeping)

14:40: elthōn . . . heuren . . . katheudontas (coming... he found ... sleeping)

Clearly, the passion of Jesus is the eschatological turning-point in redemptive history. At the same time, disciples, having been found sleeping at this moment, are encouraged by this story "to stay on guard" in anticipation of the final, eschatological woes (see Apocalyptic Teaching; Eschatology).

Finally, we may observe that Jesus' prayer in both Gospels contains allusions that contribute to its interpretation. Thus, the Markan version suggests conceptual borrowing from selected psalmic laments—such as Psalms 42:9-11; 55:4-8; 61:1-3. Matthew 26:37 actually recasts Mark 14:33 (substituting lypeō [sorrowful] for Mark's ekthambeō [greatly disturbed]) to achieve a more direct reference to Psalm 42:5. For both evangelists the result is a typological portrait of Jesus as the Suffering Righteous One. Matthew's rendition evidences an allusion of another sort, presenting Jesus' prayer in terms that closely parallel the Lord's Prayer (cf. 6:10; 26:42; see Prayer). In this way Jesus proves himself a living example of his own teaching.

Before discussing the significance of Luke 22:39-46 for the Third Gospel, we must address some important text- and source-critical questions (see Textual Criticism; Synoptic Problem).

2.1. The Originality of Luke 22:4344. The presence or absence of these two verses is crucial to an interpretation of the scene as a whole. The textual evidence is ambiguous, though it is clear that the omission of these verses from so many and diverse witnesses (e.g., P^{69} [apparently], P^{5} [first corrector], A, B, T, W) could not have been accidental. Some modern interpreters (see Fitzmyer, 1443-4; RSV) exclude these verses, noting their uniqueness within the Synoptic tradition, judging them as inappropriate to their context and suggesting they were added later for the purpose of Christian instruction. Others, however, observe the impressive Lukan character of these verses, which speaks for their originality to the Third Gospel. In addition to (1) the inclusion of characteristic Lukan vocabulary (Green 1988, 56-57), one may also observe (2) the Lukan emphasis on the appearance of an angel* (e.g., 1:11, 26; 2:13, 15; Acts 5:19; 7:30; 8:26; 10:3; 12:7), (3) Luke's interest in simile ("his sweat was like drops of blood," v. 44; cf. e.g., 3:22; 10:18; 11:44; 22:31) and (4) Luke's fondness for physical manifestations (like sweat) accompanying extramundane events (e.g., 1:20; 3:22; Acts 2:2-3; 9:18). These data, along with the fact that the presence of these verses is of a piece with Luke's interpretation of this scene as a whole, point clearly to the originality of 22:43-44.

Moreover, it is not difficult to imagine a rationale for the early exclusion of these verses in the manuscript tradition. The portrait of Jesus contained therein—human, agonizing, needful, requiring angelic support—would have been problematic to some (cf. Cos. Nie. 20; Green 1988, 56). Accordingly, they may have been dropped for doctrinal reasons. There is thus good reason for taking these verses as original to Luke.

2.2. The Source-Critical Question. In writing this story, was Luke dependent only on the Markan parallel (Mk 14:26, 32-42) or did he draw on additional material? In recent years, the tendency has been to highlight Luke's creative use of his Markan source and so to downplay Luke's use of non-Markan tradition (whether oral or written). (On this scene, see Fitzmyer, 1436-9: Luke's story is "a stark abridgment of the Marcan account") In fact much of the Lukan account of Jesus' prayer of anguish can be explained with reference to Luke's creative use of Mark.

Four lines of evidence suggest a general conclusion of this sort is overly simplistic, however. First Luke's linguistic and syntactical deviations from Mark are not easily explicable with reference only to Luke's creative hand. Second, Luke's deletion of Mark 14:33-34 from his account is most easily explained by Luke's aversion to doublets—that is, by his decision to incorporate the record of Jesus' anguish in verses 43-44 instead of, rather than in addition to, the similar Markan material. Third, in verse 42 Luke reports the content of Jesus' prayer with language from the Lord's Prayer as found in Matthew 6:10: "not my will but your will be done." This language is missing from Luke's version of the Lord's Prayer (11:2-4) and has no parallel in Mark. Finally, the presence of verses 4344 (no parallel in Mark) speaks for Luke's use of non-Markan tradition.
Thus, while in all probability Luke was dependent on the Markan account, he appears to have also had access to a second, roughly parallel tradition (see Green 1988, 53-8; Holleran, 170-98; Taylor, 69-72).

2.3. The Significance of This Scene for Luke. Primary to Luke's understanding of this scene is the role of Jesus as a model for his disciples. This motif comes onto the stage initially with the use of akoloulheō, a term suggestive of "following as a disciple," in verse 39. Structurally, the scene is bracketed by the phrases "Pray that you may not enter into temptation" (v. 40) and "Rise and pray that you might not enter into temptation" (v. 46). As Jesus prays, they are to pray; as he rises, so should they (w. 45-46). Thus, for Luke this story has a paraenetic edge: the way to stand the test—intense, submissive prayer—is exemplified by Jesus. This theme is not unique to this passage in Luke's passion account; elsewhere we find the disciples "with" Jesus (22:24-30; 23:26-27, 49) in a way not found in Mark (cf. 14:50-52, for which Luke often no parallel).

Also of profound importance to Luke's scene is the way in which every aspect of the story is subordinated to the divine necessity of Jesus' suffering and his unreserved submission to the will of God. This emphasis is accomplished by Luke's economy of style, namely the brevity with which he presents the scene. The mention of only one time of prayer (compare the threelfold pattern in Mt and Mk) highlights Jesus' firm resolve to be obedient to God. Indeed, just as Jesus' instructions to the disciples frame this story, so his communion with God (agonizing prayer and reception of divine aid) stands as its centerpoint. Again, these motifs are found throughout Luke's narrative (on the necessity [del] of Jesus' death, see, e.g., 22:19-20,22,37; 24:26; on his acceptance of his fate, see, e.g., 22:15-18; 23:27-31,46).

Luke is also interested in portraying this scene as a cosmic battle. This is evident in his use of peirasmοs in verses 40 and 46, a term denoting struggle with Satan (cf. 4:13; 8:13); and in his reference to angelic assistance. In fact, Jesus' passion as a whole is marked by supernatural conflict (e.g., 22:3, 28, 31, 53), though the present scene clearly constitutes the critical point in this struggle.

More generally, a number of interpreters have understood Luke's presentation of this episode as a central element of Luke's portrayal of Jesus' passion as a martyrdom (see Barbour). The case for this interpretation is strengthened by the observation that martyr-tales regularly present their martyrs as exemplary figures. On the other hand, Luke's portrait of Jesus in agonizing prayer not only lacks parallels in the martyrrological literature, where death is happily embraced, but stands in clear tension with that literature.

Another reading of this story proposes that Luke is especially concerned to further his portrait of Jesus as the Isaianic Servant of the Lord (Green 1986). According to this view, the necessity of Jesus' suffering, his having been chosen for this fate, his willing obedience and his reception of strengthening aid through a divine messenger are to be read against their background in the Isaianic Servant texts (especially Is 41:10; 42:1,6; 49:5; 50:5-9; 52:13-53:12). That is, Luke's portrayal of Jesus in prayer on the Mount of Olives demonstrates that it was to fulfill his role as Servant of the Lord that Jesus had to suffer.

3. The Gethsemane Tradition in the Gospel of John and in Hebrews.

The Fourth Evangelist narrates no Gethsemane episode as such, but he manifests his knowledge of this tradition. In 18:1-2 he places Jesus and his disciples in a garden on the far side of the Kidron Valley, and in 18:11 Jesus makes reference to the "cup" given him by God, a cup he must drink. Both details are paralleled in the Synoptic Gethsemane tradition. Furthermore, John 17:1-18 portrays Jesus praying immediately before his arrest.

More significant in this context, however, is the prayer of Jesus in 12:27-29. The prayer itself, "Father, save me from this hour" (v. 27), has been variously punctuated—as a hypothetical question (RSV, NIV) or as a petition (NEB). Given the note of anguish in verse 27a (see Ps 6:34; 42:6; Mk 14:34), Jesus' experience of turmoil is evident either way. Here, a number of important Johannine motifs converge: Jesus' obedience to his mission and thus to God; the "hour" as the time of Jesus' death, the climax of the work for which the Son was sent; and the transparent interpretation of Jesus' death as glorification and exaltation (cf. 12:23, 32; see Death of Jesus; Glory).

In his attempt to demonstrate Christ's qualifications for the high priesthood, the author of Hebrews utilizes material reminiscent of the Gethsemane tradition. This connection is suggested generally by the observation that the Gethsemane story is the only account in our canonical Gospels that comes close to this portrayal of Jesus praying with "strong crying and tears to the one who was able to save him." In addition, we may observe (1) the connection between Luke 22:43-44; John 12:27-29; and Hebrews 5:7: he prayed and was heard; (2) that John 12:27 and Hebrews 5:7 each speak of God's saving Jesus; and (3) that both

Many have doubted the historicity of the story of Jesus' struggle in prayer in Gethsemane, citing as primary evidence the impossibility of obtaining eyewitness testimony from sleeping disciples. On this basis, some have gone on to suggest a derivation from martyrological literature, while others hold that the scene originated in early reflection on the OT (especially Ps 22:20; 31:9-10, 22; 42:5-6, 11; 43:5; 69:1-2). As previously noted (2.3), this scene actually stands in contrast to the martyr-tales, whose protagonists gladly go to their deaths. The role of the OT in providing language and imagery for theological interpretation of the story should not be downplayed, but no convincing argument has been put forth to support the notion that the psalms actually gave birth to this tradition (Barbour; Dunn, 18-19).

Given the number of independent testimonies to this episode (Matthew-Mark, Luke, John, Hebrews), the antiquity of the Gethsemane tradition is beyond question. Its fundamental historicity is supported by additional data. First, the story underscores so profoundly the weakness of Jesus that it is unlikely to have been created out of nothing. Second, like the subsequent departure of the disciples recorded in Matthew and Mark, the scandalous failure of the disciples in this scene is unlikely to have originated in the earliest tradition. On the other hand, some have argued that the sleeping of the disciples more likely serves theological interests than Jesus' prayer, for it highlights the clarity of Jesus' understanding of his task over against the disciples' persistent dullness. This line of argumentation supports even more the historicity of Jesus' prayer of anguish. Finally, we may note the appearance of "Abba" in Mark 14:36, the use of which takes us "back to the very speech and language of Jesus himself" (Dunn, 20).

See also DEATH OF JESUS; PASSION NARRATIVE; TRIAL OF JESUS

J. B. Green

GLORY

The Gospels' use of "glory" (Gk doxa, doxaztin) presupposes the specialized theological background of the OT. Few concepts in antiquity were more important than honor, distinction, esteem and glory. The classical word doxa originally meant "opinion" (derived from dokeō), or a well-informed reputation or renown. Related closely to time ("honor"), it referred to a distinguished quality that was readily evident in a person.

1. Old Testament Background
2. Synoptic Gospels
3. John

1. Old Testament Background.

The LXX literally gave a technical meaning to doxa. Here doxa came to mean honor intended for God,* or the majesty and eminence which radiated from God's own being. This use of glory originated from the Hebrew concept of kābōd. God himself could not be seen, but his radiance—as that of a fire or light—could be apprehended (Ex 16:7; Deut 5:24). His kābōd was the visible manifestation of his power. Thus his glory was apparent at the Tabernacle (Ex 40:34) and later within Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 8:11). This presence was the special privilege of Israel,* but it could be lost such as when the sons of Eli lost the ark to the Philistines in 1 Samuel 4. "Ichabod" (1 Sam 4:21-22), the name of Eli's new grandson, means "no glory." God's kābōd had departed. To enjoy the presence of God was to enjoy his glory. In the last days the glory of Yahweh would come to earth visibly and convert the Gentiles (Ezek 39:21). It is for this reason that Simeon in Luke 2:29-32 offers his hymn of praise and consolation: he had witnessed the arrival of this glory (see Simeon's Song). In Christ the glory of God was apparent in Israel once more.

2. Synoptic Gospels.

The Gospel writers follow the use of the LXX when they employ doxa. There is initially a mundane or routine use describing the grandeur of some earthly thing, such as the kingdom of the world* (Mt 4:8; Lk 4:5-6) or Solomon's splendor (Mt 6:29; Lk 12:27). Here the meaning approximates time or honor. Similarly people may seek to "glorify" one another (Mt 6:2; Lk 14:10; Jn 5:44; 8:50; 12:43; etc.), but this too refers to honor or giving regard. This is likely the meaning of Lk 4:15: Jesus is given high honor by all in Galilee.*

But a second use is by far more prominent. Consistent with the OT, doxa also describes God or the things of God. The glory of the Lord appears again and again in the birth narratives (Lk 2:9, 14, 32; see Birth of Jesus) and in the Transfiguration* account (Lk 9:31-32), suggesting that it is God himself at work in the coming of Christ Appropriately, people are directed to give God glory or praise (Mt 9:8; 15:31; Mk 2:12; Lk 2:20; 5:25-26; 7:16; 13:13; 17:5; 18:43; 23:47; etc.). This merely echoes so much of the literature of the OT (kābōd, Ps 22:23; 50:15; Is 66:5).

The more significant theological development is the way the Synoptic Gospels portray the glory of Jesus Christ Since Christ is associated with God it is natural for him to reflect God's glory. However, this is not clearly indicated for Christ's earthly ministry. The Synoptics consistently speak of the glory of Christ in future eschatological language. The request of James and John in Mark 10:37 is instructive. Here Christ's glory will be possessed in heaven following his death —and this is what the brothers seek to enjoy. Matthew curiously alters Christ's "glory" to "kingdom" in his parallel story (Mt 20:21) in order to construct what seems to be the primary theological force of doxa. The glory of Christ will appear only when the Son of man* returns at the end of the age (Mt 16:27; 19:28; 24:30; 25:31; Mk 8:38; 10:37; 13:26; Lk 9:26; 21:27). Luke 24:26 explains that the divine glory of Christ had to await the threshold of death ("Was it not necessary that the Christ should suffer these things and enter into his "glory?" cf. Acts 2:32-33; 3:13). Then, having assumed a glorious position with God the Father, Christ would return emanating this glory (see Apocalyptic Teaching; Eschatology).

The only exception to this Synoptic pattern is Luke's Transfiguration account (9:28-36). Luke develops the parallels to the Exodus story of Mt Sinai (see Mountain and Wilderness) beyond Mark when he adds that Moses* and Elijah* appeared in glory (9:31). The kāḇōḏ of Yahweh was present. But in addition, Jesus also is seen "in his glory" (9:32). For Luke, Jesus' eschatological glory was not just future, but could be assumed under unique circumstances during his life on earth.

This brings us to what is by all accounts a most unexpected development in the Fourth Gospel. Glory is never associated with any futurist Son of man saying. John vigorously advances the theme into the earthly ministry of Jesus. He employs the doxa/ doxazein word-group forty-one times (compared with Mt eleven times, Mk four times, Lk twenty-two times). The OT notion of the glory of God still persists (5:44; 7:18; 9:24; 11:4, 40; 12:43; etc.), but the primary focus is on the glory of Christ. We are told that Christ dwelt in glory before the Incarnation* (12:41; 17:5, 24), and that during his earthly career this glory was still visible (1:14; 8:54; 11:4; 13:32; 17:1, 5, 10, 22). The Synoptic description has Jesus' glory still veiled, but the Johannine christology makes it primary: "We have beheld his glory" (1:14); "It is my father who glorifies me" (8:54).

This is consonant with the view offered elsewhere in the NT, where the divinity of the Son of God* is inseparable from his glory (1 Cor 2:8; 2 Cor 4:4; Eph 3:16; Heb 1:3; Jas 2:1). When the NT writers reached the conclusion that Christ was eternally one with God, it was left to John to sketch these results into the Messiah's earthly life. Jesus Christ was showing doxa when he revealed the Father through his work. This is especially true for his signs (2:11). But this is also true of Christ's death (see Death of Jesus) which is one more revelation of this glory. In John crucifixion is described as glorification (7:39; 12:16, 23; 13:31; cf. 21:19). It is not just a transport to a realm of glory (as in the Synoptics). It is an unveiling, a fresh radiating of God showing himself once more at work.

This interest in the present glory of the Johannine Christ helps us interpret the Fourth Gospel's repeated use of the term "light"* Since glory is pictured as a radiant quality, light and glory often appear together in the OT (see Is 60:1-3; 58:8 LXX) and in Hellenistic religion (see Hellenism). John employs "light" (phōs) twenty-three times (triple that of any other Gospel) to express the Hebraic thought that in bringing God's glory, so too Christ ushers a divine light into the world (1:4-9; 3:19; 8:12; 12:46).

See also Eschatology; Death of Jesus; Light; Transfiguration.

Gnostic Gospels. See Canon; Gospels (Apocryphal).

GOD

In the canonical Gospels, "God" (theos) is the traditional deity of ancient Israel referred to in the OT; and, as everywhere in the NT, the exclusivist monotheism of ancient Jewish piety, which involves a rejection of all other deities, is the religious orientation adapted to early Christian devotion to Jesus. In the Gospels God is the ultimate authority* and the ultimate good. The Gospels are narratives about Jesus, but his whole significance rests on the claim that God is the source of Jesus' authority, the one whose kingdom (see Kingdom of God) he truly proclaims. That is, though the Gospels are undeniably christological narratives, they are also deeply God-centered. Their whole thrust is that the one whose story they narrate represents God's new overture of revelation, fulfillment and salvation.* In this they agree; but there are also interesting differences in emphasis among the Evangelists in the ways they refer to God, which reflect their varying purposes, situations and destinations (see Redaction Criticism), and may also indicate theological development across the decades that separate them from one another. Also, the Gospels allow us with some confidence to describe important features of Jesus' own experience of, and teaching about God. Jesus' own special sense of God as his Father, to whom he was called to respond as God's obedient Son, probably formed a central feature of Jesus' mission and is reflected in the Gospels.
1. God in the Gospels: General Matters
2. God in the Individual Gospels
3. God in Jesus' Experience and Ministry

Understandably, scholarly study of the Gospels has tended to focus on their presentation of Jesus. But though the Gospels are narratives of Jesus' ministry and are explicitly concerned with presenting his significance (see Gospel [Genre]), they are on a deeper level dominated by God, whom Jesus proclaims and represents as Son (see Son of God) and Christ* The Gospels affirm as valid the OT witness to the unique God of Israel.* Thus, for example, God is the creator who instituted marriage (Mt 19:4-6) and gave divine commandments* through Moses (Mk 7:5-13). But the Evangelists also proffer new information about God's purposes, which are now advanced significantly and definitively in Jesus; and so the Gospels are theological narratives.

1.1. Terminology. (Exact figures for the frequency of the following terms dealt with may vary, depending upon decisions about textual variants and in some cases on the interpretation of particular passages; but the basic patterns of comparative frequencies are not affected.) In addition to the actual term "God" (theos), which is used frequently in each Gospel (48 times in Mark, 51 in Matthew, 122 in Luke, 73 in John), the term "Lord"* (kyrios) is used with reference to God numerous times as well (9 times in Mark, 18 in Matthew, 37 in Luke, 5 in John; the term is also used frequently with reference to Jesus, e.g., Mt 7:21; 8:2; 15:22; Mk 11:3). Many of the uses of kynos for God are in citations of the OT and in expressions derived from the OT (e.g., "angel* of the Lord"), and in these passages the term functions as the Greek translation of the Hebrew OT name for God, Yahweh. For example, twenty-five of the uses of kyrros for God in Luke are in the first two chapters, where the phrasing is so heavily influenced by the OT.

The third frequently used term for God is "Father" (patēr), doubtless the most familiar term for God in Christian tradition and also perhaps the most theologically significant title for God in the NT. Unlike the other terms for God already mentioned—without exception in the Synoptics, and with only a few exceptions in John—"Father" as a title for God appears only in the sayings attributed to Jesus (the Johannine exceptions are in editorial remarks by the Evangelist in 1:14, 18, a saying of Philip in 14:8 and the crowd's claim in 8:41).

But it must be noted that this usage is very unevenly distributed in the Gospels: 4 instances in Mark, 44 in Matthew, 15 in Luke, and 109 in John. An even more remarkable variation appears if one considers only the occurrences of the absolute form, "the Father": once in Mark, twice in Matthew, three times in Luke, seventy-three times in John. Jeremias (1967, 29-35) pointed to such figures as indications of "a growing tendency to introduce the title 'Father' for God into the sayings of Jesus" in the early church (e.g., cf. Mk 3:35 par. Mt 12:50; Mk 14:25 par. Mt 26:29; Mk 10:40 par. Mt 20:23); and he cogently argued that the Gospel of John was particularly reflective of, and influential in, the title "the Father" becoming "the name of God in Christendom."

In addition to John's considerably more frequent use of the absolute form "the Father," we should observe another interesting distinguishing feature in John's use of "Father" for God. In the Synoptics the divine title "Father" is restricted to Jesus' prayers* and his sayings addressed to followers and to audiences made up of followers and the crowds. When speaking to others (e.g., Jewish religious leaders, Satan), Jesus uses theos or kyrions. In John, however, Jesus refers to God as "Father" in sayings addressed to an assortment of characters: (e.g.) the Samaritan* woman* (4:21-23) and hostile critics (e.g., 5:17-47; 6:25-58; 8:12-30, 34-38). Indeed, in John, Jesus' reference to God as his "Father" often functions as the occasion for offense to be taken by critics. That is, "Father," which in the Synoptics denotes the situation of Jesus and his disciples* ("your Father") before God, takes on a sharpened christological function in John as a sometimes polemical term intended primarily to express the exalted status of Jesus. In keeping with this, in the Johannine writings only Jesus is "son" (huios) of God; Jesus' followers are called God's "children" (tekna), a term lacking the connotation of special rights and status implied by "son."

In addition to "God," "Lord" and "Father," there are also indirect forms of speech used to refer to God. There is Jesus' demand of the Jerusalem priests* whether the baptism* ministry of John was "from Heaven*" (Mk 11:30 par. Mt 21:25 and Lk 20:4), the high priest's reference to God as "the Blessed" in the interrogation of Jesus (Mk 14:61; cf. Mt 26:63) and Jesus' reference to God as "the Power" in his reply (Mk 14:62 par. Mt 26:64; cf. Lk 22:69). The several uses of "Most High" in Luke (1:32, 35, 76; 6:35) are to be included as well, though this particular expression is directly indebted to OT usage (e.g., Dan 4:17, 24-25). All these reverential circumlocutions reflect the profound reverence for God characteristic of the Jewish background of Jesus and the early Christian movement.

Moreover, in those passages where certain events "must" (dei) take place to advance or fulfill the redemptive plan, God is to be understood as the one whose purposes make the events necessary (e.g., Mk 8:31; 9:11; 13:7, 10). There are also a number of occurrences of what has been called the divine passive, where actions are described in passive verb forms with no subject explicitly mentioned but where God is to be understood as the subject of the verbs (e.g., Mk 3:28, "all sins will be forgiven [by God]"); Mt 7:1-2,7). Still another type of indirect reference to God is found in all three Synoptic accounts of Jesus' baptism, where the divine acclamation of Jesus is attributed simply to "a voice from heaven" (Mk 1:11 par. Mt 3:17 and Lk 3:22). Likewise, the Transfiguration* accounts attribute the divine acknowledgement of Jesus to "a voice from the cloud" (Mk 9:7 par. Mt 17:5 and Lk 9:35). In both scenes the context requires God to be understood as the one who speaks.

1.2. God's Role. In all the Gospels God is the enveloping presence, the overarching character in the narratives, who, though often referred to by others and only occasionally named as acting directly within the stories, gives the accounts, the characters and actions their whole significance (see Literary Criticism). The entire Gospel narratives in fact consist in the portrayal of God's purpose, and all characters and events in the narratives receive their evaluation and meaning in the light of their relationship to this divine purpose. Several major examples of Gospel characters will suffice to illustrate this. The Baptist (see John the Baptist) is the forerunner of Jesus the Christ, but this in turn depends on the claim that the Baptist was sent by God (e.g., Jn 1:6; Mk 11:27-33). The crowds acclaim Jesus because they see in him some manifestation of what they believe to be God's saving purposes (e.g., Mk 2:12; 11:8-10). It is those who do the will of God who are Jesus' true family, his followers (Mk 3:35 par. Mt 12:50 and Lk 8:21). The Sadducees (see Judaism) oppose Jesus because they are blind to God's power and purposes (Mk 12:24 par. Mt 22:29). Indeed, the ultimate theological irony of the Gospel stories is that the rejection of Jesus by the Jewish religious leaders constitutes the rejection of God's Son, the divinely appointed Christ. They accuse Jesus of blasphemy* (Mk 14:64 par. Mt 26:65 and Lk 22:71) but are themselves guilty of opposing God in the name of God.

Even the significance of Jesus, the explicitly central character in the Gospels, wholly has to do with his relationship to God. Jesus' message announces and interprets the kingdom of God (e.g., Mk 1:14-15, and the parables in Mk 4 par. Mt 13). The demons (see Demon, Devil, Satan) acclaim Jesus in various expressions that all denote his status before God (e.g., "the Holy One of God," Mk 1:24 par. Lk 4:34; "Son of God," Mk 3:11 par. Lk 4:41; Mk 5:7 par. Mt 8:29 and Lk 8:28). Jesus surely claims authority, but either implicitly (e.g., Mk 2:10) or explicitly (e.g., Jn 3:35; 5:19-23; 12:49) indicates that this authority is from God and is intended to promote God's purpose and glory.* In all the Gospels Jesus is the Messiah (Christ), and is often referred to in royal terms (e.g., Mt 21:1-11 ; see Christ). But this must be set in the context of Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God, which makes God as "king" one of the most pervasive, though often implicit, images in the Gospels. Thus, God is the high king whom Jesus the Messiah represents in a unique way as a kind of vice-gerent

Even in John, where we have the most explicitly exalted view of Christ's person presented, everything rests on the claim that Jesus has come from God (e.g., 5:43; 6:57; 8:18; 9:33), Jesus' glorification depends upon God's act (e.g., 17:1). Jesus' exaltation is completed by ascending to God (13:1-3; 14:28), and the claim that Jesus is "the way, the truth, and the life" has to do with the special access he provides to God (14:6).

God is not often directly mentioned as actor in Gospel scenes, but those where God is the actor are of major significance for the larger narratives. The Synoptic scenes of Jesus' baptism and Transfiguration are crucial and function to confirm authoritatively for the readers Jesus' significance as God's Son. In both these scenes, uniquely in the Synoptics, God's voice sounds clearly above the din of conflicting views about Jesus that come from other characters in the narratives. In other words God functions as the ultimate authority and his acclamations of Jesus are (in literary-critical terms) the reliable voice in the narratives by which all other voices are to be judged. Likewise, in the crucifixion scenes (see Death of Jesus) God's rending of the Temple veil (an important example of the divine passive verb form mentioned earlier, Mk 15:38 par. Mt 27:51 and Lk 23:45) functions as divine confirmation of Jesus' significance and of the negative view to be taken of the Temple* leadership who have rejected Jesus.

In John there are no baptismal and Transfiguration acclamations by God. The only time God's voice sounds is in 12:28, giving assurance to Jesus (and the readers) that God will "glorify [God's] name" through Jesus. John emphasizes, however, that Jesus' "works," including the "signs" which figure so prominently, are to be seen as acts of God which confirm Jesus' significance (5:36; cf. 3:2). For example, in the climactic sign, the raising of Lazarus,* Jesus' prayer in 11:41-42 explicitly makes the miracle a divine answer to Jesus' appeal. Through these deeds and through the Scriptures, "the Father has borne witness" to Jesus, making Jesus' status hang entirely on God.

The individual Evangelists employ terminology and references to God in varying ways that reflect something of their individual literary purposes and style and that may also reflect their respective situations in the history of first-century Christianity.

2.1. Mark. In light of the commonly accepted view that Mark is the earliest Gospel (see Synoptic Problem), the references to God in this narrative are especially important historically (see Donahue). Of particular interest are the four references to God as "Father" (always in sayings of Jesus: 8:38; 11:25; 13:32; 14:36). In Mark 8:38 Jesus warns that "the Son of man" (see Son of Man) will be manifested "in the glory of his Father," stating implicitly Mark's christological affirmation which permeates the whole of his Gospel: Jesus, the Son of man of present lowly circumstance, is the Son of God.

The expression "your Father .. . who is in heaven" in Mark 11:25 may give a glimpse of the background to Matthew's familiar way of referring to God (unless one accepts Sparks's proposal that Mk 11:25 is not an original part of Mark).

In Mark 13:32 two things should be noted. First Jesus, "the Son," does not know the time of the end; only God, "the Father," knows (reflecting a subordination of Jesus to God that Luke appears to have softened by omitting the statement from his form of the eschatological discourse in Lk 21). Second, this statement gives us the earliest Gospel use of the absolute forms "the Father" and "the Son" found elsewhere in the Synoptics only in Jesus' much-studied exclamation in Matthew 11:25-27 and its parallel in Luke 10:21-22, but frequent in John.

Finally, Mark 14:36 is unique in the Gospels in attributing to Jesus use of the term abba, used elsewhere in the NT only by Paul in references to early Christian prayer (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6). It is remarkable that Mark (like Paul) in addressing Greek-speaking (and largely Gentile*) readers used this Aramaic expression alongside the Greek term for "father" (*path). Writing for Christians acquainted with abba as a loan-word associated with prayer (as Paul's references indicate), Mark probably intended his readers to see in Jesus' Gethsemane* prayer both a precedent for their own submission to God and a reminder that the basis of their filial relationship to God lay in Jesus' own.

The role of God in the Synoptics as the ultimate reliable voice who confirms Jesus' status as Son of God is especially important in Mark (as Kingsbury has shown), where the question of Jesus' transcendent identity is such an important matter about which the human characters are obtuse, and various voices (e.g., disciples, crowds, Herod,* religious leaders, demons) all make conflicting and inadequate attempts to label Jesus. In an expression unique in the Gospels, Mark 1:14 has Jesus preaching "the gospel* of God" (a phrase found elsewhere in the NT only in Paul; e.g., Rom 1:1; 15:16), which reflects a theocentric emphasis in Mark's presentation of Jesus' message. And Donahue's examination of Jesus' replies to questions in Mark 12 shows that Jesus' teaching here is "theistic rather than explicitly christological" (581), presenting God as the one to whom true allegiance belongs (above what Caesar may claim, 12:13-17), the life-giving deity who will raise the dead and vindicate those who trust in him (12:18-27), and the one God to be loved wholly, whose service is the basis for all other duty (12:28-34). This theistic emphasis is also implicit in Jesus' reply to the demand that he identify his authority (11:27-33), for the readers know that Heaven sent the Baptist to prepare the way for Jesus and that Jesus' authority comes from God also.

2.2. Matthew. Among the Synoptics Matthew uses "Father" for God by far the most frequently (44 times), and is the only Synoptic "which refers to God as "path nearly as often as it uses *theos" (Mowery, 24). As the term appears only on the lips of Jesus, it is not found in Matthew until Jesus begins his teaching ministry in chapter five. The majority of instances of the divine title "Father" (mainly in the forms "your/our heavenly Father," e.g., 5:16, 45; 6:1, 9) in Matthew are in passages where Jesus gives directions and assurances about various duties and situations of discipleship (e.g., seventeen instances in the Sermon on the Mount). Matthew sometimes replaced theos in Markan material with references to God as "Father" (Mt 12:50 par. Mk 3:35; Mt 26:29 par. Mk 14:25). And in the Q* material comparison of Matthew's version of sayings with Luke's suggests that Matthew (or his tradition?) has a special fondness for the paternal image of God (cf. e.g., Mt 5:45 par. Lk 6:35; Mt 6:26 par. Lk 12:24; Mt
Matthew is noted for the large amount of Jesus' teachings about God it contains, in which Jesus memorably emphasizes God's all-seeing, all-knowing faithfulness. Some of this material is unique to Matthew, such as 6:1-8 ("your Father" will reward genuine piety, will hear modest prayer* "in secret" and "knows what you need before you ask him"); and other teaching material is paralleled in Luke (Q material), such as 6:25-34 and its parallel Luke 12:22-32 (God who feeds the birds and "clothes the grass of the field" will provide all you need), and 7:7-11 and its parallel Luke 11:9-13 (approach "your heavenly Father" confidently, for God is much more ready to give "good things" to his own than are earthly fathers). As Donahue observed, Matthew presents a very "'human' and immediate picture of God" (567).

Both Matthew and Luke are structurally distinguished from Mark by a nativity account (see Birth of Jesus) in which God is directly active. In both cases God's actions are described in language influenced by the OT narratives of his works. In Matthew, Mary is "with child of the Holy Spirit" (of God), and an "angel of the Lord" directs Joseph at each major turning point.

Second, Luke is noted for the strong emphasis he places on God's miraculous works throughout Luke-Acts. From the nativity account onward, God acts powerfully to advance his purposes (see, e.g., the poetic exclamations in Lk 1:46-55, 68-79). Some have anachronistically characterized Luke's interest in miracles* as reflecting a theology of glory rather than the cross, but this judgment of Luke through the categories of Protestant polemics of the sixteenth century hardly constitutes proper historical-critical method. Luke's purposes in narrating God's mighty works were to assure readers that God is genuinely in charge of the world* and to provide examples of divine attestation of the Christian message, rather than to provide a theology of the Christian life (and much less to satisfy later critics of particular dogmatic orientations).

Fourth, as reflected, for example, in the uniquely Lukan parables* in chapter fifteen, the God of Luke's Gospel is emphatically merciful and eager to forgive and redeem. The songs of the birth narratives celebrate the sending of the Christ as God's mercy upon those who wait for his redemption (e.g., 1:50, 54, 68-72). The God who orders all things, therefore, does so to accomplish his merciful intentions. In Luke divine providence orders all things in the service of divine mercy.*

2.4. John. We have already noted John's considerably more frequent use of pater as a title for God (109 times, more than twice the number for any other Evangelist), and have observed that in John the title plays a polemical role not associated with the term in the other Gospels. This polemical connotation is particularly clear in 5:18, where Jesus' reference to God as "his own Father" is one of the reasons "the Jews" seek to kill Jesus. In John, more emphatically than in any other Gospel, one cannot honor God without honoring "the Son" (e.g., 3:35-36; 5:22-23; 6:28-29).

This is because John emphasizes the transcendence of God more than the other Evangelists (e.g., 1:18; 6:46). For John the invisible God can now be understood and approached only through the one whom God has sent to declare him, Jesus "the Son" (e.g., 1:18; 14:6-9). This emphasis on God's invisible and transcendent nature makes John resemble other Greco-Roman era Jewish writers, such as Philo of Alexandria (see, e.g., Hagner). But unlike Philo and other ancient Jewish writers who emphasize God's transcendence to criticize pagan religious traditions and to avoid crude anthropomorphism, John underscores God's transcendence and invisibility to undercut competing claims to know the true God from Jews who reject Christ.

When John refers to God's works, it is most often to associate Christ with them. Like God, the Logos* was "in the beginning" (1:1-2), and God's creation was through the Logos (1:3). God, the judge of all who will reward the righteous (set Justice, Righteousness) with resurrection* life, has now given to the Son to share in the judgment* and to "give life to whom he will" (5:21-22,26-29).

Yet this strikingly exalted view of Christ is combined with an equally definite subordination of "the Son" to "the Father." The Son's prominence arises from the Father having given "all things" into the Son's hands (3:35). Believers can come to Christ only as God grants them the ability to respond (6:65). Repeatedly, the exalted Son expresses his subordination and service to the Father, credits the Son's message as given to him by the Father, makes the Son's aim the glory of God and leaves it to God to bring the Son glory (e.g., 5:19; 6:37-40; 8:28-29,38,42,49-50,54; 10:25,29-30,37-38).

Alleging a fundamental incompatibility between them, Sundberg claimed that John combined an older subordinationist christology with a body of "disjunctive" material expressing a newer view, a "binitarian theology rather than christology" in which "the Son is a god like the Father is God" (37). But one suspects that such comments reflect more an inability to grasp Johannine christological sophistication than any actual conflict in the christology of John. There is no indication whatsoever that the Fourth Evangelist noticed any tension between the subordinationist theme and his exalted view of Christ as one with the Father; the author repeatedly and effortlessly expresses both notions within the same or closely adjacent statements (e.g., 10:29-30).

The two passages where Jewish offense is taken at Christ associating himself improperly with God, which Sundberg offers as evidence of a new Johannine christology (5:18; 10:30-33), are not an entirely new feature in the Gospels; there are earlier echoes of the charge of blasphemous christology in Mark (14:64) and Matthew (26:65). Even more importantly, in John the two accusations of what amounts to di-theism are put on the lips of the Jewish opponents of Jesus (and of the Johannine community), who are consistently portrayed by John as failing to understand the truth and as distorting the divine revelation. To be sure, Thomas' exclamation to the risen Christ, "My Lord and my God!" (20:28), represents an escalation of christological rhetoric distinctive in the Gospels, an escalation that probably resulted from, as much as it may have contributed to, Jewish rejection of Christian devotion to Christ. But the veneration of Christ in divine categories reflected in Thomas' exclamation can be traced back far earlier than the Gospel of John to the earliest levels of Christian tradition in the NT (see, e.g., Hurtado).

There is in John no clumsy introduction of a new di-theism in which Christ is a second god. The accusations in 5:19 and 10:30 that portray Jesus as a second god are the complaints of hostile Jewish outsiders who distort the sophisticated monotheism of the Johannine community. John portrays a remarkable balancing of the convictions that Christ is uniquely associated with God and is also the obedient Son who is glorified by the one transcendent God precisely because the Son contentedly subordinates himself to God and seeks God's glory.

3. God in Jesus' Experience and Ministry.

The Gospels reflect and themselves exemplify, adaptations of Jesus tradition to the needs and circumstances of various first-century churches, and one cannot use the Gospels simplistically to describe Jesus' own teachings (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). Still less do the Gospels provide us an unmediated access to Jesus' own religious experience. Nevertheless, there is good reason for confidence in making certain basic claims about Jesus' references to God and perhaps even about Jesus' own religious life. Two major features strongly attested in the Jesus tradition are especially worth noting: (1) Jesus refers to God as his Father, particularly in prayer, and (2) Jesus encourages his followers to use similar language and to relate to God as their Father as well.

Although details of his discussion have been challenged effectively (see, e.g., Barr), Jeremias' investigations into the tradition of Jesus' references to God as Father have proven generally persuasive about several main matten (1967; 1971, 61-67; see also Bauckham, Dunn, Fitzmyer). First Jesus referred to God in a highly personal way (e.g., "my Father") and, especially in prayer, characteristically used the Aramaic term 'abbā to address God. Second, 'abbā constituted an unusual (perhaps unique) form of direct address to God for Jesus' day. Third, Jesus' use of this unusual and rather intimate form for addressing God in prayer suggests strongly that Jesus' religious life was characterized by relating to God in a very intense and personalized way that is not fully paralleled even in other examples of very devout spirituality in the ancient Jewish setting. "Jesus seems to have thought of himself as God's son in a distinctive sense" (Dunn, 38).

This special sense of sonship to God likely provided the experiential impetus of Jesus' mission. The Synoptic baptismal narratives (Mk 1:9-11 par. Mt 3:13-17 and Lk 3:21-22), though stylized and adapted to the didactic needs of first-century churches, are intended to reflect an authentic feature of Jesus' religious experience: the divine acclamation of Jesus as "son" in a special sense, which also entailed the corollary of a special (and representative?) responsibility and mission. The dominant category in Jesus' religious life was probably not messiahship but sonship to God, and from this "his other basic convictions about himself and his mission arose" (Dunn, 39).

If Jesus did believe he had a special relationship with God which was a major part of the basis for his own mission, it is all the more striking that the early Christian tradition so strongly indicates that Jesus also encouraged his followers to relate to God as "Father" in quite an intimate manner. The earliest evidence for this is technically indirect but quite early and strong. In addition to the Gospel tradition about Jesus teaching his disciples to address God as "Father," even earlier and more striking are Paul's references in Galatians 4:6 and Romans 8:15 to Greek-speaking Christian use of abba (along with the normal Greek term for "father," patēr) to address God in prayer (probably in corporate worship settings). These latter passages show that the practice was sufficiently well established already before the time of these letters (50-60 AD.) as to need no introduction. And these remarkable references indicate that 'abbā' was taken over as a loan-word from Aramaic-speaking churches and used in Greek-speaking (heavily Gentile) Christian churches, doubtless on account of the term's strong religious and sentimental connotations. Given that 'abbā' was a highly unusual form for addressing God in prayer in first-century Aramaic, some powerful influence must be posited for the practice becoming sufficiently regularized to have been influential even beyond Aramaic-speaking Christian groups. The only cogent suggestion is that Jesus' own use of 'abba' in prayer and his encouragement to his followers to do the same constitute the powerful originating influence required.

This makes Jesus' understanding of his relationship with God all the more remarkable. The God of Jesus' religious experience was "Father" in an unusually intense manner that involved a powerful sense of personal and special mission.
And the mission to which God called Jesus apparently included extending an unusually intimate relationship to God as "Father" among those who accepted Jesus' proclamation of God's kingdom. Whatever the partial analogies offered (e.g., by Vermes) for Jesus' own intimacy with God among ancient Jewish holy men, there is no parallel for Jesus' sense that God called him to become the pioneer and catalyst for a special filial relationship to God to be enjoyed by his disciples.

See also Christ; Holy Spirit; "I Am" Sayings; Kingdom of God; Logos. Lord; Prayer; Son of God; Wisdom; Worship.

L W. Hurtado

GOLDEN RULE. See Sermon ON THE Mount.

GOLGOTHA. See Death OF Jesus.
GOOD. See ETHICS OF JESUS.

GOOD NEWS. See GOSPEL (GOOD NEWS); JUBILEE.

GOOD SAMARITAN. See PARABLE; SAMARITANS.

GOSPEL (GENRE)

Discussion of the literary genre of the NT Gospels involves two basic issues: (1) the literary nature of the canonical Gospels as continuous prose narratives of Jesus' ministry and their relationship to other early Christian writings; (2) the relationship of the Gospels to their Greco-Roman literary setting. There are two practical purposes served in this discussion: (1) a better understanding of the place of the Gospels in the literary history of early Christianity and the Greco-Roman world; (2) a more intelligent interpretation of the Gospels as their features are illuminated by comparison with their literary background.

Until the 1970s there was practically a consensus that the Gospels constituted a unique literary genre in the Greco-Roman world, and that any apparent analogies with other early Christian writings or from the wider Greco-Roman literary setting were irrelevant. This consensus has been challenged, however, and various scholars have argued that the Gospels are related to one or more types of Greco-Roman literature, most often biographical writings.

It is likely that both sides in the debate have a legitimate point. On the one hand, the Gospels share various characteristics of one or more types of Greco-Roman literature and in light of this can be likened to certain literary genres of that period. Moreover, we should expect that the NT authors would have been influenced by general literary conventions and practices of their day. Yet the NT Gospels also exhibit a certain uniqueness and thus form at least a partially distinctive category or subgenre. That is, the Evangelists, though influenced by their literary environment, seem to have produced works whose origin and characteristics are to be understood most directly in terms of the early Christian groups for which the Gospels were written.

1. Definition and Significance of Genre
2. The Scholarly Debate
3. The Genre of the Gospels
4. Conclusion
1. Definition and Significance of Genre.

A literary genre is a category or type of literature, such as biography or novel. Literary genres are not universal and static categories but have developed and changed over time, and genres popular in one age or culture may not be found in another. Even if a genre, such as biography, appears in more than one period or culture, the specific characteristics of the genre will often vary significantly in the different settings.

In seeking to determine a writing's genre, therefore, we must work with the genres and literary conventions relevant to the era of the writing. Thus, for example, the question of the genre(s) of the Gospels must be addressed by examining their characteristics in comparison with the types of literature current in the Greco-Roman setting (or at least accessible to the authors). Genres are to be thought of in terms of clusters of characteristics or traits. The analysis of a work's relation to literary genres should involve comparison of all the characteristics of the relevant genres and of the work in question. Emphasis on isolated characteristics of a work can produce misleading conclusions. A writing can be associated with a particular genre only to the degree that all the characteristics of the writing can be understood adequately in terms of the features of the genre.

The sorts of characteristics and factors to be considered in trying to determine a writing's genre include the following: formal features (e.g., structure, style, motifs, devices), author's intention, compositional process, setting of author, setting of intended use, and contents. Every reader brings expectations to a writing that shape the reading process and affect how the writing is understood. Acquaintance with the genre of a writing allows one's understanding of a writing to be guided in light of the features and intentions that characterize the genre. If an author sets out to write in accordance with the conventions and features of a particular genre, it may be comparatively easy to identify the genre of the writing.

But sometimes things are not so easy. For example, if an author adapts a genre to achieve a purpose not ordinarily associated with that genre, or if an author simply does not follow very methodically the full conventions of a given genre, it may be much more difficult to categorize the writing. In any case, identifying a writing's genre requires informed judgment that must be based on familiarity with the writing and its literary and social context.
2. The Scholarly Debate.

The question of the genre of the Gospels is basically a modern issue, characteristic of the modern historical investigation of the NT. Our cultural and chronological distance from the first-century setting and our modern desire to overcome this distance through accurate knowledge of the past fuel the attempt to analyze the Gospels in their literary context. It is interesting to note that the discussion of this topic has been related to wider developments in Gospel studies.

2.1. The Earlier Consensus. In 1915 C. W. Votaw argued that the Gospels can be likened to the popular biographical literature of the Greco-Roman era. But in 1923, in reply to Votaw, K. L. Schmidt argued influentially that the Gospels are a unique type of early Christian writing, not explainable by reference to any other type of literature of the ancient world. This position became the standard view among NT scholars, virtually unchallenged until recent decades.

Schmidt's case reflected in part the distinction made earlier by F. Overbeck, in which the NT was portrayed as relatively unsophisticated in comparison to the more polished literature of the classical authors and the Christian writings of the late second century and thereafter. Also, Schmidt reflected the approach of early form criticism,* which tended to view the Gospels basically as collections of the Jesus traditions of early Christian communities and minimized the role of the Evangelists as authors. Moreover, form critics emphasized that the impetus for the Gospels was not literary but kerygmatic (from the Gk kerygma, "proclamation"). That is, form criticism emphasized that the Gospels embody the early Christian proclamation of the significance of Jesus and were written exclusively to serve this proclamation.

2.2. The Re Opening of the Question. By the 1970s there was a renewed investigation of the relationship of the Gospels to Greco-Roman literature. This reexamination of the previous consensus seems to have arisen in part from developments in Gospel studies (in the 1950s and subsequently) that balanced the form-critical view of the Gospels as collections of tradition with emphasis on the role of the Evangelists as effective editors of the tradition (redaction criticism*) and/or as authors who significantly determined the nature of their narratives of Jesus (recent literary criticism* of the Gospels). Although some early contributions to the renewed question of the genre of the Gospels posited a classification of them as "aretalogies" (purported narratives of divine men* in antiquity), this category has not proven viable for a variety of reasons (e.g., see Kee), including the lack of evidence for such a literary genre so defined in antiquity.

Scholars who now propose links between the Gospels and Greco-Roman literature focus on one of three genres: biography, history or novel. The modern discussion has also raised the question of whether the Gospels belong to one genre collectively or must be classified individually in different genres. Most of those who have addressed the genre of the Gospels, however, have tended to emphasize possible connections with the genre of Greco-Roman popular biography.

Proper consideration of the genre of the Gospels involves a variety of factors, and the variations among the four canonical accounts make it wise to treat them individually.

3.1. Basic Factors. There are, of course, formal features of the Gospels that must be considered. The Gospels are all narratives about Jesus that include examples of his deeds and sayings in a loose chronological framework that concentrates on the period between the beginning of his ministry and his death/resurrection. They are not impartial accounts; they all enthusiastically endorse Jesus and are quite negative in their treatment of any opposition to Jesus. In the case of Matthew and Luke, there are birth accounts attached that seem likewise intended to show dramatically the significance of Jesus (see Birth of Jesus).

The narrative mode of the canonical Gospels and their general shape as accounts of Jesus' ministry and death/resurrection set them apart from the surviving apocryphal Gospels (see Gospels [Apocryphal]). The latter form an assortment of writings about Jesus that include revelation/sayings collections (e.g., Gospel of Thomas), fanciful narratives of Jesus' childhood (the several so-called Infancy Gospels), and other writings that may be likened a bit more to the canonical Gospels but are also shaped by different religious interests (e.g., Gospel of Peter). The distinctive form of the Gospels in comparison with other early Christian literature justifies viewing them as a group or subgroup unto themselves in the literary history of early Christianity.

Though they exhibit distinguishing features as continuous narratives concerned with Jesus' ministry, the canonical Gospels can be likened to genres of Greco-Roman literature, particularly popular biography of that era (see, e.g., Aune 1987, 17-76). Indeed, in some cases there are specific formal features of a Gospel that directly reflect literary practices of the ancient setting (e.g., Luke's preface in 1:1-4 and the prefaces to Greco-Roman literary works).

In addition to the narrative form of the Gospels, however, we should consider their contents. Here also, the Gospels can be likened to other examples of Greco-Roman biographical writings that promote a particular hero (see, e.g., Talbert, "Biographies"; and Tiede). But the NT Gospels also diverge from general Greco-Roman literary culture. For example, though the Gospels may often reflect Greco-Roman themes, values and literary motifs (e.g., Luke's presentation of Jesus' death as heroic martyrdom, the motif of important teaching and events set at meal scenes, or the motif of the teacher and his disciples), more fundamentally the Evangelists invoke the OT (e.g., the many allusions and citations) and specifically early Christian beliefs in their presentation of Jesus (e.g., Jesus as "Christ"). These distinguishing features did not render their narratives more meaningful or harmonious with the literary and cultural tastes of the Greco-Roman world, and this indicates that the Evangelists were by no means simply patterning their narratives after genres of contemporary literature. Likewise, if we take into account the compositional process that probably lies behind the Gospels, there are general similarities with some types of Greco-Roman writings but also significant differences.

The Gospel writers did not invent the idea of narrating Jesus' ministry. We must surely grant some (in some places considerable) authorial contribution to the finished products. But both in many features of their form and in most of their contents (or all, depending on one's critical opinion), the Gospels reflect the Jesus tradition of Christian groups. That is, the immediate setting that shaped the work of the Evangelists was not the literary activities of the larger Greco-Roman era but the religious and social activities, needs and questions of early Christianity.

In the case of accounts of some figures associated with particular philosophical traditions (e.g., Socrates, Pythagoras), there may have been bodies of tradition about these individuals that were carried along in the groups that revered their memory. This would provide a general similarity to the Gospels' relationship to the Jesus tradition. Nevertheless, there appears to be no direct analogy to the rather considerable Jesus tradition available to the Evangelists, the massive preoccupation with proclaiming and teaching about Jesus, and the rather exclusive claims made on his behalf in the early Christian movement

The popularity of biographical writings in the Greco-Roman era may have conditioned the Evangelists to find the writing of their books about Jesus a worthy task. But the major reason biography-like accounts of Jesus appeared is that the early Christian message from the first was focussed on Jesus as the personal vehicle of revelation and redemption (see, e.g., Stanton). The impetus, basic contents and general narrative complexion of the Gospels reflect primarily the Jesus-centered proclamation of early Christianity.

That the Gospels do not explicitly name their authors is evidence of their highly traditional nature. Contrary to the frequent literary practice of the Greco-Roman era, the Gospels do not convey their author's identities (the present superscriptions were added after the Gospels began to be circulated, probably when they were circulated as a fourfold collection). With the exception of Luke-Acts, the Gospels do not have such common literary devices as prefaces either. These things suggest that in general the Evangelists did not see themselves primarily as authors writing for a general audience, but more likely as "servants [hypēretai] of the word" (Lk 1:2).

Furthermore, the intended and characteristic use of the Gospels is somewhat distinctive. As indicated already, the Evangelists did not write for the general public but for the Christian groups with which they were associated. Suggestions that the Gospels were composed to fit some fixed lectionary schedule have been judged implausible. But the Gospels were apparently intended for corporate reading and teaching within Christian groups and quickly found a role in their liturgical activities. Although some Greco-Roman biographical writings may have been intended primarily for followers of a particular philosophical tradition, the close association of the Gospels with early Christian worship and proclamation suggests that we should see them as church documents with a certain biographical character rather than as biographies with a religious tone.

Furthermore, in Greco-Roman biography the central figure is glorified in terms of values that do not really derive from the figure or rest on his authority. Instead, the biographer shows the main character to be a model who embodies the virtues (sometimes the vices) already recognized by the writer and expected readers. The biographer seeks to show the essence of the main figure by recounting incidents and sayings that display and prove his character.
Although the Evangelists portray Jesus in ways that seem intended to dispose the Christian readers to find encouragement and inspiration to live as his followers, we can hardly say that the Gospels focus on the essence of Jesus' character or emphasize Jesus primarily as a model of particular virtues. In fact, they supply surprisingly little about Jesus' personality or character. The Evangelists were mainly concerned to show Jesus' significance in the divine purpose, not his virtues. Thus, in emphasis and aim, as in several other respects, the Gospels exhibit distinctive features that do not derive from Greco-Roman literary genres.

3.2. Mark. Commonly regarded today as the earliest of the NT Gospels and the major narrative source of Matthew and Luke, it is important to try to understand the features of Mark and the forces that shaped this influential narrative. Matthew and Luke are called "Synoptic" Gospels because of their strong resemblance to Mark, making the question of the genre of Mark at least partially relevant for these other two Gospels as well (see Synoptic Problem).

It has long been recognized that Mark and the other Synoptics are composed of traditions about Jesus that circulated in the early churches and that can be classified into broad types of Jesus material (e.g., parables,* miracle* stories, chreia* or pronouncement stories, passion narratives,* etc.). These all exhibit in various ways rhetorical features of popular-level oral narratives as these were adapted in the proclamation and life of early Christianity. In the general narrative style of Mark as well, there is evidence of the continuing impact of oral narration. This indicates that the Gospels are not simply literary works, but are constructed in close connection with the teaching and preaching activities of early Christianity.

Some have noted that the plot or shape of Mark's story of Jesus reflects the general structure of Greek tragedy (introduction, rising action, climax/crisis, falling action, catastrophe, denouement), and a few have suggested that the Evangelist was influenced directly by this form of literature (e.g., Bilezikian, Standaert). But most scholars (e.g., Aune 1987, 48-49) believe that the resemblances are to a large extent coincidental, and that Mark's plot reflects the broad narrative structure of pre-Markan Jesus tradition in which Jesus' ministry, death and resurrection were portrayed in terms of a general structure found in widespread literature of a variety of ancient cultures: a righteous person undergoes opposition, persecution and vindication. This judgment seems correct, for not only Matthew and Luke but also John's Gospel (which is not usually thought to have been directly dependent on the Synoptics) reflect essentially this basic plot (see Synoptics and John).

Some features of Mark (and of Matthew and Luke as well) are characteristic of ancient biography (e.g., anecdotal narrative style, absence of character growth), but there are no indications that the author was consciously shaping his work in the light of any literary precedents or patterns. If we ask, however, how the Evangelist came to compose a written narrative of Jesus in the form he did, it may be that very general literary influences can be included in the answer.

Surely the primary reasons Mark took pen in hand were the perceived needs of the Christians for whom he wrote, and the immediate influences on him stemmed from the religious circles in which the writer worked. But it may well be that the developing popularity of biography as a literary vehicle in the Greco-Roman era (see, e.g., Cox, Momigliano) helped make it seem logical or appropriate to the author to produce the first book narrating Jesus' ministry, though it is difficult to say whether such general influence was perceived consciously by the author. That is, the relevance of the genre of Greco-Roman biography for a historical explanation of Mark may be less in terms of direct or specific similarities and influence and more in terms of the general climate that contributed to the author's decision to serve Christ and Christians through his pioneering written work.

3.3. Matthew and Luke. In comparison with Mark, both Matthew and Luke reflect a somewhat higher literary level and exhibit more features that can be compared with characteristics of Greco-Roman biographical literature. Aune refers to Matthew and Luke as early stages of the "literaturization," the more direct appropriation of literary tastes, that went on in early Christianity in the first few centuries.

In addition to their birth accounts, additional features such as the genealogies* and post-resurrection appearance/vindication scenes, make Matthew and Luke seem closer to ancient biographies of figures described as sons of gods or divine. Also, both Matthew and Luke have a more refined Greek style in comparison to Mark. In short, Matthew and Luke allow more scope for positing influence of the Greco-Roman literary environment Nevertheless, like Mark, Matthew and Luke seem to have taken their major stimuli from, and had their primary connections with, the religious life of early Christianity. And the Christian matrix of these works has produced a profound adaptation of whatever Greco-Roman literary influences we can detect.

In Matthew, for example, Jesus is presented largely in terms of ideas, values and issues that stem from the OT and the Jewish and early Christian setting. The genealogy links Jesus with great figures of the OT and with the history of Israel. Like other subjects of Greco-Roman biography, Jesus is presented in Matthew as the great teacher. But in Matthew Jesus' teaching is presented thoroughly in terms of the vocabulary and motifs of the Jewish and early Christian background, which are often noticeably different from those of the general literary culture. For example, the citation of numerous OT prophecies as fulfilled by Jesus probably reflects the narrative style of OT historical books (esp. 1 Sam —2 Kings), which likewise make fulfillment of the words of prophets a major device in their accounts.

Shuler has offered a definition of Matthew as a type of laudatory biography he calls "encomium biography," but this proposal is inadequate for several reasons. All ancient biographies were either laudatory and sought the same basic objectives as the rhetorical category of speeches called encomium or (occasionally) were condemnatory and critical. Shuler's category is not recognized in ancient sources and is too vague and broad to be of use. And Shuler is surely wide of the mark when he refers to Matthew as an attempt to relate the Evangelist's message "to the society in which he lived." The many indications that the Evangelist presumed an acceptance of the OT as Scripture and Christian beliefs and vocabulary as normative show that Matthew was written as an in-house document for the encouragement and edification of fellow Christians, not for the general public.

It is with Luke that scholars usually find the closest analogies to Greco-Roman literature. The author is believed to have drawn upon Mark as his major narrative source, but the use of a formal preface (Lk 1:1-4; cf. Acts 1:1) and chronologies (Lk 2:1-2; 3:1-2) are only two more obvious indications that this Evangelist consciously drew upon literary conventions of his time as well in composing his account. The scholarly attempt to categorize Luke in terms of a particular genre, however, has not resulted in agreement on what genre is preferable.

A major difficulty in reaching agreement is that one must take into account the second part of the Evangelist's work, the Acts of the apostles. Talbert has proposed that the combined work, Luke-Acts, is an integral work and represents a particular type of biography designed to show the valid succession of a tradition, in this case the tradition of Jesus in the ministry of the apostles featured in Acts. Others who agree that the genre of Luke must be decided in light of Acts have argued (e.g., Aune) that the two-volume work is an example of Greco-Roman historiography, in this case a history of the Christian message that begins with Jesus and continues on through to the Pauline Gentile mission.

Praeder, however, analyzed Luke-Acts as a Christian adaptation of the Greco-Roman genre of novel. Indeed, she regards all four canonical Gospels similarly, though she grants that their contents, setting and intended uses require that they be taken as forming a separate sub-genre within the genre of "the ancient novel." Still others (e.g., Pervo) see as misguided the attempt to categorize Luke by reference to Acts, and have urged that there is no reason why Luke and Acts cannot be linked to different genres. Pervo regards Acts as most closely related to the Greco-Roman genre of novel, but seems to consider Luke an example of popular biography.

In view of these disagreements among scholars with special competence in Greco-Roman literature, perhaps the wisest course is to recognize the limitations inherent in approaching the Gospels, even Luke with its clear appropriation of Greco-Roman literary devices and techniques, in terms of Greco-Roman literary genres alone. To be sure, the author of Luke seems to have had direct acquaintance with formal literary conventions of the Greco-Roman era and both unconsciously and consciously drew on them in producing Luke-Acts. But the same author also shows a rich familiarity with, and the influence of, other aspects of his more immediate background in early Christian circles, as shown in his linguistic style (which is much influenced by the LXX) and in various motifs drawn from the OT.

Also, in view of the fluidity in Greco-Roman literary genres and the influences of genres on one another, it is wise to be cautious about invoking a specific literary genre as the key to Luke (or Luke-Acts) on the basis of selected features of the work. For example, Greco-Roman historiography seems not to have conformed Strictly to the standards espoused by the ancients who tried to define the literary genre. Popular historiography incorporated narrative features (such as fictional embroidering of events and dialogs) associated also with novels. Likewise, what may be termed historical novels affected a style like popular historiography. Biography too was not a tightly defined genre. Authors wishing to portray a great person had a variety of literary styles and approaches they could adapt.

In summary, Luke's appropriation of particular features of Greco-Roman literary practice can be demonstrated and our grasp of the literary texture of Luke-Acts has been enhanced as a result. In spite of the scholarly disagreement mentioned, given the author's expressed intention (Lk 1:1-4) and taking Luke-Acts as a work of unified intention, the closest broad genre with which to compare Luke-Acts is probably Greco-Roman historiography. But Luke-Acts is a historical account with a sizable biographical component (Luke) and a certain amount of authorial freedom exercised in portraying dramatic scenes; and the whole was governed primarily by the ethos and needs of the Christians for whom the Evangelist wrote.

3.4. John. Not nearly as much scholarly effort has been spent on John's relationship to Greco-Roman literature. Talbert has classified John (with Mk) as an innovative example of a biography intended to correct a misunderstanding of the central character. But Talbert's categories are his own rather than those recognized by ancient writers, and his view of John as advocating a corrective christology is not widely shared.

Most scholars tend to see John as written mainly to consolidate a particular Christian community's tradition and to guide the community in the aftermath of a bitter conflict with Jewish synagogue authorities. John is both broadly similar to the Synoptics and quite distinctive in features of contents, style and arrangement. In place of a birth account and genealogy, 1:1-14 makes Jesus' birth the personal, historical manifestation of the divine Word (logos*). In place of the parables and pronouncement stories, there are extensive dialogs (e.g., 3:1-21; 4:4-26) and discourses (esp. chaps. 14—16) in which Jesus delivers teachings. The dialog was a well-established literary motif in Greco-Roman literature.

The narrative order exhibits differences from the Synoptics also (e.g., the Temple incident in chap. 2), and the overall arrangement is distinctive (e.g., linkage of Jesus' movements with Jewish feasts) as is the vocabulary (e.g., "signs," "eternal life"). Nevertheless, John is much more easily compared with the other canonical Gospels than with any other type of ancient literature, non-Christian or Christian.

There are also interesting similarities between John and the Synoptic accounts in particular incidents such as the feeding account. The similarities show that common features were shared by different streams of the Jesus tradition. John seems to show also that the idea of a written narrative of Jesus' ministry suggested itself to more than one Christian independently in the latter decades of the first century. And it is likely that common factors, such as the general situation of the Christian movement at that time, plus, perhaps, the general literary climate, helped make the composition of a written account of Jesus' ministry seem an appropriate service to provide.

4. Conclusion.

Although there are numerous differences among them, the four canonical Gospels exhibit a basically similar type of Jesus literature: (1) connected narratives of his ministry, death and resurrection; (2) composed out of the Jesus tradition; (3) reflecting and serving early Christian proclamation; (4) intended for Christian readers and presupposing their beliefs and vocabulary. Their general formal characteristics and/or the beliefs they affirm set them apart from other early Christian literature, canonical and non-canonical, in varying ways and degrees. They thereby constitute a distinctive group of writings within early Christianity.

Similarities to other Greco-Roman narrative genres such as biography reflect the cultural setting in which the Gospels were written. The Greco-Roman genres provide partially analogous writings that help us understand better some particular features of the Gospels, and may certainly help us see the literary expectations and categories through which non-Christian readers in particular may have viewed the Gospels. It is likely that the Evangelists consciously and, perhaps more often, unconsciously reflected features of Greco-Roman popular literature.

The Gospels are not fully explainable, however, simply in terms of the Greco-Roman literary setting or by linking them with literary genres of that era. The impetus for the Gospels derives from the religious complexion and needs of early Christianity; and their contents, presuppositions, major themes and literary texture are all heavily influenced by their immediate religious setting as well. In very general terms, the Gospels can be likened to other examples of Greco-Roman popular biography, but they also form a distinctive group within that broad body of ancient writings.

See also GOSPELS (APOCRYPHAL).

L. W. Hurtado

GOSPEL (GOOD NEWS)

Gospel, or "good news," designates Jesus' message of the appearance of God's* kingdom (see Kingdom of God), a message entailing liberty for those held captive to any form of affliction and demonstrated most dramatically in acts of healing.* In some instances the term encompasses the whole story of the life, death* and resurrection* of Jesus.

1. Terminology, Distribution and Origins
2. Luke
3. Matthew and Mark

1. Terminology, Distribution and Origins.

Matthew (4 x) and Mark (8 x, including Mk 16:15) use the noun form euangelion (the message of "good news"), which is usually the object of the verb kēryssō ("to preach"). Luke (10 x) makes exclusive use of the verb form euangelizō (the activity of "preaching good news"), except in Luke 7:22, a citation from Isaiah 61:1 (par. Mt 11:5). Neither term appears in John. The general usage of these terms appears to be consistent with their etymology: the eu- prefix meaning "well, good" and angellō, meaning "to proclaim news."

Each Evangelist uses these terms in a distinctive manner. In six of the eight instances of gospel in Mark (including Mk 16:15) it appears as a Markan expansion (Mk 1:1, 14-15; 8:35; 10:29; 16:15) which is not followed by either Matthew or Luke. Mark uses the term absolutely (i.e., without qualification), except in Mark 1:1 ("of Jesus Christ") and 1:14 ("of God," i.e., the kingdom of God; see Mk 1:15). Matthew, on the other hand, where he parallels Mark either omits gospel (Mt 4:17 par. Mk 1:14-15; Mt 16:25 par. Mk 8:35), replaces it with another term (Mt 19:29 par. Mk 10:29) or in the two cases where he does include it he specifies it ("this gospel of the kingdom," Mt 24:14 par. Mk 13:10; "this gospel," Mt 26:13 par. Mk 14:9). Two other occurrences in Matthew are formulaic summary statements preceding extended teachings of Jesus (Mt 4:23 introduces the Sermon on the Mount [sue Sermon on the Mount]); Mt 9:35 the commission of the Twelve). Here too Matthew qualifies "gospel" with "of the kingdom." According to W. Marxsen (123-24) these summary statements (not paralleled in Mark) are composed of Markan terminology, but one should note that Matthew 9:35 finds a parallel in Luke 8:1, where the verbal form (euangelizō) appears. The remaining occurrence in Matthew is also paralleled in Luke (Mt 11:5 par. Lk 7:22). Here the verbal form is used by both Evangelists as they present Jesus' citation of Isaiah 61:1 in answer to John the Baptist's (see John the Baptist) question from prison.

Except for the two Matthean parallels just noted, all occurrences of the term in Since each Evangelist engages a distinctive use of euangelion and euangelizō, the terms themselves may well be traceable to the redactional level. In his Gospel Luke uses the verbal form exclusively and reserves the use of the noun until Acts, where it is used of the apostolic preaching (Peter in Acts 15:7; Paul in Acts 20:24). It will be argued below that the appearance of the verb in Luke's Gospel stems from its use in Isaiah 40—66, especially Isaiah 61:1. Only Luke records Jesus' reading and self-application of Isaiah 61:1 at the synagogue* in Nazareth.

The origins of the singular noun form to euangelion, appearing in Mark and Matthew, are not traceable directly to the LXX. The LXX uses only the plural ta euangelia for "the reward for good news" and the feminine he euangelia for "good news" and does not use either term in a religious sense (Friedrich, 725). Euangelion was used in the Roman imperial cult and applied to the emperor, who was thought to be divine, in the oral proclamations of his birth, his coming of age and especially of his accession to the throne (Friedrich, 724-25). While the singular noun form does have this Roman usage, it will be shown that the background of the term in Mark and Matthew is thoroughly rooted in the OT. The appearance of euangelion probably stems from Mark since there are no indications that it was present in any pre-Markan traditions (see Marxsen, 117-25).

The reader of the Gospels must be wary of reading a post-Easter definition into the Evangelists' use of the term gospel (such as is found in Pauline writings, 1 Cor 15:14; Rom 1:24). In the Synoptics it is found in the mouth of Jesus at the beginning of his ministry: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe in the gospel" (Mk 1:14-15; cf. Mt 4:17, 23; Lk 4:18, 43). They use the term to designate Jesus' message without prior definition, implying that it was a term known to their audience.

The term gospel shows an affinity to Jesus' association with John the Baptist. Angels* use the term to announce the births of both John (Lk 1:19) and Jesus (Lk 2:10; see Birth of Jesus). Luke describes John's ministry as "preaching good news" (Lk 3:18), and once he is imprisoned Jesus himself begins to "preach good news" (Lk 4:14-21, 43). Later, when John from prison asks Jesus if he is "the one to come," Jesus responds affirmatively by saying that "the poor have the good news preached to them" (Lk 7:22). Finally, when addressing the Pharisees,* Jesus says that from the time of John the Baptist "the good news of the kingdom of God is being preached" (Lk 16:16).

