JUBILEE

The Year of Jubilee figured significantly in the theology of Jesus as it is related in the Gospel of Luke. The rejection of Jesus in Nazareth (4:16-30), an event which is programmatic for the Gospel of Luke, makes extensive use of themes related to the OT prescription of a Year of Jubilee (Ex 21:2-6; 23:10-12; Lev 25; Deut 15:1-18; 31:9-13), especially as those themes were already incorporated into Isaiah 58:6; 61:1-2, the text which was read and sermonically elaborated by Jesus (4:18-21).

The Jubilee year is best understood as an intensified Sabbath Year, announced on the Day of Atonement every fifty years as a "sabbath year of sabbath years." The Sabbath Year legislation had three basic provisions, to which a fourth was added in a Jubilee Year: (I) the freeing of all slaves; (2) the cancellation of all debts; (3) the falling of the land; and (4) in a Year of Jubilee, the return of all land according to the original Mosaic distribution.

The "release" of the land was the central provision of the Jubilee code. If, because of indebtedness, a Hebrew was forced to sell his property, the sale was not to be a permanent alienation of the land, but more like a lease; the price of the property was determined according to the number of harvests remaining between the time of sale and the next Year of Jubilee (Lev 25:13-17).

Corollary to this provision was the right of redemption (qōlūlāh) attached to the sale of any land by a Hebrew. One did not have to wait for the Year of Jubilee to recover one's land; rather, it could be reclaimed at any time by the gō'ēl (redeemer), a kinsman of the original owner, or by the owner himself, upon payment of a sum proportionate to the number of harvests remaining from the time of repurchase to the next Jubilee Year (Lev 25:24-28). In any case, the land was to revert to its original owner at the time of the Jubilee. The primary theological basis for the "release" of slaves, debts and land was Yahweh's ownership of both the people and the land. Since he had delivered them from Egyptian servitude and given them the land, neither they nor the land could ever truly be sold (Lev 25:42, 55; Deut 15:15).

Ideas related to the Sabbath/Jubilee Year were taken up in the latter portions of Isaiah, especially chapters 58 and 61. Envisioning a day of release from Babylonian captivity, the prophet naturally described the coming redemption in terms of the well-known year of "release" (דָּרָּה in Hebrew, aphesis in Greek). Just as the Mosaic legislation had provided for the release of slaves and the recovery of land, so the prophet foresaw the release of the Babylonian captives and the recovery of their ancient patrimony.

The use of the Jubilee as a kind of eschatological motif was not however, unique to Isaiah. A sabbatarian/jubilary messianism is attested as well in Daniel (9:24-27), the Book of Jubilees (1:21-25), Qumran (HQ Melch) and later Jewish talmudic literature (Sanh. 97b). The Qumran fragment known as HQ Melchizedek is especially helpful in this regard. This brief, eschatological document weaves together Isaiah 52:7 (referring to the messianic herald of the "good news"), Isaiah 61:1-3, Leviticus 25 and Deuteronomy 15, and does so in a way that emphasizes the jubilary motifs therein. More importantly, it demonstrates the existence in the first century of an exegetical tradition which linked, from an eschatological perspective, the major Sabbath/Jubilee Year passages in the Old Testament (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology).

Luke's narration of Jesus' sermon in Nazareth represents a particular development in the eschatological use of Jubilee Year themes: Jesus himself is presented as the anointed (messianic) herald of the long-awaited Year of Jubilee. The text of Jesus' sermon (4:18-19) was:

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me,

Because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor;

He has sent me to proclaim release (aphesis) to the captives.

And recovery of sight to the blind.

To send away in release (aphesis) those who are oppressed,

To proclaim the Favorable Year of the Lord.

Year of Jubilee (4:21).

The term "release" (aphesis) represents the primary theological and verbal connection with the levitical proclamation of Jubilee. The classical Creek employment of aphesis was in the legal sense of a "release" from office, marriage, obligation, debt or even punishment. The word was not used, however, in religious contexts. In the LXX, of the approximately fifty instances of aphesis, twenty-two are in Leviticus 25 and 27, where it translates in most cases the Hebrew yôbel, "Year of Jubilee"; in other cases, most notably Leviticus 25:10, it translates דֶּרֶּר, "release." דֶּרֶּר, in fact, seems to have been the technical term of the prophets to indicate the Year of Jubilee, that is, "the year of release," or "liberty," as Jeremiah 34:8,15, 17; Ezekiel 46:17; and Isaiah 61:1 indicate. Aphesis also translates the complex of Sabbath Year passages (Ex 23:11; Deut 15:1-11; 31:10) in which the Hebrew שֵׁמַת, or שָׁמַת, is used.

Thus with "liberation" or "release" as the primary meaning of aphesis in the LXX, and with aphesis highlighted as the key term holding together Jesus' conflated reading of Isaiah 61:1-2; 58:6, the Sabbath/ Jubilee Year import of the Nazareth sermon would have been lost on no one in Jesus' or Luke's audience familiar with either the Mosaic traditions or the then-popular eschatological text of Isaiah 61. The "good news to the poor" is thus the happy announcement of their re-enfranchisement. It is at long last the commencement (4:21) of the eschatological Year of Jubilee, when God graciously pardons all debts and sets the oppressed and the captives free.

Given the central significance of the Nazareth pericope for Luke, there can be little doubt that further references in Luke to "preaching the gospel*" must be read with jubilary significance. This is borne out by Luke's use of the verb euangelizō, whereas Matthew, Mark and John show an overwhelming preference for the noun euangelion (a fact which argues that Luke's usage is based upon the programmatic Is 61 passage where the verb form is in evidence). The same may be said for the other occurrences in Luke of the noun aphesis, normally translated in the NT as "forgiveness." The fact that aphesis occurs in the two programmatic passages of Luke's two-volume work (Lk 4:18 and Acts 2:38), as well as in the capstone passage of evangelistic commissioning in his Gospel (24:46-49), indicates, against the backdrop of its infrequent use in the NT (of only seventeen occurrences in the NT, ten are in Lk-Acts, one in Mt, two in Mk and none in Jn), not only its importance for Luke, but also that its meaning throughout must be read over against its initial jubilary use in 4:16-30.
The idea of Jubilee has also shaped other sections of the Gospel of Luke, as evidenced by Jesus' own summary of his ministry (7:22), the so-called fifth prayer of the Lukan version of the Lord's Prayer (11:4), the use of Isaiah 61:1-3 in the Lukan Beatitudes (6:20-26) and the clear use of certain Sabbath-Year motifs from Deuteronomy 15:7-11 (cf. Lev 25:35-38) in the following section of the Great Sermon in Luke 6:27-38 (see Sermon on the Mount).

Luke's employment of the Jubilee/Sabbath-Year themes from Isaiah 58:6; 61:1-2 (and Lev 25, Deut 15), has a distinctly eschatological application. The one-sentence summary (Lk 4:21) of Jesus' sermon is, "Today this Scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing." It was not the renewal of a purely social or economically leveling piece of Jewish legislation that concerned Jesus, though none can deny the profound social import of his teachings (see Liberation Hermeneutics), but the inauguration, using the eschatologically adapted language of Jubilee, of the long-awaited kingdom of God.* As such, the Jubilee-Year motif is of a piece with Jesus' apocalyptic* announcement of the reign of God, a reign which has begun with the coming of Jesus and will be finally manifested when, like the blowing of the šōpār on the Day of Atonement to announce the Year of Jubilee, the "last trump" will herald the glorious appearance of Christ our göēl and Kinsman Redeemer.

JUDAISM

In every period of its history Judaism has been rooted in the notion that Israel* is chosen. Indeed, the perennial paradox in the study of Judaism is that the notion of election is more persistent than any definition of what Israel might be. We might be thinking of an extended family of Aramaeans which departed from Mesopotamia in order to settle westward, of their settlement in Canaan, of the migrant group in Egypt, of those who departed from Egypt, of those who struggled for control of the land of Canaan, of the nation and its eventual monarchy (and civil war), of the dispossessed peoples in Babylonia, of the ideal Israel which the Scriptures of the Exile project, and/or of those people both in the land and in the Diaspora who read those Scriptures as their own, for whom Israel was and is an identification of self.

Each of the moments of the development of Israel named above (and each of several other stages) has been the object of particular, scholarly attention. But for convenience we may categorize the history of Judaism under four stages: (1) the period from family to people; (2) the period of nationalization and monarchy; (3) the period of dispossession and the canonization of Scripture; and (4) the period of radical pluralization which is widely referred to today as "early Judaism." While a full appreciation of Judaism would call for an understanding of all of these stages, the focus of this article is set on the latter period which most directly pertains to the environment of Jesus and the Gospels.
1. From Family to People

From Faith to People. The conviction of being divinely elect as a condition sine qua non of Judaism is predicated on the traditional understanding that Abraham is the father of all Jews. For Abraham is remembered as being partner to the covenant involving both God's gift of the land which would be called Israel and the sign of circumcision (Gen 15:1-21; 17:1-14). But it is Moses* who is particularly associated with the constitution of Israel as a people rather than simply a family. The transition took place in the events surrounding the liberation of Israel from Egypt and the revelation given at Sinai. The Mosaic constitution or covenant would become paradigmatic for every age of Judaism which followed. Tribal lineage, based on the assumption that the tribes were descended from the sons of Jacob/Israel, replaced familial lineage as the operative definition of the group.

Moses is also the emblem of centralized sacrifice and judgment, both of which contribute to the understanding of Israel as an organic whole. Sacrifice within the Mosaic system is the place of meeting between God and Israel (Ex 24:1-11), such that only what is clean* may be involved (cf. Lev 11—15), and much of it passes to divine ownership (cf. Lev 3:1-17). Moreover, the declared aim of entry into the land of promise is to cleanse it of what is not acceptable to God. Everything else—people, beasts and property—is to be "devoted" (cf. Josh 6—7), in effect offered as a sacrifice for the cleansing of the land.

2. Nationalization and Monarchy.

Israel's occupation or dispossession of Canaan led to a period of leadership by judges, charismatic figures known for their success in defending tribal claims on the land or rooting out Canaanite worship. But the unsystematic convention of judges was no answer to the centralized attack of even a petty kingdom. And though the book of Judges criticizes kingship as an implicit denial of the sovereignty of Yahweh (cf. Judg 8:22—9:57), a transition to monarchy came under the leadership of Samuel, who incorporated the roles of both priest and judge. But Saul, the first king anointed by Samuel (1 Sam 10), is portrayed as persistently usurping authority not his own (1 Sam 13:8-15; 14:31-35; 15; 18—20), and is rejected by God in favor of David (1 Sam 16:1-13).

2.1. The Davidic Monarchy. The Davidic monarchy itself becomes the object of a solemn oath in 2 Samuel 7, where the prophet Nathan promises God's protection of David's progeny. It is notable that the promise is occasioned by David's undertaking to build a temple. The offer itself is accepted but deferred; it is Solomon who is to accomplish the task (2 Sam 7:12-13). But the function of the king in protecting, not leading, worship is established, and the promise to David is integrated within the covenant generally.

The centralization of the sacrificial cult in David's city, Jerusalem (2 Sam 6), had both positive and negative effects from the point of view of faithfulness to the covenant. Positive, because the new center became the focus of collecting Israel's holy traditions and presenting them at the feasts* which were primarily celebrated at Jerusalem. Negative, because with monarchy came the pressure to trade and compete with other cities: the multiplication of cults—and the de facto acceptance of their deities—being a feature of Solomon's otherwise auspicious reign (cf. 1 Kings 11).

First Kings lays the blame on Solomon's apostasy (1 Kings 11:29-40) for the division (c. 922 B.C.) of united Israel into Israel in the north and Judah in the south. But the kings, north and south, undermined their own authority not only by their idolatry, but also by their recourse to slavery and their conspicuous consumption.

2.2. The Prophetic Movement. Prophecy (see Prophets, Prophecy) found its voice as a movement in its opposition to the monarchs it regarded as apostate. Prior to the crystallizing impact of that opposition, prophets appear to have been identified as those who spoke for God, often in association with worship* in particular sanctuaries. But first the association with David, and then the antagonism of kings in the north and south, made of prophecy a startlingly coherent movement.

The emergence of prophecy as a literary genre is to be dated to the eighth century and the message of Amos. Fundamentally a prophet of doom against the northern kingdom, Amos foretold judgment against Israel's apostate kings, and Hosea vividly generalized that theme to include the nation as a whole. They were quickly followed in the south by Micah and Isaiah, and an urgent appeal for social justice became a hallmark of prophecy in the south.

The announcement of doom against the north by an Amos or a Hosea must have appeared idle during periods of prosperity, but when in 722 B.C. the capital of the north was taken, and the northern kingdom was subjected to a policy of Exile, the prophetic message appeared to be vindicated.

Spurred on by the demise of Israel in the north, whose people were lost to history, the prophets in Judah attempted to purify the life of their people. Isaiah urgently argued against foreign alliances and insisted that fidelity to God alone would save Jerusalem. Jeremiah ceaselessly denounced faithlessness and was prosecuted for his trouble. Ezekiel's enactments of coming disaster won him a reputation as a crank. But in the reign of Josiah a royal reformation backed much of the critique of the prophets (cf. 2 Kings 22:1-23:30; 2 Chron 34:1-35:27). Josiah restored worship in the Temple according to covenantal norms; he centralized sacrifice, even of the Passover, in Jerusalem; he tolerated no foreign incursions. In this program he was guided by a scroll of the Law* which was found in the Temple during the restoration. Since antiquity this scroll has been associated with the present book of Deuteronomy. Like the agenda which impelled Josiah, Deuteronomy presses the issue of radical centralization and separation from foreign nations. But in 609 Josiah was killed in battle in an attempt to block the alliance between Pharaoh Neco and the Assyrians at a place called Megiddo.

3. Dispossession and Canonization.

3.1. Exile and the Vision of Classic Israel: The Pentateuch. The end of the kingdom of Judah came quickly after the death of Josiah. In 587/6 the Babylonian Empire, having laid siege to Jerusalem and destroyed the Temple, implemented a policy of exile. Had the course of events then followed what happened to the northern kingdom, there would today be no Judaism to study. Paradoxically, however, just the forces which must have seemed sure to destroy the religion of the covenant with Yahweh instead assured its survival and nurtured its international dimension. The program of restoration which followed put a form of Israel back on the map within a generation. Even more influentially, the vision of classic Israel enshrined in the Pentateuch became a canonical standard. Sometime after the sixth century that work was combined with what many scholars have come to call the Deuteronomic History (Joshua-2 Kings), a telling of events between Moses and the Exile which explains success or failure according to the nation's adherence to the program which drove Josiah.

3.2. Restoration and New Visions for the Future: The Prophets. The dispossession of Judah to Babylon, then, set up the priestly and prophetic hegemony which made restoration possible. Just as the Pentateuch set out particular priestly concerns, the prophetic movement also brought a distinctive message to the canon. In general agreement with the priestly perspective that the land was to be possessed again, the prophetic writings found in Isaiah 40—55; Jeremiah 23:1-8; 31; and Ezekiel 40—48 constituted eloquent motivations for return to the land.

But the previous abuses of the kings and their sanctuaries made the prophetic movement insist that righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness) was the prior requirement of sacrifice, and that the events of the recent past were a warning. A Zechariah might be happy to set out the hope of a priestly messiah (see Christ) beside the Davidic king who was to rule (Zech 3,4), but the predominant emphasis fell on the crucial necessity of loyalty to the worship of God (Zech 14). Moreover, eschatology* became characteristic of the prophetic movement. These themes are seen in the latter chapters of Isaiah and Ezekiel, as well as in fresh works such as Joel and Malachi: the contemporary governance, whether Persian, Ptolemaic or Seleucid, and the present Temple were provisional, awaiting an anointed king and an anointed priest who would rule properly. Just the image of a priestly orientation redefined by the prophets is seen in the career of Ezra as it is related in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah: prophet, priest and scribe become one in their insistence on the vision of classic Israel, centered on the restored Temple.

The Temple as restored was, however, far from anyone's ideal. Some who remembered the splendor of Solomon's edifice are reported to have wept when they saw the results of the efforts under Ezra (Ezra 3:10-13). That imperfect focus nonetheless served to attract a permanent priesthood, and the notion of a canon provided focus to the prophetic movement: now a body of literature which could be interpreted was held to provide the guidance which individual prophets formerly gave. Indeed, it is notable that Ezra's own ministry involved guiding Israel on the basis of scriptural interpretation: the scribe emerges as the dominant religious personality, as the warrant of true prophecy and the arbiter of priestly conduct (Neh 8-13).
3.3. Voices from Outside the Priestly-Prophetic Hegemony: The Writings.

But the appearance that scribal leadership was settled is more superficial than representative. Battles concerning the proper conduct of the cult and the proper personnel of the priesthood raged during the period of restored Israel, and powerful movements produced literatures outside of scribal control. While the Pentateuch and what are called the Former Prophets (Joshua—2 Kings) and the Latter Prophets within Judaism may be attributed to the hegemony of priestly and prophetic interests which has been described above, the category of "Writings" (the last in the three biblical divisions of traditional Judaism), together with the "Apocrypha" and the "Pseudepigrapha" best characterize other facets of the religion.

The book of Psalms represents a cultic piety centered on just those aspects that Levitical instructions exclude: the music, dance, poetry, prayer* and praise (the term "psalms," тéhillîm, means "songs of praise") which the Temple attracted. They speak more eloquently of the emotional effect of, and popular participation in, sacrificial worship than any other document in the Bible. Proverbs also represents a non-priestly, non-prophetic focus of piety in restored Israel defined by prudential wisdom. Job and Ecclesiastes are other examples within the canon.

Initially, wisdom* is understood to be an aspect of God which by knowing one can become familiar with God. "Wisdom" in Hebrew is a feminine noun (ḥokmâ), and came to be personified as a woman. By the time of Ecclesiasticus (or Ben Sirach; early second century B.C.) and the Wisdom of Solomon (late first century B.C. or later), she is considered a fundamental means of access to God. The Wisdom of Solomon was composed in Greek, but the focus on Wisdom is by no means unique to what is commonly called Hellenistic Judaism: contacts with Egyptian and Babylonian inquiries into divine wisdom do probably date from the time of the Israelite and Judean kings as part of their characteristic syncretism. But unlike idolatry and polygyny, wisdom survived and prospered as a suitable and fertile means of communion with God after the notion of the unique covenant with Israel had triumphed. In the case of Philo of Alexandria, whose lifetime straddled the end of the last era and the beginning of our own, the pursuit of wisdom became a philosophical articulation of Judaism. He contributed an awareness of how Judaism and Hellenistic culture (see Hellenism)—whose contact is already obvious in the so-called Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha—might be related. Philo is unusually learned in his representation of a basic development of the Judaism of his period. His simultaneously Greco-Roman and Judaic notion of the logos is a case in point (cf. Philo Op. Mund.).

3.4. Threats Against Cultic Purity and Priestly Unity.

The question of the priesthood in the restored Temple, meanwhile, became increasingly fraught. The Persian regime gave way to Alexander the Great. Among the dynasties of the generals who succeeded him, first the Egyptian Ptolemies and then the Syrian Seleucids largely maintained the enlightened settlement of the Persians. The Seleucid monarch Antiochus IV (surnamed "Epiphanes") is commonly portrayed as a great exception to the policy, and he did unquestionably occupy Jerusalem and arrange for a foreign cult in the sanctuary (in 167 B.C.), which included the sacrifice of swine (a Hellenistic delicacy; 1 Macc 1:20-64; Josephus Ant. 12.5.4 §§248-56). But Antiochus entered the city at first as the protector of a high-priestly family, the Tobiads, who were then in dispute with the Oniad family (Josephus J.W. 1.1-2 §§31-35). Dispossessed, the latter group moved to Egypt where a temple was built at Heliopolis in a form different from the restored Temple in Jerusalem (Josephus J.W. 1.1 §33; 7.10.2-3 §§420-32). The cult of Onias appears to have been of limited influence, but the mere existence of an alternative cult in the period of restored Israel, served by legitimate pretenders to the high priesthood in Jerusalem, is eloquent testimony of deep divisions within the sacerdotal ranks, and within Judaism generally.

4. Radical Pluralization.

Early Judaism may conveniently be dated from 167 B.C. with the entry of Antiochus's officer, named Apollonius (2 Macc 5:24-25) into Jerusalem and his desecration of the Temple. But it is evident that the radical pluralization of Judaism prior to Jesus is rooted in the flawed unity of restored Israel during the previous period. Antiochus's campaign triggered both a fissure of interests and a reconfiguration of those interests in a way which made pluralism the order of the day. The temple of Onias at Heliopolis is only one example, but one which shows that one familial group could regard the issues of how sacrifice was offered and by whom as a better measure of acceptable worship than where sacrifice was offered.

4.1. The Rise of the Hasmoneans and the Response of the Faithful. In Israel, however, there was another group, defined by a desire to remain faithful to sacrifice in Jerusalem by an appropriate priesthood and a resistance to the demands of Antiochus, known as "the faithful" (the famous Hasidim, Heb ḥašîḏîm). Attempts have been made in the history of scholarship to identify the Hasidim with a particular sect of Judaism during the period of the second Temple, such as the Essenes or the Pharisees.* But the adjective "faithful" cannot usefully or legitimately be limited to any one group. In the context of reaction to Antiochus, however, the sense of the term clearly related to one's adherence to covenantal norms of sacrifice as part of a vehement resistance.

Among the resisters was Mattathias, a country priest from Modin, whose son Judas Maccabeus ("the hammer") introduced the most powerful priestly rule Judaism has ever known. This rule came to be known under the name of Hasmoneus, Mattathias's ancestor (1 Macc 2:1—9:18; Josephus Ant. 12.6.1 §265; 16.7.1 §187; 20.8.11 §§189; 20.10.3 §§238; 20.10.5 §247). Judas, as is well known, turned piety into disciplined revolt, including an alliance with Rome (1 Macc 8) and a willingness to break the Sabbath* for military reasons (1 Macc 2:41). This initiative saw the restoration of worship within the covenant in the Temple in 164 B.C. (1 Macc 4:36-61). After his death his brother Jonathan was named high priest (1 Macc 10:20-21), and from that time until the period of Roman rule the high priesthood was a Hasmonean prerogative.

Those events were too rapid for some and simply unacceptable in the view of others. In Strictly familial terms the Hasmoneans could not claim the high priesthood as a right, and therefore competition with other families of priests was a factor. Moreover, the suspension of the Sabbath for military purposes (cf. Josephus J.W. 1.7.3 §146) and the arrogation of the high priesthood and the monarchy by the non-Davidic Hasmoneans (cf. Josephus J.W. 1.3.1 §70) seemed particularly vicious to many Jews in that Antiochus had sanctioned apostasy, and the regime appeared to be compounding apostasy both in its initial resistance and in its consolidation of power.

4.1.1. Apocalyptic Perspective. The book of Daniel represents the less activist, apocalyptic* stance which many pious Jews adopted as an alternative to the nationalistic and militaristic policy of the Hasmoneans. The eschatology* of the prophets during the period of restored Israel is here transposed into a scenario of the end time in which the Temple would be restored by miraculous means, with the archangel Michael's triumph capped by the resurrection of the just and the unjust (cf. Dan 12:1-4). Folk Judaism of the period also anticipated providential interventions (cf. Tobit), but Daniel elevates and specifies that anticipation until it becomes a program of patient attention and fidelity, warranted by both heavenly vision and its ascription to the sage named Daniel of the Babylonian period (cf. Ezek 14:14).

4.1.2. Essenes. In the case of the Essenes opposition to the Hasmoneans became overt. They pursued their own system of purity, ethics and initiation, followed their own calendar and withdrew into their own communities, either within cities or in isolated sites such as Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls). There they awaited a coming apocalyptic war when they, as "the sons of light," would triumph over "the sons of darkness": a reference not only to the Gentiles, but to anyone not of their vision (1QM; 1QS). The culmination of those efforts was to be complete control of Jerusalem and the Temple, where worship would be offered according to their revelation, the correct understanding of the Law of Moses (cf. CD 5:17—6:11). Their insistence on a doctrine of two messiahs, one of Israel and one of Aaron, would suggest that it was particularly the Hasmoneans' arrogation of priestly and royal powers which alienated the Essenes.

4.1.3. Pharisees. Most of those who resisted the Seleucids or who sympathized with the resistance were neither of priestly families nor of Essene temperament. Nonetheless, the unchecked rule of the Hasmonean priests in the Temple was not entirely acceptable to them. For that large group the Pharisaic movement held a great attraction. The Pharisees, in their attempt to influence what the Hasmoneans did rather than to replace them definitively, appear as much more conservative than the Essenes or competing priestly families. Their focus was on the issue of purity (see Clean and Unclean), as defined principally in their oral tradition as well as in their interpretation of Scripture. Since issues of purity were bound to be complicated, in the Hasmonean combination of secular government and sacrificial worship, disputes were inevitable.

Josephus,* for example, implies that the Pharisees made known their displeasure at Alexander Jannaeus by inciting a crowd to pelt him with lemons (at hand for a festal procession) at the time he should have been offering sacrifice, with disastrous consequences (Josephus Ant. 13.13.5 §§372-373). Josephus also relates from a later period the teaching of the rabbis (probably Pharisees) who were implicated in dismanding the eagle Herod had erected over a gate of the Temple (Josephus J.W. 1.33.2-4 §§648-55; Ant. 17.6.2-4 §§149-67). This gesture was both less subversive of the established authority in the cult than what earlier Pharisees had done and more pointedly a challenge to Herod.
Paradoxically, the willingness of the Pharisees to consider the Hasmoneans in their priestly function, in distinction from the Essenes, involved them not only in symbolic disputes but in vocal and bloody confrontations. Alexander Jannaeus is reported to have executed by crucifixion eight hundred opponents, either Pharisees or those with whom the Pharisees sympathized, and to have slaughtered their families; but his wife came to an accommodation with the Pharisees which guaranteed them considerable influence (Josephus J. W. 1.4.6-1.5.3 §§96-114).

It seems apparent that within the Hasmonean period purity was a political issue and to some extent a symbol. The acquiescence of one of the dynasty to any Pharisaic stricture implicitly acknowledged that the Hasmonean priesthood was provisional, and the Pharisaic movement probably found its original, political expression in opposition to that priesthood (cf. Josephus Ant. 13.10.5-6 §§288-98). The Pharisees accepted and developed the notion that with the end of the canon the age of prophecy in the classical sense had ceased (cf. 1 Macc 4:46). For that reason they plausibly saw Ezra and "the men of the great assembly" as their source and their own interpretative movement as an extension of his program of restoration (cf. m. 'Abot 1:1-18; 2 Esdr 14). But in two vital respects the Pharisees need to be distinguished from the reforms of Ezra. First, they identified themselves with no specific priestly or political figure: their program was its own guide and was not to be subservient to any particular family or dynasty. Second, Pharisaic interpretation was not limited to the Scriptures nor was its characteristic focus scriptural: the principal point of departure was the recollection of the earlier teaching of those called "sages."

Ultimately, after the period of the NT the ideology of the rabbis (as the Pharisees came to be called) had it that Moses conveyed two Torahs on Sinai, one written and one oral. Even before that understanding, however, the sages treated as normative the teachings of their predecessors in chains of tradition. It was not so much that oral tradition was set alongside Scripture as that oral tradition was Scripture until the canon itself could no longer be ignored as the functional standard of Judaism (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings).

4.2. Judaism Under Roman Ride. Factionalism among the Hasmoneans, which resulted in rival claims to the high priesthood between Aristobulus and Hyrcanus (the sons of Alexandra), culminated in an appeal by both sides to the Roman general Pompey, who obliged by taking Jerusalem for Rome* and entering the sanctuary in 63 B.C. (Josephus J. W. 1.7.6 §§152-54).
4.2.1. Opposition and Accommodation: Pharisees, Prophets, Herodians and Revolutionaries. The Psalms of Solomon represents a common, pious expression of horror at the events of 63 B.C. which was probably shared by most Pharisees (whether or not the Psalms should be taken as specifically Pharisaic). From that period and all through the reign of Herod and his relatives, the Pharisees' attitude to the government was ambivalent. Some appear to have engaged in a principled opposition to Roman rule and its representatives as such. Today that group is known as the "Zealots," but the term is a misnomer.

The Zealots were a priestly group of revolutionaries (see Revolutionary Movements), not rebellious Pharisees, who were associated with Eleazar, son of Simon, during the revolt of AD. 66-73 (Josephus J.W. 2.20.3 §§564-565; 4.4.1 §§224-225). The rebellious Pharisees are also to be distinguished from the movements of prophetic pretenders who claimed divine inspiration for their efforts to free the land of the Romans (Josephus J.W. 2.13.4-6 §§258-65; 7.11.1-2 §§437-46). Other Pharisees normally accommodated to the new regime but resisted—sometimes violently—Herodian excesses such as the erection of a golden eagle on a gate of the Temple (Josephus J.W. 1.33.24 §§648-55; see Herodian Dynasty). Nonetheless, an apparently Pharisaic group is called "the Herodians" (Mt 22:16; Mk 3:6; 12:13; see Herodian Dynasty), which presumably signals its partisanship of the interests of the royal family as the best support of their own teaching of purity. They may be associated with rabbis who enjoyed the protection of Herod and his house; the authorities referred to in rabbinic literature as the "sons of Bathya" (cf. b. B. Mes. 85a) may have been such a group.

Others still largely cooperated with the Romans and with the priestly administration of the Temple, although they might fall out regarding such questions as whether the priestly vestments should be kept under Roman or local control (Josephus Ant. 18.4.3 §§90-95; 20.1.1-2 §§6-14) or the price of cloves for sacrifice (m. Ker. 1:7; see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings).

4.2.2. The Fracturing of the Priesthood: Sadducees, High Priests and Priestly Nationalists. Meanwhile, the priesthood (see Priest, Priesthood) itself was fractured further in its response to the fact of Roman governance. Some priests, especially among the privileged families in Jerusalem, were notoriously pro-Roman. The story of sons of the high priest having the surgery called epispasm in order to restore the appearance of a foreskin (for gymnastic purposes) is well known (cf. 1 Macc 1:14-15; Josephus Ant. 12.5.1 §§240, 241).
There is little doubt but that such families, the most prominent of which were the Sadducees and Boethusians, were not highly regarded by most Jews (cf. b. Pesah. 57a). They are typically portrayed in a negative light as not teaching the resurrection* of the dead (cf. Josephus J.W. 2.8.14 §165; Mt 22:23; Mk 12:18; Lk 20:27; Acts 23:8), but the issue may have been one of emphasis: the Torah had stressed that correct worship in the Temple would bring with it material prosperity, and the elite priests attempted to realize that promise. The arrangement gave them such consistent control that they became known as "high priests," although there was in fact only one high priest. But Josephus indulges in the usage, as well as the Gospels, so it should not be taken as an inaccuracy: the plural is a cultic mistake, but a sociological fact.

Caiaphas held an historically long tenure as high priest during the period (Josephus Ant. 18.2.2 §35; 18.4.3 §95), and the frequent change of personnel reflects the collective nature of the priestly leadership as well as Roman caution regarding a post which might have produced a national leader. Herod himself understood the possibilities of the high priesthood in that regard, which is why he had his potential rivals Jonathan and Hycanus (albeit relatives by marriage) murdered, and why he married Mariamne (Josephus J.W. 1.22.1-5 §§431-44; Ant. 20.10.1 §§247-51). His ambition was for a new Hasmonean dynasty, and it appears that only the notorious greed of his sons, combined with his willingness to have them executed, thwarted its realization. As it was, Herod's grandson and namesake, king of Chalcis, did maintain the residual power of selecting the high priest, although as king of Chalcis he had no ordinary authority over Jerusalem (cf. Josephus Ant. 20.1.3 §§15-16).

Several priests were also prominent in the revolt against Rome, however, and it should not be thought that such priestly nationalists, among whom were Joseph bar Matthias, better known as Flavius Josephus, emerged only at the end of the sixties (Josephus J.W. 2.20.3-4 §§562-68). The precedent of the Hasmoneans was there for any priestly family to see as a possible alternative to Roman rule, direct or indirect Indeed, some priests were not only nationalists but revolutionaries who joined with the Essenes, or with rebellious Pharisees, although any alliance of priests with a prophetic pretender is, perhaps, not a likely supposition.

4.2.3. The Growing Influence of the Pharisees. The Pharisees' mastery of the oral medium made them the most successful—in terms of popularity—of the tendencies within pluralized Judaism. In the period before written communication was standard among Jews in general, the use of memorization and recitation was far more prominent. The Pharisees were in a position to communicate guidance regarding purity, an understanding of Scripture (in the Targums,* whose development they influenced), and their own sense of the authority of the sages, without requiring general literacy. There is no reason to suppose, for example, that rabbis of the first century, such as Hillel and Hanina ben Dosa, were able to read fluently, although each was a formative member of the Pharisaic, and therefore later of the Rabbinic, movements. The Pharisees' willingness to make a living by a craft rather than by status (cf. m. 'Abot 2:2)—the most prominent example being Hillel's menial labor (b. Yoma 35b)—also meant that they could move from town to town, promulgating their views. In some respects their occasional itineracy was comparable in Israel to that of the Greco-Roman philosophers of the Mediterranean world (Stoic, Pythagorean and/or Cynic).

The success of the Pharisees in small towns became all the more pronounced as their power was largely ceded to priestly interests in Jerusalem. Many local scribes, but not all, were likely Pharisees, and the majority would have to account for Pharisaic views. Scribes* were, Strictly speaking, simply men who could read and write, a skill which in antiquity represented some social and educational attainment. In Israel, given the Roman encouragement of local government scribes emerged in towns and villages as a focus of judicial and religious power. From the time of the writing of the Torah itself, it was accepted that both aspects of God's rule, the legal and the cultic, were articulated by Moses. The ability of the scribes to read and write made them ideal judges, adjuncts to priests, teachers* and leaders of worship.

Indeed, all those functions were probably discharged in any given village by an interactive group of scribes, people of priestly lineage, and Pharisees and other elders. It was likely in the same place in a town that cases were settled, purity or impurity declared, lessons given, and the Torah recited from the written form and from memory in Aramaic (see Languages of Palestine). There too disputes would take place among scribes, judges, priests, Pharisees and elders, concerning how the Torah was to be understood and applied. Later rabbinic literature tends to reduce the disputes of the period to the "houses" of Hillel and Shammai, but that is quite evidently a schematic generalization. Because they lacked any central leadership in the period before AD. 70, Pharisees differed from movement to movement, town to town, rabbi to rabbi, and even day to day.
4.2.4. The Sanhedrin. The structure of a local council also prevailed under Roman rule in Jerusalem, the Greek term synedrion was applied to it, and it has become known as "the Sanhedrin," largely as a result of the Mishnah (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Mishnah, a document of the second century, cannot be taken as a sure guide of events and institutions during the first century. But it does seem clear from the Gospels and Josephus, with the Mishnah, that the council in Jerusalem was largely controlled by the high priests, but that elders or aristocrats of the city also participated, among whom were Pharisees (and, of course, some scribes who may or may not have been priests, elders or Pharisees). Whether there were actually seventy-one members of the Sanhedrin (as in rabbinic literature) cannot be known with certainty, and the extent of its capital jurisdiction is not known. But the Romans appear to have given the council the authority to execute perpetrators of blatant sacrilege (Josephus J.W. 2.12.2 §§228-31; 5.5.2 §194; Ant. 15.11.5 §417).

The authority of the council of Jerusalem outside of the city followed the prestige of the city itself and the acknowledged centrality of the Temple. But a ruling of the council in Jerusalem was not automatically binding on those in the countryside and in other major cities; acceptance of a given teaching, precept by precept, was the path of influence. Pharisees also taught in and around the Temple, which was the focus of their discussion of purity, and the Pharisees in Jerusalem were the most prestigious in the movement

5. Early Judaism As Reflected in the Gospels.

5.1. Jesus Within Judaism. The references within the Gospels to groups and movements within Judaism become quite explicable within the context of the social history of the religion. Priests appear locally in adjudications of purity (Mt 8:1-4; Mk 1:40-45; Lk 5:12-16; cf. Lk 10:31; 17:14, and the exceptional role of Zechariah in Lk 1:5-23), where their role is challenged by Jesus. He claims that he can declare clean in a matter which Leviticus expressly assigns to priests (cf. Lev 13; 14:1-9). evidently, Jesus understood purity in a way which brought him into conflict with a straightforward, priestly interpretation of Scripture, and the issue of purity also set him at odds with some Pharisees. References to high priests in the Gospels portray their power as essentially circumscribed by the boundaries of Jerusalem, or they use Jerusalem as a base of power (cf. Mt 2:4; 16:21; 20:18; 21:15, 23, 45; 26:1-28:11; Mk 8:31; 10:33; 11:18,27; 14:1-15:31; Lk 3:2; 9:22: 19:47; 20:1-24:20; Jn 1:19; 7:32, 45; 11:47, 49, 51, 57; 12:10; 18:3-19:21). Their close association with the execution of Jesus makes it plain that his activity in the Temple figured centrally in his condemnation before Pilate (see Trial of Jesus).

The Pharisees engage in vigorous debate with Jesus because he is also interested in developing teaching about purity, but Jesus himself is to be understood in association with that movement precisely because purity was at the heart of his program. Moreover, he is called "rabbi" (meaning, "my master"; cf. Mt 26:25, 49; Mk 9:5; 10:51; 11:21; 14:45; Jn 1:38, 49; 3:2; 4:31; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8), has close followers, deliberately promulgates his teaching by travel and sending his disciples* to teach, and attempts to influence the conduct of worship in the Temple. (The reticence of some twentieth-century scholars to identify Jesus as a rabbi arises from their awareness of the danger of identifying Jesus with the rabbinic movement after A.D. 70, after which it became more systematized. But anxiety over an anachronistic understanding of Jesus can result in the far greater error of placing him within so-called sectarian Judaism—as if an orthodoxy existed in early, pluralized Judaism—or worse still, placing Jesus within no Judaism at all.)

In all of those aspects Jesus comports well with a recognized pattern of teaching concerning purity in early Judaism, although the substance of his teaching was distinctive (and, for many, controversial). Except perhaps for his use of Capernaum as a center, however, Jesus does appear to have been programmatically itinerant, not merely occasionally so. In this characteristic he would have been distinguished from most Pharisees. Although he may well have appeared to many observers in Jerusalem during the final conflict as one Pharisee among many, it is more plausible to see him as an itinerant rabbi, a preacher of the eschatological kingdom (see Kingdom of God) and the kingdom's holiness, whose focus upon matters related to purity brought him into conflict with the Pharisees.

Scribes appear both in a local context (Mt 5:20; 7:29; 9:3; 12:38; 15:1; 17:10; Mk 1:22; 2:6,16; 7:5; 9:11; Lk 5:21,30; 6:7), even as a part of Jesus' movement (Mt 8:19; 13:52; Mk 12:28, 32-34; Lk 20:39) and during the final confrontation in Jerusalem (Mt 16:21; 20:18; 21:15 [26:3]; 57; 27:41; Mk 8:31; 10:33; 11:18,27; 12:35, 38; 14:1, 43, 53; 15:1, 31; Lk 9:22; 19:47; 20:1, 19, 46; 22:2, 66; 23:10). They are probably to be identified with references to "lawyers" in the Gospels (Mt 22:35; Lk 7:30; 10:25; 11:45, 46, 52; 14:3). The presence of "scribes" among both local and high-priestly elites reinforces the impression that the category concerns more a function than a distinctive teaching (as in the case of the Essenes or the Pharisees) or a special interest (as in the case of the Sadducees).

5.2. The Portrayal of Jesus Opposed to Judaism. The social history of Christianity itself tended to cast scribes, Pharisees and lawyers into a single category of persecutors and hypocrites,* like the "Jews" themselves, and that influence is evident in the present text of the Gospels (cf. Mt 15:1; 23:2, 13, 15, 23, 25, 27, 29; Mk 3:6,22; 7:1,3,5; Lk 6:7; 11:45,46, 53,54; 15:2). The Matthean Jews are liars about the resurrection (Mt 28:15) and willful murderers who implicate their own children in the crucifixion (Mt 27:25; set Death of Jesus). That is the most prejudicial charge in all of the Gospels, but it is not unlike Mark's claim that "all the Jews" hold to practices of washing "cups and pots and copper vessels" (Mk 7:3, 4), or Luke's scene of Jesus' rejection at Nazareth by his own people (Lk 4:16-30), or John's note that "the Jews" excluded the followers of Jesus from synagogues* during his lifetime (Jn 9:22; 12:42; cf. 16:2). The Gospel of Thomas has Jesus himself ironically ask the disciples whether they have become as obtuse as the Jews in that they must ask concerning Jesus' identity when they ought simply to recognize it (£43). Within all five sources of primary importance in the study of Jesus, Judaism and the Jews appear more as a foil for Jesus than as the matrix of his movement (see Anti-Semitism). But the realities of a radically pluralized Judaism in which Jesus was a vigorous participant also shine through the texts as they may be read today.