We should also note the affinity between these appearances of the term gospel and Isaiah 40—66. This affinity may imply that both John and Jesus in part derived their understanding of their ministries from Isaiah 40—66, much of which announces the restoration of Jews in Babylonian captivity back to their homeland. Luke describes John the Baptist's ministry by a citation from Isaiah 40:3-5: He is the "voice of one calling in the desert" (see Mountain and Wilderness) to "prepare the way for the Lord" and the appearance of his "salvation"* (Lk 3:4-6).

Luke 4:16-21 clarifies what Jesus' audiences in the Third Gospel would have understood by the term gospel. Luke appears to have transposed this story, which in Mark 6:1-6 and Matthew 13:53-58 occurs toward the end of Jesus' Galilean ministry, intentionally placing it near the beginning of his Gospel. In fact Luke 4:14-15 with verse 23 implies that Jesus went to Capernaum and performed miracles* there before going to Nazareth. Luke makes this scene in Nazareth (Lk 4:1443) his counterpart to Mark 1:14-15. Note, for example, how Luke's "Today this scripture has been fulfilled . . ." (Lk 4:21) corresponds to Mark's "The time is fulfilled" (Mk 1:15). Luke's setting the story at the beginning of Jesus' ministry draws the reader's attention to its programmatic significance.

After John's imprisonment (3:20) Jesus goes to Galilee* and to the synagogue of his own hometown of Nazareth (Lk 4:16). There he reads from Isaiah 61:1-2a (LXX, with an insertion from Is 58:6, "to send the oppressed away in liberty"), which proclaims liberation from Babylonian captivity (see, e.g., Is 61:3-4). By declaring that "today this scripture is fulfilled in your hearing" (Lk 4:21) Jesus identifies himself with the one upon whom the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) of the Lord* rests "to preach good news (euangelisasthai)." "To preach good news" is twice paralleled by another verb of speaking, "to proclaim" (kēryxai, Lk 4:18, 19): The content of this good news is thus associated with proclaiming "liberty"
(aphesis), "recovery of sight" and "the favorable year of the Lord."

The recipients of these four messages and of the action of "sending away in liberty" are the helpless and afflicted: "the poor" (see Rich and Poor), "the captives," "the blind" (see Blindness and Deafness) and "the oppressed." Of the five messages/actions on behalf of the helpless, Luke will single out the preaching of good news as the summary characterization of Jesus' ministry (Lk 4:43; 8:1; 9:6; 20:1). In this respect the other four simply unpack the significance of "preaching good news." In Luke 4 the task that appears most strongly associated with "preaching good news" is that of healing, which is suggested in the phrase "recovery of sight to the blind." After this reading Jesus is aware that his audience will demand such acts of healing, but he notes that both Elijah and Elisha (see Elijah and Elisha) had performed healings for outsiders, not for those of their homeland (Lk 4:23-27). (Elijah was sent to a widow near Sidon, whose son he cured, and the only leper that Elisha healed was Naaman the Syrian, 1 Kings 17:17-24; 2 Kings 5.)

Jesus is met with a twofold response. After he claimed to be the herald preaching the good news that the favorable year of the Lord has arrived, "all spoke well of him" (Lk 4:22). But after he specified that "the poor" to whom this good news was addressed may well be outsiders and not those of the in-group, namely those of his own hometown/land, they "were furious" (Lk 4:28). Thus in Jesus' view the recipients of this "good news" are to be the helpless in general—their "worthiness" is not to be determined by their religious standing or national allegiance. It is this understanding of the "good news" that leads to Jesus' rejection (see Sanders).

Behind the "good news" of Isaiah 61 may be the metaphor of the "year of Jubilee" (Lev 25) in which debts were forgiven, slaves set free and lands restored to the original families (see Jubilee). The original significance of such an allusion would be obvious for the captives in Babylon: They would be set free and restored to their homeland. In the Hebrew Masoretic Text the phrase "to proclaim liberty (d'rôr) to captives" uses a technical term for this "year of Jubilee" (Lev 25:10; Jer 34:8, 15, 17; cf. Ezek 46:17). The LXX translates this and another Hebrew technical term associated with the year of Jubilee (yôbêl, esp. in Lev 25) with the Greek apphasis.

The possibility of an allusion to the year of Jubilee is increased in the Lukan context of Jesus' two modifications of the Isaiah reading. First, he inserts a phrase from Isaiah 58:6 (LXX) between Isaiah 61:1 and 2. This phrase also contains the term aphesis (though it is here used to translate a different Hebrew word associated with setting slaves free), thus drawing further attention to this "liberty" of Jubilee. Second, Jesus breaks off the quote in the middle of Isaiah 61:2, thus omitting the other object of the verb "proclaim"— "the day of vengeance of our God." Jesus, by suddenly closing off the reading, draws his listeners' attention to his proclamation of "the year of the Lord's favor."

If Isaiah 61 alludes to the year of Jubilee and if this is Jesus' interpretation of the passage, he is not alone. The Qumran text llQMelch 1-4, 9 explicitly makes this connection. The year of Jubilee described in Leviticus 25:13 as applied to the "last days" is seen to refer to the liberation of the captives and to the "year of favor" mentioned in Isaiah 61:1-2.

In Luke 4:43 Jesus describes his own ministry in Galilee, which includes the incident in Nazareth, as "preaching the good news of the kingdom of God" (basileia tou theou, note also Lk 16:16). The connection between "good news" and God's kingly rule is also evident in Isaiah 40—66. In two key passages from these chapters a "herald of good news" (euangelizo-menos) announces that the Lord is returning to Jerusalem as a victorious warrior-king (Is 40:9-10; 52:7). These instances are consistent with earlier OT usage of "good news" (MT, bšr and cognates; LXX, euangel- and cognates), where it most often refers to messages of military victory (e.g., 2 Sam 4:10; 18:19-28, 31; Ps 68:11-12; Nahum 1:15). In Isaiah 52:7 the herald's message is "Your God reigns!" (LXX, "will reign," basileusei; cf. Ps 96:2,10). In Isaiah 40:9-10 the message is "Behold, your God! Behold ... his arm rules...." But in the Targum* the message of the "herald of good news" is identical in both passages: "The kingdom of your God is revealed." llQMelch 15-19 explicitly equates the "herald who proclaims .. . 'Your God has now claimed his kingdom' " in Isaiah 52:7 with "the one anointed with the Spirit" in Isaiah 61:1. As the herald of good news proclaims "peace" in Isaiah 52:7, so he, as "the one anointed," "comforts all who mourn" in Isaiah 61:2. Furthermore, we should note evidence that in Palestinian Judaism,* both before and after the time of Jesus, there was the expectation of a herald of good news who would come and announce the revelation of God as king, along with his salvation and peace* (Friedrich, 715-16).

Luke 7:22 (par. Mt 11:5) also refers to Isaiah 61:1 with the words "the poor have good news preached to them." Jesus uses the phrase, along with another phrase from Isaiah 61:1, "the blind receive their sight," in responding to the Baptist's question whether or not he is "the coming one" (ho erchomenos, Lk 7:19-20). This designation is so general it may not point to any single eschatological figure mentioned in the OT (see, e.g., Ps 118:26; Dan 7:13; 9:26; Mai 3:1; Gen 49:10; Hab 2:3). Coming from John the Baptist, this expression has most direct reference to his earlier claim that "he who is mightier than I is coming" (erchetai, Lk 3:16). The people's question to which the Baptist's claim responds may imply that this "coming one" is "the Christ" (Lk 3:15). But his further description of this personage (Lk 3:16-17) appears to be derived from the Elijah-messenger foretold in Malachi 3:1-2; 4:1, 5 (erchetai in 3:1), one who announces a fiery purge. Jesus' reply to John in Luke 7:22, however, presents a personage foretold in Isaiah, one who heralds liberty for captives. Jesus' point, therefore, is to answer yes to the Baptist's question but also to specify "the coming one" as one who is preaching good news, not fiery judgment.* (In this light Jesus' comment in Lk 7:23 makes clear sense.) Again we should observe the close connection made between the preaching of the gospel and healing, both in Isaiah 61:1 and in this Lukan passage (see Lk 7:21). We should also note that in his answer to John, Jesus refers to other OT passages—all from Isaiah (Is 29:18; 35:5-6; 26:19).

Each of the above occurrences of the term "to announce the gospel" appears in connection with the pairing of Jesus and John the Baptist and with an echo of Isaiah 40—66. Subsequent appearances of the term in Luke do not add any nuances or overtones to the term; it is used simply as a designation for Jesus' message (Lk 8:1; 9:6; 20:1). Like Luke 4:43, Luke 8:1 specifies the "good news" as "of the kingdom of God." Luke 9:6 collocates the term with Jesus' acts of healing, a feature we have already observed.

3. Matthew and Mark.

As in Luke, Matthew and Mark describe the role of John the Baptist by citing Isaiah 40:3 (Mt 3:3; Mk 1:3; Lk 3:4-6); all three Synoptics record that once John was imprisoned (Mt 4:12; Mk 1:14; Lk 3:20) Jesus began to preach the "gospel," and each collocates this with "the kingdom (of God)" (Mt 4:23; Mk 1:14-15; Lk 4:43).

In Jesus' eschatological discourse both Mark and Matthew record Jesus' saying that the gospel must be preached to all nations (Mt 24:14; Mk 13:10). After the woman anoints Jesus at the house of Simon the leper, Jesus says that she will be remembered wherever the gospel is preached (Mt 26:13; Mk 14:9).
In each passage Matthew specifies it as "this [tuto] gospel." Both of these pericopes refer to the preaching of the gospel that will take place in the missionary activity which will follow Jesus' death and resurrection. Hence the term here may embrace more than Jesus' message of the kingdom and include the whole story of Jesus—his death and resurrection in particular (note esp. Mt 26:12-13).

3.1. Mark. Mark 1:14-15 presents four features which are also prominent in Isaiah 40—66: The term gospel, the anticipation of a period of time, the kingdom of God and the need for repentance* (metanoēō). In Isaiah 61 the servant, in addition to "preaching good news," is to "proclaim the favorable year of the Lord" (note also Dan 7:22). In Isaiah 40:9 and 52:7 a "herald of good news" announces the advent of God's kingdom (esp. clear in the Aramaic Targum). Isaiah 59:20 affirms the message of the herald in Isaiah 40:9 and 52:7-10—"The redeemer will come to Zion" (the herald in 52:9 announces that Zion's king has "redeemed Jerusalem")—but adds this crucial qualification, "to those who repent (LXX, apostrephō) of their sins." It is possible that there is more import in this Markan use of gospel than this Isaianic background. R. P. Martin, following W. Marxsen, argues that "Mark's record is written from the vantage-point of all that his ministry accomplished as a past fact" and thus the term gospel here would include "its full Christian content" (Martin, 27).

In Mark's so-called title (Mk 1:1), "the gospel of Jesus Christ" does not denote a "Gospel" (i.e., a generic designation for the book) but "good news" (i.e., the message or story about to be told). The genitive ("of") is probably both subjective and objective: Jesus proclaims the gospel and it proclaims his story. Mark is thus the first to transform gospel from what was exclusively oral proclamation (in both Roman and early Christian usage) to written proclamation. (Even in Mk 1:1-2 one must note the close association between the term gospel and the prophecies of Is 40—66.)

In Mark 8:35 and 10:29, where Jesus promises reward for those who forsake worldly relationships and goods for his sake, Mark uniquely adds the phrase "and the gospel's (sake)." In the longer ending of Mark this version of the Great Commission uses the term explicitly: "Go into all the world and preach the gospel . . ." (Mk 16:15). Since the next verse makes clear that the listener's destiny is determined by his or her response to this "gospel," the term appears to include the message of the death and resurrection of Jesus.
3.2. Matthew. As we have seen, Matthew always specifies the noun gospel with "of the kingdom," except in 26:13 where the demonstrative "this" associates it closely with Jesus' death. Matthew 4:23 and 9:35 (par. Lk 8:1) are summaries of Jesus' ministry. They use identical formulae and both associate his preaching of the gospel with healing. Matthew parallels Luke in recording Jesus' response to the Baptist's question (Mt 11:2-6), where the verb form appears in the citation from Isaiah 61:1. Matthew, however, draws a closer connection between "the coming one" of the Baptist's question (Mt 11:3) and Jesus as "the Christ" (Mt 11:2).

In conclusion, it would appear that neither Jesus nor the Evangelists coined the term gospel (at least the verb form), but that Jesus' audience had a prior understanding of that term. Since the usage and associations of the term in the Synoptics coincide with those in Isaiah, it is likely that the meaning of gospel has its roots in this message of restoration and healing for the helpless. The preaching of the "good news" is collocated with the kingdom in both the Synoptics (Mk 1:14-15; Mt 4:23; 9:35; Lk 4:43; 8:1; 16:16) and in Isaiah (Is 40:9-10; 52:7) and so also with healing in both the Synoptics (Mt 4:23; 9:35; 11:5; Lk 7:22; 9:6) and in Isaiah (Is 61:1; 26:19; 29:18; 35:5-6).

See also Gospel (Genre); Jubilee; Kingdom of God.

C. C. Broyles

GOSPELS (APOCRYPHAL)

The writing of Gospels did not end with the production of the Gospels which became canonical or even with the fixing of the canon* of four canonical Gospels. Many other Gospels continued to be written for many centuries. Most of these do not resemble the canonical Gospels in genre (see Gospels [Genre]). For the purpose of this article a Gospel must be defined as a work which recounts all or part of Jesus' earthly life and teaching (including his appearances on earth between the resurrection* and the ascension*). This definition excludes some works which were called Gospels, such as the Gospel of Truth, the Gospel of Philip, the Coptic Gospel of the Egyptians and the Gospel of Eve. There is no space here even to mention a large number of late apocryphal Gospels. Most attention will be given to those Gospels most relevant to the study of Jesus and the canonical Gospels. (It should also be noted that many extracanonical traditions about the life and teaching of Jesus, some of great importance for the study of the canonical Gospels, are not found in Gospels as such, but in other early Christian literature.)

1. Gospel of Thomas
2. Gospel of Peter
3. Papyrus Fragments of Unknown Gospels
4. Jewish Christian Gospels
5. Gospel of the Egyptians
6. Secret Gospel of Mark
7. Birth and Infancy Gospels
8. Gospel of Nicodemus
9. Post-Resurrection Revelations

1. Gospel of Thomas.

The Coptic version of the Gospel of Thomas was discovered in 1945 among the Nag Hammadi codices. Since then it has received more scholarly attention than any other extracanonical Gospel, mainly because of the claim that it preserves early Gospel traditions independently of the canonical Gospels. Certainly, it is more important for the study of Jesus and the canonical Gospels than any other extracanonical Gospel of which we have a complete text. As well as the Coptic version of the whole Gospel of Thomas, there are three fragments in Greek, which were discovered among the Oxyrhynchus papyri and published in 1897 and 1904 (P. Oxy. 1,654,655), but not recognized as fragments of the Gospel of Thomas until the Coptic version became known. Though there are significant differences between the Greek fragments (which are from three distinct copies of the work) and the Coptic text, they are recognizably from the same work, which must therefore have existed in at least two redactions. The original language was probably Greek, though some have argued for a Semitic original.

The earliest of the Greek fragments (P. Oxy. 1) was written no later than A.D.
200 and provides the only firm terminus ad quem for the writing of the Gospel. Hippolytus, writing between 222 and 235, provides the earliest reference to it by name. The Gospel has been dated as early as A.D. 50-70 and as late as the end of the second century. But since parallels to its more explicitly Gnostic concepts and terminology date from the second century, it is probably no older than the end of the first century. The attribution of the Gospel to "Didymus Judas Thomas" (prologue) shows that it derives from the East Syrian Christian tradition, centered on Edessa. It was only in this tradition (from which come also the Book of Thomas and the Acts of Thomas) that the apostle Thomas was known as Judas Thomas and regarded as a kind of spiritual twin-brother of Jesus. Thomas was thought (perhaps correctly) to have been in some sense responsible for the founding of the church in this area, and it is probable that the oral Gospel traditions of this church were transmitted under the name of Thomas and that the Gospel of Thomas drew on these oral traditions. Its points of contact with other literature from this area and especially its probable use by the Acts of Thomas (end of second or early third century) confirms this hypothesis.

The Gospel of Thomas is a collection of sayings of Jesus, numbered as 114 sayings (logia) by modern scholars. There are no narratives and only minimal narrative contexts provided for a few sayings (22, 60, 100), though the latter are important for showing that Thomas does not, like most of the Gnostic Gospels (see 9. below), have a post-resurrection setting. As a sayings collection, the Gospel has often been compared with the hypothetical Gospel source Q* and with the many ancient collections of sayings of the wise. The genre is consistent with the theology of Thomas, which presents Jesus as a revealer of the secret wisdom by which the elect may recognize their true spiritual identity and recover their heavenly origin. Some scholars deny that Thomas is properly Gnostic and locate it rather in the tradition of Jewish Wisdom theology or in the encratite tradition characteristic of East Syrian Christianity. But although there are real contacts with both these traditions, some of the sayings most distinctive of Thomas express adistinctively Gnostic theology (e.g., 18, 29, 50, 83-84).

It seems that the tradition of the sayings of Jesus on which Thomas drew was Jewish Christian in origin (see especially saying 12 on James the Just) but had developed in a gnosticizing direction. Some sayings of clearly Gnostic origin had entered the tradition and the editor of Thomas selected from the tradition sayings which were compatible with his own Gnostic theology. The apostle Thomas has become the authority for an esoteric interpretation of the tradition of the sayings of Jesus (cf. 1, 13).
The majority of the sayings in the Gospel of Thomas have parallels in the Synoptic Gospels (including the triple tradition, the Q material, and matter peculiar to Mt and to Lk; see Synoptic Problem; M; L), but whether Thomas is dependent on the canonical Gospels is still debated. Arguments for dependence try to show both that Thomas reflects the specifically Matthean and Lukan redactions of Gospel traditions and that its differences from the Synoptics can be explained as deliberate redactional changes expressing a Gnostic interpretation. But neither of these points has been conclusively established. On the other hand, it is striking that the order of the sayings in Thomas almost never corresponds to that of the Synoptics, while the association of sayings by catchword connections—one of the few reasons that can be discerned for the order in Thomas—h is characteristic of oral tradition. It has been argued on form-critical grounds that Thomas sometimes preserves sayings, especially parables, in a more primitive form than the Synoptics. Finally, it should be noticed that since a significant number of the sayings in Thomas which do not have parallels in the canonical Gospels are also attested in other extracanonical sources, it is impossible to argue that the canonical Gospels were the only source of Gospel traditions used by Thomas. It follows that even if the editor of Thomas knew the canonical Gospels, a parallel to them need not derive from them.

The most probable opinion is that Thomas is dependent on a tradition substantially independent of the canonical Gospels, though influence from the canonical Gospels cannot be ruled out—whether during the oral transmission of the tradition, or at the stage of editing or at the stage of translation into Coptic. Thomas can therefore provide useful evidence for the study of the origins and development of the traditions behind the canonical Gospels, provided that due allowance is made for its greater distance (both theologically and probably chronologically) from the historical Jesus. It is even quite possible that a few of the sayings in Thomas which have no parallels in the canonical Gospels (such as the parables in 97 and 98) are authentic sayings of Jesus.

2. Gospel of Peter.

A substantial fragment of the Gospel of Peter, in a manuscript of the eighth or ninth century A.D., was discovered in 1887 at Akhmim in Egypt. It contains a narrative which begins at the end of the trial* of Jesus, includes the crucifixion (see Death of Jesus), burial* and resurrection* of Jesus, and breaks off in the course of a story which must have described a resurrection appearance to a group of the disciples * The words "I, Simon Peter" (14:60) identify the text as part of the Gospel attributed to Peter to which some writers of the early church refer. We have only two other indications of the rest of its contents. The Syriac Didascalia (early third century), which used the Gospel of Peter, refers briefly (ch. 21) to the resurrection appearance in the house of Levi which must have followed the end of the Akhmim fragment. According to Origen (Comm. Mt. 10.17), the Gospel of Peter supplied evidence that the brothers of the Lord were sons of Joseph by his first marriage. This may indicate that the Gospel began with a birth narrative. In addition to the Akhmim fragment, there are two tiny fragments of another Greek manuscript (P. Oxy. 2949) of the late second or early third century. The differences between one of these and the Akhmim text suggest that the latter cannot be relied on to preserve the text of the original Gospel very accurately.

The quite probable use of the Gospel of Peter by Justin and very probable use of it by Melito of Sardis suggest that it must date from before the middle of the second century. At the end of the second century, Bishop Serapion of Antioch heard of a dispute over its use in the church of Rhossus. When he discovered it was being used to support docetic heresy and that a few passages in it were suspect from this point of view, he disallowed its use (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 6.12). Recent scholarship has come to the conclusion that, on the evidence of the Akhmim fragment, the Gospel itself cannot be considered docetic, though there are phrases which docetists could interpret in their support. This conclusion is confirmed by its probable use by Justin, Melito and the Syriac Didascalia, which suggests that it was quite widely accepted in orthodox circles.

The Gospel is distinguished, in the text we have, by its interest in the fulfillment of prophecy in the passion narrative,* its strongly anti-Jewish bias (see Anti-Semitism), which emphasizes the sole responsibility of the Jews for the death of Jesus, its heightening of the miraculous, and its apologetic interest in supplying evidence for the resurrection. Distinctive features include Herod's participation in the trial of Jesus and ordering of the crucifixion to be carried out by Jews, and the account (which has a close parallel in Ascension of Isaiah 3:16-17) of the exit of the risen Christ from the tomb, escorted by angels.*

The Gospel's relationship to the canonical Gospels is disputed. There are parallels to all four canonical Gospels, but remarkably few verbal parallels. Some scholars have thought the Gospel of Peter completely independent of the canonical Gospels; most have thought it dependent on all four. J. D. Crossan has recently argued that although sections dependent on the canonical Gospels have been secondarily added to the text, the greater part of the Akhmim text is not only independent of the canonical Gospels, but actually a source used by all four canonical Gospels.

A more plausible view needs to build on the following three observations: (1) The major parallels are with special Matthean material (M) and with Markan material; (2) Close verbal parallels are largely limited to the passages parallel to Markan material, which are closer to the text of Mark itself than to Matthew's redaction of Mark; (3) If Markan and M passages are distinguished, both in Matthew and in the Gospel of Peter, it can be seen that connections between Markan and M passages are quite differently made in Matthew and the Gospel of Peter respectively. It seems then that the Gospel of Peter drew primarily on Mark's Gospel and on Matthew's special source, independently of Matthew's Gospel. Whereas Matthew gave priority to the Markan narrative and augmented it from his special source, the Gospel of Peter gave priority to the narrative of M and augmented it from Mark. M was probably the oral tradition of the church of Antioch and its neighboring churches, which acquired written form in the Gospel of Peter no doubt some decades after Matthew had used it. On this view, the Gospel of Peter would be valuable evidence for the study of Matthew's use of his sources.

3. Papyrus Fragments of Unknown Gospels.

Among the papyrus fragments of extracanonical Gospels there are some which cannot be identified as belonging to any known Gospel. The following are the most important:

3.1. P. Oxy. 840. This fourth- or fifth-century manuscript contains the conclusion of a discourse by Jesus, followed by a visit to the Temple in which Jesus engages in a discussion about ritual purification (see Clean and Unclean) with a Pharisaic chief priest named Levi. Some scholars have defended the historicity of the account.

3.2. P. Egerton 2. This manuscript, dating from around A.D. 150, is one of the two earliest Christian manuscripts extant, along with the fragment of the Gospel of John in P 12. It contains fragments of four pericopes. The first gives the conclusion of a controversy between Jesus and the Jewish leaders, in which Jesus has been accused of breaking the Law and at the conclusion of which he escapes an attempt to stone him. There is close verbal relationship with several parts of John's Gospel. The second pericope concerns the healing of a leper, the third contains a version of the question about the tribute money, and the fourth contains an otherwise unknown miracle story. The second and third resemble Synoptic material.

The relationship of this unknown Gospel to the canonical Gospels is disputed. Some have argued that it is entirely independent of all four, shares common tradition with them or was even a source used by Mark and John. If this were accepted, the distinctively Johannine material in the first pericope would be very important for the study of the sources of John's Gospel. But it seems at least equally possible that this unknown Gospel draws on oral tradition which had been substantially influenced by the canonical Gospels.

3.3. Oxy P. 1224. The legible parts of this fourth-century manuscript contain parallels to three Synoptic sayings of Jesus and one otherwise unknown saying whose authenticity was defended by J. Jeremias. It could be from an early Gospel independent of the Synoptics, but is too brief for any firm conclusions.

3.4. Fayyum Fragment. This third-century fragment parallels Mark 14:27, 29-30 with some variation. It is too brief for its relationship to Mark to be ascertainable.

3.5. Strasbourg Coptic Fragment Unlike the preceding fragments, which are all in Greek, this fifth- or sixth-century fragment is in Coptic. "We, the apostles" are the speakers, but this phrase could be consistent with attribution to a particular apostle (cf. Cos. Pet. 14:59). The contents are a prayer* of Jesus, a conversation with the disciples and a revelation of his glory* to them, all in the context of bidding them farewell, most probably before the passion but possibly before the ascension. There are close contacts with both Synoptic and Johannine material, on which this unknown Gospel is probably dependent.

The Gospels used by specifically Jewish Christian groups in the early church—whether, like the Eb-ionites, they were heretical in the eyes of the Catholic Church, or, like the Nazarenes, they were orthodox but separate from the predominantly Gentile Catholic Church—have unfortunately survived only in quotations by the Fathers, along with some untrustworthy evidence from the Middle Ages. The titles which the Fathers use for these Gospels and the manner in which they refer to them leave it very unclear how many such Gospels there were and from which the surviving quotations come. Recent scholarly consensus distinguishes three, all of which seem to have resembled the Synoptic Gospels in genre:

4.1. Gospel of the Hebrews. The most recent investigation by A. F.J. Klijn assigns seven quotations to this Gospel. These show no sign of dependence on the canonical Gospels. One saying also appears in the Gospel of Thomas (2). Otherwise the traditions are quite distinctive to this Gospel, including the account of the risen Christ's appearance to his brother James the Just, who was highly revered in Jewish Christian tradition. The Gospel was written in Greek before the middle of the second century. It may well have originated in Egypt, where its title would have designated it the Gospel of the Greek-speaking Jewish Christian community and distinguished it from the Gospel of the Egyptians (see 5. below) used by the Gentile Christian community in Egypt.

4.2. Gospel of the Nazarenes. Klijn assigns twenty-two quotations definitely to this Gospel, but many of these are indications of points where a few words differed from the text of Matthew's Gospel. Others are more substantial additions to or variations from the text of Matthew. The Gospel was evidently a free translation (in targumic style; see Targums) of Matthew into Aramaic or Syriac. The view of Jerome and others that it was actually the Semitic original from which our Greek Matthew was translated cannot be maintained. In Jerome's time it was used by the Nazarene community in Beroea in Syria, and may have originated among them in the second century.

4.3. Gospel of the Ebionites. Epiphanius preserves seven quotations of this Gospel, which was composed in Greek and based on all three Synoptic Gospels. Taking Matthew as its principal authority, it drew on Mark and Luke in order to combine the three in a harmonized narrative. It is thus an example of the apparently rather common second-century tendency to produce harmonies of the various Gospel texts, of which Tatian's Duitessaron is the most famous example.

Ebionite theology is evident in the quotations. Since the Ebionites rejected the virginal conception and held an adoptionist christology, the Gospel began with the baptism* of Jesus. The Ebionite prohibition on eating meat and their opposition to the Temple* cult are also reflected.
5. Gospel of the Egyptians.

This Gospel appears to have been the one predomi-nandy used by Gentile Christians in Egypt until it was superseded by the canonical Gospels in orthodox circles. Unfortunately, little is known of it. The only clear information comes from Clement of Alexandria, who refers to a conversation it contained between Jesus and Salome (a woman disciple of Jesus who is prominent in apocryphal, especially Gnostic, Gospel traditions). This contained sayings, also known from the Gospel of Thomas (22, 37; cf. also 2 Clem. 12:1-2), about the rejection of sexuality, which reflect an encratite view of salvation as the restoration of the original condition of humanity without sexual differentiation. Whether the Gospel was not merely encratite but Gnostic is unknown. The Sethian Gnostic work from Nag Hammadi, which is also known as the Gospel of the Egyptians (CG III, 2 and IV, 2), is a quite different work.

M. Smith discovered in 1958 (but did not publish until 1973) a previously unknown letter of Clement of Alexandria in an eighteenth-century copy. The majority of scholars have provisionally accepted Smith's case for the authenticity of the letter, though not all rule out the possibilities that it is an ancient pseudepigraphon (in which case its witness to the Secret Gospel of Mark could still be of value) or a modern forgery.

Clement claims to know three versions of Mark's Gospel: (1) the Gospel used publicly in the church (our canonical Mark), which Mark wrote first; (2) the Secret Gospel, which Mark wrote later, in Alexandria, by adding to his earlier text certain secret traditions which are revealed only to initiates; (3) the version used by the Carpocratian Gnostics, who have made their own additions to the Secret Gospel. Clement gives no more than two words of the material peculiar to (3), but quotes the two passages which the Secret Gospel adds to the public Gospel. After Mark 10:34, the Secret Gospel had a story set in Bethany, which is clearly related to the Johannine account of the raising of Lazarus, but told in Markan rather than Johannine language. Six days after Jesus raised the young man (who is anonymous in the Secret Gospel) from the dead, he came to Jesus at night wearing only a linen cloth, and Jesus taught him the mystery of the kingdom of God.* The reference must be to some kind of initiation, most likely involving baptism. The Secret Gospel's second addition to Mark occurs in 10:46: it is an oddly brief reference to Jesus' refusal to receive the young man's sister and his mother and Salome.

Smith argued that the additional material is so characteristically Markan that it must derive from the same body of tradition as canonical Mark. Some have argued that canonical Mark is a later, expurgated version of the Secret Gospel. Others regard the material in the Secret Gospel as late interpolations, deliberately imitative of Markan style and content. So far, the evidence remains peculiarly puzzling.

From the second century onwards, interest in the family background and early life of Jesus produced many works devoted solely to this theme. Two second-century works on this theme proved extraordinarily popular for many centuries, and all later Gospels of this kind were indebted to one or both of them.

7.1. Protevangelium of James. This tells of the miraculous birth of Mary to her childless parents, Joachim and Anna, who dedicate her to the Temple where she lives until entrusted to Joseph. The story from the annunciation to the massacre of the innocents (concluding with the martyrdom of Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist at that time) makes free use of the narratives of both Matthew and Luke, laying special emphasis on the virginity of Mary. The birth of Jesus in a cave is miraculous, preserving Mary's virginal state. Her perpetual virginity is implied, since the brothers of Jesus are considered sons of Joseph by a previous marriage. The work is attributed to one of them, James, though he does not appear in the narrative. The main purpose of the work is clearly the glorification of the figure of Mary as a pure virgin, though an apologetic defense of her virginity against Jewish anti-Christian polemic may also have influenced the traditions it contains. It has been called midrashic (according to the loose use of that term in some NT scholarship; see Midrash) because of its creative use of OT texts in developing the narrative. It probably originated in second-century Syria, where its ideas about the virginity of Mary can be paralleled from other texts.

7.2. Infancy Gospel of Thomas. This work consists solely of a series of stories of miracles performed by the child Jesus up to his twelfth year. For example, Jesus makes sparrows out of clay and brings them to life (a story which later found its way into the Qur'an). He heals the injured, raises the dead, curses his enemies so that they die, proves superior in knowledge to all his schoolteachers. The general effect is to manifest his superhuman nature to all who encounter him.

In its original form the work must date from the second century, but from the extant texts in many versions it is very difficult to establish the original text.

7.3. Later Gospels. The Coptic History of Joseph does for Joseph what the Protevangelium of James did for Mary. The Latin Infancy Gospel of Matthew (often called Pseudo-Matthew) transmitted much of the content of the Protevangelium of James and the Infancy Gospel of Thomas, along with further legends of its own, to the medieval West. The Latin Infancy Gospel published by M. R. James is important for one of its sources, otherwise unknown, which must be of early origin. Many other late birth and infancy Gospels in many languages are extant.

This title is given to a work combining two distinct parts: the Acts of Pilate and the Descensus ad Inferos (descent to Hades). The Acts of Pilate is an account of the trial and crucifixion of Jesus, and of an investigation by the Sanhedrin which receives evidence of the resurrection of Jesus. The work is notable for its anti-Jewish and apologetic tendencies. Descensus ad Inferos is the fullest account from the early church of Christ's activity in the realm of the dead between his death and his resurrection: his victory over the powers of Hades and his liberation of Adam and the righteous dead. The Gospel of Nicodemus in its present form is generally assigned to the fifth century, but undoubtedly draws on earlier sources.

Those who wished to amplify the known teaching of Jesus or to trace to Jesus secret revelations handed down in esoteric tradition found the most suitable literary vehicle to be an account of Jesus teaching his disciples in the period between his resurrection and ascension. Often such accounts take the form of a dialog in which Jesus is questioned by his disciples about subjects left unclear by his teaching before his death. Gospels of this kind sometimes draw on traditions of the sayings of Jesus, in order to interpret and develop them further, but often the contents are unrelated to Gospel traditions. Though the apocalyptic discourse of Jesus in the Synoptics (Mt 24 par.) was sometimes a model for such works, their genre is often as close to that of the apocalypses as to other kinds of Gospel (and so several of these works are entitled Apocalypses).

Though this kind of Gospel proved especially useful to and popular among Gnostics, it did not originate with and was not confined to Gnostics. Orthodox examples from the early second century are the Apocalypse of Peter and the Epistle of the Apostles, both significant for the Gospel traditions they contain, the latter for the way in which it seems to draw on the canonical Gospels, including John, within a continuing oral tradition. The Freer Logion (added to Mk 16:14 in one manuscript) is not a complete work, but illustrates the second-century tendency to ascribe additional revelations to the risen Christ Later non-Gnostic works of this type, from the third century or later, are the Questions of Bartholomew, the Syriac Testament of our Lord, and the Ethiopie Testament of Our Lord in Galilee. Gnostic works of this type include the Apocryphon of James (CG I, 2), the Book of Thomas (CG II, 7), the Sophia of Jesus Christ (CG III, 4 and BG 8502, 3), the Dialogue of the Saviour (CG III, 5), the First Apocalypse of James (CG V, 3), the Coptic Apocalypse of Peter (CG VII, 3), the Gospel of Mary (BG 8502, 1), the Pistis Sophia and the Books of Jeu.

See also Gospel (Genre); Jesus in Non-Christian Sources.

R.J. Bauckham

GOSPELS (HISTORICAL RELIABILITY)

Different scholars come to widely divergent conclusions when they assess the historical reliability of the Gospels. About the only point on which virtually all are agreed is that the Gospels were written primarily for theological rather than historical purposes. In other words, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John above all wanted to commend their understanding of the person and work of Jesus to their first-century audiences. But most scholars also recognize that in order for the four Evangelists' representations of Jesus to be convincing, they had to match the course of events in his life. How much of a match is required and how much is actually present are questions which are both vigorously debated. This essay is written from the conviction that a fair assessment of the evidence supports a high degree of historicity. It must be stressed, however, that the Gospels have to be evaluated according to the historiographical canons of their day and not anachronistically compared with modern conceptions of what is and is not so-called reliable history.

1. External Evidence
2. Internal Evidence
3. Philosophical Considerations

1. External Evidence.

1.1. The Text of the Gospels. Non-Christian religions often allege that the Gospels as they now appear cannot be trusted because the text has been greatly corrupted. This allegation has virtually no evidence to support it. There are 2,328 manuscripts and manuscript fragments surviving from the earliest centuries of the Christian church and representing all portions of the Gospels. The earliest fragment of any portion of the NT currently in existence is the John Rylands papyrus fragment of John 18:31-33, 37-38, which probably dates to c. A.D. 125 or within about thirty years of the original composition of the Fourth Gospel. Twenty-one papyri containing major sections of one or more Gospels can be dated to the third and fourth centuries, while five virtually complete NTs survive from the fourth and fifth centuries. Compared with the numbers and ages of manuscripts which have survived for most other ancient documents, including many believed to contain reliable accounts of historical events, this evidence is overwhelming.

As a result textual critics (see Textual Criticism) have been able to reconstruct a highly reliable prototype of what the original Gospel writers undoubtedly wrote. Estimates suggest that from ninety-seven to ninety-nine per cent of the original text is securely recoverable. More than fifty-four per cent of all of the verses in the Gospels are entirely free of textual variants, and the vast majority of those which remain have no bearing on questions of historicity. Modern editions of the Greek NT (Nesde-Aland; UBS) print the textual variants which have any significant effect on meaning, and most modern English translations use footnotes to alert readers to the most disputed texts (e.g., Mt 6:13b; Mk 16:9-20; Jn 7:53-8:11).

1.2. Archeology. Archeology* has not played nearly as major a role in Gospel studies as it has for many other sections of Scripture. Occasionally the existence of previously unattested places or people has been demonstrated. For example, only in 1888 did the site of the pool of Bethesda become known (Jn 5:2), and excavations demonstrated that it contained five porticoes as described by John. So too, in 1961 the first reference in Roman sources to "Pontius Pilate,* Prefect of Judea" was discovered in an inscription in Caesarea Maritimis. But for the most part, the type of information which the Gospels contain—narratives of actions and teachings of Jesus—do not lend themselves to archeological corroboration or contradiction. Since no one was able to tape-record them, there are no physical traces by which one can test the trustworthiness of the Gospel record.

1.3. Written Testimony Outside the Gospels. Virtually all biblical scholars acknowledge that there is enough information from ancient non-Christian sources to give lie to the myth (still, however, widely believed in popular circles and by some scholars in other fields-see esp. G. A. Wells) which claims that Jesus never existed. Most also recognize that only a paucity of the testimony of the Gospels can be corroborated by a comparison with other materials. Given that Jesus was not perceived by non-Christians as a significant political or military leader, this is not surprising. Ancient historians had little reason to consider that centuries later he would prove significant; even as the founder of a religious movement he had little impact during his lifetime (see Jesus in Non-Christian Sources).

1.3.1. Greco-Roman Testimony. The third-century writer Julius Africanus cites a first-century Greek historian, Thallus, who referred to the darkness that occurred at the time of the crucifixion (see Death of Jesus). Early in the second century the Roman legate Pliny the Younger wrote that Christians met regularly and sang hymns to Christ "as if to a god" (Epp. 10:06.7), in a way that suggested he realized that Jesus had been a human but doubted that he was a god. About the same time the Roman historian Tacitus clearly referred to "Christ who had been executed by sentence of the procurator Pontius Pilate in the reign of Tiberius" (Ann. 15:44). Tacitus' Roman contemporary Suetonius speaks in one passage of "Chrestus" as the one at whose instigation a riot involving Jews and Christians in Rome broke out (Claudius 25:4)—probably a garbled reference to Christ as the founder of Christianity.

1.3.2. Jewish Testimony. Jewish literature from the first centuries of the Christian era contains additional references to Jesus. Some have been censored, so once there were probably even more than now remain. A famous passage in the Talmud speaks of Jesus as "the Nazarene" who "practiced magic and led Israel astray" (b. Sanh. 107b). This reference is particularly interesting because it seems to admit that Jesus worked miracles, even though its interpretation of them differs from Christian belief. In several places Jesus is called the son of "Pandera"; the second-century Christian writer Origen explained that the Jews believed that Jesus was the child of Mary by an adulterous relationship with a Roman soldier by that name (Contra Celsum 1:32). The name and legend could well have come from a corruption of the Greek word parthenos for "virgin" and thus provide indirect though corrupt testimony to the Gospels' claim that Jesus was not the natural child of Joseph but was virgin-conceived (see Birth of Jesus). Again in the Talmud (b. Sanh. 43a) Jesus is said to have been hanged on the eve of the Passover. This text also teaches that "Jesus had five disciples, Mattha, Naqai, Nezer, Buni and Todah," possible references to Matthew, Nicodemus, an anonymous Nazarene, John and Thaddeus.

The most interesting of all of the Jewish testimonies to Jesus is the account in Josephus* (Ant. 18.63-64). Here one learns that Jesus was a wise man who wrought surprising feats, taught many, gathered a large following and was crucified by Pilate. Extant copies of Josephus' writings also affirm that Jesus was the Messiah and that he was raised from the dead. Because Josephus was not a Christian, few people believe that he actually wrote these words; they may well have been added by scribes in later Christian circles which preserved his work. But the rest of his statements fit his style elsewhere and are most likely authentic. Josephus also often independent corroboration of the ministry of John the Baptist* (18:117) and of James, the brother of Jesus (20:200).

1.3.3. Other Christian Testimony. Outside the New Testament various apocryphal Gospels present additional teachings and deeds of Christ (see Gospels [Apocryphal]). Some of these are clearly legendary attempts to fill in the "gaps" in the Gospel record-stories of Jesus the child prodigy (e.g., the Infancy Gospel of Thomas and the Protevangelium of James) or additional details concerning his trial, death, descent into hell and resurrection* (e.g., the Gospel of Nicodemus and the Gospel of Peter). Many emanate from Gnostic circles and purport to reveal secret teachings of Christ, often spoken after his resurrection in private conversation with the disciples (e.g., the Apocryphon of John and the Dialogue of the Savior). Two of these contain some sayings attributed to Jesus and often believed to be authentic, or at least as trustworthy as parts of the canonical Gospels (the Coptic Gospel of Thomas and the Apocryphon of James). But none of these extra-canonical writings can be shown to date from before the mid-second century, so that the trustworthiness of the NT Gospels, which date from the first century, is in no way impugned. Though widely disputed, those documents from the Gnostic library at Nag Hammadi (esp. the Coptic Gospel of Thomas) which contain teachings of Jesus most closely paralleled in the NT are precisely those which are most clearly dependent on and inferior to the Synoptic Gospels (see Blomberg in France & Wenham, vol. 5; Tuckett).

It has often been observed how little the Acts, epistles and Revelation reflect any awareness of the Gospel tradition. Only rarely is a teaching of Jesus quoted (but see Acts 20:35; 1 Cor 7:10; 9:14; 11:23-25; 1 Tim 5:18). Nevertheless, the epistles are filled with numerous allusions to Jesus' teaching (e.g., Rom 12:14; 12:17; 13:8-9; 14:10; 16:9; 1 Thess 2:14-16; 5:2), which suggests that such awareness was much more widespread than a superficial survey of Scripture discloses (see Stanton). The book of James contains allusions to the Sermon on the Mount* in nearly every paragraph, while Acts reflects the basic outline of Mark in several of the longer speeches which summarize the gospel as preached by Peter and Paul (and in 10:36-41 and 13:24-25 even more specific details are included).
1.4. Authorship. Many people have tried to assess the historicity of the Gospels in light of their authorship. It is often assumed that if the traditional ascriptions are correct, then these writers would have reflected firsthand eyewitness testimony in the case of Matthew and John, and secondhand in the case of Luke (cf. Lk 1:1-4). If the ascriptions are incorrect, as most modern scholars believe, then it is often assumed that the Gospels' historicity is impugned. But in fact eyewitnesses can err, accidentally or deliberately, while secondary sources can preserve accurate information reliably transmitted to them. For these reasons, the value of the debate over authorship for questions of historicity has probably been exaggerated.

Strictly speaking, the four Gospels are anonymous documents. The titles were added later, probably early in the second century when the texts were first gathered together as four versions of the one gospel. But the virtually unanimous early-Christian testimony which associates them with Matthew, Mark, Luke and John (see e.g., Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3:39.4, 16; Irenaeus, Han. 3:1.1-2) should be treated very seriously. And even scholars who see the Gospels as written by anonymous Christians almost always date them within the first century. This is certainly well within a time period that would have permitted accurate information about the life and times of Jesus to have been preserved, even if it in no way guarantees such preservation.

1.5. Sources. An author, however close in time to the events he or she describes, is nevertheless only as reliable as his or her sources. The most common reconstruction of the literary interrelationship of the Synoptic Gospels has Matthew and Luke depending on at least two written sources—Mark and Q* (a hypothetical document accounting for material Matthew and Luke have in common which is not found in Mark; see Synoptic Problem). Q is usually dated to the 50s and Mark is assumed to have utilized source material at least that old. With Christ's crucifixion no earlier than AD. 30, the time gap between events and written accounts is reduced to about twenty years, a far cry from the centuries that were usually necessary for supernatural legends to attach themselves to other historical characters from antiquity (see Stein).

1.6. Oral Tradition. Any time lag between events and their recording allows for potential distortion. Despite all of the external evidence so far cited, many scholars doubt the reliability of the Gospels because they doubt either the ability or the interest of early Christians to have preserved accurately the story of Jesus' ministry as they passed it along by word of mouth. A number of factors, however, supports the likelihood that the Gospel tradition was carefully preserved.

(1) Jesus was perceived by his followers as one who proclaimed God's* Word in a way which demanded careful retelling. (2) Over ninety per cent of his teachings has poetic elements which would have made them easy to memorize. (3) The almost universal method of education in antiquity, and especially in Israel, was rote memorization, which enabled people accurately to recount quantities of material far greater than all of the Gospels put together. (4) Oral storytelling often permitted a wide range of freedom in selecting and describing details but required fixed points of a narrative to be preserved unchanged. (5) Written notes and a kind of shorthand were often privately kept by rabbis* and their disciples, despite a publicly stated preference for oral tradition. (6) The lack of teachings ascribed to Jesus about later church controversies (e.g., circumcision, speaking in tongues) suggests that the disciples did not freely invent material and read it back onto the lips of Jesus. (7) The degree to which Jesus emphasized his imminent return, that is, to the exclusion of envisioning the establishment of an ongoing community of followers, has been exaggerated (see Church). Hence, the claim that the disciples would have had no interest in preserving the Gospel tradition until the second generation of Christianity is doubtful (see Form Criticism).

2. Internal Evidence.

2.1. The Intentions of the Evangelists. Gospel studies have often introduced a false dichotomy between history and theology. One group of scholars seeks to harmonize all of the data of the four Gospels in order to create a composite, comprehensive life of Christ which blurs the unique emphases of each Gospel in its own right. Another group so emphasizes the theological distinctives of each individual Evangelist that it rejects the possibility of constructing any kind of plausible harmony. The two clearest statements in the Gospels about their authors' own intentions suggest that history and theology both played important roles (Lk 1:1-4; Jn 20:31). In fact, it is often precisely when one recognizes the theological emphases of a particular Gospel that one can understand why it differs from the others and can see those differences as complementary rather than contradictory.

Various studies of the Gospel genre (see Gospel [Genre]) have linked Matthew, Mark, Luke and John with apocalyptic,* aretalogy (a Greco-Roman story of a "divine man"), tragedy or comedy, midrash* (a Jewish form of interpretive re-writing of authoritative narrative) or parable,* while many have viewed the Gospel as a new genre invented by Mark. But probably the best approach sees important parallels with the more historically reliable Jewish and Greco-Roman biographies and histories (see esp. Aune).

Ancient biographers and historians did not feel constrained to write from detached and so-called objective viewpoints. They did not give equal treatment to all periods of an individual's life. They felt free to write in topical as well as chronological sequence. They were highly selective in the material they included, choosing that which reinforced the morals they wished to inculcate. In an era which knew neither quotation marks nor plagiarism, speakers' words were abbreviated, explained, paraphrased and contemporized in whatever ways individual authors deemed beneficial for their audiences. All of these features occur in the Gospels, and none of them detracts from the Evangelists' integrity. At the same time, little if any material was recorded solely out of historical interest; interpreters must recognize theological motives as central to each text.

2.2. A Comparison of the Synoptics.

2.2.1. Agreement. The most striking feature one notices in comparing Matthew, Mark and Luke is their similarity. Approximately ninety-one per cent (c. 601 out of 661 verses) of Mark's information reappears in Matthew or Luke, and usually in both. An additional 235 verses appear in some form in both Matthew and Luke but not in Mark. Approximately sixty-eight per cent of the self-contained units of narrative common to Mark and either Matthew or Luke appear in the same sequence in each. Given the wealth of detail which could have been told about Jesus, the fact that these three Evangelists chose to follow such similar outlines (and almost certainly to borrow from one another in some kind of literary interrelationship) suggests that a relatively fixed manner of telling the gospel originated at an early date in the life of the church. This common kerygma ("proclamation") clearly enhances the case for the Gospels' historical reliability.

2.2.2. Disagreement. Nevertheless, numerous differences among the Synoptics appear whenever parallel accounts are laid side-by-side. For many critics these differences are of such a nature and number that no amount of external evidence can convince them of the Gospels' trustworthiness. On the other hand, most of the differences are so minor that it seems unfair to refer to them as contradictions. Historians and biographers regularly add, omit or reword stories and portions of stories without necessarily falsifying them. At the same time, there are a handful of more glaring discrepancies which puzzle all readers. But plausible solutions have been suggested for all of them; fair-minded scholars must at least consider credible harmonizations before dismissing the whole process as impossible. In many instances it is precisely when one understands the varying theological concerns of the different Evangelists that one can appreciate how apparently discrepant accounts are in fact complementary rather than contradictory (see Blomberg in Carson and Woodbridge). The following survey offers a representative sampling of seven major types of problems which appear, a few of the most famous illustrations of those problems and some possible solutions.

(1) The theologies of the Evangelists may seem to conflict. Mark portrays the disciples as without understanding following Jesus' walking on the water (Mk 6:52); Matthew has them worship* him as the Son of God* (Mt 14:33). In Mark, after stilling the storm, Jesus berates the disciples for their lack of faith* (Mk 4:40); in Matthew he concedes that they have "a little faith" (Mt 8:26). Both tendencies are credible in light of the disciples' mixture of faith and disbelief elsewhere and each fits into distinctive emphases of the Gospels in which they appear.

(2) One Evangelist may seem to correct his source. In Mark, Jesus' reply to the so-called rich young ruler seems to deny his goodness (Mk 10:18); Matthew rewords the comment so that Jesus merely inquires, "Why do you ask me about the good?" (Mt 19:17). Matthew is not contradicting Mark but trying to avoid a misinterpretation of him. Similarly, Luke reports Jesus as telling his followers to hate their parents (Lk 14:26); Matthew explains that this means they must love* God much more than family* (Mt 10:37).

(3) Events may appear in contradictory orders in different Gospels. Luke places Jesus' rejection in Nazareth at the beginning of his Galilean ministry (Lk 4:16-30); Mark locates it much later (Mk 6:1-6). Usually, it is best not to assume chronology* unless it is explicitly indicated. Luke has topically relocated this story at the front of his Gospel to show the type of rejection Jesus would receive from his native people throughout his ministry. In the same way, Luke reverses the order of the second and third temptations* of Christ to build toward a climax with Jesus in the Temple in Jerusalem (Lk 4:1-13; cf. Mt 4:1-11). Both of these are key themes throughout his work.

(4) A passage may be so abbreviated that it seems to contradict a fuller parallel. Mark has Jairus and his companions come to Jesus twice, once to tell him of his daughter's illness and once to say that she has died (Mk 5:21-43). Matthew so compresses the account that Jairus comes only once and tells Jesus right at the outset of the story that his daughter is dead (Mt 9:18-26). This type of literary abridgment was common in antiquity and not perceived as misleading or in error (cf. Lucian, How to Write History, 56). Similar telescoping appears in Matthew's account of the withered fig tree (Mt 21:18-22; cf. Mk 11:12-14,20-21) and in Luke's account of Jesus' trial before the Sanhedrin,* if Luke is not in fact using a different tradition altogether, rather than Mark (Lk 22:66-71; cf. Mk 14:53—15:1).

(5) Sayings of Jesus may appear in different contexts. The Sermon on the Mount* (Mt 5—7) and the Olivet Discourse (Mt 24—25) gather together teachings which are scattered all around the Gospel of Luke. Some of these may simply reflect Jesus' repeated utterances; others no doubt reflect the common practice of creating composite speeches. Again, no one questioned the integrity of ancient historians when they utilized a device that modern readers often find artificial. Yet again, both sermons may be excerpts of a much longer original.

(6) A unique event may be told twice in apparently contradictory ways. Many see the feedings of the 5,000 and the 4,000 (Mk 6:32-44; 8:1-10) or the two anointings of Jesus (Lk 7:36-50; Mk 14:3-9) as doublets of the same events. In each case, these are probably better viewed as separate incidents.

(7) Names and numbers may appear to contradict each other. In Matthew Jesus heals two blind men along the Jericho road (Mt 20:30); in Mark he heals one (Mk 10:46). The latter does not exclude the former. In Mark Jesus exorcises a demoniac in the region near Gerasa (Mk 5:1); in Matthew it occurs in Gadara (Mt 8:28). The former is probably a city; the latter, a province.

2.3. The Synoptics and John. The Fourth Gospel stands out as distinct from the Synoptics in at least five principal ways (see Synoptics and John). (1) Most of John's material is unparalleled in Matthew, Mark and Luke, and only rarely does a passage common to the first three Gospels reappear in John. (2) John seems to have a much higher christology; only in his Gospel do explicit equations of Jesus with God ever appear (e.g., Jn 1:1; 10:30; 20:28). (3) The chronologies of John and the Synoptics are difficult to harmonize. Especially noteworthy are John's references to Jewish festivals (see Feasts), which indicate Jesus had at least a three-year ministry traveling back and forth between Judea and Galilee* (in the Synoptics Jesus seems to visit Jerusalem for the first time the week before his death) and to the day of his crucifixion (apparently on Passover rather than the day after as in the Synoptics). (4) Other historical anachronisms seem to abound, most notably the reference to Jewish excommunication of Christians from the synagogues (Jn 9:22). (5) John's writing style differs markedly from that of the Synoptics; Jesus' language is indistinguishable from John's and Christ speaks in lengthy discourses rather than pithy aphorisms. As a result even scholars who grant a substantial measure of historical reliability to the Synoptics usually view John as having so overlaid his material with theological interpretation that the Fourth Gospel has become largely worthless for the reconstruction of the historical Jesus.

On the other hand, major themes of John include the revelation of truth* (see esp. 19:35), the incarnation* of the Logos* in space and time (1:14) and the inspiration of the apostles* by the Holy Spirit* to enable them to remember what Jesus did and said (14:26; 15:26). John would undermine his own theological emphases if his historical information were in error. He must be given an opportunity to be viewed as reliable before he is assumed to be untrustworthy.

Each of the five distinctives noted above must be set in a proper context. (1) Information is no less reliable for not being multiply attested. John probably wrote either to supplement the Synoptics or in independence from them; either way he was not likely to repeat much of their material (21:25). (2) The Synoptics certainly know of Jesus' divine status even if it is not emphasized (Mt 1:18; Lk 1:35; Mk 14:62), while John also underlines Jesus' subordination to the Father (Jn 14:28). The christologies differ but they do not contradict each other. (3) The Synoptics do not preclude a three-year ministry or additional visits to Jerusalem. The evidence suggesting Jesus' crucifixion on Passover in John (esp. 13:1; 18:28; 19:14, 31) is better taken as referring to the week-long Passover festival rather than just the first day of that feast. (4) Closer analysis dispels allegations of anachronism. The reference to putting Jesus' disciples out of the synagogue* does not refer to practice outside of Jerusalem nor to any formal ban on Christians as occurred toward the end of the first century. (5) Historical accuracy does not require exact quotation, merely faithful paraphrase. John's extended discourses may reflect homiletical development of the teachings of Jesus, shorter parallels to which may usually be found in the Synoptics (cf. e.g., Jn 3:3 with Mk 10:15). They also often represent private teaching for the disciples, whereas the Synoptics tend to focus more on his public ministry. There is no doubt that history and theology are interwoven in more complex fashion in John, but once it is recognized that he is utilizing a more dramatic genre (see esp. Michaels), a good case can be made for the historical trustworthiness of the Fourth Gospel within the conventions of its genre (see Robinson).

3. Philosophical Considerations.

3.1. Miracles and the Supernatural. For many readers the historicity of the Gospels is called into question simply because they are filled with miracle stories about the supernatural deeds of Christ. Disbelief in the miracles usually stems from any one of three different objections. (1) Philosophers of science often allege that modern science has proved the impossibility of the supernatural. (2) Philosophers of history often argue that the evidence in favor of a miracle can never outweigh the evidence against it, so that a rational person may never conclude that testimony in behalf of a supernatural event is reliable. Unless someone has personally experienced the same kind of miracle, there is always a more likely explanation for someone else's claim that one has occurred. (3) Philosophers of religion often compare the miracle stories in the Gospels with those in other ancient religious and philosophical traditions and believe that all are equally suspect.

In fact none of these claims can withstand close scrutiny. First the proper domain of science is the realm of the repeatable, predictable and verifiable. Miracles by definition are non-repeatable events. If there is a theistic God such as the Judeo-Christian tradition has affirmed, miracles are a natural corollary of his existence. Whether or not such a God exists cannot be determined by science. Second, personal experience is not a reliable criterion for determining truth. By that criterion evidence against the existence of ice would always demand that a primitive person in a tropical climate disbelieve it. Third, the testimony on behalf of other ancient miracles is usually not as strong, as consistent or as religiously significant as it is in the Gospels. Nevertheless, there is no reason to deny altogether the possibility of the miraculous in certain other ancient settings.

For many philosophers and theologians, the issue of the Gospels' credibility rests ultimately with the accounts of Jesus' resurrection* Several alternatives have been put forward to explain the origin of belief in the risen Lord. Those which have largely been abandoned in scholarly circles include the views that (1) Jesus never really died on the cross but later revived; (2) his body was stolen; (3) the women went to the wrong tomb and found it empty; and (4) mass hallucination.

More common is some form of the view that the disciples' belief in the abiding significance of Jesus' message and goals convinced them that he was still alive spiritually and that this belief eventually became transformed, in Jewish categories, into the idea of a bodily resurrection. Had the Gospel begun in Hellenistic circles and later been transformed by Judaism, this view might be credible. But the direction of development was precisely the reverse. From the very outset belief in an empty tomb, and therefore a raised body, formed part of the Gospel tradition (see esp. 1 Cor 15:3-7), and in Jewish circles mere immortality of the soul was seldom affirmed. As long as one rejects a priori antisupematural prejudices, the evidence may be seen to support a bodily resurrection of Jesus. All the proposed alternatives are even more incredible (see Ladd).

3.2 The Burden of Proof. Notwithstanding all of the evidence in favor of the general trustworthiness of the Gospels, many critics find little they can confidently endorse because they adopt a skeptical stance on the issue of the burden of proof. That is to say, they assume that each portion of the Gospels is suspect, and reverse that verdict only when overwhelming evidence points to historical reliability. But this method inverts standard procedures of historical investigation; it applies more rigorous criteria to the biblical material than students of ancient history ever apply elsewhere.

Once a historian has proved reliable where verifiable, once apparent errors or contradictions receive plausible solutions, the appropriate approach is to give that writer the benefit of the doubt in areas where verification is not possible (cf. Goetz and Blomberg). Neither external nor internal testimony can prove the accuracy of most of the details of the Gospels; the necessary comparative data simply are lacking. But the coherence and consistency of material which cannot be tested with that which can be tested goes a long way toward inspiring confidence in the remaining portions of the texts.

See also Form Criticism; Redaction Criticism; Synoptics AND John; Synoptic Problem; Tradition Criticism.

C. L Blomberg

GREAT COMMANDMENT. See COMMANDMENT

GREAT COMMISSION. See APOSTLE; GENTILES RESURRECTION.

GRIEBACH HYPOTHESIS. See SYNOPSIS PROBLEM
The well-known OT idea of spiritual obduracy or moral insensitivity (often referred to as "hardness of heart") occurs in Jesus' teaching and in editorial comments in the Gospels, especially in Mark and John. In these latter writings the concept makes an especially important theological contribution.

1. OT Background

According to OT usage the heart is the seat of understanding, moral affection and will (Deut 6:5). A soft heart is receptive to the divine will; a hard heart is not. Pharaoh is the classic OT example of hardness of heart. Despite the many plagues brought against him through Moses,* Pharaoh (or God) "hardened his heart" (Ex 4:21; 7:3; 8:15, 32; 9:12, 34-35; 10:20, 27; 11:10) and refused to allow the Israelites to leave Egypt. God also hardened the heart of Sihon, king of Heshbon (Deut 2:30), who fought against Israel* and was defeated (Num 21:21-31).

Other figures of speech are used to express the idea of obduracy: "blind eyes," "deaf ears," "stiff neck" and "stubborn shoulder." These figures are frequently used in reference to Israel (Deut 29:2-4; Is 6:9-10; 29:9-10; 63:17; Jer 5:21-23; Ezek 11:19; 12:1-3). Sometimes God sends a lying spirit to deceive Israel or its leaders (Judg 9:23; 1 Sam 16:14; 18:10; 19:9; 2 Sam 17:14; 1 Kings 12:15). This tradition is also part of the obduracy idea.
As in the case of Pharaoh, Israel sometimes hardens itself and at other times is hardened by God. Isaiah 6:9-10, quoted in all four Gospels, is perhaps the most significant obduracy passage. According to the MT and Targum,* God commands the prophet to "make the heart of this people fat." The LXX, however, gives the text a different nuance: "for the heart of this people has become fat" This difference is significant in the NT.

2. The Synoptic Gospels.

2.1. Mark. The theme of obduracy occurs in four passages in the Gospel of Mark. In 3:5 Pharisees* opposed to Jesus are described as having "hardness of heart." In 4:12 Jesus paraphrases Is 6:9-10, applying the passage to "outsiders" (i.e., non-disciples). In 6:52 and 8:17-21 even the disciples* of Jesus are described as having hardened hearts, unseeing eyes and deaf ears. Only two of the passages, 4:12 and 8:17-21, are presented as sayings of Jesus.

The interpretation of the first text has been vigorously debated, with the first word, the conjunction hina, at the center of the discussion. It has been variously translated "who," "with the result that," "in order that (it be fulfilled)" or "because." These suggestions, however, do not do justice to the syntax of the saying as a whole or to its wider context in Mark. It is better to understand hina in its normal final sense "in order that," as several scholars recently have come to recognize. That is, according to Mark, Jesus tells parables in order that outsiders (i.e., non-disciples) will not understand, repent* or be forgiven (see Forgiveness of Sins). Mark's citation is thus basically true to the thrust of the Isaianic passage as it is found in the MT and Targum.

In Mark 8:17-21 Jesus applies the language of obduracy to the disciples themselves. Many interpreters believe that these passages reflect the Evangelist's interest in the secrecy theme, a theme which may have been an early attempt to explain why Jesus' messianic status was not understood, by the disciples or by anyone else, before the resurrection* (See Christ; Gospel of Mark).

2.2. Matthew. The First Gospel shows little interest in the Markan obduracy theme. The Evangelist omits reference to the disciples' obdurate condition (cf. Mt 14:25-33 with Mk 6:48-52; Mt 16:5-12 with Mk 8:17-21). He also omits reference to the Pharisees' "hardness of heart" (cf. Mt 12:13 with Mk 3:5), although Jesus does inveigh against the scribes* and Pharisees, calling them "hypocrites," "fools" and "blind guides" (Mt 23:13-36). Even though Matthew retains Mark's paraphrase of Isaiah 6:9-10 (Mt 13:13), he introduces the text with the conjunction hoti ("because"), not hina ("in order that") as in Mark. He then augments his Markan source with a verbatim quotation of the LXX version of Isaiah 6:9-10 (Mt 13:14-15), a version which suggests, contrary to the MT and Targum, that obduracy is not a condition brought on by God. Matthew's understanding of obduracy may be summed up in two points: (1) The disciples of Jesus on occasion may have suffered temporary lapses of faith, but they were never spiritually obdurate or opposed to Jesus; (2) Jesus' teaching did not promote obduracy, it only encountered it

2.3. Luke. The Third Gospel also appears to reject Mark's obduracy theme. Although the Evangelist retains Mark's hina clause, "in order that seeing they may not see ..." (Lk 8:10), he omits the second clause ("lest they repent and it be forgiven them"). As the Lukan context makes clear, the point is that Jesus' parables may hinder non-disciples from understanding the "secrets" of the kingdom, but they do not prevent repentance and forgiveness. Failure to respond is in part due to the Devil (see Demons, Devil, Satan), who wishes to snatch away Jesus' word, "lest [people] believe and be saved" (Lk 8:12). Like Matthew, Luke does not portray the disciples as obdurate, only as "slow of heart" until the event of Easter and the opening of their minds to understand the Scriptures (Lk 24:25, 45-47).

The hardness-of-heart idea in the Fourth Gospel has a function somewhat similar to that in Mark. Alluding to OT obduracy language (perhaps to Is 6:9 itself), Jesus says that he "came into the world in order that [hina] those who do not see may see and those who see may become blind" (Jn 9:39). The lack of belief in Jesus, despite his many signs, is said to have fulfilled Scripture (Jn 12:37-38, where Is 53:1 is cited) and is apparently God's will: "For this reason they could not believe, because again spoke Isaiah, 'He has blinded their eyes and hardened their heart . . .' " (Jn 12:39-40, paraphrasing Is 6:10). These passages constitute an important part of a larger theme of mystery and misunderstanding that pervades the Fourth Gospel (2:19-21; 3:1-15; 6:60-66; 8:27; 14:9). The Jewish response of unbelief in Jesus' ministry of signs (semeia) recalls what Moses said to Israel: "You have seen all that the Lord did before your eyes in the land of Egypt ... the signs [LXX: semeia], and those great wonders; but to this day the Lord has not given you a mind to understand, or eyes to see, or ears to hear" (Deut 29:2-4 RSV).
4. Jesus.

Did Jesus himself make use of the language and theology of obduracy? Although some scholars in the past have questioned the authenticity of Mark 4:11-12, a saying attributed to Jesus, it is likely that it does reflect something that Jesus said. But it is probable that the saying originally applied to the whole of Jesus' ministry, not to the parables only. Furthermore, it is possible that Jesus compared himself to the prophet Isaiah whose message had also fallen on deaf ears and alluded to Isaiah 6:9-10 as a way of explaining why so many of his contemporaries had failed to perceive the true significance of his ministry. People did not understand Jesus because their eyes could not see and their ears could not hear. The undiscerning and unbelieving response, therefore, was not evidence that Jesus' ministry was a failure; it was an important witness to the continuity of the biblical witness against Israel's hardness of heart.

C. A Evans

HEALING

According to all four canonical Gospels, Jesus devoted a substantial portion of his ministry to performing miracles of healing for a wide variety of people. These miracles sometimes occurred in response to faith and sometimes to instill faith. They demonstrated Jesus' compassion and his concern to break down social barriers. They challenged the Jewish Sabbath Laws and exposed Israel's faithlessness. Above all, they supported his teaching that the kingdom of God was arriving with his ministry and that he himself was God's unique Son (see Abba; Son of God).

1. Classification
2. Meaning

3. Emphases of the Gospel Writers

4. Authenticity

5. Sociology

6. Significance for Today

1. Classification.

Three major kinds of healing miracles occur in the Gospels. Each requires slightly different interpretation, and some scholars would evaluate the historical reliability* of the various categories differently as well.

1.1. Exorcisms. frequently, Jesus casts one or more demons out of individuals who have been possessed by them (see Demon, Devil). The demons regularly demonstrate that they know who Jesus is, even when most or all of the human onlookers do not (e.g., Mk 1:24; 5:7). They use this knowledge to try to gain mastery over Jesus, since knowledge of one's adversary's name was a key component in exorcisms of that day. But in every instance they fail. Jesus proves his superiority over Satan.

The Gospel accounts differ from many other exorcism stories of antiquity in the immediacy of the exorcisms, the lack of a struggle or extreme violence by the demons and the lack of magical paraphernalia customarily used by the exorcist. Many modern scholars have assumed that what ancient people believed to be demon-possession was simply some severe psychological or physical affliction which today would be treated by medicine or therapy. But the Gospels themselves distinguish between the two (e.g., Mt 10:1; Mk 3:10-11), and contemporary experiences of possession and exorcism which science has been unable to explain are too numerous to support this reductionist approach.

1.2. Physical Healings. Jesus regularly helped blind people to see (e.g., Mt 9:27-31; Mk 8:22-26), the deaf to hear (e.g., Mt 11:5; Mk 7:32-37) and the lame to walk (e.g., Jn 5:1-15). He cleansed lepers (e.g., Lk 5:12-16; 17:11-19), cured fevers (e.g., Mk 1:29-31; Jn 4:43-53), stopped a hemorrhage (Mk 5:24-34), restored a withered hand (Mk 3:1-6), replaced a cut-off ear (Lk 22:51) and healed a wide variety of unspecified illnesses. He healed with a word (e.g., Mt
8:16), without praying to God or invoking his name (except in one instance when he specifically declares that it is for the crowd's benefit—Jn 11:41-42) and sometimes at a long distance from the one who was sick (e.g., Mt 8:5-13). On two occasions he used indirect means and two stages in the healing (Mk 8:22-26; Jn 9:1-7), but normally the cures were instantaneous and unmediated.

Many scholars are willing to grant that people were genuinely healed after their encounters with Jesus, but they attribute the healing to a psychosomatic power of suggestion. The Gospels, however, are clear that Jesus' healings were genuinely supernatural events. H. C. Kee has helpfully delineated the differences in ancient thought concerning medicine (building on the foundation of natural order), miracle (based on belief in divine intervention), and magic (manipulating mysterious forces for personal benefit). Kee demonstrates that Jesus' healings normally belong to the second of these three categories.

1.3 Resurrections. The Gospels report that on three occasions Jesus brought back to life an individual who had recently died (Mk 5:35-43; Lk 7:11-17; Jn 11:1-44). In the first two the death seems just to have occurred within a matter of hours; in the case of Lazarus four days have passed (Jn 11:39). Some writers prefer to speak of these as resuscitations or reanimations to distinguish them from the resurrection* of Jesus and from the coming resurrection of all believers which is a restoration to life without death ever again intruding. But inasmuch as these terms suggest a non-miraculous procedure, they do not correspond to what the Gospels describe. For critics who are inclined to disbelieve the miraculous, the resurrections are the most incredible of all of Jesus' healing miracles. Ultimately their credibility depends on the evidence for the resurrection of Jesus. If the latter is admitted, then the former, temporary resurrections follow as a natural corollary, a foretaste of the future, permanent resurrection of all God's people.

2. Meaning.

2.1. Teaching about Faith Sometimes Jesus heals an individual in response to that person's faith. Both Jairus' daughter and the woman with the hemorrhage are explicitly declared to be healed as a result of their faith or of the faith of their loved ones (Mk 5:34, 36). Sometimes lack of faith prevents Jesus from healing, as at his hometown of Nazareth (Mt 13:58). Jesus similarly explains that his disciples were unable to exorcise a demon-possessed epileptic because of their lack of faith (Mt 17:20). Many Christians deduce from accounts like these that if a person could only generate enough faith, healing would always occur. But this does not follow. There is a balancing theme which pervades the Gospels as well. Frequently, healings occur where there is little or no faith in order to try to instill belief in Jesus as the Son of God. All of the healings in John have this as one purpose (Jn 20:31); sometimes it is pre-eminent (Jn 4:53-54). After Peter's mother-in-law is cured of her fever, she serves Jesus (Mt 8:15). Jesus upbraids several of the cities in which he has worked miracles because they did not repent (Mt 11:20-24). So it is clear that miracles may be designed to produce faith where there is none; once that faith has developed, healings may be less necessary (cf. Jesus' attitude to those who demanded signs to support their faith, Jn 4:48; 20:29).

2.2. Jesus' Compassion. Although it seems a natural inference that one of Jesus' main motives for healing would be his compassion for the sick, the Gospels state this explicitly only on rare occasions (e.g., Mt 14:14; 20:34). If compassion were a dominant motive, then presumably all sick people in his day (or in any other day) would have been healed, and this was patently not the case (cf. Jn 5:3-5 in which Jesus singles out only one of the many disabled people lying near the Bethesda pool). Jesus undoubtedly had compassion for all the sick, but the broader testimony of Scripture is that God's power may be demonstrated at least as dramatically through people's suffering as through their health. (In the Gospels the classic example is the passion and crucifixion of Christ; authentic discipleship also embraced the way of the cross [cf. Mk 8:31-35].)

2.3. Breaking Down Social Barriers. Frequently Jesus heals in such a way as to incur the anger of the Jewish leaders. He does not have to touch the leper to cleanse him, but does so deliberately to show that he is unconcerned with the ritual taboos that separated classes of people (Mk 1:41; see Clean and Unclean). He sends ten lepers (see Leprosy) to the priest* for their cures to be confirmed, but only a Samaritan* returns to give thanks; Jesus declares that one clean, leaving open the question of what happened to the other nine (Lk 17:11-19). The point is that the despised, outcast Samaritan is the hero; the social barriers Judaism* had erected are being destroyed. Jesus praises a Syro-Phoenician woman for her faith and heals her daughter, demonstrating that his saving power is not to be limited to Israel* (Mk 7:24-30; see Gentiles). In each of these instances Jesus is preparing the way for the establishment of a broadly inclusive religious movement not bounded by barriers of race, sex or nationality.
2.4. Challenging Israel's Law and Exposing the Nation's Faithlessness. Closely related to the previous category are those examples of Jesus breaking the Sabbath laws (e.g., Mk 3:1-6; Lk 13:10-17; 14:1-6). He does not have to heal on the Sabbath; not one of the maladies he cures on that day is said to be life-threatening. But he shows that the restrictions regularly attached to Jewish Sabbath law were of human rather than divine origin. He praises the Roman centurion for a quality of faith superior to that which he has found anywhere in Israel and predicts that many Gentiles will replace many Jews in God's kingdom (Mt 8:10-11). He laments the wickedness of the generation of Israelites in which he lives as contributing to the inability of his disciples* to effect an exorcism (Mt 17:17). This is not a critique by a reformer but a condemnation by one who is in the process of inaugurating a new age in redemptive history, in which the laws of the Mosaic covenant cannot carry over unchanged (see Law).

2.5. Teaching about Sin. Two healings recorded in John juxtapose opposite perspectives on the relationship between sickness and sin.* After healing the man who had been an invalid for thirty-eight years, Jesus tells him, "Stop sinning or something worse may happen to you" (Jn 5:14). Here Jesus presumes the common Jewish view that illness was a punishment for sin. But later, when his disciples ask him why a certain man had been born blind, he denies that it had anything to do with the sin of either that man or his parents (Jn 9:3). Instead, it was to manifest God's glory. Thus, sometimes healings undo a punishment for sin; other times there is no relation between health and obedience, or between sin and sickness, beyond the general observation that all evil came into the world through original sin.

2.6. Signs of the Kingdom and of the Messiah. The Gospels nowhere distinguish between the meaning of Jesus' miracles of healing and other kinds of miracles. When one studies all of the miracles of the Gospels, it becomes clear that their predominant purpose is to demonstrate the inauguration of the kingdom of God in the person and work of Jesus the Messiah (cf. esp. Betz and Grimm, Wenham and Blomberg; see Christ). But an analysis of the healing miracles alone makes this point evident

Several passages in the Gospels give an explicit rationale for Jesus' healings. Jesus declares that his exorcisms prove that the "kingdom of God has come upon you" (Mt 12:28). He sends the messengers from John the Baptist* back to their imprisoned leader to tell him that the healing of the blind, lame, deaf and lepers (see Leprosy) and the resurrections from the dead answer John's question about... whether or not Jesus was "the one to come" (Mt 11:4-6). He heals the paralytic who was lowered through the roof, so demonstrating that the Son of Man* has authority* to forgive sins (see Forgiveness of Sins), a prerogative reserved for God alone (Mk 2:10-11). Giving sight to the blind leads to Jesus' claim to be "the light* of the world" (Jn 9:5) just as raising Lazarus reinforces his pronouncement that he is "the resurrection and the life" (Mt 11:25). Numerous summary statements throughout the Gospel link his healing with his preaching as the two major foci of his ministry (e.g., Mt 4:23; 9:35; 21:14), summed up under the call to repentance "for the kingdom of God is near" (Mk 1:15).

In addition to these specific statements, several healing miracles point to the arrival of the messianic age more indirectly. When Jesus heals a deaf-mute, Mark describes the man as one who could "hardly talk" (Mk 7:32), an expression found in the LXX only in Isaiah 35:6, in which the prophet is describing the wonders of the age to come, including the fact that the "mute tongue" will "shout for joy." The resurrection of the widow of Nain's son (Lk 7:11-17) strikingly resembles Elisha's raising the son of the Shunammite woman (2 Kings 4:8-37), especially since Nain was located on approximately the same site as ancient Shunem. Even the crowds pick up on the resemblance as they marvel at the "great prophet" (Lk 7:16) who has arisen among them (probably implying the ultimate, eschatological prophet, fulfilling Deut 18:18). The nature of Jesus' messianic mission is clarified, in ways not particularly pleasing to his followers, when he heals Malchus' ear which Peter has cut off (Jn 18:10-11). His will be the way of the cross, not resisting the suffering which God has ordained for him.

3.1. Mark. Of all the Evangelists, Mark devotes the largest percentage of his Gospel to the miracles and healings of Jesus (approx. thirty-one per cent). For Mark they demonstrate the establishment of God's reign and the need for repentance (6:7-12). Mark focuses on the power of Jesus and on his dramatic confrontations with the forces of Satan. Jesus conquers disease, demons and death (5:1-43). Mark stresses the immediacy of the miracles (1:29, 42; 2:8). His stories of Jesus' exorcisms contain more demonstrations of combat and violence than is common elsewhere in the Gospels (1:25; 5:6-13). Jesus discloses his emotions and even his anger at the work of the devil (3:5; 9:19).

As throughout his Gospel, Mark stresses what has come to be called the "messianic secret" (see Christ; Mark, Gospel of). Repeatedly, after various healings, Jesus commands those healed not to tell others who he is or what has happened (e.g., 1:34; 3:12; 5:43; 7:36). There have been numerous explanations of this motif. The most popular in critical circles is that associated with W. Wrede: Jesus never claimed to be the Messiah but later was confessed as such by his followers. To account for the silence of the earlier tradition, they alleged that Jesus at first forbade them to tell others of his messianic works and words. Many scholars have backed away from parts of Wrede's hypothesis and affirmed a core of genuinely messianic Jesus material, but most agree that Mark has substantially embellished and emphasized this theme, along with the motifs of misunderstanding and secrecy. More convincing are two less radical explanations: (1) Jesus recognized that most of his contemporaries were looking for a political Messiah which did not correspond to his mission (see esp. Jn 6:15); and (2) Only after his suffering, death and resurrection could the nature of his messianic ministry be fully understood (see esp. Mk 9:9).

On two occasions Mark deliberately contrasts the unbelief of both the disciples and the crowds with Jesus' ability to heal and the belief generated in those healed (8:14-21, 22-26; 9:1-13, 14-32). Yet at the same time the disciples are commissioned and empowered to carry out healings identical to those Jesus himself performed (6:7-12). Mark further uses healings to frame his first main section of stories about Jesus' controversies with the Jewish leaders (2:1-12; 3:1-6), and elsewhere sees healing as a kind of teaching itself (1:27). His is also the only Gospel to refer to the use of anointing oil in conjunction with healing (6:13).

Mark's emphasis on Jesus' miracles has often been linked with a divine man* christology—a portrayal of Jesus in terms of other Hellenistic wonder-workers of his day. But Jesus' exasperation with those who demanded of him signs as they did of others (8:11-13) and his warning against false prophets who would perform miracles (13:21-23) call this interpretation into question. Other scholars have suggested that Mark was trying to counter a divine man christology by emphasizing Jesus' suffering and servanthood. But surely then he would not have needed to include nearly as many miracles as he did. Better than either of these approaches is one which sees Mark's purposes as more pastoral than polemical. Mark expected miracles, especially healings, to continue to occur in the church of his day (9:28-29), hence the emphasis on signs and wonders in 1:1—8:26. But Mark's church is also undergoing suffering and persecution, frequently without supernatural alleviation. So it needs to learn to follow Jesus on the way to the cross (8:34), hence the emphasis on humility and servanthood in 8:27—16:7 (see 3.2. Matthew. Matthew's largest group of healing miracles occurs in chapters 8—9. Here Matthew presents Jesus as one mighty in deed, while sharply focusing on his sovereignty and authority. Matthew regularly abbreviates the healing stories, eliminating distracting detail and dialog in order to focus more exclusively on christology (e.g., 8:28-34; 9:1-8). At times this compression or telescoping of narrative is so drastic as to border on contradiction with his sources (9:18-26; cf. Mk 5:21-43). For Matthew, Jesus is the promised Jewish Messiah, the Son of David,* and several of those whom Jesus heals confess him as such (9:27-31; 20:29-34). Several who are healed further acknowledge him as Lord* (8:2; 15:22; 17:15). The healings fulfill OT Scripture (11:4-5; cf. Is 61:1; 35:6), especially those connected with Isaiah's Suffering Servant (8:17; cf. Is 53:4; see Servant of Yahweh). Twice Matthew depicts Jesus as healing two blind men (9:27-31; 20:29-34), where the parallel accounts mention only one. Perhaps Matthew is concerned to apply the Deuteronomic criterion that a matter is confirmed by the testimony of two or more witnesses (Deut 19:15).

Matthew's Gospel is at one and the same time the most particularist and the most universalist. He includes statements in conjunction with his healings and those of his disciples which reserve their miracle-working power for Israel (10:5-6; 15:24). In reserving his healing ministry for the crowds who are not yet his disciples, he can be seen as presenting himself as the healer of Israel, where the nation's leaders have failed (see Gerhardsson). Yet, upon seeing the Canaanite woman's faith, he is persuaded to heal her daughter (15:28). The best resolution of this apparent tension is to recognize Matthew's view of salvation history. God's call for repentance comes to the Jews first, but after they have had a chance to respond it must go forth into all the world.

In his summary statements of key stages of Jesus' ministry, Matthew regularly refers to the role of Jesus' healing with distinctive emphasis (e.g., 4:23-24; 9:35). These summaries consistently juxtapose Jesus' healing with his preaching and teaching to give both aspects of his ministry equal weight. Matthew's larger outline mirrors this balance (cf. chaps. 5—7 with 8—9). Similarly, Matthew diminishes the miraculous and heightens the controversy in a series of healing stories so as to give both elements equal attention (e.g., 9:1-8; 12:1-14). So too, healing as well as teaching leads to Jesus' rejection, arrest and crucifixion (21:10-17, 23-27; 26:57-66).
But after the resurrection the Great Commission does not repeat Jesus' earlier commands to the disciples to heal the sick as they evangelize (28:18-20; cf. 10:7-8). Arguably, Matthew expects his community to continue to experience both physical and spiritual salvation in Jesus. But he does not expect them to be able to reproduce such miracles with the frequency that the twelve disciples once did (see Heil).

3.3. Luke. Luke's Gospel is most concerned with Jesus' true humanity and his compassion for the outcasts of society. Only in Luke does Jesus cleanse the Samaritan leper (17:11-19). He is also most interested in portraying Jesus as Savior [set Salvation] of the world* (2:11). Part of the holistic salvation which Jesus brings includes physical healing. Jesus' programmatic manifesto of liberation (see Jubilee) combines preaching good news (see Gospel [Good News]) to the poor (see Rich and Poor) with providing sight for the blind (4:18). The same combination recurs later (7:21-22) in a Q* passage which Luke has redacted to stress the role of healings in testifying to Jesus as the promised "coming one."

In Luke's Gospel the lines are more blurred between healing and exorcism. Disease and demon-possession may both be attributed to Satan (5:35 and 39 employ the identical word for a "rebuke"), and a crippled woman's malady is ascribed to a "spirit" of infirmity (13:11-12)—an expression otherwise unparalleled in the NT. At the same time, the demons regularly recognize Jesus as the Son of God (4:41; 8:28) who is victorious over them. Occasionally, Jesus' ability to heal and vanquish demons borders on the magical—e.g., power goes out from a mere touch of his robe (8:44). Yet Luke makes it clear that it is faith and not magic which saves (8:48). In fact, many writers believe that it is Luke, of the four Evangelists, who makes most clear the possibility of miracles serving as a basis of faith (cf. esp. Achtemeier). Despite the influential view of H. Conzelmann to the contrary, it is obvious that Luke does not envision the interval between Jesus' temptation and Gethsemane as a "Satan-free" period. Rather, Luke pictures Jesus embroiled in an eschatological battle with Satan, whose powers he is decisively vanquishing as he ushers in the age of the new covenant (see esp. 10:17-18).

Luke does not portray the Jews in so uncompromising terms as does Matthew. He is more concerned with the worthiness of the Gentiles than with the faithlessness of Israel (7:1-10; cf. Mt 8:5-13). But while he uses different texts and typologies (see Typology), most notably parallels with Elijah and Elisha (e.g., 7:1-28) to depict Jesus as the eschatological prophet (7:16), he is equally concerned to portray Jesus as the fulfillment of Jewish hopes (4:16-21; 24:44). In fact he is most interested in tracing Jesus' journey to Jerusalem and his ministry under the shadow of the cross (9:51). His healings and other miracles are but a prelude to suffering which has been ordained by the Scriptures (13:32). Thus like Mark and Matthew, Luke expects that healings will continue in the apostolic age and beyond (see section 6.1.), but he recognizes their limited value in creating faith (16:31) and subordinates them to conversion and salvation in importance (10:20).

3.4. John. John offers the most contrast in his view of Jesus' healings. For him they are pre-eminently signs designed to bring people to faith in Jesus as the Messiah and Son of God (4:54). Many commentators find this in flat contradiction with the Synoptic accounts, which portray Jesus as refusing to work miracles in response to the demand for a sign (Mt 12:38-42; Mk 8:11-13). But there is an important difference. Neither in John nor in the Synoptics will Jesus produce a sign on demand, especially when the request comes from one who is skeptical of Jesus' power or hostile to his preaching (cf. Jn 6:30-59). God's power cannot be commanded by human whim, and Jesus will not coerce anyone to believe. Even his own family members coming to him with legitimate requests cannot dictate what he will do. He may grant their requests but only at the precise time he chooses (2:3-7; 7:3-10).

At the same time, fair-minded assessment of Jesus' powers should elicit a confession of faith (20:31). Yet John recognizes this will not always occur. Even as he is the Evangelist most concerned to appropriate the apologetic value of Jesus' miracles, he is also the one who consistently praises those who do not need such crutches for their faith (4:48; 20:29). With maturity comes less dependence on the miraculous. So too, when healings plant the seeds of belief, they must grow into a deeper faith which better understands who Jesus is (9:35-38).

For John healings are not only signs but works (5:36). They show that the miracles are not independent actions but part of God's total activity, or "work," in Jesus (4:34; 5:17). The signs inevitably lead to explanatory discourses which invest them with symbolic and christological significance. Healing the blind man and raising Lazarus reinforce Jesus' claims to be the light* of the world (9:5) and the resurrection and the life (11:25). These two healings demonstrate God's glory* (11:40; 9:3), a key motif throughout John's Gospel. Healings in John further provoke controversies with the Jews* as polemical as those found in Matthew (9:13-41)—including disputes over Sabbath laws (5:16-47)—and issuing in death threats (11:45-57; 12:10-11). But ultimately these debates focus more on the christological questions; many of the Jewish leaders reject Jesus' claims, but many others are more favorably impressed (9:16; 11:45).

Overall there are fewer miracles in John than in any of the Synoptics, and only a handful of healings, none of which is an exorcism. But those which are presented are given more explicitly theological interpretation, in keeping with John's more generally complex interplay of history and theology. Fundamentally, they function as signs of God's glory and a testimony (see Witness) of the Father to the Son through the works which he enables him to perform (see Fortna).

4. Authenticity.

4.1. Challenges. In the modern western world many people do not believe in the miraculous healings of the Gospels because they think that science has disproved the possibility of miracles. Biblical miracles, however, by definition involve a supernatural God; if such a God exists, it is only logical to conceive of him as occasionally choosing to transcend the laws of medicine and physics which normally govern the universe. Even today, after fervent prayer or the involvement of faith healers, many people recover from illness in ways which physicians cannot explain.

Other skeptics argue on philosophical grounds that the evidence or testimony for a miraculous healing could never outweigh the evidence in favor of some naturalistic explanation. But it is not obvious why this should be so; such logic actually requires excluding a much larger category of unusual events which human experience has nevertheless proved real (see Brown).

Still other critics argue on historical grounds that the picture of Jesus as healer must be understood as the vestige of a primitive world view which permitted many ancient teachers and leaders to have miracles ascribed to them. Unless one is prepared to accept the equally good testimony of other ancient writers to the thaumaturgic powers of various rabbis (e.g., Hanina ben Dosa and Honi the Rain-maker), Greek philosophers and divine men (e.g., Apollonius of Tyana and Asclepius; see Divine Man), and occasionally even a Roman emperor (e.g., Vespasian), one has no reason for believing the Gospels. This argument holds up to a point; there may well be other genuinely supernatural miracles in many periods of world history. God may well use unbelievers to serve his purposes, and the devil certainly employs counterfeit signs to serve his (see Richards). There may be extra-canonical, non-Christian accounts of healings which are true, but for the most part it is inaccurate to say that numerous other accounts have as much evidence in support of them as do the Gospel healings. And A. E. Harvey's helpful survey of miracle stories in ancient Jewish and Greco-Roman sources demonstrates just how unique the Gospel accounts are both in style and significance.

4.2. Corroboration. Once antisupernatural bias is removed, the Gospel healing miracles actually satisfy the various historical criteria of authenticity quite well. There is good external evidence supporting them. Other portions of the New Testament refer back to Christ's wonder-working powers (e.g., Acts 10:38; 1 Cor 15:4-8; Heb 2:4), and apocryphal Christian texts, while fancifully embellishing the accounts of Jesus' ministry, nevertheless bear indirect testimony to his power to heal by focusing so much attention on this aspect of his career (see esp. the Infancy Gospel of Thomas and the Acts of Pilate). Non-Christian Jewish sources also recognize that Jesus was a healer. Both Josephus (Ant. 18:63-64) and the Talmud (b. Sanh. 107b) refer to his extraordinary powers, although the latter source attributes them to a demonic rather than a divine origin.

Internal evidence proves even more supportive. The miracles pass the dissimilarity test (see Form Criticism); although earlier Jews and later Christians apparently healed some people miraculously, with prayer* to God and invocation of the name of Christ regularly featured in their attempts. While individual parallels can be identified for specific Gospel healings (cf. esp. Lk 7:11-17 with Philostratus The Life of Apollonius of Tyana 4.45), the overall directness, authority, simplicity and restraint of the accounts of Jesus' healings are unique.

The healings satisfy the criterion of multiple attestation (see Form Criticism); they recur in all layers or sources of the Gospel tradition (Mark, John, Q,* M* and L*), and references to them appear in multiple forms as well (summary statements [e.g., Mk 3:7-12], dialogs [e.g., Mt 11:1-6], controversy stories [e.g., Mk 2:1-12] as well as the numerous narrative accounts of the healings themselves).

They correspond to the Palestinian environment of the early first century; features like the use of spittle (Jn 9:6; Mk 8:23) in a therapeutic context or the types of illnesses prevalent all fit in well with the times and customs. Even as specific a detail as the description of the pool of Bethesda near the Sheep Gate having five porticoes (Jn 5:2), where Jesus healed a long-term invalid, has been corroborated by archeology.

Most importantly, the meaning of the healings, as already noted, is closely bound up with Jesus' teaching about the presence of the kingdom of God. They thereby satisfy the criterion of coherence, fitting well with that body of sayings of Jesus most commonly held to be authentic.

5. Sociology.

A major new development in the past decade of NT scholarship centers on sociological analysis. Jesus' healings, no less than other portions of the Gospels, have been scrutinized not so much from a historical perspective, asking "What really happened?" as from a social-scientific perspective, asking "How did the stories of these events function in first-century society?" The work of H. C. Kee and G. Theissen has proved seminal here. They compare the Gospel accounts with stories of healings in other Greco-Roman contexts (e.g., of Isis or Asklepios) which were not necessarily ever viewed as entirely historical.

Rather, the stories of healings functioned symbolically to affirm meaning, order and integration of reality in a world filled with conflict and suffering. Similarly, the Gospel healings should be viewed as symbolic accounts which affirm, from a primarily rural, poor and uncultured perspective, the possibility of rescue, salvation and redemption in this life in a world of rapidly overturning geographical, economic and cultural norms.

The sociological method offers important insights into the function of miracle stories in the early Christian world. It is less clear that this method stands as strictly opposed to traditional historical methods as it alleges. The Gospel accounts remain tied to history in a way not entirely identical to various Greco-Roman parallels. If substantial portions of the Evangelist's narratives, including stories of the miraculous, did not occur as described, the claims of Christianity to be built on a unique space-time incarnation of God would be undermined. But granted that Jesus did perform miracles, sociology can prove very beneficial in explaining why people continued to talk and write about them.

The question of whether or not people living after NT times can expect miraculous healing has often polarized Christianity. At one end of the spectrum many argue that the miracles are unique and not to be repeated following the close of the apostolic age. Others expect them to be common in every age for those filled with the Holy Spirit* and sufficient faith. In fact the data of the NT supports neither of these extremes. Evidence reinforces both the claim that miraculous healings will appear in almost every age of church history and the observation that such healings will still be more the exception than the norm (see Sabourin).

6.1. Evidence for Continuation As he sent them out to minister in the cities of Israel, Jesus commanded his disciples to carry on exactly the same kind of healing ministry which he had been performing, and he gave them the power to execute his commands (Mt 10:1-10). Some of the injunctions he gave the disciples on these early missions were later rescinded (Lk 22:35-38), but not the command to heal.

The book of Acts includes close parallels between the types of healings wrought by Christ and those performed by the disciples, proving that the crucifixion, resurrection and coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost did not alter the disciples' ability or need to effect miraculous cures. They are able to heal the lame (Acts 3:1-10; 14:8-10), to cast out demons (16:16-18; 5:16) and to raise the dead (9:3641; probably 20:7-12). The almost magical powers attached to Christ's robe reappear in conjunction with Peter's shadow (5:15) and Paul's handkerchiefs (19:11-12). The wording of the account of Peter's healing of Aeneas (9:32-35) and of the resurrection of Dorcas (9:36-41 ) so closely parallels the wording of similar stories in the Gospels (Lk 5:17-26; 8:49-56) that Luke almost certainly was trying to make clear that the apostles* had received exactly the same healing power which Jesus himself had. Nor is this power limited to apostles. For example, Luke describes the deacons Stephen and Philip as equally endowed with the ability to work signs and wonders (Acts 6:8; 8:13).

6.2. Evidence of Exceptionality. Though some would argue that there is healing in the atonement (Mt 8:17), clearly no one receives full physical healing until the life to come, since all die. There is good evidence, therefore, that supernatural, physical healing should be viewed as the exception rather than the rule in this life. Healings, like other miracles, are not uniformly spread throughout the pages of Scripture or periods of church history. They tend to be clustered around the initial stages of key advances in the knowledge of God's Word and will—Moses with Pharaoh, Elijah and Elisha, Jesus and the next two centuries of church history, and sporadically throughout the Christian era until a substantial outpouring of the Holy Spirit has once again made healings well known in the twentieth century.

On the pages of the Gospels there is no indication that Jesus healed all or even a majority of the sick people in his day. He warns against those who would work counterfeit signs and wonders in his name (Mt 7:21-23), especially as the last days unfold (Mt 24:5). He refuses to work signs on demand and warns against an inappropriate dependence on the spectacular (Mt 12:38-42; Jn 4:48; 20:29). Even the most well-authenticated signs do not necessarily prove their divine origin (Mt 9:32-33; 12:22-24); Christian faith should therefore be based on a more solid foundation.

Some of the devil's strongest temptations involved his encouraging Christ to rely on his miraculous power to avoid the way of suffering and the road to the cross (Lk 4:1-12; see Temptation of Jesus). Gethsemane* is the most powerful testimony in all of Scripture to the divinely ordained necessity of not always receiving protection from suffering (Lk 22:39-46). In his epistles Paul echoes this theology (esp. 2 Cor 4:7-18; 6:3-10). Not all receive or benefit from gifts of healing, and Paul personally and agonizingly learns the lesson that God's grace is sufficient for him and that God's power is made perfect in Paul's weakness (2 Cor 12:8).

6.3. Conclusion.

Miraculous healings can and do occur today. They are perhaps most prevalent in areas into which the kingdom of God is advancing for the first time, or for the first time in a long while. Exorcisms tend to occur most in conjunction with the preaching of the gospel in lands and areas in which Satan has long held sway and in which Christianity has not flourished. To the extent that Western societies continue to become more paganized, one may expect a continued revival of healings and exorcisms there as well. As Christian individuals and congregations mature, it may well be that the need for such miracles, as a testimony to a non-Christian culture of the truth and power of the gospel, will diminish. But Christians of all theological persuasions must scrupulously avoid dictating to God what he must do or what he cannot do. Ultimately, God's Spirit blows where it wills, and no one can unerringly predict where his gifts of healing will break out (see Smedes).
See also Demon, Devil, Satan.

C. L Blomberg

HEART. See Ethics Of Jesus; Hardness Of Heart

HEAVEN AND HELL

Beyond the common reference to the physical "sky," the Gospels use heaven to refer both to the abode of God,* as well as to the place of eternal habitation for those who obey God and follow Jesus. The Gospels use the concept of hell to refer to the place of punishment for those who reject God, Jesus and the prophets*

1. Heaven
2. Hell

1. Heaven.

1.1. Heaven in the OT. The most common words for heaven in the OT are the Hebrew šāmayîm or the Aramaic šmayîn. Given the large number of occurrences, only predominant usages can be addressed here (see Traub).

On the most mundane level, šāmayîm/šmayîn are used to refer simply to the physical "sky" or "air" above the earth (Gen 1:8; Ps 104:2). Used in this way, it refers to one of the creations of God (Gen 1:1; Ps 33:6; Amos 9:6) which therefore ought not to be worshipped (Jer 44:17-23; Is 47:13-14). Given God's dominion over it (Deut 4:39; 10:14), it is understood to be the source from which he sends the various physical phenomena which affect the earth (e.g., Gen 8:2; Ex 9:23; Deut 33:13; Josh 10:11; Job 38:29, 37; Ps 147:8; Is 55:10; Jer 49:36). It is also the place where God has set the multiple heavenly lights and bodies (Gen 1:14; Job 9:9; 38:31). Though it can represent lasting duration (Ps 89:29; Deut 11:21), it too is subject to judgment* and destruction (2 Sam 22:8; Is 51:6; Job 14:12). It will, however, be recreated (Is 65:17; 66:22).

Alongside this conception is the OT belief that heaven is the habitation of God (1 Kings 8:30; Ps 14:2; Is 63:15) and of angels* (Gen 28:12; 1 Kings 22:19; cf. Is 6:2-3). Heaven either contains God's throne (Ps 103:19; 1 Kings 22:19) or functions as the throne itself (Is 66:1). It cannot, however, contain him (1 Kings 8:27). Given this close association, he is referred to as the "God of heaven" (Gen 24:3; 2 Chron 36:23; Ezra 1:2; Neh 1:4), who hears from his lofty abode both to judge the ungodly (Gen 19:24; 1 Kings 8:32) and to help his people (Ps 102:19-20 (MT 102:20-21); 113:5-9; 1 Kings 8:30-52). Heaven, therefore, is the source of many blessings* (Gen 49:25; Deut 33:13; 1 Kings 8:35). Since God is understood to be "above," he is sought there in prayer, often with upstretched hands (Ex 9:29; 1 Kings 8:22).

Finally, the tendency to use heaven as a substitute for the name of God begins in the OT. In Daniel 4:26 [MT 4:23] Daniel announces to Nebuchadnezzar that the purpose of the Lord's judgment on him is to convince him that "heaven" rules. Clearly, this is a circumlocution for the divine name, a tendency that is hinted at elsewhere in the OT (e.g., Ps 73:9; Job 20:27; Dan 12:7) and further developed in the subsequent literature.
1.2. Heaven in the LXX. The LXX translators used the Greek ouranos/ouranoi to render the Hebrew šāmayîm and the Aramaic šmayîn (cf. 1 Kgdms 2:10; 2 Kgdms 22:10; Is 44:23; Hab 3:3), subsuming all of the connotations which the latter words entail. In only a few instances do the translators add ouranos, mainly to achieve greater vividness and concreteness, as well as to emphasize the linkage between God and heaven (see Traub). Most importantly, through the LXX the plural ouranoi (“heavens”) comes into the Greek usage, leading to its frequent use in the NT.

1.3. Heaven in Other Jewish Literature. Subsequent Jewish literature draws heavily on these diverse portrayals of heaven, developing them far beyond the detail found in the OT. Frequently, the physical aspects of heaven are discussed, as the human author is given a cosmic tour to observe its secrets (e.g., T. Levi 2:6-3:8; / Enoch 17:2-18:14; 43:1-4; 72:1–80:8). At the end of the age these will be involved in the catastrophic and apocalyptic* events that transpire (e.g., 4 Ezra 5:4-5; T. Levi 4:1; 1 Enoch 1:4; 80:2-7; Sib. Or. 3:75-90).

Under the influence of such OT phrases as "heaven of heavens" and "heaven and heaven of heavens" (Deut 10:14; 1 Kings 8:27; 2 Chron 2:6 [MT 2:5]; 6:18), the belief in multiple layers of heaven developed (e.g., T. Levi 2:6—3:8; b. Roš Haš. 24b; b. Sank 110a). At the uppermost height is God's throne (T. Levi 3:4; 5:1), surrounded by angels (T. Levi 3:1-8; 1 Enoch 51:4; 61:10-11). Paradise, usually identified as the Garden of Eden, was believed to be preserved with God in heaven. It would ultimately be opened to the righteous in the next age so that they might eat of the Tree of Life (T. Levi 18:10-11; cf. also 2 Apoc. Bar. 4:3-7). In 4 Ezra 7:36-38 the author presents "paradise" as a place of "delight and rest" opposite the pit of "hell." This may provide evidence of a tradition similar to which Jesus draws upon in Luke 16:19-31.

In addition to the belief in the destruction and recreation of heaven (1 Enoch 72:1; 91:16: Sib. Or. 3:75-90; b. 'Abod. Zar. 17a), the notion of a "transfiguration" of the old heaven is also present (Jub. 1:29; 1 Enoch 45:4; T. Levi 18:1-14). Rather than eternity in heaven, the reward for the righteous usually is a life of bliss on a cleansed or recreated earth (cf. 2 Apoc. Bar. 73:1-74:3; 1 Enoch 25:3-7; 45:4-5; 51:3-5; Apoc. Abr. 29:17-21; cf. 4 Ezra 7:119-124; but cf. Josephus Ant. 18. §14;J.W. 2. §163; 3. §§374-75).

The tendency to use heaven as a circumlocution for the divine name is most evident in the rabbinic writings (e.g., b. 'Abod. Zar. 18a; b. Sanh. 15b; 17a).
Typical are such phrases as "the kingdom of heaven" (m. Ber. 2:2; b. Hag. 5b), "the fear of heaven" (m. 'Abot 1:3; b. Ber. 33b), "the sake of heaven" (m. 'Abot 4:11) and the "name of heaven" (m. 'Abot 4:4; b. Hag. 16a).

1.4. Heaven in the Gospels. Much of the use of "heaven" in the Gospels mirrors this literary milieu. Moreover, the use of the concept of heaven is broader than merely the use of the word ouranos.

1.4.1. The Message of John the Baptist. Given the limited amount of John's preaching in the Gospels (see John the Baptist), only a few allusions to John's use of the concept of heaven are preserved. One such allusion occurs in Matthew 3:12 and its parallel Luke 3:17, where he describes the ministry of the "mightier" one who would follow him. John declares that he will "clear his threshing floor" and "gather his wheat into (his) granary." Since the eschaton was about to dawn, the great and final separation between the wicked and the righteous was soon to transpire. Accordingly, the "granary" appears to function as a metaphor for heaven, to which those whom the "coming one" finds righteous will be taken (cf. Mt 13:30, 40-43). In John 1:32, the Baptist bears witness to the anointing of Jesus by the Spirit of God, who descended from heaven in the appearance of a dove (see Holy Spirit). Finally, John uses "heaven" as a circumlocution for the divine name in John 3:27.

1.4.2. The Teaching of Jesus in the Gospels. Jesus speaks of heaven in several ways. As in the OT, he employs ouranos to refer simply to the sky or the air. For instance, heaven is the domain of the birds (Mt 6:26; 8:20 par. Lk 9:58; Mk 4:32 par. Mt 13:32 and Lk 13:19) as well as the abode of the clouds (Mk 14:62 par. Mt 26:64). It bears portents of coming weather (Lk 12:56; Mt 16:2-3), and it will be the theater of future catastrophic events (Mk 13:25-26 par. Mt 24:29-30 and Lk 21:26-27). When used in this sense, it is included in the created order under God's sovereign dominion (Mt 11:25 par. Lk 10:21). Unlike the Law and Jesus' teachings, it may not endure forever (Mt 5:18 par. Lk 16:17; Mk 13:31 par. Mt 24:35 and Lk 21:33).

More significantly, heaven is the abode of God (e.g., Mt 5:16; 6:1; 7:21; 10:32), from which also the Spirit (Jn 15:26) and the Son (Jn 3:13; 6:33, 38) are sent. It is also the place to which Jesus ascended (Lk 24:51). It is not surprising, therefore, that the will of God is done perfectly in heaven (Mt 6:10). The angels, too, are said to inhabit heaven (Mk 12:25 par. Mt 22:30; Mk 13:32 par. Mt 24:36; Mt 18:10; 28:2; Lk 2:15; Jn 1:51).
By metonymy, heaven is also used by Jesus as a circumlocution for the divine name. One evidence of this tendency is shown in his query to the religious leaders regarding John's baptism; either it came from humans or from heaven (Mk 11:30 par. Mt 21:25 and Lk 20:4). Likewise, the repentant prodigal confesses that he has sinned both against his father and against heaven (Lk 15:18, 21).

Finally, Jesus refers to heaven as the place of future bliss for the righteous (Mt 13:43; see Justice, Righteousness) who follow him. Those who are persecuted because they are Jesus' disciples are instructed to rejoice because they have a "great reward" in heaven (Mt 5:12 par. Lk 6:23). Similarly, those who give sacrificially to the needy will gain an incorruptible "treasure" (Mt 6:20 par. Lk 12:33; cf. Mk 10:21 par. Mt 19:21 and Lk 18:22). Jesus' disciples are promised a "room" in his "Father's house" where they will be with Jesus (Jn 14:2-3). Accordingly, the image of the banquet is employed to portray heaven as a place of joy and celebration (cf. Mt 8:11 par. Lk 13:28-29; Mt 25:10; 22:1-10 par. Lk 14:16-24; 22:29-30; cf. also Mk 14:25 par. Mt 26:29 and Lk 22:16). In contrast to the suffering of gehenna, it is characterized as "life" (Mk 9:43, 45 par. Mt 18:8-9). Moreover, it is understood to be eternal (e.g., Mk 10:30 par. Mt 19:29 and Lk 18:30; Jn 3:16, 36; 5:24; et passim; Mt 25:46; Lk 16:9). Those who enter the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) will gain this eternal life (Mk 10:17-25 par. Mt 19:16-24 and Lk 18:18-25). Far from being a place of inactivity, Jesus implies that heaven will involve further responsibility for its inhabitants (Mt 25:21, 23 par. Lk 19:17,19; Mt 24:47 par. Lk 12:44).

Though no explicit discussion is given regarding when heaven begins, most sayings portray the "end of the age" (Mt 13:30, 40-43; Mk 10:30 par. Luke 18:30) or the Son of man's (see Son of Man) return (Mt 25:10, 31-34; 24:46-47 par. Lk 12:43-44; Mt 25:19 par. Lk 19:15) as the inaugural event of the consummated kingdom (Mt 8:11 par. Lk 7:29; Mk 14:25 par. Mt 26:29 and Lk 22:16, 18). Both the parable of Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31) and the saying to the thief on the cross (Lk 23:43), however, imply an immediate transfer to heaven of the righteous at death.

It is difficult to know precisely the referent in Jesus' use of the term paradise in Luke 23:43. Given its use in the LXX and especially in related Jewish literature, it is likely that it refers genetically to heaven (e.g., 4 Ezra 7:36-38), or specifically to the Garden of Eden which has been preserved by God in heaven for the future enjoyment of the righteous (e.g., T. Levi 18:10-11; 2 Apoc. Bar.)
Fitzmyer has argued rather convincingly, however, that paradise in Luke 23:43 should be understood as a way of describing Jesus' "entrance into his glory" after death, implying a heavenly existence (Lk 24:26; cf. Acts 2:33; 5:31). In either case, the adverb today suggests that Jesus' and the thief's enjoyment of heaven would begin immediately subsequent to death.

1.4.3. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers

Matthew alone employs the phrase "kingdom of heaven" in place of "kingdom of God." Though some have tried to make a distinction in the referents of the two phrases, the presence of numerous parallels nullifies this claim (e.g., Mt 5:3 par. Lk 6:20; Mt 8:11 par. Lk 13:29; Mt 11:11 par. Lk 7:28; Mt 13:11 par. Mk 4:11 and Lk 8:10: Mt 13:31 par. Mk 4:30 and Lk 13:18; Mt 19:14 par. Mk 10:14 and Lk 18:16). This tendency to use heaven is evidenced elsewhere when speaking of the Father. Repeatedly, Matthew identifies God as the "Father in heaven" or the "heavenly Father" where parallel passages do not (e.g., Mt 6:9 par. Lk 11:2; Mt 6:26, 32 par. Lk 12:24, 30; Mt 10:32-33 par. Lk 12:8-9; Mt 12:50 par. Mk 3:35). This makes it likely that some of the unparalleled occurrences of this phrase are redactional as well (e.g., Mt 5:16; 6:1; 15:13; 16:17; 18:10, 14, 19, 35; 23:9; see Redaction Criticism).

Whereas the Synoptists utilize the images of some kind of reward in heaven, the kingdom of God (heaven) or various parabolic portrayals (see Parables) of celebration and joy to speak of heaven, John opts mainly for the notion of "eternal life" (e.g., Jn 3:16,36; 4:14; 5:24; 6:27 et passim, but cf. Jn 3:3, 5). Additionally, while the Synoptists portray heaven as future, John's Jesus asserts that believers who have been given a new birth by God (Jn 3:3, 5) have this "life" now (Jn 5:24; 3:36). The resurrection* is still an important event, but not so that eternal life can begin. Rather it seals the believer in this "life," eternally (Jn 11:25-26; 5:24-25; see Thompson). Then those believers will be given a room in the Father's "house" so that they might be with Jesus (Jn 14:2-3).

2. Hell.

References to hell in the Gospels draw on a rich and varied background, the historical development of which is complicated and elusive. Beginning with the OT, the concept progresses through ever-increasing stages of detail and description. In addition to hadēs and gehenna, the Gospels employ several other images to speak of hell. Given this diverse background, the Gospel presentation is neither uniform nor tidy. Rather, the reader is left with more general notions of the concept

2.1. Sheol/Hades.

2.1.1. Sheol in the OT. Any discussion of the background of hell in the Gospels must begin with a discussion of the problematic use of š 'ôl, frequently rendered sheol in English translation. Though its precise meaning in any given instance may be difficult to ascertain, it is evident that it refers in some way to the place of the dead. A problem arises, however, when it is discovered that both the righteous (cf. Gen 37:35; Is 38:10; Ps 30:3, 9) and the unrighteous (cf. Num 16:30, 33) go there. This led the early church to teach that the OT saints went to an upper level of sheol, from which Christ* delivered them. This doctrine rests on tenuous exegetical support at best and it is better to understand sheol as originally referring simply to the grave (cf. Is 14:11; Job 17:13-16; Ps 30:3 [MT 30:4], 9; 88:3-5 [MT 88:4-6]; Prov 7:27) and/or death (cf. Hos 13:14; Hab 2:5; Is 28:15, 18; 38:18; Song 8:6; Ps 49:14 [MT 49:15]; 89:48 [MT 89:49]; 116:3; Prov 5:5; 1 Kings 2:6, 9). Gradually, however, it began to take on the specialized connotations of a realm of the dead (cf. Is 14:9-10; Job 26:5-6), moving closer to the notions surrounding the concept of hell. This would then explain its character as the universal lot of humankind (Eccles 9:10), as well as the place reserved for the wicked (cf. Ps 9:17 [MT 9:18]; 31:17 [MT 31:18]; 49:13-14).

When described, its location is almost always in a downward direction (cf. Ps 55:15 [MT 55:16]; 86:13; Prov 9:18; 15:24; Is 14:15; Jon 2:2 [MT 2:3]), functioning as the extreme opposite of the heights of heaven (Job 11:8; Ps 139:8; Amos 9:2). It is portrayed as a place of "darkness" (Job 17:13) and "dust" (Job 17:16), and the place where the worm feasts (Job 17:14; 24:19-20; Is 14:11). Its inhabitants are reduced to silence (Ps 6:5 [MT 6:6]; 31:17 [MT 31:18]; Is 38:18). The general belief is that once one passes through its portals (Is 38:10), there will be no return (e.g., Job 7:9-10; Is 38:10, 18). Some notions of future hope for the righteous do exist (Hos 13:14; Ps 16:10; 49:15 [MT 49:16]; Job 14:13; 1 Sam 2:6). Many of these themes will be picked up by the subsequent literature, including the NT.

2.1.2. Hades in the LXX and Apocrypha. The Greek hadēs is employed by the LXX translators to render the Hebrew sheol, obviously including all of the related connotations. Additionally, hadēs translates such words as "darkness" (Job 38:17), "silence" (cf. Ps 94:17 [LXX 93:17]), "death" (Prov 14:12; 16:25; Is 28:15) and "the pit" (Is 38:18; 14:19).
The apocryphal literature largely reflects OT usage, indicating that the location of hadēs is in the depths (cf. Sir 21:10; 51:5-6). Once through its "gates" (cf. Wis 16:13; 3 Macc 5:51; 6:31), however, this literature allows more hope of return than indicated in the OT (cf. Wis 16:13; Sir 48:5; Tob 13:2; but cf. also Wis 2:1). Not surprisingly, it is used often simply to signify death (cf. Sir 9:12; 14:12; 3 Macc 4:8; 5:42, 51; 6:31) or the grave (Tob 3:10), where the inhabitants reside in silence (Sir 17:27; 41:4).

2.1.3. Hades in Other Jewish Literature

Subsequent Jewish literature picks up and further develops many of the themes already seen in the OT and apocryphal literature. Accordingly, some passages evidence the belief that hadēs is the universal destiny of humankind (Pseudo-Phoc. 112-15), while the notion that it is a place of punishment reserved for the wicked is also represented (Apoc. Zeph. 10:3-14). Furthermore, hadēs is sometimes thought of as a temporary place of residence until the resurrection (cf. Sib. Or. 2:227-30; 4 Ezra 4:42; but cf. Pseudo-Phoc. 112-15; b. Yebam. 17a [§’ ’ōl]).

2.2. Gehenna

An even more common name for hell in the Gospels is geenna. It too has roots in the OT, and then is developed in subsequent literature.

2.2.1. Gehenna in the OT

Behind the word gehenna, as it frequently appears in English translation, stands the Greek geenna, which is a transliteration of the Aramaic gēhinnām. The Aramaic is itself derived from the Hebrew gē hinnōm (Josh 15:8; 18:16) and gē bēn hinnōm (Josh 15:8; see Jeremias), which refer to a valley located on the south slope of Jerusalem (Josh 15:8; 18:16), literally, the "Valley of (the son of) Hinnom." It gained its infamous notoriety during the reigns of Ahaz and Manasseh, both of whom burned sacrifices there to Molech, even to the point of sacrificing their own sons in the fire (cf. 2 Chron 28:3; 33:6; 2 Kings 16:3). This elicited prophetic condemnations on the valley, identifying it as the scene of future carnage and desolation resulting from God's judgment (Jer 7:30-33; 19:1-13; 32:34-35; cf. also Is 31:9; 66:24; 2 Kings 23:10; Lev 18:21).

2.2.2. Gehenna in Other Jewish Literature

Throughout much of the subsequent Jewish literature, it is evident that geenna came to be equated with the place of God's final judgment of the wicked. Like sheol, it is located in the depths of the earth (Sib. Or. 4:184-86), and descriptions include "fire," "darkness" and "gnashing of teeth" (cf. Apoc. Abr. 15:6; Sib. Or. 1:100-103; 2:292-310). There is also the implication that this punishment is an eternal one (Sib. Or. 2:292-310; Josephus Ant. 18.14 J.W. 2.163; 3.374-75).
In the rabbinic literature, gehenna appears frequently. It is one of the seven things created prior to the creation of the world (b. Pesah. 54a). In at least one place, gehenna is equated with sheol (b. B. Bat. 79a; cf. b. 'Erub. 19a). Many will be spared from it, including those who fear God (b. Yebam. 102b), those who follow the Torah in obedience and good deeds (b. Šabb. 118a; b. Giṭ. 7a; b. B. Bat. 10a; b. Ḥag. 27a), and those who are especially unfortunate in this life (b. 'Erub. 41b). Solely a place of retribution, gehenna is reserved for the wicked (b. 'Erub. 19a; b. Yebam. 63b; b. Ḥag. 15a; cf. also b. B. Bat. 74a; b. Šabb. 104a), including those guilty of a variety of sinful acts: idolatry (b. Ta'an. 5a), immorality (b. Qidd. 40a; b. Soṭa 4b), arrogance (m. 'Abot 5:19; b. B. Bat. 78b; b. 'Abod. Zar. 18b), flattery and foolish speech (b. Soṭa 41b; b. Šabb. 33a), a lack of compassion on the poor (b. Beṣa 32b; see Rich and Poor) and listening too much to women* (m. 'Abot 1:5; b. B. Meš. 59a). With its entrance in the Valley of Hinnom (b. Sukk. 32b), it is believed to contain various levels (b. Soṭa 10b). Though generally its fiery torments (b. Šabb. 39a; b. B. Bat. 84a) are believed to be limited in duration (m. 'Ed. 2:10; b. Šabb. 33b; b. Roš Haš. 16b-17a), the thoroughly wicked do not reascend from it (b. B. Mes. 58b; b. Roš Haš. 16b-17a).

2.3. Hell in the Gospels. In speaking of hell, the Gospels do not confine themselves to its specific names. Actually, the word hadēs only occurs there four times (Mt 16:18; 11:23 par. Lk 10:15; Lk 16:23), and geenna eleven times (Mk 9:43, 45, 47; Mt 5:22, 29-30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Lk 12:5). To complement these the Gospels employ images which are present in other Jewish literature of the period. Two of the most common are "darkness" (cf. 1 Enoch 103:7; 1QS 4:11-14) and "fire" (cf. Is 66:24; Deut 32:22; 4 Ezra 7:36, 61; 2 Apoc. Bar. 44:15; 1 Enoch 10:13; 91:9; 108:3; 4 Macc 9:9; 12:12; 1QS 2:5-9; 1QM 3:29-36; cf. also Mai 4:1 [MT 3:19]; Ezek 38:22; Gen 19:24; Amos 1:4; Jer 43:12; Hos 8:14). Throughout, the Gospels preserve the distinction between hell and death or the grave (cf. Lk 12:5; 16:22).

2.3.1. The Message of John the Baptist. Convinced as he was that the end of the age was near, the Baptist proclaimed that the mission of the Messiah would be characterized both by the salvation of the righteous and the eschatological (see Eschatology) judgment of the wicked. To describe the latter, he employed the common image of "fire," asserting that the "unfruitful" (Mt 3:10 par. Lk 3:9) and the "chaff" (Mt 3:12 par. Lk 3:17) would soon be gathered and "burned" by the "coming one."
2.3.2. The Teaching of Jesus in the Gospels. Throughout the teachings of Jesus, the concept of hell is used consistently to refer to the place of punishment and suffering prepared for the devil (see Demon, Devil, Satan) and his angels (Mt 25:41; Lk 8:31), as well as for those people who reject God. Accordingly, those who reject Jesus (Mt 11:20-24 par. Lk 10:12-15; cf. also Mt 8:8-12 par. Lk 7:6-9 with 13:28-29; Mt 22:1-14; 25:41-46) and the prophets (Mt 23:31-33; Lk 16:29-31) reap it as their reward. In addition, those guilty of hypocrisy (Mt 23:15, 33; see Hypocrite), hateful language and intent (Mt 5:22), unfaithfulness (Mt 24:45-51 par. Lk 12:41-46), unrepentance (Mt 5:29-30; 18:8-9 par. Mk 9:43-47; see Repentance) and disobedience (Mt 5:22; 7:19; 13:40, 42, 50; 25:30; Jn 15:6) are liable to its judgment. Predictably, its location is understood by Jesus to be in the depths, the very opposite of the heights of heaven (cf. Mt 11:23 par. Lk 10:15).

There is, however, no explicit distinction in Jesus' teachings between hades and gehenna (contra Jeremias; see also Boyd). He does emphasize that individuals sent to the latter will be in the body (cf. Mt 5:29-30; 10:28; 18:8-9; Mk 9:43-47; cf. also Lk 12:4-5). But he implies the same of the rich man in hades (Lk 16:23-24). Life does continue on the earth while the rich man is in hades (Lk 16:27-31), suggesting that the judgment is yet in the future. However, both gehenna and hades are used in reference to the future judgment (cf. Mt 11:23 par. Lk 10:15; Mt 5:22; 23:33). Therefore, any explicit distinction must rely on other NT passages, which may or may not reflect Jesus' intention here (e.g., Rev 20:13-14; cf. 2 Apoc. Bar. 21:23: 1 Enoch 51:1-2; Sib. Or. 2:227-30; 4 Ezra 4:42). Given the fluidity with which these concepts are used in the antecedent and related literature (e.g., b. B. Bat. 79a; Apoc. Zeph. 10:3-14), it should not be surprising to find the same in Jesus' use.

Finally, it seems that Jesus taught that hell would involve an eternal, conscious punishment. Probably the clearest indication of this is in Matthew 25:46, where the lots of the two groups are contrasted by means of the adjective eternal (i.e., "eternal life" as opposed to "eternal punishment"). Additionally, such images as the "undying worm" (Mk 9:48; cf. Is 66:24), the "fire that is not put out" (Mk 9:48; Mt 25:41) and the emotive picture of "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Mt 8:12 par. Lk 13:28; Mt 13:42,50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; cf. Sib. Or. 2:305) all contribute to this perspective (cf. also I Enoch 22:11-13; T. Gad 7:5; T. Benj. 7:5). However, the use of the verb destroy (apollumi; Mt 10:28), and the frequent image of "burning" has been understood by some to imply annihilation (e.g., Mt 7:19; 13:40, 42, 50; Jn 15:6; cf. 4 Ezra 7:61; 1 Enoch 10:13-14; 38:3-6;
2.3.3. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers. Luke includes two unique references to hell. In Luke 8:31 he alone explicitly identifies the "abyss" as the place feared by the demons possessing the Gerasene man (cf. Mk 5:10; Mt 8:29; cf. also 2 Apoc. Bar. 59:5; 1 Enoch 10:4; 18:11; 54:5; 88:1; 90:24-27; Jub. 5:6).

Luke is also alone in recording the parable of the rich man and Lazarus* (Lk 16:19-31). It remains unclear whether or not Jesus used this story to describe the actual situation beyond the grave. There is substantial evidence of the prior existence of similar traditions elsewhere in Judaism,* raising the question of Jesus' purpose in using it (see Grobel; cf. Hock; cf. also I Enoch 22; 4 Ezra 7:36). If Jesus did make use of existing tradition, his point may have been the distinctive feature of his parable—the impossibility of a resurrection to convince the "brothers" to listen to the prophets—rather than to describe eschatological conditions. Regardless, hadēs is explicitly reserved for the wicked, while Lazarus is sent to a place of comfort. Typical of Luke's emphasis elsewhere, Lazarus is an example of the poor and the downtrodden who are shown favor by God (cf. Lk 4:18; 6:20; 7:22; 14:13, 21).

Matthew's Gospel presents the greatest concentration of references to hell. This is not surprising, given Matthew's tendency to draw extensively on apocalyptic imagery. Matthew alone preserves the statement that hadēs will not prevail against his "assembly" (ekklēsta, Mt 16:18; see Church). He also records three unique references to gehenna. In Matthew 5:22 the one guilty of hateful language against another will be liable to the "gehenna of fire." The two other references appear in Jesus' condemnation of the scribes* and Pharisees.* In Matthew 23:15 their proselytizing activity is said to result in the making of "son[s] of gehenna." Then in Matthew 23:33 their complicity in the deaths of the prophets puts them in dire danger of gehenna's judgment.

Matthew includes additional references in parabolic settings, making pronounced use of the apocalyptic image of "fire." In Matthew 13:40, 42 the angels gather the "weeds" at the "end of the age" and burn them with fire. The same fate befalls the "bad fish" in Matthew 13:50 and the accursed "on the left" at the great judgment of the nations in Matthew 25:41-46 (cf. also Mt 7:19). Finally, Matthew repeatedly describes the lot of the wicked with the emotive phrase "weeping and gnashing of teeth." Except for one parallel (Mt 8:12 par. Lk 13:28), Matthew alone includes the phrase five times (cf. Mt 13:42,50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30).

See also ANGELS; APOCALYPTIC; DEMON, DEVIL SATAN; ESCHATOLOGY; JUDGMENT; LIFE; RESURRECTION

J. Lunde

HEBREW (NATIONALITY). See Israel

HELL. See Heaven and Hell.

HELLENISM

1. Definition and Use of the Term

2. Historical and Cultural Background

3. Hellenism and Judaism

4. Hellenism and the Gospels

1. Definition and Use of the Term.

"Hellenism" derives from the Greek verb hellēnizō, meaning "to speak Greek," and hence "to make Greek" and "to act in a Greek way." Today it is used in two broad senses: (1) Greek civilization in general, especially the high culture and humane spirit of classical Greece and (2) the culture of a wide area of the Mediterranean and Near East which came under strong Greek influence in the Hellenistic period after the death of Alexander the Great. This influence included the use of the Greek language in its koinē form (see Languages of Palestine). It continued during and after the Roman conquest of the area.

The word Hellenism nowhere occurs in the Gospels (it is used in 2 Macc 4:13 of the peak of Hellenization, i.e., the adoption of pagan ways, in Palestine under Antiochus IV). But closely related terms appear—with various meanings: (1) In Mark 7:26 Ἑλληνίς, literally "Greek woman," is used of the Syro-Phoenician woman whose daughter Jesus heals. Here it seems to mean a Greek-speaking pagan from the region of the Hellenized cities of Tyre and Sidon. (2) In John 7:35 the Jews ask whether Jesus intends to go to the Diaspora to teach the "Greeks" (Ἑλληνες). The term probably means again pagans of Greek culture rather than Greek-speaking Jews or proselytes. (3) In John 12:20, however, the "Greeks" who seek Jesus are almost certainly proselytes, pagan converts to Judaism,* at Jerusalem for the festival (see Feasts). They too were probably Greek-speakers. (4) In John 19:20 the notice on the cross is written in Hebrew (= Aramaic?), Latin and Greek. Here the term Ἑλληνιστή is used unambiguously of the Greek language. Thus in the Gospels the term Greek applies to both language and culture (including religion).

2. Historical and Cultural Background.

2.1. Early Greece. The roots of Greek civilization and the first documentary evidence for the Greek language go back to the Bronze Age, when princes of the Mycenaean palace culture kept records in the so-called Linear B script, fostered the arts and traded widely in the Near East. This early culture was followed by a dark age of illiteracy and comparative poverty. But some arts were kept alive. A continuing tradition of oral poetry culminated magnificently in the epic poems of Homer, whose Iliad and Odyssey were to have a profound influence on Greek religion and education down to the Hellenistic Age and beyond. By Homer's time (c. eighth century B.C.) trade had been reopened with the East, writing had been re-introduced in the form of the Phoenician alphabet (adapted to Greek needs), and a wave of overseas colonization had begun.

2.2. Classical Greece. The Geometric Age (c. 900-700 B.C.) was followed by the Archaic Age (c. 700-480 B.C.) and the great Classical Age (480-323 B.C.). At this time Greece consisted of many small, independent city-states known as poleis (sing, polis), with a common language (Greek) and religion, but speaking their own dialects (e.g., Attic at Athens, laconian at Sparta) and having their own local religious cults and distinctive styles in sculpture, vase painting and other arts. During the Archaic Age many of these communities were governed by autocratic rulers, or "tyrants" (tyrannoi); but "tyranny" gave way to oligarchy (rule by a few) or to democracy, as at fifth-century Athens, where all free, male citizens had a vote and shared directly in government. The Classical Period was the golden age of Greek literature and art, when Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides composed their tragedies, when the historians Herodotus and Thucydides wrote. It was the age of the great philosophers Socrates, Plato and Aristotle; of orators like Demosthenes; of sculptors like Pheidias; and of the building of fine temples, such as the Temple of Zeus at Olympia and the Parthenon at Athens. But it was also a period of interstate rivalry and sometimes war. Having united to defeat the Persian invaders (490-479 B.C.), the Greeks were themselves torn apart in the Peloponnesian War (431-404 B.C.) between Athens and Sparta.

2.3. Alexander the Great. The fourth century saw the rise of a new power on the northern fringes of the Greek world in the kingdom of Macedon. The Macedonians were of related stock to the rest of the Greeks but were not regarded by them as full Hellenes. Their dialect was quite distinctive, and they retained a monarchy long after other Greek states had moved on to other forms of government. But their rulers were anxious to be considered Greeks. They established relations with Athens, competing as early as c. 500 B.C. in the Olympic Games (open only to Hellenes). Perdiccas II (king c. 450-413 B.C.) established a new capital at Pella, and invited distinguished Greek artists and poets to his court. Philip II (king 359-336 B.C.) went further, invading Greece and defeating the Athenians at Chaeronea, effectively putting an end to the independent Greek city-states. Philip was succeeded by his son, Alexander, a man of great intelligence, courage, chivalry and military skill, who in his youth had been tutored by Aristotle. His invasion and conquest of Asia Minor, Phoenicia, Palestine, Egypt and Babylonia became legendary (cf. 1 Macc 1—4). He died in 323 B.C. at the age of thirty-three. He had taken his army as far as India. He had destroyed the old Persian Empire, founded cities (such as Alexandria in Egypt), and opened up new ways for Greek and "barbarian" to live together.

2.4. The Hellenistic Age.

2.4.1. Cosmopolitanism. Alexander's empire was too vast to hold together long. It was soon divided into three parts, ruled by powerful dynasties—the Antigonids in Macedon, the Seleucids in Syria and the Ptolemies in Egypt. But the effects of his conquests were far-reaching, causing the spread of the Greek language and of a Hellenizing culture throughout the Near East. The old independent Greek city-states, with their dialects, distinctive styles and distrust of barbarians had now gone for good. They were replaced by a cosmopolitan culture involving peoples of many different ethnic origins, using what was basically Attic Greek for their lingua franca.

2.4.2. Art and Literature. The Hellenistic Age is sometimes disparaged as decadent compared with Classical Greece. It needs to be stressed that artistically it was a period of creativity, when sculptors and painters maintained a high peak of technical skill. The old idealism of Classical art gave place to a vigorous realism in which subjects such as old age, poverty and pain were portrayed as well as moving representations of physical beauty. In architecture attention was paid to town planning and dramatic effect; civic amenities such as stoas and theaters were constructed on a grand scale; new art forms, such as mosaic, were developed. In literature it was an age of erudition rather than originality, as can be seen typically in the poems of Callimachus and Aratus, and in the Homeric scholarship which flourished at Alexandria. But there were also authors of charm and elegance, like the epic poet Apollonius Rhodius, the pastoral poet Theocritus and the novelist Chariton. Among historians Polybius was outstanding, among writers of biography (a popular new literary genre) Plutarch.

2.4.3. Science and Philosophy. In medicine, science and engineering there were spectacular advances, as shown by the work of men like Galen and Archimedes. In philosophy the chief feature was the development of different "schools" such as the Academics, following in the tradition of Plato, and the Peripatetics, following that of Aristotle, the Stoics and Epicureans. While also studying and developing logic and physics, such philosophers were deeply concerned with ethics, especially the nature of virtue and the proper conduct for an individual.

The Stoics stressed the importance of living in harmony with nature (physis). They believed in divine Providence, allegorizing many of the old tales of the gods and postulating a logos, or divine "reason," which permeated the world.

The Epicureans are famous today for their early atomic theory and the view that everything has material causes. They taught that the gods took no interest in human affairs and that pleasure (hēdonē) and calm detachment (ataraxia) are the key to virtuous living. (They understood these ideals in a lofty way rather than in terms of sensual pleasure or an easy life.)

There were also Cynics, who cherished personal freedom, despised material possessions and practiced a simple, ascetic life. They never had an organized school like the other philosophers, and in the later Hellenistic Age many became wandering preachers and beggars.

2.4.4. Religion. The Hellenistic Age saw simultaneously a decline among intellectuals of belief in the old Homeric gods and a growth, especially among the uneducated, of magical practices and exotic new cults, often of an emotional nature, the product of Greek contact with the so-called mystery religions of the East These cults included those of Isis and Serapis (from Egypt), of Cybele, the "Great Mother," and of Attis (from Phrygia). Ancient Greek nature cults, such as the Eleusinian and Dionysiac mysteries, were also revitalized. This was an age of syncretism, when the gods of one people were assimilated to those of another: Greek gods were identified with their Roman and oriental counterparts, taking on new traits as they did so (e.g., Zeus Hypsistos and Dionysos Sabazios). There also developed in the Hellenistic East a ruler-cult, in which living kings were given divine honors. In Rome the early emperors were regarded as divine only after their death, but in many parts of the Empire they were worshiped during their lifetime.

2.4.5. The Rise of Rome. The Hellenistic Age was a time of almost constant jockeying for power. The town of Pergamon, originally pan of the Seleucid kingdom, asserted its independence and, under its powerful Attalid dynasty, came to dominate Hellenized Asia Minor. In 201 B.C. it joined with Rhodes to call in Roman aid against Macedon, giving the Romans a pretext for intervening in Greek affairs. Extended and beautified by an ambitious building program, it became an artistic and literary center with a library rivaling that of Alexandria. In 133 B.C. its last king, Attalus III, bequeathed his kingdom to Rome.

Under Ptolemaic rule Palestine was subject to gradual and peaceful Hellenization for around a hundred years. Then in 198 B.C. the conquest of Palestine (and Phoenicia) by the Seleucid king Antiochus III led to a much more rapid and violent phase of Hellenization, notably under Antiochus IV Epiphanes. He built a Greek gymnasium at Jerusalem and shocked Jews to the core by setting up an altar to Zeus Olympios in the Temple* itself. His forced imposition of Greek customs, and persecution of those who remained loyal to the Jewish faith, led to the Maccabean Revolt and a period of Jewish independence under the Hasmonean rulers. But even in this period more subtle Hellenization continued, as can be seen in the use of Greek names by rulers like Alexander Janneus (103-76 B.C.) and in their Greek coin types (some of which used the Greek title of basileus, or king). A dispute over the succession led eventually to Rome being called in, and to the conquest of Palestine and Syria by Pompey, whose entry into the Holy of Holies in the Jerusalem Temple (63 B.C.) was another dreadful act of sacrilege for the Jews (see Rome).

2.4.6. Economic and Social Life. Conditions varied in the different Hellenistic kingdoms. The ancient economy was basically agrarian, and the Hellenistic Age saw many improvements to methods of agriculture, especially in Egypt, where farming and related industries were under royal control. There were state monopolies in oil, textiles (except wool) and papyrus, the paper of the ancient world. The tax system was highly organized, and administration was bureaucratic. Foreign residents—notably Greeks—had more privileges than native Egyptians.

In the Seleucid Empire the economic system was less unified: taxation was farmed out to tax collectors, who bid for franchises—a system which continued in Roman times. Direct taxes were usually levied only on non-citizens, but citizens paid indirect taxes* like customs and sales taxes. Much use was made of slave labor, the number of slaves increasing in the Hellenistic period through war, piracy and kidnapping. In the crafts and professions it was an age of specialization; trade guilds and other voluntary associations were important (see Koester; Walbank).

Social divisions ran deep. Most privileged were the kings, their families and "friends"; then came the higher administrators, followed by wealthy independent citizens such as merchants; below that were craftsmen and artisans, peasant farmers and petty employees of the bureaucracy; below that, slaves. Women took their social class from their husbands: not many professions were open to them, and most were kept busy with domestic pursuits and home industries. They had few legal rights and, apart from members of the privileged upper classes, limited education and social life.

3. Hellenism and Judaism.
3.1. The Diaspora. By the time of Jesus many Jews lived outside Palestine in the Diaspora (Dispersion), especially in large cities such as Alexandria, Antioch and Rome. Under Roman rule they were exempt from taking part in the state cult and from military service. They sought to uphold Jewish monotheism and ethical standards, and to keep the Sabbath and food laws, lacking access to the Temple cult, they focused worship and religious education on the synagogue. Some managed to get to Jerusalem for festivals. But inevitably there was assimilation to the Hellenistic environment, particularly where there was intermarriage. Greek was the first language for most Diaspora Jews, the language in which they read and studied their Scriptures. Many were educated in Greek philosophy, rhetoric and literature, and a lively Jewish literature in Greek grew up, including such typical literary forms as history, tragedy, epic and romance. Philo and others sought to reconcile Platonic and Stoic philosophy with the Jewish faith. Writings like Wisdom and 4 Maccabees also reveal extensive Greek influence. At a popular level Hellenistic ideas of Fate, Fortune, astrology and magic were adopted.

3.2. Hellenized Judaism in Palestine. In the past the Hellenized Judaism of the Diaspora has often been contrasted with what was thought to have been the purer Judaism of Palestine. But Martin Hengel and other scholars have strongly argued that such a distinction is artificial. By the Roman period Palestine and its surrounding areas were also heavily Hellenized. Caesarea Maritima, the seat of Roman government, had magnificent public buildings, including an amphitheater, theater and hippodrome. At Jericho, Herod's palace contained an ornate Roman bath, colonnaded court, mosaics and other features of a Hellenistic luxury mansion. At Jerusalem, the Temple had Greek architectural features. The cities of the Decapolis were splendidly adorned with stoas, temples, theaters and other amenities. Even in Galilee,* Sepphoris (near Nazareth) had a theater of Herodian date. Further north at Caesarea Philippi there was an ancient shrine of Pan and a temple to Augustus.