JUDAS (SON OF JAMES) See Disciples

JUDAS ISCARIOT

One of the twelve apostles,* to be distinguished from another apostle (one of the Twelve?) who was also called Judas (Jn 14:22), he is three times identified as the son of Simon (Jn 6:71; 13:2, 26). Since Simon is also called Iscariot, and Iscariot is further explained by the addition of apo karyōtou in some textual witnesses of John 6:71; 12:4; 13:2, 26 and 14:22, it would appear that Iscariot identifies Judas as "a man (Heb. 'îš) of Kerioth." Among other suggestions are: "man of Issachar" and "the assassin" (from the Gk sikarios; cf. Acts 21:38). Jeremiah 48:24, 41 and Amos 2:2 locate Kerioth in Moab, and it is mentioned in the Moabite Stone (1.13). Its site is uncertain, but it has sometimes been identified with Ar, a Moabite site (or possibly a region), and sometimes with Kir (probably Kir-Hareseth, about seventeen miles south of the Arnon and eleven miles east of the Dead Sea). Alternatively, it has been identified with Kerioth-Hezron, mentioned in Joshua 15:25, some twelve miles south of Hebron. On either count, Judas appears to have been the exception among the Twelve in not being a Galilean (see Galilee).

1. Judas's Place within the Twelve
2. Judas's Betrayal of Jesus
3. Judas's Death

1. Judas's Place within the Twelve.

The order in which the names are listed appears to reflect some sort of hierarchy within the Twelve (see Disciples), but the fact that Judas is consistently listed last almost certainly has more to do with subsequent events than with his place within the apostolic band during Jesus' ministry (Mt 10:4; Mk 3:19; Lk 6:16). Similarly, in John 6:70-71 the Evangelist has almost certainly transferred to this point in the narrative an element of the story of the Last Supper* (cf. 13:2, 21-30) in order to warn those who might turn back (6:66) not to join the company of Judas (Beasley-Murray, 97). Despite Judas's name appearing always at the end of the list of the apostles' names, he held an important place within their company. He was their treasurer (Jn 12:6).

2. Judas's Betrayal of Jesus.

2.1. The Plan. It is only as the Synoptic Gospels reach their climax that their silence regarding Judas's activities is broken and he emerges as Jesus' betrayer. All three Synoptics tell how Judas plotted with the Jewish leadership to have Jesus arrested. Their problem was how to have him arrested without a riot (Mt 26:5; Mk 14:2; Lk 22:2). It was that problem that Judas was able to solve for them. Within Jerusalem itself there were few, if any, private gardens. Instead, the well-to-do had their gardens on the slopes of the Mount of Olives outside the city. Presumably, some unnamed friend had given Jesus the right to use his garden, and it was evidently Jesus' custom, when in Jerusalem, to go to that garden to pray (Lk 22:39; see Gethsemane). Judas knew this and he would lead Jesus' enemies to where they could find him (Jn 18:1-2). For this, he was promised (or given) money. Matthew alone specifies the amount: thirty pieces of silver (Mt 26:15), which may have been a partial payment of the agreed sum (with an implied allusion to Zech 11:12 and possibly Ex 21:32; cf. Mt 27:9).

2.2. The Motivation.

2.2.1. Mark. The enormity of Judas's proposal is highlighted in Mark by juxtaposing the story of betrayal (14:10-11) with that of the extraordinary love of the woman who anointed (su Anointing) Jesus at Bethany (14:3-9). To this is added the explicit comment of Jesus at the Last Supper "The Son of man goes as it is written of him, but woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! It would have been better for that man if he had not been born" (14:21). Here is a paradox: Jesus' death was inevitable, but the betrayer was culpable. Mark makes no attempt to resolve the enigma.

2.2.2. Matthew. Matthew follows Mark in juxtaposing the anointing (26:6-13) with the betrayal (26:14-16). But by changing the conjunction from kai ("and") to tote ("then"), he links them in such a way as to present the second as the first step in the fulfillment of the prediction of death (see Predictions of Jesus' Death and Resurrection) in the first, thus emphasizing more than Mark the inevitability of what happened. At the same time added emphasis is given to Judas's culpability by changing the word order of Mark to draw attention to the fact that Judas was one of the Twelve. This phrase is put first in the sentence. The naming formula ("who was called . . .") is also a Matthean addition to Mark (cf. 26:3). Where the other Synoptics have the Jewish leaders only agreeing to pay him, here the money is paid to Judas (v. 15) in readiness for the story of its return (Mt 27:3-10). The announcement at the Last Supper of the woe to Jesus' betrayer (26:24) is almost identical with the report in Mark.

2.2.3. Luke. The same announcement appears in Luke 22:22. Where this Gospel differs from the other Synoptics is in omitting the story of the anointing from the passion narrative* (but cf. Lk 7:36-50) and in adding to their account of the plot an explanation of what prompted Judas to do it: "then Satan entered into Judas..." (22:3).

2.2.4. John. The Fourth Gospel has a similar statement that Satan (see Demon, Devil, Satan) entered into Judas (13:27), but here it occurs in the context of the Last Supper. In terms of vocabulary, the two statements are almost identical, but whether this coincidence is evidence of dependence is a moot point. A similar view of the motivation behind the betrayal is found earlier in this chapter: "During supper (the Last Supper), when the devil had already put it into the heart of Judas ... to betray him, Jesus ..." (13:2). The Greek of this verse is open to more than one reading: either the devil put it into Judas's heart to betray Jesus, or the devil resolved in his own heart that Judas should do it. On the first reading we have two verses in John agreeing with the (earlier?) Lukan view that Satan prompted Judas to act one of them (Jn 13:2) making the same point concerning the protagonists, but locating the decisive moment of their compact at the Last Supper. On the second reading the interpretation of what happened is developed beyond Luke to the extent that Satan is presented as much more the initiator of what happened, and Judas as merely his tool. The woe pronounced on the latter in the Synoptic Gospels is not found here, unless 19:11 refers to Judas and not to the high priest: "he who delivered me to you has the greater sin." But Judas is by no means exonerated in this Gospel as the hapless tool of the devil. In John's account of the anointing at Bethany (12:1-8) Judas is singled out as the woman's critic. "Why was this ointment not sold," he asked, "and the money given to the poor?" On which the Evangelist comments: "This he said, not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and as he had the money box, he used to take (ebastazen) what was put into it." The verb bastazō means "to carry," but it is used here in the colloquial sense "to steal." The imperfect tense implies that this was Judas's practice.

This story and the story of his plot with the Jewish leaders suggest that, as far as a human motive is concerned, Judas's betrayal of Jesus was done for the money. But some find other and better motives for what he did. To understand these arguments we must recognize how completely the disciples misunderstood what Jesus meant by the kingdom (set Kingdom of God). Even after the resurrection* they were still thinking in terms of an earthly kingdom (Acts 1:6) and were certainly thinking in those terms before it James and John had asked for official positions within the kingdom (Mt 20:20-24; Mk 10:35-40), and they all were still quarreling about their respective ranks and positions when they came to the Last Supper (Lk 22:24-26). Clearly they expected Jesus to contest the authority* of Rome* and were willing to die with him, if need be, in such a glorious cause (Mt 26:33; Mk 14:29-31; Lk 22:33-34). Either, then, Judas thought to force Jesus' hand by pushing him into a confrontation with his enemies or he, better than the others, understood that Jesus was thinking not of battle with Rome but of an inglorious death at the hands of Rome and, for reasons best known to himself, saw this as a betrayal by Jesus of his disciples. On the latter view Judas was a disillusioned disciple retaliating against Jesus not so much because he loved money, but because he loved his country and thought that Jesus had failed it. But this is only speculation.

2.3. The Implementation. Whatever the reason for Judas's betrayal, the Last Supper marked the point of no return from his chosen course. During the meal Jesus declared that one of the Twelve would betray him. There was consternation at this. The disciples were perplexed and questioned Jesus about the matter. Clearly no one other than Jesus suspected Judas. Indeed, in their own ways the individual Evangelists each indicate that any one of the disciples could be the betrayer (Mt 26:22; Mk 14:19; Lk 22:23). They differ, however, in their concern to identify during the supper the betrayer as Judas, with Matthew being the most explicit and Luke the least (Mt 26:23, 25; Mk 14:20; Lk 22:21).

Of all the accounts of his betrayal, John's is by far the most developed. It seems likely from this Gospel that Judas was in the place of special honor at the Last Supper. The usual arrangement at such a meal was to have a series of couches, each accommodating three people, arranged in a U around the table. The host reclined in the center of the chief couch at the center of the curve of the U. The guests reclined on either side of him, leaning on their left elbow and eating with their right hand. The place of honor was to the left and, therefore, in a sense, behind the host. The second place was to his right and the guest in that position would have his back to the host "lying close to his breast". This was the position occupied by "the disciple . . . whom Jesus loved" (Jn 13:23). Peter was evidently separated from this disciple by some others, so that he had to beckon him to capture his attention. When Jesus declared that one of them would betray him, Peter asked the disciple whom Jesus loved to find out who it was. Jesus told him, "It is he to whom I shall give this morsel when I have dipped it" (Jn 13:26). So saying, he gave the morsel to Judas, telling him to do what he was going to do quickly.

On the grounds of the Evangelist's comment that "after the morsel, Satan entered into him," it is assumed by some that the action and the word of Jesus had a negative intention—that in some sense Jesus was thus severing the relationship with Judas. Such an interpretation seems highly unlikely. In normal circumstances the giving of the morsel was a mark of favor. Moreover, it would appear that Judas was in the place of honor since Jesus was able to hand him the piece of bread (Jn 13:26). We should take this portrayal of Jesus' action, then, as a sign of his friendship with Judas despite his knowledge of Judas's intentions. It was his last appeal to Judas to change his course. His words "What you are going to do, do quickly" (Jn 13:27) were in effect a demand on Judas to make up his mind either to respond to Jesus' friendship or to betray him. But with the morsel "Satan entered into him." Judas had made his choice, and in making it he had cut himself off from the light of the world (cf. Jn 8:12). John observes that when Judas left the room "it was night" (Jn 13:30). In fact the paschal moon was shining at the full, but John was using "night" symbolically. Judas had surrendered himself to the power of darkness.

The remarkable thing about this incident is that still no one at the table realized what was happening. On the other hand, Judas's departure could have been for any reason, and there was no particular reason for the other disciples to connect it with the betrayal. Some thought that Jesus had sent him to buy food for the feast* (which lasted for seven days), others that he had gone to give something to the poor (Jn 13:29; see Rich and Poor).

Later that evening Jesus and the disciples went to the garden called Gethsemane* on the Mount of Olives, and Judas's plan went into operation (Mt 26:36-56; Mk 14:26-50; Lk 22:39-53; Jn 18:1-14). So this became, in the words perpetuated ever since in the church's liturgy, "the night in which he was betrayed" (1 Cor 11:23). Judas was provided with a band of men and officers to carry out the arrest. Judas was clearly in charge of the proceedings. There was a full moon and enough light to see by, but to prevent any mistake, the Synoptic Evangelists write that Judas gave a sign: he would identify Jesus with a kiss, the normal mode of greeting between disciple and rabbi (Mt 26:47-50; Mk 14:43-45; Lk 22:4748). Curiously, at the point of having identified Jesus in the garden, Judas fades from the scene.

The NT has two accounts of the death of Judas which, on the face of it, differ markedly. Matthew has it that Judas, overcome by remorse when he saw that an innocent man was condemned, threw the money he had received down in the Temple* and went out and hanged himself. The priests,* unwilling to put "blood money" into the treasury, bought a potter's field with it—a worked-out clay pit—"to bury strangers in." This place came to be known as "the Field of Blood" (Mt 27:3-9; cf. Zech 11:12-13). Acts reports that Judas purchased the field himself, and "falling headlong (in the field) he burst open in the middle and all his bowels gushed out" Thus the field was known as Akeldama, "the Field of Blood" (Acts 1:18-19; cf. 2 Sam 17:23; 2 Macc 9:7-18).

As long ago as Augustine it was suggested that if Judas hanged himself in the field, perhaps sometime after his death, when his body was decomposing, the rope gave way and Luke's account describes the consequences. It might be regarded as supplementary to Matthew's account Papias, in a fragment (Fragment 3) preserved by Apollinaris of Laodicea, relates how Judas's body swelled (this may be the meaning of prēnēs in Acts 1:18, see RSV note), and he died on his own land. As for the field, it could be regarded as purchased by Judas since it was his money that was used. Whatever the tradition history of these accounts, two things seem clear: Judas died a violent death, and in some way connected with him a plot of ground was bought that was called "the Field of Blood." Tradition has located this field at the confluence of the Kidron, Tyropoean and Hinnom valleys. The last word the NT gives on Judas is this: he had "turned aside" from his ministry and apostleship "to go to his own place"—a common euphemism for one's final destruction. The apostle had become an apostate and a warning to all disciples.

JUDGMENT

Judgment is the process whereby God calls people to account for their behavior and allots their destinies accordingly. The theme is prominent in the teaching of Jesus, which echoes many features found in the OT, apocalyptic* and rabbinic literature (see Rabbinic Traditions).
1. Terminology and Meaning

Like the English verb "judge," the Greek word krinō can mean "form an opinion" (Lk 7:43). But normally in the NT it describes the passing of a sentence—either in a law-court (Mt 5:40) or metaphorically with reference to divine judgment (Mt 7:1-2; Jn 5:22, 30). Often the focus is on the negative aspect of condemnation (Mt 7:1; Jn 3:17-18). The noun krisis normally refers to the act of judging (Mt 5:21-22; Lk 11:31-32), while krima connotes the verdict or sentence (Lk 23:40). But this distinction is sometimes blurred (e.g., krima in Jn 9:39). The influence of the LXX, where the word group usually translates ššṭ, can be seen in Matthew 23:23 and Luke 11:42, where krisis means "justice"; and in Matthew 19:28 and Luke 22:30, where krinō probably means "rule." Although the noun "judge" (kritēs) occurs in parables* (Mt 5:25; Lk 18:2, 6), it is not used as a description of God in the direct sayings of Jesus.

Other expressions to be considered are "condemn" (katakrinō, Mt 12:41-42; katadikazō, Mt 12:37), "punishment" (kolasis, Mt 25:46), the dik- word group (injustice, Righteousness), translated variously as "punishment," "retribution," "vindicate," "justice" (Lk 18:1-8; 21:22), "visitation" (episkopē, Lk 19:44) and references to the "day" (hēmera) of judgment (Mt 7:22; 12:36; Lk 21:34; see Eschatology). In addition there is a rich variety of parabolic images of judgment.

2. The Message of Jesus.

Jesus rejects the widespread idea that the wealth or suffering of individuals is God's reward for righteousness or punishment for sin (Mk 12:38-44; Jn 9:2-3). In Luke 13:1-5 the lesson to be learned from the sufferings of some Galileans at Pilate's hands and from the disaster in Siloam is not that the victims were especially wicked but that everyone must repent in the face of God's judgment (see Repentance).

2.1. Judgment on the Nation. Much of Jesus' most vivid teaching consists of warnings to his contemporaries that an unrepentant Israel* is heading for imminent historical catastrophe. According to the parable of the children in the marketplace (Mt 11:16-19), "this generation's" refusal to "play the game" with either John the Baptist* or Jesus shows its defiance of God. The phrase identifies Jesus' contemporaries with the rebellious generation of Deuteronomy 32:5,20; Psalm 78:8 and Jeremiah 7:29. This is the last generation of a rebellious people, destined now to pay in full the accumulated debt of the nation's resistance to God (Lk 11:47-51; Mk 12:1-12). There is still time for a change of heart, but a strictly limited time (Lk 13:6-9).

Jerusalem and its religious leaders are the main target of these warnings. In the manner of an OT prophet Jesus laments Jerusalem's failure to respond to his call and prophesies its desolation (Lk 13:34-35; 19:41-44). Judgment takes the form of God's abandonment of Israel to its enemies, as in Jeremiah 7:25-34; 12:7; 25:4-11 and Hosea 9:15-17; 10:13-15.

It has been argued, notably by C. H. Dodd and J. Jeremias, that several parables, which in the Gospels are addressed to disciples and relate to Jesus' final coming and the final judgment were originally addressed by Jesus to his opponents or to the crowds (see People, Crowd), and referred to the coming catastrophe for Israel (e.g., Mt 24:45—25:30). But since Jeremias concedes that Jesus expected a final judgment, it is better to allow that some parables allude to Israel's impending crisis, others to the final judgment of all people (see Marshall). But we may of course agree with Jeremias that Jesus gave no clue that the gap between Jerusalem's destruction (see Destruction of Jerusalem) and the final judgment would be extended for centuries.

2.2. The Final Judgment. Jesus speaks of a judgment of all people on the "day" when the Son of man* comes to establish his kingdom in its fullness (Mt 7:22; Lk 17:30-35; see Kingdom of God). God is the judge (Mt 10:28). Jesus' own role at the judgment is sometimes that of witness for or against the person judged (Mt 10:32-33), but sometimes he is the judge (Mt 7:21-23; 16:27). There is some force in the argument that in the earliest Son of man sayings Jesus is witness rather than judge, and that the depiction of him as judge is therefore a later development. Yet the fact that the Son of man sits at God's right hand (Mk 14:62) shows how easily one concept could pass over into the other.

2.2.1. Judgment as Separation. The judgment involves a division between two kinds of people—"sons of the kingdom" and "sons of the evil one" (Mt 13:38), "wise" and "foolish" (Mt 7:24-27), "sheep" and "goats" (Mt 25:31-46), those who "enter into life" and those who are "thrown into hell" (Mk 9:42-48). This reflects the radical distinction between "the righteous" and "the wicked" found in much apocalyptic literature and in the Dead Sea Scrolls.*

2.2.2. The Criterion and the Outcome of Judgment. Jesus maintains the Jewish emphasis on judgment according to works (Mt 7:21-23; 12:36-37; 25:31-46). He provides examples of particular kinds of deeds which will seal a person's condemnation—e.g., causing "little ones" to sin (Mk 9:42), lack of care for the poor (Lk 16:19-31; Mt 25:31-46), failure to forgive (Mt 18:21-35), being judgmental toward others (Mt 7:1-2). His warnings of condemnation are almost never directed at those who, for example, commit adultery (see Marriage and Divorce), collect taxes* dishonestly, but at the pious who would exclude such people from the community (Mt 23:33; Lk 18:9-14).

In some judgment sayings, works are bound up with relationship or response to Jesus. In Matthew 7:24-27 we read, "everyone who hears these words of mine and does them is like a wise man ...." In Matthew 25:31-46 care for the needy (or lack of it) is taken as evidence of people's reaction to Jesus. Other sayings declare that reaction to Jesus will be the key criterion at the judgment. "All who acknowledge me before other people, the Son of Man will acknowledge them before the angels of God. Those who disown me before other people will be disowned before the angels of God" (Lk 12:8-9; cf. Mk 8:38; Lk 10:8-16; 11:29-32).

Luke 12:8-9 also indicates that, just as the criterion of judgment is relationship to Jesus, so the outcome of judgment will be expressed in terms of relationship to Jesus or to God. It will involve acceptance into fellowship with God or rejection from that fellowship. Those who do not know him—who are not in genuine, obedient relationship to him—now, will not know him then. In the parables of Matthew 25 and Luke 13:25-27 the outcome of the judgment is also expressed in terms of coming into or departing from God's presence.

Apart from the language of relationship, Jesus uses other more pictorial language to depict human destiny beyond the judgment God's family will sit at the Father's table, while others are thrown outside (Lk 13:28-29). They will see God (Mt 5:8) and experience eternal life (Mk 10:30). A negative outcome is described as unquenchable fire or Gehenna (Mk 9:43, 45, 48; Mt 5:22; Lk 12:5). Those excluded from God's kingdom will "weep and gnash their teeth" (Mt 13:42, 50; Lk 13:28). It is not clear whether such language can be taken to imply eternal torment as traditionally understood. Such imagery, together with the reference to "eternal punishment" in Matthew 25:46, may be intended not so much to describe the specific character of punishment as to underline the irreversible and negative force of separation from God's presence.

It must also be noted that, in comparison with much Jewish literature (e.g., 1 Enoch 21-22), Jesus' references to the destiny of the wicked are remarkably allusive and unspecific; and that such references occur mostly in exhortations to the hearer to respond to Jesus' message, not in descriptions of the fate of someone else.

2.2.3. The Main Thrust: Relationship Rather Than Retribution.

The evidence suggests that Jesus' understanding of judgment focuses not on a Strictly retributive justice, whereby rewards and punishments are recompense for human deeds. Rather, the focus is on relationship to Jesus, or to God through him. The relationship chosen by people when confronted by the message of God's kingdom will be confirmed at the final judgment When the language of judgment according to works is used, the character of the works is understood as evidence of a person's relationship to God, or as showing whether the basic direction of one's life is toward him or away from him.

This perspective on Jesus' message is reinforced by three other images of judgment The motif of the Two Ways, already familiar in Judaism* (e.g., 1 Enoch 94:1-4; 1QS 3:13—4:26), suggests that human destinies are not rewards or punishments imposed from outside, but the inherent outcome of the choices people make (Mt 7:13-14). The image of treasure in heaven (Tob 4:3-10; Pss. Sol. 9:9; 2 Apoc. Bar. 14:12; 24:1) pictures people's destinies as the end-result of their desires. Those whose hearts are fixed on submission to God's rule will gain the riches of his kingdom (Mt 6:19-21; Lk 12:33-34). Finally, in the image of the banquet invitation (Lk 14:16-24), everything turns on the refusal of those invited to come to the feast They have excluded themselves while the poor are open to the insistent gift of the host.

2.2.4. Conclusion.

Jesus rejects speculation about many aspects of final judgment and its outcome. He is silent about the geography of God's kingdom or of Gehenna (see Heaven and Hell). Rather than speculate about the number of those saved (2 Esdr 8:1), he urges his hearers to make sure of their own entry into the kingdom (Lk 13:23-24). And he tempers stern warnings of judgment with a greater emphasis on the infinite care of God for his creatures (Lk 12:4-12). There are also hints that his own suffering and death involve taking on himself the judgment of God on behalf of others (Mk 10:45; 14:36; 15:34).

3.1. Matthew. In comparison with Mark and Luke, Matthew heightens the emphasis on judgment reward and punishment. He increases the number of references to Gehenna and related images (5:22; 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 23:15, 33; 24:51; 25:30), and makes more prominent use of judgment as a sanction for behavior (6:1-6, 16-18; 18:35; 25:14-30). In keeping with this is the stress on judgment according to works (16:27, different from Mk 8:38). Peculiar to Matthew is the parable of the sheep and the goats (25:31-46) in which destinies are allotted according to deeds of mercy done, or not done, toward "the least of these brothers of mine." The older view, that this refers to general humanitarian concern, has been increasingly supplanted in recent studies by the view that the "brothers" are Christians, or Christian missionaries (see France, 264). Possibly Jesus' original reference was to suffering humanity in general, but this has been narrowed down in Matthew to a reference to Christian missionaries.

Matthew's Gospel highlights God's judgment on "this generation" of Jews, in particular Jewish leaders (23:29-36). They are the object of the series of "woes" in chapter 23. Matthew alone adds to the parable of the wicked tenants the conclusion: "Therefore I tell you that the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a nation producing its fruits" (21:43). Yet there are severe warnings for the church* too, lest they follow the same path of disobedience. The parable of the wedding feast ends with the ejection of the "replacement" guest who has failed to meet the condition of being properly dressed (22:1-14). The criticism of scribes* and Pharisees* becomes a warning to "you," the hearers of the Gospel, to live circumspectly (23:2-12). For even religious works will count for nothing at the judgment if they are not "the will of my Father in heaven" (7:21-23). Only at the judgment will it be clear who truly belongs to God's kingdom (13:24-30, 36-43, 47-50).

3.2. John. The Fourth Gospel refers in only two places to the final judgment. When in John 12:48 Jesus says people will be judged on the last day by the word which he has spoken, the thought seems to be close to that of Mark 8:38. John 5:26-29 offers the traditional apocalyptic description of a final general resurrection and judgment. Christ* is the judge (v. 27). He judges according to works, and there are two possible outcomes—life and condemnation (krisis. verse 29; for krisis and krinō denoting condemnation cf. 3:18; 12:31; 16:11). But these verses are set in relation to verses 19-25, which emphasize a process of judgment already in operation: "whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life, and does not come under condemnation, but has crossed over from death to life." Thus the verdict of the last judgment is a ratification of the life or death which people already experience because of their reaction to Christ.

This focus on judgment as a process already at work is entirely characteristic of John. Confronted by Jesus and his revelation of God, people react either by committing themselves in trust to him, or by rejecting him (1:11-12; 3:16-21, 36; 5:24; 8:12-19; 9:39). The immediate outcome of faith* is reception of eternal life (3:16, 36; 5:24; 12:50; see Life), which derives its quality from relationship to Christ (17:3). The experience of eternal life reaches its goal beyond death (11:25-26) or at the last day (5:29; 6:40, 51, 54, 58). Those who do not receive Christ are out of relationship to him. God's wrath rests on them (3:36); they remain in darkness and death (12:46; 5:24). Their condition is self-imposed: They prefer darkness and that is what they get (3:19-21).

Whereas the Synoptics use colorful imagery such as kingdom and wedding, John prefers the more abstract language of love, knowing God, life, death. The overall effect of his presentation is to highlight the theme, which we have seen in the Synoptics, of judgment determined by response to the person and message of Jesus.

JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS

In biblical thought the idea of justice or righteousness generally expresses conformity to God's will in all areas of life: law, government covenant loyalty, ethical integrity or gracious actions. When humans adhere to God's will as expressed in his Law, they are considered just or righteous. Jesus taught that those who conform their lives to his teachings are also just or righteous.

2. The Message of Jesus
3. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers

1. Terminology, Meaning and Context.

English words related to justice and righteousness are usually used to translate the dik- word group found in the NT. The use of dik- in the NT reflects the LXX's usual translation of the Hebrew šdq (righteous) word-group with the Greek dik-. In the OT the šdq word group essentially refers to "conduct in accordance with the requirements of a particular relationship," whether that be the covenant which imposes obligations on both God and his people or the world order set up by God, with which humanity must live in accordance. Hence, though she acted sinful in playing the harlot, Tamar is said to be "more righteous" than Judah because she acted in the interest of a social standard—Judah's obligation to provide offspring for her deceased husband (Gen 38:26). In several instances the šdq word group is translated in the LXX by other Greek terms, including eleēmosynē (almsgiving) and krisis (judgment). However, it is not just the šdq word group that conveys the idea of righteousness and justice in the Hebrew OT; the concept also embraces mišpāṭ (judgment, ordinance), ḥeseḏ (lovingkindness), tôrâ (command) and tâmîm (perfect, complete).

Whereas in English justice emphasizes conformity to a society's standards, righteousness usually denotes conformity to God's standards or religious norms. However, these distinctions are not helpful when justice and righteousness are used to translate biblical terms (e.g., Job 22:6-9, 23; Ezek 45:9; Amos 4:1-3). In conveying biblical thought, the two English terms are inseparable in that it is God's will to which a person conforms, whether that will is expressed in predominantly social or religious categories. In this article justice will be used exclusively for the social implications of God's will; righteousness will be used for the broader meaning of the concept. However, in many instances a clear distinction cannot and should not be made.
Throughout Jewish literature we find two dominant ideas: God is righteous and his people are to be righteous in their behavior. The righteousness of God, primarily understood as his impeccable holiness and the conformity of his actions to that holy nature, is commonplace in Jewish thought (Is 45:21; Ps 22:31; 40:10; 51:14; 71:15-24; Hos 10:12; Amos 5:21-24; Mic 6:5; 7:9; Pss. Sol. 2:15; 8:23; Bar 5:1-2; Sib. Or. 3:704; Josephus Ant. 2.6.4 §108; 11.3.6 §55; 1QS 1:21; 10:11, 25; 1QH 12:19; 14:15; Sipre Deut 307 [on 32:4]; m. Sota 1:9). In addition, as recent scholarship has shown, righteousness attributed to God's people refers to moral behavior conforming to God's will (Gen 18:19; Lev 19:36; Deut 6:25; Is 5:16; Ps 1:4-6; Pss. Sol. 2:34-35; 3:3-12; 15:1-13; Philo, Leg. AU. 2.18; Migr. Abr. 219; 1QS 1:5, 13; 3:1; 1QH 2:13; 4:30, 31; 7:14; Sipra Qedoshim pereq 11:6 [on Lev 20:16]; t. Pe'a 4.19; t. Sanh. 1.3-5). These twin themes of divine and human righteousness should inform our approach to the use of righteousness in the Gospels.

Biblical statements about the necessity of righteousness sometimes seem to imply a righteous status attained by works (Gen 18:19; Mt 5:20). But in the context of biblical thought righteous behavior is generally the result of salvation* and is required of those who participate in the covenantal blessings. Throughout the OT, as well as Jewish literature from the time of Jesus, righteousness refers to behavior conforming to the will of God. Paul's doctrine of justification, an eschatological righteousness imputed to believers in view of Christ's work, is largely confined to Paul's letters and should not be read into the texts of the Gospels simply because the terminology of righteousness appears.

2. The Message of Jesus.

Jesus describes as righteous those who conform to God's will as revealed both in the OT and in his own teachings. The foundation for Jesus' teachings on righteous behavior is that the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) has been inaugurated in his own person and ministry (Lk 7:18-23; 11:20). Since God's kingdom is a righteous kingdom (Ps 97—99; Is 11:1-5; I Enoch 62:1-16), when Jesus inaugurates the kingdom he brings righteousness to pass and expects righteous behavior from his followers. Participation in the kingdom of God entails an ethical obligation (Mk 1:15), just as covenantal participation required obedience in OT religion (Lev 19:36; but 24:17-8) and in later Judaism* (see Ethics of Jesus).

Today many scholars argue that Jesus probably did not use the vocabulary of righteousness with any frequency. Since the vocabulary is found relatively infrequently in our Gospels, this view deserves consideration. However, evidence for the presence of the concept of righteousness in Jesus' teaching should not be limited to the occurrence or frequency of the vocabulary of righteousness. From the evidence of the Gospels, Jesus' teaching stressed that his followers must conform their lives to God's will. Thus it may be argued that the idea of righteousness, if not the terminology, is found everywhere in the teachings of Jesus: in his demand for repentance, in his blessings for good works, in his practice of social mercy and in his consistent concern for personal holiness. Furthermore, the usage of the terminology of righteousness in the Gospels conforms to what we know of its usage in Judaism at the time of Jesus.

Since some of the references to righteousness in the Gospels undoubtedly come from the vocabulary of the Evangelists themselves or their tradition (e.g., Mt 3:15), we cannot always be certain that the term was used by Jesus in a particular setting. But if Matthew, Luke or John used the term righteousness where Jesus did not, they are faithfully reflecting the message of Jesus, laying stress on what they considered needful for their audiences to hear.

2.1. Righteousness in the Mission of Jesus and John

Jesus and John (see John the Baptist) show clear continuity in their messages of righteousness. Jesus views his mission as intimately tied with John's as together they accomplish all righteousness by submitting to God—John as baptizer and Jesus as the one baptized (Mt 3:15). Furthermore, John's essential message was a call for righteous behavior (Mt 21:32; Mk 6:20) manifesting itself in repentance* (Lk 3:7-9), mercy* and the pursuit of justice (Lk 3:10-14). Jesus builds on John's message in his own call for repentance (cf. Mt 3:2 and 4:17).

2.2. Righteousness As Conformity to OT Law

Jesus is described as righteous, just or innocent in the sense that he performs all that God's will requires. We may assume that God's will in this case is that described in the OT (Lk 23:47; Mt 27:4,19,24). Jesus also describes as righteous those whose behavior is in conformity to God's laws found in the OT. Thus, righteous describes those who anticipated the Messiah (Mt 13:17) and those who were martyred (23:29, 35). In the OT (Gen 15:6; Ps 1:4-6; 11:7; 72:1; Is 1:16-17) and in Jewish literature (*Pss. Sol. 3:3-12; Philo Leg. AU. 2.18; Josephus Ant. 6.5.6 §93; 1QS 1:13, 15; CD 1:19-21; m. Soṭa 1:9) righteousness commonly characterizes those who adhere to God's commands in faith and obedience.
2.3. Righteousness At Conformity to Jesus' Teachings. Jesus goes beyond the OT as a standard for righteousness by describing as righteous those who obey his own teachings. In so doing Jesus redefines the term in a manner parallel to what we find in the Dead Sea Scrolls (see Dead Sea Scrolls), where the instruction of the Teacher of Righteousness sets a new standard for the sectarian community at Qumran (CD 4:7; 20:20-21; lQpHab 2:2; 7:3-5).

In using his own teachings as the basis for righteousness, Jesus reveals that the OT Law and Prophets (Mt 5:17) are being fulfilled in his own teachings and that he is the Messiah (see Christ). Jesus fulfills the Law* and so reveals a new standard of conduct (Mt 5:20). Henceforth, the righteousness of God's people is determined by conformity to the teachings of Jesus, which in turn fulfill the OT revelation of God's will. Jesus expects his followers to be righteous in their conduct (Mt 5:6, 10), to do God's will (Mt 7:12, 13-27) and to pursue justice (Mt 23:23 [Akrisis]; 25:37; Jn 7:24). According to Jesus, only those who are righteous are finally acceptable to God (Mt 10:41; 12:37; 13:43, 49; 25:46; Lk 14:14; Jn 5:30). Again, this righteousness is not an outward conformity to the Law or an appeal to ritual observances, but the necessary fruit of commitment to Jesus as Messiah and Lord.* The link between commitment and obedience is illustrated by Jesus' words at the end of the Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount): "Everyone then who hears these words of mine and does them ..." (Mt 7:21-27). Particular manifestations of righteousness (Mt 6:1) include almsgiving (Mt 6:2-4), prayer* (Mt 6:5-15) and fasting* (Mt 6:16-18).

As for those who claim to have conformed to the standards of the Jewish legal traditions, Jesus—tongue in cheek—describes them as "righteous" (Mt 9:13; Mk 2:17). The righteousness of the Pharisees* and scribes* is not considered sufficient (cf. Lk 5:30, 32; 15:7; 18:9; 20:20; Mt 23:28) for at least two reasons: (1) their hearts are not right (Mk 7:6-7; Mt 5:28) and (2) their standard is no longer adequate since God has fulfilled the OT Law in Jesus (Mt 5:17-48). However, for the one whose heart is right and whose standard is the fulfilled Law of Jesus, their commitment to obedience is to be complete (Mt 5:48). The word perfect in Matthew 5:48 speaks of the response of the whole heart, a total or thorough commitment to God's will—not sinless perfection. For Jesus the pursuit of righteousness is obeying God's will in all its aspects (personal, social and communal) and is to be the first priority of his followers (Mt 6:33).

3. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers.
Among the Gospel authors only Matthew and Luke give prominent place to the vocabulary of righteousness; Mark only uses the adjective dikaios, and that only twice (Mk 2:17; 6:20), while John uses dik- terminology five times (see 3.3. below).

3.1. Matthew. There is little doubt that Matthew has reworked some important traditions and added the term righteousness, emphasizing behavior that conforms to the new standard revealed in Jesus (cf., e.g., Mt 5:6 with Lk 6:21; Mt 6:33 with Lk 12:31). Indeed, some scholars see Matthew’s hand in each occurrence of the word. Matthew places particular emphasis on righteousness as conformity to Jesus' teachings.

3.1.1. Righteousness As Conformity to OT Law. As the wording of Matthew 3:15 indicates ("it is proper for us to fulfill all righteousness"), together John the Baptist and Jesus fulfill God's will for them in its entirety and so bring all of God's demands to a salvation-historical climax. The favored Matthean expressions, "fulfillment" and "all righteousness," set the tone for both John's work (Mt 21:32) and Jesus' life (Mt 27:19) and teachings (Mt 5:20). They do all that God has called them to do, and in so doing they fulfill all righteousness. John is later described as the one who came "in the way of righteousness," meaning he proclaimed and performed God's will (cf. Mt 21:31 and 3:1-10). Some interpreters have understood the fulfillment of righteousness in Matthew 3:15 as meaning "to bring about God's prophetic and eschatological plan of redemption." In either case the OT revelation of God's will is in view (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

In addition to John the Baptist and Jesus, Matthew describes others as righteous in their obedience to OT Law, including Joseph (Mt 1:19) and various OT saints (Mt 13:17; 23:29, 35).

3.1.2. Righteousness As Conformity to Jesus' Teachings. The Sermon on the Mount is a revelation of Jesus' teachings on righteousness, explaining what it is to do God's will and perform good works (Mt 5:6,16,17-20, 21-48; 6:1-18, 33; 7:12,13-14,16-21, 23-27). The thrust of the Sermon points to the importance of righteousness for Matthew.

For Matthew, Jesus' pre-eminent demand of his disciples* is to do God's will— to exhibit righteousness (cf. Mt 5:20, 48; 7:13-27). Accordingly, entrance into the kingdom is conditioned on moral righteousness. In light of its Jewish background and its Matthean context, the beatitude on those who hunger and thirst for righteousness should be understood as a blessing for those who desire to do God's will, who strive to conform to his standard (Mt 5:6). However, some scholars understand this as a blessing on those who are longing for eschatological (see Eschatology) vindication or salvation.* According to this interpretation, righteousness may be a gift of righteous conduct granted them in the last day or the fulfillment of their longing to see God's righteousness established on earth. But in light of the behavioral grounds for the blessings (see Blessing and Woe) in Matthew 5:3-11, it is more likely that righteousness in Matthew 5:6 refers to the habit of doing God's will. Those who have been persecuted because of righteousness (Mt 5:10) are those who suffer for obedience to God's will as revealed by Jesus. Hence, the grounds for their persecution is their loyalty to Jesus as much as it is their good works.

The righteousness expected of Jesus' disciples is a righteousness that is vastly superior to the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 5:20). Matthew 5:20 is often understood to mean that, whereas the Pharisees and scribes taught a righteousness that was merited by their quantity of good deeds, Jesus taught a righteousness that was given by God. Hence, Jesus' righteousness is superior. But today there is a growing consensus among scholars that the debate Jesus had with the scribes and Pharisees was not over earning merit before God. Rather, it was about Jesus' place in God's plan for redemption. Consequently, the righteousness Jesus demands is superior, not because scribal and Pharisaic righteousness is necessarily an attempt to earn salvation, but because Jesus demands behavior that conforms to God's standard as revealed by himself. The point-counterpoints of Matthew 5:21-48 explicate the nature of the surpassing righteousness that Jesus reveals. This righteousness is messianic (Mt 5:17), deeper (Mt 5:27-30) and innovative (Mt 5:3842). The usage of righteousness in Matthew 5:20 is similar to the usage of the term in the Qumran literature: it is an eschatological righteousness pertaining to a particular group of God's people. Those who are marked by the righteousness of Jesus will be approved by God and will enter the kingdom (Mt 5:6, 10; 6:33; 7:21-23; cf. 12:36-37).

For Matthew righteousness is behavioral. The "practice of piety" referred to in Matthew 6:1 is immediately related to the giving of alms in 6:2. Matthew 6:1 sets the theme for Jesus' instruction on religious behavior such as almsgiving, prayer and fasting (Mt 6:2-18). In some MSS Matthew 6:1 reads "almsgiving" (eleēmo-synēn) instead of "practicing your piety" (dikaiosynēn). Interestingly, rabbinic sources show that the Hebrew and Aramaic terms for almsgiving and righteousness (ṣēdeq) are closely associated, though in this case the more general term is most likely intended, setting the stage for the specific instructions of Matthew 6:2-18 (see Przybylski).