How deep did such Hellenization go? We know that Greek proper names were widely used, and it is likely that more of the population spoke Greek than was once believed. Hellenism was clearly strongest in the cities, especially the Herodian and Roman administrative centers and the Greek cities of Phoenicia and the Decapolis. How far Greek education and outlook permeated the country areas of Galilee and Judea remains uncertain (see Sevenster; Hengel).

4.1. The Language of the Gospels. The clearest sign of Hellenism in the Gospels is the fact that they are written in Greek. They share this characteristic with the rest of the New Testament and with a large body of Hellenistic Jewish writings, including those of Philo, Josephus, the Jewish tragedian Ezekiel and many apocryphal and pseudepigraphical works. The reasons for this choice of language were probably threefold: (1) Greek was the most widely understood common language in the world in which the Gospels were expected to circulate; (2) it was the language conventionally used for most literary work in the Hellenized Near East; and (3) it may well have been the language with which the Evangelists themselves were most familiar (see Languages of Palestine).

Although all four Gospels show clear signs of an underlying Semitic tradition, including sayings of Jesus in Aramaic, it is uncertain how much Hebrew their authors knew (most of their OT quotations rely on Greek versions; see Old Testament in the Gospels). It has been suggested that the author of Mark may have been bilingual in Greek and Aramaic.

4.2. The Literary Form of the Gospels. The Gospels have often been compared to ancient biographies (see Gospel [Genre]). Thus C. H. Talbert has argued that they correspond to certain specific types, designed either to legitimate the authority of a founder or to dispel false images of him or to present a true account of him (and his successors). Luke, in particular, in his two-volume work Luke-Acts has been seen as acting in the manner of a classical historian, with his formal dedications to Theophilus, his careful dating of Jesus' birth and the set speeches in Acts. Parallels have also been seen between the Gospels and Hellenistic aretalogies (hymns praising the virtues of gods).

But while there are general similarities, the Gospels do not correspond exactly to any ancient literary genre. Mark, almost certainly the earliest lacks biographical interest in Jesus' ancestry, birth, education, appearance, character and achievements; his chronology is quite vague. Even Luke, with his interests in the Greek world, does not give a systematic chronology of Jesus' life, and may have been more influenced by OT and Jewish historiography than classical. The aim of all the Evangelists was to present the good news (euangelion; see Gospel [Good News]) of salvation* through Jesus Christ; hence, the large proportion of the Gospels devoted to Jesus' passion (see Passion Narrative). This is not to deny influences from the classical world in rhetorical devices (see Rhetorical Criticism), vocabulary, narrative form and even thought A few of Jesus' healings* (e.g., Mk 7:31-37) are described like those of Hellenistic wonderworkers; but in most the magical element is minimal. It seems improbable that Mark was seeking to present Jesus as a Greek-style Theios Anēr (Divine Man*) or in contrast to one. (There has been much confused thinking about this supposed Hellenistic figure. See section 4.6.)

4.3. The World of the Gospels. With Judea, Samaria, Galilee and adjacent areas so long under Hellenistic rule one might have expected the Gospels to contain fairly frequent references to Hellenistic culture. In fact neither the theater, amphitheater, gymnasium nor other recreational facility is mentioned, even in metaphors (contrast the epistles). There are no references to Greek literature or to the cults of the Greek gods (though some have noted Dionysiac parallels to the miracle* at Cana). But we do find allusions to the social world of Hellenism (e.g., the luxury of those who in live large houses, Mt 11:8) and to the architectural splendors of Herod's Temple (Mk 13:1). The autocratic power of the Herodian rulers is illustrated in Matthew’s picture of Herod the Great (Mt 2), and in the story of Herod Antipas’ execution of John the Baptist* (Mk 6:14-29; see Herodian Dynasty). Mention is made of the Roman emperor and of various features of the Roman administration (see Rome), but there is no systematic account of political conditions.

Sometimes the ways of Jesus' followers are contrasted with the Hellenistic world: in Luke 22:25 Jesus refers to the kings of the Gentiles lording it over their subjects and to those who are called "Benefactors,"* saying that it must not be like this with his followers. "Benefactor" (Euergetēs) is a well-attested title for Hellenistic kings such as Ptolemy III and Antiochus VII, for the emperor Augustus and other leading men. In John 18:36 Jesus contrasts his kingdom with the military kingdoms of the world. The Gospels' picture of kings and courts, including that found in Jesus' parables, seems to derive from popular perceptions of Hellenistic kings rather than the Hebrew monarchy. In Luke 19:11-27 a noble travels to a far country to receive the title of basileus (king): this reflects the habit of local Eastern rulers seeking vassal status from Rome, an outstanding example being that of Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, who went to Rome to obtain the title of "king," but won only that of "ethnarch." However, the general picture of life in the Gospels is not of kings and wealthy townsfolk, but of Palestinian peasants with their round of agricultural labor, herding, fishing, food production and domestic activities.

4.4. Jesus' Contacts with Hellenism. The extent of Jesus' contact with the Hellenistic cities is uncertain. Most of his ministry was in the rural areas of Galilee.* Hellenized Sepphoris, an administrative center and one-time residence of Herod Antipas, was only three or four miles from Nazareth, but there is no mention of his visiting it. The Gospels do record occasional visits to Gentile* territory: Mark 7:24-30 tells of an encounter with a Syro-Phoenician woman in the area of Tyre and possibly of a visit to Sidon (7:31). Mark also tells how Jesus traveled in the Decapolis, healing a deaf and dumb man (7:31-37) and a demoniac in the region of Gerasa (5:1-20; some versions place this event in Gadarene, or Gergesene, territory). In Mark 8:27 we find Jesus in the villages of Caesarea Philippi, but we do not know if he visited the city. He had contact with a Roman centurion at Capernaum (Mt 8:5-13; Lk 7:1-10) and with a royal official, presumably a Gentile (Jn 4:43-54—possibly a variant of the same story). In dining at the house of the wealthy tax-collector Zacchaeus in Jericho (Lk 19:1-10) he surely met with Hellenistic luxury. We have already mentioned the "Greeks" who come to see him in Jerusalem (Jn 12:20). Nonetheless, it is clear that Jesus saw his mission as primarily to the Jews and not to their Greek or Semitic neighbors (Mt 10:5-6; Mk 7:27; see Gentiles).

4.5. Evidence for Hellenism in the Everyday Life of the Gospels. A clear example is the use of Greek personal names (e.g., Philip, Andrew) and of Hellenized forms of Jewish names (e.g., Maria [Mary], Simon, Bartimaeus—an Aramaic-Greek hybrid). Many towns and geographical localities are called by their Greek (or Latin) rather than Semitic names (e.g., Tyre, Caesarea, Decapolis, Lake Tiberias, Galilee). There are frequent references to Greek coinage, including the valuable talent (e.g., Mt 18:24; 25:15), the mm (the "pound" of Lk 19:12-26), the staēr (Mt 17:27), the drachma (the coin lost by the woman in Lk 15:8) and—the smallest coin of all—the lepton (the widow’s mite of Mk 12:42; cf. also Lk 12:59). It is not always clear where actual currency is intended and where the Evangelists are simply giving the Greek names for their Roman, Jewish or Tyrian equivalents. The Gospels also mention Greek units of measurement (e.g., the Stadion). Sometimes we note Greek legal terms, such as the archōn (magistrate) and praktōr (jailor) of Luke 12:57-59—language derived from the Hellenistic law court rather than the Jewish scene. The name synedrion (Sanhedrin*) for the highest Jewish court is also Greek.

4.6. Hellenism and the Thought of the Gospels. More problematic is the question of Hellenistic influence on the thought of the Gospels. The fact that they were composed in Greek meant that Greek terms for concepts had to be used instead of Hebrew. Sometimes this presented no difficulties (e.g., when Luke uses Greek epistatēs [master] for Hebrew rabbî). At other times it may have led readers to understand important concepts in a Greek rather than a Semitic way (e.g., Son of God,* Savior* and Lord*).

Sometimes the Evangelists may have deliberately intended to evoke the connotations of the Greek terms or have used words with more than one level of meaning. An important example is John's use of logos* for Christ as the Word (1:1, 14). While this term owes much to OT ideas of the dynamic and creative Word of God and to Jewish Wisdom traditions, it could hardly fail to suggest to educated Greeks the Stoic doctrine of the logos (see section 2.4.3). The sharp contrasts in John between flesh and spirit, above and below, the earthly and the heavenly, may owe something to popular Platonism (such influence might have come indirectly via Hellenistic Judaism); the question of gnostic influence on John has been much debated (w John, Gospel of). Greek concepts of the nature of the soul may even have influenced the Synoptic Gospels: in Matthew 10:28 the Hebrew idea of the unity of the human person seems to have been replaced by a Greek dichotomy between body and soul.

The Gospel writers belonged to a society that constituted part of the ancient world and, in spite of the uniqueness of their message, still had much in common with their contemporaries. They shared with the Greeks, Romans and other peoples of the Hellenistic world certain presuppositions, such as a stratified social structure with women subordinate to men and an economy supported by slave labor. There are similarities between some of Jesus' ethical teaching (see Ethics of Jesus) and that of the Greek philosophers. We note especially his emphasis on the fatherhood of God, the value of the individual and indifference to material possessions. In a fascinating work F. G. Downing has drawn attention to parallels between Jesus and the Cynics. But in spite of all this, Jesus' teaching remains distinctive for its emphasis on the kingdom of God, its radical summons to discipleship and teaching on love.*

The NT writers also shared with their contemporaries a basically pre-scientific approach to such subjects as the physical universe, sickness and miracles.* This means that Hellenistic parallels can be found to many features of the Gospels, like their understanding of demon* possession (including the idea that demons may be transferred from one home to another) and of natural phenomena (like earthquakes and eclipses). Sometimes it is hard to tell whether we are dealing with direct Hellenistic influence or a parallel development of ideas. Thus the motif of walking on water (Mk 6:47-51) is paralleled in the Argonautic saga (Apollonius Rhodius 1.179-84) but may in fact have closer links with OT ideas of Yahweh's conquest of the unruly sea.

Some of the events associated with Jesus' birth and death appear to have parallels in the so-called prestige myths of Greco-Roman folklore, including tales of astronomical portents and dreams* heralding the birth of famous people or marking their death. There are classical stories of heroes or famous men born from a mortal woman and a divinity (e.g., Perseus, Plato, Alexander). There are tales of the return of the dead to life and of a hero's ascent to heaven (cf. Dionysos and Heracles). We must stress, however, that the Greco-Roman parallels are mostly broad and general rather than precise, and that some motifs are also paralleled in the Jewish background. The Gospel stories are unique in their theological depth, doctrinal coherence, descriptive conviction and detail. The fact that important teachings are couched in the language and, sometimes, the thought forms of the Hellenistic world in no way detracts from the truth of their message.

See also Judaism; Languages of Palestine; Rome.

HERODIAN DYNASTY

The Herodian family ruled over the Palestinian area from 40 B.C. until around A.D. 100. In order to understand the political and social setting of Jesus' ministry, it is important to understand the story of the Herods up through the first four decades of the first century A.D.

1. Herod the Great (47-4 B.C.)
3. Philip the Tetrarch (4 B.C.-A.D. 34)
5. The Herodians

1.1. Herod's Family Origins. The demise of the Hasmonean dynasty, the transference of Syria and Palestine to Roman rule, and the civil wars that marked the decay of the nation all created confusion which opened the way for the Herodian family to come into prominence. Upon her death Alexandra Salome's eldest son, Hyrcanus II, succeeded as king and high priest (see Priest Priesthood) in 67 B.C., only to be displaced three months later by his aggressive brother Aristobulus II.

Antipater II, father of Herod the Great, was an Idumean (Josephus J.W. 1.6.2 §123; cf. also Ant. 14.1.3 §9; Justin Martyr Dial. 52.3; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 1.6.2; 7.11; b. B. Bat. 3b-4a; b. Qidd. 70a). He realized he would not be able to be king and high priest, but he knew he could become the power behind the throne, and thus he sided with the weak Hyrcanus II. Antipat-er II convinced Hyrcanus II that he was unjustly deprived of his right to rule by Aristobulus II.
Furthermore, Antipater II promised to help him regain that position. With the help of the Arabian king, Aretas, Aristobulus II was defeated in 65 B.C.

With the advent of Roman power in the East, each brother (Hyrcanans II and Aristobulus II) asked Pompey, the Roman general, to side with him against the other. After having some trouble with Aristobulus II, Pompey joined forces with Hyrcanans II (Josephus Ant. 14.3. §§46-47) and after three months in the autumn of 63 B.C. they defeated Aristobulus II. This marked the end of the Jewish independence that had first been gained in 142 B.C. Pompey entered the Holy of Holies but did not plunder it. In fact, he ordered its cleansing, the resumption of the sacrifices, and he reinstated Hyrcanus II as high priest (Josephus Ant. 14.4.4 §§69-73; J.W. 1.6.5-7.6 §133-53; Tacitus Hist. 5.9; Appian Mithr. W. 106, 114; Floras 1.40.30; Livy Epit. 102; Plutarch Pomp. 39; cf. Dio Cassius Hist. 37.15-17).

In 48 B.C., with the defeat of Pompey by Julius Caesar, Hyrcanus II and Antipater II attached themselves to the new ruler who in turn reconfirmed Hyrcanus II as high priest and gave him the title of Ethnarch of the Jews and recognized Antipater II as administrator of Judea (Josephus Ant. 14.8.1-5 §§127-55; 10.2 §191; J.W. 1.9.3—10.4 §§187-203). Although publicly Antipater II enjoined the people to honor Hyrcanus II, he began to show his dynastic ambitions in 47 B.C. by appointing his son, Phasael, as governor of Jerusalem and his second son, Herod, as governor of Galilee* (Josephus Ant. 14.9.1-2 §§156-58; J.W. 1.10.4 §§201-3).

1.2. Herod's Rule.

1.2.1. Herod's Governorship of Galilee (47-37 B.C.). Although only twenty-five years of age, Herod was admired by the Galilean Jews and the Romans for the leadership he demonstrated in removing the brigand leader Ezekias and his followers (47-46 B.C.). Some in Hyrcanus' court felt that Herod was becoming too powerful, and he was brought to trial before the Sanhedrin*; however, Sextus Caesar, governor of Syria, forced Hyrcanus II to acquit him. After that Herod joined Sextus Caesar in Damascus who appointed him governor of Coele-Syria, and thus he became involved with Roman affairs in Syria (Josephus Ant. 14.9.2-5 §§158-84; J.W. 1.10.5-9 §§204-15; b. Qidd. 43a). He again proved himself to Rome as an able leader in collecting taxes* and suppressing revolts (see Revolutionary Movements).
After Cassius and Brutus murdered Julius Caesar in 44 B.C., Cassius went to Syria and assumed the leadership there. In need of money, he reappointed Herod as governor of Cœle-Syria to collect more revenue. He promised to make Herod king after he and Brutus defeated Octavius and Antony. New disturbances in Judea were quelled by Herod (43-42 B.C.), and he received praise from the people and from Hyrcanus II (Josephus Ant. 14.11.3—12.1 §§277-99; J.W. Mill 2.3 §§220-40).

In 42 B.C. Antony defeated Cassius. About this time Herod and Phasael were accused by the Jewish leaders of usurping governmental powers and leaving Hyrcanus II with only titular honors. But Herod was acquitted (Josephus Ant. 14.12.2-6 §§301-23; J.W. 1.12.4-6 §§242-45; Plutarch Anton. 24; Dio Cassius 48.24; Appian Civ. W. 5.30-38). In 41 B.C. new accusations were made against Herod, and he was tried in Antioch with Antony present. Antony asked Hyrcanus II who would be the best-qualified ruler, and Hyrcanus II suggested Herod and Phasael. As a result, Antony appointed them as tetrarchs of Judea (Josephus J.W. 1.12.5 §§243-44; Ant. 14.13.1 §§324-26).

New troubles appeared in 40 B.C. when the Parthians arrived in Syria. The Parthians were joined by Antigonus (the son of Hyrcanus II's deposed brother Aristobulus II) who wanted to remove Hyrcanus. Jerusalem was besieged, and the Parthians asked for peace. However, Herod was suspicious of the offer. On the other hand, Phasael and Hyrcanus II met the Parthians but were betrayed by them and were put in chains. On hearing this, Herod and his family fled to Masada and then Petra. Antigonus was made king, and he mutilated his uncle Hyrcanus' ears, in order to prevent him from being restored as the high priest, and then carried him off to Parthia. Phasael died either of suicide or poisoning (Josephus Ant. 14.13.3-10 §§335-69; 15.2.1 §12; J.W. 1.13.2-11 §§250-73; Dio Cassius 48.26, 41).

Herod went to Rome,* where Antony, Octavius and the Senate designated him King of Judea (Josephus Ant. 14.14.6 §§381-85; J.W. 1.14.4 §§282-85; cf. Strabo 26.2.46; Appian Civ. W. 5.74; Tacitus Hist. 5.9). Herod returned to Palestine, recaptured Galilee and finally captured Jerusalem in the summer of 37 B.C. Just before capturing Jerusalem, he married Mariamne II, niece of Antigonus, to whom he had been betrothed for five years. Not only was this a contemptuous move against Antigonus, but also, since she was a Hasmonean, it strengthened his claim to the throne. Herod beheaded Antigonus, thus ending the Hasmonean rule and ensuring his position as king of the Jews (Josephus Ant. 14.15.8-16.2

*Josephus used the term "Rome" to indicate a court where a Roman was situated, not necessarily the city of Rome.
1.2.2. Herod’s Kingship (37-4 B.C.). The reign of Herod is divided into three periods: (1) consolidation from 37 to 25 B.C.; (2) prosperity from 25 to 12 B.C.; and (3) the period of domestic troubles from 14 to 4 B.C.

The period of consolidation lasted from his accession as king in 37 B.C. to the death of the sons of Babas, the last male representatives of the Hasmonean family in 25 B.C. The first adversaries, the people and the Pharisees,* objected both to his being an Idumean, a half-Jew, as well as his friendship with the Romans. Those who opposed him were punished, and those who took his side were rewarded with favors and honors (Josephus Ant. 15.1.1 §§2-3; J.W. 1.18.4 §358).

The second adversaries were those of the aristocracy who sided with Antigonus. Herod executed forty-five of the wealthiest and confiscated their properties and thereby replenished his own coffers (Josephus Ant. 15.1.2 §§5-6; cf. 14.9.4 §175; J.W. 1.18.4 §358).

The third group of adversaries were the Hasmonean family. His mother-in-law, Alexandra, was the main problem. She forced him, through Cleopatra's influence, to appoint her son Aristobulus as high priest even though he was only sixteen years old. After officiating at a successful Feast of Tabernacles (see Feasts), Aristobulus was supposedly accidentally drowned at Herod's palace in Jericho—a story never believed by Alexandra (Josephus Ant. 15.3.2-4 §§42-61; J.W. 1.22.2 §437). Alexandra told her friend Cleopatra of Herod's misdeeds, and thus Herod had to appear before Antony at Laodicea (on the coast of Syria). Not knowing what his fate might be, he ordered his uncle Joseph to kill Mariamne if he were sentenced to death. Mariamne heard of Herod's order for her execution and resented it. But through gifts and eloquence Herod was able to convince Antony that he was not guilty (Josephus Ant. 15.3.5-9 §§62-87; J.W. 1.22.4-5 §§441-44).

Herod's final adversary was Cleopatra. She had cooperated with Alexandra in the matter of Aristobulus. Next, she asked Antony to increase her territory by eliminating Herod and Malchus of Arabia in order to possess their lands. Antony did not permit this but did give her the rich distria of Jericho and a part of Arabia (Josephus Ant. 15.4.1-2 §§88-103). When in 32 B.C. civil war erupted between Antony and Octavius, Herod wanted to help Antony, but he was prevented by Cleopatra; she wanted Herod to make war against Malchus, who had failed to pay tribute to her. When she saw Herod winning she ordered her troops to help Malchus, hoping to weaken both parties so that she could absorb both. In the spring of 31 there was a devastating earthquake in Herod's land, killing 30,000 people, and Malchus took advantage of the situation and attacked. But in the end Herod won (Josephus Ant. 15.5.2-5 §§121-60; J.W. 1.19.3-6 §§369-85).

Soon after, on September 2, 31 B.C., Antony was defeated by Octavius in the Battle of Actium. Herod now had to ingratiate himself to Octavius and persuade him that he was the rightful ruler of Judea. In the spring of 30 B.C. he set out for Rhodes and persuaded Octavius that he had not actually fought Octavius because of his skirmish with Malchus and that he had been loyal to Rome for many years. Octavius was convinced and confirmed Herod's royal rank. When Octavius came through Palestine on his way to Egypt, Herod met him at Ptolemais and gave him 800 talents, a gesture much appreciated by Octavius (Josephus Ant. 15.6.6-7 §§188-201; J.W. 1.20.1-3 §§387-95). Following Octavius's defeat of Antony in Egypt, Herod went to Egypt to congratulate him and Octavius returned Jericho (which Cleopatra had taken) to Herod, adding to it Gadara, Hippos, Samaria, Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa and Strato's Tower (which later became Caesarea) (Josephus Ant. 15.7.3 §§215-17; BJ 1.20.3 §396).

During this time Herod continued to have domestic problems. While he was at Rhodes, his wife, Mariamne, discovered that Herod had again ordered that she be killed if he did not return. Her bitterness toward Herod was increased, and when it became evident to Herod, he placed her on trial for adultery and had her executed toward the end of 29 B.C. (Josephus Ant. 15.7.1-5 §§202-36). In 28 B.C. he had his mother-in-law Alexandra executed. And Herod's sister Salome, wanting to get rid of her husband, Costobarus, convinced Herod that Costobarus was concealing and protecting the influential sons of Babas who were loyal to Antigonus and who spoke ill of Herod. Herod executed Costobarus and the sons of Babas in 25 B.C., making it impossible for any of Hyrcanus' descendants to become king (Josephus Ant. 15.7.6-10 §§237-66).

The second period of Herod's reign was one of prosperity, which lasted from 25 to 12 B.C. The first thing Josephus mentions of this period is Herod's violations of the Jewish Law in introducing the quin-quennial games in Caesar's honor as well as the fact that he built theaters, amphitheaters and hippodromes (Josephus Ant. 15.8.1 §§267-76; 17.10.3 §255 J.W. 2.3.1 §44). Herod rebuilt many fortresses in the land and temples in Gentile territories, including the rebuilding of Strato's Tower, which was renamed Caesarea. In 24 B.C. he built for himself a royal palace in Jerusalem (Josephus Ant. 15.8.5-9.6 §§292-341). According to Josephus the most notable achievement of Herod was the building of the Temple* in Jerusalem, which was begun in 20/19 B.C. and finished in A.D. 63, long after his death (Josephus Ant. 15.11.1-6 §§380-425). The rabbis said, "Whoever who has not seen the Temple of Herod has never seen a beautiful building" (b. B. Bat. 4a), and they saw its construction as an "atonement for having slain so many sages of Israel" (Midr. Num. Rab. 14:8).

Herod acquainted himself with Greek culture by surrounding himself with people accomplished in Greek literature and art (see Hellenism). In 22 B.C. Herod sent his sons by Mariamne I, Alexander and Aristobulus, to Rome for their education. They were personally received by Caesar. About this time Augustus (Octavius's newly acquired title) gave Herod the territories of Trachonitis, Batanea and Auranitis (Josephus Ant. 15.10.1-2 §§34349; J. W. 1.20.4 §398). Two years later (22 B.C.) Augustus came to Syria and bestowed on Herod the former territory belonging to Zenodorus that lay between Trachonitis and Galilee (containing Ulatha and Paneas) and the adjacent area north and northeast of the lake of Gennesaret Augustus also made the procurators of Syria responsible to Herod for all their actions (Josephus Ant. 15.10.3 §§354-60; J.W. 1.20.4 §§399400; Dio Cassius 54.7.4-6; 9.3). In addition Herod obtained the tetrarchy of Perea for his brother Pheroras (Josephus Ant. 15.10.3 §§362; J.W. 1.24.5 §483). In a show of gratitude for Augustus' generosity, Herod built a beautiful temple for Augustus in the territory of Zenodorus, near the place called Paneion (Josephus Ant. 15.10.3 §§363; J. W. 1.21.3 §§404-6). It was around this time that Herod reduced the taxes by a third, under the pretext of a crop failure, but in reality it is more likely he did this to promote good will among those who were displeased with his emphasis on Greco-Roman culture and religion (Josephus Ant. 15.10.4 §§365-72). In 14 B.C. Herod again reduced taxes by one-fourth (Josephus Ant. 16.2.5 §§64-65). In conclusion, this period was marked by prosperity in building and success in ruling the country.

The third period of Herod's reign was characterized by domestic problems (144 B.C.). Many of the problems came because he had ten wives, each wanting their son(s) to succeed (Josephus Ant. 17.1.3 §§19-22; J.W. 1.28.4 §§562-63). His first wife, Doris, had only one son, Antipater (Josephus Ant. 14.12.1 §300). In 37 B.C. Herod repudiated Doris and Antipater and married Mariamne I, permitting Doris and Antipater to visit Jerusalem only during the festivals (Josephus J.W. 1.22.1 §433). Mariamne was the granddaughter of Hyrcanus II and she had five children: two daughters and three sons. In late 24 B.C. Herod married his third wife, Mariamne II, by whom he had Herod (Philip). His fourth wife, Malthace, was a Samaritan who bore Archelaus and Herod Antipas. His fifth wife, Cleopatra of Jerusalem, bore Philip the tetrarch. Of the remaining five wives, only Pallas, Phaedra and Elpsis are known by name, but they play an insignificant role (Josephus Ant. 17.1.3 §§19-22; J. W. 1.28.4 §§562-63).

Of all the sons of Herod, Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Mariamne II, were his favorites. However, they were hated by Salome, Herod's sister, even though her daughter Bernice was married to Aristobulus. The reason for her hatred is that she wanted her son to succeed her brother, Herod the Great. Salome spread rumors that Alexander and Aristobulus had never forgiven Herod for his murder of their mother and they were seeking to avenge it by bringing charges against him before Caesar which would lead to his losing the throne (Josephus Ant. 16.3.1-2 §§66-77). Because of this, Herod recalled his exiled son Antipater to show Alexander and Aristobulus that there could be another heir to the throne (14 B.C.). Antipater took full advantage of the situation and used every means to acquire the coveted throne.

In 13 B.C. Herod made his second will, whereby he designated Antipater as the sole heir. Herod sent Antipater with Agrippa (a friend of Augustus) to Rome to have this will ratified. While in Rome Antipater wrote slanderous letters against Alexander and Aristobulus. Herod became more aggravated with these two sons and finally in 12 B.C. he brought them before Augustus in Aquileia (near Venice) to be tried. Rather than being executed, the two brothers were reconciled to their father.

Herod made his third will naming all three sons as successors (Josephus Ant. 16.3.3—4.6 §§86-135; J.W. 1.23.2-5 §§451-66). Shortly thereafter (c. 11 or 10 B.C.) Herod again became suspicious of Alexander and Aristobulus because the slanderous accusation that they were going to kill and succeed Herod was brought against them by Antipater and Herod's sister Salome. Herod imprisoned Alexander, but Alexander's father-in-law, the king of Cappadocia, being concerned about his daughter's welfare, interceded and was able to reconcile Herod and Alexander (Josephus Ant. 16.7.2-8.6 §§188-270; J.W. 1.24.2-25.6 §§467-512). This brought peace to the Herodian household only temporarily. A certain Eurycles from Lacedemon and other troublemakers aroused in Herod's mind new suspicions against Alexander and Aristobulus. Consequently, Herod imprisoned them and sent a report to the emperor of their involvement in treasonable plots (Josephus Ant. 16.10.1-5 §§300-24; J.W. 1.26.1-27.1 §§513-35; cf. also Pausanias 2.3.5; Strabo 8.5.1; Plutarch Ant. 67).

Herod had lost favor with the emperor because of the accusations of Herod's Arab neighbor, Syllaesus, that Herod had invaded his territory for no reason. However, Herod's teacher, friend and counsellor, Nicolaus of Damascus, went to Rome and convinced Augustus that Syllaesus's case was false and Herod regained the emperor's favor. Nicolaus also presented Herod's accusations against his two sons, and Herod was given permission to have them tried outside of Herod's territory. Herod had them tried at Berytus (Beirut) before a Roman court. They were found guilty and were executed by strangulation in Sebaste (Samaria) c. 7 B.C. It was there that Herod had married their mother Mariamne II thirty years earlier (Josephus Ant. 16.10.6-11.8 §§324-404; J.W. 1.27.1-6 §§536-51).

Herod made his fourth will, naming Antipater as the sole heir. But, impatient to gain the throne, Antipater attempted to poison Herod. However, this plot failed when Herod's brother, Pheroras, drank the poison by mistake. Herod imprisoned Antipater and reported this attempt on his life to the emperor (c. 5 B.C.).

After becoming very ill, Herod drew up the fifth will, in which he bypassed his oldest sons, Archelaus and Philip, because Antipater had turned Herod's mind against them, and chose his youngest son, Antipas, to succeed him as king (Josephus Ant. 17.1.1-6.1 §§1-146; J.W. 1.28.1-29.32 §§552-646).

It is against this background of palace intrigue that Matthew recounts the circumstances surrounding the birth of Jesus (see Birth of Jesus). Shortly before Herod's death, magi arrived in Judea looking for the newborn king of the Jews. Herod instructed them to inform him of the location of this child. But being warned in a dream they did not report back to Herod but returned to their homes via another route (Mt 2:1-8, 12). God warned Joseph (husband of Jesus' mother) to flee to Egypt because of Herod's intention to kill Jesus (Mt 2:13-15). Soon after Joseph left Bethlehem, Herod killed all the male children in Bethlehem who were two years old and under (Mt 2:16). Herod steadily grew more ill. He received permission from Rome to execute Antipater, which he promptly did.

Herod wrote his sixth will, making Archelaus king, Antipas tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and Philip tetrarch of Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Batanea and Paneas. Five days after Antipater's execution, Herod died at Jericho in the spring of 4
B.C. The people made Archelaus their king. Herod's reign of thirty-three or four years had been marked with violence, not unlike those of most of his contemporary rulers.

1.2.3. Herod's Wills. Herod had written six wills, the sixth will being only a codicil of the fifth. Since the sixth will was made only five days before Herod's death, it did not have the ratification of the emperor. When Herod died Archelaus assumed leadership but refused to be crowned king (Josephus Ant. 17.8.4 §§202-3; J.W. 2.1.1 §3). Immediately after the Passover Archelaus and Antipas went to Rome to contest the will while Philip took care of the home front. Archelaus felt that Augustus should ratify Herod's sixth will because it expressed Herod's wish immediately preceding his death. On the other hand, Antipas argued that Herod had not been of sound mind when he wrote the sixth will. To further complicate the situation a revolt broke out in Palestine, and a Jewish delegate went to Rome asking for national autonomy and a union with the province of Syria. After much discussion, Augustus formulated a compromise whereby Archelaus was designated ethnarch of Idumea, Judea and Samaria with the promise to be made king if he proved worthy; Antipas was made tetrarch of Galilee and Perea; and Philip was tetrarch over Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Batanea and Paneas (Josephus Ant. 17.11.4 §§317-20; J. W. 2.6.3 §§93-100). Thus Antipas, while losing his claim to be king, did prevent Archelaus from becoming king over the entire realm.

2.1. Archelaus's Rule. Archelaus (born c. 22 B.C.), the son of Herod the Great and Malthace (a Samaritan*), was made ethnarch over Idumea, Judea and Samaria with the promise to be made king if he ruled with prudence. But Archelaus got off to a bad start. Even before he left for Rome to contest Herod's final will he overreacted to an uprising in the Temple at Passover by sending in his troops and cavalry, killing about 3,000 pilgrims. While he was in Rome a revolt broke out again in Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost, this time against Caesar's procurator, Sabinus, and spread to Judea, Galilee and Perea.

Archelaus's brutal treatment of the Jews and the Samaritans (Josephus J.W. 2.7.3 §111) is in keeping with what Matthew tells of Joseph, who heard that Archelaus was ruling Judea and was afraid to go there. Being warned in a dream on his return from Egypt Joseph, Mary and Jesus went to live in Nazareth in Galilee (Mt 2:20-23).

Soon after his return from Rome, Archelaus removed the high priest, Joazar, blaming him for siding with the rebels. He replaced him with Joazar's brother, Eleazar, and later replaced Eleazar with Jesus, son of See. Around this same time Archelaus divorced Mariamne and married Glaphyra, daughter of King Archelaus of Cappadocia. She was the former wife of Alexander, Herod's son and Archelaus's half-brother. This was a transgression of ancestral law (Josephus Ant. 17.13.1. 4-5 §§339-41, 350-53; J.W. 2.7.4 §§114-16). Either or both of these last two incidents may have caused the unrest that erupted. Archelaus used oppressive measures to quell the opposition.

Archelaus followed his father's example in building projects. He rebuilt the royal palace in Jericho in splendid fashion and diverted half of the water of the village of Neara into the newly planted palm trees in the plain of Jericho. He also created a village and honored himself by naming it Archelais (Josephus Ant. 17.13.1 §340).

2.2. Archelaus's Demise. Because of his continued oppressive rule he was finally deposed in A.D. 6. A delegation of Jews and Samaritans complained to Augustus about Archelaus's brutality and tyranny. For these two enemies to cooperate in this matter indicates the seriousness of the complaint. Also, Archelaus's brothers, Antipas and Philip, went to Rome to complain about him, presumably resenting his oversight of them in his role as ethnarch, or Roman representative, for Palestine. As a result, Archelaus was banished to Vienna in Gaul (modern Vienne on the Rhône, south of Lyons). Antipas and Philip retained their domains while Archelaus's territories were reduced to an imperial province under the rule of prefects (Josephus Ant. 17.13.1-5 §§342-55; J. W. 2.7.3—8.1 §§111-18; Strabo 16.2.46; Dio Cassius 55.27.6).

Philip the tetrarch was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem and was born around 22/21 B.C. As a result of the debate over Herod's will, Augustus made him tetrarch over the northeastern part of Herod the Great's domain, Gaulanitis, Auranitis, Batanea, Trachonitis, Paneas and Iturea (Josephus Ant. 17.9.4 §319; J. W. 2.6.3 §95; cf. Lk 3:1). His subjects were mainly Syrian and Greek (i.e., non-Jewish), and hence, he was the first and only Herodian to have the emperor's as well as his own image on his coins.
Philip built two cities (Josephus Ant. 18.2.1 §28; J.W. 2.9.1 §168). The first city was a rebuilding and enlarging of Paneas (near the source of the Jordan), which he renamed Caesarea Philippi in honor of the Roman emperor and to distinguish it from the coastal Caesarea. It was there that Peter made his confession of faith to Jesus and was given the revelation of the church (Mt 16:13-20; Mk 8:27-30). The second city was the rebuilding and enlarging of the fishing village of Bethsaida (where the Jordan flows into the Sea of Galilee). Philip gave it the status of a Greek polis and renamed it Julias in honor of Augustus's daughter Julia. There Jesus would heal the blind man (Mk 8:22-26), and in a nearby desert place Jesus would feed the 5,000 (Lk 9:10). Also, it may have been in the southern portion of Philip's territory that Jesus fed the 4,000.

Philip did not possess the ambitious and scheming character of his brothers. He ruled his domain with moderation and tranquility and was well liked by his subjects (Josephus Ant. 18.4.6 §§106-8). He married Herodias's daughter Salome, whose dance led to the beheading of John the Baptist (Mt 14:3-12; Mk 6:17-29; Lk 3:19-20; Josephus Ant. 18.5.2 §§116-19; see John the Baptist). They had no children (Josephus Ant. 18.5.4 §§137). When Philip died in A.D. 34 the emperor Tiberius annexed this territory to Syria, and when Caligula became emperor in A.D. 37, Philip's territory was given to Herod Agrippa I, brother of Herodias.

4.1. Antipas's Realm. Herod Antipas, the younger brother of Archelaus, was born c. 20 B.C. He was made tetrarch of Galilee and Perea and ruled from 4 B.C. to A.D. 39. These were the territories where both Jesus and John the Baptist concentrated their ministries. On his return from Rome Antipas had to restore order and rebuild what had been destroyed at the feast of Pentecost in 4 B.C. Like his father he founded cities. He rebuilt Sepphoris (c. AD. 8-10), the largest city in Galilee and the capital of his territories until he built Tiberias. Joseph, Mary's husband, living in Nazareth only four miles SSW of Sepphoris may well have used his skill as a carpenter (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3) during its rebuilding. The second city Antipas rebuilt was Livias (or Julias) of Perea in honor of Augustus's wife Livia. This was completed c. AD. 13 (Josephus Ant. 18.2.1 §27). Although the Herodian family had built twelve cities, Tiberias was the first city in Jewish history to be founded within the municipal pattern of the Greek polis. In the process of building the city an ancient cemetery was struck, and subseq Anti-pas had difficulty in populating it because the Jews regarded it as an unclean area. Antipas offered free houses and lands as well as exemption from taxes for the first few years for anyone who would move into the new city. Named in honor of the emperor Tiberius, it was completed around AD. 25 and served as Antipas's capital (Josephus Ant. 18.2.3 §§36-38).

4.2. Antipas's Reign. As far as Rome was concerned Herod Antipas was a good ruler who reigned over the territories of Galilee and Perea from 4 B.C. to A.D. 39.

4.2.1. Antipas and Archelaus. The only important recorded event early in Antipas's reign was the deposition of his brother Archelaus in AD. 6. Together with his brother Philip the tetrarch and a Jewish and Samaritan delegation, he went to Rome to complain about Archelaus to Tiberius (Josephus Ant. 18.13.2 §§342-44; J. W. 2.7.3 §111). Although he hoped to receive the title of king, Tiberius allowed Antipas to have the dynastic title of Herod (cf. Josephus J.W. 2.9.1 §167; Ant. 18.2.1 §27), which was significant for both his subjects and the political and social circles of the Roman world.

4.2.2. Antipas and John the Baptist. In the Gospels Herod Antipas is most known for his imprisonment and beheading of John the Baptist (Mt 14:3-12; Mk 6:17-29; Lk 3:19-20; Josephus Ant. 18.5.2 §§116-19). Antipas had been married to the daughter of the Nabatean king Aretas IV, a marriage probably arranged by Augustus in order to gain peace between Jews and Arabs and provide a buffer zone between Rome and the Parthians. This marriage would have taken place before Augustus's death in A.D. 14. When Antipas travelled to Rome around A.D. 29, he visited his brother Herod (Philip), who apparently lived in one of the coastal cities of Palestine. While there he fell in love with his niece as well as his brother's wife, Herodias. She agreed to marry Antipas when he returned from Rome, provided that he divorce* his first wife (Josephus Ant. 18.5.1 §§109-10). Antipas's first wife learned of the plan and fled to her father, Aretas IV, who considered the matter a personal insult and later retaliated against Antipas.

When Antipas married Herodias, John the Baptist boldly criticized him for marrying his brother's wife, and as a result he was imprisoned by Antipas. The Mosaic Law prohibited a man from marrying a brother's wife (Lev 18:16; 20:21), except in the case of levirate marriages (Deut 25:5; Mk 12:19). Since Antipas's brother had a daughter, Salome, and, more pointedly, his brother was still living, the levirate marriage did not apply.
There is a problem in identifying Herodias's first husband. The Gospels designate him as Philip (Mt 14:3; Mk 6:17), but Josephus lists him as Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne II, daughter of Simon the high priest (Josephus Ant. 18.5 §109). Since the Herodian family line is complicated, many think that the Gospel writers confused this Herod with Philip the tetrarch who later married Herodias's daughter, Salome. However, although this may seem plausible at first, it is untenable for several reasons.

First, the Gospels would be guilty of three historical blunders, namely (1) confusing this Herod with his half-brother Philip the tetrarch, (2) making Philip the tetrarch the husband of Herodias instead of the husband of her daughter, Salome, and (3) assuming that Salome was the daughter of Philip the tetrarch who, according to Josephus, had no children. These errors would be incredible in the light of the Gospel writers' familiarity with other historical details of the era. Furthermore, the early Christian community included people like Joanna, wife of Chuza, Antipas's financial minister (Lk 8:3), and Manaen, a close friend of Antipas (Acts 13:1), who would have known the details and would have prevented such historical error.

Third, some argue that Herod the Great would not have two sons with the same name. But this is untenable because, although the two sons had the same father, they had different mothers. This is substantiated by the fact that Herod the Great did have two sons named Antipas/Antipater and two sons named Herod, all of whom had different mothers.

Fourth, it is highly probable that Herodias's first husband was called both Herod and Philip or, in other words, Herod Philip. Although some would argue that double names were not used, no one argues that Herod of Acts 12:1, 6, 11, 19-21 is the Agrippa of Josephus or that Archelaus is Herod Archelaus. Double names were used of emperors like Caesar Augustus.

Fifth, if the Evangelists intended that Herodias's former husband was actually Philip the tetrarch, why did they not call him "Philip the tetrarch" as they had called Herod Antipas first "tetrarch" and then "king" within the same pericope (cf. Mt 14:1, 9; Mk 6:14, 26)?

Therefore, it seems most reasonable to conclude that the Philip in the Gospels and the Herod in Josephus are one and the same person; otherwise it would be hopelessly confusing.
Antipas's imprisonment of John the Baptist was not enough for Herodias. At the appropriate time, probably Antipas's birthday, at Machaerus in Perea, Herodias arranged for a banquet for Antipas in order to eliminate John the Baptist. When Herodias's daughter danced before the guests, Antipas was overwhelmed and promised under oath to give her anything she wanted, up to half of his kingdom. With the advice of her mother, Salome asked for the head of John the Baptist on a platter. Although Antipas was sorry for his rash promise, he granted the request to save face before his guests. John was beheaded in AD. 31 or 32.

4.2.3. Antipas and Jesus. Antipas's relationship to Jesus is seen in three events. First, Antipas heard of Jesus' ministry and concluded, with some irony, that Jesus was John the Baptist resurrected (Mt 14:1-2; Mk 6:14-16; Lk 9:7-9). Antipas had silenced John the Baptist's movement, and now there appeared to be a more successful people's preacher on the horizon. Hence, Antipas concluded that it was John the Baptist all over again. Antipas wanted to see Jesus, but Jesus withdrew from his territories. Antipas did not want to use force, fearing that his citizens would again resent his treatment as they had with his treatment of John the Baptist.

The second incident was Jesus' final journey to Jerusalem. While in Antipas's territories, some of the Pharisees came to warn Jesus that he should leave because Antipas wanted to kill him (Lk 13:31-33). Jesus told them to "go tell that fox" that he would continue his ministry of casting out demons and healing for a short time longer, and when he had finished he would then go to Jerusalem to die.

The third event was Jesus' trial by Antipas in A.D. 33 (Lk 23:6-12; see Trial of Jesus). Although some scholars think this pericope is legendary because it is not mentioned in the other Gospels, its occurrence in Luke's Gospel makes historical sense. Luke was writing to Theophilus, perhaps a Roman official, who would have been interested in the relationships between the Herods and the prefects of Judea, especially since this pericope reports the reconciliation between Antipas and Pilate (Lk 23:12; see Pontius Pilate). Since the account reports no progress in the trial, it is understandable why the other Gospel writers left it out. Some scholars think the source for this incident is from the Gospel of Peter. But that Gospel presents no real parallel with Luke's account of Antipas's trial of Jesus. In fact, the Gospel of Peter holds Antipas responsible for Jesus' death, whereas there is nothing of this in Luke.
In Luke's account Pilate (see Pontius Pilate), knowing Antipas was in Jerusalem for the Passover and hearing that Jesus was from Antipas's territory, Galilee, sent Jesus to him. Pilate was not legally obligated to do so, but he wanted to extricate himself from an awkward situation in which the Jews wanted to crucify Jesus while Pilate felt that he was innocent. Furthermore, Pilate needed to improve his relationship with Antipas. It had been strained by his massacre of some of Antipas's subjects (Lk 13:1), and it was further aggravated when Antipas reported to Tiberius the trouble Pilate had caused the Jews when he brought the votive shields to Jerusalem. Subsequently, Tiberius had ordered their immediate removal c. A.D. 32 (Philo Leg. Gai. 299-304). Hence, Pilate had overstepped his bounds and needed to appease Antipas. On the other hand, Antipas did not want to give Pilate any reason to report him to the emperor, and so after mocking Jesus he sent him back to Pilate without comment, thereby paving the road for reconciliation between the two leaders from that day forward (Lk 23:12).

4.2.4. Antipas and Exile. In A.D. 36 Aretas IV attacked and defeated Antipas's army. The Jews considered this divine punishment for Antipas's execution of John the Baptist (Josephus Ant. 18.5.1-2 §§116-19). Tiberius commanded Vitellius, governor of Syria, to help Antipas against Aretas. However, before this could be accomplished Tiberius had died and Vitellius withheld his aid until he received orders from the new emperor Caligula.

When Caligula became emperor (A.D. 37) he gave his friend Agrippa I, brother of Herodias and nephew of Antipas, the land of Philip the tetrarch as well as the tetrarch of Lysanius with the title king (Josephus Ant. 18.6.10 §§225-39). Later, Agrippa went to Palestine (c. August of 38) to see his newly acquired domain. His presence in the land provoked Herodias's jealousy because he had obtained the much-coveted title king which Antipas had never received, although he had ruled well and faithfully since 4 B.C. Finally, under Herodias's persuasion, Antipas and Herodias went to Rome in A.D. 39 to seek the same honor. Agrippa heard of this and sent an envoy to Rome to bring accusations against Antipas. This action resulted in the banishment of Antipas and Herodias to Lugdunum Convenarum, now Saint-Bertrand de Comminges in southern France in the foothills of the Pyrenees. Caligula learned that Herodias was the sister of Agrippa I and excused her from the exile, but she chose to follow her husband As a result, Agrippa I obtained Antipas's territories of Galilee and Perea (Josephus Ant. 18.7.1-2 §§240-55; J.W. 2.9.6 §§181-83).
5. The Herodians.

The Herodians were influential persons who were partisans of the Herodian dynasty. They are mentioned three times in the NT, dealing with two incidents where they joined with the Pharisees in their opposition to Jesus. The first incident took place in Galilee immediately after Jesus healed the man with the withered hand, and the Herodians and the Pharisees sought to destroy Jesus (Mk 3:6). The second episode was in Jerusalem when the Pharisees and the Herodians tried to incriminate Jesus regarding the lawfulness of paying taxes to Caesar (Mt 22:16 par. Mk 12:13). The Herodians are not mentioned in Luke or John.

The origin of the name has been debated. Some think that the ending of their name reflects the Latin suffix -ianus which is appended to adjectives, thus making it a substantive meaning that they were of the household of Herod, that is, domestic servants. Others think that it is a Greek suffix meaning that they were officers or agents of Herod However, in the Gospel narratives they are not portrayed as either domestic servants or officers of Herod but as influential people whose outlook was friendly to the Herodian rule and consequently to the Roman rule upon which it rested.

The issue comes to the forefront in Mark 8:15 and Matthew 16:6 where in Mark we read of the "leaven of Herod" and the Matthean parallel refers to the "leaven of the Sadducees." This problem becomes more critical if the secondary Markan reading, "leaven of the Herodians" (p45, θ f1 13), is the correct one. The problem with this passage is not the interpretation but the question of whether the Sadducees and the Herod(ians) are the same? At first this seems impossible because Herod the Great tried to discredit the Hasmonean house. Furthermore, he and his grandson Agrippa I never selected a high priest from among the Sadducees, who were pro-Hasmonean, but rather from the house of Boethus. However, a reversal of this policy occurred between Herod's son Archelaus's deposition in A.D. 6 and Agrippa I's acquisition of Judea in AD. 41. At that time most of the high priests came from the Sadducean house of Annas because the province of Judea was not under Herodian rule but under direct Roman rule of the prefects. It seems probable, then, that the Boethusians, being pro-Herodian, were really the Herodians and the Sadducees were pro-Hasmonean. Actually, later rabbinic sources used the Boethusian name interchangeably with that of the Sadducees (m. Menah 10.3). It may well be that the Sadducees and the Herodians would have been close if not identical religiously and economically.
Thus, the Herodians were politically affiliated with the Herodian house, but they were religiously and economically affiliated with the Sadducees. However, the political distinctions between the Sadducees and Herodians were blurred with the marriage of Herod Antipas and Herodias (a Hasmonean on her mother's side). It could be that Herod Antipas married Herodias to gain Sadducean support. Hence, the Herodians and the Sadducees would have been on the same side politically against the Pharisees, the Herodians being pro-Herodian government while the Pharisees were both anti-Hasmonean and anti-Herodian. This is borne out in Mark 8:15 and Matthew 16:6, 12 where the Pharisees and the Sadducees/Herodians are contrary parties opposing Jesus.

In summary, the Herodians were theologically in agreement with the Sadducees and politically both of these parties would have been the opposite of the Pharisees who were anti-Hasmonean, anti-Herodian and anti-Roman. The Pharisees looked for a cataclysmic messianic kingdom to remove the rule of the Herods and Rome, whereas the Herodians wanted to preserve the Herodian rule. However, the Herodians and the Pharisees worked together to oppose Jesus, because he was introducing a new kingdom (see Kingdom of God) that neither wanted.

See also Hellenism; Josephus; Judaism; Pontius Pilate; Revolutionary Movements; Rome; Temple.

H. W. Hoehner

HIGH PRIESTS. See Judaism; Priest AND Priesthood.

HISTORICAL JESUS, QUEST OF

The idea of the quest of the historical Jesus gained currency through Albert Schweitzer's The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (1910). Schweitzer's original German title Von Reimarus zu Wrede. Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung [From Reimarus to Wrede. A History of Research into the Life of Jesus] (1906) suggested a history of biographical research. The English title bestowed added drama to Schweitzer's narrative of the numerous efforts from the late eighteenth century down to his own day to discover the truth about Jesus as he really was. It heightened the impression that scientific research showed that the Jesus of history was different from the Christ* of Scripture, the creeds, orthodox theology and Christian piety.

The period covered by Schweitzer is commonly designated as the original quest of the historical Jesus. It is generally thought to have terminated with Schweitzer's own reconstruction of Jesus, the rise of form criticism and the growing popularity of neo-orthodoxy. In the 1950s followers of Rudolf Bultmann initiated what was called the New Quest of the historical Jesus. More recently, the term Third Quest has been coined to describe the renewed interest in Jesus in his historical context.

1. The Original Quest (1778-1906)
2. From the History of Religions School to the New Quest

3. The Third Quest

4. Conclusion

1. The Original Quest (1778-1906).

1.1. The Initial Phase in Germany. Schweitzer dated the quest from the publication in 1778 of an anonymous article, "On the Intention of Jesus and his Disciples." The article was taken from a manuscript by the Hamburg scholar Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694-1768), whose Apology or Defence of the Rational Worshippers of God had been withheld from publication on account of its dangerous ideas. Among the circle permitted to see it was the dramatist Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-81). Between 1774 and 1778 Lessing published extracts under the title Fragments from an Unnamed Author which he had ostensibly found in the library of the Duke of Brunswick at Wolfenbüttel. The extracts came to be known as the Wolfenbüttel Fragments. Although accurate guesses were made at the time, confirmation of the author's identity came long after Reimarus's death.

The Fragments included an attack on the historicity of the resurrection narratives. But the notoriety of this article was surpassed by the fragment "On the Intention of Jesus and his Disciples" (ET Reimarus Fragments, ed. C. H. Talbert, 1970). Jesus was depicted as a pious Jew, dedicated to calling Israel* to repentance in order to establish the kingdom of God on earth (see Kingdom of God). He did not intend to introduce new teaching or ceremonies. As time went on Jesus became more fanatical, obsessed by the idea that he could force God's hand by dying a martyr's death (see Death of Jesus). However, he miscalculated popular support, and his beliefs about God proved to be misguided. He died disillusioned with the God who had forsaken him.

Christianity might well have ended then but for the ingenuity and duplicity of the disciples.* When it became clear that there would be no general persecution, they emerged from hiding, proclaiming that Jesus had been raised from the dead and would return to establish the promised kingdom. Eschatology* was thus the key to understanding both Jesus and the disciples, but in both cases it is mistaken. Jesus wrongly believed that God would establish his kingdom on earth through him; the disciples were guilty of encouraging false expectations of the coming kingdom.

The Wolfenbüttel Fragments provoked numerous replies. The weightiest came from the leading biblical scholar of the day and founder of "liberal theology," J. S. Semler (1725-91). Semler's Answer to the Fragments (1791) was virtually a line-by-line refutation, written from the standpoint of a moderate orthodoxy. In the meantime, Lessing protested that, while he did not fully agree with the Fragments, they nevertheless raised important questions. His standpoint expressed the Age of Enlightenment's confidence in reason, and sought to detach religion from history by claiming that nothing in history could be demonstrated beyond doubt. "If no historical truth can be demonstrated, then nothing can be demonstrated by means of historical truths. That is: accidental truths of history can never become the proof of necessary truths of reason" (On the Proof of the Spirit and of Power, 1777, in H. Chadwick, ed., Lessing's Theological Writings, 1956, 53). History might exemplify rational truth, but such truth was not dependent on history. To Lessing, Jesus was one of the great educators of the human race, being "the first reliable, practical teacher of the immortality of the soul" (The Education of the Human Race, 1780, #58, Chadwick, 92).

1.2. German Lives of Jesus. The latter part of the eighteenth century witnessed a growing number of accounts of the life of Jesus. The more conservative accounts were meditations and paraphrases of the Gospel stories, like J.J. Hess's popular three volumes on The History of the Three Last Years of the Life of Jesus (1768-72). Such works were the literary counterpart to the combination of text and meditation set to music by J. S. Bach (1685-1750) in his Passions according to St. Matthew and St. John. A work which stressed the moral aspect of Jesus' teaching was the Essay on the Plan Developed by the Founder of Christianity for the Benefit of Humanity (1781) by the court preacher, F. V. Reinhard.

K F. Bahrdt's series of letters addressed to seekers of truth on The Execution of the Plan and Purpose of Jesus (1784-92) introduced the genre of fictitious reconstruction. Bahrdt depicted Jesus as a tool in an Essene plot to transform Jewish society. He had acquired remedies for eye infections and nervous disorders from a mysterious Persian. The crucifixion was rigged by Nicodemus who had enlisted the aid of Luke to give Jesus pain-killing drugs. Jesus duly appeared in public to convince people that he had risen from the dead. Another work in this genre was K H. Venturing Natural History of the Great Prophet of Nazareth (1800-2).
The first professor to lecture on the life of Jesus was Friedrich D. E. Schleiermacher (1768-1834). His lectures on The Life of Jesus (1819-20) were subsequently repeated and published posthumously in 1864 (ET ed. J. C. Verheyden, 1975). Schleiermacher regarded John's Gospel as a historical outline into which could be inserted material from the other Gospels. He reinterpreted Jesus in the light of his own philosophical theology which was based on his analysis of religious experience. The essence of religious experience was a sense of utter dependence on God. Jesus was a man in whom this sense of dependence was uniquely developed. His consciousness of God could be said to be an existence of God in human nature (The Christian Faith, 2d ed. 1830-31, §94, ET 1928). It was also the source of Jesus' redemptive power. In Schleiermacher's theology Jesus' unique awareness of God replaced the traditional doctrine of Christ's divine and human natures.

While Schleiermacher sought to give a rationally credible account of Jesus' person, other scholars attempted rational explanations of his actions. In The Life of Jesus as the Basis for a Pure History of Early Christianity (1828) H. E. G. Paulus insisted that what was truly miraculous about Jesus was his holy disposition. Individual miracle stories (see Miracles and Miracle Stories) were capable of rational explanation. Jesus did not walk upon the water, but was standing on the shore. The five thousand were fed by those who had brought ample provisions. Jesus was taken down from the cross before death and revived in the cool of the tomb. Stripping off the grave clothes, he found the gardener's things, which explained the failure of Mary Magdalene to recognize him. A more restrained rationalism was adopted by K A. von Hase in his widely used textbook on The Life of Jesus (1828). Like Schleiermacher he accepted John as the historical foundation of his chronology. The miracles were not violations of the laws of nature, but manifestations of the recovery of nature's original harmony. He doubted the infancy stories, but sought rational, psychological explanations for other events.

1.3. Strauss and the Question of Myth. The approaches noted so far were rejected by David Friedrich Strauss (1808-74) in The Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835-36; ET 1846, repr. ed., Peter C. Hodgson, 1973). Strauss's work was prompted by reading notes based on Schleiermacher's lectures on The Life of Jesus. When the latter was published years later, Strauss subjected them to a bitter critique in The Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History (1865; ET ed. L E. Keck, 1977). Strauss denounced Schleiermacher as a supernaturalist in his christology, but in criticism and exegesis a rationalist.
Strauss repudiated both the supernaturalism of orthodoxy and the attempts of the rationalists to salvage the underlying historicity of events by preferring rational explanations. Both had failed to take into account the myth-making tendencies in religion which had been at work in the Gospel stories long before they were put into writing (see Myth).

Strauss accepted a basic historical framework for the life of Jesus: he had grown up at Nazareth; he was baptized by John the Baptist*; he collected disciples, he went about teaching, opposing Pharisaism and summoning people to the messianic kingdom; he fell victim to the hostility of the Pharisees* and died on the cross. However, this outline was overlaid by the creative imagination of the early church* which interpreted these events as the fulfillment of prophecy, and of the beliefs and institutions of the OT (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology). Messianic expectation predetermined that the Messiah should perform miracles and act like a new Moses* and a Davidic king (see Son of David). Once Jesus acquired the reputation of being the Messiah (see Christ), popular belief created myths and legends about him. The historical Jesus was thus turned into the divine Messiah by the pious, but erroneous, devotion of the church.

At the end of his work Strauss sought to rescue the underlying truth of the Christian faith by appealing to the philosophy of Hegel who had taught that reality is the manifestation of the infinite Spirit in the finite. Christianity was a symbolic representation of the general truth concerning the transformation of life by the absolute Spirit. The Incarnation was the mythological symbol of the divine manifestation in humankind in general.

Strauss's work provoked great outcry. Within five years some sixty replies appeared. A widely respected conservative response was August Neander's Life of Jesus Christ (1837; ET 1851). Strauss published three series of replies to his critics and made revisions to his work. But the radical character of his position cost him his academic career, and he turned to literature and politics. In 1864 Strauss published The Life of Jesus Adapted for the German People (ET 1865). It was prompted by the popularity of J. E. Renan's Life of Jesus (1863) in French. Strauss's second Life retained his earlier mythical explanation but dropped the appeal to Hegelian philosophy. The desupernaturalized Jesus depicted by Strauss emerged as one of the great improvers of the ideal of humanity.

Strauss's methods pioneered those of more recent times. His emphasis on the role of myth in religion anticipated the History of Religions School, and his view of the preliterary formation of Gospel material anticipated form criticism (see 2.3. below). However, his underlying approach was if anything more rationalistic than that of the rationalists whom he repudiated. For the latter were willing to give some credence to the events for which they sought rational explanations, whereas Strauss rejected their historicity altogether. Strauss and the rationalists shared an underlying conviction that the homogeneous character of historical causes precluded special, supernatural interventions.

1.4. The Synoptics Versus John. The term "Synoptic Gospel" goes back to J. J. Griesbach's Synopsis of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke (1776) which set out the text of the three Gospels in parallel columns, thus facilitating comparative, critical study of the first three Gospels. Up to this date scholars had widely accepted Augustine's view that the first Gospel was the work of the apostle Matthew, and that Mark abbreviated Matthew. Griesbach himself accepted this view, with the modification that Mark had also Luke before him. Griesbach also questioned the wisdom of trying to produce a harmony of the accounts on the grounds that the Evangelists themselves were not interested in strict chronology.

The priority of Matthew was widely accepted in the early nineteenth century. Among those who did so was Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792-1860), who had been one of Strauss's teachers and who emerged as the leader of the new Tübingen School. Baur insisted upon a purely historical approach which avoided supernatural explanations. For him the key to NT study was tendency criticism, which sought to identify and evaluate sources by discovering their basic tendencies. Baur believed that Matthew was the earliest Gospel on account of its Jewish character. Luke was written by a follower of Paul with the deliberate intention of softening Matthew's Jewishness. Mark's aim was to round off the Gospel story into a harmonious whole. John reflected the conflict with Gnosticism and the church's situation in the second century. It contained a docetic tendency which stressed the Spirit at the expense of the flesh. Historically, John was remote from the time of Jesus. But since Matthew was written c. A.D. 130, it was only relatively more historically reliable. Baur's view of Jesus was akin to that of Schleiermacher. Jesus had a unique consciousness of God. As the highest emissary of God, he mediates divine knowledge.

The Tübingen School enjoyed great notoriety, but membership was limited to Baur himself and a handful of disciples. Their views were too extreme for most scholars. In the meantime, the traditional view of the priority of Matthew began to be overturned.

The year which saw the appearance of Strauss's Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835) also witnessed the publication of an article by Karl Lachmann, "On the Order of Narratives in the Synoptic Gospels." Lachmann's article was the first to treat seriously the order of events as the key to understanding Synoptic relationships. Lachmann saw Mark as the middle term between Matthew and Luke. His work led to the growing popularity of the view that Matthew and Luke were dependent on Mark for their account of events. This view was supplemented by the theory of Q,* developed by H. J. Holtzmann (1832-1910). Q (German Quelle "source") was the designation given to the sayings source posited behind the teaching contained in Matthew and Luke, but generally omitted by Mark who gives relatively little of Jesus' teaching (see Synoptic Problem).

By the end of the nineteenth century the traditional views of the apostolic authorship and priority of Matthew and the apostolic authorship of John, together with the latter's reliable chronological framework, were largely replaced by a view which discounted the historicity of John and favored a two-source theory (Mark and Q) as the substratum for recovering the historical Jesus (see Synoptics and John). This tendency was linked with the further tendency to discount the miraculous and supernatural. The result was a portrait of Jesus which followed Mark's general outline but focused on his moral, altruistic teaching.

1.5. French and British Lives of Jesus. Such a view of Jesus had already been developed in France by the former Catholic seminarian J. E. Renan (1823-92). In 1862 Renan was suspended from his chair at the Collège de France for describing Jesus as such an incomparable human that he would not contradict those who called him God. Renan had already completed the draft of a biography while on an archaeologcal expedition. Inspired by the scenery of the Holy Land, Renan resolved to write a life of Jesus. His account eschewed critical discussion of sources and method, seeking instead to retell the Gospel stories in a way that was credible to the modern French reader. Renan added imaginative splashes of local color to the scenes which he described and wrote with the calm assurance of a man who had got to the bottom of things. What made Jesus the Son of God was his realization that true worship* did not depend upon places and ritual but upon spirit (see Holy Spirit) and truth* (Jn 4:23). What made him unique was his dedication to the Father and to his divine mission.

Renan's work enjoyed great popularity and was translated into most European languages. In the preface to the thirteenth edition Renan explained his underlying philosophy and aims. He complained that the Christ of Strauss, Baur, and the German critics was like a Gnostic Christ, an impalpable, intangible creation of their philosophy. He claimed that his own Christ was rooted in "genuine history." His method was to follow closely the original narratives, discard impossibilities, sow everywhere the seeds of doubt and put forth as conjectural different ways in which events might have happened.

The Strasbourg Protestant scholar T. Colani complained that Renan's Christ was not the Jesus of history, but that of the Fourth Gospel without a metaphysical halo. Colani set out his own views in Jesus Christ and the Messianic Beliefs of his Time (1864). Colani believed that there was no connection between the historical Jesus and Jewish messianic beliefs. The eschatological teaching attributed to Jesus in the Gospels (Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 17) was not authentic. Jesus had predicted the destruction of the Temple,* and the disciples had asked when it would occur (Mt 24:3; Mk 13:4; Lk 21:7). Jesus replied that he did not know (Mt 24:36; Mk 13:32; Lk 21:33). The so-called little Apocalypse that comes between the question and answer was the work of overzealous eschatologically minded Jewish Christians who could not accept Jesus' confession of ignorance (see Apocalyptic Teaching). German and French thought made an impact on the English-speaking world through the translations of Strauss and Renan and also of more conservative scholars. In comparison with the German and French scholars, British scholarship was more modest and restrained. An exception was Charles Christian Hennell's Inquiry Concerning the Origin of Christianity (1838), whose ideas were similar to those of Strauss, but were eclipsed by the latter. Hennell was instrumental in introducing George Eliot (Mary Ann Evans) to skeptical views and arranged for her to translate Strauss into English.

Somewhere between the skeptical products of continental criticism and the conservative, devotional works which appealed to the British Christian readership was the anonymous Ecce Homo (1865). The title was taken from the Latin version of Pilate's words "Behold the Man" (Jn 19:5). The author was J. R. Seeley, professor of Latin at University College, London, and later professor of modern history at Cambridge. The work was not so much a life of Jesus as an appreciation which downplayed the miraculous and the dogmatic. The power of Jesus lay in his ability to infect people with an enthusiasm for morality. Jesus stood in sharp contrast with Socrates with whom argument is everything and personal authority nothing. With Jesus personal authority was everything (see Authority and Power). His aim was to establish a divine society on earth, or in the language of Seeley's day, "the improvement of morality" (chap. 9).

The first major Life of Christ by a British writer was that by F. W. Farrar (1874) which set the model for the rest of the century. Like Renan's work, it was inspired by a visit to the Holy Land and was filled with imaginative descriptions of places and events. But unlike Renan, Farrar did not tamper with orthodoxy. Jesus was both the divine Son of God (see Son of God) and a flesh-and-blood human personality.

The most notable British "life" was Alfred Eder-sheim's The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (1883). Edersheim was born in Vienna of Jewish parents and studied in Berlin. He became a convert to Christianity and spent his last years in England as vicar of a country parish. Edersheim avoided critical discussion of sources and took the Gospel narratives at face value. Matthew and John were the work of the apostles* whose names they bear. Luke and Mark had access to apostolic testimony to supplement their own reminiscences. Edersheim accepted duplicate events behind duplicate traditions: there were two cleansings of the Temple (see Temple Cleansing), two feedings of the multitudes, numerous journeys to and from Jerusalem, and no conflict between John and the Synoptics. The value of Edersheim's work lay in its author's immense erudition. No other British (and perhaps no continental) scholar had such a grasp of the Jewish world, the Talmud (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings), Philo, Josephus,* the apocryphal and pseudepigraphal literature, archeology and geography (see Archeology and Geography). Whereas Farrar resorted to florid prose for his effect Edersheim was able to elucidate the details of the Gospel stories with a wealth of exact learning.

The contributions of the Cambridge trio of B. F. Westcott (1825-1901), J. B. Lightfoot (1828-89) and F. J. A. Hort (1828-92) helped to vindicate the NT against continental radicalism. However, their grand plan for a series of commentaries covering the NT was only partially realized. Wescott's commentary on John (1881) defended apostolic authorship and the historical integrity of the Gospel. The commentaries on the Synoptics remained unwritten.

The leading British NT scholars of the next generation were the brilliant but unconventional F. C. Burkitt (1864-1935) at Cambridge and William Sanday (1843-1920) at Oxford. Both were instrumental in disseminating the views of Schweitzer and modern critics. Burkitt's contributions included The Gospel History and its Transmission (1906) and Christian Beginnings (1924). Sanday never completed his projected life of Christ but left behind a number of important studies. His seminar produced Oxford Studies in the Synoptic Problem (1911). His article in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible was published in book form as Outlines of the Life of Christ (1905). Sanday gathered together various papers in The Life of Christ in Recent Research (1907) and developed a tentative christology in Christologies Ancient and Modern (1910), which was reprinted in Christology and Personality (1911). Drawing on William James's theories about the unconscious, Sanday suggested that the locus of divine indwelling in human beings was the "subliminal." Consciousness was the "narrow neck" through which everything comes up from the depths. While Jesus was fully human in every sense, he had a deep relationship with God in the depths of his being. It was this relationship which produced his messianic consciousness as Son of God.

1.6. The Ritschlian School. A major theological force in the second half of the nineteenth century was the school of A. B. Ritschl (1822-89). In his younger days Ritschl had followed his mentor, F. C. Baur, but came to reject the latter's account of Christian origins. Ritschl's theological outlook matched the empirical emphasis of the University of Göttingen, where he taught. The university was a center of scientific research. The focus of Ritschl's attention was the empirically observable experience of the church. The origin of the person of Jesus was not a fit subject for theological inquiry, because it transcended all inquiry. His divinity was not to be understood as a statement of fact but as an expression of the revelational value of Jesus to the church. His vocation was to be the bearer of God's ethical lordship (see Lord) over human beings. Ritschl's major work on The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation (3 vols., 1870-74; partial ET 1900) identified two focal points in Christianity. The first was the redemption wrought by Christ understood as freedom from guilt and freedom over the world through the realization of God's fatherhood. The second was the kingdom of God, understood ethically (see Ethics of Jesus) as the extension of God's ethical lordship over the world through the redeemed.