Though some scholars have suggested that the righteousness pursued in Matthew 6:33 is a gift from God—eschatological salvation (much like Pauline usage)—many interpreters today understand it as moral behavior which includes the establishment of justice (cf. Mt 6:10 with 5:6; 6:33). The fact that pursuing righteousness is joined so closely with seeking God's kingdom—submitting to God's reign and seeking to realize it in this world—favors a behavioral sense here as well. Thus submission to God through seeking his kingdom unleashes God's provisions (Mt 6:33).

Matthew further highlights the behavioral focus of righteousness in the examples of Joseph (Mt 1:19), Abel (Mt 23:35) and other OT saints who are finally acceptable to the Father because they have lived faithfully (Mt 5:45; 12:37; 13:43, 49; 25:37, 46). On the other hand, Matthew emphasizes the absence of the proper kind of righteousness in the Pharisees and Jewish leaders, who either feign their religiosity or have not perceived the new standard set forth in Jesus’ teachings (Mt 5:20; 9:13; 23:28).

It is unclear whether the "righteous person" of Matthew 10:41 refers to a special class of leaders (e.g., teachers) among Jesus' followers or to anyone who is simply obedient to his commands. Jesus' final words explicitly call for all future disciples to obey his commands (Mt 28:20) and, in keeping with Matthew's emphases, we may assume that those who do so are righteous.

3.2. Luke. Luke seems to focus less attention on whether the standard of righteousness is derived from the OT or Jesus, placing his emphasis on the pious, merciful and just behavior that is the fruit of those who are ultimately approved by God. In several passages Luke describes righteousness as conformity to God's Law (Lk 1:6; 2:25; 23:47, 50). Zechariah and Elizabeth are described as "righteous before God" because they obeyed the Lord's commandments blamelessly (Lk 1:6). The angel* tells Zechariah that John, the promised fruit of Elizabeth's womb, will turn many from disobedience to "the wisdom of the just"—a life of obedience to God's commands that conforms to God's wisdom (Lk 1:17). Simeon is described as "righteous and pious" because of his trusting hope that God would eventually save his people (Lk 2:25). Joseph from Arimathea was publicly known for his piety because he was one who lived according to God's commandments* (Lk 23:50). In Acts a similar evaluation is given of Cornelius (Acts 10:22). These people embody proper OT faith—a faith that obeys God's will, trusts in his salvation and waits for him to vindicate his purposes. Luke's concept of righteousness includes a dominant element of piety as well as social mercy and justice (Lk 14:14; cf. also Lk 12:57; 23:41). The importance of righteousness in Luke is illustrated in Luke 14:14 (cf. Acts 24:15): It is the righteous who will be raised in the last day and enjoy fellowship with the Father.

Finally, whereas in Matthew and Mark the centurion at the cross confesses Jesus as the Son of God (see Son of God), in Luke he describes Jesus as dikaios — meaning "righteous," "just" or "innocent" (Lk 23:47; see Death of Jesus). This speaks indirectly of the injustice dealt Jesus by the authorities. The innocent or righteous character of Jesus is a theme Luke further emphasizes in Acts. Peter accuses the Jewish crowds (see People, Crowd) of denying the holy and righteous one and asking for a murderer in his place (Acts 3:14; cf. 7:52). Paul, when describing his conversion, says that Ananias told him that he was appointed by God to see the "Just One" (Acts 22:14)—referring to Jesus as vindicated and exalted in spite of his humiliating death in Jerusalem. Like the OT saints and their worthy successors in people like Zechariah, Elizabeth and Simeon, Jesus devoted his entire life to God and obeyed God's commands. Because of his obedience he was crucified.

For Luke the innocence of Jesus is more than a political or legal statement. It almost certainly connects Jesus with the Servant of Yahweh (see Servant of Yahweh) described in Isaiah 52:13—53:12 who both suffers and is exalted. In Acts 3:13-14 the themes of suffering and the righteous one are joined. Likewise, Luke 22:35-37, 39-46 shows traces of the theme of Jesus as the Suffering Servant At the cross, when the centurion confesses Jesus as "righteous" (Lk 23:47), Luke is once again indicating that Jesus is the innocent law-abiding Servant of Yahweh who brings salvation.

3.3. John. Out of the five uses of dik- terminology in the Fourth Gospel the adjective righteous is applied once to God (Jn 17:25) and twice to judgments made either by Jesus (Jn 5:30) or the crowd (Jn 7:24). John 16:8, 10 is the most notable use of righteousness in John, though scholars do not agree on the meaning of these verses. God has sent his Spirit (see Holy Spirit) into the world to convince the world* either (1) of its inadequate righteousness and consequently its need to turn to Christ or (2) of the righteous vindication of the Son in spite of his condemnation by the world. The Spirit will continue the work that Jesus performed in exposing sin (Jn 16:8, 10).

In inaugurating the kingdom of God and salvation, Jesus revealed that his followers were to be characterized by the pursuit of righteousness and justice. This is so central to Jesus' message that he states that without a righteous status/character one will not enter the kingdom of God. Though righteous character is expressed in righteous behavior, a righteous status is not obtained by good works. Rather, the person who is committed to Jesus in discipleship and has entered the kingdom of God can and should be expected to show righteousness in character and actions.

KINGDOM OF GOD/KINGDOM OF HEAVEN

The term "kingdom of God" or "kingdom of Heaven" signifies God's (see God) sovereign, dynamic and eschatological (see Eschatology) rule. The kingdom of God lay at the heart of Jesus' teaching. As proclaimed by Jesus the kingdom of God had continuity with the OT promise as well as with Jewish apocalyptic* thinking, but differed from them in important respects. For example, it denoted God's eternal rule rather than an earthly kingdom, its scope was universal rather than limited to the Jewish nation, and it was imminent and potentially present in him rather than a vague future hope, being inextricably connected with his own person and mission.

1. Terminology.

The Gospels use three terms to express the idea of the kingdom of God: ἡ ἐβάσιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ ("the kingdom of God"), ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν ("the kingdom of [the] Heaven[s]"") and the absolute ἡ βασιλεία ("the kingdom"). The equivalence of the first two expressions is indicated by their content, context and interchangeability in the Gospels. (The distinction between the kingdom of God as God's sovereignty, and the kingdom of Heaven conceived as an otherworldly, future reality, the former of which is the condition for entering the latter [Pamment], is without exegetical basis). The Greek for "the kingdom of (the) Heaven(s)" is a literal translation of the later Jewish mal'ḵûṯ šāmāyim (e.g., 2 Apoc. Bar. 73; 3 Apoc. Bar. 11:2; As. Mos. 10; Pss. Sol. 17:4; IQSb 3.5; m. Ber. 2.2.5; y. Ber. 4a; 7b), where "Heaven" replaces "God" out of reverence, as "2dōnay ("lord," "master") had replaced Yahweh ("Lord") and mākôm ("place") in due time replaced Šāmayim ("Heaven") (Dalman, 91-101). The kingdom of God is also referred to by the absolute "kingdom" when the reference is obvious.

The primary meaning of the Hebrew malēkūt (with synonyms), Aramaic malkū and Greek basileia is abstract and dynamic, that is, "sovereignty" or "royal rule." This is almost always the case in the OT and Jewish literature when the term is applied to God. The sense of realm—a territorial kingdom—is secondary, arising out of the necessity for a definite locus as the sphere for the exercise of sovereignty.

The Gospels introduce the ministries of John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) and of Jesus by stating that they proclaimed the nearness of the kingdom of God. No word of explanation is ever offered, and the conclusion must be that the idea of God's kingdom was well known.

In contrast to this is the total absence in the OT canonical books of the expression "kingdom of God." (The expression occurs once in Wis 10:10). Yet though the term is absent, the idea is present throughout the OT. In a number of instances Yahweh is presented as king (Deut 9:26 [LXX]; 1 Sam 12:12; Ps 24:10 [LXX 23:10]; 29:10 [LXX 28:10]; Is 6:5; 33:22; Zeph 3:15; Zech 14:16,17). At other places he is ascribed a royal throne (Ps 9:4 [LXX 9:5]; 45:6 [LXX 44:7]; 47:8 [LXX 46:9]; Is 6:1; 66:1; Ezek 1:26; Sir 1:8) while occasionally his continuous or future reign is affirmed (Ps 10:16 [LXX 9:37]; 146:10 [LXX 145:10]; Is 24:23; Wis 3:8). In fact Psalm 22:28 (MT 22:29; LXX 21:29) says "the kingdom" (hamm'lûkā; LXX basileia) belongs to the Lord.

The idea is not, however, confined to these texts with explicitly royal attributes; it underlies Yahweh's whole relation to Israel.* The demand presented to Pharaoh to let Israel go is the demand of the lawful king over against the usurper. The covenant with Israel is the covenant which affirms the suzerainty of Yahweh over his people. In the conquest of Canaan Yahweh as king apportions to his people a country; a country, moreover, which he, as the creator and king of the earth, can dispose as he pleases. The rule of God over Israel is especially exemplified in the time of the Judges, who functioned as his representatives. A crisis emerged with Israel's demand for a king (1 Sam 8:4-5), a demand that was interpreted as a rejection of Yahweh's rule (1 Sam 8:6-8). With the accession of David to the throne, however, the situation was somewhat normalized and the king was understood to reign as Yahweh's representative and be under Yahweh's suzerainty. In other words, the monarchy was looked upon as the concrete manifestation of Yahweh's rule.

This explains the (authoritative) role of the prophets at the court (e.g., Nathan, Gad, Elijah). The promise to establish David's throne forever, despite the rejection of Solomon (1 Kings 11:11-14), led to the focus upon a future Messiah (see Christ) who would rule over David's kingdom in righteousness and prosperity (see Son of David). Thus the Davidic kingdom was somehow conflated with Yahweh's rule. The great ethical prophets portrayed Israel's unfaithfulness against the Creator and king (Lord) of the universe, who had been pleased to identify himself with Israel. The crisis became especially acute when the last vestiges of David's kingdom were swept away by the Babylonian captivity. The promise made to David for an everlasting kingdom was now in some circles radically reinterpreted.

No other writing of the OT has more to say about the sovereignty of God than Daniel, where the kingdom of God is the central theme. However, the conception of the kingdom of God by Daniel is transformed under the impact of the new situation. The divine sovereignty is set vis-à-vis human kingdoms. These are described as being under the control of the God of heaven,* who allots the sovereignty in accordance with his will. In Daniel 2 the kingdom of God is described as a direct divine intervention. Its agent, in the form of a stone cut without hands, crushes the various human kingdoms, here symbolized by various metals (and clay), and grows until it (i.e., the kingdom, king and kingdom being interchangeable in Daniel) fills the whole earth. In Daniel 7 the symbolism changes to one of wild beasts portraying the ungodly character of the human kingdoms. The agent for the kingdom of God is a figure described as "one like a son of man" (see Son of Man). This figure assumes the royal rule of the spiritual powers at work behind the earthly potentates, and his saints are given the kingly rule of the monarchs under the whole heaven (i.e., the earthly potentates).

Thus Daniel not only portrays the kingdom of God divested of its Davidic, earthly, political character, but also depicts its agent as a heavenly, transcendental being. The new situation has brought about not only a new concept of the kingdom of God but a transformation of its agent (see Caragounis 1986, 61-80). These new ideas were of decisive importance in shaping future messianic thought and eschatology, not only in Judaism* but also in Jesus' teaching.

The concept of the kingdom of God in early Judaism was shaped principally by three factors. At the basis was the OT idea of Yahweh's eschatological epiphany in judgment* to punish the wicked (i.e., Israel's enemies) and reward the just (i.e., Israel). This was coupled with the idea of God's reign through his elect messianic king of Davidic descent, bringing in a time of untold bliss for the Jewish people. The second factor was Daniel's new understanding of the kingdom and its agent as transcendent, heavenly realities and the consequent deliverance of God's people in primarily dynamic terms. The third factor was the centuries-long Gentile rule over Palestine which intensified the longing for liberation, national identity and happiness (see Revolutionary Movements).

Although the term "kingdom of God" is rare in Judaism, the idea is almost ubiquitous, either explicitly as the kingdom of the Messiah or implicitly in descriptions of the messianic age. The two lines of messianic expectation to which Judaism was heir are reflected in the ambivalent descriptions of the messianic kingdom. This ambivalence, besides defying a strictly systematic presentation of kingdom teaching, also implies that motifs from both lines of thought are blended together to various degrees. The result is a variety of messianologies and kingdom conceptions, which are not always clearly demarcated from one another. In general, however, we may distinguish between two main tendencies in kingdom thinking: an earlier, political, this-worldly conception of a temporary, Davidic kingdom with Jerusalem as the center and the Jews as the primary beneficiaries— though sometimes encompassing the whole world— and a later, apocalyptic conception of an ultramundane, transcendental and everlasting kingdom, conceived in universalistic terms.

When the kingdom of God is considered as temporary, usually a judgment follows and a new world is posited, and a reign of God is looked for in heaven with greater bliss than that of the messianic kingdom. This view is sharply contrasted with the apocalyptic view, according to which the kingdom of God comes by a direct intervention of God and is transcendent and everlasting under a similarly transcendent and pre-existent Messiah, described as Son of man (Daniel, the so-called Parables of 1 Enoch 37—71, 2 Ezra). In this case the Messiah takes part in the judgment, which thus precedes the messianic kingdom. This kingdom is the final kingdom of God which is to last forever.
But as is natural, even the later expectation for the most part utilizes the messianic categories of the earlier expectation, and this makes it more difficult to isolate the traits of the one from those of the other. The following is an attempt to illustrate briefly some of the main lines of thought in Jewish expectations of the kingdom of God without attempting to draw a stria demarcating line between the early and the later forms of the expectation or between the different standpoints within early Judaism.

Especially in works evincing Danielic influence, the inbreaking of the kingdom of God is preceded by a time of tribulation and upheaval both in heaven and on earth (Sib. Or. 3:796-808; 2 Apoc. Bar 70:2-8; 4 Ezra 6:24; 9:1-12; 13:29-31; 1QM 12:9; 19:1-2; cf. Mt 24:7-12 par.). In rabbinic literature this came to be called the birth pangs of the Messiah (b. Sank 98b.; Str-B 1.950). The Messiah's appearance is sometimes preceded by the coming of Elijah* (Mai 3:23-24; Sir 48:10-11; cf. Mt 17:10 par.; m. 'Ed. 8:7; Justin Dial. Tryph. 8) or of the prophet-like-Moses* (Deut 18:15; 1QS 9:11; 4QTestim 5-8; Jn 1:21).

The Messiah himself is conceived variously. The traditional view of a fully human, Davidic Messiah (Pss. Sol. 17:5, 23; Sib. Or. 3:49) who conquers the wicked (Sib. Or. 3:652-56; Pss. Sol. 17:23-32) is frequent, while in works belonging to the Danielic tradition the Messiah is a pre-existent, supernatural being with powers to judge the kings and the mighty, in short, all the enemies of God, and to vindicate the righteous (1 Enoch 46:1-6; 48:2-6; 62:5-7; 4 Ezra 12:32). Another difference is that according to 1 Enoch 90:16-38 the Messiah will appear after the judgment, whereas in most other works (Sib. Or. 3:652-6; Pss. Sol. 17:14-41; 1 Enoch 46:4-6; 62:3-12; 69:27-9; 4 Ezra 13:32-8; cf. Mt 25:31-46) he actually conquers or judges his enemies.

Echoing the sentiment of Psalm 2:1-3 a number of works presuppose a final assault by the ungodly against the Messiah (Sib. Or. 3:663-68; 1 Enoch 90:16; 1QM 15—19; 4 Ezra 13:33-34) in order to thwart the establishment of the messianic kingdom. These powers are annihilated sometimes by God (T. Mos. 10:2-7; 1 Enoch 90:18-19) or more often by the Messiah himself (4 Ezra 12:32-33; 13:27-28, 37-39; 2 Apoc. Bar. 39:7—40:2), who is occasionally presented as a warrior (Tg. Isa. 10:27; Gen 49:11), and sometimes in judicial categories (1 Enoch 46:4-6; 45:3; 52:4-9; 55:4; Gen 49:11), and sometimes in judicial categories (1 Enoch 46:4-6; 45:3; 52:4-9; 55:4; 52:4-9; 55:4; 61:8-10; cf. Mt 25:31-46).

The establishment of the Messiah's kingdom involves the gathering of the scattered Israelites (LXX Bar 4:36-37; 5:5-9; Philo Praem. Poen. 28; 4 Ezra 13:39-47) and the restoration of Jerusalem (Pss. Sol. 17:25, 33; 1 Enoch 53:6; 90:28-29; 4 Ezra 7:26). The messianic kingdom is understood to imply the ultimate reign of God over his people (Sib. Or. 3:704-6, 756-59; Pss. Sol. 17:1-4; 1QM 19:1; Šemôneh 'E'sreh, 11 b'râkâ), thus fulfilling the OT idea of God being king over Israel. The kingdom is centered on Palestine, with Jerusalem being "the jewel of the world" (Sib. Or. 3:423), though Jubilees (mid-second century B.C.) probably presents the first instance of a temporary messianic kingdom of 1,000 years. This is brought about gradually by man's moral or spiritual development, and during this time the powers of evil are restrained (1:29; 23:26-30).

Similarly, the third book of the Sibylline Oracles (second century B.C.) 762-71 exhorts to righteous living as the condition for God "to raise up his kingdom for all ages over men." The Messiah is described in book 5 (c. A.D. 100) 414 as "a Blessed Man" from "the plains of heaven," perhaps reflecting Danielic influence. Under his reign there will be peace (3:702), fruitfulness and prosperity (3:744), in which even the animal world will share (3:788-95).

According to the Testament of Moses (first century A.D.) 10:1, God's kingdom "shall appear throughout his whole creation." However, the kingdom seems to be earthly and appears to lack a Messiah, being introduced by repentance (1:18; 9:6-7). The awaited kingdom will spell glory for Israel and punishment for the Gentiles* (10:7-10).

The Second Apocalypse of Baruch describes the messianic kingdom especially in three visions (considered pre-70 A.D.). In the first vision (27—30) the revelation of the Messiah will bring a time of prosperity for "those who are found in this land" and "have arrived at the consummation of time." In the second vision (36—40) the Messiah will annihilate his enemy the fourth empire (reflecting Dan 7) and reign "until the world of corruption has ended . . . and the times . . . have been fulfilled." In the third vision (53—74) prosperity and bliss follow the Messiah's annihilation of Israel's enemies. The kingdom is related to Israel's long-cherished hope, though the Messiah has supernatural status.

The two works bearing the clearest influence of the Danielic Son of man, the Parables of I Enoch and the book of 4 Ezra, follow their source in associating the concepts of kingdom and Son of man. At several points in the Parables the Son of man is portrayed as exercising the functions of judge and universal ruler (46:4-6; 62:3-12; 63:4; 69:27-29, and the book closes with a description of the messianic age (71:15-17, cf. 62:12-16) (see Caragounis 1986, 84-119).

The book of 4 Ezra conflates the earthly with the transcendental Messiah (12:32), who dies after reigning for 400 years (7:28-29, other versions have variously 1,000 and 30 year). The Davidic descent of the Messiah is perhaps his way of stressing continuity in messianic thought, though the content is that of a transcendental Messiah, as seen from (e.g.) 12:32-34; 13:26 (see Caragounis 1986,119-31).

In the Qumran scrolls the term malckût occurs over a dozen times, but probably only once of God's kingdom (1QM 12:7), most of the rest referring to Israel's kingdom. The idea of God's kingdom is, however, latent in the sectarians' belief that they constituted God's true people who were to fight the eschatological battle against God's enemies (see Dead Sea Scrolls; on Judaism generally, see Schürer 11.492-554).

4. Jesus and the Kingdom of God.

In the teaching of Jesus the discussion of the kingdom of God revolves around two questions: (1) the character and (2) the imminence of the kingdom of God. These two questions are interrelated and have been at the center of scholarly discussion during the past hundred years.

4.1. Jesus' Dynamic View. Jesus' conception of the kingdom of God had continuity with the OT promise as well as shared certain features with apocalyptic Judaism, particularly Daniel, but went beyond them in certain important respects: (1) the kingdom of God was primarily dynamic rather than a geographical entity; (2) it was connected with the destiny of the Son of man; (3) entrance into it was not based on the covenant or confined to Jewish participation and (4) whereas in apocalypticism it was a vague future hope, in Jesus it is definite and imminent; in fact it demands immediate response.

With the apocalypticists Jesus held that the kingdom of God was no human achievement but an act of God. However, unlike them he did not expect the kingdom of God to follow on upheavals and catastrophes, but to appear in a gentle, quiet and unobtrusive manner. The catastrophic element for Jesus lay in the upheaval his call caused to his followers' relations with their family,* friends and even their own self. Jesus' followers should be willing to "hate" their own life in order to be worthy of him, worthy of the kingdom of God (set Discipleship).

4.2. The Kingdom As Present or Future—The Modern Debate. In modern discussion the kingdom of God in the teaching of Jesus has actualized three questions: (1) What is its essence? (2) How is it related to Jesus' person and work? (3) When does it come?

In the past hundred years since the work of A. Ritschl and J. Weiss the kingdom of God has been at the center of discussion and the three questions above have received a variety of answers. Ritschl, influenced by Kant's idealistic philosophy, conceived of the kingdom of God in primarily ethical terms as the organization of redeemed humanity, whose actions are inspired by love (see Historical Jesus).

The interest generated by Ritschl's work gave rise to several interpretations of the kingdom of God, principally: (1) the individualistic, spiritual and non-eschatological interpretation (which located the kingdom of God in the experience of a person's own heart, an interpretation which was associated with the liberal school, for which the essence of Christianity lay in certain general principles taught by Jesus, as e.g., the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of all people [e.g., A. von Harnack, 1886, and W. Herrmann, 1901]); (2) the Social Gospel movement in Germany (C. Blumhardt c. 1900, and L Ragaz, 1911) and especially in America with its emphasis on a present social order based on love and solidarity (S. Mathews, 1897; F. G. Peabody, 1900; and particularly W. Rauschenbusch, 1912).

But the most important interpretation for the continued scholarly discussion was given by Ritschl's own son-in-law, J. Weiss, in his epoch-making work Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes (1892, ET Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God, 1971). Weiss reacted strongly against Ritschl's interpretation, emphasizing the future, eschatological and apocalyptic character of the kingdom of God which is opposed by the kingdom of Saun. The kingdom of God would erupt suddenly, be solely the work of God and sweep away the present order. The work of Weiss aroused a storm and with it an unprecedented interest in the theme of the kingdom of God. In the hands of A. Schweitzer the line Weiss had struck out became known as Konsequente Eschatologie ("consistent" "futuristic" or "thoroughgoing eschatology"). In due time this found its opposite pole in Dodd's realized eschatology. In the meantime Dalman (1898), by means of philology demonstrated the dynamic character of the kingdom of God in Judaism and the NT, which has been the basic assumption of almost all subsequent discussions. According to Dalman the idea of kingdom of God has no territorial or geographical reference but expresses dynamically the kingly rule of God which is basically eschatological. However, the theological interpretation was given by A. Schweitzer.

In his landmark works Das Messianitäts und Leidens-geheimnis (1901, ET The Mystery of the Kingdom of God, 1925) and especially in Von Reimarus zu Wrede (1906, ET The Quest of the Historical Jesus, 1910), Schweitzer interpreted not only Jesus' teaching (as Weiss had done), but also Jesus' whole ministry in consistently eschatological terms. Jesus was understood as an apocalyptic figure who expected the end to come during the mission of the Twelve (Mk 6:7-13 par.), wherefore he did not expect to see the disciples* again. In this he was, however, mistaken. The end, and with it the kingdom of God, did not come. Having staked everything on this expectation and been proved wrong in his prediction of the end, Jesus decided to cast himself headlong to death in a final, heroic attempt to force God to set up his kingdom. Schweitzer's impact, particularly in Germany, can be gauged from the fact that his futuristic eschatology became the characteristic German line.

As a reaction to the one-sidedness of this German position, a number of British scholars like A. T. Cadoux (1930) and T. W. Manson (1931) (and even Germans like E. von Dobschütz and H. D. Wendland) laid emphasis on the present element of the kingdom of God in the teaching of Jesus. Like Schweitzer, R Bultmann thought that Jesus expected the kingdom of God to begin at his death and went up to Jerusalem to purify the Temple* in preparation for it. The kingdom of God is conceived by Bultmann as a future, eschatological, supra-historical and supernatural entity, which places a person at the position of decision. But differently from Schweitzer, in Bultmann's demythologizing interpretation the kingdom of God is ever coming and thus ceases to be a future event that is and can be hoped for. Since the decision is a continual decision, the kingdom of God is not an event in time. Thus the kingdom of God, emptied of its content, transcends time without ever entering it In short, Bultmann sees the kingdom of God primarily in existentialist fashion as the hour for the individual's decision.

However, the scholar who gave definitive form to this reaction was C. H. Dodd. In his important little book The Parables of the Kingdom (1935), Dodd interpreted the ēngiken of (e.g.) Mark 1:15 and its parallels in light of the ephthasen of Matthew 12:28 (par. Lk 11:20). His claim was that LXX usage translating the Aramaic of Daniel, Modern Greek idiomatic usage and the parables* of the kingdom all lent their united support to his thesis that the kingdom of God was already a present reality during Jesus' ministry. The decisive event had occurred in the coming of Jesus. Jesus' healings,* particularly his casting out of demons (see Demon, Devil, Satan), were proof that in Jesus' person and works the divine sovereignty had dealt the decisive blow to the kingdom of Satan and was indubitably a wholly present reality. In a sense Dodd identified the kingdom of God with the person of Jesus. This opened the way to viewing the kingdom of God as a timeless reality. "The absolute, the 'wholly other', has entered into time and space" (Dodd, 81). "The inconceivable had happened: history had become the vehicle of the eternal; the absolute was clothed with flesh and blood" (147). In Dodd's interpretation of the kingdom of God, "futurist eschatology disappears, and all that is left is 'the eschaton' as the Eternal" (Lundström, 121). To achieve this Dodd played down the Gospel statements which presented the kingdom of God as future.

Dodd's influence has been far-reaching, forcing significant modifications upon the futuristic interpretation. This has led in the last forty-five years to a number of mediating positions according to which the kingdom of God is conceived as both present and future (with the German side inclining more toward the future and the British more toward the present aspect), e.g., Kümmel in his important Verheissung und Erfüllung (1945, Promise and Fulfilment, 1961), G. R. Beasley-Murray (1954, 312-16; 1986, 75-80), E. Jüngel, Schnackenburg, N. Perrin, D. C. Allison (99-114). In a similar vein J. Jeremias, at the suggestion of Haen-chen, speaks of the kingdom of God as sich realisierende Eschatologie ("an eschatology in process of realization"), a term preferred by Dodd but apparently never allowed to change his basic viewpoint R H. Fuller (25-27) interprets ephthasen as "has come," but understands it by way of the prophetic device of speaking of an event proleptically as though it had already taken place. For Fuller the powers of the kingdom of God were already making themselves felt in the deeds of Jesus by operating in advance, and his viewpoint received the label of proleptic eschatology. G. Flo-rovskey and A M. Hunter (94) speak of inaugurated eschatology, while G. E. Ladd argues from a rendering of ephthasen as "has come," for a fulfillment of the kingdom of God in history (i.e., in Jesus' ministry) as well as a full consummation at the end of history, and calls his position an eschatology of biblical realism.

Kümmel has been described as the scholar who came closest to a "genuine synthesis of realized and futurist eschatology in the teaching of our Lord" (Beasley-Murray 1954, 103). Thus, while duly recognizing the future character of sayings admitting an interval between the passion and the Parousia (Mk 2:18-20; 8:38 par. Lk 12:8-9), he understands the ephthasen of Matthew 12:28, with Dodd, as "has come" and as implying that the eschaton was already active in Jesus. In Jesus' person and actions the future was already realized since he who was to usher in salvation* at the end was already present. In this way the future of the kingdom of God and its coming were linked closely with the present which had Jesus as its center. The kingdom of God was present in the person, teaching and works of Jesus. By faith in him people received the kingdom of God and the guarantee of its appearance. This guarantee implied that the kingdom of God is to be fulfilled in him. Thus promise and fulfillment are insolubly connected with each other. Ladd (123-24) criticizes Kümmel for failing to define precisely what the kingdom of God is. According to Grässer (7) what is understood as present by Kümmel is not the kingdom of God itself, but its imminence.

Morgenthaler, Schnackenburg and Beasley-Murray (1986) all take ephthasen as "has come" though for Morgenthaler it only implies that the kingdom of God is around here but not actually present. For Schnack-enburg it means that the kingdom of God is "connected with his (Jesus') person and his work" (109). Although he speaks of the kingdom of God as something entirely eschatological and wholly supernatural, he also conceives of it in its salvific character as present and active in Jesus. The miracles of Jesus were "the kingdom of God in action." On the other hand, it would be an overstatement to claim that the presence of the kingdom of God indicates something completed; the present kingdom functions as a precursor of the coming, perfected kingdom of God.

Beasley-Murray thinks that the meaning of "has come" for ephthasen in Matthew 12:28 and parallel is "unambiguously plain" and criticizes the defenders of futuristic eschatology for looking for "ways of muting its testimony" (1986, 75-76). The miracles of Jesus, especially his driving out demons, speak eloquently of the presence of the kingdom. However, the arrival of the kingdom of God spoken of in Matthew 12:28 and parallel was not the same thing as its consummation, which Beasley-Murray, like Schnackenburg, Kümmel, Ladd and others, considers as future.

A basically similar position is that of D. C. Allison. He follows the usual interpretation of ephthasen and thus subscribes to the present consensus that the kingdom of God is both present and future. The relation between present and future is explained by appealing to Jewish thought which "could envision the final events—the judgment of evil and the arrival of the kingdom of God—as extending over a time and as a process or series of events that could involve the present. When Jesus announced that the kingdom of God has come and is coming, this means that the last act has begun but has not yet reached its climax; the last things have come and will come" (105-6). And again, "For Jesus, the kingdom of God, the eschatological establishment of God's kingly rule, was due to come in its fullness soon" (114).

It may then be concluded that those who emphasize the presence of the kingdom of God in Jesus' works of power also allow for a future perfection or consummation of the kingdom of God, while those who advocate the futurity of the kingdom of God allow for some kind of effect which the imminently near kingdom of God exercised in the ministry of Jesus. Both of these positions are attempts to explain important elements in the Gospel data.

Of rather different nature is the more recent work of Perrin, who has retreated from his earlier positions (1963). Receiving impulses from literary critics like P. Wheelwright (1962), P. Ricoeur (1969), A. N. Wilder (1964), R. W. Funk (1966), D. O. Via (1967) and F. D. Crossan (1973), Perrin has suggested that "kingdom of God" is not an idea or a conception, but a mythical symbol (1976, 33). He adopts Wheelwright's distinction of steno-symbol, which has fixed meaning—a one-to-one correspondence between symbol and referent as in apocalyptic language—and tensive symbol, which is open and multi-significant having an inexhaustible set of meanings. Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God involved the tensive symbol, which, however, his followers turned to an apocalyptic steno-symbol, making the kingdom of God lose its rich variety of reference and instead refer to a particular event of universal experience. Perrin thinks that Jesus' whole teaching claimed "to mediate an experience of God as king, an experience of such an order that it brings world to an end" (Perrin 1976,54). Though the symbolic and metaphorical aspects of the kingdom of God and its parables should be profitably explored, Perrin's analysis and claims can hardly be said to do justice to the biblical data or to have led to a deeper or more valid understanding of the kingdom of God. Not infrequently Perrin's position involves self-contradictions, and his categories are plainly inapplicable to the Gospel texts (see further the criticism of Beasley-Murray 1986, 338-44 and Allison, 107-12).
4.3. The Imminence of the Kingdom. From the above it must have become clear that the interpretation of ephthasen of Matthew 12:28 and its parallel Luke 11:20, which is normally accepted as an authentic saying of Jesus, has played a most crucial role in discussions of the kingdom of God. This is so because it is the only kingdom saying in the Synoptics that apparently describes the kingdom of God as having arrived. Dodd was so certain of this meaning that he let it determine his interpretation of the ēngiken-type of sayings. The claim that the kingdom of God had arrived in Jesus' person and that it consisted of, or at least was active in, his driving out demons is hardly a satisfactory answer to the three questions regarding the essence, the arrival and the relation of the kingdom of God to Jesus' person and work. If the kingdom of God had come already, say, by the time Jesus uttered the saying in Matthew 12:28 and Luke 11:20, how is the remainder of Jesus' earthly existence to be understood? And what about the Son of man's duty "to give his life a ransom for many"? What is the significance of his death? And how did Jesus relate his death to the kingdom of God? To speak of a final or full consummation at a future point of time does not satisfactorily answer these questions. And to emphasize the coming of the kingdom prior to the time of the ephthasen saying raises the question of whether the death of Jesus is superfluous to that coming. Any viable solution must take account of (1) the language used and (2) the relation of the kingdom of God to the Son of man (4.5. below).

4.3.1. Ephthasen (Mt 12:28/Lk 11:20). The most indubitable fact is that the Synoptics present Jesus as having spoken of the kingdom of God as imminently near (ēngiken), just as John did (Mt 3:2). The problem which the ephthasen saying raises is due to its being interpreted in a dubious way. The ephthasen saying makes excellent sense if understood according to a well-attested but little-known and generally misunderstood Greek idiom. The aorist tense is sometimes used to emphasize the certainty and immediacy of an action that properly belongs in the future by describing it as though it had already transpired (Caragounis 1989, 12-23). In comparison with the ēngiken-type of sayings the ephthasen logion implies an advance, but not quite the presence of the kingdom of God which, in the context of Matthew 12:28 and Luke 11:20, is still future. What Jesus is saying in effect is, "If it is by the Spirit/finger of God (rather than by Beelzebul, as you claim) that I drive out the demons (i.e., preparing for the coming of the kingdom of God by defeating the forces of evil), then the kingdom of God is about to break in upon you (and overtake you in your obstinate and unrepentant state)" (see Holy Spirit).
Ephthasen implies that the coming of the kingdom of God is so imminent that the kingdom of God may be considered as being virtually here. This means that the force of the saying is not purely informative, in which case the force of eph'hymas ("upon you") would have been lost, but one of warning, almost threat. This threatening force of eph' hymas shows clearly that the kingdom of God has not yet arrived. The relation of the miracles (see Miracles and Miracle Stories) of Jesus to the kingdom of God is that they bear witness to the warfare of the Son of man (i.e., the agent of the kingdom of God) against the powers of evil for the establishment of the kingdom of God. But the kingdom of God does not consist of those miracles. Jesus' miracles are only the preliminaries, not the kingdom of God itself (contra Dodd). The kingdom of God is the dynamic reign of God over his people. The saying looks forward to the cross.

4.3.2. Entos Hymōn Estin (Lk 17:21). Another saying often adduced as evidence of the presence of the kingdom of God is Luke 17:21. Here Jesus is represented answering the Pharisees' question about the time of the coming of the kingdom of God by saying, "the kingdom of God does not come with your careful observation, nor will people say, 'Here it is,' or 'There it is,' because the kingdom of God is within you" (entos hymōn estin) (NIV). The basic meaning of entos is "within," "inside," being the opposite of ektos, "without" (i.e., "outside"). This meaning is borne out by the entire Greek literary corpus including the papyri and Modern Greek. The attempt has sometimes been made to construe entos hymōn in the sense of "in your midst" "among you," "in your domain," "within your grasp," etc. in accordance with whether hymōn is interpreted of the Pharisees or of eventual followers of Jesus, in which case the estin ("is") is taken with future significance (i.e., "the kingdom of God will suddenly be among you," etc.).

An examination of the ancient Greek texts that have been appealed to for these meanings (e.g., Herodotus, Xenophon, Symmachus' translation of the OT, Papyri) shows that the meaning is regularly "within" and that the sense of "among" has been based on a few (sometimes obscure) instances in Aquila and Symmachus. On the other hand, P. Oxy 654, 16 (which is parallel to the Gospel of Thomas) has a saying similar to Luke's, where the meaning is unambiguously "the kingdom (of God) is within you." Luke's usage must be considered decisive. The sense of "among" occurs a good many times in Luke-Acts, but the expression is always en (tōi) mesō hymōn, never entos. The entos hymōn is the opposite of meta paraphē-rēseōs ("with (apocalyptic?) signs that can be observed") with its amplification " 'Here it is' or 'There it is.' " Therefore any interpretation that fails to set entos hymōn in its intended contradistinction to meta paratē-rēseōs fails to do justice to Luke's intention. Jesus is here trying to discourage (apocalyptic) speculations and calculations based on observable signs (see Apocalyptic Teaching). "Within you," therefore, seems to be Luke's way of expressing the inward nature and dynamic of the kingdom of God, rather than refer to any actual presence in or among the Pharisees.

In the Synoptics there does not seem to be a single kingdom of God saying which unequivocally demands to be taken in the present sense. The kingdom of God is presented either timelessly (notably in the parables), or as the object of proclamation, or in its demands (Mk 9 [10]x; Lk 17 [19]x; Mt 25 [31]x) or as something future from the standpoint of the utterance (Mk 5 [6]x; Lk 19 [21]x; Mt 19 [25]x; the figures in [ ] fitting either category).

4.4. The Kingdom in Jesus' Teaching. The Synoptics present Jesus from the start as charged with one message, compelling and irresistible, the message that the kingdom of God was at hand. The impression is that the eschaton has drawn near, the long-promised kingdom of God is about to appear, and the hour of decision has come. The kingdom of God is presented in two ways: (1) it forms the heart of Jesus' teaching and (2) it is confirmed by his mighty works (see e.g., Mt 4:23; 9:35). A third component is that the kingdom of God is inextricably connected with Jesus' person as Son of man (see 4.5. below).

4.4.1. The Conditions and Demands of the Kingdom. The first condition is to "repent and believe the gospel" (see Repentance; Mk 1:15; Mt 4:17). A childlike (see Children) faith is a presupposition for entering into the kingdom of God (Mt 18:3; Mk 10:14 par.). The gospel is the good news about the sovereignty of God. God's eschatological, salvific act demands an undivided heart (Mk 12:29-30 par.). Therefore, it is not lip service or even the use of Jesus' name in performing miracles, but the performance of God's will that opens the door to the kingdom of God (Mt 7:21-23). Nothing may stand in the way of the kingdom since no one who has put his hand on the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God (Lk 9:62). The kingdom may demand the sacrifice of marriage and family (Mt 19:12) as well as of possessions (see Rich and Poor; Mk 10:21-27 par.). At the other end it holds the promise of repaying to a hundredfold (Mk 10:29-31 par.). The demand is radicalized still further when the would-be disciple is given the choice of either letting the tempting hand be cut off or the tempting eye plucked out for the kingdom of God, or keeping them and being cast into Gehenna (see Heaven and Hell; Mk 9:47 par.). The kingdom must be preferred to everything.
All this illustrates the seriousness with which people must act with regard to the kingdom of God rather than superior moral attributes qualifying for entrance into it. In other words, they must seek to enter in by the narrow gate (Mt 7:13-14); in fact they must actively storm the kingdom (Mt 11:12).

4.4.2. The Ethics of the Kingdom. The ethics of the kingdom of God (see Ethics of Jesus) are the ethics that God expects from those who are set to do his will. The ethical demands are scattered throughout Jesus' teaching but occur in more concentrated form in the Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount; Mt 5—7; cf. also Lk 6:17-49). Here we see a continuation with the ethical teaching of the OT, although Jesus' requirements go beyond it by penetrating behind the letter to the spirit and intent of it In the end Jesus lifts up a performance motivated by pure love* and devotion to God and love to one's neighbor. Thus, for example, the commandments* "Do not murder," "Do not commit adultery," "Do not break your oath" are only partial and particular aspects of the greatest commandment of all, namely undivided love toward God and neighbor. Love is the fulfilling of all the commandments (cf. Mt 22:40), in fact the logical conclusion would seem to be that love makes commandments superfluous.

4.4.3. The Parables of the Kingdom. Jesus spoke about the kingdom of God also through the medium of parables (see Parable). After centuries of allegorical interpretation of the parables (in which every detail was given a particular significance), A. Jülicher demonstrated that the parables had one essential point, the other details being the necessary trappings of the story. (Jülicher's principle should not be applied rigidly as there are occasions when more than one point may have been intended.)