The ethical side of Christianity was stressed by the great church historian Adolf Harnack (1851-1930), who shared Ritschl's suspicion of the adverse effects of metaphysics on theology. As a historian of the development of dogma, Harnack sought to separate the kernel from the husk by extracting the essence of Christianity from the Hellenized formulations of the church. In his celebrated lectures at Berlin University on "The Essence of Christianity" (1899-1900; ET What Is Christianity? [1901]), Harnack argued that Jesus desired no other belief in his person than what was contained in keeping his commandments.* His consciousness as Son of God was nothing but the practical consequence of knowing God as the divine Father. Jesus' teaching could be summed up under three heads: the kingdom of God and its coming; God the Father and the infinite value of the human soul; the higher righteousness (see Justice and Righteousness) and the commandment of love.* In The Sayings of Jesus (ET 1908) Harnack declared that Q expressed most clearly the teaching of Jesus and the essence of Christianity. Q provided the refutation of those who exaggerated the apocalyptic* and eschatological elements in Jesus' teaching.

Hamack's celebrated lectures prompted the comment of the French Catholic modernist Alfred Loisy, which was repeated by George Tyrrell in Christianity at the Cross-Roads (1909, chap. 7): "The Christ that Harnack sees, looking back through nineteen centuries of Catholic darkness, is only the reflection of a Liberal Protestant face, seen at the bottom of a deep well." However, Loisy's alternative was scarcely more acceptable to the Catholic authorities. In identifying the essence of Christianity with the "idea" of Christ in Catholic Christianity, Loisy was implicitly questioning the historical basis of that idea. Modernism was condemned by the decree Lamentabili and the encyclical Pascendi (1907), and an oath against Modernism was imposed by Sacrorum Antistitum (1910).

1.7. Weiss, Wrede, Schweitzer and the End of the Original Quest. Despite Hamack's prestige and popularity, signs of strain were already evident in the edifice of Ritschlian theology. In 1892 Ritschl's son-in-law, Johannes Weiss (1863-1914), published Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (2d ed. 1900; ET ed. R. H. Hiers and D. L Holland, 1971). Weiss's personal outlook was much the same as that of his father-in-law, in deference to whom he delayed publication of his findings. However, his research showed that, though it might be unacceptable to the modern mind, Jesus' teaching about the kingdom was definitely eschatological. Weiss identified six characteristics: The kingdom was transcendent and supramundane; it belonged to the future; Jesus was not the founder or inaugurator but waited for God to bring it; the kingdom was not identified with the circle of Jesus' disciples; it did not come gradually by growth or development; its ethics were negative and world-denying. Jesus was a rabbi or prophet* who believed that in God's good time he would become the Son of man (see Son of Man). Eventually, he came to realize that this would occur only after his death.

A further blow to the liberal picture of the historical Jesus was delivered by William Wrede's The Messianic Secret in the Gospels (1901; ET 1971). Wrede challenged the prevailing assumption on which the liberal picture of the historical Jesus was based, viz., that Mark's Gospel was an unadorned account of the historical facts. Wrede saw Mark not as an objective reporter but as the theologian of the Messiasgeheimnis (a term which could be translated either as "messianic secret" or "messianic mystery"). According to Wrede, Jesus himself did not claim to be the Messiah. It was the church that thought of Jesus as Messiah in the light of its resurrection* faith.* The church explained the paucity of messianic claims by Jesus by devising stories that Jesus had secretly revealed his messiahship to the disciples and had forbidden them to broadcast it. On this view the Gospels were primary sources not for the life of Jesus, but for the beliefs of the Evangelists and the communities which they served.

On the same day that Wrede's book was published, Albert Schweitzer published a two-volume dissertation which put forward an alternative view. The first volume was entitled The Problem of the Lord's Supper according to the Scholarly Research of the Nineteenth Century and the Historical Accounts (ET 1982). The second volume dealt with The Mystery of the Kingdom of God: The Secret of Jesus' Messiahship and Passion (ET 1914). Although the work was published in 1901, Schweitzer had reached his conclusions as early as 1897. He later declared his "thoroughgoing eschatology" to be a consistent extension of Weiss's views and the answer to Wrede's skepticism. Whereas Weiss had made eschatology the key to Jesus' teaching, Schweitzer saw that it was also the key to the course of Jesus' life. The title Son of man was a designation of the Messiah coming on the clouds as judge. Jesus believed that it was his vocation to be the coming Son of man. Initially he revealed this messianic secret only to Peter, James and John. Later, Peter told it to the rest of the Twelve. Judas told the secret to the high priest (see Priest and Priesthood) who used it as the ground for Jesus' execution (Mk 14:61-64; cf. Dan 7:13).

Jesus had sent out the Twelve on a mission to proclaim the coming kingdom of God. He did not expect them to return. The Twelve were the "men of violence" (Mt 11:12) who would provoke the messianic tribulation that would herald the kingdom. Whereas Weiss believed that one could only wait passively for the kingdom, Schweitzer believed that the mission was designed to provoke its coming. When this did not happen, Jesus determined to give his own life as a ransom for many (Mk 10:45) and so cause the kingdom to come.

At the time that Schweitzer wrote The Mystery of the Kingdom of God he was an unknown instructor at Strasbourg. His work attracted little attention, and it was only after World War 1 and the collapse of liberal optimism that eschatology and the "otherworldly" gospel got a wider hearing. In the meantime, Schweitzer's celebrated Quest of the Historical Jesus established his reputation as a scholar. Schweitzer went on to earn doctorates in music and medicine. His medical work in Africa enhanced the impact of his writing.

The Quest of the Historical Jesus was originally intended as a supplement to the earlier, shorter book. It rapidly established the reputation of being the definitive history of research on the historical Jesus. In intent it was a massive vindication of Schweitzer's earlier conclusions which had largely been ignored and which were repeated in the final chapter. It did not show, as is often assumed, that recovery of the historical Jesus was impossible. Rather, it presented a massive critique of the views of the theological establishment, set out in such a way as to show that all paths but Schweitzer's proved to be dead ends.

Schweitzer identified three major crises in which critical study was faced with a choice between stark alternatives (238). The first was the crisis provoked by Strauss: either a purely historical approach or a purely supernatural one. The second was posed by the Tübingen school and Schweitzer's teacher, Holtzmann: either the Synoptic Gospels or John. The third was the choice between Wrede and himself: either an eschatological or a non-eschatological Jesus. In each case Schweitzer left no doubt as to the path which the reader should follow.

There were certain ironies in Schweitzer's position. Although Schweitzer was concerned with critical history, he made no attempt to deal critically with sources. He accepted the Synoptic narrative more or less at face value (though with a preference for Mark supplemented by Matthew, understood in a non-supernatural way). Consistent eschatology was the connecting theme which gave the story credibility as history, though not as something to be believed in the twentieth century. Schweitzer himself did not accept the eschatological views of Jesus and the Gospels any more than did Johannes Weiss or the liberal scholars who treated them as a husk to be discarded.

The Quest (403) concludes by remarking on how good it was that "the true historical Jesus should overthrow the modern Jesus." Jesus was not a teacher,* but "an imperious ruler," as can be seen from his belief in himself as the Son of man. However, titles like Messiah, Son of man, Son of God, are merely "historical parables." "We can find no designation which expresses what He is for us." Jesus comes to us "as One unknown," summoning followers and setting new tasks in each generation. Those who follow shall learn "as an ineffable mystery" in their own experience "Who He is." For Schweitzer himself, this meant life as a medical missionary in West Africa, guided by a philosophy based on "reverence for life."

If Harnack's historical Jesus was a reflection of the liberal Protestant scholar, Schweitzer's had an element of the heroic "superman" of Nietzsche, a philosopher whom Schweitzer admired. Schweitzer went on to apply his "Christ mysticism" to the apostle Paul (Paul and His Interpreters, 1911; ET 1912; The Mysticism of the Apostle Paul, 1930; ET 1931). Schweitzer's medical thesis on The Psychiatric Study of Jesus (1913; ET 1948) sought to vindicate Jesus against charges of paranoia. The Kingdom of God and Christian Origins (ET 1968) summarizes Schweitzer's final position.

1.8. Re-evaluation. The monumental character of Schweitzer's Quest is apt to conceal its omissions and apologetic character. It is now clear that the enterprise did not begin with Reimarus, but with the English deists on whom Reimarus had heavily drawn and whose ideas were already well known in Germany. Among the British writers cited by Reimarus in his Apology were Toland, Shaftesbury, Collins, Tindal, Morgan and Middleton. His personal library included most of the English deists. Hobbes, Spinoza and Hume were among the philosophers who had already raised doubts about the historical reliability of the NT picture of Jesus. Schweitzer's work took little account of the interplay between philosophy and theology, especially the influence of Kant, though Schweitzer himself had already written a dissertation on Kant's Philosophy of Religion from the Critique of Pure Reason to Religion within the Limits of Reason Alow (1899).

Schweitzer confined his attention largely to works in German, plus a few in French. Having adopted the methodological principle, allegedly forced upon him by Strauss, of working Strictly with the "historical" which was juxtaposed to the "supernatural," the work of systematic theologians could safely be left out of account. Consequently, scant attention was paid to the Mediating School of theologians like I. A. Dorner (1809-94) whose History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ (ET 5 vols., 1861-63) concluded with an attempt to restate christology drawing on contemporary philosophy. Also ignored were the confessional theologians, like J. C. K. von Hofmann (1810-77) and Gottfried Thomasius (1802-75). Hofmann sought to understand christology in the wider context of salvation history. Thomasius' doctrine of kenosis sought to show the conceivability of the divine incarnation of God, if the Son of God had in some way emptied himself of his divine glory during his earthly life (cf. Phil 2:7).

It was perhaps inevitable that not only Schweitzer but also nineteenth-century theologians in general ignored the thought of the Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard (1813-55) whose works remained largely inaccessible until the twentieth century. Kierkegaard's Philosophical Fragments (1844) provided a counterpart to the Fragments of Reimarus. Kierkegaard asked what conditions would have to be fulfilled if God intended to save human beings. He replied that God might communicate with human beings by becoming human and thus utterly like them. This entails the paradoxical conclusion that, in reaching out to human beings in history, God remains incognito in Christ.

In the meantime the whole enterprise of trying to get behind the church's faith and tradition was condemned by Martin Kähler (1835-1912). In The SoCaled Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (1896; ET ed. C. E. Braaten, 1964) Kähler repudiated the attempt to make faith dependent upon historical research. He also argued that it was impossible to separate the historical Jesus from the Christ of faith. The Christ who influenced the course of history is the Christ who is preached, the Christ of faith. Kähler's work appealed not only to conservatives who believed that their faith was grounded in history, but also to radicals like Kähler's pupil Paul Tillich, who went on to treat the Gospel stories as symbols mediating the depths of existence.

2. From the History of Religions School to the New Quest.

2.1. The History of Religions School. The History of Religions School flourished between 1880 and 1920. In seeking to understand the Bible in the context of the broader religious and cultural setting of Egyptian, Babylonian and Hellenistic religion, it emphasized the continuity between the Bible and the ancient Near East and also the discontinuity between the Bible and the modern world. The school was anticipated by D. F. Strauss. The views of Johannes Weiss and William Wrede who were linked with the school have already been noted.

The most comprehensive application of the school's method to the historical Jesus was made by Wilhelm Bousset (1865-1920) in Kyrios Christos (1913; ET 1970). Bousset argued that the eschatological ideas underlying the terms Messiah and kingdom of God were derived from other religions. He traced the title Lord* (Greek kyrios) to Hellenistic religion, and saw the ascription of divinity to Jesus as the result of alien influences. Bousset believed that the earliest tradition of the life of Jesus was relatively free from the miraculous. People transferred to Jesus current stories about wonder workers and miracles (see Divine Man). Bousset made little attempt to show how such stories came to be applied to Jesus. It was enough to note alleged parallels, no matter how remote the source might be.

The methodology of the school was set out by the former Ritschlian Ernst Troeltsch (1865-1923). Troeltsch's paper "On Historical and Dogmatic Method in Theology" (1888) laid down principles for approaching history. Every tradition and interpretation must be sifted by an unending process of criticism. The principle of analogy serves as the criterion by which events are identified and their historicity assessed. Present experience and knowledge must be used to interpret the past. The historian accepts only those events which bear analogy with present experience and understanding of the world. The principle of correlation asserts that every historical event is correlated with others in the same series. Since all events are of the same order, no particular event can be final or absolute. Since Christianity belongs to the sphere of religious and human history as a whole, no absolute claims may be made on behalf of it. No absolute claims may be made on behalf of Jesus. Christianity may be the absolute religion for the Westerner, but only because there is nothing else (The Absoluteness of Christianity and the History of Religions, 1901; ET 1971; Christian Thought: Its History and Application, 1923).

2.2. Neo-Orthodoxy. In reaction to liberalism with its emphasis on humanity, religious experience and scientific study, the neo-orthodoxy of Emil Brunner (1889-1966) and Karl Barth (1886-1968) stressed the sovereignty of the transcendent God, human need of redemption and revelation, and the centrality of Jesus Christ. Brunner's The Mediator (1927; ET 1934) rejected attempts to interpret Jesus as a religious hero, genius or moral personality. God must be understood biblically rather than philosophically, and known through personal encounter through Christ. Although Brunner insisted on the reality of the humanity of Christ, his lack of interest in history led to charges of docetism.

Barth's emphasis on revelation brought him into sharp conflict with his former teacher Harnack (Revelation and Theology: An Analysis of the Barth-Harnack Correspondence of 1923, ed. H. M. Rumscheidt, 1972). The christocentric theology developed in Barth's Church Dogmatics (1932-81) elaborated the theme of God taking humanity into partnership with himself on the basis of the incarnation of God in Jesus of Nazareth. Barth stressed the historical reality of this event, but showed little interest in the historical Jesus as such.

2.3. Bultmann, Form Criticism and Demythologization.

Form criticism was pioneered by K. L. Schmidt, Martin Dibelius and Rudolf Bultmann (see Form Criticism). Schmidt's Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (1919) claimed that the framework of the Gospel stories was created by the Evangelists for their own purposes and was thus historically valueless. The Heidelberg scholar Martin Dibelius (1883-1947) adopted a more constructive approach in Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (1919; ET From Tradition to Gospel, 1934). His Jesus (1939; ET 1949) showed how the Gospel traditions related to the historical Jesus. However, a more skeptical view was taken by Rudolf Bultmann (1884-1976) of Marburg who was the most influential NT scholar of his generation. Bultmann's theology combined neo-orthodoxy, Neo-Kantianism, Heidegger's existentialism with the traditions of liberal criticism and the History of Religions School. His personal influence was extended through his pupils in key university chairs throughout the German-speaking world.

Bultmann's major work on The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1921, ET 1963) gave an analysis of the forms of the traditions behind the Gospel as shaped by the Christian communities. He concluded that the material throws more light on the Sitz im Leben, or life setting, of the traditions in the early church than they do on the life of Jesus. Many utterances attributed to Jesus were the deliverances of Christian prophets* speaking in his name. The Christ preached in the Hellenistic church was not the historical Jesus, but the Christ of faith and the cult Teaching which applied to the church situation could not be attributed to the historical Jesus.
Basic to Bultmann's method was the criterion of dissimilarity as a test of authenticity. "We can only count on possessing a genuine similitude of Jesus, where, on the one hand, expression is given to the contrast between Jewish morality and piety and the distinctive eschatological temper which characterized the preaching of Jesus; and where on the other hand we find no specifically Christian features" (205). To Bultmann, as to later form critics and redaction critics (see Redaction Criticism), use of this criterion was the hallmark of scientific criticism. To others it was arbitrary and absurd to assume that the historical Jesus could have nothing in common with either Judaism* or the early church. Bultmann's other test of authenticity was equally controversial. Phraseology and language serve to corroborate the origin of material (see Languages of Palestine). Thus, the presence of Semitisms is deemed to suggest a Palestinian origin (12). Critics of Bultmann and others who have used this criterion complain that it is equally arbitrary and useless. For the presence of Semitisms does not necessarily mean that Jesus was the original speaker. On the other hand, idiomatic translation into Greek is assumed to be a mark of inauthenticity (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]).

Bultmann contended that the thought world of the NT was essentially mythological, being shaped by myths drawn from Jewish apocalyptic and gnosticism (see Myth). Such myths caused Jesus to be presented as a heavenly redeemer in a cosmic struggle. Bultmann claimed that his aim was not to eliminate myth, but to interpret it so as to allow the true offense of Christianity to make its impact. The mythological eschatology of the NT with its central message of the cross and resurrection is to be seen as a summons to live existentially by faith in the cross and resurrection of Christ. Drawing on the categories of Heidegger's existentialism, Bultmann reinterpreted the life of faith as "authentic existence" in contrast with the "inauthentic existence" of life apart from faith. What God has done in Jesus Christ is not a historical fact capable of proof. The objective historian as such cannot see that a historical person is the eternal Word. Nevertheless, the NT paradoxically testifies to Jesus Christ as the eschatological event which brings liberation through the message of the cross and resurrection.

2.4. Other Approaches. Despite the claims of Schweitzer that his historical Jesus was the sole credible option, and the claims of the neo-orthodox and the Bultmann school that recovery of the historical Jesus was impossible but fortunately unnecessary, other scholars patiently pursued historical research.

In Britain T. W. Manson protested that the proper task of form criticism was the classification of the material, and that it was illegitimate to treat forms as a test of historical authenticity ("The Life of Jesus: Some Tendencies in Present-Day Research," in The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of C.H. Dodd, eds. W. D. Davies and D. Daube, 1954,211-21). Demythologization issues in the myth of a Heideggerian Jesus, which on closer inspection turns out to be Heideggerian robes with only a pale ghost inside them. Elsewhere he remarked that Bultmann's History of the Synoptic Tradition was not an account of how the life of Jesus produced the tradition, but how the tradition produced the life of Jesus. Manson's own work included The Teaching of Jesus: Studies in its Form and Content (1931), The Sayings of Jesus (1949), which first appeared in the volume Manson co-authored with H. D. A. Major and C. J. Wright, The Mission and Message of Jesus (1937) and The Servant-Messiah (1953). His "Materials for a Life of Jesus" was published posthumously in Studies in the Gospels and Epistles (1962).

Other British studies of form criticism drew positive results from it Among them were William Manson's Jesus the Messiah: The Synoptic Tradition of the Revelation of God in Christ, with Special Reference to Form-Criticism (1943) and Vincent Taylor's The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (1933). Taylor's other works include Jesus and his Sacrifice: A Study of the Passion-Sayings in the Gospels (1937), The Atonement in New Testament Teaching (1940), his massive commentary on Mark (1953), The Life and Ministry of Jesus (1954) and The Person of Christ in New Testament Teaching (1958).

The challenge of form criticism and in particular of K. L Schmidt's contention that the units of the Gospel tradition were arranged with scant regard to chronology or topography, was met by C. H. Dodd (1884-1973), who made influential studies of the early church kerygma ("The Framework of the Gospel Narrative" [1932], NTS [1952] 1-11; and The Apostolic Preaching and its Developments [1936]). Dodd argued that the early preaching of the church contained a basic outline of the ministry of Jesus which emphasized certain themes, and that this outline was used by Mark whose account is partly chronological and partly topical. Dodd's work has provoked considerable debate. It now seems clear that the early preaching was not intended to give a biography of Jesus in the modern sense (for the materials are too selective, and in any case are not full enough). Nor was it preaching designed for all occasions. Rather it was the church's answer to charges against Jesus which led to his execution, whose purpose was to rebut the charges by appealing to teaching and incidents in the life of Jesus (see C. Brown, "The Structure and Content of the Early Kerygma," NIDNTT 3.57-67).

In History and the Gospel (1938) Dodd drew attention to the fact that different kinds of forms identified by form critics indicate a common underlying picture of God and Jesus in the tradition. Dodd's study of The Parables of the Kingdom (1935) developed realized eschatology in antithesis to Schweitzer. Dodd argued that the ministry of Jesus was not a prelude to the kingdom; it was the kingdom. In his later work Dodd turned to the study of John. In The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1953) Dodd charged that the nineteenth-century quest, with its concentration on the Synoptics to the exclusion of John, "leads to an impoverished, a one-sided, and finally an incredible view of the facts—I mean, of the facts, as part of history" (446). He went on to say that the Johannine formula "the hour is coming and now is" was John's way of expressing realized eschatology. He welcomed the emendations proposed by Georges Florovsky ("inaugurated eschatology") and Joachim Jeremias ("a self-realizing eschatology") as attempts to prevent misunderstanding of the term (447). Dodd further explored John in Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (1963). His final work was a study of The Founder of Christianity (1970).

In America the tradition of liberal lives of Jesus was continued by Shirley Jackson Case's Jesus: A New Biography (1927) and Shailer Mathews's Jesus on Social Institutions (1928). C. C. McCown, Frederick C. Grant, John Knox and Amos N. Wilder carried on the liberal tradition of presenting Jesus as a social prophet. Meanwhile in Europe the historical basis of the Gospel tradition continued to be investigated by distinguished scholars. Joachim Jeremias of Göttingen University sought to recover the original teaching and intentions of Jesus in The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (rev. ET 1966), The Parables of Jesus (rev. ET 1963), The Prayers of Jesus (ET 1967) and New Testament Theology I:

2.5. The New Quest

2.5.1. The New Quest in Europe. In 1959 James M. Robinson published A New Quest of the Historical Jesus. The book was both a history of, and an apologia for, the developments that were taking place in the Bultmann school. The starting point was a lecture given by Ernst Käsemann to a reunion of old Marburg students in 1953 on "The Problem of the Historical Jesus" (ET in Käsemann, Essays on New Testament Themes, 1964, 15-47). Like others engaged in the New Quest, Käsemann protested his fidelity to Bultmann's methodology and proclaimed the impossibility of writing a biography of Jesus. However, to disengage interest in the earthly Jesus would fail to grasp the earthly church's concern with the identity between the exalted and humiliated Lord, and lapse into docetism. The way forward was to discover the earthly Jesus through investigation of his preaching. Jesus did not come to proclaim general religious or moral truths, but to tell of the kingdom that had dawned and of how God had come near in grace and demand. Jesus did not preach realized eschatology; he inaugurated it.

Bultmann's successor at Marburg, Ernst Fuchs, wrote numerous articles over the years which were published in Studies of the Historical Jesus (1960; partial ET 1964). Fuchs drew attention to Jesus' "conduct" as the context of his preaching." Jesus' table fellowship (see Table Fellowship) with sinners* was the conduct of neither the prophet nor the sage, but that of a person who dared to act in God's stead, calling sinners near to him who otherwise would have to flee from God. Fuchs also introduced a psychological element by suggesting motives behind Jesus' actions. Jesus transformed the Mosaic Law* into a Law of suffering. The way of salvation* was not by works of the Law but by suffering for the faith. Fuchs suggested that, after the martyrdom of John the Baptist, Jesus began to envisage the possibility of his own suffering and death.

A further step was taken by Günther Bornkamm who wrote a full-length study of Jesus of Nazareth (1956; ET 1960). Bornkamm stressed the note of authority in Jesus' teaching. Whereas Bultmann had stressed the future coming of the kingdom in Jesus' teaching, Bornkamm underlined the present element; the new age was already breaking in through Jesus' words and actions. Bornkamm followed in the footsteps of his predecessor at Heidelberg, Martin Dibelius. In marked contrast with Bultmann, Bornkamm could write: "Quite clearly what the Gospels report concerning the message, the deeds and the history of Jesus is still distinguished by an authenticity, a freshness, and a distinctiveness not in any way effaced by the Church's Easter faith. These features point us directly to the earthly figure of Jesus" (24).

The methods and conclusions of the New Quest were summarized in an encyclopedia article which Hans Conzelmann wrote for Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart. It was later published separately in expanded form as Jesus (ET 1973). The ethos of the New Quest was captured by Gerhard Ebeling in Theology and Proclamation: Dialogue with Rudolf Bultmann (1962; ET 1966). Through the person Jesus "God comes to expression in such a way that we come to know Jesus himself as the Word which brings certainty and therefore as the point where reality is radically challenged" (79). Bultmann responded to the New Quest in a paper on "The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus" (ET in The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ, ed. C. E. Braaten and R. A Harrisville, 1964, 1542). He denied that he had destroyed the continuity between the historical Jesus and the kerygma, insisting that the kerygma presupposes the historical Jesus, however much it may have mythologized him. Bultmann remonstrated with attempts to make psychological reconstructions of Jesus and to legitimate the kerygma by historical research. He concluded by accepting the charge that in his interpretation Jesus has risen in the kerygma. For it presupposes that the kerygma is an eschatological event and expresses the fact that Jesus is present in it.

2.5.2. The New Quest in the English-Speaking World. In the English-speaking world the two leading representatives were James M. Robinson and Norman Perrin. For Robinson the key question was how did Jesus the proclaimer of the kingdom become Christ the proclaimed. He disdainfully dismissed as positivistic the methods of the original quest, claiming the old objectifying approach to historiography had been replaced by existential historiography which required openness to encounter. The quest of the historical Jesus must have meaning in terms of the human quest for meaningful existence. Inquiry into historical continuity is replaced by inquiry into its inner necessity.

Perrin sought to work within the tradition of the New Quest in Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (1967). However, to Perrin a serious weakness of the New Quest lay in the assumption of the identity of the historical Jesus with the kerygmatic Christ. The assumption ignored the variety of kerygmata in the NT, and assumed that historical research would always point to parallels between Jesus and a form of the kerygma (233). Perrin himself distinguished between "historical knowledge" (which included Jesus' acceptance of his own death as the necessary consequence of his proclamation of the kingdom, his table fellowship with tax collectors [see Taxes] and sinners, and belief that his death would further God's purposes), "historic knowledge" (which occurs when a historical event assumes direct significance for a future time), and "faith knowledge" (which has to do with trans-historical reality and the ascription of special significance in terms of revelation, experience and belief).

2.6. The End of the New Quest. If Hamack's Jesus had the face of a liberal Protestant, and Schweitzer's the heroic demeanor of Nietzsche's superman, the Jesus of the New Quest was an existentialist philosopher whose presence in history was barely discernible behind the kerygma. He is encountered in a kind of existential vacuum from which the historical conditions of the first century are largely excluded. The New Quest ended scarcely two decades after it started. Its demise coincided with the end of the Bultmann era and the passing of existentialist philosophy.

Despite its emphasis on scholarly rigor, its methods and assumptions were limited to those of the Bultmann school. For all its stress on history, it remained curiously indifferent to the world of first-century Judaism as known from Josephus, the Dead Sea Scrolls (see Dead Sea Scrolls) and rabbinic literature (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). To those engaged in the New Quest the proclamation of the cross was the pivotal event which linked existence with the historical Jesus. By positing the crucifixion of Jesus as a fact, docetism was averted. But little attention was paid to the question Why exactly was Jesus crucified? Insofar as it was answered at all, it was answered in existential terms. To exclude the close connection between religion, theology, politics, sociology and economics as interrelated factors in answering this question now looks curiously unhistorical and short-sighted.
3. The Third Quest.

3.1. The Quest Continued. It is open to question whether the term Third Quest will succeed in establishing itself to describe post-Bultmannian developments in Jesus research. There is certainly no common methodology or sense of unity of purpose beyond the conviction that more may be known about Jesus than was known or admitted in the earlier quests. If the term Third Quest is taken to embrace all scholarly investigation of the relationship between the texts of the NT and the historical figure of Jesus in the light of current knowledge of the first-century world, we are at once confronted with a variety of conflicting views and methods. At first sight it may appear to be a case of plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose. For connections between current research and what has gone before appear to continue without interruption. If there is a common theme, it lies in the belief that Jesus was not the Jesus of liberal Protestantism or of the New Quest, but a historical figure whose life and actions were rooted in first-century Judaism with its particular religious, social, economic and political conditions.

3.2. Varieties of Approach. Three main lines of approach may be noted: the radical tradition, the conservative tradition and attempts to see Jesus in new perspectives.

3.2.1. The Radical Tradition. The radical redaction-critical tradition is exemplified by the Jesus Seminar in the United States which seeks to examine the layers of tradition in both the NT and extra-canonical accounts of Jesus' words and actions in order to develop a firm data base for determining who Jesus was. The Seminar meets twice yearly to discuss research papers and vote on the authenticity of the material. Using a color system of balloting, the Seminar is producing a series of Red Letter Editions. The first to be published was The Parables of Jesus (1988). In the text words printed in red indicate that Jesus said it or something very like it, and that it could be used for the data base.Pink indicates that Jesus probably said it. Gray indicates doubt, and black rejection of authenticity. As in all scholarship, the conclusions of the scholars involved depend on the methods employed.

Another example of the radical tradition is Burton L. Mack's A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (1988). Mack rejects Mark as a historical account of Jesus in favor of seeing the first Gospel as a complex of traditions. He suggests that Jesus' themes, topics and use of epigrammatic chreiai were closer to the Cynic idiom than to characteristic Jewish piety. Jesus was not trying to reform Judaism; he was taking up a Hellenistic kind of social criticism. Similarities and differences between Jesus and the Cynics may be studied in the collection of source material compiled by F. Gerald Downing, Christ and the Cynics (1988).

3.2.2. The Conservative Tradition.

The tradition of pre-war British scholarship is maintained by C. F. D. Moule in The Origin of Christology (1977). Moule rejects the idea of evolutionary process in the manner of the History of Religions School which would imply that the historical Jesus had been transformed into another species through the influence of Hellenistic savior cults. Instead he sees a developmental process taking place which relates later perceptions of Jesus to Jesus himself. Moule seeks to show how the titles Son of man, Son of God, Christ and Lord were appropriate to the historical Jesus, and how the corporate savior of Pauline theology was grounded in him.

3.2.3. New Perspectives.

Perhaps the most distinctive development in the Third Quest is the search for new approaches by way of forming general hypotheses to account for questions posed by the text. Such hypotheses seek to address questions sometimes neglected in the past and endeavor to understand Jesus in the context of the religious, social, economic and political world of Judaism. In particular, attention is focused on the questions "Why did Jesus come into conflict with the Jewish authorities?" "Why was he handed over to the Romans, and put to death in a manner normally reserved for political revolutionists?"

Among the remarkable modern phenomena is the considerable interest in Jesus on the part of Jewish scholars. In the period after World War 1 scholars

Non-Jewish scholars are also paying much attention to the Jewish world in which Jesus lived. In this category belong John Bowker's Jesus and the Pharisees (1973); J. K Riches, Jesus and the Transformation of Judaism (1980); Bruce D. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible (1984); James H. Charlesworth, Jesus within Judaism (1988); and Sean Freyne, Galilee, Jesus and the Gospels (1988). In Jesus als Lehrer (1981) Rainer Riesner has compared Jesus' teaching methods in the Gospels with Jewish teaching methods (see Teacher). In Jesus and Judaism (1985) E. P. Sanders deviates from the traditional approach which begins with an investigation of the sayings of Jesus. Instead he focuses on the accounts of Jesus' actions. His starting point is Jesus' action in the Temple (see Temple Cleansing; Death of Jesus) and its significance within a contemporary eschatology which expected restoration. Sanders then works backwards, exploring the ways in which Jesus offended Judaism. He finds them in Jesus' relativizing of the present age, in his claim that sinners* would be in the kingdom and in his attack on the Temple.

A major work is Ben F. Meyer's The Aims of Jesus (1979). Meyer's study is significant not only for the way in which it seeks to locate Jesus within Judaism, but also for its response to previous scholarship and the challenge it makes to reconsider the question of methodology. Common features of previous scholarship were the attempt to interpret Jesus in tennis of a closed view of the universe and the use of Troeltsch's principle of analogy with its reductionistic consequences. Drawing on the philosophy of Bernard Lonergan, Meyer seeks to develop a cognitional theory which enables the historian to grasp the transcendent element in history. According to Meyer the theme underlying Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God was the restoration of Israel. Jesus understood himself to be the unique revealer of God's will. He offered a critique and reform of Temple worship, and in his table fellowship with sinners he anticipated the messianic banquet. In private Jesus indicated to his disciples that in his mission the Scriptures were reaching their fulfillment (see Old Testament in the Gospels). But this would be reached only through his suffering and death. Until the definitive gathering of the saved at the end of time the aims of Jesus will be incarnated in his community, the remnant and first fruits of messianic Israel.

Another work which tries to develop an alternative methodology is Anthony Harvey's Jesus and the Constraints of History (1980). In any given historical situation any individual who wishes to influence others is subject to constraints imposed by culture. Jesus was no exception. Harvey endeavors to identify the constraints under which Jesus found himself and use them in his reconstruction of history. Working backwards from the crucifixion, Harvey tries to identify what led to it. Jesus died the death of an anti-Roman revolutionary, though the historical sources do not indicate that he was. This apparent contradiction leads Harvey to think that there must have been something in Jesus' teaching and conduct that led the Jewish authorities to hand him over to the Romans. In the light of the constraints of the Law, Harvey infers that Jesus' teaching must be regarded as that of someone who claims that the urgency of the moment overrides some of the Law's provisions. The constraint of time indicates that current expectation of God's breaking into history sets the stage for Jesus' message. Other constraints are miracle, messiahship and Jewish monotheism (set God).

A major area of interest for the Third Quest is Jesus and politics (set Revolutionary Movements). S. G. F. Brandon claimed that Jesus sympathized with the ideals and aims of the Zealot movement, suggesting that these sympathies were downplayed by the Evangelists (The Fall of Jerusalem and the Christian Church, 1951; Jesus and the Zealots, 1967). This thesis has been challenged by numerous scholars, including Alan Richardson, (The Political Christ, 1973) and Martin Hengel (Victory over Violence, 1973; Christ and Power, 1974; The Zealots, 2d ed. 1976, ET 1989). Studies of numerous political issues have been collected by Ernst Bammel and C. F. D. Moule in Jesus and the Politics of His Day (1984). The importance of the Zealots in the time of Jesus has recently come under close scrutiny and has been rejected by Richard A. Horsley and John S. Hanson (Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs, 1985; R. A. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence, 1987). Nevertheless, Horsley allows that Jesus' actions and teaching were increasingly affected by social and political conditions.
Jesus' actions have been studied from the standpoint of sociology (see Sociological Analysis of the Gospels) by Gerd Theissen in Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (1978) and in an imaginative reconstructive narrative The Shadow of the Galilean (1987; see Narrative Exegesis). Horsley has responded with Sociology and the Jesus Movement (1989). Martin Hengel has compared Jesus with other types of Jewish leaders in The Charismatic Leader and his Followers (1981). Hengel's earlier studies of Crucifixion (1977) and The Atonement (1981) probe the circumstances surrounding the death of Jesus and its significance for the Christian community. The sociologist Irving M. Zeidin sees the key to understanding Jesus in the concept of charisma, the gift which bestows authority (Jesus and the Judaism of his Time, 1988).

The links between politics and holiness have been explored by Marcus J. Borg in Conflict, Holiness, and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus (1984) and Jesus: A New Vision (1987). Borg rejects Schweitzer's eschatological interpretation of the kingdom and prefers to see the kingdom as a linguistic symbol for the power of the Spirit and the new life which it created. The image points to a life centered on God. Jesus was "an epiphany of God" and a model for human life.

Spirit christology represents an alternative way of approaching the person of Christ by way of relating the Gospel accounts of Jesus and the Spirit to the study of Jesus' identity (see Holy Spirit). In Jesus and the Spirit (1975) James D. G. Dunn examines the Gospel accounts of Jesus as the recipient of the Spirit and the testimony of the early church to Jesus as the sender of the Spirit Dunn interprets Jesus' divinity as his relationship with the Father as son and the Spirit of God in him. The eschatological kingdom was present for Jesus only because the eschatological Spirit was present in and through him. In Christology in the Making (1980) Dunn inquires into the origins of the doctrine of the incarnation. Dunn's The Evidence for Jesus (1985) responds to negative and fanciful claims made in a TV series and the book by Ian Wilson which accompanied the series, Jesus: the Evidence (1984).

A number of studies have examined the Gospel miracle stories and their background (see Miracles and Miracle Stories). They include Gerd Theissen's The Miracle Stones of the Early Christian Tradition (ET 1983), Howard Clark Kee's Miracle in the Early Christian World (1983) and Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times (1986), and Herman Hendrickx, The Miracle Stories of the Synoptic Gospels (1987). The most radical position was taken by Morton Smith in Jesus the Magician (1979). Smith argued that the miracle stories point to the fact that Jesus was really a magician, and that the Gospels have deliberately tried to obscure the truth.

Colin Brown has sought to respond to this view and also to earlier claims that the miracle stories belong to later layers of tradition developed under the influence of the Hellenistic world, where "divine men"* were expected to perform miracles (Miracles and the Critical Mind, 1984; "Synoptic Miracle Stories: A Jewish Religious and Social Setting," Foundations & Facets Forum 2 [1986] 55-76). The following hypothesis also seeks to take note of Jewish views of Jesus and his Jewish environment and also of Spirit christology.

The Gospels present two conflicting types of theology: that of the Evangelists and that of the Jewish authorities. According to the Evangelists' theology, Jesus was anointed and empowered by the Spirit at his baptism * This fact determined his activity as the Christ (i.e., one who was anointed by the Spirit) who fulfilled the prophecy of John the Baptist that Jesus would baptize (i.e., consecrate) Israel with the Spirit (Mk 1:8; Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16; Jn 1:33). This ministry of consecration includes forgiving of sins, table fellowship with sinners, reinterpretation of the Law* and the Šabbath,* healing,* casting out demons,* social and political teaching, and the "baptism" of the Temple. It culminates in his sacrificial death which establishes the new covenant.

By contrast the theology of the Jewish authorities is based on the Torah, which in terms of daily life meant living in accordance with the teaching of Deuteronomy. In particular, the authorities were alarmed by the combination of teaching and wonder-working that they perceived in Jesus. Turning to the Torah for guidance, they came to the conclusion that Jesus was the kind of prophet described in Deuteronomy 13, who was performing signs and wonders in order to lead the people astray. The only recourse was to follow the prescriptions of Deuteronomy 13 and purge the evil one from the midst of the people by putting him to death.

Jesus differed from contemporaries like Hanina ben Dosa, who also had the reputation of being a "man of deed" (i.e., miracle worker, cf. Lk 24:19). Hanina disclaimed the title of prophet and put forward no new teaching. It was precisely the combination of novel teaching, actions that were perceived as threatening, and wonder working which led to Jesus' downfall. Opposition to Jesus was bound up with his miracles and exorcisms which thus belong to the earliest layers of tradition. To his opponents Jesus was an evildoer who appeared to be... bent on leading the people astray and thus must be dealt with in accordance with the prescriptions of the Torah. To his followers, Jesus was the anointed one who fulfilled both the Law and the prophets. The issue became one of whether Jesus' works were wrought by someone who was possessed by Beelzebul (Mk 3:22 par.) or whether they were the work of the Holy Spirit (Mk 3:29-30 par.; Mt 12:28). In the Fourth Gospel Jesus' works are said to be the works of the Father (Jn 14:10-11), though here too his opponents see him as someone possessed who is leading the people astray (Jn 7:12; 8:48; 11:47-48). In their different ways all four Gospels develop Word and Spirit christologies.

3.3. Systematic Theology. It remains to be noted that renewed interest in the historical Jesus has made a significant impact on other areas of theology.

The issue was brought into sharp focus by the Scottish systematic theologian D. M. Baillie (1857-1954) in God Was in Christ (1948). Baillie agreed with the old quest in insisting that we must think of Jesus as a historical human being. Anything less would be to lapse into docetism and unreality. However, the questions raised by Schweitzer and the historical skepticism of the Bultmann school appeared to negate the possibility of knowing the historical Jesus. Moreover, neo-orthodoxy was right to stress that knowledge of God involved more than historical reconstruction. Baillie's solution drew upon the moderate form criticism of C. H. Dodd and others which saw in different layers of tradition and forms patterns of the same divine action of God reaching out to human beings in Christ Baillie went on to suggest that the "paradox of grace" might provide the best clue for thinking about how God might be present in Christ As God dwells in believers by grace, so he might also dwell in Christ in a more complete way. Baillie's approach seems to restate that of Schleiermacher in a more attractive way, though he seems to end with an incarnation of the Father. Nevertheless, his work draws attention to the significance of critical study for theology and raises the question of whether, if Baillie had paid more attention to the role of Word and Spirit in the NT, he might have achieved more satisfactory results.

Wolfhart Pannenberg (Jesus—God and Man, ET 1968) and Hans Küng (On Being a Christian, 1976) have urged the need to do christology "from below" as distinct from doing it "from above." To Pannenberg the idea of doing it "from above" presupposes the divinity of Christ and ignores the most important task of christology, viz., to present reasons for confessing the divinity of Christ To take the divinity of Christ as one's starting point is to devalue the historical Jesus and his relationship with Palestinian Judaism. Moreover, human beings stand in history and do not have God's absolute perspective. Therefore, Pannenberg adopts a phenomenological approach to the Gospel accounts of Jesus' activity. However, the historical event of Jesus' resurrection removes the previous ambiguity and provides the key to understanding the meaning of history. Pannenberg's work is rich in insights, but it is open to question whether his method is successful. Nothing can be apprehended from a point of absolute neutrality. It is arbitrary to suspend judgment about God's activity until after the resurrection, at which time an approach "from above" is allowed to come into play. Judgments about Jesus did not begin with the resurrection. Rather, this event is to be seen as confirming the identity of God's personal presence in Jesus.

In the work of Jürgen Moltmann Jesus' earthly messianic activity and especially his death on the cross serve as the basis for a reinterpretation of eschatology, the church, God's character as a suffering God and the Trinity (Theology of Hope, 1967; The Crucified God, 1974; The Church in the Power of the Spirit, 1977; The Trinity and the Kingdom, 1981; The Way of Jesus Christ, 1990).

Latin American Liberation Theology bases its teaching and praxis on the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels and his action among the poor and needy (see Liberation Hermeneutics). Important works include Leonardo Boff, Jesus Christ Liberator (1978) and Jon Sobrino, Christology at the Crossroads (1978). For a survey see Arthur F. McGovern, Liberation Theology and its Critics (1989). In liberation christology, social conditions and the need for liberation raise the questions that are to be asked of the text and determine the agenda. However, the methods to be used in working through the agenda and developing a christology are the critical, historical methods that are valid everywhere.

This sample review of systematic theology underlines the need for theologians to take into account the work of biblical scholars and also the need of the latter to be aware of the theological dimensions of their research.

4. Conclusion.

In retrospect it is clear that impressions of the course of the quest of the historical Jesus, and even of how many quests there have been, have been shaped by the viewpoint of the person giving the impression. It also is clear that the Jesus that was discovered in particular quests all too often reflected the image of those engaged in it Hamack's Jesus was the reflection of a liberal Protestant face at the bottom of a well. Schweitzer's Jesus had the demeanor of Nietzsche's superman. The Jesus of the New Quest sounded like an existentialist philosopher summoning his hearers to make existential decisions. In all this the hermeneutical circle came into play: the questioner's questions and outlook helped shape the answers that were given. No single school of thought has attained absolute results and driven all rival theories from the field. As in all theorizing, all claims are open to evaluation in the light of the methods pursued. However, in the battles between rival schools of thought and in the process of successive approximation that belongs to all scholarly inquiry, positive gains have been made. It is no longer possible to have a docetic Christ. Jesus was a particular historical figure rooted in his times, but speaking to all times. The study of Jesus and the Gospels in the light of the social, economic, political and religious conditions of his times has immensely enriched our understanding not only of history but also of theological issues embedded in history.

C. Brown

HOLINESS. See CLEAN AND UNEFFECTED. PHARISEES, SINNER; TEMPLE

HOLY SPIRIT

In the Gospels the term Holy Spirit (along with "the Spirit," "Spirit of God," "Paraclete," etc.) is a referring expression for the power and presence of God in action, especially as the means of God's self-revelation.

1. The Holy Spirit in Intertestamental Judaism

2. The Holy Spirit in the Synoptic Gospels

3. The Holy Spirit in John

1. The Holy Spirit in Intertestamental Judaism.

I.1. As the Spirit of Prophecy. By far the most widespread understanding of the Spirit in Judaism is as "the Spirit of Prophecy" (a regular term for the Spirit especially in the Targums*), in other words the Spirit acting as the organ of communication between God and a person:

(1) affording charismatic revelation and guidance (numerous examples in Rabbinic Judaism and Targums; but see also e.g., 4 Ezra 14:22; Philo (e.g.) Som. II.252; Bib. Ant. 9.10; 31.9; Sir 48:24);

(2) affording charismatic wisdom (e.g., Targums to Ex 31:3; Frq. Tg. Num 11:26-27; Tg. Onq. Deut 34:9: Jos. and As. 4:9; Josephus Ant. 10.239Jub 40:5; Philo Jos. 117; Vit. Mos. 11.265; Gig. 24; Sir 39:6; Sus 45b (Theod); Wis 7:7; 9:17-18; and cf. 1QH 12.11-13; 13.18-19; 14.12-13);

(3) (less commonly) invasively inspiring prophetic speech (Targums to Num 11:26-27; Josephus Ant. 4.119; Jub 25:14; 31:12; Philo Spec. Leg. IV.49; Vit. Mos. 1.175 and 277; Bib. Ant. 28.6; etc.);

(d) (rarely) invasively inspiring charismatic praise or worship* (1 Enoch 71:11; Ex Rab. 23:2; Tg. Neb. 1 Sam 10:6; 19:20, 23; Bib. Ant. 32.14; T.Job 48-50).

It was generally held, though not universally, that the Spirit of prophecy (see Prophets and Prophecy) had been withdrawn from Israel* since the last prophets (t. Soṭa 13:3-4) because of the nation's sin (cf. b. Sanh. 65b), and (especially on the basis of Joel 2:28-32 (= MT 3:1-5)) that it would be poured out on all of the restored Israel at the end (cf. Num Rab. 15:25; Midr. Haggadot Gen. 140). This would bring Israel immediate knowledge of God and of his will, and thus promote ongoing obedience fulfilling the hope of Ezekiel 36:27 (Deut Rab. 6:14; Tg. Neb. Ezek 36:25-26: cf. b. Ber. 31b-32a). In the meantime the Spirit had afforded the repository of wisdom and revelation in Scripture.

1.2. At the Power of Creation and Miracle. It has sometimes been held that a Judaism that thought of the Spirit as the Spirit of prophecy could not conceive of it as the power of creation and miracle.* This is at best a half-truth. While the Targums tended to translate Genesis 1:2 as "a wind from the Lord," the LXX renders ūaḥ "lōhim by pneuma theou, a collocation which elsewhere means "the Spirit of God" (e.g., Gen 41:38; contrast Gen 8:1 etc.). 2 Baruch 21:4 unquestionably attributes the cosmos to the work of the Spirit (cf. Is 32:15), and there is also a widespread attribution of animate creation to God's Spirit (cf. LXX Job 33:4; Ps 103:30; 32:6 and Jdt 16:14; Philo Op. Mund. 29-30; 2 Apoc. Bar. 23:5; etc.), and some rare hints of resurrection life too (Ezek 37:9-10, 14; 2 Apoc. Bar. 23:5; m. Soṭa 9:15; Pesiq. R. 1:6; Cant. Rab. 1.1.§9). The LXX and the Targums also retain the tradition that the Spirit empowered Samson's exploits (Judg 14:6, 19; 15:14), might lift and/or transport prophets around (cf. 1 Kings 18:12; 2 Kings 2:16; Ezek 2:2; 3:12, 14; etc.), and, at 2 Kings 2:9-15, the power of Elisha's division of the waters is specifically traced by the Targumist to "the Spirit of prophecy" on him.

The Targums even extend the connection between Spirit and power in the Hebrew Bible by attributing to the Spirit of prophecy deeds the MT traces instead to "the hand" of the Lord (cf. Ezek 37:1). Of special interest is the tendency to trace the charismatic power of Gideon (Judg 6:34), Jephthah (Judg 11:29), Saul (1 Sam 11:6) and David (1 Sam 16:13-14) to "the Spirit of power"
(as on Samson), rather than translating these passages with "Spirit of prophecy/wisdom" or "power of the Lord" which we might have expected if the relation between Spirit and miraculous "power" was thought to be problematic. Here the "Spirit of power" has become the equipment of Israel's "saviors," even the power miraculously to rout the enemy. Other examples of the Spirit understood as the power of miraculous deeds may be found outside the so-called biblical translations (e.g., Lev. Rab. 8:2; Bib. Ant. 27.9-10 and 36:2; Josephus Ant. 8.408 [and probably 8.346]; etc.).

1.3. At the Spirit on the Messiah. A major strand of Judaism anticipated a Messiah (see Christ) mightily endowed with the Spirit as both the Spirit of prophecy (affording unique wisdom and knowledge of the Lord as the basis of dynamic righteousness) and the Spirit of power. The model is first David, then more especially the Davidic figure of Isaiah 11:1-4, endowed with the Spirit of wisdom,* knowledge and power— and it is this combination, and with strong echoes of the very language of Isaiah 11:1-4, that provides the messianic portrait in 1 Enoch 49:2-3; 62:1-2; Psalms of Solomon 17:37; 18:7 (cf. IQSb 5:24-25).

Other rarer strands of Jewish messianic hope also involve Spirit-endowed figures, whether the Elijah-like prophet based on Malachi 4:5 (Sir 48:10; see Elijah and Eli-shah); a Priestly Messiah (e.g., 1QS 9:10-11; T. Levi 18); a prophet-like-Moses based on Deuteronomy 18:15-16 (e.g., 1QS 9:10-11; see Moses); a Servant-Herald based on Isaiah 42:1-2 (see Servant of Yahweh); a Servant-Warrior derived from Isaiah 61:1-2 (e.g., 11QMelch), or some combination of these. In each case the quality of the endowment of the Spirit might be nuanced slightly differently, but would combine wisdom, revelation and some kinds of acts of power.

2. The Holy Spirit in the Synoptic Gospels.

2.1. The Spirit in the Gospel Infancy Narratives.

2.1.1. Prophecy Restored in Israel. Luke (alone) portrays a number of prophetic activities in association with Jesus' conception, birth and infancy (see Birth of Jesus). Elizabeth and Zechariah (see Zechariah's Song) experience the Spirit of prophecy in invasive prophetic speech (the invasive quality denoted here by the Lukan favorite idiom "filled with" the Holy Spirit) at 1:41-42 and 1:67, and as a result give oracles of recognition and assurance of salvation.* Simeon too receives charismatic revelation (2:26, and perhaps Anna at 2:38), guidance (2:27) and prophetic utterance (2:29-35; see Simeon's Song). This so closely tallies with the picture of the Spirit of prophecy in Judaism that it has been suggested Luke here creates an idealized picture of the epoch of Israel, to be succeeded by those of Jesus and the church* (so Conzelmann), and also that the deliberate likeness of the activities of the Spirit to those portrayed in Acts is intended by Luke to establish Christianity as the continuity and fulfillment of Judaism (so Chevallier). However, although even the rabbis can exceptionally speak of individuals experiencing the Spirit of prophecy (only at t. Pesah. 2.15; Lev. Rab. 21.8; y. Šeb. 9.1; y. Soṭa 1.4 and parallels?), the general belief in the full withdrawal of the Spirit until the end (see 1.1. above) and the strongly christocentric focus of the Spirit's activities in Luke 1—2 (and it is exclusively those awaiting the messianic salvation of Israel that experience the Spirit), suggest rather that Luke portrays here the dawn of the eschatological (see Eschatology) restoration of the Spirit to pious Israel*; not the period of Israel as such. This is further confirmed in what is said of John (see John the Baptist) and Jesus.

2.1.2. The Spirit on the Baptist. The eschatological quality of the Spirit restored to God's people is evidenced in the unique features within the portrayal of John the Baptist as prophet if he is the greatest (Lk 7:26-28), that is because he fulfills the role of the awaited Elijah* to restore Israel in repentance before the eschatological visitation (Lk 7:27; Mai 3:1 [cf. Mal 4:5] denied by Conzelmann, but see Fitzmyer). Luke has carefully sculpted this understanding into the infancy narratives, not only in stepwise parallelism between John, the Prophet of the Most High (1:76), and Jesus, the Son of the Most High (1:32; see Son of God), who comes to effect the promised salvation, but also in the specific identification of John as the one who "will go before him in the Spirit and power of Elijah" to prepare the Lord's people (Lk 1:17, again strongly echoing the Malachi tradition). In Judaism the collocation "Spirit and power of Elijah" (probably pre-Lukan) would normally suggest a miracle-working prophet but in the Lukan redaction (see Redaction Criticism) it means rather that John preaches powerfully—according to Luke 7:21-23, miracles are what distinguish Jesus from John, and are offered to John's disciples* as evidence to their master that Jesus is indeed the "Coming One." In accordance with his eschatological stature and role, the gift of the Spirit to John is unprecedented: he is "filled with the Holy Spirit" even from his mother's womb (1:15). Hence even in utero he recognizes with joy the bearer of the Messiah (1:41, 44) and from birth grows and becomes strong in the Spirit (1:80 [or possibly "in spirit"]).
2.1.3. The Spirit and the Conception of the Son of God. The eschatological quality of the Spirit restored to Israel is manifest especially in connection with its role in the conception of the Messiah (1:32-35). Here Luke is almost certainly dependent on tradition, for the same motif is witnessed independently (albeit briefly) in Matthew (1:18). The child born to Mary is to be hailed Son of the Most High and given the eschatological throne of David (1:32-33; see Son of David), because he will be no child of ordinary wedlock (1:35). As Fitzmyer now admits, following the semi-miraculous conception of John the Baptist to his aged parents in 1:5-25, the ascending parallelism of the narrative requires that this means a virginal conception of Jesus by the creative activity of the Holy Spirit. The angelic (see Angel) oracle asserts that through the action of the Spirit (perceived as the new creation "power of the Most High" [cf. 1:35b]) that which is born shall be "holy, the Son of God." As G. Schneider puts it: "Jesus is not merely filled with the Spirit like John, rather his very being is attributed to the Spirit" (Schneider, 53).

While Leisegang's attempts to explain this striking assertion in terms of pagan prophetism have been decisively overturned (see e.g., Barrett 1966), it is usually explained instead (so Brown 1977) as a late development in Christian thinking which first attributed Jesus' divine sonship by the Spirit to the resurrection*-exaltation (cf. Rom 1:4), then fed it back; first to Jesus' baptism,* then finally to his birth. It is held that the notion of creation or new creation by the Spirit (in a physical sense) was unknown in pre-Christian Judaism and could only evolve with the resurrection belief. But (1) the view is entirely conjectural: from the earliest confessions (Rom 1:3-4 and Gal 4:4-6) Jesus' birth is already a decisive christological moment and there is no evidence Mark 1:10-11 and parallels were first understood in an adoptionistic sense; (2) an understanding of the Spirit as new creation power of miracle is already clearly attested in the tradition of Jesus' miracles (see 2.4.2. below); and (3) Judaism was not as devoid of the idea of the Spirit as the power of miracle, creation or resurrection as is alleged (see 1.2. above). Indeed, Jesus and earliest Christianity would hardly have identified the power of resurrection specifically as God's Spirit unless Judaism already invited such an identification.

The outcome of Jesus' conception by the Spirit is portrayed in Luke 2:41-52, which is understood against the background of messianic hopes for a ruler endowed with wisdom* (Is 11:2-4; Pss. Sol. 17:37; 1 Enoch 49:2-3; etc.) and God's grace (cf. 2:40). Already Jesus shows a wisdom that startles the leaders of Israel; knows a duty to his Father which transcends that to his parents (2:49) and a divine "sonship" (compare ho patēr mou ["my Father"] here with the same expression at 10:22; 22:29 and 24:49), the depths of which Luke underscores by the redactional notice in 2:50 that Mary and Joseph did not understand the significance of what he said.

2.2. The Baptist's Promise (Mk 1:8 par. Mt 3:11 and Lk 3:16). John contrasts his own baptizing activity with that of one to come who "will baptize you with Holy Spirit-and-fire" (so the older Q version: Mark omits "and fire"). The "you" in question is all Israel (not merely the righteous), and syntactically "Holy Spirit and fire" is probably a hendiadys (i.e., one deluge consisting of Spirit and fire; not a baptism of Spirit for the righteous and one of fire for the wicked).

Speculation about whether the Baptist originally promised only judgment* in the form of a baptism of fire alone (Bultmann 1963) or of "wind and fire" (Best taking his cue from the winnowing image which follows in Q and the fact that Heb rûah can mean both "wind" and "spirit"—but does one "baptize" with "wind"?) is as unverifiable as it is unnecessary. The concept of an eschatological deluge of Spirit-and-fire is understandable enough within apocalyptic* Judaism.
There, for example, we find an eschatological stream, deluge or flood of fire (a burning counterpart to Noah's: cf. Dan 7:10; 1QH 3:20-36; 1 Enoch 67:13; 4
Ezra 13:10-11), destructive of the wicked, but purging the righteous (cf. T. Isaac 5:21-25; T. Ahr. 13), and the connection of the Spirit with cleansing, purging, even "fiery" judgment was traditional (cf. esp. Is 4:4; 1QS 4:21-22; see Dunn 1972). This is not quite, however, a flood of Holy Spirit-and-fire, and in Judaism a flood of divine Spirit could only be anticipated from God himself, not from the Messiah (though 4 Ezra 13:8-11 comes close in anticipating a stream of flame and fiery breath from the Messiah). Indeed, this is the main objection to the authenticity of the Baptist's promise as it stands: It is alleged that a promise of any human agent pouring out God's Spirit is simply inconceivable (T.Jud. 24:2-3 is suspect precisely as Christian interpolation).

But this probably misunderstands John's promise. He does not speak of the Messiah "bestowing" the gift of the Spirit. We have no need to posit that he went further than the traditional expectation of a messianic figure powerfully fulfilling Isaiah 11:14 (and 9:2-7— as in 1 Enoch 49:2-3; 62:1-2; Pss. Sol. 17:37; 18:7; etc.). The arrival of such a figure to rule, with his decisively authoritative Spiritimbued command, burning righteousness and dramatic acts of power, effecting both judgment and salvation, would itself be sufficient to suggest the metaphor of his unleashing a deluge of Spirit-and-fire on Israel (cf. Tg. Neb. Is 4:4 where the "Spirit of judgment" and "Spirit of fire" become the Messiah's powerful command of judgment and of extirpation respectively).

The imagery here was clearly capable of being applied by the Evangelists (1) to the Spirit in Jesus' ministry, (2) to the continuation of his ministry through the church in Jesus' lordship over the Spirit and (3) to the final act of judgment and re-creation, without requiring to be applied exclusively to anyone. Yates is probably right to think Mark saw Jesus' baptismal reception of the Spirit and powerful ministry, as fulfillment of the Baptist's promise, but wrong to restrict it to that: because a climactic new phase in the revelation of Christ and of God's reign in Mark is initiated with the Easter events. Exegetes are right to suggest Luke saw the fulfillment of John's promise in Pentecost (Acts 1:5; 11:16) and Matthew in the eschaton (cf. "fire" in Matthew), but wrong to restrict it to this if it means denying Luke thought Jesus' ministry (empowered by the Spirit precipitating eschatological judgment-and-salvation and casting "fire" on the earth [12:49]) already began to fulfill John's logion, and if it means denying that the final act of judgment and re-creation would further fulfill it.

2.3. The Spirit Comes in the Wilderness. The Gospels portray the Baptist as preparing the way of the Lord in the wilderness (see Mountain and Wilderness) and appealing to Isaiah 40:3. This was to evoke an intertestamental Isaianic New Exodus ideology; that God (through a Spirit-empowered Servant [Is 61:1-2, with certain Mosaic characteristics, cf. 42:1-7]) would destroy Israel's enemies (which at the time were partly identified as the spiritual forces behind idolatry and Israel's blindness), and shepherd* her along "the way" through a transformed wilderness to a restored Zion where he would rule. The ideology is widely reflected in Judaism (cf. 1QS 8:12b-16a; 9:17-20; 4Q176; Sir 48:24-25; T Moses 10:1-8; Pss. Sol. 11; etc.), and is woven through the Spirit traditions.

2.3.1. Jesus "Receives" the Spirit (Mk 1:10-11 par. Mt 3:16-17 and Lk 3:21-22). Dunn (1970, chap. 3) rightly observes that for the Evangelists Jesus receives the Spirit only after he comes out of the water* (and for Luke, while he is praying); his baptism was not the first Christian sacrament. Strictly speaking, the Synoptic Gospels do not actually record an objective coming of the Spirit on Jesus at all, but a vision ("the heaven(s) opened" is a standard formula to denote visionary experience: cf. Acts 7:56; 10:11; etc.; Mark's "heavens rent" simply heightens the Isaianic New Exodus connections by using the language of Is 64:1). Within the structure of such visions what is seen and what is heard are mutually interpretive. Taken as a unity, the import of the vision is that from that time the Spirit will be with Jesus as the power to exercise the messianic task (thus the use of Ps 2:7 [Mk 1:11b and pars.]); particularly as the Servant-Herald of Isaiah 42:1-2 (Mk 1:11c and pars.; cf. also Is 53:7 and 61:1-2). To see the Spirit descend as a dove most probably evokes the symbolism of the dove as a herald or trustworthy messenger (so b. Git. 45a; b. Sank 95a) and bearer of good tidings (cf. Gen 8:11), and so further interprets the Spirit on Jesus as the power to proclaim the messianic "good news."

Dunn (following a long line of exegetical tradition from Büchsei and von Baer on) attempts to explain the gift here primarily in terms of Jesus' paradigmatic experience of the Spirit in eschatological sonship, new age "life," life of the kingdom of God, etc., and only secondarily as empowering. But anyone holding the sort of messianic hopes outlined in §1.3. and §2.2. above would immediately recognize this primarily if not exclusively as messianic empowering. For Luke, Jesus already experiences a sonship to God deeper than that to which believers aspire (cf. 2:41-52), and any further dimension of sonship added by Jesus' reception of the Spirit at Jordan is of a more distinctively messianic rather than generally paradigmatic nature (see Turner 1981).

2.3.2. The Spirit and the Defeat of Satan in the Wilderness (Mk 1:12-13 par. Mt 4:1-11 and Lk 4:1-13). The Spirit who comes upon Jesus in the wilderness now leads him deeper into the wilderness into the trial with Satan (see Temptation of Jesus), but nothing is said of the Spirit's role in the encounter itself in Mark or Matthew. For Luke (4:1), however, the emphasis falls more on the one "full of the Spirit" now being led (by God) in the wilderness in a way that manifests the messianic empowering ("in the Spirit"). The final temptations echo Israel's in the wilderness, but while they "rebelled and grieved his Holy Spirit" there (Is 63:10), the new representative of Israel overcomes. Luke does not specify whether this is because the Spirit affords Jesus new depths of charismatic wisdom which is the basis of the hoped-for Messiah's redoubtable righteousness (1 Enoch 49:2-3; Pss. Sol. 17:37; 18:7; lQSb 5:24-25; Tg. Neb. Is 11.1-2), but such is probably to be inferred. The redactional notice in Luke 4:14 that Jesus then returned "in the power of the Spirit" to Galilee* not only highlights the "power" character of the gift of the Spirit to Jesus, but may be intended to indicate that the successful encounter with Satan lies at the root of Jesus' later success in "healing all who were under the power of the devil" (Acts 10:38; see Demon, Devil, Satan; Healing).

2.4. The Spirit in Jesus' Ministry.
2.4.1. The Messiah-of-the-Spirit, Exorcisms and Blasphemy against the Spirit. Matthew 12:28 (a Q saying) explicitly attributes Jesus' exorcisms (see Demon, Devil, Satan) to his empowering with the Spirit and concludes they manifest the inbreaking of God's reign (see Kingdom of God). This is striking as Judaism did not connect exorcisms with the Spirit nor see them as evidence of the kingdom. The same assumption—that Jesus exorcises by the power of the Spirit—is made in the Markan tradition warning of blasphemy* against the Spirit (Mk 3:28-30 par. Mt 12:31-32). This with the saying that immediately precedes may provide a clue to the connections of thought.

The most obvious OT background to the charge of "blasphemy against the Spirit" is Isaiah 63:10 with its accusation that the perverse and blind rebellion of the wilderness generation "grieved his Holy Spirit" and turned God into their enemy. Equally, the closest OT parallel to the parable of the strong man is widely recognized to be Isaiah 49:24-26, with its New Exodus theme of the Yahweh-Warrior taking back the captives from warriors, and plunder from the fierce—i.e., releasing Israel—so that all humanity will know he is Israel's savior. By the intertestamental period these "enemies" from whom deliverance was awaited were none other than the powers of Belial, and the Messiah was the one who would act as God's agent in effecting the New Exodus release (so esp. T. Dan 5:10-13 and 11 QMelch, but see also T. Zeb. 9:8 and T. Lew 18:12). The New Exodus hopes thus offer a plausible background to explain why the Messiah (already traditionally regarded as empowered by the Spirit to deliver Israel from her enemies) should be connected with exorcisms, and these in turn with the advent of God's reign. These hopes also provide an inviting background for labelling as "blasphemy against the Holy Spirit" the rebellious refusal to recognize such acts of redemption as God's work.

Luke has shifted the blasphemy against the Spirit saying to a different context (12:10-12). It probably still means obdurate and rebellious unbelief that opposes God's redemptive initiative, now in persistent antagonism to the gospel* (see Gospel [Good News]) preached in the power of the Spirit (so Fitzmyer)—a theme which dominates Acts. Of the alternative suggestion (Schweizer, George etc.), that "blasphemy against the Spirit" denotes failure of the Christian to confess Jesus when prompted by the Spirit in situations of trial, there is simply no trace in Luke-Acts.

Luke 11:20 has also changed the Q* saying to attribute exorcisms to "the finger of God" rather than to the Spirit It is alleged Luke has made both these changes because he regarded the Spirit (as in Judaism) as "the Spirit of prophecy" and, for that reason, could not accept the Spirit was also the power of miracle. But this is based on a false antithesis (see 1.2. above), and Luke's changes are more readily explained in other terms. In Luke 11:20 the shift in terminology (a clear reference to Ex 8:19 [LXX Ex 8:15] is probably in the interest of Luke's prophet-like-Moses christology but still refers to the Spirit (cf. the parallel term "the hand of the Lord" which was interpreted to refer to the Spirit).

2.4.2. The Spirit and Miracles of Healing. To the extent that illness was regarded as both directly and indirectly Satanic (e.g., Acts 10:38; Lk 13:10-15; etc.), so we might expect healings* to be regarded as part of the messianic deliverance; the acts of the Messiah endowed with the Spirit (cf. Mt 11:2) to liberate Israel from her enemies. The strong connection between healings and pronouncement of the inbreaking reign of God supports the view (notably Lk 9:2 and 10:9, 11 par. Mt 10:7-8), and the Q tradition (Mt 11:5 par. Lk 7:21-22) that Jesus responded to the Baptist's doubt by highlighting the blind seeing, the lame walking, lepers cleansed, deaf hearing and "good news" being preached to the poor, thus evoking a medley of Isaianic New Exodus texts (29:18; 35:5-7; 42:18) including the most significant Isaiah 61:1-2 (see 2.4.3. below). Matthew specifically and redactionally traces the healings to the Spirit bestowed on the Servant-Herald of Isaiah 42:1-2 (Mt 12:15-21). The occasional Elisha or prophet-like-Moses allusions in the miracle tradition of Luke (7:11-17; 9:10b-17, 28-36; 10:1-12; 13:32-33) should not be taken as providing a competing explanation, but reflect a merging of prophetic and more traditional messianic views (anticipated in the New Exodus ideology and elsewhere).

2.4.3. The Interpretation of the Spirit in Terms of Isaiah 61:1-2. Via the redactional bridges of 4:1 and 4:14, Luke interprets the gift of the Spirit to Jesus in 3:21-22 in terms of fulfillment of Isaiah 61:1-2 (4:18-21). The unusual text form of the citation and other non-Lukan features suggest he has received 4:16-30 from a source (Strobel, Schürmann and Tuckett differently), but Luke has given it programmatic significance.

The use of Isaiah 61:1-2 to explain the Spirit on Jesus has both christological and soteriological significance. Isaiah 61:1-2 was understood in contemporary Judaism to encapsulate the New Exodus hopes for a messianic Jubilee* and "release" of "the poor" (i.e., Israel in need of salvation; see Rich and Poor) from captivity to the powers of Beliar (compare 11 QMelch; see Sloan). That the citation was understood this way is indicated by the intercalation of the thematic "to set the oppressed free" from Isaiah 58:6. Jesus claims to be the one empowered by the Spirit to effect the "release" of Israel from the variety of forms of Satanic oppression. That this includes healings and exorcisms is clear from Luke 7:21 (Lukan redaction) with 7:22 (Q) and Acts 10:38 (which echo the language of Lk 4:18-21: cf. also e.g., Lk 13:10-15). But that it also goes beyond these to include release from Israel's idolatrous "blindness" and "deafness" to God too (cf. 8:4-15; Acts 28:26-27) is evident from (e.g.) the way Isaiah 61:1-2 shapes the Beatitudes (Mt 5:3-6; Lk 6:20-21; see Sermon on the Mount).

Christologically, the use of Isaiah 61:1-2 (and 42:1-2) with a New Exodus theme probably indicates a prophet-like-Moses motif rather than the more traditional regal Messiah. But the two are complimentary, not antithetical, and whether the Messiah is Davidic or Mosaic makes only slight difference to the pneumatology: both figures are expected to experience the Spirit in acts of power and deliverance, and both experience the Spirit in charismatic wisdom. A Mosaic motif enables an emphasis on the Spirit as the source of charismatic revelation, and on the outcome in foundational and authoritative teaching, more easily than the regal. In the final analysis, however, the Synoptics are surprisingly reticent to speak of Jesus receiving revelation (contrast the paucity of such reference in Luke [only 3:21-22 (10:18?) and 10:22] with the richness in Acts), and this is never specifically attributed to the Spirit. And while Jesus is presented as the giver of foundational teaching, the authority* of the content is presented as his own ("I say to you . . ."; see Amen), rather than attributed to the Spirit The Spirit has become the power that works through Jesus' words and deeds to affect others.

2.5. Jesus' Promise of the Spirit. As the Synoptics present Jesus giving minimal explicit teaching on the church,* it is hardly surprising there is little on the gift of the Spirit

Luke 11:11-13 probably belongs to the controversy within Jesus' ministry about the source of the power he demonstrates. It assures the disciples who have shared in this power on Jesus (cf. 9:1; 10:17-19), that the Father does not give harmful gifts ("snake" and "scorpion" are symbols for evil powers, cf. 10:19) when good gifts are sought. Similarly he gives a good spirit (pneuma agathon p45 L [etc.] is the reading that explains the rest), not an evil one as the opponents imply (11:14-23).
The only passage that specifically promises an activity of the Spirit in the disciples is that of Mk 13:11; Mt 10:19-20; Lk 12:11-12, where the Spirit is clearly the "Spirit of prophecy." That is, it affords charismatic revelation or wisdom to the persecuted disciple. This promise assumes the disciples will already have the Spirit promised by Joel (it is only the words of defense that are given "in that hour"; not the gift of the Spirit itself). Luke's parallel saying (21:15) derives the necessary charismatic wisdom from the heavenly Lord instead, but it is clear Luke believes the means by which the charisma is received is the Spirit of prophecy—for he combines the wording of both promises in his description of Stephen's preaching at Acts 6:5,10 (which also shows he does not regard the activity as restricted to persecution contexts)—and thus 21:15 implicitly asserts Jesus' future lordship over the Spirit.

Relevant also are the two final commissioning passages: Matthew 28:18-20 and Luke 24:4649. The former does not specify a promise of the Spirit to the disciples, but is of interest as the one substantial hint of an emerging trinitarian understanding of the Spirit. Elsewhere the ideas do not necessarily move beyond Jewish traditional conceptions, but here the one divine name is spelled out in terms of Father, Son and Spirit (Schaberg's rejection of the apparent trinitarianism, on the grounds the Matthew passage is a midrash of Dan 7:9-27, with the Holy Spirit replacing the multitude of angels, is hardly logical, even if the tradition history—its own questionable—is right) Luke 24:49 (strongly redactional in formulation) does not use the word Spirit at all, but the expression "the promise of the Father" clearly refers to Joel's promise through the verbal links Luke carefully establishes in Acts 1:8; 2:17 and 2:33. Though the activity of this gift will empower the mission to all nations (see Gentiles), it is not to be thought of as a second blessing. Joel's promised gift of the Spirit of prophecy will become the means by which disciples experience the presence and guidance of their heavenly Lord.*

In the Fourth Gospel the Spirit is to be understood primarily as a development of the Jewish understanding of the "Spirit of prophecy," redefined christologically and developed in a trinitarian direction.

3.1. The Portrait of Jesus Endowed with the Spirit (Jn 1:32-34; 3:34-36; 6:63). John's account jumps from the Prolog, which proclaims Jesus the incarnate Logos who reveals the Father (1:1-18), to the Baptist's testimony concerning Jesus' reception of the Spirit (1:32-34), with no birth or infancy scenes. Kümmel, Schweizer and others have claimed John plays down Jesus' endowment in favor of his own Logos* christology—after all, he who has descended from the Father barely needs the Spirit to supply revelation (cf. 3:12-13, 31-32). But Porsch and Burge have shown this to be misleading. The very first glimpse we see of Jesus is through the testimony of the Baptist (apparently party to Jesus' vision) that he saw the Spirit descend on the Son and "rest/remain on him" (1:32-33—a reference to Is 11:2, or a way of saying the endowment was permanent or both?), and thereby identify him as the one who baptizes with the Holy Spirit. More significant is 3:34-36. The elliptic 3:34 means "Jesus utters the words of God because God gives him the Spirit without measure" (to make Jesus the one who gives the Spirit without measure here breaks the logic of the "because": with Bürge, against Porsch). A deliberate contrast with the prophets seems intended (cf. Lev. Rab. 15:2, "The Holy Spirit who rests on the prophets, rests on them only by measure"). John's point is that the immeasurable gift of the Spirit (of revelation) to Jesus corresponds to the perfection of revelation through Jesus—it provides a revelation which transcends the Law* and the Prophets. This is confirmed in 3:35b where the result of the Father's love* for the Son is that "he has given all things into his hands," that is, the totality of revelation given to the Son whereby he "utters the words of God" (3:34; cf. Mt 11:27!). John 3:36 now draws the natural conclusion: If the fullness of God's revelation is imparted through the Son, then to receive that revelation brings "life."* Correspondingly, to reject it is to reject God and so to remain under his wrath. It would seem then that John portrays the gift of the Spirit to Jesus at his baptism as the gift of full revelation and the power to impart it to others. This chimes with Jesus' claim in 6:63 that his revelatory words are an experience of Spirit and "life." The claim goes to the heart of John's soteriology.

3.2. Birth "from Above" and Birth of "Water and Spirit" (Jn 3). "Birth from above" (3:3; cf. 3:31 for anōthen as "above" not "again") is a circumlocution for birth from God. The explanatory "birth 'of water-and-Spirit' " (3:5) is a hendiadys which must refer to a unitary event (so not natural birth followed by spiritual birth or John's baptism followed by reception of the Spirit, etc.), and it cannot be Christian baptism, of which Nicodemus could scarcely be expected to know. L. Belleville has shown the most probable explanation is the promise in Ezekiel 36:25-26 of eschatological cleansing and new creation in true filial obedience (which Jub. 1:23-25 already identifies as the gift of "sonship"). Jesus claims this essentially apocalyptic hope, and concomitant "eternal life," begins to be realized where people truly believe in the Son God has sent (3:14-18). By no means all "belief' in Jesus, however, is authentic (contrast 2:23 with 2:24; 8:31a with 8:31b-36; etc.). Even the claimed belief of the disciples (6:69) does not truly become authentic faith until after the glorification (see Glory) of Jesus in the cross (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection (cf. 16:25). The Spirit-imbued revelatory teaching of Jesus (6:63) plays a vital function in coming to true belief.

3.3. The Offer of "Living Water" (4:10, 13-14). Jesus' offer of "living (i.e., flowing) water" which truly quenches thirst and "wells up" like a spring in the believer "to eternal life" merges three kinds of symbolism: (1) the general use of flowing water as a symbol of God's eschatological salvation (e.g., Is 55:1; Zech 14:8; Ezek 47:1-12); (2) refreshing and life-giving water as a symbol for divine wisdom (Prov 13:14 ["a fountain of life"]; 18:4; Sir 24:21 ("Those who eat of me will hunger still; those who drink of me shall thirst for more"), especially as revealed in the Law (Sir 24:23-29; CD 19:34, Sipre Deut 11.22, §48) and (3) water as symbolism for the gift of the Spirit (Is 44:3; 1QS 4:21; etc.). That John intends the promise to be understood as the Spirit is evident both from 4:23 ("The Hour is coming and now is . . ." when true worshipers worship the Father "in Spirit and truth") and from his specific equation of the offer of living water with the Spirit in 7:37-39. But it is particularly the Spirit as the revealer of divine wisdom through Jesus' Spirit-imbued teaching (cf. 6:63b) that is meant at 4:10, 13-14. Jesus, as Wisdom* incarnate, imparts new revelatory wisdom which re-creates a person and brings "life," but he does so as the one to whom the Father has given the Spirit without measure (3:34). It is the combination of revelatory "word" and Spirit together that is the "living water" (cf. 1QS 4:21-22) which effects the "birth from above."

3.4. The Redemptive-Historical Qualification on the Gift (Jn 7:37-39). John 4:10 and 6:63b suggest the gift of life-giving Spirit-imbued revelation is available within the ministry of Jesus (cf. "the hour... now is" at 4:23). This would appear to be supported by 13:10; 15:3 and 17:17, which declare the disciples are already "cleansed" by Jesus' word, and by the implication of saying not all (who seem to) actually believe (6:64; cf. 13:11; see Faith)—to exclude Judas.* But while these references indicate that Jesus' revelation is already beginning to transform the disciples, John provides a strong qualification of this.

3.4.1. John 7:37-39. In a context of the ceremony of water-drawing and libation at the festival of Tabernacles (interpreted in Judaism as a promise of the rivers of salvation to pour out from the Temple [Is 12:3; Ezek 47:1-12 and Zech 14:8 were read during the festival]), Jesus invites the thirsty to drink from him
Instead. The invitation is supported by "Scripture" (apparently summarizing its message in the light of the fulfillment expected rather than citing; no OT passage corresponds verbally to 7:38) that "out of his/ its belly shall flow rivers of living water." Most modern exegetes (e.g., Brown 1966 and Beasley-Murray 1989, Bürge) repuncture 7:37 to make Christ (rather than the believer) the source ("If anyone thirst, let him come to me, and let him drink who believes in me"). J. B. Cones, however, argues strongly for the traditional view that the Spirit flows from the believer (the messianic community being thus seen as the embodiment of the eschatological Temple from which the renewing waters stream (cf. Ezek 47:1-12; Zech 14:8)— with Jesus as the ultimate source. Either way, John 7:39 insists the promise relates to the gift of the Spirit (cf. m. Sukk. 5:55a) and affirms that this gift was not yet given, for Jesus was not yet been "glorified" (i.e., exalted through the cross, resurrection and ascension* [12:23-24; 17:5]).

3.4.2. John 20:22. According to John 20:22, when Jesus appeared to the disciples, bid them Peace and recommissioned them, "he breathed on them, and said to them, 'Receive the Holy Spirit...' " (RSV). The verb enephusēsen means "insufflated" more readily than "breathed upon," and is a direct allusion to Genesis 2:7, where God breathed the breath of life into Adam (cf. Ezek 37:9). The implication is that it is only now, beyond the cross and vindication, that the Spirit-empowered revelation to the disciples achieves what had been begun within the ministry, namely new creation transformation. Essentially the same point was anticipated at 3:14-18, where the belief in the Son, which brings life, is specifically belief in the revelation of the Son afforded by the cross and vindication. Compare also John 6, where the divine wisdom Jesus' hearers are invited to eat and drink (6:35) is first spelled out as the unity of the Father and the Son in salvation (Jesus is the life-giving counterpart to the manna God gave in the wilderness), but then narrowed down to that divine wisdom expressed in the Son's revelatory death on behalf of humanity (6:51c-58). For John the fundamental problem of humankind is alienation from God expressed in unbelief, darkness (see Light) and ignorance of God. What is needed to overcome it is a revealer, light and knowledge of God—which it is precisely the mission of the Son, empowered by the Spirit, to bring (8:28; 14:10; 15:22-24). His revelatory word frees (8:31-36); to "hear" it is to experience the Spirit transforming through it and to taste life (6:63b). But for John, the exaltation through the cross both deals objectively with the sin that caused the fundamental alienation (contra Bultmann and Forestell: see Turner 1990) and also provides the supreme revelation of the unity of the Father and the Son in saving love. Correspondingly, only after the Easter event can the word of Jesus be released in full transforming power through the Spirit.

3.5.1. The Meaning of Paraklētos. In Greek the word is formally a passive verbal adjective, "one called alongside" (especially to offer assistance in a court), and so an "advocate" (though not with the professional legal sense of the Latin advocatus), and indeed later Rabbinic Judaism came to use pēraqlit (a loan word) for "advocate" (cf. Pirqe Aboth 4:11). Because, however, the functions actually attributed to "the Paraclete" in John are primarily teaching, revealing and interpreting Jesus to the disciples (with forensic functions only explicit at 15:26[?]; 16:8-11), other meanings of paraklētos have been championed. These include (1) "Comforter" (derived from parakalein, "to encourage" [so Davies]; but John does not use the verb, and this etymology should require an active not passive adjective); (2) "Exhorter" (so, roughly, Barrett 1950, deriving from paraklēsis and facing similar difficulties) and (3) "Helper" (so Bultmann 1971, by somewhat forced linguistic and conceptual association with [plural] "helpers" [arguably rather "bearers of light"] in alleged Mandaean background). But none of these have forensic functions. Those that have accepted the sense "advocate" have generally found the background in the angelic intercessor-defender figures of the OT and intertestamental literature (so Mowinckel and Johansson), and Qumran (so O. Betz, who thinks John modelled the Paraclete/Spirit of Truth primarily on Qumran's cosmic dualism (Spirit of Truth v. Spirit of Error; see Dead Sea Scrolls) and (e.g., for the personal traits) their Michael mythology. (For a review of the complex discussion see G. Johnston [esp. chap. 7] and G. Burge [chap. 1], To date these background studies [esp. Betz], illuminate various traits of John's portrait of the Paraclete rather than satisfactorily explaining the redactional whole.)

3.5.2. The Paraclete is Modeled on Jesus. This point is made both in Jesus' promise of "another Paraclete of the same kind" (alios, and in the deliberate parallelism between Jesus and what is promised of the Spirit [e.g.] (1) both "come forth"/are "sent" from the Father into the world* (3:16-17; 5:43; 16:27-28; 18:37 par. 14:26; 15:26; 16:7-8,13); (2) both are called "holy" (6:39 par. 14:26) and are characterized by "the truth" (14:6 par. 14:17; 15:26; 16:13); (3) if Jesus is the great teacher* (cf. 13:13-14), the Paraclete will "teach you ... all things" (14:26); and (4) just as the Messiah bears witness to God and reveals all things (4:25-26; cf. 1:18; 3:34-36; etc.)—supremely himself and the Father—so too the Paraclete will witness to and reveal especially the glorified Son (15:26-27; 16:13-14). And as Jesus set out to convince and convia the world, which nevertheless did not "receive" him (1:12 etc.), so too the Paraclete's task is to convince and convict the world (Jn 16:8-12), but the world does not receive him either (14:17; 15:18-26). The Sitz-im-Leben of these parallels (as Müller has shown) is the usual concern of the Jewish genre "Farewell Discourses"*; namely, to establish how the decisive initiative made by the man of God will be continued beyond his death. Jesus has acted as the Paraclete so far; the Spirit is to take over that role.

3.5.3. The Paraclete Will Mediate the Presence of the Father and the Glorified Son (14:16-26). Having assured them of the gift of the Spirit in 14:16-17, in vv. 18 and 19 Jesus promises he will not leave the disciples desolate but will come to them in such a way that "the world" will not see him—he will manifest himself to any disciple who loves him (14:21). When this is pressed by Judas in 14:22, Jesus reasserts that (if a disciple love him) he and the Father will come and make their home with him. This promise cannot refer to Jesus' "Second Coming" (for then the world shall see); nor to resurrection appearances which were neither dependent on the love of the disciples, nor capable of being described as the coming of the Father and the Son to dwell with the disciple. As these affirmations are sandwiched by promises of the Spirit-Paraclete (14:14-17; 14:25-26), and as (in Judaism) the Spirit of prophecy was regarded as the presence of God in revelation, most exegetes infer that it is precisely the promised Spirit that will mediate the presence and self-revelation of Father and Son. Those who deny this (e.g., Beasley-Murray) do not tell us how Christ and the Father are supposed to "manifest themselves" to the disciple, nor explain why (if they can) John thinks the Spirit need be given at all. We conclude the Paraclete/Advocate is the Holy Spirit in a special role, namely as the personal presence of Jesus in the Christian while Jesus is with the Father (so Brown), though without agreeing that John significantly collapsed the delayed Parousia into his pneumatology.

3.5.4. The Paraclete as Teacher and Revealer (14:26; 16:12-14). The disciples cannot take in (16:12) or understand the significance of what Jesus has said and done until he is glorified (16:25). Consequently, the Spirit-Paraclete is given to remind them of Jesus' teaching (14:26) and to interpret it to them (e.g.,
The main task of the Spirit in John is to provide a particular sort of charismatic wisdom: to bring true comprehension of the significance of the historical revelation in Christ. The truth into which he leads (16:13) is not the later doctrines of the church, but principally the truth which Jesus has incarnated and taught and concerning which Jesus would readily explain more at the Last Supper* (if the disciples could only absorb it [16:12]); the things of Jesus and which glorify him (cf. 16:14). Even the promise of the Spirit declaring "the things that are to come" (16:13), in context of the Last Supper, refers primarily (though not exclusively) to the all-important coming events of the cross and exaltation, not the End. As Porsch put it: "Jesus brings the truth, and makes it present through his coming into the world; the Spirit-Paraclete opens up this truth and creates the entrance into it for believers" (300). The title of E. Franck's monograph on the Spirit-Paraclete—Revelation Taught—points to the centrality of this motif for John.

3.5.5. The Paraclete as "Advocate" and the Christian Mission. The reason why this Revealer-Teacher is called "another Paraclete" (= "advocate," 14:16) is best clarified in terms of John's presentation of Jesus' ministry under the extended metaphor of a cosmic trial. The issue contended is whether or not Jesus truly is the final manifestation of God, very Son from the Father, whom to know is "Life" transcending the possibilities offered by Judaism (cf. 20:31). As the sent one, Jesus has a mission to convince the world of God's saving truth, which he incarnates and reveals, and this mission dominates the Gospel (within 5:31-47 alone Jesus points to five "witnesses" on his side); he is the chief advocate of the case with which the disciples have become identified. The impending removal of Jesus through cross and exaltation, cannot be allowed to leave the disciples "as orphans" (correctly NIV; RSVs "desolate" misses the point)—that is, defenseless. Nor may the case be lost because reduced to silence. Rather the disciples are now "sent" as Jesus was "sent" (Jn 20:21; cf. 17:17-18), and the Spirit from the heavenly Lord is given to them to take over the earthly Jesus' advocacy of the case (15:26-27; 16:7b-11). According to 16:8-11, the Spirit-Paraclete will prosecute the case against the world by exposing it with respect to sin (that its unbelief is the essence of sin), righteousness (that its claim to righteousness is false [?]; or—more probably—that its verdict on Jesus is reversed by the exaltation), and judgment (that the power that engineered Jesus' death, and continues to oppose Christ stands condemned in Jesus' vindication). But the connection with 16:12-15 must be observed. The Spirit will convince the world of these things precisely by revealing the truth and by teaching its significance to the disciples. 16:8-11 does not mean the Spirit offers independent witness; John knows of no witness by the Spirit that is not witness through the church. But equally the disciples only give their witness as ones to whom the Spirit has revealed Jesus and the significance of his life, death and resurrection. It is thus as teacher and revealer that the Spirit will also be Paraclete or Advocate. This does not mean John thinks the Paraclete is given as a second blessing of revelation and wisdom for missionary empowering; but that he thinks the post-ascension gift of the Spirit is simultaneously the means by which the disciple "understands" the gospel and the means of ongoing knowledge of the presence and guidance of the Father and the Son, and this itself constitutes the witness to Christ and so is "the Spirit of mission."

3.5.6. Concluding Theological and Critical Remarks. A minor debate continues as to when John thought the Spirit was first given as the "Paraclete" (whether at 20:22 or beyond the period of the Gospel, when first the Spirit replaces Jesus). More theologically significant are the christological and trinitarian conclusions to be drawn: (1) Jesus' lordship over the Spirit expressed in his sending and commissioning of the "Paraclete" (15:26; 16:7) attest a fully divine christology; (2) the portrait of the Spirit as a replacement figure, and one which goes well beyond the frequent but incidental personifications of the Spirit in Judaism, takes the pneumatology in the direction of trinitarianism. Major differences center on the origin of the traditions about the Spirit—whether they are purely Christian creative midrash* around Jesus' minimal teaching on the Spirit as an advocate in time of persecution (2.5. above) or more substantially derive from Jesus—but a convincing tradition-history of the material would at present be very hard to establish (see Tradition Criticism). Nevertheless it may be observed that the Johannine Spirit teaching, with its strong wisdom accent, is evidently rooted in the Jewish conception of the Spirit as the "Spirit of prophecy," and no single formulation demonstrably moves beyond the circle of what could be expected if the Jesus we otherwise know from the Synoptics were to express his teaching in specifically pneumatological terms.

See also Baptism; Birth Of Jesus; Demon, Devil Satan; God: John The Baptist; New Birth

HYPOCRITE

In contemporary English hypocrite denotes an insincere person, especially someone who pretends to be pious or virtuous when he or she really is not. Interpreters in recent years have expressed doubts about the adequacy of this traditional definition in connection with the NT. Alternative suggestions have been advanced on the basis of the use of the word in the Greek versions of the OT and on the basis of a fresh analysis of the "woes" in Matthew 23 (set Blessing and Woe).

1. Vocabulary and Historical Background

2. Usage in the Gospels

1. Vocabulary and Historical Background.

The words in question are the noun "hypocrite" (hypokritēs) and its cognates, the noun "hypocrisy" (hypokrisis) and the verb "pretend" (hypokrinomai). Matthew uses words of this family almost three times as frequently as Luke (14/5) and seven times more frequently than Mark (14/2). (In addition hypokritēs appears in a variant reading at Mt 23:14.) The words never appear in John's Gospel. Statistics alone reveal that the charge of hypocrisy is a Matthean concern.

1.1. Classical Usage. In early Greek the active verb hypokrinō meant to "interrogate" and the middle verb hypokrinomai meant to "answer" (used both of human beings and of oracles to whom questions were put). When Attic Greek settled on apokrinomai for "answer," it began to use hypokrinomai to mean "interpret," or "explain," oracles, dreams or riddles.

The verb also came to mean "act a part in a drama," because the drama is speech in dialog with questions and answers or because the actor is an interpreter of the poet-dramatist and of the underlying myth. Later the word was used of orators in the sense of "deliver a speech" and then to "speak in exaggerated fashion." Especially under Stoic auspices the word came to be used metaphorically: all the world is a stage, and we are all actors summoned to play well our assigned parts. It was then a short step to the negative sense of "deceive" or "pretend."

Polybius notes how envoys of hostile tribes "pretended" to be humble in their words to Roman authorities but in reality were not submissive (Polybius Hist. 35.2.13). Epictetus declares that he is not "deceiving" or "playing a part" (used in parallel with "being silly") in explaining an ethical point (Disc. 1.25.1).

The history of the nouns parallels that of the verb. Hypokrisis once meant "reply" and then in Attic Greek came to mean "playing a part," the "delivery" (of a speech) and finally "pretense." Hypokritēs meant "interpreter" (of dreams or riddles), "actor," "reciter" and then "pretender" (LSJ, BAGD, TDNT). The Latin Vulgate simply followed a Latin tradition of transliterating the Greek by means of the noun hypokrita (or hypokrites) and hypokrisis. In Latin rhetoric and drama hypokrisis meant "mimicry," while hypokrita (hypokrites) meant a "mime" or "accompanist" who represented in gestures or dance what the actor was expressing with words (Suetonius Nero 24).

But is classical and secular Greek the proper trajectory within which to understand the use of these words in the NT, or should we look instead to the LXX, understanding it as representing a separate biblical Jewish-Greek trajectory?

1.2. Hellenistic-Jewish Usage. In the ancient Greek versions of the Bible the word group sometimes means simply "wickedness." The LXX uses hypokritēs at Job 34:30 and 36:13 to translate the Hebrew hānēp. That Hebrew word is ordinarily rendered asebēs ("godless," Job 8:13; 15:34; Is 33:14; Prov 11:9), paranomos ("transgressor," Job 17:8; 20:5) or anomos ("lawless," Is 9:16; 10:6; 32:6; 33:14) in the LXX. But hypokritēs or a cognate occurs for hānēp at these passages in the Greek versions of Theodotion, Aquila and Symmachus.
Because hypokritēs renders hānēp in these passages, and because Israel did not have a theater or dramatic tradition and regarded the theater as a pagan institution, Wilckens and Young deny that the modern sense of "acting a part" or "deceiving" is meant in all uses of hypokritēs and cognates in Jewish Greek. They suggest that "lawless, corrupt or unrighteous person" captures the essential meaning of the word.

Batey has argued that the presence of Hellenistic (see Hellenism) theaters in the cities of Palestine, including one at Sepphoris a few miles from Nazareth (although it cannot be dated with certainty to the first century), supports the notion that Jesus and his hearers were familiar with the vocabulary of drama, including the word actor.

It is simply a fact that Greek-speaking Jews both in biblical and non-biblical writings frequently used hypokritēs and cognates in the sense of "pretending" or "playing a part with intent to deceive." For example, the agent of Antiochus arrived in Jerusalem and "pretended" to be peaceably disposed toward the Jews, although he was looking for an opportunity to destroy them (2 Macc 5:25). Pious Eleazar, advised to "pretend" to eat swine's flesh, replied that to do so would be to "enact a part," something ill-becoming to him and inconsistent with the truth he had lived so far and with the Law* he loved (2 Macc 6:21-25; 4 Macc 6:15-23).

The Psalms of Solomon condemn high government officials and religious leaders who "give the impression" of piety while their hearts are far from God. They are the kind of people who commit sins at night as if no one could see them (Pss. Sol. 4:5-6), and by fraud they "deceive" innocent people (Pss. Sol. 4:22). Sirach 1:29 calls "hypocrites" those who praise God with their lips while their hearts are not fixed on God. Josephus* reports many stories of intrigue and double-cross, describing how politicians in Palestine scripted events, directed other actors and themselves played roles, pretending friendship while plotting destruction (Josephus J. W. 1 §§471, 516, 520; cf. J.W. 1 §318; 2 §587; Ant. 2 §160). And the same use is found often in Philo (see Wilckens).

2. Usage in the Gospels.

In the Gospels the odor of deceit and malice hovers around the words. In the pericope on paying tribute (see Taxes) to Caesar (Mk 12:13-17; Mt 22:15-22; Lk 20:20-26) all three Synoptic Gospels use words of the hypokri- family but in different places and in different ways. In his introduction to the pericope Luke (20:20) says that scribes and chief priests* watched Jesus and sent spies, "who pretended (hypokrinomenous) to be sincere" (RSV; cf. Lk 12:1). Mark (12:15) says that Jesus suspected the Pharisees* of "hypocrisy" (hypokrisis), while Luke speaks of their "cunning" (panourgia, Lk 20:23) and Matthew of their "wickedness" (ponèria, Mt 22:18). In this same pericope, Matthew says that Jesus addressed his opponents as "hypocrites" (Mt 22:18). Thus all three Synoptic Evangelists in their varied ways render their verdict that Jesus' opponents came to him under false pretenses, flattering him and giving the impression that they sought his considered response to a difficult issue but actually seeking only to trap him.

The sense of a disastrous inconsistency is strong. The words imply some kind of fatal rift, whether between outer appearance ("lips") and inner reality ("hearts," Mk 7:6; Mt 15:7, both quoting Is 29:13; cf. Sir 1:29) or between ability in one sphere and inability in another (Lk 12:56), or between compassion in one area of life and unfeeling stubbornness in another (Lk 13:15-16), or between hypersensitivity to the failings of others and blindness to one's own shortcomings (Mt 7:5; Lk 6:42; cf. Rom 2:1-5).

Matthew frequently criticizes the discrepancy between hearts and lips (Mt 15:7), between hearing and doing (Mt 7:24-27), between telling and doing (Mt 23:3; cf. 21:28-32). And Matthew heaps scorn on people who perform acts traditionally associated with the worship* of God, doing them not as acts of worship but strutting about and performing them as attention-getters among humans (Mt 23:5; 6:2, 5, 16; cf. Pss. Sol. 4:6, 22).

In his Gospel Matthew ranges "hypocrisy" alongside "lawlessness" (anomia, Mt 7:23; 13:41; 23:28; 24:12) as opposed to the virtues of righteousness (Mt 5:6,20; 6:1, 33; see Justice, Righteousness), perfection (Mt 5:48; 19:21) and wholeness (Mt 22:37-40). These latter terms speak of integrity and soundness, while "hypocrisy" describes a splintering, a division, an inconsistency between the inner and outer person, between hearts and lips, between words and deeds.

But do the passages cited so far determine the meaning of "hypocrites" in the "woes" Jesus pronounces (Mt 23:13, 14, 15, 23, 25, 27, 29; cf. 23:28; cf. Lk 11:39-52)? Albright and Mann fasten on the most ancient Greek sense of the word as involving an act of interpretation. Accordingly, Jesus is involved not in the cultivation of private virtues but in public debates about the meaning of the Law. Believing that Jesus represented the prophetic versus what they call the growing legalism of scribes,* they translate hypokritēs as "overscrupulous" interpreter, "casuist," "pettifogging lawyer."

Garland argues for a wider range of meaning than that which the English hypocrite allows. He concedes that in some Matthean passages the sense of deception is present. Nevertheless, on the basis of Qumran's (see Dead Sea Scrolls) characterization of Pharisees as false interpreters ("seekers after smooth things"), he argues that Matthew portrays Jesus and his opponents as locked in a struggle concerning correct interpretation. The contrast in the woes, he thinks, is not between heart and lips (Mt 15:7) or between saying and doing (Mt 23:3). It is rather the contrast between the tradition of the religious teachers and the Law* of God. The teachers are guilty not of conscious pretense or sham but of nullifying God's intention by twisting the Law to their own purposes in their interpretations.

The English word fraud or imposter seems to capture the sense of hypokritēs in Matthew 23 and in most other uses in Jewish-Greek literature and the NT. It is regularly used of teachers and leaders who are inauthentic, whether consciously or unconsciously. The sense of being false interpreters arises not from the etymology of the word (contra Albright and Mann), nor from a tradition of use like that at Qumran (pace Garland) but from the fact that the word is used in Matthew 23 of scribes, who were interpreters of the Law.

Matthew 23 contains seven woes (eight, if 23:14 is original) against the scribes and Pharisees as hypocrites. That chapter has contributed to the terrible equation: Pharisee = hypocrite. But Matthew has probably collected these sayings which condemn some habits of past religious leaders (scribes and Pharisees) not to inform readers about the character of all scribes and Pharisees, nor to wage polemic against the Pharisaic leadership of Jamnia but in order to campaign against parallel attitudes and habits he discerns in certain Christian teachers of his own religious community (see Minear, van Tilborg, Garland).

See also Anti-semitism; Pharisees; Scribes

R H. Smith
"I AM" SAYINGS

The unique authority* and identity of Jesus are expressed particularly in the Fourth Gospel through sayings which employ the Greek formula egō eimi ("I am"). In some cases a simple predicate is given ("I am the bread of life"), in others an absolute usage is playing a specialized role in John's christology. The Synoptics frequently employ the so-called authoritative egō ("I") for Jesus, but even here the Fourth Gospel uses it more: Matthew uses egō 29 times, Mark 17 times, Luke 23 times and John 134 times. Likewise, egō eimi is used by Matthew five times (Mt 14:27; 22:32; 24:5; 26:22, 25), Mark three times (Mk 6:50; 13:6; 14:62) and Luke four times (Lk 1:19; 21:8; 22:70; 24:39), but John employs it thirty times (see below).

1. Synoptic Use
2. The Fourth Gospel
3. Background
4. The "I am" in Johannine Christology

1. Synoptic Use.

Greek generally employs personal pronouns to express emphasis or antithesis. Thus, throughout Matthew, Mark and Luke, Jesus asserts his authority and contrasts his teaching with that of others by using such emphatic pronouns. This is especially evident in Matthew's Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount) where Jesus teaches, "You have heard that it was said . . . but I say unto you" (egō legō humin; see Mt 5:22, 28, 32, 34, 39, 44 etc.). This speech form underscores Jesus' unique mission and is echoed throughout the Gospels ("all things have been given to me by my father," Lk 10:22).

There are, however, a number of Synoptic texts which may betray a more specialized meaning. In Mark 6:45-50 during the storm Jesus identifies himself saying "egō eimi" ("It is I") while trying to "pass by them." This parallels the theophanies given to Moses* on Mt Sinai (Ex 33 LXX) and Elijah (1 Kings 19) where the Lord passes by (paralambanō) and the divine name is revealed. Is Jesus using egō eimi simply to identify himself, or is he too revealing a divine name? The same question pertains to Mark 13:6 when Jesus warns about a future age when many will come in his name saying "egō eimi. " During Jesus' trial (Mk 14:62; see Trial of Jesus), when the priest* asks if Jesus is the Christ* he answers "egō eimi. " And in Luke 24:39 the resurrected (see Resurrection) Christ identifies himself: "See my hands and my feet it is I (egō eimi)." Are these innocent expressions of self-disclosure, or are they trying to convey something more profound?

2. The Fourth Gospel.

The repeated use of egō (134 times) and the highly specialized use of egō eimi in the Fourth Gospel shows that these terms carried a unique importance in Johannine theology (see John, Gospel of). John's use of "I Am" may be organized in the following way.

2.1. Common Identification. This use is common in John in answer to the question "Who are you?" or "What are you?" In John 1:20 the Baptist (see John the Baptist) says, "I am not the Christ." In John 18:35 Pilate asks, "Am I a Jew?" This use is evidenced throughout the Gospel and bears no theological importance.

2.2. An Explicit Predicate. In seven passages John records the well-known "I Am" sayings where Jesus describes himself using a graphic metaphor: "I am the bread* of life*" (6:35, 41, 48, 51); "I am the light* of the world" (8:12; 9:5); "I am the door of the sheep" (10:7,9); "I am the good shepherd*" (10:11,14); "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25); "I am the way, the truth, and the life" (14:6); and "I am the true vine*" (15:1, 5).

These texts are often accompanied by discourses in John and serve to contrast Jesus with the Judaism* he is fulfilling. Hence, "I am the good shepherd" means that other shepherds are unnecessary and untrustworthy. These paragraphs in John serve in a way similar to the Synoptic parables* of the kingdom ("the kingdom of God is like . . ."; see Kingdom of God) where concrete images fill out the meaning of Jesus' announcement 2.3. An Uncertain Predicate. More difficult are passages where Jesus says "I Am" and we are left uncertain if we are to supply a predicate or if the phrase is being used for self-identification. For example, in John 6:20 the frightened disciples* are comforted when Jesus says, "egō eimi, do not be afraid." He may mean, "It is I" (so Barrett, who compares it with Jn 9:9). On the other hand, it may be describing a divine theophany (much like Mk 6:45-50) with some sort of divine name at its center. The same problem arises in John 18:5 during Jesus' arrest. When the soldiers announce that they are seeking Jesus of Nazareth, Jesus responds by saying "egō eimi." Again, this may mean "I am (the one whom you seek)." But John takes it a step further. John 18:6 reports, "When he said to them, 'egō eimi,' they drew back and fell to the ground." The mere uttering of this name creates a powerful revelation which leaves the arresting party prostrate before God.*

2.4. An Absolute Use. There are at least four texts where the use of egō eimi seems incomplete and the words have assumed the form of a title: John 8:24, "For you will die in your sins unless you believe that I am"; John 8:28, "When you have lifted up the Son of man, then you will know that I am"; John 8:58, "Truly, Truly I say to you, before Abraham* was I am"; John 13:19, "I tell you this now—so that when it does take place you may believe that I am." In each case the verse seems truncated. In 8:58 before Abraham what was Jesus? The text gives no predicate. But as we shall see, John no doubt wishes for us to recall the sacred divine name unveiled in the OT and well known in Rabbinic Judaism (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings).

3. Background.

Scholars have been divided in their explanation of this phenomenon. Many would deny a consistent theological theme running throughout John, while still others believe that John is echoing religious titles from other sources. The solution to the riddle is also tied up with the cultural milieu which we deem primary to the background of the gospel.

3.1. Non-Jewish Sources. Egō eimi enjoyed a widespread use among the religions of the ancient Near East Parallels have been found in the magic formulas of Isis, the opening tract of the Hermetica (Poiman-dres) and Mandaean texts (see Bultmann, 225 note 3; Barrett, 291-93). In each case, however, it seems clear that either the predicate is supplied ("I am Poiman-dres," Corp. Herrn. 1.2; "I am Isis," Ios inscription) or the form is used for self-identification ("I am the one who . . ."). But in no case have parallels been found to the Johannine absolute use in which $\varepsilon \gamma \mu \omicron$ virtually becomes a title.

3.2. The OT. The Septuagint shows abundant examples of the $\varepsilon \gamma \mu \omicron \varepsilon \mu \omicron$ with predicates (Gen 28:13; Ex 15:26; Ps 35:3). This is the form of God's self-disclosure when he employs a metaphor to depict himself: "The Lord appeared to Abraham and said ... 'I am El Shaddai [God all-powerful]' " (Gen 17:1). Frequently, God affirms his exclusive relationship to Israel saying, "I am the Lord and there is no other" (Is 45:18; Hos 13:4).

The most important use is found in Exodus 3. In Exodus 3:6 God introduces himself to Moses on Mt Sinai saying, "I am the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob." Feeling that this is insufficient, Moses inquires further about God's name (Ex 3:13-14), to which God responds, "I am who I am." This becomes the truly personal name of God in Israel's faith. YHWH (the Hebrew consonants, used throughout the OT for the Divine Name) originated with the Hebrew verb "to be" and thus the LXX translated Exodus 3:14 $\varepsilon \gamma \mu \omicron \varepsilon \mu \omicron \varphi \omicron \omicron$ ("I am the one who is"). This became the covenant name of God and was used on its own as a title (Deut 32:39). This is especially true in Isaiah where the Greek text makes $\varepsilon \gamma \mu \omicron \varepsilon \mu \omicron$ a consistent title for God, "I am, I am he who blots out your sins" (Is 43:25; cf. 51:12; 52:6).

3.3. Palestinian Judaism. The Septuagint is not the only source which shows a unique interest in the "I am" as a code name for Yahweh; the same appears to be true of post-biblical Judaism. 1 Enoch (108:12), Jubilees (24:22) and even Philo (commentary on Exodus 3:14) all show a marked interest in the name. This flourished especially in the apocalyptic* literature and thus we find it used even in the Christian apocalypse (Rev 1:17).

4. The "I AM" in Johannine Christology.

John employs the $\varepsilon \gamma \mu \omicron \varepsilon \mu \omicron$ in order to echo this extensive OT background. Jesus has come to unveil the Father's name for all the world. He comes in the name of the Father (5:43; 12:13) and does all of his works in his Father's name (10:25). In 17:6 and 17:26 Jesus sums up the nature of his mission in a prayer* to the Father, "I have manifested your name to those whom you gave me out of the world." Keeping the disciples in "the name of the Father" is similarly important (17:11-12). Just as in the OT, the revelation of Yahweh always includes the disclosure of his covenant name. Jesus is carrying on this historic pattern.
John also employs this divine name to show his severe critique of Judaism and its obsolete rituals (see Anti-Semitism). Jesus becomes in his person the focus of religious desire. He is bread, water,* light,* truth* and life.* In many cases Jesus can be found standing in the midst of a religious festival (Jn 6—8, 10; see Feasts) or personal crisis (Jn 11, 14) directing spiritual longing and need to himself. This is appropriate and justified since John is trying to make a larger theological claim about Jesus: The Son is not simply representing the Father here but in some fashion is bearing the Father's presence to the world (see Son of God).

This is the remarkable new step taken by the Fourth Gospel. Jesus is the Lord incarnate, and thus he himself bears this divine name. He is not simply a courier of revelation like Moses. He is revelation. Jesus' own name has power and significance (1:12; 2:23; 3:18; 14:26), and thus prayer uttered in his name will witness results (14:13; 15:16; 16:23-24, 26). But the power of prayer in Jesus' name resides in the fact that, as 14:13 shows, the Father himself is being glorified through Jesus. In fact, it is the Father himself who is present in Jesus. Thus, in the immediately preceding section (14:8-11) Philip is told that he sees the Father when he looks at Jesus. The Father and the Son share an intimate reciprocity and to glorify one is to glorify the other (see Glory).

The principal theological contribution of the "I am" sayings is therefore christological. It buttresses Jesus' divine status by showing that he can work, speak and act in the Father's stead. He is no mere human. He is the Word (see Logos) of God dwelling in human flesh. But as such, he is also the Father's emissary— and more—and the "I am" title he bears is simply one more of his many credentials.

This christological development linking the Father to Jesus is not unusual in the Fourth Gospel. For example, in John 5 when Jesus is accused of violating the Sabbath,* his defense turns on his connection with the Father. Since the Father works on the Sabbath giving life, so must the Son (5:19-24). Jesus' works are justified not because some day the Father will vindicate them, but because Jesus is doing the Father's work directly; and any perceptive observer should recognize this. Thus, to dishonor the Son in this situation is to offend the Father as well.

In the many "I am" sayings Jesus is publicly applying the divine name of God —and God's authoritative presence—to himself. No prophet* or priest in Israeliite history would ever have done this. For Judaism it is the most severe christological affirmation of all, leading audiences in the Gospel either to believe in Jesus or accuse him of blasphemy.*

See also Authority and Power: John Gospel of.

G. M. Bürge

IMPURITY. See Clean and Unclean; Sinner.

INFANCY NARRATIVES. See Birth of Jesus.

ISRAEL

The presence of the name "Israel" in the Gospels reminds us that Jesus lived among the people of the God* of the OT Scriptures, that these same people played an important role in the unfolding history of salvation,* and that Christ's saving work continues to possess particular relevance for them.

1. Introduction
2. Israel in the Gospels
3. Jesus and Israel
1. Introduction.

The name Israel (Gk Israēl) occurs only thirty times in the four Gospels, and in no less than a third of these cases as part of another common expression, like "God of Israel" or "king of Israel." But the scarcity of the term itself is a little misleading, for the idea of Israel permeates the Gospels and comes through strongly in terms such as Jew (Ioudaios), Hebrew (Hebraikos), people (laos) and Israelite (Israēlītēs). A score of other terms and ideas (such as "feast" and "Pharisee") similarly reveal the tremendous debt of the Gospels to the concept of Israel.

For Jews of the first century the name Israel probably carried with it one or more of three basic associated ideas, all of which stemmed from their historical and religious consciousness: (1) reference to the election of Jacob (called Israel) and his progeny; (2) ongoing faithfulness to the divine covenants (notably circumcision); and (3) the theocratic ideal of Israel as it emerged in the people's history, particularly in the Davidic Golden Age. Such religious and historical associations would be largely foreign to Gentiles.* Hence the rule in the ancient world that Israel was primarily a Jewish self-designation, while Jews was the name more familiar to Gentiles. In the mouth of Gentiles the term Jews frequently carried a deprecatory tone, although it was used in a positive, nationalistic sense by Israelites. In fact, the latter group may have opted for this name, since out of an apparent respect for the term there seems to have been a reticence among the Jewish people to employ Israel too freely. Israel seems to have been reserved as a term of self-dignity, religious privilege or purity of the people, or to refer to biblical Israel.

There is no evidence up to this time that Israel had ever been used to define a geographic entity, even though a strong national and geographical constitution appears to have existed earlier on in biblical history. When the Gospels were written the people Israel was neither independent politically nor well-defined geographically, so the idea of a state of Israel was presendy non-existent, although it had a part in certain future hopes of the people. For the time, however, the capital, Jerusalem, and in particular the Temple,* functioned as a unifying focal point. So the use of the term implied nearness to the capital and cultic center. In other words, those Jews living near Jerusalem were more commonly referred to as Israel, and in this way the term retained a certain geopolitical nuance, although this could not have been the chief sense of the word. It was primarily a socio-religious term, a self-designation of God's people.
When we come to the Gospels we see that the term likewise preserves a geopolitical nuance in some passages (Mk 15:32; Mt 2:20-21; 9:33; 10:23; Lk 4:25; 7:9; Jn 1:49; 12:13). Even these texts demonstrate, however, that the reference is primarily social (i.e., refers to a people: Lk 1:80; 2:25, 32,34; 24:21; Jn 1:31; 3:10; cf. "sons of Israel," Mt 27:9; Lk 1:16; "God of Israel," Mt 15:31; Lk 1:68; "house of Israel," Mt 10:6; 15:24; "twelve tribes of Israel," Mt 19:28 par. Lk 22:30).

And yet the term is never simply ethnic. Israel is also a religious term. It frequently denotes a people with a particular religious identity. This religious element often takes on a negative content in the Gospels, associated with the rejection by Israel of the one sent to Israel. Yet in spite of this fact, the one consistent feature of the usage of the word in the Gospels—in continuity with its use in the Jewish world generally—is that it retains its dignity. It continues to imply privilege associated with covenant, election and theocratic ideals. This is true even in a passage like Matthew 8:10 and its parallel Luke 7:9, where the surprise shown by Jesus (expressed in the word οὐδεν/οὐδε, "not even") nevertheless implies a special dignity for Israel. Nor do the Gospels deviate from the traditional significance of the term as referring to the descendants of Abraham* (through Jacob). Never, for example, is the term used either of the church* or of Gentiles. While Paul can distinguish between an ethnic and a spiritual Israel (Rom 9:6), the Gospels avoid the use of the term in anything but its traditional sense (granting, however, that Pauline-type ideas may be differently expressed).

It is clear, however, that our concern goes far beyond the usage of the term, for a whole theology of Israel can be found in the Gospels. The interpretation of this theology has seen important changes throughout its history. Among the earliest Christian exegetes the Israel of the Gospels received little attention and even less sympathy. Even up to modern times the Gospels have commonly been thought to pronounce the rejection of Israel in favor of a New Israel—namely, a church consisting predominantly of Gentiles which superseded the Old Israel of the Law.* This view eventually gave way to another which recognized that it was not all of Israel which was rejected, for from that nation came a small remnant who formed the nucleus of the "True Israel." Sometimes the idea of a True Israel is used to refer to believing Jews, sometimes to Jewish and Gentile believers together, sometimes to believing Jews with a believing Gentile "addition." Simply expressed, the term "New Israel" implies some continuity with the idea of Israel, but a whole different people is intended; "True Israel," on the other hand, implies a new set of criteria for membership in the people of God (cf. "spiritual" Israel with Israel "according to the flesh," kata sarka, Rom 2:28-29; 9:3). In either case these terms by themselves might imply that the significance of the historic nation Israel in the divine economy has come to an abrupt and decisive end. It should be noted that the tenu "True Israel," like "New Israel," is not found in the Gospels.

Interest in the place of Israel in the Gospels has, until lately, chiefly been that of the redaction critics. The perspective of many of these scholars is that while the Gospels do in fan portray the rejection of Israel, this notion largely emerged during the later debate between church and synagogue* rather than in the ministry of Jesus. (With this view the form critics [see Form Criticism] would largely agree, with the exception that they place the same developments earlier on in the stages of oral transmission, rather than with the Evangelists as such.)

The most recent approaches to the question of Israel, however, have come from another discipline, that of historical-Jesus research (see Historical Jesus). These new contributions have served to place Israel not at the perimeter as earlier, but in the very center of Gospel studies. By viewing Jesus as a Jewish restorationist preacher, they have also served to accentuate the rift already discerned by redaction criticism (see Redaction Criticism), between the historical ministry of Jesus and the portrayal of him in the Gospels. In attempting to answer the question of Israel and its salvation, we will first consider the redaction critics' findings in the Gospels before moving on to the larger question of Israel in Jesus research.

2. Israel in the Gospels.

The view that the negative attitude toward Israel in the Gospels originates in the synagogue/church debate rather than in the ministry of Jesus itself takes its cue from passages like the parable* of the tenants (Mk 12:1-2 par. Mt 21:33-46 and Lk 20:9-19), which ends with the moral that the owner of the vineyard will "give the vineyard to others" (seemingly indicating a transferral of the kingdom [see Kingdom of God] from Israel to the Gentiles). This parable is felt to depend upon a highly developed christology (cf. the important place of the son and his death in the parable), a christology which could only have originated long after the ministry of Jesus and presumably, therefore, amidst the conflict between Christianity and Judaism.
But while it may seem quite a straightforward matter to discard such pericopes as later Christian expansions of the ministry of Jesus, it is nevertheless much more difficult to eliminate the still large accumulation of sayings and oracles against Israel which remain after this process. For example, the judgment* of Israel motif is present in a large proportion of the Gospel material. The "killing of the prophets" theme (a theme, incidentally, which has been thought to explain and authenticate Jesus' own use of the parable of the tenants) is also present in every layer of the Gospel tradition, including the so-called triple tradition (see Synoptic Problem), Mark and Q* (cf. Mt 8:11-12 par. Lk 13:28-29). Can all of this tradition be relegated to the Evangelists and their communities? This would appear to be the view of some extreme redaction critics.

2.1. Mark. While redaction critics have paid most attention to Israel's place in the other Gospels, Mark has not been ignored in this respect The findings of Markan studies are summarized by the Jewish scholar S. Sandmel in his study of anti-Semitism* in the Gospels. Like the other Gospels, large sections of Mark develop the central plot of Jewish conspiracy against Jesus. In the process the members of Israel are portrayed as extremely stubborn and imperceptive. Even the Jewish disciples in Mark are imperceptive, an observation first given significance by W. Wrede, the father of modern Markan redaction criticism. Only a Gentile centurion clearly understands who Jesus is (15:39; cf. 8:33). Some feel that this reflects an attack by Gentile or Galilean Christianity on the establishment in Jerusalem, or on Judaizers such as Paul confronted in his ministry, while others hold that it represents a categorical rejection of all of Judaism. Some scholars find evidence for the view that Mark therefore envisages God's decisive rejection of Israel: Israel is undeserving of salvation.

But it should be noted that it is never explicitly stated in Mark's Gospel that Israel as a people is rejected. The so-called conspiracy plot as in the other Gospels, is essential to understanding the rejection of Jesus, explaining his death and accentuating the graciousness of God in sending Jesus to die for the "many" (10:45). Furthermore, this rejection by his own people serves as one more form of opposition, along with sickness (see Healing) and demonic oppression (see Demon, Devil, Satan), over which Jesus is seen to triumph. Thus Mark has a theological-historical interest in this dramatic progression. Rather than portraying the rejection of Israel, Mark's Gospel contrasts God's saving initiative with the undeserved-ness, not only of Israel, but of those imperceptive Jewish disciples who will prove to be far from rejected If Mark is guilty of theologizing in his Gospel, it is by presenting the received tradition in light of the saving event of the cross; it is not with a feeling of hostility toward Israel that he does so—such a judgment is a quite subjective one placed on Mark and on his community.

2.2. Matthew. The question of Israel in this Gospel and its sources is considerably more involved (see Matthew, Gospel of). While the Gospel is Pharisaic in tone, it is also highly critical of that group. Although Jesus restricts his ministry to Israel in Matthew (10:6; 15:24), according to some scholars the Gospel leads naturally and progressively to the conclusion that the Gentile mission is all that remains for its readers (cf. 28:19)—Israel is rejected and there is no future for the nation. Others see a carefully constructed salvation history at work here: Whereas Mark merely characterizes Israel as reprobate and undeserving, Matthew speaks of the transfer of salvation to the Gentiles, something deliberately orchestrated and commanded by Christ* Matthew adjusts the wording of texts like Mark 3:7-12 (par. Mt 12:15-21) to highlight this transfer. He always emphasizes controversy and conflict In this Gospel the blame for Jesus' death (see Death of Jesus) is consciously assumed by an Israel who invokes upon their race the ensuing punishment for this act (27:25, referring to A.D. 70, according to some).

W. Trilling considered such things evidence that Matthew envisaged a "True Israel" which displaced ethnic Israel, and that the Gospel came from a time when Jews and Christians were decisively split (A.D. 70-135). D. R A Hare, who studied Jewish persecution of Christians in this Gospel, concluded that while controversy was doubtless a part of Jesus' ministry, Matthew's situation was largely responsible for this element in his Gospel. The abundant references to Pharisees* (Matthew even seems to insert them into his sources) reflects a late date when that group was prominent Matthew envisaged not a "New" or "True" Israel, but a "Third Race" of Christians altogether. S. H. Brooks has recently added complexity to the debate by suggesting that there is evidence of several layers of material in Matthew, ranging from times of peaceful relations between the Christian community and Judaism to times of hostile opposition.

In spite of all the relevant observations made above, much of the same rationale for including the Jesus-Israel debate applies for Matthew as well as for Mark. There is no compelling reason to doubt that the struggles witnessed in Matthew were struggles within Judaism and reflect the kind of interaction with his people that Jesus experienced during his ministry. A true respect for Judaism is evidenced in the Gospel, where Jesus' teaching is rooted in and emulates Jewish teaching, making Matthew the most Jewish of the Gospels. While a few have interpreted the presence of extensive teaching material (the Sermon on the Mount in chapters 5—7 [see Sermon on the Mount]) as a competing legal system in contrast to, and in defiance of, the Law of Israel—a Christian system supplanting the Jewish one—this is only one way of interpreting the teaching material, and clearly a minority point of view.

As for the Pharisees, the little we know about this party suggests that their history extended over a much earlier period, hardly making it a controlling factor in the dating of Matthew's final redaction—a point which lately has been made by several scholars. Pharisees appear in every Gospel, if not as frequently as in Matthew. The invective against the scribes* and Pharisees may represent nothing more than a focusing of blame on establishment-Judaism as Matthew knew it. More likely it reflects Matthew's characterization of Jesus' historical opponents (something we also find in John) since it was widely known that the Pharisees were notorious in their resistance to Jesus. This characterization may give us a clue to the relative dating of the Gospels but says little about their situation of writing. The theme of Israel's obduracy was taken up by Paul as early as A.D. 57 (Rom 9—11) and does not necessarily presuppose later synagogue/church debate. As with Mark, nothing explicit is found regarding the rejection of Israel.

2.3. Luke. Luke's Gospel is of special interest because of the author's apparent concern with salvation history—God's working among Jews and Gentiles (see Luke, Gospel of). H. Conzelmann stressed the discontinuity between Israel and the church created by this salvation history and postulated that Luke envisaged a New Israel. But in this Gospel the continuity between Israel and Jesus' movement is also obvious. The latter appears as the valid fulfillment of the former. Many scholars therefore feel that the church of Luke is depicted as the "True Israel."

But others deny that any sense of continuity is intended, or else that this continuity is meant to dignify Israel in any way. What takes place in Luke's view is a gradual shifting of God's people from Jews to Gentiles (cf. the prominent location of 4:16-30, along with the story line of the companion volume Acts, the Stephen episode in Acts 7 and the conclusion of Acts at 28:23-28). R. Maddox and J. T. Sanders are the most recent exponents of this view. The church is a New Israel, and the break with the Old Israel is complete. As a sign of this Luke appears to transfer the term "people" (laos, a term for Israel) to the church (a view held earlier by Conzelmann). This Gospel has the entire Jewish populace united in condemning Jesus to death (23:2-5, 13-23).

It should be noted, however, that this latter passage may only reflect the perspective of Luke's source. Some feel that the Q source is itself responsible for Luke's negative view of Israel. Indeed Luke's special source (L*), or Luke himself, emphasizes the dignity and hope of Israel (1:80; 2:25, 32, 34; 24:21).

The idea that the fate of Israel comes to rest either in a New Israel or a True Israel is clearly an interpretation placed upon Luke. There is no need to adopt either view. Luke's interest was largely historical and apologetic. The common question of theodicy: "Why did so few from Israel respond to the Gospel?" is also dealt with by Paul in Rom 9—11 (cf. Rom 9:6, 19-20, 30; 11:1). According to Luke many in Israel did believe. We should therefore probably follow scholars like J. Jervell who see Israel divided by the ministry of Jesus, some coming to repentance, others not. But Israel never transfers its name or status to Gentiles.

2.4. John. John's Gospel is notorious for its frequent (but strangely not consistent) derogatory usage of the term "the Jews" to speak of Jesus' adversaries. Long digressions on the unbelief of the Jews and Jesus' conflict with them appear in John 5—9. The Jews as a group are treated as resisters (5:10, 15, 18; 8:48, 52, 57; 10:24, 31). In their recalcitrance they even disown the universal Jewish confession of God as king (19:12-15). This categorical distrust of the Jews is widely felt to reflect a much later situation in the life of the church when excommunication from the synagogue for confessing Christians was officially sanctioned (cf. 9:22), a view widely made known by J. L. Martyn's study of the relevant chapters and of the life setting of John's Gospel. By all appearances John's Gospel is no longer aware of the diversity of parties within early first-century Judaism.* They are all lumped together as one group: "the Jews." Jews appear to the readers of this Gospel as outsiders (e.g., "your Law," 10:34).

But Jews also believe (11:45). And they are at times divided (10:19-21). Israel always remains a positive term (1:31, 47), and singular respect for Judaism is evinced (4:22). Other uses of "the Jews" are neutral (e.g., 11:19; 18:20). The usage of "the Jews" seems therefore to demonstrate what has been described as a sense of remoteness rather than hatred. Considering the growing recognition among scholars of the Jewish background of the Fourth Gospel (see John, Gospel of), this remoteness is somewhat baffling. Perhaps the writer was a Jew, but he was writing for non-Jews. The important point is that this remoteness is also expressed in passages where Jews believe. This precludes the notion that Jews are recalcitrant because they are Jews.

While some feel that it is only the authorities who are singled out for criticism in the Gospel, the critique appears to be more widespread than that. The message seems to be that the structure of the religion of Judaism, as it was interpreted in contemporary Israel, had departed from the way of Israel historically, and this departure was reflected in the attitudes of many Jews (cf. 2:18-20). There are strong indications in the Fourth Gospel of the underlying doctrine of the remnant (cf. 10:1-18; 11:45; see 3.1. below).

2.5. Conclusions about Israel in the Gospels. Some of the tendencies noted by scholars in the individual Gospels may be significant, but these tendencies have been exaggerated. The teaching which is so often attributed to the developing tradition has a claim to go back to Jesus himself (see discussion below). The characterizations ("the Jews," "the scribes and Pharisees") often refer to a certain part of Israel which typically rejected Jesus, but the term Israel is never used for this group. While there are no clear statements that Israel is forever rejected by God, there nonetheless emerges through the Gospels the impression that, by the time of the Gospel writers at least, Israel had surprisingly little representation among the followers of Jesus. This needed to be explained from the events of Jesus' ministry, and the Gospels sought to fill this need. However, the theological, historical and soteriological motive—the need to explain how God brought salvation through rejection—was certainly still the dominating factor in the Gospel presentations.

3. Jesus and Israel.

3.1. Background for Jesus' Ministry to Israel. The most recent development in the study of Israel in the Gospels has come from the area of historical-Jesus research (see Historical Jesus). Older historically negative quests for the Jesus of history, like that of R Bultmann, which divorced Jesus from his Jewish environment, have been abandoned in favor of a new Jewish Quest, or Third Quest, which attempts to place Jesus properly within his Jewish environment. This approach has been adopted by an impressive array of scholars both Jewish and Christian (among them: G. Vermes, B. F. Meyer, A. E. Harvey, J. Riches, G. Lohfink, E. P. Sanders and J. H. Charlesworth). Some adherents of this new school of Jesus research hold that the major presupposition for Jesus' ministry was the widespread eschatological doctrine of the restoration of Israel, and that Jesus both addressed this concern and understood his ministry in the light of the G. Lohfink is a good example of the newly emerging restorationist perspective. He points to Jesus' deliberate choice of twelve disciples and to the significance of the miracles as evidence that Jesus intended from the beginning of his ministry to restore the nation. When his preaching failed to appeal to Israel, Jesus began to see that Israel's salvation would now only come through his own meritorious death which would result in the salvation of the "many" (Mk 10:45).

But none has been more thorough in his presentation of Jesus as an eschatological restorationist preacher than E. P. Sanders. Sanders maintains that in common with the rest of Judaism, Jesus assumed the salvation of all Israel. Jesus' preaching was in anticipation of the final restoration of Israel. This can be seen in the way Jesus predicted the destruction of the Temple (see Temple Cleansing) so that it could be replaced with the new eschatological Temple. In addition, the kingdom Jesus preached referred to the hope of a restored nation. Jesus' task, specifically, was gathering the sinners* and outcasts of Israel so as to assure that all Israel would be included in this blessing.

Where such a position is adopted, it could easily lead to the view that the restoration which Jesus envisaged was a failure, for Israel turned away from him and the promised gathering of Israel did not take place. The view of restoration as the salvation of all Israel and the return of the dispersed Jews does not seem to match the results of Jesus' ministry. What can be said about Jesus as a preacher of Israel's restoration, especially when the Gospels provide such clear evidence that this restoration was a failure? Are we forced to accept the pathos and tragedy of A Schweitzer's Jesus whose goals, even at the cost of death, were scarcely acquired?

The attempt to place Jesus within Judaism is a welcome trend. But restorationism was not so prevalent a movement in Judaism as the scholars of the Jewish Quest seem to maintain, at least in the way assumed by them. We can point to many groups in Judaism who indeed looked forward to restoration in the future but also maintained that only a faithful remnant would be saved in the present.

The doctrine of the remnant consists in the idea that many, perhaps most, of Israel has abandoned the covenant in such a way as to place themselves outside salvation and in danger of judgment.* Such doctrines could be cultivated in Judaism because Israel was not a unified community at this time. It was severely divided within itself. As a result of so much intra-Jewish conflict, divisions between ethnic and religious Israel were drawn, each party claiming to be the remnant. We see the beginnings of the doctrine of segregation within Israel in Sirach (cf. 8:17; 9:16; 11:9; 12:14; 13:1, 17-18; 22:13). 1 Maccabees implies throughout that God's retribution against sinful Israel finally outweighs his concern for their election, for they have broken the covenant (1:43, 52-53; 9:23-25; 10:14). There is a clear distinction between the faithful and the apostates, and the righteous are in the minority (1:62-63; 3:15-19; 9:5-6). The rest are judged in the unfolding history (1:63-64). The apocalyptic* writings and those of Qumran (set Dead Sea Scrolls) take this development further and speak clearly of a remnant of the faithful, or righteous (see Justice, Righteousness), in Israel (1 Enoch 10:16; 83:8; 94:4; 99:10; Pss. Sol. 12:6; 4 Ezra 7:50-61; 8:2-3; 2 Apoc. Bar. 48:33; 77:2-6; CD 1:4-5; 2:11-12; 3:19-20; 1QM 13:8; 14:8-9; 1QH 6:7-8; 4Q181) and of the judgment of the remainder of Israel (1 Enoch 5:6-9; 80:2-8; 81:7-9; 90:26-27; Jub. 15:34; Pss. Sol. 8:15-20; 12:6; 13:5-10; 4 Ezra 9:8-12; 2 Apoc. Bar. 24:1-25:2; CD 1:34; 1QS 4:11-14), for many in Israel, along with their leaders, have effectively broken the covenant (1 Enoch 94:2-5; 101:1-9; Jub. 23:19; 4 Ezra 7:22-24; 2 Apoc. Bar. 41:3; CD 1:12-2:1; 1QH 15:18-21; often they are implicated in the sin of the world, e.g., 4 Ezra 8:14-18). Accordingly, ideas of national election are questioned or played down (cf. 4 Ezra 3:11-17, 36). Occasionally the community of the remnant appears to take the name Israel for itself (1 Macc 1:53; 7:9, 22; 9:27, 51; Pss. Sol. 10:6; 1QS 5:22; 8:4, CD(B) 2:26; IQSa 1:6; 1QM 10:9, lQpNah 3:2-3), although as a rule the term still refers to the nation.

In spite of their sometimes-harsh remnant theology, these works also manifest a definite respect for the promises to Israel and a hope for the eventual restoration of all Israel (1 Enoch 90:30-36; Jub. 23:27-32; Pss. Sol. 8:28; 17:26-46; 4 Ezra 4:26-35; 6:26b-28; 13:12-13, 3947; 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:3-30:3; CD 2:11-12). This restoration frequently includes the Gentiles (e.g., 1 Enoch 10:17, 21-22; 90:33), but the remnant is consistently at the center of this restoration. Israel is not restored except by joining the remnant (cf. e.g., / Enoch 90:30).

We can see therefore that a background had already been established for the kind of intra-Jewish strife recorded in the Gospels. Sociologically speaking, the most bitter battles are fought among siblings, especially when, as in the Jewish world of this time, the claims on God and salvation are mutually exclusive. It is notable that within one sectarian dispute one side was forced to adopt a negative view of the name "Judah" (cf. "Jew" in CD 4:3, 11; 8:3), suggesting a certain group which the author's community felt had corrupted the true faith* of Israel.

3.2. Jesus and the Remnant of Israel. As scholars like B. F. Meyer have insisted, the remnant theme is undeniably present in the Gospels. While it is conceivable that the Evangelists have written their contemporary controversies between church and synagogue back into their Gospels, it is difficult to remove altogether from the tradition signs that Jesus faced controversy over Israel's salvation in his day and offered comments of the type which we now find in our Gospels. Specifically, Jesus' association with John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) reveals that he shared the warnings about the coming judgment upon Israel. It appears that Jesus not only warned about judgment but pronounced it (cf. Mt 11:20-24 par. Lk 10:12-15). His parables and the secrecy theme demonstrate that he shared the current practice of sheltering truth designed for the righteous from those who would misunderstand and abuse it. Sayings like that concerning Jesus' mother and brothers (an undeniably authentic tradition; Mk 3:31-35 par. Mt 12:46-50 and Lk 8:19-21) demonstrate that Jesus set his own criteria for membership in the covenant people of God. That Jesus often alluded to a "seed" in his parables may also mean that he shared the dualism of the sectarian groups who distinguished between the righteous and the unrighteous "seed" in Israel. Such a use of the concept of good and evil seed is well documented in Jewish literature (1 Enoch 80:2; Jub. 7:29; 16:26; 22:13, 27; 31:20; 4 Ezra 4:28-32; 2 Apoc. Bar. 42:4-5; CD 2:11-12). The choice of the Twelve (see Disciple) who eventually assumed their role as apostles* to Israel seems also to point in this direction, although there may be something to the view that Twelve pointed more to Israel's restoration than to its reduction to a remnant. The Twelve clearly did not compose the remnant They were just a few of the wider circle of repentant (see Repentance) in Israel who had committed themselves to John's baptism* and to Jesus' own preaching of the kingdom. Response to the presence of this kingdom was doubtless the criterion by which these were saved and others were not

This brings us to one of the chief objections to the idea that Jesus called a remnant. J. Jeremias strongly influenced the view that while many groups in Judaism considered themselves to be the chosen remnant, this was far too particularist a doctrine for the liberal-minded Jesus who preached against all forms of strict Judaism. Meyer responded that Jesus could have created an "open remnant," a remnant which did not establish social boundaries and was never clearly defined. All of this discussion, however, takes us away from historical questions to dogmatic ones. The fact remains that Jesus' group from the beginning was particularistic inasmuch as Jesus required faith and response to God's message preached by him. While Jesus' remnant did not possess a legalistic base, it did have an implicit christological one. (In a sense, then, this particularism was an anti-particularism, or a particularism not based on legal requirements.) As for Meyer's view of the "open remnant," it requires that we deny any intentions by Jesus to foster community interaction—something which seems doubtful indeed (cf. e.g., Mt 18).

Then there is the persistent question whether Jesus intended, called or gathered a remnant, or whether this remnant was the unintended result of his divisive mission. It appears that there was nothing unintentional about Jesus' remnant ideas, providing we recognize the theological framework in which the idea of intention was operating. For human intention was considered subservient to divine determination in Jesus' day, and no one more than Jesus was aware of the inevitability of the working of God's word in Israel. In short, if the word of God created a remnant in Israel's past, it must be considered inevitable that such a remnant would be created by God's word to Israel through Jesus today. Such an idea would conform to the way Scripture so often appears to have molded Jesus' self-consciousness in the Gospels. It appears, therefore, not only that Jesus expected a remnant, but that he cooperated with its formation by intending, gathering and calling.

If Jesus possessed a remnant theology, what exactly did he have in mind? Was there to emerge a True Israel? Or a New Israel? A common view is that while Israel was denied salvation as an institution, individuals out of the nation might still be saved. But this is not the Jewish view of the remnant as seen in the OT or in the Judaism of Jesus' day. The remnant always relates back to Israel. There is implied in this doctrine an accountability or responsibility to Israel; the ties are not broken altogether. Through this remnant Israel is affirmed. There is certainly no New Israel, and the idea of a True Israel might falsely signify independence from ethnic Israel—a view not generally encouraged by Judaism.

3.3. Jesus and the Destiny of Israel. But what can we say about Jesus? Did he possess any hope for the restoration of Israel kata sarka ("according to the flesh")? Or did his view of the remnant of Israel override, or perhaps extinguish altogether, the hope for restoration? It is apparent that Paul still held the two ideas in tension in Rom 9—11. But a systematic statement such as we find there does not exist in the Gospels. In fact, there is no explicit statement to the effect that Jesus expected, either then or in the future, a restoration of Israel. Many scholars therefore argue that there is no doctrine of restoration in the Gospels. And it is difficult to disagree with this conclusion.