The parables of the kingdom have been regarded as the most authentic element in Jesus' teaching (see Form Criticism) and occur in concentrated collections in Mark 4 and Matthew 13. These parables illustrate different aspects of the kingdom of God: people's response to the message of the kingdom of God (the sower, Mk 4:3-9; Mt 13:3-9), the unobtrusive character of the kingdom of God as contrasted with the apocalyptic expectation of upheaval (the seed growing quietly, Mk 4:26-29), the immense growth of the kingdom from an insignificant beginning (the mustard-seed, Mk 4:30-32; Mt 13:31-32, and the leaven, Mt 13:33), the mixed nature of those presently involved in the kingdom of God, who will be separated at the end (the weeds, Mt 13:24-30, with its probably later allegorical interpretation, Mt 13:36-43, and in all probability the dragent, Mt 13:47-50) and the inestimable value of the kingdom of God, for which people must be prepared to give up everything (the treasure and the pearl, Mt 13:44-46).

Jesus' use of parables raises the question of their purpose or function. Matthew has the disciples raise the question (Ml 13:10). Jesus' answer, "to you it is given to learn the mysteries of the kingdom of Heaven, but to those it is not given" (Mt 13:11 ), has given rise to many interpretations. The point of the explanation seems to be that, having rejected the message of Jesus when exposed to it, these "outsiders" (Mk 4:10) have willfully chosen to keep their eyes shut and their hearts hardened, that the continued message is now given in the form of half-revealing, half-concealing parables. But though the interpretation—and therewith the precise meaning—is denied to them, they still perceive their gist sufficiently well (cf. Mk 12:12 par.: "they knew he had spoken the parable against them"). It is not therefore an exaggeration to say that sometimes the parables have a polemical tone in addition to their usage to illustrate the kingdom of God.

4.5. The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man. The kingdom of God should not be dissociated from the Son of man, who in Jesus' teaching, as in Daniel, is its agent The destiny of the Son of man is therefore directly connected with the coming of the kingdom of God. The present activity of the Son of man, especially his casting out of demons, is an integral part of the proclamation of the kingdom of God, but it should be seen not so much as indicating the actual occurrence of the decisive event of the kingdom of God but as the preliminary warfare of the Son of man against the evil powers in his work of making possible the entrance of the kingdom of God in human history. This warfare, the Son of man's attacks on the kingdom of evil, ought not to be construed in terms of the Hellenistic or Jewish exorcist's activity but rather ought to be connected with the Son of man's mission to "serve and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mk 10:45 par ); otherwise the link between the kingdom of God and the cross becomes illegitimately obscured.

We would thus submit that it was the near prospect of a violent death (see Death of Jesus), to which Jesus attributed atoning significance (see Ransom Saying), that led him to change the engiken to ephthasen and thus characterize the coming of the kingdom of God as unprecedentedly certain and imminent Viewed from this perspective, though the kingdom of God had come nearer than in the engikene type of sayings, it had not arrived, as the last pre-passion occurrence(s) of the kingdom of God in all three Synoptics would seem to testify.

4.6. Potential Eschatology. By way of conclusion it may be said that during Jesus' ministry the kingdom of God is spoken of always as a future event. It is expected, hoped for and prayed for. But it is never said explicitly to have arrived, not even at the Last Supper (see Last Supper). What is present is the agent of the kingdom of God, Jesus. But because the agent of the kingdom of God is present and active through his teaching and mighty works, the kingdom of God may also be said to be potentially present. However, the decisive event for its coming, that is, for the release of its powers in salvific blessings, still lies ahead.

The term potential does not qualify the term "kingdom of God," only the term "present in Jesus." Thus, it should not be construed as in any way implying uncertainty as to the kingdom's coming. Potential simply means that the kingdom of God in Jesus' ministry is not present in any absolute or independent sense but only in so far as it is represented by Jesus. Its arrival and presence in its own right is depicted as a future event. Thus, if we are to speak of eschatology in connection with the kingdom of God during Jesus' earthly ministry at all, it is more accurate to speak of potential eschatology. This is an eschatology that has not yet begun to unfold itself in final, catastrophic events, but the eschaton is, nevertheless, in principle present in Jesus, because he, as Son of man, is the agent of the kingdom of God. Nonetheless, the ministry of Jesus and his teaching look forward to the awful and more immediate event of the cross, the event in which the Son of man fulfills his God-given mission for the arrival of the kingdom of God.

4.7. The Consummation. But even this decisive event (the cross-resurrection complex) does not exhaust the entire content or expectation of the promise. It seems to be the key event that makes possible the arrival of the kingdom of God in time, but also in principle its full manifestation and consummation which lies at the end of history (see Ladd 1974, 307-28). In this regard the concept of the kingdom of God is parallel with the Johannine concept of eternal life (see Life) and the Pauline concept of salvation. Precisely as those who put their faith in the atoning work of Christ are said to possess eternal life, to be in Christ or to be saved in spite of the fact that eternal life or salvation (see Salvation) are essentially eschatological concepts, so also believers may be said to have entered into the kingdom of God despite the fact that the kingdom of God, like eternal life and salvation, can be properly experienced only at the end of time.
5. The Gospels.

The Synoptic Gospels contain 76 different kingdom sayings, or 103 including the parallels:

(2) Mark-Matthew (Mk 1:15 par. Mt 4:17);

(3) Mark-Luke (Mk 15:43 par. Lk 23:51);

(4) Matthew-Luke (Mt 5:3 par. Lk 6:20; Mt 6:10 par. Lk 11:2; Mt 6:33 par. Lk 12:31; Mt 8:11 par. Lk 13:29; Mt 10:7 par. Lk 9:2; Mt 11:11 par. Lk 7:28; Mt 11:12 par. Lk 16:16; Mt 12:28 par. Lk 11:20; Mt 13:33 par. Lk 13:20);

(5) Mark (4:26; 9:47; 10:24; 12:34);

In addition, Matthew has one more reference to "kingdom of God" (7:21) and one to "kingdom" (6:13) in part of the textual tradition. The Gospel data on the distribution of the various expressions is as follows:
The Johannine sayings have no parallels in the Synoptics. The three expressions "Kingdom of God" (KG), "Kingdom of Heaven" (KH) and "Kingdom" (K) are distributed as follows:

5.1. Mark. Mark (see Mark, Gospel of) introduces the public ministry of Jesus with the summary statement that Jesus proclaimed the gospel of God saying, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent and believe the gospel" (1:15). The position of the statement within the structure of Mark indicates that the proclamation of the kingdom of God was at the heart of Jesus' preaching. The saying announces the fulfillment of the time for the arrival of the kingdom of God. The kingdom of God is still future, but has drawn near and already makes its demands for preparation to receive it: these are repentance and believing (see Faith) acceptance of the gospel. This saying does not give any clear indications whether "kingdom" refers to the national or to a more apocalyptic type of hope. The collocation of "repent" and "believe" might favor the second alternative, but even for the national hope Israel was expected to keep the Law* flawlessly for at least one day (see b. Ta'an. 64a).

In Mark 4 Jesus' parabolic teaching is concerned with the mystery of the kingdom of God which is given to the group of Jesus' inner disciples, while to the outsiders the kingdom of God is being conveyed in dark, unintelligible parables (4:11). The description of the kingdom of God as seed sown, shooting up and growing quietly (4:26) implies that the kingdom of God here is conceived neither in nationalistic terms of open revolt and warfare for liberation, nor in the style of apocalyptic upheavals. The emphasis in the similar idea expressed at 4:30 is on the contrast between the insignificant beginning and the immense growth of the kingdom of God.

In an isolated logion at 9:1 the kingdom of God is described as imminent, to occur within a generation or two. At 9:47 in the context of resisting various temptations, the importance of entering the kingdom of God at any price—even losing one's eye—is underlined, and entering the kingdom of God is compared to entering "life" (9:43-44).

According to 10:14 children should be allowed access to Jesus because the kingdom of God belongs to such as these. In fact the kingdom of God demands a childlike faith (10:15).

In the group of sayings at 10:23, 24 and 25, love of possessions is a hindrance to entering the kingdom of God, which demands the sacrifice of everything and implies being "saved" (10:26).

The scribe who recognized that the heart of Hebrew/Jewish religion lay in undivided devotion to God was told that he was not far from the kingdom of God (12:34). In the Last Supper (14:25) the kingdom of God is eschatological. In traditional Jewish imagery Jesus will feast with his own (see Table Fellowship). Finally, at 15:43 Joseph of Arimathea is described as awaiting the kingdom of God, presumably in the sense of the traditional hope of Israel.

5.2. Matthew. As implied above, Matthew (see Matthew, Gospel of) offers a richer and more nuanced picture of Jesus' teaching on the kingdom of God than Mark. For in addition to his nine Markan and his nine Q* sayings, he has another thirty-two sayings peculiar to himself.

At the very outset of his Gospel Matthew describes the preaching of John as being one of repentance in view of the nearness of the kingdom of Heaven (3:2). The wording—probably stylized by Matthew to bring out the continuity—is placed on Jesus' lips by way of a summary of his proclamation from the time of John's arrest onwards (4:17). The summary character of Jesus' preaching is repeated at 4:23 (and again at 9:35) along with the information that Jesus' preaching was accompanied by healing. The same emphasis occurs in the mission of the Twelve (10:5-8).

The kingdom of God figures at the first and last beatitude (5:3, 10), thus framing the collection of Beatitudes (an inclusio) and suggesting that they must be understood within its thought-compass (note: autōn estin "theirs is" occurs only in these two beatitudes. The beatitude of 5:11 is in different form [second person]). Humility and righteous suffering are necessary presuppositions for possessing the kingdom.

The three logia at 5:19-20 teach that even the least commandments affect people's relation to the kingdom of God and that scribal or Pharisaic (i.e., Jewish) religiosity is insufficient for entrance into it. The centrality of the kingdom of God is seen also in the Lord's Prayer (see Prayer), where its future coming constitutes the first petition (6:10). Some textual witnesses end the Lord's Prayer with the mention of the kingdom. If this uncertain reading were original, it would imply that here too, as in the case of the Beatitudes, the prayer occurs within the frame of the kingdom of God.

The radicalism associated with the kingdom of God is underscored at 6:33 where the interests of the kingdom of God are to go before all other interests. The Sermon on the Mount actually closes by emphasizing that entrance into the kingdom of God will depend not on mere lip-service, but on a faithful performance of God's will (7:21). Indeed, not only will there be a distinction among the Jews as far as entering into the kingdom of God is concerned, but with faith rather than descent as a condition the door to it will be opened to many Gentiles, while many of the "children of the kingdom" (i.e., physical descendants of the Patriarchs) will be excluded (8:11-12; 21:43; 22:2).

In a dispute concerning John, Jesus declares him to be the greatest of those born, but still lesser than the least in the kingdom of Heaven (11:11), the kingdom being pictured as the final eschatological reality. John's crucial role in salvation history is underscored by the statement that his day marks a new period in the realization of the kingdom. From his time on the kingdom of God is proclaimed and is being stormed by those who are eager to get in. His coming has given the signal that the kingdom of God has now drawn near and people can prepare themselves by repentance and baptism (11:12). From 21:31 we understand that those most eager to enter the kingdom of God are precisely the ones considered furthest from it. The imminence of the kingdom of God is expressed in unprecedentedly strong terms at 12:28, where Jesus' miracles, wrought by the Spirit of God, are interpreted as a sign of it.

The chapter on the parables of the kingdom contains no less than twelve kingdom logia (see 4.4.3. above). The point made in 16:19, where Peter is given the keys of the kingdom, is probably in polemic against the Jewish dispensers of God's truth, who according to 23:13 not only would not enter the kingdom themselves, but also closed the door to those who wanted to enter. The logion is often understood as the Christian counterpart to the Jewish way of speaking of authority in teaching as binding and loosing.

Matthew ascribes a kingdom to the Son of man (16:28; 20:21), which is thought of as being future. The disciples' questions as to who is greatest in the kingdom of Heaven (18:1) elicits from Jesus the statement that a condition for entering into the kingdom and being greatest in it is childlike faith and humility (18:3-4). In fact the kingdom belongs to such (19:14).

The kingdom of God illustrates God's forgiveness (see Forgiveness of Sins) and demands a spirit of forgiveness from those who would enter it (18:23). It may demand abstention from marriage (19:12), and it certainly demands being taken seriously and loved more than possessions (19:23-24).

The rewards of the kingdom are apportioned by different principles. Personal achievement is of little importance. In God's evaluation scheme the last can become first and the first last (20:1).

In the Olivet discourse the kingdom of God is presented in future, apocalyptic terms. Those who persevere faithfully to the end will be saved. But the end will not come until the gospel of the kingdom has been proclaimed throughout the world. The parable of the ten virgins (25:1) was intended to teach perseverance and watchfulness. This finds its fitting sequel in the great judgment, when the Son of man invites the faithful to inherit the kingdom which had been prepared for them from the time of the foundation of the world (25:34). The righteous are to go into its bliss, while the unjust are to go to everlasting torment. This picture bears the well-known features of apocalyptic thought.

The last occurrence of kingdom in Matthew is in connection with the Last Supper, when Jesus, looking forward to the eschatological feast in the Father's kingdom, promises to abstain from wine* until that day.

The first mention of kingdom occurs at 1:33 and is put on the angel's lips, when he brought Mary the message of the birth of the Messiah who was to sit on the throne of his father David, reigning for ever as the definitive Messiah (see Birth of Jesus).

The first clear reference to kingdom in connection with Jesus' ministry occurs at 4:43, in which Jesus' mission consists of the proclamation of the kingdom of God. This gives the saying the character of a summary statement and implies that Jesus' previous ministry too was concerned with the kingdom of God. The same is repeated at 8:1.

In his Sermon on the Plain Luke has a logion similar to Matthew's first beatitude, but the saying is here directed to the poor rather than the humble (6:20). This is in line with Jesus' sermon in Nazareth (4:18) and Luke's sociological interests. Luke also has the saying on the least in the kingdom of God being greater than John (7:28). In interpreting the parable of the sower Luke too affirms that the knowledge of the mysteries of the kingdom of God are given to Jesus' disciples, but the rest must be content with unexplained parables (8:10).

Luke has both a mission of the Twelve and a mission of the Seventy-Two. The Twelve were to proclaim the kingdom of God (9:2), while the Seventy-Two were to proclaim that the kingdom had drawn near (10:9, 11). The preaching of both groups was to be accompanied by healing. And the crowds (see People, Crowd) that followed Jesus were instructed by him in the kingdom of God (9:11).

Luke connects the death of the Son of man with the coming of the kingdom of God and envisages the latter event as taking place within the lifetime of some who were present on the occasion (9:27). This indicates not only that the kingdom is thought of as future, but also that its coming is fairly imminent. The urgency of the kingdom makes it imperative that those who aspire to it do not let anything stand in the way— even the death of relatives (9:60)—but must devote themselves wholly to it never looking back (9:62).

As in Matthew the coming of the kingdom figures prominently in the prayer Jesus taught his disciples (11:2). In the Beelzebul controversy Jesus' works of power accomplished through the finger (Mt: "Spirit") of God are a strong indication of the imminence of the kingdom (11:20).

The concerns of the kingdom of God are to affect all attitudes toward life. Undue worry about worldly matters is to be laid aside and the interests of the kingdom to be given priority. Then God will see to it that all legitimate needs are supplied (12:31). Trust rather than fear is to characterize Jesus' followers since God has been pleased to give them the kingdom (13:18, 20). Like Matthew, Luke too makes it clear that entrance to the kingdom of God is not based on physical acquaintance with Jesus or physical descent but it is based on accepting the conditions of the kingdom-entering through the narrow gate. This, while leaving out many descendants of Abraham,* Isaac and Jacob, will open the door for many Gentiles* to feast with the Patriarchs in the kingdom (13:28-29).

The comment made by an outsider as to the blessed state of those who feast in the kingdom of God (14:15) leads to the parable of the great banquet in which, with a view to the Jewish rejection of Jesus and his message, the point is made that those called first were not worthy and were replaced by the sordid mob of Gentiles. Luke does not record the incident of the man who had no wedding gown.

Luke too considers John's ministry as the beginning of a new era distinguished from that of the Law and the Prophets. It is the era of the proclamation of the kingdom of God when everyone has the chance to force their way into it (16:16). This shows that Luke does not share the apocalyptic view of the kingdom of God as being introduced suddenly following great eschatological upheavals. The subject is broached by the Pharisees. The answer is that the kingdom does not come in a way open to physical observation (17:20). No one will be able to point to it as being here or there. The kingdom of God is "within you" (17:21; see 4.3.2. above). The view of the kingdom advocated here is one in which God is at work quietly in those who have accepted his claims and faithfully take on them the yoke of his will.

The kingdom of God must be accepted in childlike trust (18:16-17). On the other hand, those who put their trust in their riches will not be able to enter into it (18:24-25). But to those who forsake everything for the kingdom of God a rich reward is promised, not only in the life to come, but even in this world (18:29-30).
By relating the parable of the pounds, Luke has Jesus correct the popular notion that the kingdom of God was about to break out in the apocalyptic way (19:11). The point is that Jesus' hearers had rather see to it that they administer faithfully what was entrusted to them and wait quietly for its full realization than speculate on the time of its full arrival. Luke generally discourages such speculation (cf. Acts 1:6-8). Even in the prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, only general signs are given for the arrival in power of God's kingdom (21:31). It is obvious that Luke thinks of the kingdom of God as something that in a way has drawn near, so that from John's time onward people can prepare for it and be actively engaged in it, while in its full power it is something future, promised to appear after the fulfillment of certain events. Thus the apocalyptic element is not altogether absent from Luke.

That the kingdom can be spoken of as a future event is confirmed by the Last Supper, where Jesus promises to abstain from further eating and drinking until he can do so in the kingdom of God (22:16, 18).

Occasionally the kingdom is ascribed to Jesus as given to him by the Father (22:29-30). The context is again eschatological.

Finally, the thief on the cross asks to be remembered by Jesus when the latter comes in his kingdom (23:42), and Joseph of Arimathea is described as a man waiting for the kingdom of God (23:51), though it is by no means easy to decide whether his expectation was for a mundane or a transcendental kingdom.

5.4. John. The kingdom of God plays no significant role in John's Gospel (see John, Gospel of), its place being taken by the typically Johannine concept of "eternal life" (seventeen times) or simply "life" (nineteen times; see Life). The equivalence of eternal life with kingdom of God is proved from the occasional interchange of the two terms in the Synoptics (Mk 9:43-47 par.; 10:17-30 par.; Mt 25:31-46) and has its roots in rabbinic tradition (see Dalman, 116-17, 156-58). John's avoidance of the term "kingdom of God" may be owing to his desire to avoid association with current apocalyptic hopes. It may also be due to his writing for non-Jewish readers to whom a typically Jewish conception might pose communication problems, and especially because the term had been in rather rare use in the church, where the emphasis had been laid on Christ's person and work (christology and soteriology) as well as on the church (ecclesiology).
The concept kingdom of God occurs twice in the Nicodemus story and the expression "my kingdom" occurs three times in Jesus' answer to Pilate (see Pontius Pilate). In the Nicodemus incident no indication is given that the kingdom of God had been the main emphasis in Jesus' teaching or even a subject of discussion. But with Nathanael's confession, "Rabbi .. . you are the king of Israel!" (1:49), the reader is, however, not totally unprepared.

At John 3:3, 5 Jesus tells Nicodemus that spiritual regeneration is the condition to seeing or entering the kingdom of God. From this it becomes obvious that the idea bears no relation to the Jewish national hope. It is the sovereignty of God under which people place themselves by accepting the message of Jesus in faith and undergoing a spiritual rebirth (see New Birth).

In Pilate's interrogation Jesus answers the question "Are you the king of Israel?" (18:33) by explaining that "my kingdom is not of this world" (18:36, "my kingdom" being repeated three times). No clearer statement than this could be made to show that the kingdom of which Jesus thought had very little relation to Israel's national expectation. This accusation, which stemmed from the Jews as well as from the titulus on the cross, indicates that in John's Gospel the rejection and condemnation of Jesus depended to a large extent on the Jews' disappointment by Jesus' refusal to accept the role of the national, political messiah (cf. also 6:15, 26).

6. The Kingdom of God and the Church Today.

Does the concept of the kingdom of God have any relevance for the present proclamation of the church? Here we are confronted with the kind of dilemma that led R. Bultmann to launch his controversial demythologization program.

In his proclamation of the kingdom of God Jesus was standing firmly on OT ground. At the same time he was proclaiming a subject that made every Jewish heart throb. Yet Jesus took this concept and transformed it from a narrow-minded nationalistic hope to a universal, spiritual order in which humankind could find the fulfillment of its ultimate desires for righteousness, justice, peace, happiness, freedom from sin and guilt, and a restored relationship to God—an order in which God was king. Given the fact that the basic human problem of sin and alienation from God is as true today as it ever has been, the message of the kingdom of God ought to have as great a relevance today as it ever had.
The kingdom of God need not be demythologized (see Myth). But it is instructive to note that the early church, addressing primarily Gentile converts, avoided using a term loaded with Jewish national or apocalyptic connotations which might introduce confusion, seeking instead other dynamic equivalents such as "eternal life" or "salvation" as more appropriate, though "kingdom of God" did not disappear entirely from its lips. The church continued to proclaim the legacy of its Master, but in dynamic forms. Every age has to find its own appropriate forms for expressing the ever-relevant message of Jesus on the kingdom of God. The forms may change but the essence remains.

"L" TRADITION

"L" can be defined broadly as the unique material in the Gospel of Luke. In German scholarship it is designated "S" (Sondergut, "special material"). The exact extent of L is debated, but its importance is seen by noting that it accounts for between one-third to one-half of Luke's Gospel. Opinion is divided as to whether L should be thought of as a lost written document; a collected body of oral and/or written traditions; if the infancy narratives (chapters 1 and 2) are a separate entity with their own prehistory, and as to the extent of Luke's creative contribution. Much of the distinctive content and theology of the Third Gospel is found in L.

According to the two-document hypothesis (see Synoptic Problem), Luke in compiling his Gospel drew heavily on Mark's Gospel. He followed Mark's order, except in the passion narrative,* and included most of his material. He then added Q* and L traditions to complete his work. As the L and Q material are most commonly found together, it has been suggested that there was an earlier edition of Luke's Gospel, "proto-Luke," to which the Markan material was later added. In modified form this hypothesis continues to find some supporters, but it has not been generally endorsed because the structure of the Third Gospel is taken over from Mark, and the non-Markan material appears to have been inserted into a Markan context rather than vice versa.

The case that the L tradition reflects a written document to which Luke added the infancy narratives (see Birth of Jesus), which had a separate history, was popularized earlier this century by B. H. Streeter in his classic case for the four-document hypothesis. He suggested that in the two years Luke was in Caesarea with Paul he collected information and took copious notes which he then collated to form L. In more recent times E. Schweizer has also argued that the L material bears witness to a written document taken over by Luke. As evidence he points out that (1) Luke claims to be drawing on written sources (Lk 1:1); (2) in many L passages a tension between the tradition and its interpretation can be seen; and (3) the L passages exhibit a characteristic style reflecting the LXX.

The opposing view that L was a collection of oral traditions is not widely supported today, but it is given a fresh hearing in B. Reicke's recent attempt to redirect discussion about the Synoptic problem. It has often been suggested that various prominent people in the early church, such as Mary the mother of Jesus, Philip the evangelist, Cleopas and others are the eyewitnesses to which Luke refers (Lk 1:1), and these people were his informants. Some of L may reflect diverse oral traditions, but because there are similar interests and themes in much of the L material a written collection of stories, sayings and parables* seems likely.

The infancy narratives are usually not included as part of L because in language and style they stand apart from the other special Lukan material. One widely held explanation for the differences is that in these chapters Luke has translated a Hebrew or Aramaic document. Recently Farris has provided new evidence to support this hypothesis. Others, however, maintain that here Luke has chosen simply to write in the style of the LXX, and that this explains the differences. On this view there is no reason to exclude the infancy narratives from what may be broadly called L.

But whether or not the infancy narratives are considered to be a part of L, there is today less confidence in arguing for discrete, lost sources—written or oral—than earlier. It is recognized that the special Lukan material is of a varied nature and thus possibly of varied origins. Source-critical work continues, but with the ascendancy of redaction criticism (see Redaction Criticism), the extent of Luke's creativity has become a major issue. It is clear that Luke felt free in editing his material to add introductions, change words and phrases and allocate contexts, and that he could compose material. Undisputed examples of composition would be the prologue (Lk 1:1-14), the historical settings (Lk 2:1-2; 3:1-3) and the summaries such as Luke 3:19-20. This can be accepted, but to argue that most if not all the distinctive Lukan material, including the birth narratives, basically represents the compositional work of Luke as Goulder does and others do in relation to particular sections of the Third Gospel, is not convincing.

It may not be possible to distinguish accurately between tradition and Lukan redaction or composition at many points in the Gospel, but a good case can be made for Luke's dependency on traditions other than Mark and Q. Several scholars (e.g., Rehkopf and Taylor) have sought to establish criteria (e.g., unLukan words or constructions, Semitisms etc.) to locate traditional material over against Lukan redaction for certain sections of the Third Gospel, notably the passion narrative, and Jeremias in his final published work, Die Sprache des Lukasevangeliums, follows this approach for the whole Gospel. He concludes that Luke extensively drew on distinctive source material; on the whole he was faithful to the traditions he received—especially when recording the words of Jesus—and in the passion narrative he had an independent, connected account in addition to Mark.

Another indicator that behind much of the L material there lies early tradition is the surprisingly large number of instances where John's Gospel and L share common stories or details, common geographical interests and common theological perspectives which are independent of the other two Gospels and sometimes stand over against them. For example, only in these two Gospels do we find mention of Lazarus,* Mary and Martha, the apostle Jude, the cutting off of the ear of the high priest's slave and certain details about Jesus' trial (see Trial of Jesus) and crucifixion (see Death of Jesus). A similar interest in Judea and Samaria is also evident and this suggests these traditions may have been first preserved in southern Palestine. If, as is generally held, John did not know Luke's Gospel and Luke did not know John's Gospel, then these parallels bear witness to the existence of independent Gospel traditions, probably in oral form, which both Evangelists drew upon (see Synoptics and John).

Much of the distinctive content and theology of the Third Gospel is found in L. There are fourteen unique parables including the good Samaritan (Lk 10:29-37), the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32) and the Pharisee* and the tax collector (Lk 18:9-14; see Taxes); many positive stories about women,* such as Jesus' visit to the home of Mary and Martha (Lk 10:38-42), and the women at the cross who had followed Jesus from Galilee* (Lk 23:49; 8:1-3); a number of warnings about the deceit of riches (Lk 12:13-15, 16-21; 16:19-31; etc.; see Rich and Poor); an emphasis on prayer* (Lk 11:5-8; 18:2-8; etc.); extra teaching on the end time (Lk 12:54-56; 13:1-9; 17:20-21, 28-32; see Apocalyptic Teaching) and added accounts of Jesus' appearances after his resurrection* (Lk 24:13-49), the longest and most detailed being the one on the road to Emmaus (Lk 24:13-35).

The phrase "Lamb of God" is found in the NT only in the Gospel of John. There are two occurrences, the first in John 1:29 where John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) is reported as saying of Jesus: "Look, the Lamb of God (ho amnos tou theou), who takes away the sin of the world" and the second in John 1:36 where the first half of the saying is repeated.

The same word is used in Acts 8:32 where Jesus is compared with a sheep (probaton) led to the slaughter and a lamb that is silent before the shearer (citing Is 53:7; see Shepherd, Sheep). In 1 Peter 1:19 there is reference to redemption "with the precious blood of Christ [as of] a lamb without blemish or defect." Finally, in Revelation 5:6 Jesus is described as "a Lamb [arnion] looking as if it had been slain" (cf. Rev 7:14; 12:11). Scholars have had considerable difficulty in identifying the background of the ideas and hence the significance which would have been conveyed by this imagery to John's readers. We have to ask both what the statement means in the context of the Gospel in which it appears and also what it would have meant on the lips of the Baptist (assuming that it is an authentic saying). If John presents it as a saying of John the Baptist, he may well have envisaged a meaning which was credible on his lips; but it is also conceivable that John saw a fuller meaning which did not become apparent until later (cf. Jn 2:22; 11:49-52 for this kind of phenomenon).

The word amnos is used some seventy-five times in the LXX, mostly with reference to the lamb sacrificed in the ritual of the burnt offering, which was a daily gift offering "to make atonement" (Lev 1:4). One possibility is, therefore, that the background to John's statement was the daily offering in the Temple* (Ex 29:38-46).

A second possibility is that the reference is to the lamb associated with the Passover offering (see Feasts). Jesus is identified with the Passover offering in 1 Corinthians 5:7, and this concept may be present at the Last Supper (see Last Supper) if it is right to see Jesus there as comparing himself to the lamb (cf. also Jn 19:37). John stresses that it was at the time of the Passover that Jesus was executed (Jn 18:28; 19:14, 31). It is hardly a strong objection to this interpretation that the word used in the LXX is arnion rather than amnos. It is a more serious point that the Passover offering is said not to have been an expiatory offering (although it did have redemptive efficacy in delivering Israel from Egypt). However, L Morris argues that all sacrifices were credited with expiatory power. He objects that the Passover animal was not known as "the lamb" but simply as "the Passover" (it could be a lamb or a goat).

A third possibility is that Jesus is being described in the language of Isaiah 57:7 (a similar but less likely allusion would be to Jer 11:19). In this chapter the lamb is used metaphorically to describe the Servant of Yahweh who bears sin (Is 53:11; see Servant of Yahweh), and Jesus is implicitly identified as the Servant in John 12:38 (Is 57:1). It is not a great step from the identification of the Servant as "my Servant" to the phrase "the Lamb of God."

A reference to the Servant has also been detected by scholars who argue that amnos here is a mistranslation of Aramaic talyā which can mean both "lamb" and "servant"; in an authentic saying of John the meaning was "servant," but the church reinterpreted the word as "lamb." However, the linguistic arguments against this view seem convincing.

The lamb which was sacrificed in place of Isaac (Gen 22:8) has been adduced. In Judaism much was made of the "sacrifice" of Isaac, and it would be possible to regard the lamb as representing his sacrificial role.

Yet another possibility is that the imagery is that of the arnion in Revelation 5:6 which is traced back to the messianic leader of God's people who is depicted as the ram which leads the flock in 1 Enoch 90. In Testament of Joseph 19:8-11 and Testament of Benjamin 3:8 the actual phrase "lamb of God" appears. The latter text says that there "will arise the lamb of God who will take away the sin of the world" (but the text is probably interpolated). In the time of the anointed priest (or priestly Messiah) "sin shall come to an end" (T. Levi 18).

With this variety of possibilities before us a certain feeling of confusion may arise. L. Morris finds it difficult to decide that any specific one of these interpretations is correct and finally concludes that the reference "awakens memories of more sacrifices than one." Probably it is best to see the origin of the idea in the concept of the strong ram as a messianic image, but to this have been linked the concepts of the Passover sacrifice and the Servant of Yahweh.

There remains the question: how is "takes away sin" to be interpreted? This phrase (which also occurs in 1 Jn 3:5 and, using anapherō in Heb 9:28 and in 1 Pet 2:24 of Jesus as the Servant) can be interpreted in two ways. First, "to bear sin" can mean to remove it by making expiation for it (Lev 10:17 of the sin offering; 1 Sam 15:25; 25:28). Second, it can mean to remove sin by bearing the penalty attaching to it on behalf of others (cf. Num 14:33-34; Is 53:12; Ezek 18:19-20). J. Jeremias has argued that originally the text referred to the Servant of God and hence to "the representative bearing of the punishment of sin," but that the Evangelist took it to refer to "the setting aside of sin by the expiatory power of the death of Jesus... by the atoning power of His blood" (TDNT I.186). But these two explanations may come down to the same thing in this passage. Another possibility is "to abolish sin" (cf. 1 Macc 3:29 for the verb and T. Levi 18:9 for the idea), a concept which C. H. Dodd finds to be credible on the lips of the Baptist.

The description of Jesus as the Lamb of God belongs to the language of sacrifice which is no longer common currency today. The concept of guilt for offenses committed remains current (although there is a tendency to confuse feelings of guilt with the objective state of guilt) and with it the consciousness that guilt can be removed only by some act of restitution or evidence of penitence or payment of a penalty. Against this background it is possible to understand the biblical concept of guilt over against God—whether in terms of disobedience to divine law or, at a more profound level, in terms of flouting and wounding his love.* In this situation reconciliation is possible only if there is a willingness on both sides to repair the relationship. This is done on God's side by his provision—in the Lamb of God—of evidence of his willingness to forgive (see Forgiveness of Sins), and on the human side by an appropriate offering. The wonder of the gospel* is that God himself provides the offering which humankind itself cannot provide.

LANGUAGES OF PALESTINE

1. Introduction
2. The Languages of Palestine, 200 B.C.-A.D. 135
3. The Languages of Jesus
4. Semitic Sources for the Gospels

1. Introduction.

Which languages Jesus may have spoken, whether Semitic sources underlie portions of the Gospels and which languages were in use among Palestinian Jews in the first century—these are three related but distinct questions. It cannot simply be assumed, for example, that Jesus taught in every language which the Jews of Palestine might have used or that his teaching was written down in the same dialect, or even in the same language, in which he gave it. Thus these three questions require separate treatment. Yet an understanding of the language usage of Palestinian Jews is a prerequisite to the treatment of the other two questions; discussion of these related matters must therefore begin there. Once the evidence has been amassed, all three are best approached using a framework provided by sociolinguistic categories.

1.1. Method and Terminology. Sociolinguistics is a branch of modern linguistics which studies the interrelationships between society or social groups and language. Sociolinguistic studies have shown, for example, that it is important to differentiate between social classes in describing the language usage of a given society. Noteworthy differences often exist in this regard between the upper and lower classes, especially in a bilingual or multilingual society such as ancient Palestine. Related work on dialect geography has focused attention on the differences and similarities which characterize various localities within a linguistic community. As ancient Palestine was subdivided into numerous geographical regions, such as Galilee and Judea, these studies highlight the illegitimacy of simply applying the evidence derived from one such region to another.

Sociolinguistics has also led to the recognition of what is called "code switching"—the use of different levels or forms of the same language depending on certain variables within a given communicative situation. An extreme form of this phenomenon, known as "diglossia," is important for the understanding of ancient Palestine. The term refers to a situation in which a classical form of a language (designated as the "high," or H, form) exists alongside another form or forms of the same language (the "low," or L); each has a distinct role to play. The H form is not normally spoken; it derives from a highly esteemed literature written at an earlier stage of the language, is substantially different both in grammar and lexicon from the L variety, and must be learned by formal study. No one learns it at their mother's knee. In modern times Greek, the written forms of which harken back to Attic literature, and Arabic, whose speakers regard the language of the Koran as the only proper vehicle for many situations, provide excellent examples of this phenomenon.

1.2. Problems and Limitations. Unfortunately, the nature of the linguistic evidence from ancient Palestine makes a complete linguistic analysis impossible. The best one can hope for is an approximation of the facts. Many factors contribute to this difficulty. For example, in understanding a linguistic community it is essential to distinguish between spoken and written forms of language, but by definition the spoken language was rarely written down; even more rarely have any such materials survived into the present. Again, the linguistic situation in Palestine must have changed during the period of this inquiry (roughly 200 B.C. to 135 A.D.), but the evidence is not equally distributed within that period. What survives is random and spotty, and the changes are correspondingly difficult to trace. One must therefore draw appropriately tentative conclusions.

Given modern analogies, it is likely that Palestine in Jesus' day was a welter of dialects and languages, many of which have left no written record at all. Certain other languages which have left some record—for example, Latin and Nabatean—were certainly in use among small numbers of Jews (and larger numbers of Gentiles) in first-century Palestine. But as these languages are not central to the present discussion they shall be left to one side. In what follows the focus will be on evidence for the types and varieties of use of Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek.

2. The Languages of Palestine, 200 B.C.-A.D. 135

2.1. Hebrew. At the time of Jesus Hebrew was the language which had been in use among the Jews of Palestine for the longest time. Yet the Hebrew Bible never refers to the language by that name, but calls it instead either "the language of Canaan" or "Judean."

2.1.1. History of Use Prior to 200 B.C. Based on the former designation it is probable that when Israel came into existence at the end of the second millennium B.C., they spoke various Northwest Semitic dialects which they found the Canaanite inhabitants speaking. From biblical and inscriptive evidence it is clear that there were several distinct dialects in use among the Israelites, and that in particular linguistic differences existed between the south (Judah) and the north (Israel). At the time of the United Monarchy, if analogies with other areas of the ancient Near East hold true, a particular form of the language was enshrined as the official form, to be used in writing of narrative literature and court documents and to be taught as the standard to all scribes. Presumably the type of Hebrew chosen to play this role was that spoken about the year 950 B.C. in the capital, Jerusalem.

When, after the reign of Solomon, Judah and Israel formed separate polities, Jerusalemite Hebrew continued as the official language of the south. It is likely that the Hebrew of the northern capital, Samaria, came to function as its northern counterpart. Of that northern written standard, apart from relatively meager inscriptive evidence such as the Samaria ostraca, only traces may remain. These are perhaps preserved in biblical books such as Amos and Hosea. Those books, of which some form probably circulated in Israel, survived that nation's fall to Assyria in 722 B.C. only because they were borne to the south and copied in the capital of Judah, Jerusalem. At that point their language began to be assimilated to the southern dialect. Thus the southern written standard, dating from the time of David and Solomon (although with later orthographic modernization), essentially constitutes Standard Biblical Hebrew (SBH).

During the 350 years of pre-exilic history subsequent to the United Monarchy, the spoken forms of Hebrew in both the north and the south probably diverged more and more from the written official languages. By the time of the destruction of Judah at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C., spoken Hebrew in the south may have been substantially different from SBH. Some scholars have suggested that Mishnaic Hebrew (MH) represents a development from this spoken language of the late pre-exilic period.

With the return from exile following the decree of Cyrus in 538 B.C., the linguistic situation in Judah had changed. Not all of the people had gone into exile-only the elite, perhaps ten to twenty per cent of the population. These groups represented the linguistic standard-bearers, however, and in their absence SBH apparently languished; the peasants who remained in Judah during the exilic period spoke various dialects of Hebrew and, especially at the borders with the north and west, increasingly Aramaic. According to Nehemiah 13:24, Nehemiah had to contend with a situation in which, because of intermarriage with neighboring peoples, many of the Jews could not speak Hebrew—a situation he took steps to correct Thus Hebrew began to be regarded from a nationalistic perspective; its use and survival were now connected with the survival of the Jews as a separate people.

The biblical books written during this period manifest a different form of the written language, known as Late Biblical Hebrew (LBH). The authors of these books varied in terms of their knowledge of their model—the earlier classical language—and in the degree to which their spoken idiom was allowed to intrude. Considerably more Aramaic influence is apparent, and so-called Mishnaisms (grammatical forms known from MH) begin to show up. The book of Ecclesiastes, for example, which reached its final form at any rate in the early Second Temple period, manifests many such linguistic peculiarities, which are most convincingly explained as examples of the L of fourth- to third-century Jerusalem. Stamp seals from this period, which read "Hezekiah the governor," show that although Imperial Aramaic was the lingua franca and served for many official purposes, the Jews continued to use Hebrew in connection with the government and Temple.* These stamps preferred the older paleo-Hebrew script to the Aramaic script which had generally usurped it This fact underscores the nationalistic importance ascribed to Hebrew at a time when the Jews were no longer a sovereign nation.

2.1.2. Evidence of Use 200 B.C.-A.D. 135. Earlier scholarship used to argue that Hebrew had become a dead language after the exile, and that Aramaic was the spoken language of ordinary Jews. But this position, although still held by some scholars, is simplistic. Moreover, as one approaches the turn of the second century B.C., it is contradicted by certain evidence. In fact, while LBH did continue as the written language for many purposes, the usual evidence for approaching language "death"—for example, vastly increased numbers of loan words, even for common expressions, and the loss of morphological integrity—is absent. On the contrary, different authors continued to shape the classical idiom to serve new needs, coining neologisms and developing a variety of types of this written language. Moreover, many of those works written in LBH contain inadvertent slips, precious evidence of the spoken language of the authors and scribes responsible for the forms in which we possess them. Not infrequently, this spoken language seems to have been Hebrew of a form different from LBH, and approaching MH.