However, some things might be considered as less direct evidence of the restoration of Israel before the idea is dismissed out of hand. We have already mentioned the possibility that the Twelve points to the hope that Israel will be fully restored through Jesus' ministry, since twelve is manifestly the number of the tribes of Israel. And Sanders's view that the announcement of a kingdom must in its context imply restoration, also carries conviction. Then we have evidence like Matthew 23:39 (par. Lk 13:35) where Jesus announces to Jerusalem, "I tell you, you will not see me (again) until you say, 'Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord!'" Matthew, who places the saying after the Triumphant Entry, clearly implies the warm reception of the Son of man (see Son of Man) by Israel at some future date.

On any accounting the number of references to restoration in the Gospels is minimal. Can this be explained? Certainly if Jesus intended to restore Israel, all indications are that this was not expected immediately but in some indefinite future, and it was conditioned by the acceptance of his preaching—contra the view that Jesus was a restorationist (e.g., Sanders). In this case the most that can be said is that Jesus set in motion a (gradual?) restoration exemplified in his disciples. More likely, restoration was still a future hope. For the present, however, only a remnant would respond. In this way the judgment pronounced against Jesus' contemporaries can be taken seriously; restoration still remains valid only for those who accept the terms of salvation. In the Gospels the idea of the restoration of Israel is therefore overshadowed by the teaching about the remnant. For the relatively small group of Jesus' followers who found themselves in conflict with the rest of the Jewish world, this teaching would certainly have been the more urgent one.

Perhaps also by the time the Gospels were written, attention was turning from the hope for restoration to the influx of Gentiles into the kingdom. If Israel was not experiencing her restoration, Gentiles certainly were. In the Fourth Gospel unbelieving Jews are lumped together with the world; perhaps by analogy we can say that within the allusions to success in mission to the world, Israel herself is also to be included (cf. 17:21; 21:11). This would amount to a restoration which affects Israel as well as the Gentiles—something quite in harmony with the Jewish restoration belief.

If Jesus did teach the restoration of Israel, he probably also had some view of the role the Gentiles would play in this restoration. Both the Gospels and the Jewish background encourage this assumption. It is less clear whether Jesus intended to remove all distinctions between Jews and Gentiles, or to uphold the special privilege of Israel.

Thus the idea of a future for Israel which includes their salvation is not incongruous with the message of Jesus and may be implied in certain texts of the Gospels. Such a restoration would clearly involve the future (or possibly gradual) acceptance of the message of the kingdom by Israel based on Jesus' work on their behalf (cf. Mk 10:45).

See also Anti-Semitism; Church; Gentiles; John, Gospel of; Judaism; Law; Luke, Gospel of: Matthew, Gospel of; Sinner.

JAMES (SON OF ALPHAEUS). See DISCIPLES

JAMES (SON OF ZEBEDEE). See DISCIPLES

JERUSALEM. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY;
DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM TALMUD. See RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS.

JESUS IN NON-CHRISTIAN SOURCES

Traditions about Jesus appear in many literatures, Christian and non-Christian alike. The ancient non-Christian sources have value principally because they usually offer data from a non-Christian perspective, and in some instances either corroborate or clarify the Gospels.

1. Josephus
2. Roman Historians and Other Writers
3. Rabbinic Writings
4. The Qur'an

1. Josephus.

One of our most important first-century writers is Flavius Josephus* (c. A.D. 37-100). A survivor of Israel's catastrophic war with Rome (A.D. 66-70), Josephus went on to write an account of the conflict entitled the Jewish War (J.W.). He also wrote Jewish Antiquities (Ant.), an autobiography (Life), and a polemical treatise Against Apion (Ag. Ap.). These works were written in Greek, but were later translated into other languages, including Slavonic.
1.1. Greek. Twice in Jewish Antiquities Josephus refers to Jesus. "And so he [Ananus the High Priest, son of Annas; cf. Lk 3:2] convened the judges of the Sanhedrin and brought before them a man called James [cf. Acts 15:13], the brother of Jesus who was called the Christ [cf. Gal 1:19], and certain others. He accused them of having transgressed the law and delivered them up to be stoned" (20.9.1 §§200-203).

Whereas no one seriously doubts the authenticity of this passage, another passage, known as the "Testimonium Flavianum" (or "Flaviun"), is disputed: "About this time there lived Jesus, a wise man, if indeed one ought to call him a human. For he was one who wrought surprising feats and was a teacher of such people as accept the truth gladly. He won over many Jews and many of the Greeks. He was the Messiah. When Pilate, upon hearing him accused by people of the highest standing among us, had condemned him to be crucified, those who had in the first place come to love him did not give up their affection for him. On the third day he appeared to them restored to life, for the prophets of God had prophesied these and countless other marvelous things about him. And the tribe of Christians, so called after him, has still to this day not disappeared" (18.3.3 §§63-64). The authenticity of this passage is doubted because nowhere else does Josephus discuss Jesus, which would be very hard to explain if he believed him to be the Messiah. Moreover, Josephus regarded Vespasian as the Messiah of Judah (cf. J. W. 3.8.8-9 §§392-408), an interpretation probably based on Genesis 49:10, and one that cohered with the views of Tacitus (Hist. 5.13) and Suetonius (Vespasian 4) as well. Although some scholars view the Testimonium Flavianum in its entirety as a Christian interpolation, most regard it as a Christian embellishment of a passage that probably was originally critical of Jesus and his following. The fact that this passage was apparently unknown to most of the early fathers argues strongly for the inauthenticity of its present form. For had this form existed at the end of the first century, it is quite likely that Christian apologists would have cited it often. Although Eusebius (fourth century) knows of this passage (cf. Hist. Eccl. 1.11.7-8; Dem. Ev. 3.5), according to Origen (third century) Josephus did not regard Jesus as the Messiah (cf. Comm. Mt. 10.50.17; Contra Celsum 1.47). This suggests that the passage, as we now have it, did not exist in the third century. Moreover, the absence in the Arabic version of the very words and phrases suspected of being interpolations adds more support to the contention that the passage has been tampered with.

The Arabic version of the Testimonium Flavianum (taken from Agapius, Book of the Title) reads as follows: "Similarly Josephus the Hebrew. For he says in the treatises that he has written concerning ... the Jews: 'At this time there was a wise man who was called Jesus. And his conduct was good, and [he] was known to be virtuous. And many people from among the Jews and the other nations became his disciples. Pilate condemned him to be crucified and to die. And those who had become his disciples did not abandon his discipleship. They reported that he had appeared to them three days after his crucifixion and that he was alive; accordingly he was perhaps the Messiah concerning whom the prophets have recounted wonders' " (Pines, 16; Klausner, 55-56, restores the passage along similar lines). The Arabic version may very well preserve a form of the passage that is closer to the original than the one we now find in the Greek manuscripts, but it too is unlikely to represent Josephus' point of view.

It is the context of the Testimonium that argues against any positive, or even neutral, form of the passage. The Testimonium falls in the middle of Antiquities 18.2.2-4.3 §§35-95 (from the appointment of Caiaphas to the dismissal of Caiaphas and Pilate), a section that is highly negative and critical of Roman severity and insensitivity and of the foolish and reckless behavior of various Jewish groups in Palestine. It is much more likely that the original form of the passage described Jesus and his following as yet one more "disturbance" brought on by misguided messianic aspirations.

Nevertheless, the Testimonium Flavianum is not without significance. Even if the original form of the passage was negative, the fact that Josephus apparently viewed Jesus as a messianic claimant is suggestive. This may tell us something about the nature of Jesus' ministry, possibly something of his self-understanding, and something about the political factors that led to his arrest and crucifixion.

1.2. Slavonic. In the Slavonic (or Old Russian) version of Josephus' Jewish War there appear several passages that make reference to John the Baptist,* Jesus and early Christians (passages without parallel in the Greek MSS.). A lengthy passage describes Jesus as "more than a man," yet not "an angel," one who "wrought amazing and wonderful deeds" by his "word and command" (2.9.3, between §§ 174 and 175, according to the chapter divisions of the Greek tradition). The passage goes on to say that many urged him to lead an uprising against the Romans and that out of fear that such a thing might happen the Jewish leaders bribed Pilate to have Jesus executed.

Another passage (following 5.5.4 §214) tells of the torn Temple* curtain, various signs at the lime of Jesus' death* and the discovery of the empty tomb—despite the fact that it had been guarded by thirty Romans and a thousand Jews! Nevertheless, the author states that he is not sure which explanation is best: that Jesus was raised from the dead or that his friends had stolen his body.

Of interest is the passage (within 5.5.2 §195) that reports the wording of a tablet, written in Greek, Roman and Jewish characters, that hung at one of the gates leading into the Temple: "Jesus has not reigned as king. He has been crucified by the Jews because he proclaimed the destruction of the city and the laying waste of the Temple." This statement evidently reflects the charge the Jews (but apparently not the Romans) brought against Jesus when he was accused of having threatened to destroy the Temple (cf. Mk 14:58; Acts 6:14).

Scholarly opinion varies widely on the question of the authenticity and value of these additions. The lack of overt sympathy for Jesus and his followers favors authenticity, for it is hard to understand why a Christian would add so many passages that do not promote Christian views. It is equally hard to imagine why a non-Christian would add passages that concerned a figure who otherwise plays no role in Jewish War and for whom Jesus' life is of little or no importance. Of course, the absence of these passages in the Greek manuscripts tell against their authenticity. Even if these Slavonic passages are accepted as authentic, their historical value is another question.

2. Roman Historians and Other Writers.

Pagan writers said little about Jesus, and what they did say varies in its historical value and interest. In a letter to his son, Mara bar Serapion (c. A.D. 73) asks: "For what advantage did . . . the Jews [gain] by the death of their wise king ... ?" Tacitus (c. A.D. 110) tells us that the name "Christian" "originates from 'Christus' who was sentenced to death by the governor, Pontius Pilate, during the reign of Tiberius" (Ann. 15.44). In his letter to Trajan, Pliny the Younger (A.D. 110) explains that Christians regularly assemble to recite "a hymn antiphonally to Christ as God" and to "partake of a meal" (Epp. 10.96).

In his Life of Emperor Claudius, Suetonius (c. A.D. 120) reports that "Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome [A.D. 49; cf. Acts 18:2] who, instigated by Chrestus, never ceased to cause unrest" (25.4). Apparently Suetonius has confused "Chrestus, " a name commonly held by slaves, with "Christus, " a title with which he was probably not familiar.
Celsus (c. A.D. 179), according to Origen (c. A.D. 248), claimed that Jesus was the illegitimate son of a Roman soldier (Contra Celsum 1.32-33), and that he performed miracles through the power of magic: "He was brought up in secret and hired himself out as a workman in Egypt, and after having tried his hand at certain magical powers he returned from there, and on account of those powers gave himself the title of God" (1.38; cf. 1.6,68,71).

According to Julius Africanus (c. A.D. 230), the Samaritan chronicler Thallus suggested that the darkness at the time of Jesus' death was caused by an eclipse of the sun (Frag. 18).

3. Rabbinic Writings.

There are relatively few references to Jesus in the Talmud (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) and Midrash*. Although the name Yeshu, or Yeshu ha Notzri ("the Nazarene"*), sometimes does occur, some of the relevant passages refer to him as "Balaam," "ben Pandira," "ben Pantera," "a certain person" and possibly "ben Stada" (although the majority of the references to Balaam and ben Stada are not to Jesus.) Most of the passages are of little historical value, representing scarcely more than secondhand acquaintance with the Gospels and later polemic with Christians. In the Middle Ages many of these traditions were compiled into a small book known as the Toledot Yeshu (earliest references to this writing date from the ninth century; for an edited version see Goldstein, 148-54).

3.1. On the Parents and Birth of Jesus. In what may be a reference to the Gospels' claim of Jesus' virginal conception, we are told that Mary, "who was the descendant of princes and governors, played the harlot with carpenters" (b. Sanh 106a). "Princes and governors" probably allude to some of the names in Luke's genealogy,* which some Church Fathers thought was Mary's. The second part of the statement is an obvious allusion to Joseph the carpenter. "Was not ... his mother Stada? His mother was Miriam, a women's hairdresser [megaddela]. As they say . . . 'Statth da [i.e., "this one strayed"] from her husband' " (b. Šabb. 104b; Mary "the megaddela" is sometimes confused with Mary Magdalene; cf. b. hag. 4b.). Elsewhere we are told that "Jesus ... was near to kingship" (b. Sanh 43a; or "near to the Kingdom," possibly as satire on Jesus' proclamation that "the kingdom of God is near"; cf. Mk 1:15). Rabbi Simeon ben Azzai (late first/early second century) claims that he "found a scroll of genealogical record in Jerusalem, in which was written: 'A certain person was illegitimately born of a married woman' " (m. Yebam. 4:13; cf. b. Yebam. 49a).

3.2. On the Life of Jesus. Stories are told of Jesus being rejected by various Rabbis: "When King Jan-neus [104-78 B.C.] slew our Rabbis [c. B.C. 87], Rabbi Joshua [ben Perahiah] and Jesus fled to Alexandria of Egypt" where Jesus was later excommunicated and condemned for worshipping an idol (b. Sanh 107b; b. Sota 47a; cf. y. hag. 2:2; y. Sanh 6:6). The association of Jesus with a flight to Egypt may have been suggested by Matthew 2:13-15. The chronological displacement of Jesus in this tradition is obvious, but there is good reason to identify this "Jesus" with Jesus of Nazareth.

3.3. On the Ministry of Jesus. We are told that "Jesus had five disciples: Matthai, Nakai, Nezer, Buni and Todah" (b. Sanh 107b). Although the first name does resemble "Matthew" and the last possibly that of "Thaddeus," these names are only meant to serve as a basis for word-plays. This is seen in the subsequent paragraph of Sanhedrin, where aspersions are cast against Jesus and his disciples, and their deaths are justified. The Rabbinic view of Jesus' ministry of miracles is similar to that of Celsus already noted: "Jesus the Nazarene practiced magic and led Israel astray" (b. Sanh 107b; cf. t. Sabb. 11:15; b. Sanh 43a; b. Šabb. 104b; b. Sota. 47a). The charge of practicing magic parallels the accusation found in the Gospels that Jesus cast out demons by the power of Satan (cf. Mk 3:22).

3.4. On the Teaching of Jesus. The rabbis hope that they do "not have a son or a disciple who burns his food in public [i.e., teaches heresy], like Jesus the Nazarene" (b. Sanh 103a; b. Ber. 17a-b). "One of the disciples of Jesus . . . told me, 'Thus did Jesus the Nazarene teach me: 'For of the hire of a harlot has she gathered them, and to the hire of a harlot shall they return' [cf. Deut 23:18]' " (b. 'Abod. Zar. 16b-17a; t. hul. 2:24 [".. Jesus ben Pantera ..."]; cf. Qoh. Rab. 1:8 §3; Yal. Shim, on Mic 1 and Prov 5:8). "The disciples of Balaam the wicked shall inherit Gehenna and go down to the pit of destruction" (m. 'Abot 5:19). "He [a judge] said to them: 'I looked at the end of the book, in which it is written, 'I am not come to take away the Law of Moses and I am not come to add to the Law of Moses" [cf. Mt 5:17], and it is written, "Where there is a son, a daughter does not inherit" [cf. Num 27:8].' She said to him: 'Let your light shine forth as a lamp' [cf. Mt 5:16], Rabbi Gamaliel said to her: 'The ass came and kicked the lamp over' " (b. Šabb. 116b).

From the same tradition we find a proverbial statement that probably sums up very well the rabbinic view of Jesus' teaching: "Since the day that you were exiled from your land [i.e., the destruction of Jerusa-lem in A.D. 70] the Law of Moses has been abrogated, and the law of the euangelion [gospel] has been given" (b. Šabb. 116a). In fact, by playing on the Greek word euangelion, the rabbis sometimes referred to it as the 'awen-gillayon ("falsehood of the scroll") or the 'awon-gillayon ("perversion of the scroll").

Most offensive to the rabbis was Jesus' claim to be God* and Son of man* (cf. Mk 14:61-62; Jn 19:7), who would ascend to heaven (cf. Jn 20:17). Rabbi Abahu (third century) is reported to have said: "If a man says to you, 'I am God,' he is a liar; [or] 'I am the son of man,' in the end he will regret it; [or] 'I will go up to heaven'—he that says it will not perform it" (y. Ta'an. 2:1). Again from Abahu: "[God] says ... "I am the first"—I have no father; "I am the last'—I have no son' " (Ex. Rab. 29.5 on Ex 20:2). Similarly Rabbi Aha (fourth century) declares: "There is One that is alone, and he has not a second; indeed, he has neither son nor brother—but: 'Hear O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One' " (Deut. Rab. 2.33 on Deut 6:4). "There was a man, the son of a woman, who would rise up and seek to make himself God, and cause the entire world to err. ... If he says that he is God, he lies; and in the future he will cause to err—that he departs and returns in the end. He says, but will not do. . . . Alas, who shall live of that people that listens to that man who makes himself God?" (Yal. Shim. on Num 23:7).

Elsewhere we are told that Moses warns Israel not to expect "another Moses" who will "arise and bring another Law from heaven" (Deut. Rab. 8.6 on Deut 30:11-12)). The rabbis predict that "the 'servant' [i.e., Jesus] will bow down to the [real] Messiah" (b. Sanh. 61b). Lying behind this statement is the Christian view of Jesus as the Lord's Servant.

3.5. On the Crucifixion of Jesus. "On the eve of Passover they hanged Jesus the Nazarene. And a herald went out before him for forty days, saying: 'He is going to be stoned, because he practiced sorcery and enticed and led Israel astray. Anyone who knows anything in his favor, let him come and plead in his behalf.' But, not having found anything in his favor, they hanged him on the eve of Passover" (b. Sanh. 43a; cf. t. Sanh. 10:11; y. Sanh. 7:12; Tg. Esther 7:9). "They brought him to the Beth Din [i.e., "House of Judgment" perhaps the Sanhedrin] and stoned him . . . and they hanged him on the eve of Passover" (b. Sanh. 67a; y. Sanh. 7:16). Jesus' execution "on the eve of Passover" coheres with Johannine chronology (cf. Jn 18—19). "Balaam the lame was thirty-three years (old) when Phineas the brigand killed him" (b. Sanh. 106b). Although it is disputed, "Phineas the brigand" may refer to Pontius Pilate. If this is correct then the thirty-three-year-old "Balaam" must be Jesus. "The robber was caught and they hanged him on the gallows, and all passersby say: 'It seems that the ruler is hanged.' Thus, it is said, 'He that is hanged is a reproach to God' [cf. Deut 21:23]" (t. Sanh. 9:7). Excluded from the "World to Come" (m. Sanh. 10:2), Jesus will be boiled in filth in Gehenna (b. Git. 56b-57a).

3.6. On the Resurrection of Jesus. "He then went and raised Jesus by incantation" (b. Git. 57a, MS. M). "Woe to him who makes himself alive by the name of God" (b. Sanh. 106a). These statements probably belong to the general accusation that Jesus was a magician.

3.7. On Healing in the Name of Jesus. "It once happened that [Eliezer] ben Dama, the son of Rabbi Ishmael's sister, was bitten by a snake; and Jacob [James?], a native of Kefar Sekaniah, came to him in the name of Jesus ben Pantera. But Rabbi Ishmael did not permit him." Ishmael goes on to say that it is better to die in peace than to be healed in the name of Jesus (t. Hul. 2:22-23; cf. y. Šabb. 14:4; y. 'Abod. Zar. 2:2; b. 'Abod. Zar. 27b; Qoh. Rab. 10:5 §1).

4. The Qur'an.

Jesus, his mother Mary, and his disciples are frequently mentioned in the Qur'an (c. A.D. 620). The Arabic tradition appears to be dependent on the NT Gospels, especially Luke (cf. 3:37-41 with Lk 1:5-25, 57-79), and possibly some of the ideas that came to expression in the rabbinic writings. There is tradition that relates to the virginal conception and birth of Jesus: "And mention Mary in the Book when she drew aside from her family to an eastern place, taking a veil (to screen herself) from them. Then We sent to her Our spirit and there appeared to her a well-made man. . .. She said: 'When shall I have a boy and no mortal has yet touched me, nor have I been unchaste? ... So she conceived him; then withdrew herself with him to a remote place. And the throes (of childbirth) compelled her to go to the trunk of a palm tree. She said: 'Oh, would that I had died before this, and had become something utterly forgotten!' Then (the child) called out to her from beneath her: 'Grieve not....' " (19:16-17, 20, 22-24; see also 66:12).

Another passage refers to the feeding of the five thousand: "When the disciples said: 'O Jesus son of Mary, will your Lord consent to send down to us food from heaven?" He said: 'Be careful of (your duty to) Allah, if you are believers.' They said: 'We desire that we should eat of it and that our hearts should be at rest and that we may know that you have indeed spoken the truth to us that we may be of the witnesses to it' Jesus the son of Mary said: 'O Allah, our Lord! Send down to us food from heaven which should be to us an ever-recurring happiness, to the first of us and to the last of us, and a sign from You, and grant us means of subsistence, and You are the best of the Providers.' Allah said: 'Surely I will send it down to you, but whoever shall disbelieve afterwards from among you, surely I will chastise him with a chastisement with which I shall not chastise anyone among the nations' " (5:112-115; compare Jn 6:31-65).

Elsewhere Jesus denies divine sonship: "And when Allah will say: 'O Jesus son of Mary! Did you say to men, "Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allah?" ' He will say: 'Glory be to You, it did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say). If I had said it, You would indeed have known it. You know what is in my mind, and I do not know what is in Your mind. Surely You are the great Knower of the unseen things' " (5:116; see also 5:71, 75; 4:171).

Finally, the Qur'an describes the death and ascension of Jesus: "Allah set a seal upon them owing to their unbelief, so they shall not believe except a few for their saying: 'Surely we have killed the Messiah, Jesus son of Mary, the apostle of Allah.' They did not kill him, nor did they crucify him, but it appeared to them (like Jesus). . . . Nay! Allah took him up to Himself' (4:155-158). A similar idea is credited to Basilides, according to Irenaeus: "He [Christ] appeared, then, on earth as a man, to the nations of these powers, and worked miracles. Wherefore he did not himself suffer death, but Simon, a certain man of Cyrene, being compelled, bore the cross in his stead; so that this latter being transfigured by him, that he might be thought to be Jesus, was crucified, through ignorance and error, while Jesus himself received the form of Simon, and, standing by, laughed at them" (Haer. 1.24.4).

See also Gospels (Apocryphal); Josephus.

C. A. Evans

JESUS OF HISTORY. See Historical Jesus, Quest of.

JEW(S). See Anti-Semitism; Israel; Judaism.

JEWISH WAR. See Destruction of Jerusalem; Judaism; Revolutionary Movements.

JOHN. See Disciples; John, Gospel of.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF

The Gospel of John has long been prized by Christians for its distinctive portrayal of Jesus. John characterizes Jesus as the light* of the world; way, truth* and life*; resurrection*; vine*; good shepherd*; and bread* of life. John presents extensive narrative and sayings material found in no other Gospel, and it includes some of the best-loved stories in the Gospels, such as the encounter with the woman at the well and the raising of Lazarus*, as well as some of the most familiar sayings of the NT, including Jesus' majestic "I am" statements (see "I Am" Sayings). And yet controversy has long swirled around problems of John's origin, historicity and theology.
1. The Origin of John

As with the other Gospels, there are questions about the purpose, intended readers, date and authorship of the Gospel of John. But with John these questions become particularly acute due to its unique content, distinctive presentation of Jesus, and the significant differences between it and the other three (Synoptic) Gospels. In this section we shall briefly take up the questions of authorship, date, place of origin and purpose of the Gospel. We shall deal with related issues, such as the nature of the tradition found only in John and John's relationship to the other three Gospels, in section 3 (The Genre and Character of John).

1.1. Authorship. The Gospel itself comes to us anonymously, as do all the Gospels and, in fact, much ancient literature. The title "According to John" (kata lōannēn) is derived from the tradition that the Gospel was written by the apostle John, the son of Zebedee. This tradition has been challenged for the following reasons: (1) The evidence of the earliest sources and church fathers (external evidence) is deemed ambiguous, inadequate, wrong, legendary or polemical. (2) Those statements within the Gospel which might allude to its authorship (internal evidence) are also ambiguous and perhaps even point away from authorship by one of the Twelve. (3) The content of the Gospel suggests that it was not written by an eyewitness or by one of the twelve disciples* of Jesus. We shall look briefly at the external and internal evidence for authorship and discuss the content of the Gospel in section 3. below.

1.1.1. External Evidence. There are full discussions of the problems of assessing the external evidence in the commentaries of Barrett, Beasley-Murray, Brown and Schnackenburg. None of these scholars holds to authorship by John, the son of Zebedee. Discussion of the issue usually begins with the following statement from Irenaeus (c. A.D. 130-200): "John, the disciple of the Lord, who leaned on his breast, also published the Gospel while living at Ephesus in Asia" (Haer. 3.1.1; quoted in Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.8.4.). Irenaeus also writes (in a letter to a friend, Florinus) of hearing Polycarp (d. 155) recount his interaction with "John and with the others who had seen the Lord, how he remembered their words, and what were the things concerning the Lord which he had heard from them," and of which he took notes "not on paper but in my heart" (Hist. Eccl. 5.20.6-7; cf. 4.14.3-5). We have, then, in Irenaeus a man who claims to have traditions from John—whom Irenaeus assumes to be the apostle John, the son of Zebedee—mediated through Polycarp. But questions have been raised about the source and reliability of this information from Irenaeus, especially in light of the following facts:

(1) Other Christian literature which we know to have had its origin or destination in Ephesus, such as the Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians, mentions no ministry of the apostle John there, although Ignatius does stress the church's ties to the apostle Paul. Although not inexplicable, the absence of any reference to John is odd if John was known to have ministered there and if his place was firmly fixed in Ephesus.

(2) Irenaeus' testimony depends on secondhand information which he received as a young boy from the aged Polycarp. But it is possible that Irenaeus either did not remember or understand correctly Polycarp's references to "John." For Irenaeus also says that Papias was "a hearer of John and companion of Polycarp" (Haer. 5.33.4). But as Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3.39.33) notes, Papias—according to his own words—was not a "hearer of John" the apostle, but of John the presbyter, who was living in Papias's day (Hist. Eccl. 3.39.4). Perhaps this is the John meant by Polycarp as well.

(3) Other testimonies to the apostolic authorship of the Gospel seem to be either legendary or polemical, such as Clement of Alexandria's (c. A.D. 155-220) famous assertion that after the other Gospels were written, "John, perceiving that the bodily facts had been made plain in the Gospels, being urged by his friends, and inspired by the Spirit, composed a spiritual gospel" (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.7). The Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 180-200) provides a more elaborate version of the same tradition, in which the other apostles fast and pray with John and then urge him to act as their spokesperson and write a Gospel. Such stories seem to be nothing other than legends, intended, perhaps, to bolster the case for the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel.

Mistakes in these testimonies, lack of corroborating evidence and fanciful narratives do not necessarily impugn the tradition of apostolic authorship, but neither do they inspire confidence in it. It will be seen that the internal evidence leaves us with similar ambiguity.
1.1.2. Internal Evidence. Evidence within the Gospel about its authorship is of two kinds: direct statements about the composition of the Gospel and statements about the "disciple whom Jesus loved" (commonly called the "Beloved Disciple"). These statements come together in 21:24, where we read that "this is the disciple who is bearing witness to these things, and who has written these things; and we know that his testimony is true" (RSV), and 21:20, where "the disciple" is identified as "the disciple whom Jesus loved, who had lain close to his breast at the supper" (RSV). Two questions arise: (1) Does 21:24 imply that "the disciple whom Jesus loved" is the author of the Gospel? (2) Does the Gospel allow us to identify the "Beloved Disciple" as John, the son of Zebedee?

The first question concerns the proper interpretation of 21:24, and several issues arise. First, what is the meaning of "these things" (tauta) to which the Beloved Disciple is "bearing witness" and which he "has written"? When taken in conjunction with the statements of 21:25, that "there are also many other things which Jesus did" and that "the world itself could not contain the books that would be written" about all of these, it seems most natural to interpret 21:24 as referring to the entire Gospel. And yet some scholars think that (aula refers only to 21:21-23 (the false interpretation of Jesus' saying that must be refuted) or to chapter 21 (which appears to be an addendum; see 2.3. below).

But even if we take "these things" (tauta) as referring to the entire Gospel, does John 21:24 assert that the Beloved Disciple wrote the Gospel? That depends on the understanding of the phrase "who has written these things" (grapsas tauta), which may be rendered "has caused these things to be written," in which case the Beloved Disciple is indirectly responsible for the Gospel. Whoever wrote 21:24-25 presumably did not write the rest of the Gospel, or at least the rest of chapter 21, since in 21:24 the author (or authors) is testifying to the veracity of the Beloved Disciple's witness. The Gospel presents the Beloved Disciple as the witness on which it is based, but not necessarily as its author.

(2) This leads us to the second question, whether the Beloved Disciple is John the son of Zebedee. "The disciple whom Jesus loved" is mentioned explicitly by that designation in 13:23, as he is in 19:26-27; 20:1-10; and 21:7, 20-24. Although 19:34-37 does not speak of "the disciple whom Jesus loved," it is generally assumed that the witness mentioned there is the Beloved Disciple. John 18:15-16 is sometimes included here and, with greater reservations, 1:35-36. We may summarize the data as follows: (a) Nowhere does the Gospel identify the Beloved Disciple by name. Moreover, the Gospel does not explicitly refer to John, the son of Zebedee, though 21:2 refers to the "sons of Zebedee." (b) It is disputed whether the Gospel presents the Beloved Disciple as one of the Twelve. If we assume that only the Twelve were present at the Last Supper (see Last Supper), then the Beloved Disciple must be one of the Twelve. But this assumption is neither supported nor refuted by the Gospel, which refers to those at the Supper as "his own" (13:1) and his "disciples" (13:35), a term not limited in John to the Twelve, (c) The Beloved Disciple is consistently presented as a model of faith* and discipleship,* leading some to assert that the Beloved Disciple is a purely ideal, and not historical, figure. His designation as "the disciple whom Jesus loved" puts him in a position of unique intimacy with Jesus, describing his relationship to Jesus on the same terms that Jesus' relationship to the Father is described (1:18). The suggestion that this veiled allusion is a way of preserving the author's own modesty seems strained. It would be far less presumptuous simply to name oneself than to continually speak of oneself as enjoying the most intimate of relationships to Jesus. Others would more naturally bestow such a term of honor.

A common understanding of the Beloved Disciple is that he is a person who heard and followed Jesus, although he was not one of the Twelve. That there clearly were such persons is obvious from the rest of the NT (Acts 1:21-26). He exercised a role of leadership in one group of early Christian congregations, probably gathering a circle of disciples around him. One (or more) of his disciples wrote the Gospel, but who this author is remains unknown to us. He preserved, shaped and interpreted the witness of his master, the Beloved Disciple, who had in turn interpreted the teaching of the Master himself.

1.2. Date and Place. As with all the Gospels, it is difficult to fix the date at which John was written, especially since the process of writing and editing the Gospel—whether by one person or several—seems to have occurred over some period of time. The time at which the Gospel was actually published and circulated may be somewhat later than the time of writing.

1.2.1. The Date of the Gospel. Earlier in this century it was fashionable to date the Fourth Gospel in the second century, due to its developed theology, presumed dependence on one (or more) of the Synoptic Gospels, lack of evidence of its use by early second-century writers and lack of early manuscript evidence. But the discovery of Rylands Papyrus 457 (P52), an Egyptian codex fragment containing John 18:31-33, 37, 38 and dated by scholars to the early second century, suggests that John cannot have been published later than the end of the first century or very early part of the second. A manuscript of a similar date, Egerton Papyrus 2, may have used John. Together with re-evaluations of the theory of a linear development of NT theology, of the view that a high or developed christology must necessarily be late, and of John's use of the Synoptics, these manuscript finds have mitigated the force of the argument for a later date, although they do not solve the problem of dating. One date that has been widely accepted by scholars of all persuasions places the Gospel in the period A.D. 90-100. The earliest external witnesses date the Gospel in this period as well. However, there have always been scholars who have argued that the Gospel can easily be dated earlier, perhaps as early as A.D. 50-60, and that it ought certainly to be placed before the first Jewish-Roman war (A.D. 66-70). In recent studies, this theory has been advanced most forcefully by J. A. T. Robinson (1985). By "priority" Robinson does not mean that John is necessarily the first of the Gospels to be written, but that it is closest to the "source" (namely, to Jesus himself). Yet, at the same time, John exhibits the deepest theological reflection of all the Gospels. In Robinson's own words, John "got it right—historically and theologically" (xiii). Robinson also argues for the reliability of the ancient tradition that the Gospel is written by John, the son of Zebedee, the Beloved Disciple, but this is not the real focus of his concern. Instead, he is primarily interested in probing the implications of his view for reconstructing the life of Jesus (set Historical Jesus).

While scholars typically use only the Synoptic Gospels when reconstructing the ministry and teaching of Jesus, Robinson argues that John ought to be regarded as a witness on a par with the other Gospels—and even to be preferred over them. He argues that we should no longer assume that the Synoptics provide the historical touchstone for understanding Jesus, with John regarded always as secondary and only to be fitted into the Synoptic picture. Instead, we ought to reconsider whether the Gospel story is not often illumined and clarified when we begin with John, and fit the picture of Jesus given in the Synoptic Gospels into its framework.

It is the merit of Robinson's work to point out that while many scholars no longer hold that John uses the other Gospels, and that it therefore supplements or interprets them, they have nevertheless not given up the related presumptions and presuppositions with which they approach the Gospel of John. They continue to use the Synoptics as the norm against which John is measured. But Robinson makes a strong case for reconsidering the historical witness of the Gospel of John to the ministry of Jesus.

Those who hope to find in an early dating (Robinson puts the Gospel's final form at about A.D. 65) a vindication of John's historical accuracy will not be disappointed. However, one must realize that Robinson's arguments are aimed at getting an "equal hearing" for John alongside the other Gospels, as one of four sources for understanding the historical events of Jesus' life and ministry. Its witness cannot simply be added to that of the Synoptics, but must be weighed along with theirs. Thus Robinson is not interested in harmonizing the four Gospels, but in arguing for John's priority in reconstructing our understanding of Jesus. As an example, one may take the cleansing of the Temple (see Temple Cleansing), which the Synoptics place toward the end of Jesus' life, and John puts quite early. Robinson does not argue for two cleansings, but rather that on historical grounds there is good reason to prefer the Johannine dating rather than the Synoptic chronology.*

Many of Robinson's arguments carry weight even if one does not adopt all his conclusions about individual points of exegesis or historical reconstruction. While most scholars have not been persuaded to follow Robinson, he has at least reopened the question of the date of the Gospel. Most scholars continue to place the date of the Gospel 'post-70, and probably sometime after A.D. 85 or so. But others will ask whether John cannot comfortably be placed early in the period A.D. 70-100, rather than toward the end of that period.

1.2.2. Place. According to tradition the Gospel was published in Ephesus, but other large centers of Christian activity which also had significant Jewish populations and representatives of various Hellenistic religions, such as Alexandria and Syrian Antioch, have also been proposed. Indeed, some see the traditions of the Gospel as stemming from Palestine, but being shaped into their final form in other territory, where the influence of Diaspora Judaism* and Hellenistic religions was greater.

1.3. The Life Setting and Purpose of the Gospel.

1.3.1. The Life Setting of the Gospel. There are various clues in the Gospel from which we may make some tentative deductions about situations which shaped the traditions and material within the Gospel as we now know it (1) The Gospel often refers to "the Jews," even when "the Jews" are distinguished from other persons who are obviously also Jewish (cf. 1:19; 2:13; 3:25; 6:42;
Indeed, throughout the Gospel the "Jews" are set over against those who believe in Jesus as Messiah; that is, "Jews" are set over against Christians, not Gentiles,* and the term is not used simply as an ethnic or racial characterization.

(2) The Gospel manifests perhaps the sharpest polemic in the NT against the "Jews"—a polemic matched in force only by passages such as Matthew 23 (e.g., Jn 8:42-47; see Anti-Semitism). The intensity of the polemic may be a reaction to Jewish measures, and particularly to expulsion from the synagogue* (9:22; 12:42; 16:2) of those who had become believers in Jesus. Some scholars have suggested that the reference to being expelled from the synagogue reflects the Jewish birkat hamminin ("blessing against the heretics"), said to have been promulgated at Jamnia under Rabbi Gamaliel II about AD. 85-90. In its full form this prayer invokes God's judgment* upon all heretics, including Christians and sectarian Jews. However, some scholars judge the birkat to have been formulated much later, perhaps as late as AD. 135. In any case, it is questionable whether the actions described in the Gospel mirror those dictated by the "benediction." The NT and early Christian literature testify to strained and hostile relationships between Christians and Jews at an earlier date, beginning with the confrontation between Stephen and certain Jews in Jerusalem (Acts 6—8).

(3) The Gospel is concerned for second-generation (and subsequent) believers who were not eyewitnesses (20:26-31), including Jews and Gentiles (7:35), the other "sheep not of this fold" (10:16; cf. 7:35; 11:52). The situation and role of this community's life under the guidance of the Holy Spirit (set Holy Spirit) is dealt with at length (14—16). There is reference to the need for unity and love* within the community (15:12-17; 17:20-23), continued faithfulness to Jesus (15:1-11; 17:11-12), the possibility of persecution (15:18-25; 16:1-4), anxiety and turmoil (14:1-7,18-21, 27-31; 16:4-6; 16:16-24), the role of the Spirit's instruction (14:15-17,25-26; 16:7-15) and the community's mission in the world (14:12-14, 23-24; 15:26-27; 17:15-19).

We may speculate that the community whose life and struggles are reflected in the Gospel was a community made up of Jewish and Gentile Christians. Prior to the composition (or at least final editing) of the Gospel, a primarily Jewish-Christian church had experienced hostile conflict with the Jews of the synagogue, to the point of ostracism and alienation. By the time the Gospel is written the hostilities between Jews and Christians are behind it, and the church includes Gentile believers. It continues to experience the pressures of existence in this world and hence needs to be reminded of the words that Jesus gave to the church about its life and mission. This leads us to a discussion of the purpose of the Gospel.

1.3.2. The Purpose of the Gospel. The Gospel presents us with a statement of its own purpose in 20:31 (RSV): "These are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name." But this broad statement leaves many details to be filled in. Some have interpreted this statement to mean that the Gospel is an evangelistic document, designed to win converts, perhaps from Diaspora Judaism. But the sharpness of the polemic against unbelieving Jews in the Gospel counts against this hypothesis. Moreover, the statement that the Gospel is written in order "that you may believe" can also be rendered, "that you may continue to believe," and much of the Gospel seems designed to encourage believers to persevere in faith.

The Gospel intends to present Jesus to second and subsequent generations of believers, those who did not "see signs" but have the Gospel's written account of them (20:30-31: "these are written"). By making clear who Jesus is and the salvation that he offers, the Gospel intends to encourage and strengthen believers in their faith in Jesus as the Messiah and Son of God. As part of its exhortative function, the Gospel endeavors to clarify the relationship of Jesus to Judaism by showing his superiority to the patriarchs of the Jewish faith (4:12; 6:32; 8:53-58), the replacement in his person of Jewish feasts* and religious institutions (2:1-11, 19-22; 6:32-41; 7:37-39), and the relationship between the Law* and Moses* on the one hand and Jesus Christ on the other (1:17; 5:39-40, 45-47; 7:19-23). Probably these traditions were shaped by disputes with the synagogue. Yet the Gospel clearly indicates the place that Gentile believers are to have in the community of faith.

Other theories, not necessarily incompatible with the broad statement of purpose outlined above, have been advanced as well. (1) An older view was that John is the Gospel in Hellenized form. While this theory has been questioned, due to a re-evaluation of the influence of Hellenism* on Judaism and of the character of the Gospel itself, there are unquestionably striking contacts with Hellenistic religion and philosophy (for example, in the Logos* doctrine). (2) The Gospel endeavors to make clear the proper relationship between John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) and Jesus (1:6-8,15,19-28,30; 3:22-30; 5:33-36; 10:40-42). Although some have interpreted these statements as an anti-Baptist polemic, directed against a group claiming John to be the Messiah, such an evaluation goes too far. The Gospel presents John positively as a witness—virtually equivalent to "disciple" in John—to Jesus. (3) Similarly, the Gospel repeatedly defines the role of the Beloved Disciple vis-à-vis that of Peter (13:23-25; 20:3-8; 21:7,20-23), which has been taken as evidence of some conflict between the churches represented by the Beloved Disciple and by Peter. The Gospel does bolster the case for the Beloved Disciple's authority and distinctive role, perhaps to show that he was in no way inferior to Peter and the Twelve. (4)
Some see in those verses of John that insist on the "flesh" of Jesus (1:14; 6:51-58) an anti-docetic polemic. But the Gospel seems not so much intent on proving the true humanity or physicality of Jesus, as it does in pressing the case for the heavenly origin and identity of the incarnate Word. These statements are not directed against docetists, but against those who do not share the Christian confession of Jesus as the Word made flesh (1:14). (5) Others suggest that the Gospel contains an apologetic against or for the sacramental teaching of the church, and the material in 6:51-58 certainly has eucharistic overtones. But it is difficult to discern a theology of the sacraments from the passages on water (which seem to refer more to the Holy Spirit than to baptism) and blood.

The Gospel may have been edited over a period of years to include materials that met changing or different circumstances. Its basic purpose, to tell the story of Jesus in such a way that his identity as Messiah and Son of God is made known to later generations, shines through, regardless of the many individual polemics and situations that may also have shaped the production of the Gospel.
Indeed, the very structure of the Gospel points to the purpose of the Gospel to define who Jesus is, and to do so in categories that arise out of Judaism, but speak to a broader religious milieu as well.

2. The Structure of John.

The Gospel is essentially divided into two main parts, with a prologue (1:1-18) and an epilog (chapter 21). The first main part, 1:19—12:50, was designated by
C. H. Dodd as the "Book of Signs," and the second part, 13:1—20:31, as "The Book of the Passion" or "The Book of Glory" (Brown). Each "book" ends with a summary statement (12:37-50; 20:30-31 ). All the signs (or miracles) of Jesus are narrated in the first part while the second part begins with the Last Supper (see Last Supper) and concentrates on the events leading up to and including the passion narrative and the resurrection appearances. "Book of Glory" is an apt designation for the second part of the book, since in Johannine theology Jesus' glorification occurs as he returns to the Father through his death,* resurrection and ascension.*

2.1. The Prologue (1:1-18). Parts of these verses appear to come from an early Christian hymn, or at least from creedal or confessional material of the church. And since some of the vocabulary (such as Logos and grace*) does not appear again in the Gospel, some argue that the prologue was affixed to the Gospel after it was completed. But even if the prologue has underlying sources, as it stands, it introduces the main themes, movement and chief protagonist of the Gospel. Opening with an echo of Genesis 1:1, the prologue goes on to identify its protagonist as the "Logos,"* the Word of God, and thus places the drama in a cosmic setting and against an OT background. The prologue foreshadows the division between belief and unbelief so characteristic of the rest of the Gospel (1:10-11). This division rests on one's response to and understanding of Jesus Christ (1:12-13). The prologue argues for its confession of Jesus by prohibiting false evaluations of John the Baptist (1:6-8,15), showing the relationship of Jesus to Moses and the Law (1:17-18) and calling for belief in Jesus Christ as the Logos of God made flesh (1:1, 14). Throughout each episode of the Gospel the drama hinted at in the prologue is replayed as the various persons that Jesus encounters endeavor to understand who Jesus is. Some (the Samaritan* woman, the man born blind, Martha, Thomas) eventually come to a confession which, if not phrased in the words of the prologue, is consonant with it while others reject precisely the prologue's evaluation of Jesus Christ as the Word and Son of God (e.g., the disciples of 6:66; the Jewish authorities of 7:32, 35-52; 11:45-53).

2.2. The Book of Signs (1:19—12:50). The arrangement of much of the first part of the Gospel is topical and thematic. The placement of some events (e.g., Jesus' baptism) is due to chronological considerations, while that of others (the cleansing of the Temple, the raising of Lazarus) may be due to theological reasons or for dramatic effect John thus introduces early in the Gospel the theme that Jesus replaces, in his person, the religious observances of Judaism. With the narrative of the changing of the water to wine* (2:1-11), Jesus is seen transforming the water set aside for the Jewish rites of purification into the wine symbolic of the presence of the messianic age (Amos 9:13-14; Hos 14:7; Jer 31:12).

The rest of the book of signs (2:12—12:50) refers to various feasts* of the Jewish calendar (2:13; 5:1; 6:4; 7:2; 10:22; 11:55). These references serve to move the story along chronologically, as well as to introduce imagery from the ceremonies that become the backdrop for Jesus' self-revelation in signs and discourses, which provoke his disputes with opponents. Thus, for example, the Sabbath* (the probable feast of 5:1) becomes the occasion for a Sabbath healing and subsequent disputes about Jesus' authority (see Authority and Power) to work on the Sabbath, to give life and to raise the dead—all privileges deemed reserved for God (chap. 5). Near Passover Jesus feeds the five thousand and gives a long discourse on being the "bread from heaven," actions and words which recall the exodus from Egypt on the original Passover and the giving of manna to provide for the people of God (chap. 6). The Feast of Tabernacles included ceremonies which featured both water and light and it is at this feast that Jesus promises living water* (7:37-39) and proclaims that he is the light of the world (8:12; 9:5). Following the climactic deed of the raising of Lazarus from the dead, there comes a transitional chapter (chap. 12) which summarizes the results of Jesus' ministry in terms of unbelief and belief. Jesus' public ministry is over, and he will now engage in extensive private instruction to his disciples (chaps. 13-17).

2.3. Book of Glory (13:1-20:31). The Book of Glory is divided into three subsections: (1) chapter 13, the Last Supper with the disciples (set Last Supper); (2) chapters 14—17, the so-called Farewell Discourses of Jesus to the disciples (see Farewell Discourse); (3) chapters 18—20, the narratives of the passion (set Passion Narrative) and resurrection.* The Last Supper that Jesus eats with his disciples is apparently not a Passover meal, but occurs twenty-four hours prior to the eating of the Passover. There is no institution of the Lord's Supper, but rather the story of Jesus' washing the disciples' feet, which prefigures Jesus' sacrificial death and provides an example for the disciples to imitate in community (see Service). Chapters 14—17 then provide exhortations about community life, instruction about the role of the Holy Spirit in teaching and guiding the community, warnings about persecution and trouble, and encouragement to remain faithful to Jesus. Chapter 17 is a prayer* that the disciples will be kept safe and remain faithful. The passion narratives (see Passion Narrative) and resurrection appearances share features in common with the Synoptic Gospels, even though they have numerous incidents and scenes distinctive to John.

2.4. Epilog (chap. 21). For several reasons the last chapter of the Gospel appears to many to be an appendix of additional narratives not included in the earlier draft of the Gospel. (1) The Gospel appears to end with the summary statement at 20:30-31. (2) The additional resurrection appearance is more like a first appearance, since the disciples do not recognize Jesus (although they have previously seen and recognized the risen Lord*). (3) The narrative of Peter's restoration seems out of place, for it would have belonged more naturally prior to the giving of the Spirit and commissioning of the disciples. (4) Finally, it appears that a new problem has arisen within the church, namely, the death of the Beloved Disciple. Chapter 21 has been added to correct a rumor that circulated concerning a prophecy that Jesus had made about the death of the Beloved Disciple.

At least 21:24-25 are added later. They may reflect the fact that the Beloved Disciple has recently died, although he was alive when the first edition of the Gospel was being written (as the present tense in 19:35 suggests). His death appears to contradict Jesus' prediction that the Beloved Disciple would remain alive until he returned, but the author of the Gospel (or of these verses) notes that this is not what Jesus had said.

But most of chapter 21 deals not with the death of the Beloved Disciple, but with Peter and with Jesus' prophecy about his death. Just as Peter denied Jesus three times, so now he is asked three times whether he loves Jesus. The commands to "tend my sheep" and "feed my lambs" may be reported to show that Peter's role was understood to be that of "shepherd," whereas the Beloved Disciple is understood chiefly as a "witness." Nevertheless, Peter was commanded above all else to "follow me" (21:19), just as the Beloved Disciple is shown doing in the very next verse (21:20). Thus chapter 21 again contrasts Peter and the Beloved Disciple, includes Jesus' prediction about each disciple's death, and shows how the Beloved Disciple was ahead of Peter in recognizing and following Jesus. The chapter does not so much denigrate Peter as it shows that the role of each disciple is distinctive, but not thereby inferior to that of the other disciple.

3. The Genre and Character of John.

3.1. John and the Synoptics. The difference between John and the other Gospels is significant, and it raises the question of John's relationship to them. This question is not new, nor is it merely the product of modern biblical criticism. The assertion of the early Christian writer Clement of Alexandria that John is a "spiritual Gospel" while the others recount the "physical" or "bodily" facts (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6.14.7) was an early attempt to account for the differences between all the Gospels (see Synoptics and John).
3.1.1. The Johannine Difference. The particular differences between John and the other three Gospels are striking and may be set out briefly.

(1) Material and Content. In John we do not find: parables*; demon* exorcisms; healings of lepers (see Leprosy); tax* collectors; Sadducees; table fellowship with sinners* (set Table Fellowship); infancy narratives (see Birth of Jesus); the temptation of Jesus (see Temptation of Jesus); the Transfiguration*; the material in Matthew's Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount); or the institution of the Lord's Supper (see Last Supper). On the other hand, the following material is in John, but not in any of the Synoptics: Jesus' baptismal ministry at the Jordan (see Baptism); the encounters with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman; the "I am" sayings, coupled with long discourses; most of the material in chapters 7—11, and 14—17; the footwashing; and Jesus' conversation with Pilate (see Pontius Pilate). Of the Johannine miracles (see Miracles, Miracle Stories) only the feeding of the five thousand is found in the other Gospels.

(2) Vocabulary. Whereas "kingdom of God" occurs often in the Synoptics, it occurs only twice in John, and the distinctively Johannine terminology (truth, witness,* world,* abide, love,* believe, light, darkness, life, and Father and Son) occurs far less often in the other Gospels.

(3) Chronology and Presentation of Jesus' Ministry. While in the Synoptics Jesus goes to Jerusalem only at the end of his life (except for Luke's account of Jesus' visit to the Temple* as a boy), much of the ministry in John occurs in Jerusalem and Judea. The Temple cleansing (see Temple Cleansing) is placed early in the Gospel, rather than toward the end; Jesus and John the Baptist minister at the same time; the anointing* occurs prior to the triumphal entry; and the Last Supper appears to be eaten twenty-four hours earlier than in the other Gospels.

(4) Messianic Secret. Whereas in the Synoptics Jesus is first confessed as Messiah by Peter well into the course of the ministry, in John, Jesus is acknowledged with various messianic titles—six times in the first chapter alone (1:29, 34, 36, 41, 45, 49)!

3.1.2. The Question of John's Relationship with the Synoptics. Prior to the twentieth century most interpreters assumed that John was familiar with the other Gospels, and that his role was to supplement and interpret them. While this theory has a broad appeal, it is difficult to explain all the differences in detail and content as either supplementation or interpretation. Sometimes the theory that John wrote to interpret the other Gospels has been coupled with a denigration of its historical value (forcing a choice between John or the Synoptics in deciding historical questions), due to the problems and difficulties in reconciling the differences between John and the other Gospels. Some scholars have gone farther, suggesting that John intended to replace or supplant the other Gospels. All of these theories depend on the assumption that John knew or was familiar with the other Gospels. But in the twentieth century that theory has been challenged.

The theory that John is independent of the other Gospels was carefully argued by P. Gardner-Smith and C. H. Dodd, and it has become widely, although not unanimously, accepted. On this theory John was composed without knowledge of, or reference to, the other three written Gospels. All the similarities between them can be accounted for by shared tradition, whether written or oral, which John used without access to the Synoptics. The differences are due to variant traditions—which does not rule out eyewitness recollection—and John's highly interpretative character (see Tradition Criticism).

While John may have known of the other Gospels, he did not use them as sources in the way that Matthew and Luke used Mark. Study of John ought not to proceed on the assumption that the Gospel intends to be a commentary on or elucidation of the other Gospels. Neither is it helpful to repeat older explanations that while the Synoptics are biography or history, John is doctrine or theology. At least some of the difference between John and the Synoptics is a difference of the degree to which the author's interpretation has shaped the story. This leads us to the question of the character of the Gospel of John.

3.2. The Historical Character of the Gospel of John. A recognition of the differences between John and the other Gospels and of John's intensely interpretative character raises the question of the nature of the historical tradition found only in John (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). If, for example, all the other Gospels record Jesus as speaking in parables and often of the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God), but never in "I am" sayings, how are we to assess the historicity of such utterances? We should note, first of all, that simply because information is found only in John is no reason to discard it as if of no historical value (see esp. Robinson). Scholars consider it probable, for example, that Jesus' ministry lasted two to three years (as John implies), that he was in and out of Jerusalem (as the other Gospels hint—e.g., Lk 13:34), that some of the disciples of Jesus were first disciples of John the Baptist (1:35-37), and that Jesus and his disciples conducted a ministry of baptism (3:22).

There is also material in John which is similar or identical to that in the Synoptics, but appears in different contexts or looks like a different story. Such material includes the charges of demon possession (cf. Mk 3:22-30 and Jn 7:20; 8:48-53; 10:19-20), the unbelief of Jesus' brothers (Mk 3:31-35 and Jn 7:5), challenges to Jesus' authority (Mk 2:1-3; 6:15; 7:22-33 and Jn 5:19, 26-27, 30) and titles such as "prophet"* (Mk 6:15; 7:28 and Jn 6:14; 7:40), "Messiah" (Mk8:29; 14:61 and Jn 1:17, 41; 7:41-42) and "Son of man" (Mk 2:28; 8:31,38; 9:31; 10:33, 45 and Jn 1:51; 3:13-14; 5:27; 6:53, 62; 9:35; 12:34). Although most of the miracles are unique to John, they have analogies in the Synoptics.

Finally, John shows an elaboration and development of themes found in the other Gospels, such as Jesus' relationship to the Father, his messianic authority, the Holy Spirit and the meaning of Jesus' miracle-working activity.

Clearly historical traditions and reminiscences lie behind John, and information from John should not be dismissed simply because it comes from John. Nevertheless, such information must be judiciously weighed in light of what we know about the interpretative character of all the Gospels, and with awareness of the contours of Jesus' ministry as it is portrayed in the Synoptics.

Much of our understanding of the Gospel of John will depend on our prior definition and understanding of the genre of the Gospels (see Gospel [Genre]). Where the Gospels are understood to be interpretations of the life of Jesus, for specific purposes and audiences, John will be seen to fit that genre, even though it has exercised more freedom in reworking and interpreting the traditions upon which it is based. To a more marked extent than the Synoptics, John's Gospel consciously interprets the essence of Jesus' ministry and teaching in light of later theological reflection. John explicitly acknowledges the understanding gained after the resurrection (2:22; 7:39; 12:16; 13:7) and through the instruction of the Paraclete (15:26; 16:13, 14), and some of this insight is likely incorporated into the Gospel itself. In many respects, John is like one of the Pauline epistles, interpreting the meaning of Jesus' life and death in terms and categories that were not typical or characteristic of Jesus himself. As part of our canon of Scripture, the Gospel of John bears authoritative witness to Jesus, who he is, and what he means for Christians and for the world (see Canon).
4. The Theology of John.

4.1. Christology. One of the most striking features of the Gospel of John is its distinctive christology. Although John shares several important titles with the other Gospels, these are sometimes used in distinctively Johannine ways. In addition, there are other images and designations for Jesus peculiar to John. Following an overview of some of the more important titles, we will summarize the central features of John's picture of Jesus.

4.1.1. Word/Logos. The only other place in the NT that the title "Word (Gk logos) of God" appears is in Revelation 19:13 (see Logos). But the term was also used in Greek philosophical thought. According to Heraclitus (6th cent B.C.), the Logos was the eternal principle of order in the universe. The Stoics saw the "word" as the mind of God, the principle of reason within the universe, controlling and directing all things. But the idea of God's word (or God's speaking) has a Jewish context as well. God created the world by speaking it into existence (Gen 1; Ps 33:6). In the prophetic books, "the word of the Lord" is nearly personified as it is described as coming to a particular prophet (Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1). The word heals (Ps 107:20), obedience to it brings life (Deut 32:46-47) and it is a light that guides people to God (Ps 119:105,130).

The Johannine description of the Word (logos) has further affinities with the Jewish concept of Wisdom* as well. In Proverbs 8, especially verses 22-31, Wisdom is said to have existed in the beginning, prior to the creation of the world; it was God's agent in creation; it brings life and light to those who accept it; and it was rejected by most human beings. According to Sirach 24:8, Wisdom made its dwelling among human beings. The verb for "made its dwelling" is a cognate of the term used of the Logos's "dwelling" (skēnoō) in John 1:14. The actual term "word," logos, is that found in the OT prophets in the Greek OT (LXX), but the characterization of that logos in John has striking correspondences to the biblical and apocryphal descriptions of wisdom.

The utility of the term Logos to speak to both the Jewish and Greek worlds is demonstrated by the Jewish writer Philo (born c. 20 B.C.), who attempted to explain Judaism in terms of Greek philosophy in order to give a rational account of the Jewish faith. Philo spoke of the Logos as an intermediary between God and his creatures, which gave meaning to the universe and was the instrument of God in creation. Like the rabbis, Philo speculated about the two "powers" of God (in the rabbinic writings, the "two measures," or middōt), and identified these "powers" with the names of God. In Philo these powers are frequently characterized as the creative power and ordering or ruling power of God. In commenting on Exodus 25:22, Philo describes the ark of the covenant, identifies the two cherubim with the two powers of God, in whose midst is the Logos, and goes on to say: "And from the divine Logos as from a spring, there divide and break forth two powers. One is the creative power through which the Artificer placed and ordered all things: this is named 'God.' And the other is the royal power, since through it the Creator rules over created things; this is called 'Lord' (Quaest. in Ex. 2.68; see Fug. 95-98, 100-101). In the Logos are the two powers of God, to create and to rule, and for this reason the Logos can be called "God" and "Lord" (cf. Jn 1:1; 20:28). In John the Logos is the agent of creation (1:3) and the incarnate Logos is the agent of God's judgment. And also in John's Gospel, the Logos is confessed as Lord and God, an important designation for Jesus in Johannine theology.

4.1.2. God. The opening words of the Gospel raise the problem of Johannine Christology in acute form when they say both that the Word was with God,* thereby implying a distinction between the Word and God, and that the Word was God (1:1-2). The designation of Jesus as "God" occurs once more, in John 20:28, when the risen Jesus is confessed as "Lord and God." Elsewhere, Jesus is accused of "making himself equal to God" (5:18) and "making himself God" (10:33). While the pair of titles ("Lord and God") in 20:28 may reflect the fact that the emperor Domitian (A.D. 81-96) sought to have himself addressed as "Lord and God," the absolute designation of the Word as "God" (in 1:1) requires another explanation. What the Gospel means in introducing the Word as "God" must be understood in light of the strict monotheism of Judaism that became the heritage of Christianity as well.

Here the Jewish category of agency sheds light. In the rabbinic writings there is reference to the figure of the šālīḥaḥ, which means literally "one who is sent" (see apostle). A šālīḥaḥ was a surrogate sent on a task or mission with specific instructions and authority to carry it out. According to the Talmud, a šālīḥaḥ could, among other things, carry out business transactions, make binding treaties and arrange marriages (b. Qidd. 41a, 42b-43a). A common saying in the rabbis was "the one who is sent is like the one who sent him" or "a man's agent is equivalent to himself" (m. Ber. 5:5; b. B. Meṣ. 96a; b. ḫag. 10b; b. Menah. 93b; b. Nam 12b; b. Qidd. 42b, 43a). Because the šālīḥaḥ may act on behalf of the one who sent him, when one deals with the šālīḥaḥ it is as if one is dealing with the one who sent that person.
Jesus is presented in the Gospel against the backdrop of the Jewish concept of agency and, furthermore, against the understanding that there is one chief agent through whom God acts. Such chief agents were variously understood to be a principal angel* (Gabriel, Michael), an exalted patriarch (Enoch, Moses) or personified divine attributes (Wisdom, Word). Clearly the Word is understood as God's chief and exclusive agent in creation (1:3). He is shown exercising the divine prerogatives in judging (5:22, 27, 30; 8:16, 26; 9:39; 12:47-48), in raising the dead (5:21, 25-26, 28-29; 6:27, 35, 39-40, 50-51, 54-58; 10:28; 11:25-26) and in working on the Sabbath (5:9-18; 7:21-23), deeds which, according to various Jewish authors, were permitted to God alone. Because Jesus is the chief agent of God, when one confronts him, one confronts God. When the concept of agency is coupled with speculation on the names or powers of God, we see that the name of "God" for the Word is intended to show that the Word exercises the divine prerogatives. As Jesus of Nazareth, the incarnate Word continues to exercise the divine prerogatives, and exactly these actions and this claim evoke hostility from the Jewish authorities who charge Jesus with blasphemy* (10:31-38).

4.1.3. "I Am."Unique to the Gospel of John are the "I am" sayings (see "I Am" Sayings). In those "I am" statements with a predicate (bread of life, light of the world, vine) Jesus speaks of the salvation that he offers to human beings. The "I am" sayings without predicate (8:24,28,58) are more difficult to interpret. In the OT "I am" sayings are found in contexts of God's revelation to Israel. "I am" also appears, apparently, as the name of God ("I am who I am"). But note that the LXX translation of this crucial passage in Exodus 3:14 is "I am the one who is" (egō eimi ho ὅν), thus underscoring that the essence of God's being or nature is unique, divine existence: God is.

Clearly the absolute "I am" sayings of the Gospel intend to reveal something about Jesus' person, and to do so with a formula that alludes to the OT formula of divine revelation. Yet Jesus is not simply using a familiar divine name for himself. His statement would not have been heard as "I am Yahweh." Rather, as the "I am" statements especially in chapter 8 reveal, Jesus claims to share in God's eternal existence. He has life in himself (5:26), and the power to lay down his life and to take it again (10:17-18). He also has the power to give life to those who keep his word (8:51; 17:2), thus exercising the unique life-giving prerogative of God. In chapter 8, one of the most heated disputes with his opponents, Jesus' claim "Before Abraham was, I am" (8:58) contrasts Abraham's* kind of life which "came into being" (genesthai) with his own, which simply "is" (egō eimi; present tense). These claims resonate with what is perhaps the central theme of the Gospel: that Jesus has and mediates eternal life (20:30-31; and see 3:16, 36; 4:14, 53; 5:21-26; 6:33, 35, 44, 51-58, 68; 8:12; 10:10, 17-18; 11:25; 14:6; 17:2-3).

There is, therefore, a reference to the divine OT "I am" in the claim of 8:58, but it is allusive or indirect. Jesus does not say "I am the I am." In fact, in 8:24 and 28, when Jesus uses the absolute "I am," no one reacts, except in puzzlement. It is not until he claims, in 8:48-58, to "have seen Abraham," that is, to share in eternal life, that the people react: now he is claiming to have or give what God alone has and gives. The Johannine "I am" statements link Jesus' work and person in the most intimate relationship with the divine person and work. They are, therefore, closely analogous to the predicate "Word" and "God" (see 4.1.1. and 4.1.2. above).

4.1.4. Son of God. In the Gospel and Epistles of John, Jesus is called the "Son of God" (huios), while Christians are called "children of God" (tekna) who are "born of God" (see Son of God). This distinction highlights the unique relationship of Jesus to the Father, which is further underscored by the Gospel's designation of Jesus as "the only Son" or "the unique Son" (monogenēs). (The KJV's translation of this term as "only begotten" is due to Jerome's translation of the Greek term with the Latin unigenitus—"only begotten"—which the KJV then echoed. Jerome was answering the Arian assertion that Jesus was "made" not "begotten.")

The frequent characterization of the Son as "sent" from the Father has a legal flavor. As Son, Jesus can function as a unique delegate (šālîaḥ) on his Father's behalf and, indeed, the "Father has given all things into the Son's hands" (3:35). Nevertheless, that Jesus is Son also underlines his dependence on and obedience to the Father (5:19, "The Son can do nothing of his own accord"; cf. 3:34; 7:28; 8:26, 42; 10:32, 37; 12:49). All that the Son does, he does in perfect harmony with his Father's will. Thus the Gospel speaks of reciprocal knowledge of Father and Son (10:15). Because of this intimate and reciprocal knowledge, the Son reveals the Father (1:18; 8:38; 15:15; 17:25-26). When the Gospel speaks of the unity of the Father and Son, it points especially to their unity in the work of revelation and salvation (8:16; 10:25-30; 14:10-11; 17:10). That is to say, the actions and words of Jesus were truly the actions and words of God. In the incarnate Word we are confronted by God, and the designation of Jesus as "Son" serves to underscore the intimate connection between God and Jesus.
4.1.5. Messiah. In the NT John alone presents the transliterated form of the Hebrew or Aramaic term messias (1:41; 4:25); "Christ" (christos) is used 17 times; and the compound "Jesus Christ" occurs twice (1:17; 17:3; see Christ). Whether or not Jesus is the Messiah becomes a topic of conversation and controversy far more often than in the Synoptics. The Baptist denies that he is the Messiah (1:20; 3:28); Jesus' disciples acclaim him as Messiah quite early in the narrative (1:41); both the Samaritans (4:29) and Jews (7:25-31, 4043, 52; 12:49) discuss Messiahship; and the confession of Jesus as Messiah is met with expulsion from the synagogue (9:22; cf. 16:2). Yet, like the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus does not announce himself to be the Messiah, nor answer plainly when asked whether he is the Christ (10:24). There is a secret to Jesus' messiahship in John, and that secret is revealed to the eyes of faith. John's use of the term Messiah still maintains its meaning of the one anointed by God as vice regent in the messianic kingdom, and John emphasizes Jesus' kingly role (6:14-15; 18:33-37). In some places it appears that Messiah is virtually equivalent to "Son of God" (20:31), emphasizing again the unique relationship to God that this appointed agent has.

4.1.6. Son of Man. Few problems have vexed scholars as greatly as that of the title or phrase "Son of man" in the Gospels (see Son of Man). The central features of John's portrait of Jesus as "Son of man" may be sketched. (1) As the Son of man, Jesus serves as judge in the final judgment (5:27), a usage paralleling the Synoptic statements that the Son of man will return in glory (Mk 13:26). (2) Son of man is particularly linked with death, especially when it is described as Jesus being "lifted up" from the earth. (3) The Son of man reveals God by serving as the mediator between earth and heaven (1:51; 3:13; 6:27, 62). These three categories should not be kept distinct from each other, however, but are obviously closely related. Jesus' glorification and death are nearly synonymous in John, for Jesus' death is at the same time his lifting up to the Father in glory (Jn 3:14). Moreover, when he is lifted up his work is brought to its climactic fulfillment as mediator between God and all humankind.

4.1.7. Prophet. The Gospel speaks of Jesus as "prophet," but the question is whether John accepts this designation for Jesus; regards it as correct, but not ultimate or adequate; or rejects it entirely (see Prophet, Prophecy). A prophet was a person who spoke with divine authority and by divine inspiration. When Jesus heals the man born blind, the man acknowledges him to be "a prophet" (9:17), thus confessing him to be "from God" (9:16). Jesus' feeding of the five thousand leads people to exclaim, "Surely this is the prophet who is to come into the world!" (6:14), and some wonder whether he is "the Prophet" (7:40). These acclamations honor Jesus not just as one among the prophets, but as the Prophet who would appear in the end time, thus fulfilling the promise of Moses to the people in Deuteronomy 18:15, "The Lord your God will raise up for you a prophet like me." The expectation of a prophet-like-Moses was known among the Samaritans (cf. Jn 4:19) and the community at Qumran (4Q Testim 5-8). Thus the confession of Jesus as a prophet acknowledges Jesus' divine commissioning and authoritative message; but the confession of Jesus as the Prophet points to his unique role as the final prophet of God. Here again Jesus is portrayed as the chief and unique agent of God.

We may summarize John's portrait of Jesus by noting the importance of the category of the agent as background. Jesus is the uniquely commissioned agent of God who, in his task of bringing the salvation of God to the world, exercises a unique, mediating function between God and human beings. Because Jesus is the designated agent of God, he also represents God to human beings in such a way that the Gospel can say that to encounter Jesus is to encounter God, to have seen him is to have seen the Father (12:45; 14:7-9), or to know and receive him is to have known and received the Father (8:19; 12:44; 13:20; 17:8; cf. 15:23). As God's agent Jesus carries out a mission which mediates God's salvation to the world, as is manifested in the signs which he does.

4.2. Signs and Faith. According to John 20:30-31 the narratives of the signs were written down in order to lead to faith. And while the signs figure prominently throughout the Gospel, there are numerous problems surrounding our interpretation of the meaning and role of signs, including such issues as the definition of a sign, the function of signs, and the relationship of signs and faith.