The evidence for the Hebrew of the late-Second Temple period comes from a diversity of sources: literary, documentary, inscriptive and numismatic. Much of the literary evidence was unknown prior to the discovery in 1947-1956 of the manuscript-bearing caves near Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls). These caves contained approximately 800 manuscripts, many of them exceedingly fragmentary. The texts were inscribed in Aramaic and Greek as well as Hebrew, but the vast majority of them were in LBH of various types. Their authors varied widely in their command of written Hebrew. The person responsible for the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifices, for example, wrote in what might be called a philosophical Hebrew analogous with philosophical Greek. The author of the Temple Scroll, on the other hand, was comparatively unimaginative and relied largely on a simplified vocabulary. The author of 4QTestimonia (or subsequent scribes) wrote a Hebrew massively affected by Aramaic, even at the level of morphology (usually the last area of a language to change through contact with another language). In addition to the Dead Sea Scrolls, literary texts originally written or preserved in LBH include Ben Sira (or Ecclesiasticus), 1 Maccabees and a substantial percentage of the apocryphal and pseudepigraphic literature produced in the three centuries between 200 B.C. and A.D. 135.

Apart from literary texts, the evidence for the use of Hebrew in this period is not substantial. At Masada finds dating from approximately the time of the First Revolt (A.D. 66-74) included jar labels attached to cultic materials, an ostraca used as a receipt reading "from Jerusalem," and numerous ostraca inscribed in the paleo-Hebrew script and serving unknown functions. From the time of the Second, or Bar Kokhba, Revolt (A.D. 132-135), in addition to the four caves of Murabba'at, four caves in neighboring wadis yielded written materials. Among the latter, the "Cave of Letters" contained eight documents in Hebrew, consisting of three contracts from En Gedi (all by the same scribe) and five letters written to Bar Kokhba by his subordinates. Interestingly, all these were written not in LBH, but in MH. From the "Cave of Horrors" came a burial ostracon, "Saul son of Saul, peace." The other two manuscript-bearing caves of the Judean desert yielded a total of only two papyri (one a promissory note) and four ostraca used as receipts. These latter materials were so fragmentary that even the language is uncertain; they may be in either MH or Aramaic.

The finds from Murabba'at included six contracts, all in MH and all either undated or dating from the time of the revolt, and seven legible letters to Bar Kokhba in the same language (four other letters are very poorly preserved and may be, but are not certainly, written in that idiom). To these documentary finds one can add a few inscriptions from the immediate environs of Jerusalem. Two are sepulchral inscriptions: the famous Bene Hezir inscription on a tomb containing at least six first-century high priests of the family of Boethus, and a recently excavated find reading, "belonging to the house of David." Both are written in MH rather than LBH. Another recent discovery, the so-called Trumpet inscription, evidently comes from the southwest corner of the Herodian Temple and indicated the spot where a priest would stand to blow a trumpet to signal the beginning and end of the Sabbath.* Several Aramaic tomb inscriptions contain Hebrew titles for the deceased, such as "high priest" and "Nazirite."

Numismatic evidence consists of Hasmonean coinage, beginning apparently with John Hyrcanus I (134-104 B.C.) and running down to the time of Mattathias Antigonus (40-37 B.C.). Herod and the Romans adorned their coins only with Greek inscriptions, but at the time of both the First and Second Revolts the Jews once again minted coins with Hebrew mottos. All the Hebrew coinage of the period used the paleo-Hebrew script rather than the ordinary square script

2.1.3. Sociolinguistic Analysis. The Hebrew materials for the time of Jesus point to a situation of diglossia. The H form of Hebrew was LBH, while the L forms were varieties of MH. In addition to contracts and letters, two texts from the Dead Sea Scrolls, 4QMMT and the Copper Scroll, are written in varieties of L. 4QMMT is a halakic epistle, perhaps addressed to the Temple authorities, while the Copper Scroll is an economic document listing some of the treasures of the Second Temple which were cached at the time of the Roman approach to Jerusalem in about 70 A.D.
Much of the LBH material—the literary texts—ultimately or proximately derives from Jerusalem. Their authors were learned people and therefore probably members of the upper classes. The Murab-ba'at contracts and their subscribers all come from Judean villages and, judging from the amounts of money they involved, also relate to the upper classes, such as village elders and propertied families. The sepulchers inscribed with Hebrew belonged, of course, to the wealthy, who alone could afford such eternal monuments. One can say, then, that upper-class people in Jerusalem could often read and write the H form of Hebrew, while many in outlying villages could at least understand the L form. The linguistic competence of the lower classes is not directly evidenced, but sociolinguistic analogy suggests that in the smaller villages many would have known an L form of Hebrew. In Jerusalem, on the other hand, it is likely that the situation was linguistically less conservative, and that L forms of Hebrew were not as widely known by the lower classes.

What type of Hebrew was used for what situation? Formal written materials and virtually all literary texts would utilize LBH, the H form. An L form would be spoken, especially in smaller villages, and be used for letters and, in certain circumstances, for ephemera such as contracts. It would also be used in halakic discussions, where the topic was sacred and the vocabulary of LBH insufficient. Matters connected with the Temple and national ideology required Hebrew, ordinarily but not entirely the H form. Thus during the Bar Kokhba revolt, for example, contracts were produced in Hebrew. That there was no continuous Hebrew tradition for such materials is suggested by the fact that the contracts follow precisely the Aramaic contract formulae, for which there was a continuous tradition dating back prior to the time of Nehemiah. Indeed, sometimes Aramaic formulae appear intact in the Hebrew contracts. Thus, as noted already, the use of written Hebrew often had nationalistic overtones at the time of Jesus. Otherwise, it had specifically religious overtones, although of course these two realms were not distinct in ancient times.

All of these comments apply, however, only to Judea, whence the evidence derives. Similar evidence for Galilee is entirely lacking. Two Hebrew inscriptions are known from that region, one from Kefar Biram and one from Dabbura, but these postdate the period of this inquiry by some two centuries. By that time Jewish settlement patterns had changed substantially. As a result of the Bar Kokhba revolt in particular, Judea was depopulated, and many Jews moved north to Galilee, bringing with them (for the first generation or two at least) their linguistic habits. Thus these inscriptions say nothing about whether Hebrew was in widespread use there in the first century. The fact that the region came under Jewish control only after some centuries of government by Aramaic and Greek-speaking rulers suggests that Hebrew was much less well known in Galilee than it would have been in Judea. Educated Jews would presumably have acquired at least some knowledge of the H form, however, and halakic discussions there, as in Judea, may have required an L form of the language.

2.2. Aramaic.

2.2.1. History of Use Prior to 200 B.C. The widespread use of Aramaic in Palestine apparently began in the late-Assyrian period (c. 720 B.C.), when the language began to function as an international language of diplomacy. As there existed numerous different dialects of Aramaic within the broad expanse of Assyrian hegemony, a standardized form intelligible to all began to develop. This process led ultimately to Imperial Aramaic, the language of government during the Persian period (c. 538-332 B.C.). The Jews of Palestine were, of course, part of the Persian Empire, and thus the upper levels of their society acquired a functional knowledge of this lingua franca.

Alongside this standard written language, people in Palestine spoke different dialects of Aramaic, some of which took root beginning with the exchange of populations carried out in the Assyrian period. For example, the Assyrians resettled Aramaic speakers in Gaza and Samaria. With the passage of time Aramaic became the most widely spoken language in Syria and Palestine, and, presumably, among the Jews, with the possible exception of the Jews of Judea.

Thus by the time of Jesus there had come to be a standard written language, usually called Standard Literary Aramaic (SLA), and various spoken dialects. The differences between them do not appear to have been as marked as those which characterize diglossia. It is more accurate to say that the switch from written to spoken language was an example of code switching. Nevertheless, while the written language was probably broadly intelligible to native speakers of Aramaic dialects, it required education to read and, especially, to write SLA. The differences between spoken and written Aramaic may have been analogous to the differences between modern spoken English and the language of the King James Bible.

2.2.2. Evidence for Use 200 B.C.-A.D. 135. Evidence for the written dialect appears in the Dead Sea Scrolls. Although these were mainly written in Hebrew, substantial Aramaic material occurs as well. These texts include the Genesis Apocryphon, the Prayer of Nabonidus, the New Jerusalem text, portions of Enoch literature, a "pseudo-Daniel" cycle, Tobit and the Testament of Levi. Akin to this material is the language of the Aramaic contracts found at Murabba'at and in the Babatha ar archive. While contracts in the ancient Near East were sometimes produced in the spoken tongues, the long legal tradition behind the Aramaic contracts guaranteed the use of stereotyped antique phrases dating from about the same period as the formation of SLA.

Many of the sepulchral inscriptions around Jerusalem are in Aramaic. Such inscriptions are by nature rather formal, and thus invite the use of formal language quite different from that actually spoken, as exemplified by the common use of Latin in eighteenth-century British epitaphs. Contemporary Palestinian Greek inscriptions sometimes attempt meter, a characteristic of formal language. Yet the Aramaic inscriptions near Jerusalem are often inscribed in cursive rather than formal script, perhaps suggesting that a less formal attitude toward this linguistic situation may have characterized certain circles of ancient Palestinian Jewry. Probably some of these inscriptions are evidence for spoken forms of Aramaic, while others are intended as SLA Other than these inscriptions, the best evidence for contemporary spoken Aramaic dialects comes from two sources: the Aramaic letters of Bar Kokhba, and the words and phrases preserved in the NT.

It has often been suggested that the targums* (Aramaic translations of the Bible, made first for the Torah, then later for the whole Hebrew Bible) may preserve the spoken speech for the period. In particular, some scholars have claimed that Targum Neofiti, although its manuscript is of medieval date, instances the spoken language of Galilee at the time of Jesus. This claim outruns the evidence; the language of Targum Neofiti is most directly comparable to that of the Samaritan Targum and Christian Palestinian Aramaic, both of which postdate our era by centuries. But some discussion of the problem of the targums is warranted in the present context.

First, there is no certain evidence for the use of targums in Jesus' day. True, among the Dead Sea Scrolls a targum to Job has turned up, but Job was not a part of the liturgical reading cycle of the period as far as is known. Further, Job is a notoriously difficult Hebrew book, so that even if one knew SBH quite well, Job would remain obscure and some help might be very welcome. Such is not the case with the books of the Torah. The other so-called targum found among the Scrolls is to the book of Leviticus, but it is so fragmentary that it is entirely uncertain that it really is a targum, as opposed to a portion from some quite different liturgical work which happened to quote Leviticus. Second, any educated Jew of Jesus' day would have been educated precisely in SBH texts, starting with the Bible, and particularly the Torah.

Thus it is unclear why a translation into Aramaic would have been necessary, unless it was to serve the needs of the uneducated. Yet an example from modern day speakers of Arabic dialects, many of whom have never learned the vastly different H form, questions even this suggestion. Such people prefer to hear the Koran and accompanying sermon in the holy language and, through long attendance at religious services, acquire a basic understanding of what they hear without formal education. Third, references to translations of the Scripture readings into Aramaic in the Mishnah and Tosephta refer to ad hoc oral translations, quite a different matter from the literary works which we call the targums, and date to a later time and linguistic situation. Any Aramaic translation of the Bible dating from the time of Jesus would doubtless have been composed not in the oral language but in SLA; the best claim to such status belongs to Targum Onkelos (not Targum Neofiti). The most plausible explanation for the function of Aramaic targums, if such did exist in Jesus' day, is as interpretive devices. Having heard the Hebrew of the Scriptures read aloud, the audience would be informed of its meaning and application in Aramaic. Hebrew was not used because of the desire to avoid confusion between the words of the text and its interpretation.

Thus at Jesus' time literacy would have meant for most Jews first an ability to read SBH. Only after this level had been attained would some go on to study further, presumably to acquire, among other things, literacy in Aramaic (and sometimes Greek). What then is the explanation for the existence of literary works in SLA? Three possible explanations seem worthy of consideration. First, some of these works, such as Tobit, antedate the Hasmonean Revolt, at which time some evidence suggests Hebrew acquired renewed ideological status. Among the Dead Sea Scrolls is one Hebrew translation of Tobit, apparently executed in the light of the changed attitude toward the language proper for most religious literature. Further evidence for this change found among the Scrolls includes Hebrew translations of other originally Aramaic works: the New Jerusalem text, the Book of Periods, and the Testament of Naphtali. Second, it is noticeable that most of the Aramaic literary materials belong to certain genres: testamentary texts, some types of interpretive texts and what might be labeled vulgar or folk genres. In this last category one might classify zodiacal texts, such as 4QZodiac, or an unpublished Aramaic brontologion or 4QChronology, which explains the divisions of time into periods. In other words, the required language for a literary work may have been genre-specific. Ready analogies exist in contemporary Greek literature—epic required archaic Homeric Greek, dramatic choral portions required Doric Greek, etc. Third, some of these Aramaic works may have originated among, or have been intended for, diasporate Jewry to the east. There Hebrew was not well known, and a standard form of Aramaic would have been the natural choice for literary composition.

2.2.3. Sociolinguistic Analysis. In terms of geography and social class it would seem that Aramaic was the best-known and most widely used language among Jews of all classes in Galilee and in Judea also, at least in the larger urban areas. Its use in Judea was confined largely to speech and to ephemeral written materials such as letters, contracts and receipts. That Aramaic was usually the language of the marketplace in both regions is shown by several economic terms found in the Gospels (e.g., batos, a measure [Lk 16:6], and mna, a unit of currency [Lk 19:23]), content-identification tags inscribed or attached to storage jars, and ostraca used as receipts found in Jerusalem and in the caves of the Judean wilderness. Literary written works would use Aramaic only for certain genres or in limited communicative situations, such as writings intended for the Diaspora (here Josephus’ Jewish Wars is a case in point—cf. J.W. 1.3.6). In such cases code switching was normal and SLA rather than spoken Aramaic was the chosen vehicle of expression.

2.3. Greek.

2.3.1. History of Use Prior to 200 B.C. The advance of Greek language and culture among the Jews of Palestine began in earnest with the conquest of the region by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. (see Hellenism). Even before, Greeks had been among the mercenary soldiers fighting in the region from time to time, and substantial trade between Palestinian cities and Greece or Greek-speaking regions is evident from archeological remains. Thus the Jews of Palestine had long known of the Greeks and perhaps some of them had had reason to learn some Greek, but the real advance followed upon Alexander. Upon his death his conquests were divided among his leading generals, and Palestine fell to the lot of Ptolemy of Egypt. Although he and the Seleucids of Syria fought over Palestine for the entire third century, for nearly the whole of that period it remained under Egyptian jurisdiction.
The Ptolemaic administration of Palestine was involved in every detail of life. Bureaucrats were installed in every village and hamlet and, as the Zeno papyri of c. 250 B.C. indicate, this administration was conducted in Greek. Thus the upper levels of society, as well as some lower class people such as merchants, could hardly avoid at least a minimal competence in Greek. Many of the upper classes in particular acquired considerably more than that. The Seleucids, who followed the Ptolemies in ruling Palestine at the turn of the second century, also conducted their government in Greek, and thus the die was cast. For the majority of the period of this inquiry, government affairs were conducted in that language. Even when Hebrew was advanced for ideological reasons, as on the coins of the Hasmoneans, many of the same coins also bore Greek inscriptions. It is a safe assertion that at the time of Jesus most educated Palestinian Jews of the upper classes knew at least some Greek, especially in Jerusalem and the larger cities such as Tiberias (the home of Justus, author of a history of the First Revolt written in Greek).

2.3.2. Evidence for Use 200 B.C.-A.D. 135. The earliest inscripational evidence for Greek in Palestine subsequent to Alexander is an ostracon of the year 277 B.C. from Khirbet el-Kom, in Idumean territory. This ostracon, a bilingual Aramaic and Greek record of a loan, shows that Greek loanwords had already begun to invade Aramaic, even for mundane concepts and matters for which perfectly good words already existed in Aramaic. The Greek loanwords of Daniel 3:5 are another approximately contemporary example of this phenomenon (although the date of the Aramaic portions of Daniel is debated). How quickly and how deeply Greek language and the ideas it presented penetrated even conservative circles of Judaism is illustrated by the book of Jubilees. Written in Hebrew about the time of the Maccabean revolt, the author of this book made use of Greek geographic literature. To do so required an advanced knowledge of Greek language and literature, since such texts were not dealt with in the Greek paideia until the student had already mastered Homer and the Attic poets, as well as more prosaic skills such as the proper technique for writing a letter. Since the author of Jubilees would certainly not have been among those Jews most enthusiastic for Greek ways, one must assume that in those circles the knowledge of Greek was generally at least as profound as was his.

In fact Palestinian Jewish authors began to compose in Greek. For example, Eupolemus wrote an apologetic history of the Jews in Greek, of which a few fragments have survived in the form of quotations in later Greek writers.
Maccabees was composed in Greek, as was 1 Esdras. Semitic works were also being translated into Greek. For example, thanks to its colophon we know that Esther was translated into Greek in Jerusalem in the year 114 B.C.

Greek was well known among the upper classes even in outlying areas of Judea. One of the signatories to an Aramaic contract from Murabba'at, for example, signed in Greek, indicating that he was more comfortable in that language than in Hebrew or Aramaic. Several Bar Kokhba letters were written in Greek. Perhaps the most dramatic proof of the knowledge of Greek in outlying areas is the scroll of the Minor Prophets from Nahal Hever. The Jews who fled to those caves brought it along with them, obviously because they could read it, and not improbably because at least some of them could read it better than they could a Semitic version of the Scriptures. The handwriting of the text is inelegant and its spelling nonstandard. It may therefore not be a professional copy, but a personal copy written out by the man or woman to whom it belonged.

Epigraphic evidence for the Jewish knowledge and use of Greek in this period is substantial. In particular, ninety ossuary inscriptions dating between the second century B.C. and the second century A.D. are known from the vicinity of Jerusalem. Some of these show a spectacular lack of appositional case agreement. Since such ossuaries belonged only to the upper classes, it would therefore appear that in those circles the desire to show a knowledge of Greek often outstripped the knowledge itself. If so, it would not be remarkable; Greek, as the official language of the eastern Roman Empire, was everywhere in the East regarded as a prestige language. But the attitudes toward Greek among the Jews as a whole were complex and varied during the period under discussion, as two examples may demonstrate.

Josephus,* the famous Jewish traitor of the First Revolt, and the man who through his writings is responsible for much of our knowledge of the history of the time of Jesus, described his accomplishments in Greek at the end of his Jewish Antiquities:

I have also labored strenuously to partake of the realm of Greek prose and poetry, after having gained a knowledge of Greek grammar, although the habitual use of my native tongue has prevented my attaining precision in the pronunciation. For our people do not favour those persons who have mastered the speech of many nations, or who adorn their style with smoothness of diction, because they consider that not only is such a skill common to ordinary freemen but that even slaves who so choose may acquire it. But they give credit for wisdom to those alone who have an exact knowledge of the law and who are capable of interpreting the meaning of the Holy Scriptures. Consequently, although many have laboriously undertaken this training, scarcely two or three have succeeded. (Ant. 20.263-66; translation by L H. Feldman, Loeb Classical Library)

This statement is self-contradictory, of course, but it nevertheless affords some insight into the attitudes toward and accomplishments in Greek learning among the upper classes of Jerusalem, to which Josephus belonged. Josephus had opportunity to study Greek at a level well beyond the elementary. The ability to speak Greek, although not the ability to write the Atticizing Greek then coming into favor with Josephus' Roman readers, was common even among the lower classes of Jerusalem; hence it was not particularly well regarded. Really advanced study of the language, of the kind that required pilgrimage to one of the literary centers of the Greco-Roman world, was not attractive to many upper-class Jews. The reason was evidently a pride in their own cultural values and a consequent devaluation of those of the broader Greco-Roman civilization. This undertone of negativity toward Greek was doubtless the flip side of the nationalistic love of Hebrew, and is more clearly seen in one of the Greek letters from the Bar Kokhba period.

This letter, 5/6HevEp gr 1, was sent by one of Bar Kokhba's lieutenants to the administrators of En Gedi and discusses preparations for the upcoming festival of Booths. It reads:

Soumaios to Jonathan son of Baianos and to Masabala, greetings; I already sent Agrippa to you. Make haste to send me . . . and citrons. And he [Agrippa] will transport these things back to the headquarters of the Jews. And be sure you do so! It was written in Greek because no one was found to write it in "Hebrew." Dismiss him very speedily in view of the festival. And be sure you do so! Soumaios. Farewell. (Author's translation)

Although this letter raises problems of grammar and interpretation, one point is clear: the author would have preferred to write it in a Semitic language, and only fell back on Greek as a last resort. Probably Hebrew would have been his first choice, but the Greek word rendered "Hebrew," hebraisti, can mean Aramaic as well, so based on the wording of the letter alone, one cannot be sure. But clearly he had a negative attitude toward the use of Greek and expected that his readers would also. Thus he felt constrained to apologize for using it. Equally striking is the fact that among these Jews it was more difficult to find persons able to write in Hebrew or Aramaic than in Greek. Presumably this fact does not mean that more of those Jews spoke Greek than either Semitic language, but rather that Semitic speakers had not received sufficient formal education to know how properly to write letters. Certain conventions existed, and in the Greek system of education at least, one did not learn this skill unless one advanced beyond elementary formal schooling. Apparently not many of Bar Kokhba's men had, and those who had and were available were trained in the Greek language. The letter is written in good Greek, as well—another evidence of the depth of Greek penetration into even nationalist circles of the Jews.

2.4. A Sociolinguistic Model. Having reached this point in the analysis, it is fitting to attempt to construct a sociolinguistic model to describe first-century language use and attitudes in Judea (see chart below). (As has become evident in this discussion, there is simply not sufficient evidence to attempt such for Galilee, although one can say that use and attitudes differed between the two regions [and, quite possibly, within Galilee, which was divided into two distinct cultures, Upper and Lower Galilee]).

This schematic lists the languages in the order of their frequency of use. As is clear, the linguistic situation of ancient Palestine was very complex—and this schematic does not include languages of lesser relevance such as Nabatean and Latin. It is thus no simple matter, turning to the question of the language or languages which Jesus spoke, to provide a confident and straightforward answer.

3. The Languages of Jesus.

In approximately thirty instances the Gospels include Semitic loanwords in the context of reporting Jesus' interaction with his contemporaries. Some of these instances record Hebrew words or expressions, usually in connection with specifically religious ideas—for example, geennēs, "Gehenna," from Hebrew gê hinnōm, the name of the valley to the south-southwest of Jerusalem which had, through its negative associations, come even within the Hebrew Bible to connote something like the Greek hadēs (Mt 23:15). Another example of a Hebrew expression is rabbi, "master" (Mt 23:7-8). But such Hebrew examples are few in number. Often even specifically religious terms such as "Passover" and "Sabbath" appear in the Greek text in Aramaic form (e.g., Mk 14:14 and Mt 3:4).
In the overwhelming majority of instances in which Jesus' reported words contain Semitic expressions, they are Aramaic. Many of these examples, however, involve only a single noun. More meaningful are those instances in which either verbs or verbal phrases are reported, for, given the multilingual environment of Palestine in Jesus' day, isolated substantives are not necessarily indicative of the language spoken. Aramaic words might appear, for example, in the course of a conversation conducted mainly in Hebrew or vice versa; such phenomena are commonly observed in the speech of modern bilinguals.

Judean Villages

A. Upper Classes

High form—Standard Biblical Hebrew for most genres

Standard Literary Aramaic, Greek for contracts, receipts

Spoken Aramaic for letters

Mishnaic Hebrew dialects for letters, contracts at times of nationalistic fervor

Low form—Mishnaic Hebrew/Aramaic, Greek

B. Lower Classes

High form— Mostly illiterate

Low form—Mishnaic Hebrew/Aramaic

Jerusalem

A. Upper Classes

High form—Standard Biblical Hebrew for most genres

Standard Literary Aramaic for a few genres and ossuary inscriptions

Spoken dialects of Mishnaic Hebrew and Aramaic for letters, contracts at certain times

Mishnaic Hebrew for written halakic discussions, temple record keeping

Greek

Low form—Aramaic, Greek

B. Lower Classes

High form—Mostly illiterate

Low form—Aramaic, Greek, Mishnaic Hebrew dialects

For this reason scholars attach great importance to the three instances in which the Gospels record Jesus speaking a verbal sentence. The first, at Mark 5:41, involves the healing of a young girl, in which Jesus says to her in Aramaic, talytā, qūm, "little girl, arise!" Apart from the fact that this is unambiguously an Aramaic sentence, it is noteworthy that the form of the verb is grammatically nonstandard—it appears to be a masculine singular imperative rather than a feminine singular imperative. A possible explanation is that the dialect Jesus spoke had replaced certain feminine forms with their masculine equivalents (a process known as suppletion). The significance of this observation is that in attempting to reconstruct Jesus' original words, it points away from the use of those Aramaic dialects which are in fact often used, SLA and the Aramaic of Targum Neofiti. Neither of these dialects regularly suppletes the feminine imperative, especially the singular (although similar suppletion does sometimes occur in both).

The other verbal sentences recorded as Jesus' direct speech are his "Ephphatha," "Open!" addressed in Mark 7:34 to a deaf man he was healing, and his cry "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" recorded at Mark 15:34 and Matthew 27:46, spoken as Jesus was being crucified (see Death of Jesus). Both are problematic as to language. The first can be understood either as Hebrew hippatēnah or as Aramaic 'eppatah. If it is Aramaic, it would again be a nonstandard (i.e., L, not H) form, of a type attested in the Bar Kokhba letters, Samaritan Aramaic and Targum Neofiti. The problem with the words from the cross is textual. Within the textual tradition of the Greek NT, the phrase as reported runs the gamut from pure Aramaic to pure Hebrew, and the traditions of each Gospel have influenced those of the other. Thus it is impossible to be certain whether on these occasions Jesus spoke Hebrew or Aramaic.

As a result, based on Mark 5:41 one can only say that Jesus certainly spoke Aramaic on occasion. This much was to be expected on the basis of our knowledge of the dominant language among the Jews of Galilee. The question whether he also knew Hebrew and Greek can only be answered on theoretical grounds. To begin with Greek, it is recorded on several occasions that Jesus held conversations with people who could not be expected to know either Semitic language: on one occasion with a Roman commander and on another with Pontius Pilate (see Pontius Pilate). The texts do not mention translators, but one cannot for this reason conclude with certainty that none were present. The Gospel writers were not generally interested in reporting such apparently irrelevant details of Jesus’ life. Theoretically, Jesus may well have known at least some Greek, for Nazareth was in Lower Galilee, an area in which there were many Greek-speaking Gentiles and in which numerous inscriptions in Greek have been discovered—although, unfortunately, not dated to the first century.

Luke reports that on one occasion Jesus was asked to give the weekly reading from the Prophets in the synagogue.* Since he stood and did so, reading from Isaiah (a rather difficult book in Hebrew), evidently Luke understood Jesus to know the H form of Hebrew. This portion of Luke is, however, problematic as to historical application. Raised as the son of an artisan, Jesus belonged to the lower classes, who were ordinarily illiterate in the ancient world. Judaism* put such an emphasis on the study of Scripture, however, even for the lower classes, that literacy among the Jews may have been substantially higher. It is also not unlikely that Jesus knew one or more dialects of L Hebrew, MH, even though such knowledge was probably much less common in Galilee than in Judea.

The reason for this suggestion is that the Gospels commonly depict Jesus engaging in halakic arguments with the Pharisees* and scribes.* If 4QMMT and the legal portions of another Dead Sea Scroll, the Damascus Covenant (not to mention later rabbinic literature), are any indication, such discussions apparently were at least sometimes conducted in MH. Since Jesus was thus, in sociological terms, competing for honor among the peasants against a prestige group of legal interpreters, it seems unlikely that he could have had any chance of victory if he could not speak the requisite dialect of Hebrew.
Therefore, one can conclude that Jesus certainly spoke a dialect of Aramaic, one which was somewhat different from any written form that has come down to us (although the degree of difference is, of course, unknown). According to indications from the Gospels, this dialect was different from that spoken in the south. Scholars have frequently suggested that the Galilean dialect differed from the Judean dialect of Aramaic principally in that the Galileans had ceased to distinguish between certain sounds, such as those represented by 'alep and 'ayin, or hê and hêt. The basis for this suggestion is, however, suspect. The sources quoted as supporting authorities are later Talmudic texts which describe the situation subsequent to the Bar Kokhba revolt when, as noted, the Palestinian linguistic situation had changed substantially. Further, the Dead Sea Scrolls, most of which are certainly Judean products, manifest this same phenomenon of interchange of the guttural letters. Thus it cannot easily be argued that it was characteristic of Galilean speech in contradistinction to Judean. We simply do not know precisely how to characterize the Aramaic dialect which Jesus spoke, either regarding morphology or lexicon. One may also conclude, although without such good evidence as for Aramaic, that Jesus probably knew both the H and one or more L forms of Hebrew, and that he had at least a minimal competence in Greek.

4. Semitic Sources for the Gospels.

Since the late nineteenth century and the work of G. Dalman, scholars have argued for the existence of Aramaic sources for the Gospels, and even in extreme cases for Aramaic originals for the Gospels themselves. In the twentieth century they have invested a great deal of effort attempting to reconstruct the actual words of Jesus, usually based on retrotranslation from the Greek text back into one or another dialect of Aramaic. The foremost book in English which takes this approach is M. Black's An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts. The two assumptions motivating this research have thus been: (1) that Jesus would have spoken in Aramaic only, and (2) that his followers preserved some sort of sayings source which then was incorporated into the Gospels, then or earlier being translated into Greek. This survey of the languages of Palestine in Jesus' day has shown that the first assumption is simplistic, and in fact the second assumption is also dubious as it has been prosecuted. Furthermore, even if these two assumptions are correct, there is the problem of deciding what material provides the best witness to the type of Aramaic which Jesus would have spoken.
To deal with the last matter first, Dalman attempted to use the type of Aramaic found in Targum Onkelos, because he regarded that Targum as the only one sufficiently ancient. He knew that it was not precisely spoken Aramaic that he was dealing with, but he felt that nevertheless Onkelos was the best source. Other scholars have suggested Christian Palestinian Aramaic and Syriac, the latter with its occasional advocates even today. Most recently, however, the two most frequently advocated types of Aramaic have been that contained in the so-called Palestinian Targums, and prominently one text of this type, Neofiti, and the Aramaic of the Qumran texts. It is possible that both claims are to some degree correct but probable that neither is entirely so.

If an Aramaic source for the Gospels were considered by its author and readers to be a literary text at the time of Jesus it would have been written in SLA, as noted in the previous survey. Therefore, the Aramaic of Qumran (and earlier texts in that standard) would serve as a good source for morphology, vocabulary and idioms. If, however, the text were written in an L form of Aramaic—for which the only evidence nearly contemporary to Jesus is the Aramaic Bar Kokhba letters and, perhaps, some of the Aramaic ossuary inscriptions—and if, also, it were written in a Galilean dialect the best witness might be Neofiti, in spite of its much later date, since there is simply nothing earlier from that region. If the author wrote in a Judean L form, of course, then the letters and ossuaries would be better models for the type of Aramaic used. And this latter option is by no means out of the question, since the early church was not centered in Galilee, but in Jerusalem. Just to underline the complexities of the question, neither Syriac nor Christian Palestinian Aramaic can be entirely ruled out as sources, especially for idioms. Some of the vocabulary found in the Qumran texts, for example, was not previously known from Aramaic texts in dialects used in Palestine, but has been elucidated by Syriac usage. And at least one idiom from the Aramaic Bar Kokhba texts is unknown anywhere else except in the much later Christian Palestinian Aramaic.

As to the assumption that Jesus' disciples memorized his words and passed them on orally to their followers, this is a model based on a misunderstanding of the nature of rabbinic literature. The model assumes that rabbinic claims for memorizing the words of one's teacher found therein are both accurate and can be generalized as characteristic of all earlier Judaism. Both assumptions are questionable, especially the latter. Even if the disciples did memorize at times, they may equally well have chosen to write Jesus' words down, not simply pass them on orally. Theirs was a relatively literate culture. And if they did so, there is good reason to believe that they would have used H forms of Jesus' language, even though while speaking he, of course, used the L form (see Teacher).

A modern analogy may illustrate. In Egypt today, where diglossia obtains between different forms of Arabic, a newspaper reporter may interview someone with the entire interview conducted in the L form of the language. When the interview appears in the paper, however, even the quotations will be changed into the H form—such is the nature of the linguistic attitudes at the heart of code switching. Thus in ancient Palestine, Jesus' Aramaic sayings, if they were such, might well come down in writing in an H form of the language rather than the actual L form in which they were spoken.

Of course, as the previous survey has shown, most religious writings were not inscribed in Aramaic at all. The chosen linguistic vehicle for such works in firstcentury Palestine was ordinarily LBH. If writing for other Palestinian Jews, the early church at Jerusalem would have been likely to write the earliest descriptions of Jesus' ministry, and to voice their claims about his Messianic significance, in that form of Hebrew—not Aramaic at all.

Thus, based on a sociolinguistic appraisal of the situation, it may well be that the efforts at reconstructing an Aramaic source or sources for the Gospels have been misdirected. Again, if such a written source were to contain something akin to the Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount), which is basically a halakic discussion, indications are that this genre would take as its language MH. And, given the rather widespread knowledge and use of Greek in all levels of Palestinian Jewry, it may well be that no Semitic sources ever existed. The earliest tradition may have been in Greek all along, particularly if such written materials were intended to be read by Gentiles and/or outside of Palestine. In view of all the unproven assumptions and complexities involved with the question of Semitic sources behind the Gospels, it is no exaggeration to say that even after 150 years of scholarly effort, research is still at a very early stage. LAST SUPPER

1. Introduction
2. Historical Background
3. The Last Supper in the Context of Passover
4. The Four Words of the Last Supper
5. The Celebration of the Supper

1. Introduction.

In the history of the Christian church a number of different terms have been associated with the Last Supper. Some of these, such as the "breaking of bread" (Acts 2:42, 46; 20:7, 11); the "eucharist" (Mt 26:27; Mk 14:23; Lk 22:17, 19; 1 Cor 11:24); the "table of the Lord" (1 Cor 10:21); "communion" (1 Cor 10:16); and the "Lord's Supper" (1 Cor 11:20) stem from the NT. Others, such as the "mass" (from the Latin ending of the Roman rite—Ita, missa est—"Go, you are dismissed") and the "Last Supper," do not.

Within the NT there are a number of references and allusions to the Last Supper (1 Cor 10:1-22; 11:20-22; Lk 24:30; Acts 27:35; Mk 6:41; 8:6; Jn 6:25-59; 19:34; Acts 2:42, 46; 20:7, 11), but the most important are the four accounts in Matthew 26:26-29; Mark 14:22-25; Luke 22:15-20 and 1 Corinthians 11:23-26, the latter being the oldest written account. In Paul's first letter to the Corinthians, written sometime during the mid-fifties, he refers to a tradition which he received from the Lord.* By this he means that ultimately the tradition of the Last Supper comes from Jesus, but by his use of the terms received and delivered it is clear that he is referring to a tradition which he was taught by the church. (Received and delivered were technical terms used to described the passing on of oral tradition. Cf. Lk 1:2; 1 Cor 15:3.) Whether this tradition was "received" from the church in Antioch (Acts 11:26) in the mid-forties or from the church in Damascus (Acts 9:19; Gal 1:17) in the mid-thirties is uncertain. The Gospel accounts date most probably from A.D. 65-90.

The four accounts of the Last Supper fall into two distinct groups representing two specific forms of the tradition. These are Matthew 26:26-29/Mark 14:22-25 and Luke 22:15-20/1 Corinthians 11:23-26. The two forms may be characterized as follows:

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Matthew/Mark</th>
<th>Luke/1 Corinthians</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>&quot;blessed&quot; bread</td>
<td>&quot;gave thanks&quot; bread</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;Take&quot;</td>
<td>[lack &quot;Take&quot;]</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;this is my body&quot;</td>
<td>&quot;this is my body + which is . . . you&quot;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>[lack &quot;This do in my remembrance&quot;]</td>
<td>&quot;This do in my remembrance&quot;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;this&quot;</td>
<td>&quot;this cup&quot;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;thanks&quot; before cup</td>
<td>[lack &quot;thanks&quot; before cup]</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>reference to all</td>
<td>[lack reference to all drinking of the cup]</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>drinking of the cup</td>
<td>the cup</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;my blood of the covenant&quot;</td>
<td>&quot;my blood of the covenant in my blood&quot;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;which is poured out for many&quot;</td>
<td>Luke has &quot;which is poured out for many&quot; you [not in 1 Cor]</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

The Lukan account is the most unusual of the four. It alone mentions the cup before the bread* (22:17) and has the word about the future kingdom (see Kingdom of God) at the beginning of the Supper (22:16) rather than at the end as in the other accounts. There is also a textual problem in the Lukan account in that a few significant manuscripts, mainly Codex Bezae and several old Latin manuscripts, omit Luke 22:19b and 20, "... which is given for you. This do in my remembrance.' And the cup likewise after Supper, saying, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood which is poured out for you.'" The main arguments in favor of this shorter text are: (1) The unusual nature of the reading. It is clearly the more difficult reading, for it is unlikely that a scribe would have wanted to omit the more traditional ending. (2) It is a shorter reading, which on textual-critical principles would generally be the preferred reading. This is especially true here in the case of a Western non-interpolation (i.e., a reading not found in the Western family of manuscripts), and such shorter readings are contrary to the tendency of the Western scribal tradition (see Textual Criticism). Nevertheless, the overall manuscript evidence favoring the inclusion of Luke 22:19b-20 is far too strong to be ignored, and it would appear that somewhere in the manuscript tradition a scribe was confused by the cup-bread-cup sequence in Luke and omitted the second mention of the cup.

2. Historical Background.

A number of historical issues present themselves in any proper understanding of the Last Supper. All four accounts indicate that the Supper was celebrated "on the night in which he was betrayed" (1 Cor 11:23). This is specifically stated in the Pauline version of the Last Supper, but each Gospel also indicates that on the night of the Last Supper Jesus announced his betrayal and went to Gethsemane* where he was betrayed (Mt 26:21-25, 36-56; Mk 14:18-21, 32-42; Lk 22:21-23, 39-53).

2.1. The Problem of Mark 14:12. In this verse we encounter a difficulty with regard to the dating of the Supper. Mark states, "And on the first day of Unleavened Bread when they were sacrificing the Passover lamb, his disciples say to him, 'Where do you wish that we should go and prepare in order that you might eat the Passover?' " The Passover, which was the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, was celebrated on the 15th of Nisan. The sacrifice of the Passover lambs, however, took place on the 14th of Nisan when the ritual search for leaven took place. Most probably Mark is not using technical terminology here. In the more popular understanding this technical distinction was lost, for the beginning of the Feast of Unleavened Bread took place on the preceding day when preparations such as the slaughtering of the Passover lamb and the search for leaven took place. Mark, in his description, has done what individuals today do when they speak of celebrating Christmas on Christmas Eve when presents are exchanged. Mark 14:12 is best understood in a similar way as a popular, inexact designation (cf. Josephus J.W. 5.3.1 for a similar reference to the 14th of Nisan as the beginning of the Feast of Unleavened Bread).

2.2. Was the Last Supper Associated with a Passover Meal? It is clear in all four Gospels that the crucifixion of Jesus took place on a Friday (Mt 27:62; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:54; Jn 19:31, 42). This, of course, means before 6 P.M. Friday, for in the Jewish reckoning of time this marks the end of Friday and the start of Saturday. The cardinal question regarding the date of the Last Supper involves whether it was in fact associated with a Passover meal. This would appear to be certain from Matthew 26:17-19; Mark 14:12-16 and Luke 22:7-15. But John 13:1, 29; 18:28; 19:31 give the impression that the trial and crucifixion took place before the Passover. Thus from John it appears that the Last Supper must have taken place on or before the 14th of Nisan. There have been numerous attempts to explain this. Some of these are:

(1) The Synoptic Gospels are correct. The Last Supper was a Passover meal. The term Passover in John 18:28 does not refer to the Passover lamb but to later feasts and sacrifices associated with the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

(2) John is correct Jesus did not eat the customary Passover meal with his disciples,* but anticipated it and ate it earlier because he knew he would be dead at the time of the Passover. John 18:28, however, refers to the actual Passover.

(3) Both the Synoptic Gospels and John are correct because the Passover was celebrated that year on two separate days (see Chronology, Death of Jesus).

Several objections have been raised against the view that the Last Supper was associated with a Passover meal. First no mention is made of the Passover lamb. Second, the word used for "bread" in the account is artos, the usual word for leavened bread, which could not be used to designate unleavened bread. Third, the four cups used in the traditional Jewish celebration of the Passover are not mentioned.

These objections are not serious, however, for the accounts of the Last Supper are abbreviated summaries of what happened, and one would expect the accounts to focus on those things which were most relevant for its celebration.
Furthermore, because the early church regularly celebrated the Last Supper apart from the yearly Jewish Passover festival, those aspects of the Passover which had little or no bearing on the Last Supper were soon dropped. As for the statement that artos could not be used to designate the unleavened bread of the Passover, this is simply incorrect. The general term for "bread," whether the Greek artos or Hebrew lehem, was always used in the OT, the LXX, the Mishnah and the Targums to describe the shewbread, which consisted of unleavened bread. Other objections focus on whether the trial of Jesus could have taken place on the day of the Passover (see Trial of Jesus).

The question of whether the Last Supper was a Passover meal needs to be clarified. The Last Supper was not a Passover meal. It was not celebrated yearly, and it involves only two elements—bread and wine. A literal Passover lamb is not involved nor are other elements of the Passover meal. Whereas Matthew 26:26; Mark 14:22 and Luke 22:15-17 envision the Last Supper taking place within the time frame of a Passover meal, it is not for them a Passover meal. This is especially clear in Luke, for none of his references to the breaking of bread in Acts is associated with the Jewish Passover. Paul furthermore appears to separate the "cup" from the Supper itself (1 Cor 11:25). Thus, whereas the Last Supper was associated with a Passover meal, and whereas the Lord's Supper was probably associated in the early church with a meal (the "love-feast"), it was never understood as being identical with these meals.

2.3. The Last Supper Associated with a Passover Meal. There are several weighty arguments which favor the view that the Last Supper was associated with a Passover meal. Some of these are:

(1) The Passover meal had to be eaten within the walled city of Jerusalem, and the Last Supper was eaten within the city walls.

(2) The Passover night had to be spent within greater Jerusalem, which included Jerusalem and the surrounding hills facing it. That night unlike other nights, Jesus and the disciples spent in Gethsemane, within greater Jerusalem, and not in Bethany.

(3) Jesus and the disciples reclined as they ate (Mk 14:18). It was customary to sit at ordinary meals but to recline at the Passover.

(4) People in Israel usually ate two meals a day. The first was a breakfast around 10-11 A.M., and the second was the main meal in late afternoon. The Last Supper was eaten in the evening (1 Cor 11:23; Mk 14:17) which was what the Law required for the Passover (Ex 12:8).

(5) The Last Supper ended with a hymn (Mt 26:30; Mk 14:26), and it was customary at the end of the Passover to sing the last part of the Hallel Psalms (Ps 115-118).

(6) The interpretation of the elements was a customary part of the Passover ritual (Ex 12:26-27).

(7) It was also customary at the Passover to give some money to the poor, a practice that would explain Judas' (see Judas Iscariot) leaving the gathering (Jn 13:29).

None of these arguments by itself is conclusive, but their overall weight argues strongly that the Last Supper was indeed associated with a Passover meal. They receive additional support from Paul's calling Jesus "Christ, our Passover" (1 Cor 5:7) and his reference to "the cup of blessing" (1 Cor 10:16), the name given to the third cup of the Passover meal. The suggestion that the Last Supper was a qiddûš (or some other religious meal) which was eaten on the eve of the Sabbath* and included a blessing over the bread and cup seems highly unlikely due to the numerous associations of the Last Supper with the Passover celebration. Indeed, the traditional materials which inform us about the qiddûš are post-Christian, and it was never celebrated twenty-four hours before the Sabbath but early on the Sabbath eve. There is even a question as to whether the qiddûš was an actual meal or simply a blessing pronounced at a meal. As to the Johannine dating of the Passover, it should be noted that this fits his theological emphases quite nicely, for John seeks to tie the death of Jesus closely with the Passover (cf. Jn 1:29, 35; 19:36; Ex 12:46; Num 9:12).

3. The Last Supper in the Context of Passover.

If, as has been maintained, the Last Supper took place at a Passover meal, any proper interpretation must seek to understand it in light of this particular context. The Passover was an elaborate ritual full of symbolism and redemptive history.

3.1. The Passover Elements. The meal consisted mainly of six elements.

3.1.1. The most significant was the Passover lamb, which had to be roasted over a fire. All the lamb had to be eaten that night. Nothing could be saved. The lamb of course reminded the participants of the first Passover in which the angel* of death was kept from visiting the first-born of Israel* because they were protected by the blood of the lamb.

3.1.2. The unleavened bread reminded them of the swiftness of God's* deliverance. His salvation* was so swift that the people of Israel did not have time to bake bread.

3.1.3. The bowl of salt water reminded them of the tears shed in their captivity and the crossing of the Red Sea.

3.1.4. The bitter herbs recalled the bitterness of their slavery.

3.1.5. A fruit puree called Charosheth reminded them of the clay which they used to make bricks in their captivity in Egypt.

3.1.6. Finally, there were four cups of wine, mixed three parts water to one part wine, which reminded them of the promises of Exodus 6:6-7. The third cup of blessing was probably the one Jesus used in the Last Supper (Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 10:16; 11:25). The fourth cup was followed by a benediction and singing.

3.2. The Passover Parallels. During the Passover meal someone, usually the youngest son, was designated to ask the question "Why is this night different from other nights?" At this point the host would retell the story of Israel's deliverance out of Egypt and the meaning of the various elements of the meal. As the host of the Last Supper, Jesus would have been the one who retold the story, later, the parallels between the Passover and the Last Supper which Jesus was establishing would be quite apparent.
4. The Four Words of the Last Supper.

Whereas some scholars have argued that the Pauline form is the most original, in general most scholars conclude that the oldest form is to be found in the Markan version. Among the more important reasons are: (1) the Markan account contains more Aramaisms than the Pauline account (e.g., "he took bread, and blessed, and broke it") and (2) it is easier to understand how the Pauline-Lukan version originated from the Markan form than vice versa. It would appear that the original form contained four elements or "words."

4.1. "This is My Body. "The addition of "which is [or "is given"] for you" in Luke and 1 Corinthians may be an interpretative comment to help explain the meaning of the bread for the believer. Yet even if these are not authentic words of Jesus, this comment is certainly implied and makes explicit what was implicit in Jesus' words. It is difficult to believe that the disciples did not interpret the "is" metaphorically. If asked "Where is the body of Jesus?" they would have pointed to Jesus rather than the bread. His frequent use of metaphorical language would have provided the context for understanding "is" non-literally. This metaphorical interpretation of "is" is supported by the fact that they are still called "bread and cup" (1 Cor 11:26-28), an unlikely reference if the elements had undergone transubstantiation.

In the first word Jesus states that he has come to give his body—himself as a person—on their behalf (cf. Phil 1:20; Rom 12:1; 1 Cor 9:27). Later, the church would understand more fully what this meant and realize that the bread represents the Incarnation when the "Word* [who] became flesh" bore our sins in his body (1 Pet 2:24) in order to achieve the redemption of the world.

4.2. "This Do in My Remembrance." The authenticity of these words have been denied, primarily because they are not found in Mark and Matthew. Yet, if Jesus saw his death as sealing a [new] covenant and in the context of the continual repetition of the Passover, it would have been quite natural for him to have said that this new and more significant deliverance of the people of God by his blood should likewise be continually remembered. Furthermore, the practice of the early church in regularly celebrating the Lord's Supper, and on more than just a yearly basis like the Passover, can best be understood as due to Jesus having said something like "Do this in my remembrance." The Passover had as its purpose that "[Israel might] remember the day when [she] came out of the land of Egypt" (Deut 16:3). Similarly Jesus' vicarious death and his inauguration of a new covenant was to be remembered in like manner.

Exactly what this remembrance involves is debated. Jeremias has suggested that it involved the disciples petitioning God to remember Jesus and come to his rescue. The last Supper thus focuses not on Jesus' mediation of humanity before God but rather on Jesus' followers seeking to intercede before God on Jesus' behalf. Another view is to understand this remembrance as a memorial in which the believer thinks back and reflects upon the death of Jesus (see Death of Jesus). A third way of understanding this term is to interpret it as meaning "to proclaim." Through the Last Supper the church proclaims the death of Jesus. This view finds support in 1 Corinthians 11:26. This tends to make the purpose of the Last Supper evangelistic in nature. The Last Supper, however, is first and foremost meant for the church. Probably the best interpretation of this command is to understand it as ordering the continual recapitulation or recounting of the passion and Parousia of Jesus Christ, even as the Passover meal recounted and represented the events of the Exodus (Ex 12:1-20).

4.3. "This Is My Blood of the Covenant Poured Out for Many." At the third cup of the Passover meal, after the traditional blessing, "Blessed be thou, Lord our God, King of the world, who has created the fruit of the vine . . ." or in lieu of it, Jesus said "this is my blood of the covenant poured out for many." The imagery recalls Exodus 24:8, where Moses seals the divine covenant by pouring half of the "blood of the covenant" upon the altar and sprinkling the other half on the people. The covenant blood of Exodus 24:8 is understood in the Targums Pseudo-Jonathan and Onkelos as being given to "atone" for the sins of the people—as being expiatory in nature. Similarly, the Matthean addition "for the forgiveness of sins" (Mt 26:28; see Forgiveness) makes explicit what is already implicit in the expression "blood of the covenant" (cf. Heb 9:20-22; 10:26-29).

Although not directly quoted, Jeremiah 31:31-34, with its reference to a "new" covenant, is also alluded to in this word. Even as the Qumran community spoke of a "new covenant" (CD 6:19; 8:21; 19:33-34; 20:1-2; 1 QpHab 2:1-4; 1 Q28b 3:25-26; 5:21-22; 1 Q34 3 ii 5-6), Jesus perceived his mission as having inaugurated a [new] covenant which would be sealed by his sacrificial death. Even if "new" was not expressly stated by Jesus, it is certainly implied. In this it recalls Jeremiah 31:34, which speaks of forgiveness of sins accompanying a new covenant. The centrality of forgiveness in this [new] covenant is also supported by the additional expression "which is poured out for many" found in the Markan and Matthean accounts. (The Lukan "for you" in 22:20 is most probably a liturgical change introduced to balance the "for you" of 22:19.) This recalls the expiatory and sacrificial selfgiving of the suffering servant of Isaiah 53:12 who bears the sin of many (see Servant of Yahweh). (It is illegitimate to interpret "many" as denoting a limited atonement, for the expression here means "transgressors"; i.e., it refers to all, as the synonymous parallelism in Is 53:12b-c clearly indicates.)

This word indicates that Jesus in referring to his "blood poured out" understood his death as sacrificial (Lev 17:11-14) and sealing a [new] covenant. It is difficult not to interpret this word along the lines of Mark 10:45; 1 Corinthians 15:3; 2 Corinthians 5:21; etc., where Jesus gives his life—pours out his blood—as a vicarious atonement for sinful humanity. This and the first word indicate the voluntary nature of Jesus' self-surrender, but this word adds that this self-surrender involves a sacrificial death which establishes a [new] covenant. It also seems clear that the words "this is my blood" would not have been interpreted literally by any of the disciples in light of the OT prohibition against drinking blood (cf. Lev 3:17; 7:26-27; 17:14; etc.), for if one remembers the difficulty Peter encountered in Acts 10:6-16 with regard to non-kosher meat, it is difficult to conclude that the disciples would have had no qualms drinking what they thought was real blood. The fact that there is not the slightest hesitation nor reservation mentioned in any of the accounts to drinking the cup indicates that they interpreted Jesus' words metaphorically. The cup—that is, the contents of the cup-symbolizes Jesus' death, his poured-out blood, shed as a sacrifice which seals a covenant.
4.4. "Until ... the Kingdom of God. " Even as the Passover celebration involved an anticipation and longing for the final day when Israel would share in the messianic banquet (Is 25:6-9; 53:13; cf. 55:1-2), so all four accounts of the Last Supper contain a word concerning the future. Though Luke's wording varies and is exceptional in its placement before the bread, the Synoptics bear unified witness to Jesus' words: "I say to you, I shall not in any way drink any longer from the fruit of the vine until that day when 1 drink it new in the kingdom of God." The Pauline word about the future does not come from Jesus' lips but is a comment from the apostle in which he says that when the church celebrates the Lord's Supper they "proclaim the Lord's death until he comes." In the Synoptics this word points triumphantly to the future messianic banquet when Jesus will eat once again with the disciples.

Elsewhere Jesus on various occasions referred to the joyous participation in the consummated kingdom as a sharing in the messianic banquet (Mt 8:11 par. Lk 13:29; Mt 5:6 par. Lk 6:21; Lk 12:35-38; Mk 7:24-30; Table Fellowship). The feeding of the 5,000 and the 4,000 were probably also understood by the Evangelists as proleptic participations of the Last Supper and the eschatological banquet (Mt 14:19 par. Mk 6:41 and Lk 9:16 [Jn 6:11] and Mt 15:36 par. Mk 8:6). Luke in fact heightens the allusion to this by separating the reference to the fish in 9:16. According to the Jewish tradition in Mekilta Exodus 12:42, Israel's future redemption would come on the night of the Passover. As a result the celebration of the Passover looked back to the greatest redemptive event of the OT and forward to the joyous anticipation of the coming of the messianic age. In a similar way Jesus in the Last Supper points his disciples to the greatest redemptive event of the NT, which is soon to be a past event, and to the arrival of the kingdom in glory* when he comes (1 Cor 11:26) and shares the messianic banquet with his followers (Mt 26:29; Mk 14:25; Lk 22:16).

Clearly, Jesus does not see his passion as a tragedy or error, but the crowning act of his ministry in which he pours out his blood as the once-for-all sacrifice which secures redemption "for many" and insures a glorious consummation in the future. Paul in his future word refers more specifically to the event which will bring about that consummation—the Parousia. Thus the Last Supper, while not itself the realization of the messianic banquet, is a proleptic experience of it, a kind of earnest, or first fruits, of that banquet.

4.5. Later Additions to the Last Supper. Within the four accounts of the Last Supper we find a number of liturgical and interpretative comments. This should not be surprising. While certainty is impossible, the following may be liturgical additions: "Take" (Mt 26:26; Mk 14:22); "eat" (Mt 26:26); "drink of it, all of you" (Mt 26:27); "and they all drank of it" (Mk 14:23); "In the same way also the cup, after Supper, saying," (1 Cor 11:25); "cup" (1 Cor 11:25; Lk 22:20); "For as often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you are proclaiming the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor 11:26). Some interpretative comments which may have been added to the account are: "which is for you" (Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24); "given" (Lk 22:19); "This do in my remembrance" (Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24; see 4.2 above); "new" [covenant] (Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25); "for the forgiveness of sins" (Mt 26:28). In all these instances the intention of Jesus is not altered, but the additions either make explicit what is perhaps only implicit or make the format of the sacrament more liturgically serviceable.

Several additional interpretative comments are found within the NT concerning the Last Supper. In 1 Corinthians 10:3-4 Paul gives a warning against the danger of assuming that mere participation in the Lord's Supper (and in Christian baptism, 1 Cor 10:1-2) guarantees the participant a favorable standing with God (cf. also Lk 13:26). Paul clearly rejects a crass sacramental view of the Lord's Supper. As in the case of circumcision, the Lord's Supper (and baptism) is of value when accompanied by faith* and obedience (Rom 2:25). There is also a specific warning concerning the danger of partaking of the Lord's Supper "in an unworthy manner" (1 Cor 11:27-32).

5. The Celebration of the Supper.

Within Acts we find several references to the "breaking of bread" (Acts 2:42, 46; 20:7,11; 24:30). Although it is debated whether this refers to a celebration derived from the Last Supper, it is clear that the Evangelist understood it this way. This is evident from Luke's use of the expression "breaking of bread" (Lk 22:19). It is further supported by the fact that in Acts 20:7 we find the breaking of bread taking place in the context of church worship* on the first day of the week. Thus for Luke these references to the "breaking of bread" are understood as the fulfillment of Jesus' command to "do this in remembrance of me" found in his Gospel. To interpret them as simply ordinary meals, or even as "love feasts," would contradict Luke's normal practice of showing how the church in Acts carried out Jesus' teachings. Probably the breaking of bread normally occurred in the context of a love-feast but the similarity in wording with the Last Supper ("breaking bread") indicates that what is most important for Luke is the celebration of the Supper. (The only difficulty with this understanding is Acts
In the early church the celebration of the Supper was almost immediately separated from the Passover, for the "breaking of bread" was practiced far more frequently than once a year. There are indications that it was celebrated weekly (Acts 20:7,11; 1 Cor 16:2) and even daily (Acts 2:46-47). No rate of frequency, however, is prescribed within the NT. In the earliest period of the church the Supper was celebrated in connection with a "love feast" (Jude 12; Acts 2:42, 46; 1 Cor 11:20-22, 33-34). It may be that Acts 2:42 should be interpreted, "They were continuing in the teaching of the apostles, and in fellowship [the love-feast], the breaking of bread [the Supper] and prayers." Likewise, Acts 2:46 might be read, "and breaking bread [the Supper] in their homes, they partook of food with glad and generous hearts [the love feast]." This practice stemmed from the fact that Jesus' Last Supper was associated with a meal (Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25). Soon, however, it became completely separate due most probably to such problems as Paul mentions in 1 Corinthians 11:20-22, 33-34—where Paul refers to it as the Lord's Supper (kyriakos deipnon, 1 Cor 11:20)—and by the middle of the second century that separation was complete.

The Lord's Supper contains a two-dimensional focus. It recounts the passion of the Son of man (see Son of Man) and his sacrificial death by which he seals a new covenant for humanity. One cannot celebrate the Lord's Supper without looking backward to the cross and the suffering of Christ, our Passover. As a result a certain pathos and sadness is present at this celebration. But there is a forward-looking dimension which does not permit the Lord's Supper to become simply a morbid recalling of the passion. Believers "proclaim the Lord's death until he comes." Since the final dimension of the Supper looks forward to the messianic banquet, the Lord's Supper is not simply practiced; it is celebrated in faith. In this celebration the church believes, hopes and sings "Marana tha—Come, Lord Jesus" (1 Cor 16:22; Rev 22:20) and awaits the consummation when faith turns to sight at the table of the Lord.

LAW

What impact did the coming of Jesus the Messiah (see Christ) and the establishment through him of the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) have on the authority and applicability of the Mosaic Law? The question is at the heart of the Gospels. It played a critical role not only in Jesus' disputes with various Jewish groups but also in the development of the early church's self-understanding as followers of Jesus sought to define the relationship between the church* and Israel.*

Jesus, living in the overlap between the old covenant and the new, is generally obedient to the Mosaic Law, but at the same time he makes clear that he has sovereign rights both to interpret and to set aside that Law. On this basis he criticizes the developing oral Law for its focus on a casuistic literalness that denied the very heart and purpose of the Law. It is in the dual command (see Commandment) to love* God* and neighbor that Jesus found the heart of the Law, and he used these basic demands to interpret and apply the Law in accordance with its author's intention. But Jesus was not simply a great expositor of the Law. What is most characteristic of the Gospels is Jesus' claim to be the Lord* of the Law itself. Jesus manifests this claim in his implicit abrogation of several commandments within the Law and in his independent yet authoritative proclamation of God's will for his followers. As Messiah and Son of God (see Son of God), Jesus stands superior to the Law. Nevertheless, Jesus never attacks the Law and, indeed, asserts its enduring validity. But it is only as taken up into Jesus' teaching, and thus fulfilled, that the Law retains its validity. The Law comes to those living on this side of the cross only through the filter of its fulfillment in Christ the Lord.

The general sketch drawn in the last paragraph is reproduced in each of the Gospels, though with considerable differences in clarity and emphasis. Mark highlights Jesus' abrogation of ritual aspects of the Law, though he shows little interest in Jesus' ethical teachings. Matthew writes his Gospel for a community deeply concerned about the relation of Israel and church and, consequently, about the relation of the Law to Jesus' teaching. He therefore includes more of the teaching of Jesus on this issue than the other Evangelists, showing how Jesus both endorses the Law and surpasses it. Luke in his own way strikes a similar balance, commending the piety of those who follow the law while showing that the continuing validity of the Law lies mainly in its prophetic aspects. John's stance is polemical, as he puts Jesus and his claims on a collision course with the law and its institutions. Even here, however, the point is not so much that Jesus abrogates the Law as to show that as Son of God he replaces it.

1. Introduction.

"law" is the standard translation of the Greek word nomos. This word occurs thirty-one times in the Gospels, always in the singular, and with two possible exceptions—both in John 19:7—the word denotes the body of commandments given by God to the people of Israel through Moses. Thus the law can be called both "the law of the Lord" (Lk 2:23-24, 39) as well as "the law of Moses" (Lk 2:22; Jn 7:23; cf. Jn 1:17, "the law came through Moses," and John 1:45, "Moses wrote in the law"). On five occasions the law is linked with "the prophets" (Mt. 5:17; 7:12; 11:13; 22:40; Lk 16:16; Jn 1:45—there is Jewish precedent for such a combination: cf. 4 Macc 18:10) and once with both the prophets and "the psalms" (Lk 24:44). In most of these texts nomos refers to the Pentateuch, and the whole phrase simply denotes "the Scriptures." The Gospel writers also refer to the Law with the words "commandment" (entolē) (singular: Mt 15:3 par. Mk 7:9; Mt 22:36 par. Mk 12:28; Mt 22:38 par. Mk 12:31; Mk 7:8; 10:5; Lk 23:56; plural: Mt 5:19; 19:17 par. Mk 10:19 and 11 18:20; Mt 22:40; Lk 1:6) and "decree" (dikaiōma) (Lk 1:6); or with a reference simply to "Moses" (Mt 8:4 par. Mk 1:44 and Lk 5:14; Mt 19:7 par. Mk 10:3; Mt 19:8 par. Mk 10:4; Mt 22:24 par. Mk 12:19 and Lk 20:28; Mk 7:10; Jn 7:22 [bis]: cf. "Moses and the prophets" in Lk 16:29, 31). On the other hand, graphe ("Scripture") is never used to refer to the Mosaic Law alone, while the verb graphō ("write": e.g., "it is written") is only rarely so used (Mk 10:5; 12:19; Lk 2:23; 10:26; 20:28; Jn 1:45; 8:17; 10:34).

The virtual identification of "Law" with "law of Moses" in the Gospels reflects OT usage and the Jewish milieu, in both of which the law of Moses, the Torah (tôrâ), plays a central role. Obedience to the Law was not the means by which the people of Israel attained their covenant relationship with God. It was their response to the gracious initiative of God, a response both appropriate as a means of thanking and glorifying the God who had chosen them and necessary as the means by which the promises attached to the covenant would be actualized (see e.g., Deut 28:1-2, 9; 30:1-10, 15-16). In a development predicted in the Pentateuch (Deut 30:15-22) and identified by the prophets, Israel failed to obey the law and so broke the terms of God's covenant. Nevertheless, God affirmed his continuing faithfulness to his people and promises, announcing that he would establish a new covenant with his people, a covenant through which God's law would be "written on the heart" (Jer 31:31-34) and through which those very hearts would be transformed so as to make them obedient to the Lord (Ezek 36:24-28).

This pessimism about the Law did not take root in early Judaism.* While generalizations about the Jewish people as a whole are dangerous and usually misleading, it is clear that the most important Jewish groups in Jesus' day gave to the Mosaic Law a place of central importance in the life of the people and in their relationship to the Lord. Some of these groups, most notably the Pharisees,* sought to aid the Jews in their obedience to God's Law by adding to the written law an oral tradition which would apply the written Law to the new situations faced by Jews. This development cannot be traced in detail, but it was certainly well underway in Jesus' day, as is clear from his reference to the "traditions of the elders" (Mt 15:2 par. Mk 7:3). Fueling this development were two central postulates: that the Jew must obey God, and that the complete guide for that obedience is to be found in the Torah. The growth of an authoritative tradition such as this, which could, at a latter date, be called tôrâ (e.g., b. Šabb. 31a), complicates the discussion of Jesus and the Law." It is necessary, for instance, to determine whether Jesus' critical attitude toward certain commandments and customs embodies criticism of the written law of Moses or of the oral traditions of the Pharisees.

2. Jesus.

From what the Gospels tell us of Jesus' behavior, he was generally obedient to the Law of Moses. He attends the major feasts* in Jerusalem, pays the half-shekel temple tax* (Mt 17:24-27), wears the prescribed tassel on his robe (Mt 9:20; cf. Num 15:38-41) and, whatever may be said about his disciples' behavior or his teaching, never clearly violates the Sabbath.* It is only in the case of Jesus' contact with unclean people (see Clean and Unclean) in his healing* ministry (e.g., touching a leper [Mt 8:3 par. Mk 1:41 and Lk 5:13]) that he could be considered in violation of the Law of Moses. Even in this case, however, the unusual nature of Jesus' healing activities makes it difficult to identify a clear-cut violation of the Law.

The situation is certainly different with respect to the oral traditions of the Jews. Jesus deliberately associates with people considered by strict Jews to be unclean (the tax collectors and sinners*; cf. Mt 9:10-13 par. Mk 2:15-17 and Lk 5:29-32) and "works" on the Sabbath by healing people who are in no danger of losing their lives (Mk 3:1-6 par. Mt. 12:9-14 and Lk 6:6-11; Lk 13:10-17; 14:1-6; Jn 5:247; 9:141). It is not, however, that Jesus consistently flaunts the traditions, for he attends the synagogue on the Sabbath, and displays habits at mealtime and at prayer* that are consistent with the traditions. What we have, then, is a Jesus who does not go out of his way to break the traditions of his day but at the same time makes clear that he considers himself free to ignore them if need demands.

While we can conclude from Jesus' behavior that he did not endorse the "traditions of the elders" as authoritative, his general conformity to the written Law allows no clear conclusions. Did Jesus obey the Law because he considered it to be eternally valid? Or did he obey it as "old covenant" Law, valid only until his death* and resurrection* should inaugurate a new covenant? Or was there a principle that Jesus applied to determine the validity of different commandments within the Law?

2.1. Love and the Law. The principle most often cited in this regard is the love command. Jesus singled out love for God and love for neighbor as the two great commandments (Mt 22:34-40 par. Mk 12:28-34; Lk 10:25-28; cf. Jn 13:31-35), going so far as to assert that "all the Law and the prophets depend" on them (Mt 22:40). Taken with Jesus' pronouncement of the "golden rule" (Mt 7:12), his insistence that "mercy"* is more important than "sacrifice" (Mt 9:13; 12:7) and his humanitarian approach to the Sabbath (Mk 2:27; cf. Mt 12:34 par. Mk 2:25-26 and Lk 6:34; Mt 12:12 par. Mk 3:4 and Lk 6:9; Lk 13:15-16), his highlighting of the love command suggests that it plays a significant role in his understanding of the Law. But what is its role? Does love function to determine when the Law is to be obeyed? What laws are to be obeyed? And what is the meaning and intent of the Law?

Only this last role of the demand of love, that of determining the meaning and intent of the Law, has any clear basis in Jesus' teaching. Never does he suggest that he or his followers are free on the basis of love to disobey an authoritative commandment of Scripture. Nor does he dismiss the validity of commandments according to whether or not they are loving. But Jesus does appeal to love in elucidating the meaning and application of the Law. In contrast to the scribes,* who insisted on literal and scrupulous observance of the commandments, Jesus sought out the intention behind the commandments and understood their meaning and the way they were to be obeyed in light of this intention (see Westerholm). And it is to love for God and love for others that Jesus appeals in clarifying God's intention in the Law. This is what he means by claiming that "all the Law and the prophets" (i.e., the OT in its commanding aspect; cf. Mt 5:17 and 7:12) "depend" (krematai) on the commands of love for God (Deut 6:5) and love for neighbor (Lev 19:18). Jesus is not here teaching that love replaces the Law or that love shows how we are to obey the Law. Rather, as the greatest commandments within the Law, they are the touchstone by which the intention and meaning of all the other commandments must be understood. Several incidents reveal this role of the love commands in Jesus' interpretation of the Law.

When Jesus defends his befriending of tax collectors and sinners by appealing to Hosea 6:6 (Mt 9:13), his point is not that the moral Law ("mercy") takes precedence over the ceremonial Law ("sacrifice"), nor that being merciful to people is more important than obeying the Law, but that one has failed to understand God's intention in the Law if rigid adherence to oral tradition (i.e., prohibition of association with the "unclean") is retained at the expense of showing God's compassion on sinners.

The situation is similar in Matthew 12:7, where Jesus cites Hosea 6:6 to defend his disciples from the charge of Sabbath-breaking: they are "guiltless" (anaitios) because their plucking of grain is not contrary to God's intention in giving the Sabbath command. In the same incident Jesus also defends the disciples by citing the action of David and his followers in 1 Samuel 21:1-6. As they were fleeing from the wrath of Saul, David and his confederates ate the bread of the presence, "which is not Lawful for any but the priests to eat" (Mt 12:34 par. Mk 2:25-26 and Lk 6:3-4). Jesus, it is sometimes alleged, cites this incident to show that human need takes precedence over obedience to the Law. But only Matthew even mentions the fact that the disciples were hungry. And, in any case, their need could not have been great—surely Jesus does not encourage disobedience to the Law to meet casual wants and desires! Rather, Jesus' purpose is quite different: by comparing his disciples with David's followers, he also compares himself to David, suggesting that if, in serving David, his followers were justified in doing what was "illegal," so much the more were Jesus' own disciples justified in breaking the Sabbath halakah (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) in their service of the greater Son of David (see Son of David). The focus is on christology, not on the interpretation of the Sabbath command. This christological interpretation is reinforced in Matthew by the comparison that immediately follows between Jesus and the Temple* (Mt 12:5-6).

In Mark's Gospel, however, Jesus' reference to 1 Samuel 21:1-6 is followed by the strongly humanitarian statement "the Sabbath was made for humankind, not humankind for the Sabbath" (2:27). Some have found christology here also, arguing that "humankind" (anthropos) is a mistranslation of an Aramaic expression by which Jesus referred to himself as the Son of man (see Son of Man). There is no basis for this, however, and the saying fits well with similar pronouncements of Jesus such as: "it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath" (Mt 12:12; cf. Mk 3:4; Lk 6:9). Again, however, Jesus is not claiming that one can break the Sabbath command when human needs dictate, but that the Sabbath command itself must be so understood as to include this basic purpose in its promulgation. The Sabbath is truly obeyed only when its intention to aid human beings is recognized and factored into one's behavior. That is why, rather than being a violation of the Law, Jesus' Sabbath-Day healing of a woman was a true fulfillment of that Law ("it was necessary" [edei] that she be healed on the Sabbath: Lk 13:16).

For Jesus, then, love for God and for others, being basic to God's intention in giving the Law, must always be considered in interpreting the meaning of that Law.
2.2. Jesus’ Use of the Law in His Ethical Teaching. The relatively few occasions on which Jesus cites the OT Law in formulating his own demands is revealing of the independent authority with which Jesus speaks. True, Jesus believes that his teaching stands in continuity with the OT demand (see, e.g., Mt 5:17 and 7:12). And he occasionally cites the OT in his own teaching (see Old Testament in the Gospels). But most of these citations come in conversation with Jewish opponents or inquirers in which the OT is appealed to because of its relevance to their situation. Jesus' teaching about the dual command of love is a case in point. He highlights these commandments in response to a question about which is the greatest commandment (Mt 22:36 par. Mk 12:28). Without minimizing the importance of these commandments, it is significant that in John's Gospel the commandment to love one another is a new commandment, authorized by Jesus without reference to the OT (13:31-35). Jesus also appeals to the prophets to establish priorities within the Law (Hos 6:6 in Mt 9:13 and 12:7; Mic 6:8 in Mt 23:23 [cf. Lk 11:42]).

Similarly, when questioned about the legitimacy of divorce (see Marriage and Divorce), Jesus cites Genesis 1:27 and 2:24 to correct the common over-interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1-4 (Mt 19:3-12 par. Mk 10:2-10). Some have thought that Jesus is following a rabbinic procedure by which two apparently contradictory statements within the Law could be harmonized. But rather than harmonizing the two, Jesus appeals to one over against the other. The original intention of God expressed in the Genesis texts is elevated over the Mosaic command which was given, Jesus says, because of "hardness of heart" (see Hardness of Heart). Here Jesus appeals to the OT teaching about the origin of marriage as authoritative for his followers. It is not clear, however, that this should be considered as an appeal to the Law. For Jesus' careful distinction between what God had said (in Genesis) and what Moses had said (in Deuteronomy) suggests that he cites Genesis not as part of "the Law," in the sense of the Mosaic command, but as a scriptural and hence authoritative statement of God's intention for marriage. Here Jesus makes an important distinction, one that runs counter to the tendency of Judaism in his day: the distinction between the books of Moses as Scripture, and the Law of Moses that takes up a large portion of those books.

Another polemical use of the Law appears in Jesus’ debate with the Pharisees over ritual defilement. Jesus defends his disciples' behavior in this matter by calling into question the "traditions of the elders" generally (Mt 15:3-6 par. Mk 7:8-13). Jesus brands these traditions as contrary to the Law they purport to expound and apply. From this we can conclude that Jesus expected the Jews of his day to observe the commandments under which they lived—beyond that we cannot go.

Slightly different is Jesus' rehearsal of decalog commandments when a young man asks him how he may attain eternal life* (Mt 19:16-22 par. Mk 10:17-22 and Lk 18:18-23). Here, it could be argued, Jesus makes OT commandments basic to his own ethical demands. But such a conclusion would be too hasty. For Jesus imposes these commands not on a follower but on a seeker after eternal life. Does Jesus then view obedience to the Law as a means of salvation? This is possible, although we would then want to question whether Jesus considered it possible for any human being to render an obedience adequate to that end. For the young man, after claiming to have observed all the commandments cited by Jesus, is still seen to be short of entrance into the kingdom. But it is also possible that Jesus cites the commandments simply to initiate a discussion and to draw out this young man, and that he is not teaching that eternal life can be gained by obedience to the Law. In any case, it is significant that the climax of the narrative is Jesus' demand that the young man "follow me." This has been viewed as Jesus' further exposition of the real meaning of the commandments, but we question whether following Jesus in discipleship can be considered an exposition of any Mosaic command. Rather, whatever the role played by the commandments of the Law, it is Jesus' own demand that is crucial here. Jesus goes beyond the OT demand: it is following him, not obedience to the Law, that is the door into the kingdom of God.

It is clear, then, that Jesus' direct use of the OT in his ethical teaching is minimal (see Ethics of Jesus). Most of the references occur in polemical contexts where Jesus may be doing no more than assuming the reference point of his opponent. This does not necessarily mean that Jesus did not consider the OT Law to be relevant for the new age that was dawning through his ministry and work. He may simply have assumed its continuing validity. Still, what is impressive in Jesus' teaching is the way in which he taught directly, and without reference to any other authority,* what it was that God was demanding of his people. The Mosaic Law, if not discarded, is generally ignored—and this signals an important shift from both the OT and the Judaism of Jesus' day.

2.3. Abrogation of the Law? We have seen that Jesus does not generally use the Law to formulate his ethics. But does he ever go so far as to pronounce invalid the Law or commandments within the Law?
2.3.1. Clean and Unclean. When Jesus' disciples violated the scribal tradition about hand-washing, he defended them in two ways (Mt 15:1-20 par. Mk 7:1-23). First he criticized the scribal tradition generally, branding it a "human tradition" (Mk 7:8) that interferes with true worship* of and obedience to God. He cites as an example the situation in which the scribes would insist that a person perform a vow, even if that vow were taken selfishly to avoid giving due honor to one's parents (see Family). Some have seen here a conflict between two parts of the written Law—the command to honor oaths and the command to honor parents—but the text makes clear that the conflict is rather between the "commandment of God" and "human tradition." This text suggests, then, that Jesus did not endorse the developing oral Law of the Pharisees. But Jesus' second line of defense goes further. In enunciating the principle that "there is nothing outside a person which by going into a person can defile them" (Mk 7:15; cf. Mt 15:11), Jesus casts doubt on the continuing validity of the entire ritual body of laws in the OT. Certainly, this is how Mark understands him: "Thus he declared all foods to be clean" (7:19). Doubt has been cast on the authenticity of this saying of Jesus, it being argued that the debates in the early church over this matter are hard to understand if Jesus had spoken so clearly on the issue. But Jesus' almost parabolic saying would hardly have been sufficient to settle the matter, and Mark's parenthetical interpretation reflects a later, clearer perspective. The contrast in this pericope between Jesus' upholding of one commandment—to honor parents—and his effective abrogation of others—concerning unclean foods—raises the possibility that Jesus distinguished between the so-called moral and the ceremonial Law. There are hints of such a distinction in the Gospels, in Jesus' stress on the "weightier matters of the Law" (Mt 23:23) and in his picking up the prophetic focus on inner obedience. Nevertheless, the distinction was unknown in the Judaism of Jesus' day, and we would have expected him to make the distinction much clearer had it been fundamental to his assessment of the OT Law. Moreover, as we will see, Jesus' varying pronouncements about the Law cannot be fit into a neat distinction between the moral and the ceremonial.

2.3.2. The Sabbath. The centrality of the Sabbath for Jewish piety is reflected in the numerous conflicts between Jesus and the Jews over its observance: the Gospels record six separate incidents. Did Jesus abrogate the Sabbath command, as some claim? Answering this question is complicated by the need to distinguish between the Mosaic Sabbath requirements and the extensive traditional regulations developed by the scribes in an effort to regulate Sabbath observance. The OT prohibits work on the Sabbath, but gives few details about what constitutes work. It is this ambiguity that the scribal tradition seeks to clarify. Certainly Jesus and his disciples violated the scribal Sabbath regulations: by plucking grain (Mt 12:1-8 par. Mk 2:23-28 and Lk 6:1-5) and by healing people whose lives were not in danger (Mt 12:9-14 par. Mk 3:1-6 and Lk 6:6-11; Lk 13:10-17; 14:1-6; Jn 5:2-47; 9:1-41). Neither of these activities is a clear violation of the Mosaic Sabbath rules, although Jesus' healing ministry is difficult to categorize. The most that can be said is that his initiative in healing on the Sabbath, rooted in theological conviction—"it was necessary" for Jesus to heal on the Sabbath (Lk 13:16)—stretches the Sabbath commandment. But we have no evidence that Jesus ever himself violated, or approved of his disciples violating, the written Sabbath commandment.

Jesus' teaching, however, is another matter. We have already discussed (see 2.1. above) Jesus' focus on humanitarian concerns in defending his Sabbath behavior. Some think that Jesus here abrogates, or at least relativizes, the Sabbath by putting human need over observance of the command. As we have argued, this is not the case: Jesus' humanitarian emphasis is not intended to abrogate but to define the Sabbath command. More telling is Jesus' christological defense for his Sabbath activity. He justifies the disciples' grain plucking through a comparison of himself with David (Mt 12:3-4 par. Mk 2:25-26 and Lk 6:3-4) and the Temple (Mt 12:5-6). He claims the Father's own right to continue "working" on the Sabbath (Jn 5:17-18). And in a succinct and clear statement of his position vis-a-vis the Sabbath, he claims "the Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath" (Mt 12:8 par. Mk 2:28 and Lk 6:5). Here Jesus claims superiority over the Sabbath, including the right to interpret transform or even abrogate this central Mosaic institution. Nevertheless, Jesus never actually uses this authority to abrogate the Sabbath, and whether the early church did so on the basis of Jesus' authority is another question.