The term sign is not unique to John, although it is used differently than in the Synoptic Gospels. There a sign is either (1) an act confirming the truth of what Jesus has said, which Jesus refuses to supply (Mk 8:11-12); or (2) a portent of the end times (Mk 13:4, 22). In the Synoptics the miracles are usually called "mighty deeds" (dynamiseis). But in John the miracles are regularly called "signs" (sēmeia). "Sign" need not, in and of itself, mean "miracle" (see Miracles, Miracle Stories). In the OT prophetic acts that signalled the coming of some future act of God (such as judgment) were called "signs." Thus some scholars think that in John the signs include the healings,* feeding of the five thousand and changing of the water into wine—in short, the miracles—but possibly other acts as well, such as the Temple cleansing or even the resurrection of Jesus himself. But for the broad spectrum of Jesus' activity, the Gospel reserves the word works.

Whereas the Synoptics narrate several dozen miracles, John recounts but a few. They are the changing of the water to wine (2:1-11); the healing of the official's son (4:46-54); the healing of the man at the pool of Bethesda (5:1-9); the feeding of the five thousand (6:1-13); the healing of the man born blind (9:1-12); and the raising of Lazarus (11:1-44). Some also include the walking on the water (6:16-21), the resurrection and the catch of fish (21:1-8). The two healings each illustrate the truth of the statement "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live" (5:25 RSV). These signs show Jesus' life-giving power. Even more dramatically is this power manifested in Jesus' raising of Lazarus. The two "gift" or "supply miracles" (the changing of the water to wine and the feeding) strike a note of messianic fulfillment and abundance. The extravagant provision of wine at the wedding may allude to traditions that in the messianic age the yield of the vineyards would be enormous and spectacular *(1 Enoch 10:19; 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:5; Irenaeus Haer. 5.33.3). Similarly, the provision of bread in the wilderness calls to mind the promises of the return of the treasury of manna from on high in the age to come. Finally, the healing of the man born blind blends together favorite Johannine terms such as light and darkness, seeing and believing, judgment and guilt, in such a way that their symbolic import is obvious. But the healing on the physical level is not played down. One is to see in the magnanimous act of healing the generous grace of God and to see Jesus carrying out "the work of God."

We may define a sign as a manifestation, through the person of Jesus, of God's work in the world. Signs are not understood to prove Jesus' divinity—for, as the Synoptics make clear, miracles only raise the question of the source of one's power, whether demonic or divine—but to point to the fact that God works through him. Specifically, God works through Jesus to bring salvation to the world, a salvation not merely symbolized by the signs, but also offered through the signs inasmuch as they are tokens of the eschatological activity of God in the world (see Eschatology). Thus the signs are revelatory of the glory of God inasmuch as they show God's power at work through the person of Jesus. Specifically, that power is understood as life-giving power, and Jesus' signs point to the fact that he offers life. It is appropriate to his life-giving work that his deeds involve the physical universe and the elements necessary for life (bread, water, wine, healing of the human body, restoration of life). Jesus offers bread which satisfies spiritual hunger and thirst even as he also offers that which meets the physical needs of hunger and thirst, and he does so because he is the agent of the God who creates and who rules, the maker and judge of all. Through Jesus, the incarnate Word through whom the world was made, God is at work restoring health and bringing salvation.

A sign is thus properly understood when it is seen as pointing to God's work through the person of Jesus to effect salvation. To have grasped this truth is to have come to faith. Signs thus serve an indirect role in mediating faith, but by no means are they discounted. Yet some interpreters have taken texts such as 4:48 to point to a relativization of the role of miracles in John. But the statement of 2:11, that the disciples believed when they saw Jesus' glory, is programmatic for the Gospel's understanding of signs: Jesus' glory is revealed in the signs, and those who see the glory of Jesus (cf. 1:14) have grasped the secret of his person and identity.

And yet it is difficult to detect a systematic understanding of the relationship between signs and faith* in John. Sometimes those who are witnesses of a sign are also led to belief in Jesus (2:11; 4:54), so that seeing leads to believing. And yet some who see do not believe, including the Pharisees of chapter 9; perhaps the crowds of chapter 6; and, depending on how one reads the evidence, the crowds of 2:23-25, Nicodemus (cf. 3:1-2) and the man at the pool of Bethesda. The summary statement of 12:37-38, "Although Jesus had done so many signs before them, yet they did not believe," characterizes them. They did not fail to believe that a miracle had been done; rather, they did not discern the meaning of the sign. Thus they did not "see signs" as manifestations of God's work through Jesus and of God's glory in Jesus—a work and glory understood to be unique to Jesus.

On the other hand, there are those who do not see signs and yet believe. All the readers of the Gospel who were not also eyewitneses fall into this category. Their faith is not superior to those who came to believe through Jesus' signs, but neither is it an inferior faith, and this is the point of Jesus' statement to Thomas, "Blessed are those who have not seen and yet believe" (20:29 RSV). Those who "see" the signs, "see" the secret of Jesus' person as the mediator of God's salvation to humankind.

4.3. Salvation. In Jesus' prayer there is a pithy statement that summarizes the Gospel's view of salvation*: "This is eternal life: to know God and Jesus Christ whom [God] has sent" (17:3). Here several elements of the Johannine theology of salvation come to the fore and need to be examined. First is the restatement of the Gospel message in terms of "eternal life," a term found in the Synoptic Gospels but not nearly so dominant in those Gospels as it is here in John (see Life). Second, this verse apparently implies this eternal life is something that one has in the present. Third, eternal life comes about through or is equated with "knowing" (rather than believing, confessing, trusting), which seems to point to a cognitive dimension of salvation. Indeed, the previous discussion of the relationship of signs and faith underscores the importance of "seeing" and "understanding" in the Gospel of John, suggesting that salvation can be characterized as the response to the revelation that one sees. These elements can be examined in turn in order to come to a fuller understanding of the Johannine view of salvation.

4.3.1. Eternal Life. It would not be amiss to summarize the Son's mission and the theme of the Gospel of John in terms of "eternal life." The Son comes so that those who believe in him may be saved or receive eternal life, and the Gospel's purpose is phrased in similar terms. But it is more difficult to explain the origin of, and impetus for, John's use of eternal life. When compared with the other Gospels, John seems to give to "eternal life" the prominence that they accord to "kingdom of God." Some scholars have suggested that John uses eternal life in place of kingdom of God in order to accent the personal and individualistic aspects of salvation. Others suggest that eternal life can convey the inner experience of salvation more aptly than a term like kingdom of God. Still other scholars have argued that John's preference for "eternal life" can be explained in terms of his historical setting: the Jewish "kingdom of God" has been reinterpreted for John's Hellenistic readership as "eternal life," perhaps emphasizing its timeless reality.

Of course the Synoptic Gospels do use the terms life and eternal life (Mt 19:16-17; Mk 10:29-30; Mt 29:29; Lk 18:29-30; cf. Mt 7:14; Lk 13:23-24; Mk 10:26; Mt 19:25; Lk 18:26). Already in the Synoptics "eternal life" and "kingdom of God" appear as virtual equivalents (Mk 9:43, 45, 47; 10:17-30; Mt 19:23-29; Lk 18:24-30). "Eternal life" translates zōē aiōnios, which literally means "life of the age," but was used in Jewish writings prior to, or contemporaneous with, the NT to mean "life of the age to come" (Dan 12:2; Pss. Sol. 3:12; 13:11; 14:10; 1 Enoch 37:4; 58:3). The absolute "life" is used in the same way. The same situation obtains for the Gospel of John. "Life" and "eternal life" are used interchangeably, and can also be used in place of "kingdom of God" to speak of the state of blessedness that one participates in through faith in Jesus. Thus the background against which one should understand the term "eternal life" is chiefly that of the Jewish view of the "life of the age to come" that the righteous are to inherit.

This "eternal life" or "life of the age to come" is the very life that God has, God's own kind of life, divine life. We may see how the adjective "eternal" fits the noun "life," for God alone exists eternally. According to John, the Father "has life in himself" (5:26). Furthermore, the Father "has granted the Son also to have life in himself." The Son has life, then, in dependence on the Father, and as the Father has it. And believers have life insofar as they depend on the Father through the mediating work of Jesus Christ. Thus John sums up, "This is eternal life, that they know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent" (17:3 RSV). Here John does not state that knowing God precedes or is necessary for eternal life, but that knowing God is eternal life. Those who know God in the present have an incorruptible fellowship with God that cannot be severed or impugned by death. This understanding of eternal life shows its affinities with the Synoptic's "kingdom of God." Both "kingdom of God" and "eternal life" come from God and are mediated through the agent of divine rule, Jesus Christ.

But what makes the Johannine statements about eternal life particularly striking is that they promise eternal life in the present (5:24-26). Attempts to argue that John relegates the reception of eternal life entirely to the future have not proved convincing. And yet it seems almost a contradiction in terms to speak of having "eternal life," the life of the age to come, in the present for eternal life is that life which does not end—and yet John clearly expects the death and resurrection of believers. "Life" and "resurrection" are not simply synonyms in John. Nor should we understand eternal life as a purely spiritual or individualized reality. John does not abandon the Jewish conception of "eternal life" as entailing the gathering of the people of God, nor does he spiritualize the hope for the resurrection of the body. Eternal life is present now insofar as through Jesus knowledge of and fellowship with God is mediated. Thus eternal life is also the appropriation by faith of unseen yet present realities that shape one's life in this world and become more fully realized in the next.

But even as salvation is present to believers through faith in Christ so judgment is effected in the present as well (3:16-21, 36). This facet of John's theology which emphasizes the present manifestations of salvation and judgment is known as "realized eschatology." It is not unique in the NT, which stresses the present reality of salvation in Christ but it is fair to say that in John the "realized" aspects of salvation receive greater emphasis (see Eschatology). John's best-known image for the presence of salvation is that of new birth, of being "born again" (see New Birth).

There is a play on words in the phrase "born again," for the Greek (γεννάω anōthen) can be understood to mean either "born from above" or "born anew." Nico-demus's protest that one cannot enter into his mother's womb and be "born again" shows that he misunderstands the meaning of Jesus' assertion "you must be born from above," for Jesus refers to the importance of submitting to a new work of the Spirit in one's life. This statement is to be taken both at the individual and corporate level. On the level of the individual there is a call to pay heed to a new work of the Spirit through Jesus and the community of faith, and to be renewed by the working of the Spirit. But on the corporate level there is implicit also a statement about who the elect people of God are, for the imagery of new birth states that there is no continuous or automatic movement forward from Judaism to eternal life. Although salvation is "from the Jews" in the person of the Messiah, Jesus, merely belonging to the Jewish people does not guarantee entry into life (3:36).

Not surprisingly, the Fourth Gospel also accents the role of human decision and faith, for it is through faith in Jesus that one becomes a member of the people of God, and not through descent or birth. However, faith is not to be construed as a natural human inclination, for those who come are those "drawn by God" or "taught by God" (6:44-45). John underscores both the divine sovereignty in drawing people to faith as well as the human responsibility in responding to Jesus (Carson). Similarly, there is an emphasis on God's trustworthiness in keeping believers faithful, as well as an insistent call to "abide" (or persevere) in the faith. But the Gospel does not deal philosophically with questions about predestination and free will. Its chief concern is to show that Jesus was the divinely commissioned agent endowed with the unlimited power of the Spirit (3:34), and that those who respond to Christ in faith are enlivened by the same Spirit of God (3:5-8). Conversely, those who do not come to Christ cannot justly claim to have the Spirit of God at work within them.

4.3.2. Salvation As Revelation. The Gospel's emphasis on coming to know or believe what Jesus makes known suggests that salvation consists in accepting the revelation that Jesus brings. The image that Jesus is the light* of the world fits here as well, for "light" is frequently understood in the OT as an image for instruction and guidance, that Jesus is the light of the world (8:12; 9:5) means that he makes known the way in which people are to walk in order to have salvation. A similar statement is "I am the way, the truth, and the life" (14:6). The predicates in this statement can be read as making three distinct assertions about Jesus, or they can be subordinated, as follows: "I am the way, that leads to truth and life" (or, "I am the way and the truth that leads to life"), thus underscoring that what Jesus makes known is not a new concept about God, but the path to God. When, at times, his revelation is set over against that of the OT Scriptures or patriarchs, and especially Moses, it does not invalidate what was made known there, but rather shows that the revelation through the Son now fulfills and supersedes all other revelation. What Moses said was true, but now since the fullness of truth resides in the Son, those who claim to be "disciples of Moses" are not disciples of the truth at all, inasmuch as they reject the one who is himself truth. Salvation consists in coming to accept the embodiment of truth in the person of Jesus, not in adhering to abstract formulations of truth about Jesus.

4.3.3. The Death of Jesus. Jesus' death as an atonement for sin does not figure prominently in John (see Death of Jesus). There may be an allusion to atonement when the Baptist identifies Jesus as "the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (1:36; see Lamb of God). But even if the atoning function of Jesus' death is not highlighted, it is clear that the mission of Jesus is brought to fulfillment with his death. While John's characterization of the effects of Jesus' death shares certain traits, both with the Synoptic Gospels and with Paul, it has distinctive features as well. (1) John particularly acccents the fact that Jesus' death serves to gather together the people of God (Jn 10:1-18; 11:46-52; 12:20-33; cf. Ezek 34). The Messiah was expected to gather together those scattered throughout the diaspora, and this expectation is found fulfilled in Jesus, even though that in-gathering is not understood in literal and physical terms. Even so, the gathering together of the "children of God scattered abroad" signals God's final salvation at work in the world. (2) Jesus gives his life so that others may have life. As one who has 'life in himself' he can bestow on others the gift of life, but only through his death. (3) Jesus' death shows his love for his own (13:1), as well as revealing God's love for the world (3:16-17). In its manifestation of self-giving love, it becomes an example for his disciples (13:11-17; 15:13).

4.4. The Community and the Paraclete.
The Paraclete. The term "paraclete" (paraklētos) is unique in the NT to the Johannine literature and is ascribed once to Jesus in the epistles (1 Jn 2:1) and to the Holy Spirit in the Gospels (see Holy Spirit). Scholars have debated the meaning and background of the term. The popular interpretation of the Paraclete as "one called alongside to help" is derived from analysis of the two parts of the compound Greek word: para, meaning "by" or "with," and kaleō, meaning "to call." Thus it is deduced that the Paraclete is one "called alongside (to help)." But if this is the function of the Paraclete in John, then this must be discerned from statements in the Gospel itself and not from dubious etymological arguments. Other interpreters relate the word to paraklēsis, which means "exhortation" or "encouragement," hence the traditional rendering "Comforter." And yet in John the Spirit's functions are not primarily to comfort or console believers.

In 1 John 2:1 "paraclete" seems closest to "intercessor" (although some take it more in a forensic sense, close to defending attorney). The Paraclete may be understood in terms of the Latin advocatus, who was a legal assistant or friend at court, a person of sufficient reputation to influence the king, emperor or other sovereign.

As stated above, in 1 John the Paraclete is the risen Jesus, but in the Gospel the Paraclete is the Holy Spirit (14:26), the "Spirit of Truth" (14:16; 15:26; 16:13). But Jesus also promises that upon his departure he will send "another Paraclete" (14:16). While the Greek could be construed to read "another who will be a Paraclete," most scholars prefer the translation "another Paraclete," implying that the first is Jesus. It is thus often assumed that John states that the Paraclete-Jesus comes back to the disciples in the person of the Paraclete-Spirit. But while there is continuity and overlap between the ministries of Jesus and the Paraclete, there are important distinctions as well.

The functions of the Paraclete can be divided between his relationship to the world and his relationship to the disciples. With respect to the world, the Paraclete serves as an accuser, putting the world on trial, pronouncing it guilty of sin and worthy of condemnation (16:8-11; cf. 14:17; 15:18-26). But the Paraclete's functions with respect to the disciples are described positively. Above all, the Paraclete assumes the role of teacher* (16:13), guiding the disciples into all truth by reminding them of what Jesus had said, where reminding seems to have the force not only of recollecting, but of interpreting as well. Indeed, as stated earlier, much of the Paraclete-inspired truth is found in the Gospel of John. One cannot, then, speak of the role of the Paraclete without also turning to the Gospel's vision of the community in which the Paraclete plays such a central role.

4.4.2. The Community. Certainly the Gospel of John emphasizes the necessity of the individual appropriation of faith in God through Jesus Christ. However, the individualistic tenor of the Gospel is balanced by its stress on one's obligation within the community of faith (see Church). The community of which the believer becomes a part is characterized by its unity and love. Its unity is modelled on the relationship between the Father and the Son, and is thus characterized by an intimacy of love, as well as a common purpose in serving as the vehicle of bringing God's revelation and salvation to the world. We may say that the unity of which the Gospel speaks has two aspects: (1) It is contemporary, a unity among Christians of any one age or time; (2) it is historical, binding Christians to their predecessors in the faith. Both are of concern in the Gospel, as Jesus' high priestly prayer for the community demonstrates. In fact the line most often quoted in ecumenical circles, "that they may all be one," refers to the unity that exists between believers of Jesus' own day and those of second and later generations of believers. They are all, equally and together, the one people of God. A concomitant of the emphasis on unity is an accent on love, where love is understood as the peculiar bond of service and loyalty which unites Christians to their God and to each other.

The Christian fellowship is distinguished in Johannine thought from the "world"* (kosmos). "World" has several shades of meaning, from the positive created order, to the sphere of human beings, to human beings as they are hostile to the revelation of God in Christ. It is in the last sense that the "world" is a force opposing, rejecting or indifferent to God and the people of God. For if God's people are characterized by their trust in God, then the world is marked by its lack of similar commitment. The church's role vis-à-vis the world is to bear witness to the truth through its proclamation and example in order that the world may know its guilt, repent, and come to the light and be saved. While some scholars have painted the portrait of the Johannine church as a community alienated from its environment, hostile to unbelievers and without a sense of responsibility toward the world, the statements of the church's mission—even when the mission results in pronouncing judgment—cannot be overlooked as suggesting that the Johannine community retained its sense of mission.

See also Abiding; Bread, Farewell Discourse; Glory; "I Am" Sayings,

JOHN THE BAPTIST

1. The Importance of John the Baptist
2. John's Origins and Early Activities
3. Jewish Expectations and Practices
4. John's Eschatological Message and Ministry
5. Jesus' View of John and His Ministry
6. The Death of the Baptist
7. The Baptist Movement in the Christian Era
8. The Christian Portrayal of the Baptist

1. The Importance of John the Baptist.

Numerous lines of evidence demonstrate the importance of John the Baptist or John the Baptizer, as he is sometimes called in the NT (cf. Mk 1:4; 6:14, 24). (1) All four Gospels associate John with, or treat him as, the "beginning of the gospel" (cf. also Acts 1:22; see Gospel [Good News]). (2) Jesus reportedly claimed that he was more than a prophet* and, from a human point of view, the greatest human being (Mt 11:11 /Lk 7:28 and Mt 11:9/Lk 7:26). (3) Unlike the case with other major NT figures (such as the apostles), only the deaths of John and Jesus are given significant treatment in the NT (cf. Mk 6:14-29 and par.). (4) The author of Luke-Acts indicates that John was such a significant figure that he still had disciples or followers long after his death (cf. Acts 18:25; 19:1-7). (5) The Synoptic Gospels state that Jesus submitted to John's baptism, and the earliest Gospel suggests that at least initially Jesus preached a message similar to John's (Mk 1:14-15). Also, the Fourth Gospel suggests that Jesus assisted John for a time or followed his example in the wilderness (see Mountain and Wilderness), collecting disciples* and supervising baptisms* (Jn 3:22-36). Indeed, during and at the end of his ministry Jesus expresses his own purpose and authority by comparing and contrasting himself with John and suggesting they are part of a single effort by God* to reach his people (cf. Mt U:16-19/Lk 7:31-35 and Mk 11:27-33 and par.). (6) There are some traditions which suggest that Jesus saw John as the eschatological prophet Elijah* redivivus (cf. Mk 9:12-13 and par.). (7) Jesus apparently was thought by some to be John come back from the dead (cf. Mk 6:14 and par.). (8) According to the Synoptic Gospels Jesus did not begin his Galilean ministry (see Galilee) until after John died, which suggests that both John's life and death influenced how Jesus acted.

2. John's Origins and Early Activities.

Luke alone informs us that John was born into a pious and priestly family, to parents well advanced in age (Lk 1). He also informs us that John's father, Zechariah, served in Herod's Temple* and that he and his family lived in a town in the Judean hill country (Lk 1:39). Luke 1:36 tells us that his mother, Elizabeth, was a female relative of Jesus' mother, Mary. The Greek word sungenis is a general term which could refer to an aunt or a cousin (Jn 1:33 suggests that the kinship may have been rather remote). In any case, Jesus grew up in Nazareth, John apparently in Judea.

Several considerations have led some scholars to conjecture that John may have been a part of the Qumran community from an early age (see Dead Sea Scrolls). (1) The Qumran community had priestly connections, plus an interest in priestly matters and a priestly Messiah (1QS 5.2). John also had priestly connections, and John's parents may well have passed away when he was quite young. Apparently, the Qumran community frequently adopted orphans (Josephus J.W. 2.120). (2) The locale of John's ministry suggests a connection with Qumran. (3) The Gospel tradition introduces John using Isaiah 40:3 (cf. Mk 1:2), a text that was also very important at Qumran (cf. 1QS 8.14). (4) John's spartan diet and apparent ascetical behavior have analogies with Qumran (S. L Davies). The Damascus Rule 12.13-14 in fact specifies how to eat honey and locusts. (5) John's water rite has similarities to Qumran ablution rites. (6) John's eschatological orientation and belief that the judgment* of God would soon fall on Israel* itself, with the possible exception of those who would repent,* parallel Qumran. John's apparent belief that the religious leadership of Israel was hopelessly corrupt strikes a chord with some attitudes known to have existed at Qumran.

This list, however impressive, does not prove a connection between John and Qumran for several reasons. (1) When we first meet John in the Gospels he is not, or is no longer, part of the Qumran community. Rather, he is undertaking his own ministry by calling the nation to repentance, not merely withdrawing from it as if it were hopelessly corrupt (2) There are major differences between John's water rite and the usual lustrations at Qumran (see section 2.3), though there may have been an initiatory water rite at Qumran as well. (3) John allows both the clean and the unclean to come into contact with him (possibly even Gentiles,* cf. Lk 3:14) and apparently does not believe in an already existing "righteous remnant" of Israel, that is, one which exists prior to submitting to his baptism. (4) John was perceived by Herod Antipas (see Herodian Dynasty) to be a political threat in a way in which the Qumran community apparently was not.

(5) John's diet is what would be expected of any itinerant in the wilderness. At most it only suggests either that John was consciously taking the prophetic mantle upon himself, as his dress suggested (cf. Zech 13:4, 2 Kings 1:8), and/or assuming a Nazirite vow. In any case, fasting,* ascetic behavior and devotion to prayer* (cf. Lk 11:1; Mt 11:18 and par.) were by no means unique to the Qumran community. Indeed, Josephus* tells us of one Bannus (Life 1 l-12a) who ate and dressed much like John, lived in the Judean wilderness and stressed ritual ablutions. Thus, while John may have been connected with Qumran at one time, in the Gospels this is no longer the case (see Reicke).

3.1. Messianic Hope and the Baptist. In early Judaism messianic hope took on a variety of shapes (see Revolutionary Movements). Some Jews expected a particular Messianic figure in the mold of David to come and retake the promised land by force for God's people (cf. Pss. Sol. 17). Some Qumranites seem to have expected two messianic figures—a priestly one and a kingly one (cf. 1QS 9.11; also T. Levi 18; T. Reuben 6:8). Still other Jews looked for an eschatological prophet like Moses* (cf. 4QTest; 1QS 9.11; cf. also the Samaritan expectation of a Taheb who will be a Moses redivivus). There were those who looked for the coming of a messianic age in general without focusing on a particular messianic figure. Other early Jews, apparently including the Sadducees,* seem to have had no messianic hopes.

P. W. Barnett (1977) has noted a pattern that various early messianic movements took (see Revolutionary Movements). Whether one is talking about Theudas, or the Egyptian or the Samaritan—or a figure like Jesus—all seem to have drawn significant crowds in remote areas, whether in the Judean wilderness, near the Jordan or in remote areas of Galilee. All of them performed or promised to perform symbolic acts which had messianic overtones (i.e., divide Jordan, cause Jerusalem's walls to collapse, reveal the Temple vessels on Mt Gerizim, provide manna in the wilderness for the 5,000). Note that John the Baptizer preached in "the wilderness," particularly at the Jordan, drew great crowds and performed an act symbolizing a change in the status of at least some of God's people—water baptism.

Given that all messianic movements in early Judaism had some social and political repercussions, even if that was not always their design, it is easy to see how John the Baptist who so far as we know made no messianic claims, could have been viewed as some sort of messianic figure. In addition, he could have been perceived as a threat to some of the governing authorities and, in light of Jewish views about martyrdom, John could have had an ongoing group of followers long after his death. All of these messianic figures, including the Baptist implied and in some cases articulated a belief that things were not as they ought to be among God's people. Thus, at least by implication, the existing authorities, both religious and political, both Jewish and Roman, were indicted by the very existence of these movements. It is into this sort of environment that both John and Jesus came raising messianic hopes and making various authorities uneasy, to the point that both were eventually executed.

One particular form of messianic hope which needs to be explored more fully in connection with John the Baptist is the belief that Elijah* or one like him would come, signalling the advent either of the messianic age, or of the Messiah or both. Whether there was such an expectation, or at least whether it was widespread during the lifetime of John the Baptist and Jesus, has been disputed (cf. Faierstein; Allison; Fitzmyer).

One must consider a number of factors, however. (1) Early Christians did associate John the Baptist with Elijah as the Gospels attest (2) It is also clear that in Mark 9:11-13 and parallels we have a tradition indicating that the teachers of the Law* taught that Elijah must come first to restore all things, but we are not told explicitly what the scribes thought he would come before—either the Messiah,* or the Day of the Lord or the Son of man* rising from the dead. Nevertheless, it is unlikely that early Christians would have attributed a Christian interpretation of the eschatological Elijah figure to the scribes if there was no basis for this in fact. (3) The tradition found in Malachi 3:23-24 (Mt 4:5-6) says explicitly that Elijah will come before the great and terrible Day of the Lord, which presumably refers to the Day of Judgment (this idea is also found in such texts as Sir 48 and possibly 1 Enoch 90:31). (4) An unpublished fragment from Qumran (4QarP) reads Ikn slh T'lyh qd[m]—"I will send Elijah before"—but unfortunately it breaks off at this point (5) The baraita in b. 'Erub. 43a-b, which quotes the Malachi passage and then comments on it provides us with the earliest clear extra-canonical evidence that Elijah would return before Messiah came. This tradition dates to the third century of the Common Era and may be much earlier, but since it is not associated with a particular Jewish teacher, we cannot be sure. Thus, there may have been a belief in Elijah as forerunner of Messiah in John's time, but we cannot be sure how widespread it was.

What is certain is that the Gospel tradition indicates that Jesus interpreted John the Baptist as an Elijah figure, and since this idea is found in at least two sources, it is very likely to be authentic (cf. Mk 9:12-13 and par. and Mt 11:14). It is also clear from Mark 9:12-13 that we have the sequence of first Elijah (John), then the Son of man, with both suffering similar fates. The natural way to understand Mark 9:11 is to say that the scribes were claiming Elijah would be the first in a sequence of messianic comings, an idea the early church would hardly have predicated of the scribes if the church had invented it and also placed it on Jesus' lips (Allison).

Thus, in the NT there are various traditions suggesting that John was viewed as an Elijah figure, and there is also evidence that Elijah was expected as a precursor of the final eschatological work of God, and perhaps also of Messiah. At least two Gospels indicate Jesus viewed John in this light.

3.2. The End of Prophecy.

There are some OT and some intertestamental traditions which suggest that after Zechariah, Haggai and Malachi, OT prophecy as we know it ceased. Psalm 74:9 has been understood in this way, or one may point to 1 Maccabees 9:27 which speaks of the distress in the land since the prophets ceased to appear there (cf. 1 Macc 4:45-6; 14:41, 2 Apoc. Bar. 85:3). Of later provenance are traditions in the Talmud that state explicitly that Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi were the last of the prophets.

Whether or not one agrees that the apocalyptic* literature that came to the fore in the intertestamental period is a form of and the sequel to OT prophecy, there is no question that the classical prophetic movement had disappeared long before the beginning of the NT era. The apocalyptic literature was by and large pseudonymous in contrast to much of classical prophecy, and furthermore it was primarily a literary rather than oral phenomenon. The rabbinic notion of the bat qôl ("daughter of a voice"), an audible echo of the heavenly voice that formerly spoke to the prophets, also attests to a difference from the period of classical prophecy. Thus, when John the Baptist arrived on the scene around A.D. 28 (cf.
Lk 3:1), he was probably perceived by some as a new and different figure, unlike anyone since the OT prophets and most like such classical figures as Isaiah, Jeremiah or Elijah.

3.3. Jewish Water Rites. The discussion about what precedents there may have been for John's baptism has been a heated one among scholars (see Baptism). This is in part the case because it is uncertain when proselyte baptism was first practiced by early Jews. In addition to the matter of OT water rituals having to do with ceremonial uncleanness, there is also the vexed question of what, if any, connection the Baptist may have had with the Qumran community (see section 1 above). It is also possible that John's rite was something new and different, without precedent

With regard to the matter of proselyte baptism, several considerations are relevant (1) The Mishna (m. Pesaḥ. 8.8) records a dispute between the school of Hillel and Shammai concerning whether or not a newly circumcised proselyte may immerse himself and eat the Paschal meal. If this dispute goes back to Hillel and Shammai, then it pre-dates John's ministry. (2) The Babylonian Talmud (b. Yebam. 46a) also records a dispute between two first-century A.D. rabbis about proselyte baptism and its necessity. (3) In view of the Jewish belief that Gentiles in general were unclean, the likelihood is strong that there was some rite of initiation such as proselyte baptism for female converts to early Judaism. Thus, proselyte baptism probably did exist during John's era (but cf. Pusey, Betz, Badia and Taylor, McKnight).

However, we must note several differences between John's practice and that of Jewish proselyte baptism. (1) apparently, John was the active immerser when he offered his rite, but Jewish proselytes immersed themselves. (2) John performed his rite primarily on Jews who, of course, were never subject to Jewish proselyte baptism. Thus, one may argue that John was practicing proselyte baptism on Jews, which suggests that he did not feel their heredity was an adequate safeguard from God's coming eschatological wrath. Indeed, it seems he felt Israel was lost, just like the Gentile world, unless they repented and received his baptism.

There are also salient differences between John's practice and both the water lustrations mentioned in the OT and those found at Qumran, including the cleansing ritual in the mikwâ. (1) John's rite, like proselyte baptism, was a unique and unpeated ritual so far as we can tell. (2) There is no indication that John's rite had anything to do with purely ceremonial uncleanness caused, for instance, by touching a corpse. Apparently, it is only or at least primarily moral uncleanness that is at issue in John's rite. (3) John's baptism seems to have been an initiation rite, not a rite to continue to maintain purity or cleanliness for one who was already basically in right relationship with Yahweh. (4) There is no evidence that John required a probationary period before being immersed, nor any prior demonstration of one's earnestness to obey God other than the willingness to come forward and be baptized.

When one considers the Qumran initiatory water rite, both the probationary period and self-immersion appear to distinguish the Qumran practice from that of the Baptist. Quite possibly, the Baptist's rite was uniquely unrepeatable (cf. Badia). Note that John may have been drawing on the ancient idea of trial by water ordeal, in which case the rite is connected with his proclamation about coming wrath and is a visible symbol of preparation for that coming event. One may compare the idea of circumcision being an act invoking the oath curse on oneself, and thus of being cut off by God, if one does not go on to obey the covenant.

3.4. Geographical Considerations.

John ministered "in the wilderness," but the question is "Which wilderness?" Was it Perea, as Josephus' account (Ant. 18.5) and John's death at the hands of Herod Antipas might suggest? Or was he ministering in the Judean wilderness adjacent to the Jordan? If full weight is given to John 1:28 and 3:23, this might suggest a ministry in the north. Riesner (cf. McCown) has even suggested a ministry in Batanaea. What is clear is that John baptized in the Jordan, and our earliest Gospel, Mark, makes clear that Jesus himself was baptized by John in the Jordan (1:9-11 — hypo loannou must mean "by John," distinguishing this rite from normal proselyte baptism). John may have worked his way up and down the Jordan valley (is this what "all the environs of the Jordan" means? cf. Mt 3:5 par. Lk 3:3). Perhaps he sometimes operated adjacent to the Judean wilderness or in Perea or used some of the streams that flow into the Jordan (if Aenon near Salim is near the Salem in Samaria).

Another consideration is whether or not John fully immersed those whom he baptized. If so, presumably he would have needed a body of water of sufficient depth to do so. The Greek verb baptizō does not in itself indicate a particular quantity of water, but if John saw his practice as a modification of proselyte baptism, then he may have totally immersed those who came to him. In any event, there is no reason to doubt that John stayed in the remote regions adjacent to the Jordan, as various different Gospel traditions suggest. Thus the description "the voice of one crying in the wilderness" was an apt one.

4. John's Eschatological Message and Ministry

John the Baptist called his audience to repentance. One major theme of John's preaching was that Yah-weh's eschatological wrath would soon fall on Israel. What is not clear is the relationship between John's preaching of repentance and his baptismal practice. Josephus (Ant. 18.5.2) suggests that repentance was seen as a prerequisite to receiving John's baptism. On the other hand, both Mark and Luke call John's rite a "baptism of repentance," which presumably means a baptism that expresses a willingness to repent and live a life that bears fruit corresponding to repentance (cf. Mt 3:8 par. Lk 3:8,10-14).

That the association of repentance with John's water rite is historically authentic few would care to dispute, particularly in view of the difficulties this connection suggested for the Christian community when Jesus submitted to such a baptism. Only the First Evangelist suggests a motive for Jesus submitting to the rite—"to fulfill all righteousness" (Mt. 3:15)— which may mean to be obedient to God's plan for his life, to fully identify with the needs of God's people. Less probably it may mean he intends to fulfill all Scripture (Davies and Allison).

According to Mark, Q* and John, John the Baptist expected a successor—the Coming One. It has been suggested that John expected Yahweh to come and bring in the Day of the Lord, which is understandable in light of the prophecy in Malachi. On the other hand, the metaphor of untying the sandal (or possibly carrying the sandal), while it connotes the idea of being unworthy to be the servant of the Coming One, also suggests that John envisioned a human successor, one who would come and baptize with Spirit and fire (possibly an example of hendiadys—the fiery Spirit). This means that John did not see himself as the definitive revealer of God (O'Neill).

Did John see Jesus as this Coming One? John 1:29-34 seems to make this identification clear, but a likely authentic Q tradition (Mt 11:2-3 par. Lk 7:19) shows that John had doubts about such an identification even as late as the time of his imprisonment Possibly these doubts were created by the fact that Jesus did not immediately bring down fiery judgment on Israel. Other authentic elements in John's preaching probably include: (1) an appeal to charitable and honest conduct (Lk 3:11-14), some of which Jesus also picks up in his proclamation (cf. Mt. 5:40 and par.); (2) a belief that being a descendant of Abraham* was no guarantee of avoiding the wrath to come, if it was not also accompanied by repentance and its fruit; (3) preaching against immorality, such as that exhibited by Herod Antipas and Herodias in their incestuous union (Lk 3:19) and (4) the idea that the Coming One would gather in the wheat as well as burn up the chaff (Lk 3:17). This means that John conceived of a righteous remnant being created by the Coming One—a community of the faithful who would survive the coming wrath.

These themes do not suggest that John preached the coming dominion of God (Heb. malkûṯ Yahweh; see Kingdom of God) in the same fashion as Jesus. Apparently he did not stress the aspect of good news entailed in the coming events (see Gospel [Good News]). The summary in Mark 1:14 does suggest that Jesus was influenced, at least in his early Galilean preaching, by John (Witherington). This continuity in preaching between John and Jesus can also be found when one compares the likely authentic parable* of the tares (cf. Mt 13:24-30 and par.) to the Johannine preaching found in Matthew 3:7-10 and parallels (Catchpole). Serious attention should also be given to the hints in John 3:22-36 that historically Jesus assisted John or had a parallel ministry involving baptizing in the Judean wilderness prior to John's imprisonment and Jesus' Galilean ministry (Linnemann).

Thus, in this regard, and also by virtue of the fact that Jesus' Galilean ministry begins after John baptizes Jesus (and probably after John was imprisoned), one may say that the origins of Jesus' call and ministry lie in the ministry of the Baptist and perhaps after John's death, in Jesus' desire to continue and to build on some of John's main emphases. John, therefore, rightly deserves the place he is given in Mark 1 as the beginning of the gospel. This raises the question of Jesus' view of John, and John's relationship to God's coming reign.

5. Jesus' View of John and His Ministry.

Jesus was not stinting in his praise of John. According to the Q tradition in Matthew 11:7-11 par. Luke 7:24-28, John is called "the greatest person ever born" and "more than just another prophet." In view of the tendency in the early church to emphasize John's role as a forerunner in relationship to Jesus, subordinating the former to the latter, it is very likely that this Q* tradition is authentic. In Matthew 11:7 we find confirmation of the setting of John's ministry—at the Jordan where there were reeds blowing in the wind. It is possible that in 11:8 we have an allusion to Herod Antipas who is contrasted with John. The way in which this Q tradition is framed suggests that Jesus saw John as the great eschatological prophet, hence the description "more than just another prophet" This comports with traditions which intimate that Jesus thought of John as an Elijah redivivus figure. The quotation of Malachi 3:1 in Matthew 11:10 also confirms Jesus' viewpoint John is one who prepares the way for God's eschatological activity.

The saying in Matthew 11:11b might seem strange—"yet he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he [John]" (RSV). Jesus is probably not talking about John being outside the kingdom and others in it; rather, he is talking about two ways of viewing people—from a purely human perspective and from a kingdom perspective. Judged from a purely human perspective, or if one is considering human origins, Jesus thought John was the greatest Thus Matthew 11:12 is not in conflict with 11:11, for 11:12 suggests that the beginning of the advancement of God's eschatological dominion started when John came on the scene. A similar idea is also found in Luke 16:16 (possibly a variant of the same tradition found in Matthew 11:12-13) where John is probably not said to be the last of the OT prophets, but rather the one who inaugurates the news of the Dominion of God breaking in (cf. 11 3:18). The era of the law and the Prophets lasted until John came on the scene. These conclusions also make sense of another difficult verse, Matthew 11:12b par. Luke 16:16b, which suggests that the violence being done to John and Jesus as proclaimers of God's new activity is in fact violence against God's reign (Schlosser).

Yet for all the praise of John and close identification with John in this new work of God, Jesus also distinguished himself from John in several ways. (1) John is seen as one who prepares the way and one who expects a successor. Jesus sees his ministry as part of that for which John prepared, and he expects no successor to follow him. (2) In their style of ministries Jesus sees a contrast between himself and John (Mt 11:19 par. Lk 7:33-34), and yet in both cases they suffered rejection by "this generation." (3) When Jesus answered John's query from prison (Mt 11:2-6 and par.) he indicated another point of distinction—that is, Jesus' ministry was characterized by miracles, and Jesus sees the Isaianic prophecies about such happenings in the messianic age to be referring to his own ministry.
Although both John and Jesus each had a ministry from God, there were points of discontinuity as well as continuity between the two men in their words, deeds and self-understanding. From a saying such as Matthew 11:19b it also appears that Jesus may have regarded himself as divine Wisdom* personified, something we have no hint of in John's case (With-erington). In any event the measure of the continuity between the two men is perhaps shown by the fact that Mark 6:14, 16 records a likely authentic tradition suggesting that some, including Herod, thought Jesus was John raised from the dead, which they believed explained Jesus' miraculous powers.

6. The Death of the Baptist

Both Josephus and the Gospel tradition agree that John lost his life at the hands of Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee and Perea. If Josephus' account (Ant. 18.5.2) is to be believed, then it appears John was executed not long before the Nabatean War against Antipas. This likely means he died around A.D. 32 (Reicke). We also learn from Josephus that John was imprisoned in the Machaerus—a fortress in Perea east of the Dead Sea, and that he met his end there.

The Gospels do not contradict the testimony of Josephus, though it has been suggested that Mark thought the execution took place in Galilee (6:22). In fact, the text only says that the leading figures of Galilee were invited to Herod's birthday celebration, which could have been held either in Perea or Galilee. Josephus indicates that John was imprisoned and executed because Herod feared John might stir the people to insurrection. This is a believable rationale for Herod Antipas' action. Mark 6:20 (cf. Mt 14:5) also informs us that Herod was afraid of the Baptist but Mark 6:17-29 goes on to relate that John was imprisoned because he had criticized Herod's incestuous marriage with Herodias. Further, it indicates that John was executed because Herodias nursed a grudge against the Baptist and devised a ruse to force Herod into executing the Baptist.

It may be that Josephus is only relating why John was imprisoned by Herod, not the cause of his execution, but if this is not the case, then the Gospels disagree with Josephus on what actually led to the Baptist's death. It will be noted though that Josephus tends to analyze matters in terms of the political issues and forces involved, not in terms of matters of personal intrigue. Furthermore, from Josephus's account we would never have guessed the eschatological character of John's ministry or baptism, another factor Josephus downplays or eliminates in his account Thus, it is doubtful that Josephus should be considered a more reliable authority on the matter of John's death than Mark (Scobie).

7. The Baptist Movement in the Christian Era.

That John had a considerable number of disciples who followed his practices and preaching is indicated in various Gospel sources (cf. Jn 1:35; 3:25-36; Lk 11:1). Indeed, the Johannine material suggests some of Jesus' first disciples were originally John's disciples (this idea is not found in the Synoptics). That John also had a following after his death is indicated by such texts as Acts 18:25; 19:1-7. Consequently, the possibility remains that the movement not merely endured but spread after John's death.

To this day there is a small sect called the Mandaeans in parts of Iraq and Iran who claim to have kept this movement going continuously into the modern era. Modern Christendom was first made aware of their existence when Christian missionaries encountered them in the seventeenth century. It is doubtful that the Mandaean literature, which dates back only to the eighth century, can help us discern anything about the historical John the Baptist except to witness that his ongoing impact was considerably greater than Christians have sometimes thought.

In point of fact John the Baptist is mentioned by various early Christian writers such as Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Hippolytus and Origen. He figures in several apocryphal Christian works such as the second century Gospel According to the Hebrews, the Proto-evangelium of James, and according to Epiphanius he is mentioned in the nonextant Gospel of the Ebionites. Mention should also be made of the references to John's disciples in the Clementine Recognitions I.60, where one of John's disciples is said to claim that John was the Messiah (Farmer).

It is further witness to the ongoing fascination with John that in the twentieth century various scholars have thought they have discovered traditions in the New Testament that ultimately came from the Baptist's followers (for example, Kraeling). Few such conjectures have received widespread acceptance among scholars, though they are not totally implausible (for example, in the case of Luke 1). What is much more certain is that John the Baptist made a major impression on all the canonical Gospel writers and that each sought to present him in a particular and somewhat distinctive way.
8. The Christian Portrayal of the Baptist

It has sometimes been thought that the NT reflects an anti-Baptist polemic, based on the assumption that the Christian movement saw the Baptist movement as a competitor. However, Wink has shown that far from polemics against the Baptist what we find in the NT is an attempt to claim John for the Christian cause. This entails a rather full recognition of the importance of the Baptist so that his testimony about "the Coming One" may be given its full weight.

As one moves chronologically through the Gospels (Mark, Matthew, Luke, then John), one finds, with the possible exception of Luke, that John's words about Jesus become increasingly confessional. Yet even as early as Mark, John is already the beginning of the good news. Thus, it must be considered doubtful that Christians were guilty of projecting some son of later conflict between Christians and John's followers into the Gospels. It is hard to believe that the early church would create such a notable group of traditions which grant the Baptist an important role in the Gospel, given the tendency of the church increasingly to stress the uniqueness of Jesus. Wink urges that Jesus' own positive evaluation of the Baptist led to the incorporation of these traditions in the Gospels.

8.1. John the Baptist from Four Perspectives. In terms of the editorial perspective of each evangelist several motifs are readily apparent.

8.1.1. Mark. Mark seems to portray the Baptist as Elijah incognito (paralleling the messianic secret). He also goes to some lengths to parallel the passion of John and Jesus, the only two figures whose death he gives significant attention to in his Gospel (see Death of Jesus). It may be that Mark 6 has been sandwiched between the sending and return of Jesus' disciples because Mark has earlier indicated that the ministry of Jesus in Galilee is precipitated by John's removal from the scene (cf. 1:14).

8.1.2. Matthew. The First Evangelist stresses that Jesus and John stand together against a hostile religious (and political) opposition to their ministries. It is interesting however that we do not find this parallelism in the uniquely Matthean material within the birth narratives (see Birth of Jesus).

8.1.3. Luke. The Third Evangelist places John within his broader schema of salvation history as a notable figure in the historical chain of events initiated by God's intervention into Israel's history at the turn of the era. He also places more explicit stress than either Mark or Matthew on John's ministry involving "good news" (Lk 1:19; 3:18). In this way he stresses more than the other evangelists the continuity between Jesus and John, an emphasis seen both in the material shared in common with Matthew and Mark and in the uniquely Lukan material in the birth narratives (see Birth of Jesus). Luke 16:16 need not be seen as being at odds with the attempt to depict John as one who is part of the new eschatological action of God amidst his people, for in view of Luke 1:19 and 3:18, Luke 16:16 should probably be taken to mean that the period of the activity of the prophets had already ended when John came on the scene.

8.1.4. John. The Fourth Evangelist portrays John as the ideal and, indeed, almost-Christian witness to Jesus (cf. Jn 1, 3) as God's Messiah and Lamb, stressing the subordination of John to Jesus (Wink). If this element of subordination and the idea of John as a preparer for the One who is to follow actually does go back to the Baptist himself, then it is not a case of the evangelists relegating John to a position that he did not have in real life, but rather highlighting and building on John's own self-proclaimed role.

8.2. A Focus on Mark's Gospel. It is not sufficient simply to take cursory note of how the Evangelists have edited their sources about John the Baptist in service of their christological interests. It is equally important to gain a sense of the overall portrayal of the Baptist in each Gospel. Space does not allow us to develop fully the portrait of John in each of the four Gospels, thus we will focus on one such sample—the earliest, and in many ways most suggestive, portrait of the Baptist found in Mark's Gospel. Depending on how one reads Mark 1:1, it is possible that Mark intends to portray the story of the Baptist as "the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God."* If this is so, it affects not only how one reads the rest of the portrayal of the Baptist in this Gospel, but also how one understands what Mark means by "Gospel." In what sense is the story of John part of the good news about Jesus? Is it just that he was the beginning of the good news of God's climactic saving activity or is something more intended?

In terms of the structure of Mark's Gospel, one notes that all the references to John are confined to the first eleven chapters of this Gospel. In fact, John appears only periodically in these chapters. He is not an ongoing figure in the flow of the narrative nor does he link the pericopes together. In fact, after the initial paragraphs about John in 1:2-11, followed by a brief reference to John's disciples fasting in 2:18, John does not appear in the story again until chapter six.
There we hear the story of two rejections—that of Jesus in Nazareth, and that of John by Herod Antipas, which led to John's demise. It is striking that this substantial narrative in chapter six is introduced by the suggestion that Jesus might be John redivivus (6:14), which is very close to the way in which John is introduced into the Caesarea Philippi discussion at 8:27-28. There Jesus asks his disciples, "Who do people say that I am?", to which the first reply is, "John the Baptist." Then in the following chapter, Jesus goes on to distinguish himself from John by implying that John is Elijah incognito (9:11-12), whom he says comes to restore all things. Yet in 11:27-33, in the final clear reference to John, Jesus links his authority with John and his baptism.

Thus in the Markan schema, we seem to see the following pattern emerging: (1) John linked closely with Jesus and the Gospel (Mk 1); (2) John distinguished from Jesus in his practices as noted by outsiders (Mk 2); (3) Outsiders attempt to identify Jesus with John, even considering him as possibly John come back from the dead (Mk 6 and 8); (4) Jesus distinguishes himself from John, but in the process ascribes to him a significant role in the new saving activity of God—he is Elijah, the one who restores all (Mk 9); (5) In Jerusalem before the chief priests, scribes* and elders,* Jesus publicly implies some sort of identification of John and Jesus in regard to the matter of divine authorization (Mk 11).

This suggests that Mark's intention in using the Baptist material is not primarily to indicate that John bore witness to Jesus (as in the Johannine material) but rather as a foil to indicate who Jesus was not. This is accomplished in part by distinguishing Jesus' and John's activities and correcting the false impression of outsiders about their identities, and in part by having Jesus in two key places (Mk 9 and 11) give testimony to who John really is. a testimony that balances that of John to Jesus in chapter one. This suggests that for Mark, John is the beginning of the gospel, not merely because he was seen to be Jesus' forerunner, an Elijah figure, but also because Jesus bore witness to John.

Finally, it may be important that near the end of Mark's Gospel outsiders once again misunderstand Jesus and his words, this time assuming he was calling on Elijah (15:35). But Jesus had already spoken of "Elijah" as one who had come and gone as it was written of him (chap 9). Thus the end of the Gospel, unlike its beginning, is a word not about Elijah or his coming or going. Rather, it is about the going and coming again of Jesus. To put it another way, the conclusion of the Gospel is about the death of Jesus, about the God on whom he called, and about that unique one for whom the divine witness is given: "Do not be amazed; you seek Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified. He has risen; he is not here" (16:6). In the end Jesus of Nazareth is not John redivivus. John's story finishes before the end of the Gospel, but as for Jesus of Nazareth, he comes back from the dead as himself— that is the end of the Gospel. The tension in the narrative is resolved by showing that the discontinuity between Jesus' and John's stories is more profound than the continuity.

It is no accident that in the New Quest for the historical Jesus, scholars have seen the history of John the Baptist as a rather secure foundation on which to reconstruct an historical estimate of Jesus and his ministry. A major key to understanding the historical Jesus is a proper estimation of the elements of continuity and discontinuity between the ministries and messages of the two major figures in the Gospels—Jesus and John.

See also Baptism; Elijah and Elisha; Eschatology; Judgment; Revolutionary Movements.

B. Witherington III

JONAH. See SIGN OF JONAH.

JOSEPH. See BIRTH OF JESUS.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA. See BURIAL OF JESUS.

JOSEPHUS

The first-century Jewish writer Josephus is significant for a study of Jesus for two reasons: (1) He provides the major (virtually the only) contemporary Jewish account of the history and conditions of the periods leading up to and including the New Testament era, and (2) if in one form or another they are from his pen, his references to John the Baptist* Jesus and the death of James the Just the relative of Jesus, are the oldest non-Christian references to Christianity.

1. Life of Josephus
2. Works of Josephus
3. The "Testimonium Flavianum"

1. Life of Josephus.

Born Joseph, son of Mattathias, he was of the priestly nobility on his father's side and from the royal Hasmonean line through his mother (Life 1.1-2 §§1-8). Later he called himself Flavius Josephus. The former name was that of the family of the Roman emperors who were his patrons and the latter, the Hellenized form of Joseph. Between his birth, about AD. 37, and death, sometime after the beginning of the second century, Josephus appears as a student sectarian, statesman, general, traitor, historian and apologist for the Jews. His writings were preserved by early Christians who recognized their contribution in establishing the historical origins of their faith.
Details of Josephus's life, often closely entwined with the crises of his nation's history, may be gleaned from his writings. He was a precocious youth. By age fourteen, Josephus claims, his learning was so widely regarded that rabbis consulted him. A couple of years later he began a study of the three primary national sects, Sadducees (see Judaism), Pharisees* and Essenes (see Dead Sea Scrolls), and lived as an ascetic in the wilderness for three years with Bannus, a hermit. He then became a Pharisee (Life 1.2 §§9-12). In A.D. 64 Josephus visited Rome* to seek the liberation of some priests sent by the procurator Felix for trial before Nero. He succeeded with the help of Nero's wife, Poppea, whom Josephus had met through a Jewish actor in the city (Life 1.3 §§13-16). In Rome Josephus was impressed with the grandeur and power of the empire.

Upon returning to Judea, Josephus found his country headed for war with Rome (see Revolutionary Movements). Realizing the folly of his fellow Jews, he sought to steer his nation in other directions (Life 1.4 §§17-19). When this failed he threw his support to the nationalistic cause and, for unknown reasons, although only twenty-nine years of age, was placed in charge of Galilee,* which would certainly be the first line of Roman attack. In The Jewish War (2.20.4-8 §§568-84) he implies his charge was to command in Galilee. Later, in his Life (1.7 §29) he implies he was supposed to pacify the region. In the fall of A.D. 67 Josephus and his forces made their last stand against the invaders at Jotapata, which fell after a forty-seven-day siege (J.W. 3.3.3-36 §§141-338). His soldiers preferred death with honor to surrender and servitude. Josephus proposed a plan in which each would kill his fellow and the two remaining would commit suicide (J.W. 3.85-86 §§361-89). However, Josephus, one of the last two, and his companion surrendered to the Romans (J.W. 3.8-9 §§392-408). When brought before Vespasian, Josephus predicted the general would one day become emperor. He was held as a captive (J.W. 3.8-9 §§392-408).

Roman military operations in Palestine were halted during A.D. 68-69 to await the outcome of the struggle for the throne following Nero's death. Eventually, Vespasian's army proclaimed him emperor (J.W. 4.10.34 §§592-604). He liberated Josephus (J.W. 10.7 §§623-69) who accompanied his benefactor* as far as Alexandria and returned to assist Vespasian's son, Titus, in the final siege of Jerusalem. Josephus acted as an interpreter and mediator between the combatant forces (J.W. 4.9.2-3 §§361-62; 5.3.2. §114; 6.4 §261; 9.1-10.1 §§361420; 13.3 §§54147; 6.2.1-2 §§94-111; 7.2 §365) and witnessed the overthrow of the nation and city in A.D. 70 (see Destruction of Jerusalem).
After the war Josephus was taken to Rome by Titus (Life 76 §422), who himself eventually succeeded to the imperial throne. Under Vespasian and Titus, Josephus lived as a ward of the court with a stipend and a villa, evidently spending much of his time in writing (Life 76 §423). After the death of Titus he was forced to find another patron, Epaphroditus, a grammarian (Ant. preface 2 §§8-9; Life 76 §430), and continued writing (especially after the death of Domitian in AD. 98). Josephus outlived Herod Agrippa II, who died in AD. 100 (see Herodian Dynasty).

Of his home life we know little. Josephus speaks of his four wives; the second deserted him and the third he divorced. He says he had three sons by his third wife and two by his last (Life 75 §§414-15; 76 §§426-28).

2. Works of Josephus.

Although Josephus mentions other works written or planned by him, only four of his writings survive (Eusebius' ascription of 4 Maccabees to Josephus [Hist. Eccl. 3.10] is no longer taken seriously). His first writing, The History of the Jewish War, is the most important It is divided into seven books which survey the history of the Jews from the Maccabean revolt to the fall of Masada and disturbances in Syria in AD. 73. The Jewish War focuses on the events of the struggle against the Romans, AD. 66-70, in which he played a part (on both sides). The first book provides an introduction tracing those events and attitudes which Josephus thinks led to the Jewish revolt Throughout the work the writer provides descriptions of the geography* of Palestine (including Jerusalem and its Temple,* J.W. 5.4.1-5.8 §§136-247) and of Jewish history, life, customs and thought which were intended to provide necessary background for Roman readers not acquainted with the region and people.

Josephus's objective is to praise his Roman patrons and to quiet anti-Jewish feelings by shifting blame for the war from the Jewish people as a whole to a minority of unwise leaders and radical parties or sects, especially the Zealots (see Revolutionary Movements). The book was originally written in Aramaic, then, with assistance, rewritten in Greek and presented to Vespasian before his death in 79. His primary sources of information appear to have been 1 Maccabees, Herod the Great's counselor and court historian Nicholas of Damascus, official written records, and his own experience, contacts and memory.
The Antiquities of the Jews appeared in twenty books in A.D. 93-94. The interval of almost twenty years since the appearance of The Jewish War was probably spent in research and writing; it was also the period of Domitian, whose dislike of literature, and especially history, silenced other writers such as Tacitus, Pliny and Juvenal. The Antiquities (or "Archaeology," as he calls it) traces Jewish history from the creation of the world to his own day. For the biblical portions of history he employs the content and structure of the Greek translation of the Old Testament, the Septuagint, into which he inserts Jewish stories, legends and embellishments (Rabbinic Haggadah; see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). He also is indebted to Greek historians for both form—including the speeches he places in the mouths of his characters—and content. From the end of the biblical history (in Ag. Ap. 1.8 §40 Josephus says biblical history was complete by the death of the Persian king Artaxerxes [Longimanus], who died about 423 B.C.) he has but scanty information. Apparently at least part of this came from the Epistle of Aristeas or a similar document In Antiquities 11.7 §297—12.5 §264 he briefly mentions such things as inter-Jewish and Samaritan* conflicts, the arrival of Alexander the Great in Jerusalem, and eventual Ptolemaic (Egyptian) control of Palestine, the translation of the Septuagint and conflicts over the priesthood. He then begins covering the same material found in the first and second books of The Jewish War up to the outbreak of the war with Rome, but often with different detail, form and emphases.

At the end of The Jewish War Josephus tells of charges against himself (J.W. 7.11.3 §448). His book The Life of Josephus is not so much an autobiography as a defense against continuing criticisms of his conduct and position during the war. Against Apion, Josephus' latest surviving writing, is a defense of Judaism against its detractors, of whom Apion, a contemporary anti-Semite, is a representative.

The accuracy of Josephus' writings has often been called into question. He is self-serving in his accounts, overly gracious and generous in his presentation of the Romans, and molds the facts of Jewish history to suit his own ends. He is notorious for his exaggeration of numbers. Parallel sections of different works have unreconcilable variants. Nevertheless, recent data such as that provided by the excavations of Masada during the 1960s, add credibility to Josephus' handling of at least the major features of his subjects. Earlier theories suggested that Luke, in both his Gospel and Acts, made use of Josephus. If true, this hypothesis would reflect negatively on Luke's accuracy. Modern studies generally support the conclusion that the two authors are independent of each other.

3. The "Testimonium Flavianum."

The Greek text of Antiquities makes reference to the deaths of John the Baptist (18.5 §§116-119]) and James, the relative of Jesus (20.9 §200). In the former reference Josephus says that Herod (Antipas) arrested John as a precaution against an upheaval. He also identifies the fortress Machaerus as the site of John's execution, and says that some Jews saw the defeat of Herod by the Nabatean king Aretas as "divine vengeance for his treatment of John." "James, the brother of Jesus who was called the Christ"* says Josephus, was the victim of judicial murder by the High Priest Ananus during the inter-regnum between the death of the procurator Felix and the arrival of his successor, Festus (c. A.D. 62). Origen (Contra Cels. 1.47) says Josephus identified the death of James as cause for the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple; this statement, however, is not in extant texts of the historian.

Antiquities 18.3 §63-64 contains the following statement, commonly called "The Testimonium Flavianium":

About this time there lived Jesus, a wise man, if indeed one ought to call him a man. For he was one who wrought surprising feats and was a teacher of such people as accept the truth gladly. He won over many Jews and many of the Greeks. He was the Messiah. When Pilate, upon hearing him accused by men of the highest standing amongst us, had condemned him to be crucified, those who had in the first place come to love him did not give up their affection for him. On the third day he appeared to them restored to life, for the prophets of God had prophesied these and countless other marvelous things about him. And the tribe of Christians, so called after him, has still to this day not disappeared. (Trans. L H. Feldman, Loeb Classical Library.)

This statement stands in all Greek manuscripts from the eleventh century onward and was known as early as the fourth century when Eusebius twice quoted it (Hist. Eccl. 1.11; Dem. Ev. 3.5,124). Origen (c.185-c.254) knew of Josephus' allusions to John the Baptist and James but twice says Josephus did not believe Jesus to be the Christ (Comm. Mt. 10.17; Contra Cels. 1.47). However, this statement casts doubt only on Origen's knowledge of the statement "he was the Messiah," not on the "Testimonium" as a whole.

The early twentieth century witnessed the circulation and discussion of a Slavonic version of The Jewish War, which contains numerous additions and omissions from the traditional text. Among the additions are references to John the Baptist Jesus and to early Christians. These are quite different from statements about the same individuals in the Greek Antiquities. There is little doubt that these Slavonic additions are the work of later Christians.

In 1971 S. Pines published a study of the quotation of the "Testimonium" by Agapius, a tenth-century Christian. He quotes an Arabic text which, it could be argued, was not subject to the same Christian influences as the traditional one. It reads:

> At this time there was a wise man who was called Jesus. His conduct was good, and [he] was known to be virtuous. And many people from among the Jews and other nations became his disciples. Pilate condemned him to be crucified and to die. But those who had become his disciples did not abandon his discipleship. They reported that he had appeared to them three days after his crucifixion, and that he was alive; accordingly he was perhaps the Messiah, concerning whom the prophets have recounted wonders.

There are three views about the validity of the "Testimonium Flavianum," especially as it appears in the Greek text: (1) it is, as it stands, from the pen of Josephus; (2) it is entirely an addition by later Christian authors, and Josephus himself said nothing about Jesus; (3) the original edition of the Antiquities contained some statement about Jesus, but the present Greek text contains later alterations by Christian hands. Attitudes toward references to John the Baptist and James the Just in the Greek text of the Antiquities are similar to those about the statements about Jesus.

Nineteenth-century scholarship (including such notables as Dobschütz, Niese, Schürer and Zeitlin) rejected the "Testimonium Flavianum" as completely unauthentic. More recently, the third option has gained support. In 1929 H. St. John Thackeray (p. 148) concluded, "The paragraph in the main comes from Josephus or his secretary, but the Christian censor or copyist has, by slight omissions and alterations, so distorted it as to give it a whole different complexion." The Vermes-Millar-Black revision of Schürer's The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (pp. 428-41) argues "Josephus mentioned Jesus. . . . Josephus wrote more about Jesus than we are able to extract from this text" The Arabic text discussed by Pines strengthens this conclusion. Pines makes no claims regarding the authenticity of the "Testimonium" in his document but notes that it contains "none of the suspicious phraseology of the 'vulgate recension' that has led many modern scholars to reject the entire passage as a Christian interpolation."

Josephus' greatest value to a study of Jesus and the Gospels lies in the background information he provides. Without his writings moderns would be left to construct a history of first-century Judaism from mere bits and pieces. In spite of his limitations, Josephus conducts us through that strange time and world which was home to Jesus and the Evangelists and so enables us better to hear and see the Word in the world in which it appeared.

See also Jesus in Non-Christian Sources; Judaism; Hellenism.

The language of joy is prominent in the Gospels, being expressed by no less than seven words: agalliaomai, agalliasis, euphrainō, skirtaō, chairō, sugchairō and chara. Agalliaomai and agalliasis, though derived from classical use, are found only in Jewish works or writings dependent on them. Euphrainō and skirtaō are also strongly attested in the LXX and are used only by Luke in the Gospels. Chairō and chara are found only in the later books of the LXX but are dominant in the Gospels and NT generally. The following table illustrates the distribution of these words.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Mt</th>
<th>Mk</th>
<th>Lk</th>
<th>Jn</th>
<th>Total</th>
<th>Total</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>agalliaomai</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>agalliasis</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>euphrainō</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>skirtaō</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>chairō</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>sugchairō</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>chara</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>24</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>36</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>72</td>
<td>173</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Clearly Luke merits the title "the Gospel of joy," making use of each of the words and having by far the most uses of "joy" vocabulary. Mark makes use only of chairō (twice) and chara (once). Joy is not a significant focus for Mark. Each of his three uses occurs in a negative context. In the parable* of the soils the stony ground represents those who at first receive the word with joy (Mk 4:16 par. Mt 13:20 and Lk 8:13) but fall away at the first sign of trouble. Mark (14:11 par. Lk 22:5) reports the rejoicing of the chief priests at the offer of betrayal by Judas.* Finally, Mark (15:18 par. Mt 27:29 and Jn 19:3) tells how the soldiers mocked Jesus, addressing him "Hail (chaire), king of the Jews." This traditional form of address using chairein was a wish of joy based on physical well-being and is found also in Matthew 26:49; 28:9 and Luke 1:28. In Matthew the irony that Judas betrayed Jesus with such a greeting (Mt 26:49) should not be overlooked.

Independently in both Matthew and Luke the birth of Jesus (see Birth of Jesus) is anticipated with joy. The wise men "rejoiced with great joy" at the sight of the star that guided them (Mt 2:10). In Luke (1:14) Zachariah is told of the joy associated with the coming birth of John (see John the Baptist) as the forerunner of the Messiah (cf Lk 1:58). When Mary greeted Elizabeth the baby in Elizabeth's womb leapt for joy (eskirtēsen, Lk 1:41, 44). The message of the angels* to the shepherds was one of "great joy" (Lk 2:10) in anticipation of the fulfillment of the promised salvation* from God.*

That Jesus taught the superficiality of attachment to earthly joys seems likely (Mk 4:16 par. Mt 13:20 and Lk 8:13). He taught those persecuted for his sake to rejoice because their reward would be great in heaven* (Mt 5:12 par. Lk 6:23 = Q). There are puzzling differences in the wording of Matthew and Luke at this point, not least Matthew's use of agalliaståthe where Luke uses skirtēsate. Both of these words are commonly used in the LXX. Perhaps Luke introduced the latter as a more vivid leaping for joy. Matthew alone (Mt 13:44) has the parable of the joy at finding the treasure hidden in the field as an analogy to the joy of the kingdom (see Kingdom of God), but shares with Luke the parable of joy at finding the lost sheep (Mt 18:13; Lk 15:5,6, 7 Q?; see Shepherd, Sheep) where the stress on joy is much greater in Luke. Luke takes the stress further in the parables of the lost coin (Lk 15:7) and the lost son (Lk 15:23, 24, 29, 32) where the return of the lost son is celebrated with a banquet Matthew's account of the parable of the talents includes a stress on the joy extended to the faithful servants (Mt 25:21, 23) that is absent from the Lukan version (Lk 19:17-19).

The reversal of the basis for joy is apparent in Luke's account of the return of the seventy. Jesus tells them not to rejoice because the spirits (see Demon, Devil, Satan) are subject to them but because their names are written in heaven (Lk 10:17, 20). Only in Luke 10:21 is Jesus said to rejoice (cf. Mt 11:25 = Q?). As a model for the correct basis of joy this shows a reversal of worldly values. Joy based on worldly values is shown to be misguided in the parable of the rich fool (Lk 12:19) and the story of the rich man (see Rich and Poor) and Lazarus.* The rich man had joy in this world (Lk 16:19) but torment hereafter. Zacchaeus had a sound basis for joy in receiving Jesus (Lk 19:6). Only Luke mentions that the crowd that heralded Jesus' entry into Jerusalem were disciples* and that they began to rejoice and to praise God, though the reported words are similar in Luke 19:37-38; Mark 11:9-10; Matthew 21:9 and John 12:13. Absent from Mark but important for Matthew, Luke and John is the joy at the appearance of the risen Jesus (Mt 28:8,9; Lk 24:41, 52; Jn 20:20; see Resurrection).

In John the language of joy is concentrated on the lips of Jesus, though John the Baptist is the first to use it He likens himself to the friend of the bridegroom (see Bride, Bridegroom) at the wedding, rejoicing at the bridegroom's voice (Jn 3:29). Here the Baptist gives voice to the Johannine theology in his role as the witness* to Jesus. In the time of eschatological fulfillment Jesus asserts that sower and reaper rejoice together (Jn 4:36). Jesus said, "Abraham rejoiced to see my day ..." (Jn 8:56), again stressing joyful fulfillment, this time enjoyed proleptically by Abraham.* On a different level Jesus says that he was glad not to be present to heal Lazarus (Jn 11:15). The reason for his gladness was not the death of Lazarus but his resurrection through which the disciples would come to believe.

References to joy are concentrated in the farewell discourses (see Farewell Discourse) and prayer* (Jn 14:28; 15:11; 16:20,21,22,24; 17:13). Jesus clarifies the basis and the nature of the joy that is his gift to those who believe in him. First, though his departure leaves his disciples grieving, it is paradoxically a basis for joy because he goes to the Father. Secondly, though he leaves them grieving he will come to them again. This coming is first of all as the risen one so that they rejoice when they see him (Jn 20:20). But it is also the presence of the absent Jesus through the abiding Spirit of Truth (see Holy Spirit). In this way the grief of the disciples is turned to become an abiding and indestructible joy (Jn 16:20-24) which is bound to the word of Jesus spoken to prepare them for their witness and work in the world. Regardless of worldly circumstances his joy would be complete in them. In this discourse Jesus expounded more fully the reversal of values involved in the teaching of joy found in Matthew and Luke. As in Matthew and Luke the last word about joy is the rejoicing of the disciples in response to their meeting with the risen Jesus (Jn 20:20).