2.3.3. Divorce. We have noted that Jesus responds to a question about the grounds for divorce by citing Genesis 1:27 and 2:24 (Mt 19:3-12 par. Mk 10:2-12; cf. Lk 16:18). He thereby bypasses the then-current debate about the interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1-4 by using God's intention in creation to call into question the entire matter of an allowance for divorce. It is true that according to Matthew (19:9; cf. 5:31-32) Jesus' position is not far from that of his near-contemporary Shammai, and from Deuteronomy 24:1-4 as well. But what is important for our purposes is the logic with which Jesus arrives at his position. The Mosaic provision for divorce is simply swept aside as a concession to "hardness of heart." What is unclear is whether Jesus thinks that the inauguration of the kingdom through his redemptive work will take away that hardness of heart or whether he considers this condition to be one that will only disappear in the next life. The contrast between the creation intention of God and the Mosaic provision ("but from the beginning it was not so") favors the former. If this is so, Jesus questions the tacit approval of divorce within the Mosaic legislation.

2.3.4. The Antitheses. Matthew 5:17-48 is the most significant passage in the Gospels for determining the relationship between Jesus and the Mosaic Law (see Sermon on the Mount). Verses 17-20 will be considered below (see 2.4.); here we focus on verses 21-48 in which Jesus six times compares his teaching with what had been told to "the ancients." Many scholars are convinced that Jesus abrogates Mosaic commands in at least some of these comparisons.

The introductory formulae vary, but appear to be variations of a single basic formula, seen fully in verses 21 and 33: "you have heard that it was said to the ancients (tots archaios)... but I say to you." The dative lois archaios has occasionally been understood in an ablatival sense ("by the ancients"), but is probably a pure dative (as we have translated it). Jesus' reference is probably to the generation that received the Law at Sinai, although this does not exclude the possibility that oral traditions are included in the reference: for it was taught that the "oral Law" had also been given at Sinai (cf. m. 'Ahoi. 1:1-2). Similarly, the "you have heard" refers to the hearing of the Law read in the synagogue,* a reading that often incorporated traditional interpretations (see Targum). The formula in itself, then, does not enable us to decide whether Jesus is citing the Mosaic Law per se or the Mosaic Law as interpreted and expanded by the scribes. Nor, while the nomenclature has become standard, is "antitheses" necessarily the best way to describe these six comparisons. The grammar allows at least three different nuances: (1) "you have heard, but I (in contrast to that) say to you"; (2) "you have heard, but I (in addition to that) say to you" or (3) "you have heard, and I (in agreement with that) say to you."

No abrogation of the Law occurs in the first two comparisons (Mt 5:21-26 and 27-30), but it is harder to know whether Jesus is expounding the true meaning of the commandments, deepening the commandments by extending them from the level of action to the level of attitude, or simply juxtaposing his own teaching with that of the Law. Against the first alternative, however, is the lack of clear evidence that the Decalogue prohibitions of murder and adultery included prohibitions of, respectively, anger and lust as well. Jesus, while not necessarily going beyond the Mosaic Law and the scribal teaching (both of which prohibit anger and lust), goes beyond the actual commandments he cites.

Jesus' teaching about divorce in verses 31-32 is sometimes taken as part of the second comparison, but the abbreviated introductory formula in verse 31 suggests rather that it be considered a separate, third comparison. In our earlier discussion of Jesus' teaching on divorce (see 2.3.3. above), we noted that Matthew's exceptive clause (v. 32: "except on the ground of unchastity") has the effect of bringing Jesus' teaching fairly closely into line with the Mosaic allowance. What effect this has on the actual commandment Jesus cites—(viz.) that a person who divorces his wife give her a "bill of divorcement"—is not clear, but it is probably stretching the matter to speak of an abrogation of the commandment here. Nevertheless, Jesus' teaching that an improper remarriage constitutes adultery goes beyond the OT. Clearly, Jesus is not simply expounding the Mosaic legislation regarding divorce; nor does the idea of deepening fit the circumstances very well. He goes beyond the Law in the seriousness with which he considers improper remarriages, and his basic agreement with Deuteronomy 24:14 over the appropriate grounds for divorce and remarriage is, as it were, incidental to the central point

The fourth thesis cited by Jesus as a point of departure for his own teaching is an accurate summary of the Mosaic requirements regarding oaths and vows (v. 33; see Oaths and Swearing). Oaths and vows were not carefully distinguished in the OT, both involving a pledge of truthfulness in connection with God. The rabbis reluctantly accepted the need for oaths and regulated their use, but the Essenes, who often had stricter requirements than the Pharisees (or the rabbis), apparently did prohibit most oaths (see Josephus J.W. 2.135). Jesus' requirement seems absolute: "do not swear at all" (v. 34). But there is considerable debate about this, for the following delineation of examples appears to reflect the casuistic debates about oaths in the scribal tradition (see m. Šeb.; m. Sanh. 3:2; t. Ned. 1). This background, taken with the undoubted presence of hyperbole in Matthew 5, may suggest that Jesus simply intends to encourage absolute truthfulness (see v. 37). Another possibility is that Jesus prohibits voluntary oaths. If Jesus is indeed prohibiting all oaths, then a technical abrogation of the Mosaic command requiring an oath in the court (Ex 22:10-13) occurs (Meier). But the uncertainty about Jesus' intention should make us cautious about claiming an abrogation of the Law here. In any case, we see again that Jesus is neither expounding nor deepening the Law but juxtaposing his own (perhaps more radical) demand with that of the Law.
Of the six antitheses there is most agreement among scholars that the fifth, relating to the lex talionis, abrogates the Mosaic Law. But this is not at all clear. The law of equivalent compensation is stated in three places in the Mosaic Law (Ex 21:23-25; Lev 24:20; Deut 19:21), and in each case it has the purpose not of justifying but of restraining private retribution by establishing an equitable judicial guideline to which all could be held. Jesus does not question, nor does he uphold, this policy. He simply demands that his followers not use it as an excuse for retaliation. Jesus certainly goes beyond the demands of the Law, but he does not contradict it.

The final quotation in Matthew 5 differs from the others in including a clause not found in the OT— that one is to "hate one's enemy" (v. 43). It has sometimes been argued that this requirement is a fair extrapolation from the fact that the scope of the love command (Lev 19:18) is restricted to the fellow-Israelite (rē') and from the frequent OT expressions of hostility to Israel's enemies. But this conclusion is not warranted, and we must consider the command to "hate your enemy" not as an OT requirement, but as a reflection of current Jewish teaching in some circles (perhaps associated with the Essenes of Qumran). Jesus does not, therefore, abrogate Mosaic Law by requiring love for one's enemy, but he does ask his followers to do something that the Mosaic Law had not asked the people of Israel to do: love one's enemy. Once more, then, Jesus' teaching transcends without clearly revoking the OT Law.

We find, then, that only one possible abrogation of the Law—that having to do with divorce and remarriage—occurs in the antitheses. In the others Jesus' teaching is juxtaposed with the Mosaic commands in a way that does not fit either of the popular categories: exposition or deepening. The dominant note, hinted at in the emphatic "I say to you" and recognized by the crowds at the end of the Sermon (7:28-29), is the independent authority of Jesus, who presumes to announce God's will for life in the kingdom without support from any other source (see Amen).

Jesus, then, abrogated some Mosaic Laws—the food Laws and possibly the divorce provisions—but this is not the dominant motif in his teaching. Jesus does not so much oppose the Law as claim to transcend it He is the "Lord of the Sabbath" and claims the right to determine God's will without reference to the Law.

2.4. Fulfillment of the Law. The best-known statement of Jesus with respect to the Law comes in Matthew 5:17: "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the prophets: I have not come to abolish, but to fulfill them." To understand this claim, we must consider its following context (Mt 5:18-19) and the partial Lukan parallel to this context (Lk 16:16-17).

In Luke 16:16 Jesus announces a fundamental shift in salvation history: "The Law and the prophets were until John: since then the good news of the kingdom of God is preached, and every one enters it violently." Especially in light of Luke 16:17 Jesus cannot mean that the significance of the OT is terminated; he must mean that John's coming has signaled a fundamental shift in the role and importance of "the Law and the prophets." Matthew's parallel (11:13) adds an important nuance: "the Law and the prophets prophesied until John." Here Jesus claims that the entire OT has a prophetic aspect, that the Law itself has some kind of forward-looking element. This reference furnishes an important clue to the Matthean viewpoint on the Law and helps us unravel the meaning of Matthew 5:17.

Study of Matthew 5:17-19 is complicated by the complex and debated tradition-history of the verses. According to one viewpoint for instance, each verse is to be assigned to a different stratum of the early Christian community, with none of them embodying the teaching of Jesus himself. However, while the verses may indeed come from different sources (e.g., v. 18 may be from Q; cf. Lk 16:17) and while Matthew was undoubtedly responsible for their final arrangement in his Gospel, there is no compelling reason to deny their authenticity.

The key word in this paragraph is the word "fulfill" (plerōō, 5:17). Its interpretation becomes the basis for, or expression of, divergent general interpretations of Jesus and the Law. We speak of law because in Matthean usage the expression "Law and the prophets" (cf. Mt 7:12 and 22:40) and the parallels "Law" (v. 18) and "commandments" (v. 19) refer to the commanding aspect of the OT. The clear connection with the comparisons of 5:21-48 also indicates that Jesus is focusing on the relationship between his teaching and the Law. With these qualifications in view, the following are the most important interpretations of "fulfill": (1) Jesus fulfills the Law by confirming its validity (presupposing that the Aramaic word qûm lies behind pleroō; Branscomb); (2) Jesus fulfills the Law by adding to it (based on the alleged parallel to Mt 5:17 in b. Šabb. 116b; Jeremias); (3) Jesus fulfills the Law by bringing out its full, originally intended meaning (Bahnsen); (4) Jesus fulfills the Law by extending its demands (Davies); (5) Jesus fulfills the Law by teaching the eschatological will of God which the Law anticipated (Banks, Meier).

Methodologically, we should look for the meaning of plerōō by referring to Matthew’s usage rather than to an alleged Hebrew or Aramaic original (see Languages of Palestine). For there is no way of confirming what that Semitic original may have been, and there is ample evidence that Matthew himself, while reproducing Jesus' own intention, is responsible for the wording of the saying. The closest syntactical parallel to Matthew 5:17 is 3:15, where plerōō is also used in the active voice and is followed by a direct object. Focusing on this parallel, Ljungman argues that "fulfilling" the Law must refer to Jesus' fulfillment of the Scripture as the means of bringing in eschatological* righteousness (injustice and Righteousness). But the most distinctive use of plerōō in Matthew comes in the introductions to his eleven so-called formula quotations, most of which are unique to his Gospel. In these texts Matthew announces the fulfillment of a text, event or prophecy in the life of Jesus. The importance of this word in these contexts, combined with Matthew's striking reference to the Law as "prophesying" (11:13), makes this prophetic use of plerōō the most likely source for our interpretation of Matthew 5:17. In a way analogous to his fulfilling Israel's history in his own departure from Egypt (cf. Mt 2:15) and his fulfilling the prophets' predictions in his life, Jesus also fulfills Israel's Law in his teaching. The entire OT, in all its parts, is viewed as the promise component in a promise-fulfillment scheme of salvation history, and the Law cannot be excluded from this scheme.

We conclude, then, that the fifth alternative listed above—the eschatological will of God—is the best interpretation of Matthew 5:17. In response to rumors about his Law-negating stance, Jesus assures his listeners that his teaching stands in continuity with the OT Law. His teaching does not abolish the Law, but brings it to its intended eschatological climax. This view of Matthew 5:17 fits well with the antitheses that follow and which furnish specific examples of Jesus' fulfillment of the Law (5:2148). For, as we have seen (2.3.4. above), what Jesus does with the Law in these six comparisons cannot all be explained by recourse to any single concept such as exposition or deepening. What is common to each is a juxtaposition of OT teaching with Jesus' own, a teaching that transcends the OT teaching. Understanding "fulfillment" in the broad, salvation-historical sense that we have defended enables 5:17 to function as a heading to these comparisons, as indeed it was apparently intended to do.
Can this interpretation be reconciled with the context of Matthew 5:18-19? At first sight no stronger endorsement of the eternal applicability of every commandment of the Mosaic Law could be envisaged than what we have here. Agreeing with this assessment are those scholars who think that Matthew 5:19, or 5:18-19 together, is a creation of a conservative Jewish group within the early church. Matthew, they argue, has inserted this material into the present context in order to correct it. While it may well be that Matthew has been responsible for juxtaposing verses 18-19 with verse 17, we are not so sure that we must deny these sayings to Jesus. Can these verses be read in a way compatible with Jesus' teaching about the Law elsewhere in Matthew's Gospel? Attempts to avoid the conclusion that Jesus here endorses the continuing applicability of every "jot and tittle" of the Law, and so to reconcile 5:18-19 with 5:17 and 21-48, focus on three issues: the scope of the two heōs ("until") clauses in 5:18, the meaning of nomos ("Law") in 5:18 and the antecedent of toutōn ("these [commandments]") in 5:19.

The first heōs clause in 5:18, "until heaven and earth pass away," must be compared to its counterpart in Luke 16:17: "it is easier for heaven and earth to pass away than for one dot of the Law to become void." Luke apparently uses this verse to guard against an antinomian interpretation of 16:16. Probably we are to understand the clause in Matthew in the same way; every detail of the Law remains valid until the present world order passes away. Nevertheless, this conclusion in itself does not stand in contradiction to Matthew 5:17, for the nature of this validity must be probed further.

The second heōs clause, which many take to be Matthew's insertion, is more difficult to interpret for there is no clear antecedent to panta, "all things," and the precise force of genētai is not evident. One possibility is that Jesus is teaching that the Law will remain valid only until all the demands of the Law are "done" or "obeyed." We may then infer that these demands were fully met by Jesus in his obedient life and sacrificial death, and that the Law is therefore no longer valid. But genētai is more likely to mean "happen" in this context while panta probably refers to predicted events (cf. Mt 24:34-35). These events have been identified with Jesus' death and resurrection, with those things prophesied about Jesus generally or with all the components of God's plan for history. The lack of any restriction in this context favors the last of these alternatives. This being so, the second heōs clause is roughly parallel to the first both maintaining that the Law will remain valid until the end of history as we know it.
An assumption quite popular in some circles is that nomos in 5:18 refers only to the moral Law. But no such restriction can be entertained. Not only is there no support for such a limitation in first-century Judaism, and little in the teaching of Jesus, but the reference to "jot and tittle" in 5:18 shows that no part of the Law can be omitted from Jesus' purview.

Jesus, then, asserts in Matthew 5:18 (and in its parallel, Lk 16:17), that the whole Mosaic Law will remain valid throughout this age. But "valid" in what way? Here it is appropriate to suggest that this must be understood in light of Matthew 5:17—the continuing validity of the Law must be seen in terms of Jesus' fulfillment of it In all its details the Law remains valid, but the manner in which people are to relate to it has now been determined by the one who brought its fulfillment We are probably to understand Matthew 5:19 in a similar way. Indeed, some have taken toutōn to refer to what follows, in which case "these commandments" are the commands Jesus himself issues in 5:21-48. But there is little grammatical basis for this. "These commandments" are the detailed parts of the Law of 5:18; the teaching of these commandments must take place in conjunction with the nature of Jesus' fulfillment of the Law.

There is an undeniable tension between the stress on continuity with the Law in these two verses and the stress on discontinuity that pervades Jesus' teaching about the Law. Those who find the tension intolerable will declare these verses inauthentic. But we would argue that while some tension remains, the interpretation we have given makes credible Jesus' uttering all the statements in Matthew 5:17-19. Indeed, if tension is to be found, it is more likely to be an authentic reflection of the historical Jesus than the creation of the church or the Evangelist. Seen in this light, Matthew 5:18-19 reinforces the "I have not come to abolish" of verse 17. As Jesus proclaimed the beginning of the new era with its "new wineskins," he was aware of the danger that the newness could be pressed to the point of rupture with the OT. This he guards against by stressing, perhaps with some hyperbole, the continuing validity of the OT and its Law for the life of the kingdom.

Jesus' stance on the Law and his disputes with his Jewish contemporaries about this stance, are so integral to his mission and message that none of the Evangelists can avoid the topic. Nor is there any indication that they wanted to. However, they do differ in the degree to which they are interested in this issue and the emphases they bring to it

3.1. Matthew. As our previous discussion would indicate, Matthew shows more interest in Jesus and the Law than do the other Evangelists. He alone records Jesus' claim to fulfill the Law (5:17). In passages paralleled in Luke's Gospel, Matthew adds references to the Law, most notably in the formulation of the so-called golden rule (Mt 7:12 par. Lk 6:31) and in the antitheses (Mt 5:21-48; cf. Lk 6:27-36; 12:57-59; 16:18). It is evident that Matthew writes to a Community that is deeply concerned about the relationship between Jesus and the Law, but there is scholarly debate about the exact nature of that community and the overall force of Matthew's teaching on this matter. This is partly because Matthew presents two different—potentially conflictive— emphases: endorsement of the Law and transcendence of the Law.

3.1.1. Endorsement of the Law. In our previous discussion (see 2.4. above) we noted the strength of Jesus' endorsement of the Law as recorded in Matthew 5:18-19. But this passage is not alone. In Matthew 8:4 (with parallels in Mk 1:44 and Lk 5:14) Jesus insists that the leper (see Leprosy) whom he cleansed report to the priests and "offer the gift which Moses commanded, as a witness to them." In the story of the rich young man, Matthew accentuates more strongly the connection between obedience to the Law and salvation by adding the saying "If you want to enter life, keep the commandments" (19:17). In Matthew 23:23 Jesus, while scolding the religious leaders for neglecting the "weightier matters of the Law," nevertheless insists that they should continue to obey the law of tithing. Jesus in Matthew expects his disciples to bring gifts to the altar (5:23-24), to give alms (6:1-4) and to fast (6:16-18). And, in perhaps the strongest statement of its kind, Matthew presents Jesus endorsing the authority and teaching of the scribes and Pharisees (23:2-3). Here Jesus appears to endorse not only the Mosaic Law but the oral Law as well.

3.1.2. Transcendence of the Law. Along with these apparently strong endorsements of the Law come equally strong indications of Jesus' transcendence of the Law. Only Matthew records Jesus' claim to fulfill the Law (5:17) and the antitheses, with their implicit criticism of the Law (5:21-48). He, along with Mark and Luke, portrays Jesus acting with sovereign freedom on the Sabbath and records his far-reaching claim to be "Lord of the Sabbath" (12:8). In a related development that many think to be central to Matthew's view of the Law, there is a strong emphasis on love or concern for others as the embodiment of the Law (7:12;22:40).
3.1.3. A Synthesis. With these two strands of teaching in evidence, it is no wonder that some have seen Matthew as a conservative on the Law, while others have seen him as antinomian. Others seek to do justice to both strands in Matthew by suggesting that he is fighting on two fronts—combating both Jews and/or Jewish-Christian rigorists, and Gentile-Christian antinomians (e.g., Barth). That Matthew was seeking to present a balanced teaching on the Law against opposing tendencies is possible. But it is also possible to find a theological coherence in Matthew's teaching about the Law if his salvation-historical perspective is considered.

Matthew makes clear that Jesus' death and resurrection mark a significant shift in salvation history. Prior to these events, as Jesus makes clear, his business is with "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (15:24). After Jesus' mission is accomplished, however, the disciples are sent to "all the nations" with the good news (28:19-20). Similarly, Matthew shows that John's ministry ends the prophetic office of the OT (11:13). To some extent, then, Jesus' endorsement of the Law in Matthew reflects only its continuing validity during the period before the new era is brought in. This is almost certainly the case in Matthew 8:4; 23:23 and 5:23-24; 6:1-4 and 6:16-18. Jesus' endorsement of the teachings of the scribes and the Pharisees in 23:2-3 may also fall into this category, although we are probably to see irony here also (Jeremias).

Jesus never doubted the authority of the Mosaic Law for the time preceding the entrance of the kingdom, and his instructions to followers living in that time will naturally include admonitions to obey those Laws. Only those who think Matthew has rewritten everything in his Gospel for the consumption of the church in his day would have any difficulty with this. On the other hand, statements about Jesus transcending the Law—and these represent the dominant thrust of the Gospel—reflect the fact that a new era of salvation history is indeed breaking in. This is an era in which Jesus' own teaching will be the central authority for the people of God, and the Law will play a role only as caught up in, and re-applied by, Jesus (Mt 5:17-19).

The relationship of the Law to Jesus in Matthew is, then, only one segment of his salvation-historical, promise-fulfillment scheme. Through it Matthew integrates his stress on the continuity of the law—for the law looks ahead to, and is incorporated into, the teaching of Jesus—and on its discontinuity—for Jesus, not the Law, is now the locus of God's word to his people.
3.2. Mark. In comparison with Matthew, Mark seems to display little interest in the issue of the Law, as is revealed by the fact that the word never occurs in his Gospel. Nevertheless, many of those incidents that are fundamental in Matthew's presentation of Jesus and the Law are taken from Mark: the controversies over the Sabbath (2:23—3:6) and ritual defilement (7:1-23), Jesus' teaching on divorce and remarriage (10:2-10), the story of the rich young ruler (10:17-22), and Jesus' teaching about the "great commandment" (12:28-34). Indeed, in three of these incidents Mark has important material not found in Matthew or in any other Gospel: the saying that "the Sabbath was made for humankind" (2:27), the editorial application of Jesus' teaching about defilement ("thus he made all foods clean," 7:19), and the conversation between Jesus and a scribe after Jesus' identification of the greatest commandment, in which the scribe, with Jesus' approval, asserts that loving one's neighbor is "more than all the burnt offerings and sacrifices" (12:33). This material suggests that Mark may have had a particular interest in the supersession of the ritual Law.

3.3. Luke. While Luke's perspective on the Law cannot be understood apart from Acts, the second part of his two-volume work, we will concentrate on the Gospel. Here there is evidence that Luke is conservative with respect to the Law (see Jervell), evidence that comes both from what Luke has added to and omitted from the tradition. In adding to the tradition he portrays the piety of those involved in Jesus' infancy in legal terms (1:6; 2:22-24, 27, 37, 39, 42; see Birth of Jesus). On the other hand, Luke omits from his Markan source the episode concerning ritual defilement, the dispute about the Law in its relation to divorce and remarriage and the teaching on the great commandment In comparison with Matthew, Luke includes Jesus' teaching about the eternal validity of the Law (16:17), but does not have the antitheses, Jesus' claim to have fulfilled the Law or any reference to "weightier matters of the Law." But these data do not justify the conclusion that Luke, in contrast to Matthew, upholds the Mosaic Law.

First comparisons with Matthew are difficult because we do not know whether Luke has omitted something in their common tradition or whether Matthew has himself added that which was not there. Second, Luke's omission of some of the Markan episodes suggests that he was not as interested in the Law as were Mark and Matthew, but this is not necessarily indicative of a conservative attitude. Third, almost all of the positive evidence for a Lukan endorsement of the Law comes from the infancy narrative. But his purpose in portraying the people in this narrative as obedient to the Law is simply to stress their piety and righteousness in accordance with the standards under which they lived To conclude that Luke presents these people as exemplars of Torah piety for Christians generally is to go far beyond the evidence. Fourth, Luke adds to the tradition two Sabbath healings by Jesus (13:10-17; 14:1-6) and while they do not present Jesus annulling the Sabbath, they share with the other Sabbath incidents an emphasis on the sovereign freedom with which Jesus treated the Sabbath.

Finally, Luke includes several sayings of Jesus that betray the same kind of salvation-historical perspective we have seen in Matthew. Luke 16:16 (with a parallel in Mt 11:12-13) is the most important: "The Law and the prophets were until John; since then the kingdom of God is being proclaimed, and everyone is entering it violently." The debate about whether John is here included in the time of the "Law and the prophets" or in the time of the kingdom is immaterial to our purposes. What is important is that Luke's Jesus affirms the cessation of the authority of the OT, in some sense, in the age of the kingdom. The important promise-fulfillment emphasis of Luke 24 (see 24:25-27, 44), while not directly applied to the Mosaic commands, contributes to this Lukan salvation-history scheme. Rather than being a "conservative," Luke in his Gospel gives many indications that he views the Law as belonging fundamentally to the past of the people of God (Blomberg).

3.4. John. True to its tendency, the Fourth Gospel follows its own course with regard to the Law. In fact there is no single teaching about the Law that is common to John and to any of the Synoptic Evangelists (see Synoptics and John). Like the Synoptic Evangelists, however, John records two healings of Jesus on the Sabbath (5:2-47; 9:1-41). In the first, Jesus' healing of a lame man sparks a debate about Jesus' authority to work on the Sabbath. John betrays no interest in the meaning and intent of the Sabbath command; he focuses exclusively on the christological claim: Jesus, as Son of God, has the same right to work on the Sabbath as does the Father himself. The same christological focus is evident in the second incident the healing of the man born blind. The Pharisees deny that Jesus is from God, because he sinned in performing the miracle on the Sabbath (9:14-16). Once again, Jesus' behavior, bound up as it is with his unique status, says nothing about his attitude toward the Sabbath or the Law generally.

Jesus' references to "your Law" in disputes with the Jewish authorities (8:17; 10:34 [although note the alternative reading]) strike a much more polemical note. The use of the possessive pronoun creates some distance between Jesus and the Law, although it is not clear if this is because Jesus stands with God over against the people, because he stands with John's Gentile* readers against the Jews (as some interpret the circumstances of the Gospel) or simply because he wants to impress on the Jews their responsibility to hearken to their own Law. Probably the last of these alternatives is the best (see Jn 7:51), in which case we learn little from it about Jesus' attitude to the Law in John.

John shares with the Synoptic Evangelists an emphasis on the fulfillment of prophecy in Jesus' ministry and includes the Law as a witness to Jesus on one occasion (1:45). We should note in this regard the way John shows Jesus replacing the great feasts and institutions of Israel—Passover (1:29 [?]; 19:36 [probably]); the manna in the wilderness (chap. 6; see Mountain and Wilderness); Tabernacles (chaps. 7—8); Israel itself (chap. 15). Evidence that John included the Law in this replacement scheme comes from terms, commonly associated with the Law, that are applied to Jesus (“light,”* 8:12; “bread* of life,” 6:35; “living water,”* 4:10), the designation of faith* in Jesus as the one "work" that disciples are to do (6:29; in contrast to the "works of the Law"?) and the Mosaic role that Jesus often assumes. It is precariously easy to read anything into John's symbolism that one wants, but there is enough evidence here to create the strong presumption that John wants to present Jesus as one who comes to fulfill for the church the role that Moses and the Law performed in Israel.

The discontinuity between the Law and Jesus seen in this replacement motif comes to clear expression in John 1:17: "the Law came through Moses, grace and truth* came through Jesus Christ" This discontinuity does not relate to the presence of grace in the OT as such, for 1:16 indicates that Christians receive grace "in place of" (anti) the grace found in the old covenant The discontinuity lies rather in the suggestion that the grace available for God's people in the OT does not come through the Law, and that it is only now in Jesus Christ that such grace can be found. Moreover, in associating the Law so closely with Moses and putting Christ firmly on the other side of the salvation-historical dividing line, John implies that in Jesus the Law will no longer have the same position and significance that it had before.

In different ways and with different emphases, all four Gospels reflect a dominant theme in the teaching of Jesus: his divine authority with reference to the law. Jesus was quick to clarify that his authority did not negate the role of the Law in salvation history. But he also made it clear that this authority involved the right not only to exposit add to or deepen the Law, but to make demands of his people independent of that Law. This being the case, it is quite inadequate, and potentially misleading, to think of Jesus as "the last great expositor of the Law." The Law, God's great gift to Israel, anticipated and looked forward to the eschatological teaching of God's will that Jesus brought. This teaching, not the Law, is the focus of the Gospels, and the Law remains authoritative for the disciple of Jesus only insofar as it is taken up into his own teaching.

LAZARUS

The Greek name Lazaros is a transliteration of the contracted form of the Aramaic name, 'el 'āzār, meaning "God helps" or "God has helped." The name appears in John 11:12:1, 10 and Luke 16:20-31. The Johannine context is the well-known raising of Lazarus, while the Lukan passage is a parable.* Whether or not there is any connection between the two has been a source of much speculation.

1. Lazarus in John
2. The Parable of Lazarus and the Rich Man

1. Lazarus in John.

The raising of Lazarus in John 11 is the climax of the series of signs which dominates the first half of the Gospel (see John, Gospel of). There can be no doubt that the resurrection* of Lazarus is also presented as the sign of all the signs Jesus performed and as the interpretive center of the Gospel. Lazarus' resurrection prepares the reader for the resurrection of Jesus and is the prototype for resurrection life promised all believers (11:21-27).

1.1. Critical Questions. Several critical questions arise in John 11. First is the historical question: Did the resurrection of Lazarus actually occur? The fact that the Synoptics do not know of the miracle* suggests to some that the whole miracle is contrived by John or his sources, possibly developing out of the parable of Lazarus and the rich man (Bultmann, 396 n.3). But the details of the parable and that of the Lazarus story are so different that this seems unlikely (Dunkerly, 323), and the connection of the story with Bethany (see Archeology and Geography) suggests that Lazarus was an historical figure (Schnackenburg, 2.321, 342-45). The Synoptics may have omitted the miracle either because they did not know of it (the Synoptics being more oriented to events in Galilee,*) while John seems to come from Judean/Jerusalem sources) or because it was simply one of several such events (cf. the raising of the widow's son, Lk 7:11-17, and Jairus' daughter, Mk 5:21-43 and par.; see Synoptics and John). John 11 is consistent with other Johannine passages such as John 5 and John 9, where miracle stories are extended and dramatized in order to draw out the theological implications of the event.

1.2. Lazarus and the Beloved Disciple. The most interesting question raised by John 11—12 is the curious description of Lazarus as one whom "Jesus loved" (11:3, 5, 36). This has led J. N. Sanders and others to identify the anonymous authority for the Gospel, the "disciple* whom Jesus loved" (13:23; 19:26; 20:2-3,8; 21:7,20-24), with Lazarus. Sanders (29-34) lists the following reasons for this identification: (1) They are the only people (along with Mary and Martha) whom John designates as those that Jesus loved; (2) Lazarus' home in Bethany would explain the Jerusalem orientation of the Fourth Gospel; (3) Lazarus' resurrection and Jesus' words to Martha (11:25-26) might explain the expectation that the beloved disciple would not die (21:23). The phrase in 12:11, "on account of him (Lazarus), many of the Jews were going away and believing in Jesus" could be seen as an implicit reference to Lazarus' role as the founder of the Johannine community. The link between Lazarus and the beloved disciple is suggestive, not only for the reasons listed above, but also because it would explain why the Gospel values so highly a miracle that the Synoptics do not record, and perhaps why the beloved disciple had more immediate insight into the meaning of the empty tomb (20:8). (For an extended presentation of these arguments in popular form, see V. Eller.)

However, this suggestion ultimately lacks compelling force. Lazarus' resurrection is not needed to explain the belief that the beloved disciple would not die: the idea is explained as rooted in Jesus' words to Peter ("If I wish for him to remain until I come, what is that to you?" 21:22). If the beloved disciple were Lazarus, the explanation of 21:22 would be superfluous. Both Lazarus and the beloved disciple are idealized figures in John. The beloved disciple exemplifies the faithful believer who has the insight given by the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) to receive Jesus as the Word (see Logos). Lazarus represents the future of the disciples as those who will be given resurrection life and are given eternal life now. Neither are fictionalized characters, but idealized historical figures who serve different roles.

The parable (Lk 16:19-31) is a curious one in its own right It is wholly Jewish in character, and falls into two parts: the first, the reversal of rich and poor in the afterlife (16:19-25), and the second, a discussion of the refusal of some to see and receive the witness of God (16:26-31). The parable takes a new direction at 16:26, raising the issue of the chasm between the rich man in Hades (see Heaven and Hell) and the poor man, Lazarus, in the bosom of Abraham. The point in the second half is that the rich man, whose lavish lifestyle and disregard for the poor man Lazarus had led to his present misery, wishes to send Lazarus back to warn his brothers (see Rich and Poor). Abraham refuses the request stating that even seeing a resurrected man would not convince them if they were not already responsive to Moses* and the Prophets. Thus, the first half of the parable warns the rich against their neglect of the poor, while the second half warns all people against the danger of blindness* to God's Word. This latter expansion maintains the Jewish flavor of the first part of the parable, but seems to fit a context of continued resistance to the message of Jesus' resurrection (cf. 16:30-31; 24:25, 44).

The background of John 11—12 raises intriguing questions for the interpretation of this parable. We have already rejected the idea that John 11—12 is dependent on the parable. If John 11—12 were dependent on Luke 16, we still would have no explanation for the fact that the name "Lazarus" is given to the character of the poor man. Any influence that might exist flows the other way: from the resurrection of Lazarus to the parable (so Sanders, 35; Dunkerly, 324).

This is not to say that the Lukan parable is directly dependent on the Johannine passage. Naming the poor man while the rich remains anonymous reinforces the eschatological-reversal motif of the parable: It is the poor beggar who is named and important while the rich glutton dies in nameless ignominy. However, another point of commonality emerges between the parable and the Lazarus narrative: the role of resurrection as a call to faith.* The mixed reaction to the raising of Lazarus (Jesus' enemies see the miracle as the driving reason to have Jesus executed) parallels the point of the parable, namely, that those who are closed to the work of God are also closed to seeing God's work in Jesus' miracles (Jeremias, 186-87). Something similar may be operating in passages like the parable of the pounds (Lk 19:11-27), where the story of Archelaus (Herod's son; set Herodian Dynasty) is woven into a parable and given a surprising application. The theory that the Lazarus story has influenced the Lukan parable remains unproven, but it provides an attractive explanation of the data.

LEPROSY

Modern discussion of leprosy has largely centered on the distinction between true leprosy, that is, the disease caused by Hansen's bacillus, and superficially similar diseases; on its treatment, including precautions against the infection of others; and on the avoidance of the pejorative term "leper," in referring to the patient.

Biblical concerns were almost wholly different. Hebrew sāra'at, translated as lepra in the LXX, is explicitly used in the detailed legislation of Leviticus 13—14 to cover a variety of human diseases, carefully distinguished, together with mold on fabrics and on the wall of a house. (Lepra was similarly used in classical Greek of a variety of human, animal and tree diseases and also, for example, of mold on a vinegar bottle.) None of these conditions is identifiable with Hansen's disease. Whether or not Hansen's disease existed in ancient Israel is disputed. The biblical terms, where they refer to human diseases, probably cover psoriasis, lupus, ringworm and favus.

The various conditions described in Leviticus 13—14 are diagnosed, and if cured declared "clean," in analogous ways, though the procedure for human conditions is more detailed. Central to the entire process, from diagnosis to declaring clean, is the role of the priest* Sacrifice is required to authenticate (not to effect) the cleansing of human beings and houses. The biblical references are not concerned with treatment The possibility of spontaneous cure was presupposed, though sāra'at in a house is assumed to be sent by God* (Lev 14:33-53). Nor are they specifically concerned with infection (unlike the patient in the apocryphal Gospel, Papyrus Egerton 2). The rule that the victim shall live alone "outside the camp" (Lev 13:46) appears in context to be more related to ritual impurity (see Clean and Unclean). The modern distinction between hygiene and cultus may however be alien to the ancient situation. Modern translations of Leviticus 14:54 use "dreaded skin diseases" (TEV), "any infectious skin disease" (NIV) and "all kinds of skin-disease" (NJB).

"To the rabbis the cure of a leper was as difficult as raising a person from the dead" (Marshall, 208, referring to Str-B IV.2.745-63). The supernatural cleansing of lepers was, however, expected as one of the signs of the messianic age (see Kingdom of God). It is to this, among other things, that Jesus points in reply to the question put by John the Baptist's (see John the Baptist) messengers: "Are you he who is to come?" (that is, the Messiah; Mt 11:3-4 par.; see Christ).

Synoptic occurrences of lepra and lepros (there are no others in the NT) stand firmly in the tradition of OT Law* and cultus. The major new element is the fulfillment by Jesus, and by implication the Twelve (Mt 10:8; see Disciples), of the expectation of miraculous healing* of this disease. As in the OT, "lepers are cleansed" (Mt 11:5) is as much a set phrase as "the deaf hear." In the account of the healing of a leper (Mk 1:40-45 par.) and of ten lepers (Lk 17:11-19), Jesus sends the healed sufferers to the priests for their cure to be confirmed. In the first case the prescribed sacrifices are to be offered (Mk 1:44 par.). In the second case the sufferers stand porrōthen, "outside," the village and at a distance from Jesus, in accordance with Leviticus 13:46. In the first case, Jesus' action in touching the sufferer is best understood as one of compassion (so explicitly in Mk 1:41, if splagchnistheis is read), by which he is symbolically welcomed back into the community. It has nothing to do with the priest's ritual smearing of parts of a healed patient's body (Lev 14:14, 17), for Jesus does not usurp the priest's functions. The force of eis martyrion autois in Mark 1:44 and parallels is uncertain. It may mean simply "to provide evidence of the cure," in which case autois will probably mean "to the priests," or the reference may be broader, as in TEV, "in order to prove to everyone that you are cured" (similarly RSV). Perhaps the most likely implication is that Jesus is telling the healed man not to speak about his cure, but rather to let it speak for itself as a messianic sign.

LIBERATION HERMENEUTICS

Liberation and feminist hermeneutics have arisen in response to the use of the Bible as a tool of oppression. Women have been excluded from ordained ministry in the church, for instance, on the basis of the male gender of Jesus or certain interpretations of the injunctions of Paul. On the other hand, the Bible has frequently been experienced by the oppressed as a source of liberation that provides the framework for identifying and transcending oppression. The purpose of liberation and feminist hermeneutics is to embrace this ambivalence toward the use of the Bible as a source both of oppression and liberation. Several principles and interpretations unite liberation and feminist hermeneutics in general.

1. Principles of Liberation Hermeneutics
2. Discerning a Liberative Axis
3. Liberative Portraits of Jesus
4. The Challenge and Limits of Liberation Hermeneutics

1. Principles of Liberation Hermeneutics.

1.1. Principle One: A Hermeneutic of Suspicion. The awareness that the Bible can be a powerful tool of oppression results in the first principle uniting feminist and liberation hermeneutics: a hermeneutic of suspicion. Suspicion begins by observing that oppression characterizes society. All the ideologies and theologies that do not challenge such oppression are suspect. Interpretations of the Bible in particular must be suspected when they omit data that might disrupt the status quo or when they emphasize data that undergird the status quo. For example, the starting point for christology has usually been the two natures of Christ (Chalcedon), or biblical christological titles such as "Son of God"* or "Messiah," or the resurrected Christ,* etc.—none of which seems to challenge oppression directly. Therefore, Latin American liberation theologians suspect that these emphases are tools of oppression. The church can affirm, for example, the two natures of Christ while siding with the political and economic elite rather than with the poor.

Based upon their experience of oppression, feminist theologians also employ a hermeneutic of suspicion—but with one significant difference. Latin American liberation theologians suspect interpretations of the Bible. Many feminist theologians apply the hermeneutic of suspicion to the Bible itself.

The reason for this difference is that the basic conviction of liberation theology—that God* sides with the oppressed—is evident throughout the Bible, while the basic conviction of feminist theology—that God sides with oppressed women—is at times ignored or opposed by the Bible. Its injunctions to silence and subordination are well known. Therefore, E. S. Fiorenza (1984, 138-139) writes,

... the critical hermeneutical task of feminist theology is more complicated [than Latin American liberation theology], since it cannot state without qualification that the "God of the Bible is the god of women," because there is considerable evidence that the Bible not only was used against women's liberation but also had no clear "option" for women's liberation.

Even an evangelical scholar such as D. M. Scholer, who gives precedence to the authority of the biblical text, asserts that evangelical feminist hermeneutics must recognize patriarchal texts and assumptions in the Bible and interpret them as limited texts and assumptions.

What feminist and liberation theologians do agree upon is that interpretations of the Bible must be held suspect. This conviction is based on the observation that society is oppressive, and that the Bible is often used to reinforce such oppression. But another reason exists for their suspicion: the recognition that no interpretation is objective. This is the second principle uniting liberation and feminist hermeneutics.

1.2. Principle Two: No Exegesis Is Objective. The social context of the interpreter inevitably determines his or her interpretation of a text. Presuppositions, prejudices and questions all determine how a specific text is interpreted. For instance, few contemporary scholars interpret the Bible to espouse enslaving Africans, although many of their nineteenth-century predecessors did so. This difference is due to changed prejudgments about slavery rather than altered exegetical methods or linguistic analysis. That is, a changed social context leads to changed questions which result in different interpretations of the same biblical texts.

This observation is not new. A. Schweitzer in his Quest of the Historical Jesus illustrated how eighteenth-and nineteenth-century lives of Jesus reflected more the beliefs and ideals of their own periods than the period in which Jesus lived (e.g., the rationalist Jesus of Venturini and the romantic Jesus of Renan; see Historical Jesus). H. G. Gadamer and A. Thiselton provided the theoretical basis for this view of the so-called hermeneutical circle. And, of course, R. Bultmann's article, which answered "No" to the question "Is Exegesis Without Presuppositions Possible?" promulgated widely the view that objective interpretations are impossible to attain.

What is new about feminist and liberation theologies is their attempt to champion the experience of oppression as the normative social context for interpreting the Bible. For Latin American liberation theologians interpretation arises out of the experience of the oppressed. For feminist theologians interpretation arises out of the experience of women, in particular "when women become critically aware of these [patriarchally manipulated] falsifying and alienating experiences imposed upon them as women by a male-dominated culture" (Ruether, 114).

1.3. Principle Three: The Advocacy of the Interpreter. Since precommitments determine interpretations, the only appropriate precommitment in a world characterized by oppression is one which advocates justice. A precommitment to justice will result in liberative interpretations, just as precommitments to the status quo tend to result in interpretations that fossilize oppressive and patriarchal structures in church and society.

This precommitment is essentially what Marx called praxis: concrete engagement for the purpose of transformation. Liberation theologians define praxis as transforming action that transforms history. Further, the nature of that action which transforms is very specific. Praxis is action on behalf of the poor. Having this precommitment to the poor reverses theology as it is traditionally approached. Rather than beginning with theological foundations, or the Bible or tradition, liberation theologians begin with praxis among the poor. Praxis is the first step of theology.

Reading the Bible—the second step of theology—with a commitment to praxis results in two developments. On the one hand, reflecting on praxis in the light of the Bible leads to a new praxis as the Bible lends insight to the present situation. Praxis, then, is always in a state of flux. On the other hand, the vicissitudes of the social context to which the interpreter is committed lead to new interpretations of the Bible.

For liberation theologians this commitment entails emphasizing biblical texts that liberate, that demand the conversion of the powerful and wealthy and that highlight the political dimension of Jesus' life and death (see Death of Jesus). In particular, prophetic texts, including Gospel texts that portray Jesus as a prophetic opponent of the powerful, hold a prominent place in liberation theology. For feminists this commitment entails denouncing patriarchal biblical texts that women experience as oppressive. Conversely, it requires rediscovering biblical texts that are not androcentric and patriarchal.

This attempt to emphasize, denounce and rediscover selective texts raises the question of authority. By what criteria do feminist and liberation theologians determine which texts are liberative and which texts are oppressive or patriarchal?

1.4. Principle Four: Interpretation from Communities of the Oppressed. In the earliest Christian centuries, men—not women—wrote the texts that comprise the NT, selected those texts for canonization (see Canon), interpreted those texts and participated in councils that established creeds which referred to those texts. Since the Reformation biblical interpretation has been accomplished by male scholars who have been educated at major universities in Europe and North America. The criteria for evaluating the validity of biblical interpretations came from these same few, male, educated European and North American scholars. Although these criteria were established largely without the input of women and the poor, over the centuries their criteria have become axiomatic for determining orthodox and heretical interpretations of the Bible.

In contrast, for feminist and liberation theologians interpretation and criteria of evaluation should emerge from the experience of oppressed people who have the potential to subvert society's oppressive and patriarchal social structures. In Latin America these groups have taken the form of base (poor and marginalized) communities. Base communities began to emerge in the 1960s due to the drastic shortage of priests in Latin America. At the Roman Catholic gathering of Latin American bishops in Medellin, Colombia (1968), these communities were applauded, and their numbers increased dramatically thereafter. Today there are over 80,000 in Brazil alone.

Generally, base communities consist of twelve to fifteen people who meet regularly to read Scripture and to reflect on it in light of their concrete situation. Their reflection frequently leads to further praxis (the commitment with which they have come to the meeting). Praxis may take the shape of community participation to construct a road or a well, or political involvement to effect substantive change. E. Cardenal has collected in The Gospel in Solantiname discussions of the Bible from a base community in a coastal village of Nicaragua.

Communities of women and men who are advocates of women in their struggle for liberation (what Fiorenza calls "women-church") have not grown as readily as base communities. This difference is due to at least two factors. First the church has not on the whole affirmed a notion of women-church that in any way parallels the Medellin affirmation of base communities. Second, feminists hold divergent opinions about whether men can rightfully be included in such communities. Some post-Christian feminists, such as Mary Daly, prefer a total separation of men from women, while more moderate revisionist feminists, such as Fiorenza and L M. Russell, want to include women-identified men in women-church. Such differences render a consistent feminist ecclesiology elusive.

1.5. Summary of Principles. Despite these differences in reality, liberation and feminist theologians share a common ideal that directly challenges traditional ecclesial and academic authority. Both feel that communities of the oppressed should be the interpreters of the Bible. Some of these principles are not new; feminist and liberation theologians are merely bringing to light what is true of biblical interpretation: All interpretations are suspect because they inevitably reflect the presuppositions of the interpreter who advocates, inadvertently or consciously, certain socially located ideologies. Another principle is quite new: In a world of injustice, biblical interpretation must be shifted from the educated elite to the oppressed. When this occurs, some interesting interpretations of the Bible in general and Jesus in particular result
2. Discerning a Liberative Axis.

Liberation and feminist theologians tend to discern a unifying axis in the Bible. This axis is selected because it reflects the experience of the interpreters. For example, Latin American liberation theologians, who live in the context of poverty and call the church to side with the poor, interpret that axis as God's preference for the poor (see Rich and Poor). The paradigmatic event that expresses God's preference is the Exodus (Ex 2:23-25; 22:21-27), but this view of God is carried on forcibly by the prophets' demand for justice* (e.g., Amos 5:21-24; Mic 6:8; Is 58:6-7) and, quintessentially, by Jesus, the friend of outcasts and sinners, who pronounced blessings (see Blessing and Curse) on the poor and woes on the rich (Lk 6:20-26). Ruether, a feminist theologian who confronts patriarchy in church and society, interprets that axis as the Bible's ability to contain its own self-critique. She calls this the "prophetic-messianic" tradition, and notes that this biblical protest against itself parallels the critical dynamic of feminism, which likewise examines structures of injustice toward women, unmask and denounces their cultural and religious sanctifications, and points toward an alternative humanity, an alternative society, capable of affirming the personhood of women. (Ruether, 118)

Undeniably many axes co-exist in the Bible, including God's preference for the poor and a prophetic critique included within the Bible itself. Each is chosen, however, not because it is the universal or timeless theme that unifies the Bible, but because it best reflects the advocacy stance (or praxis) of the interpreter who lives in a particular social context and works toward a specific historically and culturally bound form of liberation.

3. Liberative Portraits of Jesus.

Feminist and liberation theologians also develop portraits of Jesus on the basis of their experiences of oppression. These portraits illustrate well the interaction between text and social context that characterizes liberation and feminist hermeneutics.

Most feminists have made a precommitment to liberation that entails working toward equality with men. Of the church this requires open doors to ordained ministry. This precommitment to equality in church and society becomes the starting point for Fiorenza's reconstruction of the ministry of Jesus (1983, 99-159).

According to Fiorenza, Jesus exhibited a praxis of inclusive wholeness by measuring the Temple* and Torah (see Law) with the criterion of whether they engendered the wholeness of every human being. Because cult and law controlled and excluded many, especially women,* Jesus replaced the cultic meal with a festive table to which all are invited. In fact, those who gathered around this table were the poor, the sick and those so destitute as to engage in cultically dishonorable occupations: tax collectors (see Taxes), sinners* and prostitutes.*

These people Jesus liberated from patriarchal structures and gathered into a discipleship* of equals. His preference for the poor especially included women, for "widows and orphans" quintessentially express poverty in an androcentric world in which women and children are dependent on husbands and fathers for economic and social well-being. Jesus also unmasked patriarchy in his sayings: patriarchal marriage will cease to exist in the age to come (Mk 10:2-9; 12:18-27); Jesus brings a sword to households, setting son against father and father against son (Mt 10:34-36); the family of disciples has no father, even when disciples* have left fathers (cf. Mk 10:29; 10:30; see Family). Finally, Jesus rejected domination among the discipleship of equals (Mk 10:42-45). In short, "the woman-identified man, Jesus, called forth a discipleship of equals that still needs to be discovered and realized by women and men today" (154).

1. Boff portrays Jesus as a liberator who fought the three oppressions that face Latin America: economic exploitation, de-humanization of the oppressed, structural and individual sin. Jesus fought economic structures with his teaching such as the parable* of the workers who labored for different lengths of time but earned the same wage (Mt 20:1-16). This parable is a frontal attack on the view that those with more money deserve it and, concomitantly, that the poor deserve their low economic status. He fought de-humanization by placing human need above even the most sacred traditions such as Sabbath* purity (e.g., Mt 12:1-14; set Clean and Unclean). Jesus fought sin by denouncing everything—whether religious, political, economic or social—which alienates people from God and from their neighbors (e.g., Mt 22:34-40). In other words, the "fundamental project" of Jesus was to proclaim and to be the instrument of the concrete realization of the absolute meaning of the world, i.e., liberation from every stigma (including suffering, division, sin and death) and liberation for real life, for open-ended communication of love, grace, and plenitude in God." (280-281)

Both of these portraits of Jesus have as their starting point the historical Jesus. For Fiorenza this requires entering the world of Jesus behind the Gospels because the Gospels, reflecting male authors and an increasingly patriarchal church, have effaced in part the central role women had in the discipleship of equals. Now their role in Jesus' ministry must be reconstructed from subtle indicators in patriarchal texts. For liberation theologians this starting point is necessary because other christological starting points in Latin America have ignored Jesus' commitment to justice. Instead, traditional theologians have begun with questions, such as the two natures of Christ or the Trinity, which have not provided a critique of the church's historic tendency to side with the oppressors in Latin America.

Their interest in the historical Jesus, however, is different from scholars who are involved in the so-called quest of the historical Jesus. Liberation and feminist theologians are not content to establish objective data to recover precisely what Jesus said and did. Rather they want to understand the relevance of the historical Jesus for their own social contexts. Consequently, Jesus becomes the initiator of a discipleship of equals and a liberator from oppression.

4. The Challenge and Limits of Liberation Hermeneutics.

In order to fortify its role as an alternative hermeneutical approach to the Gospels, feminist and liberation hermeneutics must develop further answers to three key questions: (1) Who interprets? (2) How is interpretation accomplished? (3) Why is a particular feminist or liberation interpretation valid?

First, feminist and liberation hermeneutics challenges the assumption that academic training is the primary criterion for determining who is qualified to interpret the Bible. Their challenge signals a confrontation with a predominandy Caucasian, male guild whose training takes place in North American and European universities. But feminist and liberation theologians are themselves not free from the charge of elitism. The most significant Latin American liberation studies have come from males who received their doctorates from European universities (e.g., J. Sobrino from the Hochschule Sankt Georgen in Frankfurt; L Boff from the University of Munich; J. L Segundo from the University of Paris).
Analogously, feminist theologians, though oppressed by gender, usually are not oppressed economically. As a result, African-American women have developed an alternative to feminism, called "womanist theology," which is in part a protest against the social and economic elitism of many feminist theologians. Liberation and feminist hermeneutics, therefore, must facilitate the transition from an educated elite who speak on behalf of the oppressed to an oppressed who give voice to their own interpretations of Jesus. Cardenal's The Gospel in Solantiname, which transcribes conversations from base communities, should not be the notable exception; it should be supplemented by interpretations from women-churches, African-American communities, etc.

Second, liberation and feminist theologians correctly begin their christological explorations with the historical Jesus. Consequently, they must continue to develop their own historical-critical methodology. In particular, they must refine their facility in analyzing the social context of first-century Palestine (see Sociological Approaches to the Gospels). This refinement is essential because feminist and liberation interpretations of Jesus frequently draw social, economic and political parallels between first-century Palestine and the experience of twentieth-century oppressed peoples. Two of the most important interpretations of Jesus, Segundo's Historical Jesus of the Gospels and Fiorenza's In Memory of Her, press behind the Gospels to understand the Palestinian world of Jesus. Studies such as these, if they are to lend further insight to the enterprise of interpreting Jesus' place among the oppressed of Palestine and the contemporary world, will require greater expertise in sociological analysis.

Third, liberation and feminist theologians correctly assert that no exegesis is neutral, and that presuppositions that arise from a particular social context determine how a text is interpreted. This viewpoint challenges the assertion, often held by evangelical exegetes, that a biblical author's original intent is ascertainable and normative for today. Social context is as important for a liberation hermeneutic as is the original text. But that does not mean that all interpretations that arise out of human experience are equally valid.

The criterion normally employed by these theologians to distinguish between correct and incorrect interpretations is whether an interpretation is oppressive (hence the hermeneutic of suspicion). But the notion of oppression or justice is vague and liable to countless varieties of definition. Therefore, the challenge of avoiding pure subjectivism confronts feminist and liberation hermeneutics. A cogent hermeneutic that does not allow interpretation to dissipate into pure subjectivism requires a concerted global dialog about the meaning of Jesus for today. Such an approach may be seen in the book Conflict and Context: Hermeneutics in the Americas, a cooperative effort of North and Latin Americans produced during a conference held in Mexico in 1983. A global dialog must broach gender, economic and racial boundaries to develop interpretations of Jesus that are not merely subjective, representing a narrow slice of human experience, but consensus christologies which come under the judgment of a variety of people in dialog.

Liberation and feminist hermeneutics, then, must develop in three key ways. First, theologians must be replaced by the oppressed as the dominant spokespersons for liberation and feminist theology in the church. Second, theologians must sharpen their scholarly approach to the NT; in particular, this requires further strides in sociological analysis of the present and past. Third, liberation and feminist theology must strive to become global in order to develop consensus criteria for evaluating the validity of liberation portraits of Jesus.

For two reasons this article represents a relatively narrow portion of liberation theologies. First, it does not address directly the most radical theologians, such as M. Daly and other post-Christian feminists, or F. Belo and other materialist interpreters of the Gospels. Second, liberation theologies are burgeoning throughout the world as the oppressed are being given voices. To North American feminists and Latin American liberation theologians can be added J. Cone (African-American), I.J. Mosala and A. Boesak (South African), A. Pieris and S. Kappen (Sri Lankan), J. Grant (North American Womanist) and many others.

See also Rich and Poor; Women.

Three different Greek words are used in the Gospels to convey different aspects of the concept of life. Bios refers to daily life and one's resources for living. Psyche signifies the self-conscious individual self and can often be translated by a personal pronoun. Zoe usually denotes life as a gift from God* and is often modified by the adjective "eternal" (aiōnios). This article will treat the third of these three words.

1. The Synoptic Gospels
2. The Fourth Gospel
3. Theological Issues

1. The Synoptic Gospels.

Zōē occurs sixteen times in the Synoptic Gospels. Except for Luke 12:15 and 16:25 (where it refers to life in general), it always means the future life that will be given by God. It is a life that will be entered or inherited at the end of the present age (Mt 19:16-17, 29 par.). Thus it stands in chronological contrast to the present life. For example, the one who leaves all to follow Jesus will not "fail to receive a hundred times as much in this present age . . . and in the age to come eternal life," Mk 10:30 NIV). It is a life that is to be entered through the narrow gate (Mt 7:14). In fact this life is so important that disciples of Jesus must deal radically with sin in their hearts in order to avoid missing it and being cast into the hell of fire (Mt 18:8-9; see Heaven and Hell).

2. The Fourth Gospel.

Zōē occurs thirty-six times in the Gospel of John. In eleven of these occurrences it is the object of the verb "to have" (echō) and is used in the context of a promise, invitation or statement about those who believe in Jesus (Jn 3:15, 16, 36; 5:24, 40; 6:40, 47, 53, 54; 10:10; 20:31). By reading these eleven passages together, one comes to see that in the Fourth Gospel life or eternal life is not limited to a future age but can be realized in the present by the one who believes (see Faith) in Jesus. John can still speak of life as future (Jn 5:28-29; 6:27; 12:25), but it is also something that one may possess in the present (Jn 5:24).

John also makes a point of stressing the idea of life as a gift from God. The Father has life in himself and has given the Son (see Son of God) life to have in himself (Jn 5:26; cf. 1:4). The Son is the bread* of life (Jn 6:35, 48) who gives life to the world by his death (Jn 6:51) and through his Spirit (see Holy Spirit) and words (Jn 6:63,68).

The definition of life in the Fourth Gospel has various traits. First, the life was the light of humankind (Jn 1:4). Taken out of its Johannine context, this statement might imply that the life created by the Word of God is natural human life and that this life consists of light,* that is, the human consciousness and conscience which separates humanity from the rest of the creation. But as John goes on to describe life and light in his Gospel, life in John 1:4 probably is referring to life before God or eternal life (note the Greek article which here signifies a particular kind of life). This life was in the Word (cf. Deut 30:14-15). And it was through this word of life (cf. 1 Jn 1:1) that light (revelation) came to humankind. The revelation (light) brought through the communication of this word of life brings both salvation* and judgment* (Jn 3:19-21).

Second, the words which Jesus has spoken are life (Jn 6:63). Peter, speaking for the Twelve, says to Jesus "You have the words of eternal life" (Jn 6:68). And in his final pronouncement to the nation Jesus asserts that God's commandment is eternal life (Jn 12:50). In much the same way, at the end of the Torah and in reference to it Moses says, "This is not an idle word for you; it is your life" (Deut 32:47). Thus life and the Word of God are intimately connected. But the Word is not merely the source of life; it is life itself in the sense that nourishment becomes a part of the body (thus Jesus is the bread of life, Jn 6:35, 48).

Third, Jesus himself claims to be the life (Jn 11:25; 14:6). True life traces its source to him (Jn 10:10). But he is more than its source, he is its sustaining power, apart from whom nothing can be accomplished (Jn 15:5). He is life itself.

The definition of eternal life in John is summed up in Jesus' final prayer: "This is eternal life, that they might know you, the only true God and Jesus Christ whom you have sent" (Jn 17:3). Here life is related to knowledge. This knowledge has been revealed to those the Father has given to the Son (Jn 17:2). In that sense it is objective cognitive knowledge. But the knowledge revealed is also a knowledge of persons—God the Father and God the Son. In this sense it is subjective relational knowledge. So true life consists in knowing the Word of God. Thus Christ's words are life and he himself is life. And the reason that life is bound up with Christ and his words is that he explains (exegeomai) the Father (Jn 1:18).

3. Theological Issues.

3.1. Life in the Fourth Gospel vis à vis the Synoptics. Much has been made of the difference between the eschatology* of the Synoptic Gospels and of the Fourth Gospel (see Synoptics and John). It is asserted that the Synoptic Gospels contain a strictly futuristic eschatology. The life spoken of is something awarded at the end of the age for present activity. On the other hand, the Fourth Gospel contains the notion of an eternal life which is a present reality to the one who believes in Jesus. Hence Jesus in the Fourth Gospel says, "Truly, truly I say to you, he who hears my word and believes in the one who sent me has (present tense) eternal life and he does not come into judgment but has passed (perfect tense) out of death into eternal life" (Jn 5:24). The Synoptic eschatology is in keeping with Jewish beliefs current in early Judaism* (e.g., T. Levi 17-18; 1 Enoch 91:12-17; Pss. Sol. 17:21-46). Johannine eschatology builds on that found in the Synoptics by asserting that the future hope is now present A study of the use of the word life is used to illustrate this view (cf. Bultmann).

To deny the differences between the use of (eternal) life in the Synoptics and in John is impossible. Yet to assert that the eschatology of John is more advanced and exclusive of Synoptic eschatology is not a necessary conclusion based on the evidence.

First, it is plain that John has a futuristic eschatological viewpoint. In John 5:28 and 6:54 the resurrection is future. Bultmann recognized the difficulty of these verses in John and ascribed them to a redaction of the Fourth Gospel which attempted to bring it in line with the more traditional eschatology found in the Synoptics. But if John 5:28 and 6:54 are attributed to the Fourth Evangelist, it must be asserted that he was able to conceive of a futuristic and a realized eschatology as not mutually exclusive.

Second, C. H. Dodd (although his point may have been overstated) has shown that in fact the Synoptic Gospels contain a realized eschatology. Dodd asserts that Jesus "used parables (which are found in the Synoptic Gospels) to enforce and illustrate the idea that the kingdom of God had come upon people there and then. The inconceivable had happened: history had become the vehicle of the eternal; the absolute was clothed in flesh and blood" (Dodd, 197).

Third, to assert that the Jewish view of "life" was future is too broad a conclusion to draw from the large bank of data available in the extant writings of early Judaism. First-century Judaism had no single eschatology, a fact now widely recognized among scholars of early Judaism and Christian origins.

3.2. The Nature of Eternal Life. It would appear then that the eternal life spoken of in the Synoptics vis à vis John is a single entity with more than one facet rather than a pair of mutually exclusive concepts. Its nature can be described under four points. First, eternal life involves a personal relationship with God and all its attendant blessings. In Genesis 2—3 the tree of life was in the midst of the garden which was in Eden (Gk paraddeisos). It was in the garden that God had fellowship with man and woman (Gen 3:8). And if man had eaten from the tree of life he would have lived forever (Gen 3:22). But because of their sin, God banished them from the garden and made it impossible for them to return to the tree of life (Gen 3:24). The life God intended for humanity was one of ideal service in an ideal location (Gen 2:15). It was a life of knowing and walking with God. It was an everlasting Sabbath* (note how the seventh day of creation has no stated end, Gen 2:1-3). This notion of life as a relationship with God carried over into the teaching of Jesus and into the Gospels.

Second, in the Gospels eternal life is intimately connected with the coming of Jesus Christ (Jn 10:10). Eternal life is the life of the future messianic age (Mt
7:14; 18:8-9), and Jesus is the Messiah (see Christ). Thus one's attitude toward Jesus determines one's entrance into life (Mt 25:45-46). "For God so loved the world that he gave his only Son so that whoever believes in him might not perish but have eternal life" (Jn 3:16). Only those who eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ have eternal life. Only they will be raised to life on the last day (Jn 6:54).

Third, this life which is a relationship with God and comes through Jesus Christ is begun in the present age. In Jesus Christ one begins to know God, for he reveals his Father (Jn 1:18). By believing in Jesus one enters or has eternal life. Life is given to believers as a gift because they belong to his flock (Jn 10:27-28). Because no thief is able to snatch a believer from God's hand, no believer is able to lose the gift of life (Jn 10:29). Since eternal life is a present experience it can be said that eternity has broken into time. One does not need to wait for death. One can experience eternity now.

Finally, eternal life, which is inaugurated in the present, is fully realized only in the future. The full realization of eternal life is like receiving an inheritance (Mt 19:29). It is the opposite of punishment (Mt 25:46). Among its many blessings are the resurrection* of the body and the promise of abundant life that will never perish (Jn 3:16; 10:10).

Because of the dual nature of eternal life, on the one hand a future life but on the other hand (in the Fourth Gospel) a present experience, the issue of theological development has arisen. Is John an advance over Synoptic eschatology? Is John's understanding of eternal life a form of Platonism where life is not measured in time but is rather an ideal realm of existence parallel to earthly life? To read the Fourth Gospel platonically seems to be a misunderstanding of John. Eternal life can be experienced in the present, but it also has a future dimension as outlined above. It seems best to describe eternal life as a relationship with God. In this way there is no necessary contradiction between the Synoptics and the Gospel of John. One can begin to know God now, but will only know him fully in the eschaton.

3.3. How Eternal Life Is Entered. How is this relationship with God called eternal life entered? At this point too there seems to be a contradiction between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel. In Matthew 7:14 it is asserted that the way to eternal life is narrow and few find it. Disciples* must take radical measures to purify themselves or they may miss life and be cast into the eternal fires of hell.
(Mt 18:8-9). To a would-be disciple looking for some assurance of eternal life, Jesus said, "If you want to enter into life, keep the commandments." These commandments* he referred to came from the Decalog (Mt 19:16-19). In the same chapter Jesus told his disciples that everyone who leaves their earthly belongings and family behind will inherit eternal life (Mt 19:29). In Matthew 25:46 Jesus says that the righteous (those who care for the poor and oppressed; Justice, Righteousness) will go away into eternal life.

In the Gospel of John eternal life is gained through belief or faith (Jn 3:16; 5:24; 20:31). Life is a gift from the Father that comes through the Son (Jn 5:26, 40; 6:33; 10:10, 28; 17:2). John seems to be closer to what some consider to be the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith alone, while the Synoptic references seem to teach that eternal life is gained by works. But this conclusion arises from a misreading of all four Gospels.

First, the Synoptic Gospels do not say that life is earned by works. Matthew 7:14 places the narrow gate before the difficult way. The narrow gate might very well be a reference to faith in the sense that the way to salvation is not manifold but singular. Matthew 18:8-9 seems to be speaking primarily of the sin of pride with which faith is incompatible. In Matthew 19:16-21 the essential command is "follow me," which might be equated with faith (see Discipleship). The same might be said concerning Matthew 19:29. And in Matthew 25:4-6 life is not a reward for good works (note how the righteous are surprised by the Lord's response in Mt 25:37-39), but good works could be considered a consequence of being righteous (see Carson).

Second, John does not dissociate faith from its resultant works. In John 5:29 the good and the wicked are resurrected—the good to receive eternal life and the wicked to judgment In John 12:25 we read, "He who loves his life will lose it and he who hates his life in this world will keep it unto eternal life." And only those who eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ have eternal life and will be raised in the last day (Jn 6:54).

Thus a careful reading of both the Synoptic Gospels and the Gospel of John does not lead to soteriological disparity. Rather all four Gospels are in harmony with the rest of the NT when it comes to human responsibility for salvation. Persons cannot save themselves even by their own good works (Jn 5:3940). They must humble themselves and trust in God who alone supplies life. But this trust is like entering a gate which heads a street of obedience and hardship (Mt
7:14). True faith inevitably yields a changed life of faithful discipleship and good works. This changed life begins in the present and continues until it is consummated at the Second Coming of Christ.

LIGHT

The use of light in the Gospels follows, on the whole, the use of light in the OT and late Hellenistic Judaism. Hebrew thought uses light as a symbol of the divine presence and salvation (Ex 13:21; Ps 27:1; 36:9; Is 60:19), often of the future eschatological (see Eschatology) salvation* (Mic 7:8; Is 2:5; 9:2; 58:8, 10; 60:1-3; Bar 5:9). According to Matthew 4:16 and Luke 2:32 this expectation has been fulfilled in Jesus, who becomes the focus of the light symbolism of the Gospels. The matter appears differently in the Synoptics and John (see Synoptics and John). Whereas the Synoptic writers simply group together originally independent dominical sayings which contain terms for light, John has created a "rather elaborate theology of light" (Piper, 132). In the comments which follow the focus is on the symbolic use of phōs ("light"). The Gospels, of course, do use light in a literal sense—of the sun, of lamps and of fire (Mt 5:15; Jn 18:3; Mk 14:54; Lk 22:56). Other terms for light are also used, but do not add much to our understanding.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.

Two uses of light symbolism (not necessarily utilizing the word phōs) appear in all three Synoptic Gospels: (1) Matthew 17:2; Mark 9:3 and Luke 9:29 describe the brightness of Jesus' face or clothing at the Transfiguration*; and (2) the saying of the "light under a bushel" is found in Mark 4:21; Matthew 5:15; and in a doublet in Luke 8:16 and 11:33; but the meaning is different in the various contexts.

In Mark 4:21 and Luke 8:16 the saying of "light under a bushel" follows the parable of the sower and functions to warn the disciples to receive the light which comes from God. Similarly, the saying in Luke 11:33, which appears between the "sign of Jonah"* and the teaching on the "sound eye," emphasizes Jesus as the light and is addressed to those of Jesus' day who seek signs. Matthew 5:15 appears together with other sayings (about "salt" and "a city on a hill") and between two unique sayings ("you are the light of the world"; "let your light so shine"), all of which refer to the Christian community. The emphasis is no longer on the disciples receiving, but rather on spreading, the light

Two other Q* sayings also have differing meanings in their new contexts. As we have indicated earlier, the good and bad eyes in the context of Luke 11:33-36 have to do with recognizing the Messiah* Matthew, on the other hand, building on the Jewish associations of "a sound eye" with generosity, and "an evil eye" with stinginess (cf. Deut 15:9 [LXX]; Prov 23:6; Tob 4:7; Sir 14:10; 'Abot 5:15), sets the "sound eye" teaching (6:22-23) between the two sayings about treasure and serving God or mammon. Thus, in Matthew the references to light (and darkness) teach generosity as opposed to greediness. The second Q saying is part of an exhortation to fearless confession in both Matthew 10:26-33 and Luke 12:2-9. Matthew's saying, "What I tell you in the dark, utter in the light" (v. 27) suggests that the disciples' proclamation, unlike Jesus' words to them, will be public. Following closely on the warning concerning the hypocrisy of the Pharisees,* Luke 12:2 seems to warn the disciples against hypocrisy because the truth will come to light (see Hypocrite).

Three points need to be made about unique references to phōs in Matthew and Luke. First, Matthew 4:16 ("the people who sat in darkness have seen a great light") quotes Isaiah 9:2 and alludes to the nativity star (Mt 2:7) in order to emphasize the fulfillment of messianic expectations and the continuation in Jesus of the revelatory symbolism attributed to light in the OT. Second, this revelatory aspect of light has universal significance in Luke 2:32 ("a light for revelation to the Gentiles* and glory* for your people Israel*") where an Isaianic theme is evident (cf. Is 42:6; 49:6 and the conjunction of phōs and doxa ["glory"] in Is 60:1, 19 LXX; cf. also Jn 1:1-14). Third, a saying of Jesus appended to the parable of the dishonest steward, both of which are unique to Luke, contrasts "the sons of this age" with "the sons of light" (Lk 16:8b), a term not found in the OT nor in later rabbinic literature but appearing as a standard designation of the members of the community at Qumran (1QS 1:9; 2:16; 3:13, 24-25) and as a description of believers in John 12:36 (cf. 1 Thess 5:5; Eph 5:8). The frequent Qumran counterpart, "sons of darkness," is not found in the NT (cf. Jn 3:19).

2. The Fourth Gospel.

John's theology of light, which often appears in the Evangelist's redaction of the tradition (cf. Fortna), was developed in the debate with the synagogue* about the identity and significance of Jesus. John took up the symbol of light from Judaism,* where it referred variously to God's presence, God's salvation, the Law,* Wisdom* and Logos* (e.g., Philo), in order to epitomize the person and work of Jesus. By so doing, "the evangelist implies that the expectations and hopes of Judaism are fulfilled in Jesus" (Painter, 34).

Light is a primary symbol in the Fourth Gospel. "The prologue links logos [word], life, and light so powerfully that the cluster dominates the symbolic system of the entire narrative. The logos incarnate in Jesus is 'the life [that] was the light of men' (1:4) and where there is light there is life and the perception of Ufe" (Culpepper, 190).

John's Gospel alone has the self-predication formula, "I am the light of the world" (8:12; 9:5; cf. 12:35-36, 46). This is an exclusive claim. John the Baptist is not the light but a witness to the light (1:7-8; cf. 5:35). Moreover, all persons must receive their light from Jesus the "true light" (1:9; cf. 8:12) in order to become "the children of light" (12:36). That they do is dramatically illustrated in Jesus' restoration of sight to a blind man (Jn 9).

Light is pressed into service to express various other aspects of johannine theology: revelation, sin, faith,* judgment* and ethics (see Ethics of Jesus).* The light invades the darkness to reveal God's salvation (1:5; 3:19; 8:12; 12:35, 46). This darkness is of two kinds: that which prevails before the light comes (1:5; 8:12; 12:46) and that which descends on those who have refused the light and have chosen to live in darkness (3:19-20). This expresses the Johannine understanding of sin. On the other hand, to believe in the light (12:36, 46) describes Christian faith. That the light exposes those who accept or reject its illumination expresses the Johannine understanding of judgment (3:19-21). Light and darkness thereby also function as indexes to human character, such as in the cases of Nicodemus (3:20), the Jews (9:40; 11:10) and Judas (13:30) (Culpepper, 192). Johannine ethics is expressed in terms of walking in the light (8:12; 12:35), which means keeping Jesus' commandment* to love* one another.

Two significant omissions may also be noted. First, there is no metaphysical nor cosmological speculation about light As Conzelmann has put it, "Herein lies the basic distinction between Jn.'s Gospel and Gnosticism" (Conzelmann, 350). Second, unlike Matthew, John does not use light to describe the evangelistic mission of the believers.

One wonders what light as a symbol for God's revelation and salvation in Christ communicates to modern persons for whom light is just another physical phenomenon to be made and controlled and for whom light connotes little of mystery or the divine. Present-day communicators of the Gospel may wish to consider J. Macquarrie's suggestion for revivifying the biblical symbol of light: "Roughly speaking, one might say that the word 'openness' can do for the symbol of light what the word 'estrangement' has done in much of contemporary theology for the moribund word 'sin' " (Macquarrie, 209).

LITERARY CRITICISM

Literary criticism of the Gospels (see Gospel [Genre]) is concerned with literary conventions and the significance of such conventions for meaning. The rationale for such an approach is twofold: (1) the Gospels are, in part, literary; and (2) a reading or hearing of the Gospels involves literary appreciation. The Gospels are also theological, of course, and historical. Theological and historical preunderstandings of Christians will influence their use of literary criticism. Literary criticism and appreciation also impinge on theological and historical considerations.

This essay will survey the variety of literary approaches and suggest how they help in studying the Gospels, show how the history of the study of Jesus and the Gospels has intersected literary study, and delineate and illustrate major literary conventions and strategies of the Gospels and their study.
1. Literary Criticism and Its Implications for Study of the Gospels
2. Developments in Gospel Study from a Literary Perspective
3. The Gospels and Literary Conventions and Strategies

1. Literary Criticism and Its Implications for Study of the Gospels.

Christian appropriation of literary criticism does not mean the reduction of the Gospels to any one or a group of literary perspectives. The Gospels are presentations of the "good news" of Jesus Christ. But just as an understanding of the rules of Greek grammar and syntax help in reading the Gospels, so does an understanding of literary rules and conventions.

1.1. The History and Theory of Criticism.

1.1.1. The History of Criticism. Literary criticism offers a variety of perspectives for the study of the Gospels, for in the history of criticism different views of the reference, role, and function of literature have guided the work of criticism. An early type of criticism (mimetic criticism) views the literary work as an imitation (mimesis) of the world and human life. The primary criterion is the truth of the work in relation to the object or objects it represents. This form of criticism is associated with the classical age, but it is also characteristic of contemporary theories of literary realism, and Marxist critics in particular view literature as a reflection of reality.

The criticism which was dominant from the poet Horace (first century B.C.) through the eighteenth century (pragmatic criticism) emphasizes the effect of the work on the audience, including both pleasure and instruction. Recent revival of rhetorical criticism recapitulates pragmatic criticism's emphasis on the artistic strategies used by an author in engaging and influencing the response of readers.

Another type (expressive criticism) defines the literary work in terms of the operation of the artist's imagination on his or her perception. Contemporary psychologically oriented critics retain concerns of expressive criticism, looking in the work for indications of the particular temperament and experiences of the author.

Extrinsic criticism of various sorts explains the major characteristics of a work of art in terms of external causes or influences (historical, biographical, sociological, psychological and so on). The historical and sociological approaches of conventional biblical study are examples of extrinsic criticism. Formalism and New Criticism (termed "objective" criticism) reacts to the alleged reduction of literature to external causes and approaches the work in terms of the work itself as an autonomous object, to be judged in terms of intrinsic criteria such as coherence, integrity, equilibrium, complexity and the relationships of the parts of the work to each other and to the work as a whole. Reader-oriented theories relativize the conventional view of the literary work as a structure of meaning which has been achieved and exists apart from the reader's involvement. They emphasize the role of the reader (or readership) alongside the role of the author in the "production" or "creation" of meaning and significance.

1.1.2. The Theory of Criticism.

1.1.2.1. A Compass for Criticism: Internal and External Relationships. The fact that readers of different epochs and different readers of the same epoch can read and interpret literature differently is explained in part by the nature of literature itself. Literature consists not only of a succession of words, sentences and paragraphs; it consists also of presuppositions and perspectives taken by writers and readers.

One set of relationships in literature (syntagmatic relationships) is comparable to the syntactic relationships on the level of sentence. These relationships exist within discourse and enable linguistic and literary elements to have meaning as they are combined or chained together in a linear sequence. In Gospel narrative readers must discern relationships between words and sentences within smaller units of the Gospels such as parables* and miracle stories (see Miracles and Miracle Stories) in order to follow what is being said, and readers must discern relationships between these units in order to follow the plot of the Gospels as completed wholes.

Relationships outside any particular discourse are necessary for making sense of the combinations within that discourse. The topic, reference, literary category and function of the literary unit are discerned not simply from words and sentences and their combination. The topic of a sentence, for example, must be consistent with the combination of words, but the same combination can be assigned different topics. The specific topic is decided on in the context of discourse.
1.1.2.2. Interdependence and Variety of Relationships. In the episode of Jesus and the disciples* crossing the lake in Mark 8, Jesus told the disciples, "Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod!" The disciples recognized a syntactic and semantic unity; they made sense of the sentence by judging that Jesus' statement was to be taken literally and that he was speaking about bread*—the bread which the disciples failed to bring with them. Readers know more than the disciples knew, and they know the topic is not bread—not bread in the simple literal sense in which the disciples understood it.

At the level of every literary unit some topic must be discerned. Then, at the level of the total literary work, a comprehensive organizing principle or idea must be formulated in order for the identification of topics and relationships throughout the work and, therefore, for the meaning of the work as a whole. The topic of the subordinate unit and the idea of the work as a whole must be consistent with the literary data, but the interplay of literal, figurative and often paradoxical meanings of words and other units makes the literary data susceptible to a variety of meanings. The same word, expression or entire text can signify two or more distinct references and express and elicit different attitudes or feelings.

More than topics and ideas are involved in literary appreciation. The form and content of literature do not simply convey information; they perform action. The contrast between the discernment of the readers and the intellectual and spiritual density of the disciples has an ironic function in Mark 8. This irony has an effect upon the readers and is characteristic of the Gospel of Mark. The knowing readers come to feel superior to the simple disciples as they share the point of view of the Evangelist. Readers are nudged toward the faith of the Evangelist in the literary composition. The ironic function and the discernment of topics are related. As readers discern different levels of meaning in Mark, they may see that what the disciples think is the topic is closer to the truth than readers initially realize. Readers may eventually discern that bread (at a symbolic level) is indeed the theme (or at least one of the ways that the theme of the Gospel may be expressed).

1.2. Study of Narrative. In the past literary aspects of Gospel narratives were subordinated to dogmatic and historical interests. Since the late 1960s, however, literary aspects of narrative have increasingly become the center of interest, with the subordination of dogmatic and historical concerns. As has been noted, however, dogmatic and historical preunderstandings play their appropriate part in literary study. Certainly no literary ideology will be allowed to replace Christian faith. S. Mcknight rightly points out the danger of equating the poetic creativity of the Evangelists with fiction and depreciating "the importance of the real author's intent, historical reference, and background information for understanding texts" (S. McKnight, 127; see Gospels [Historical Reliability]).

1.2.1. Conventional Emphases. In Aristotle's mimetic poetics some aspect of reality is reconstituted by the poet through plot structures which are unified representations of human action. Readers are affected as they analyse or decompose the work into its component parts. The rules, educated insights and intelligent analysis involved in the system of Aristotle were devalued in the romantics' emphasis on aesthetic experience and the unconscious creativity of the artist. In the text-intrinsic approach of Formalism and New Criticism, both the imitated world and poetic creativity were at best secondary. With existentialism there was a return to reality—the reality of the human condition as understood by the ideology of existentialism. Modes of being and acting were not seen as determined by human nature but as possibilities for human choice, on the basis of which the human projects himself or herself.

1.2.2. Structuralist Insights. French Structuralism's desire to formulate a "morphology," or "grammar," of narrative and to establish rules that govern all forms of narrative is best understood as a reaction to existentialism's emphasis on human choice. For structuralists the surface or superficial level of narrative was important only as a means of descending to the more fundamental or deep level where history and human choice play no part. Such an approach does not do justice to history and to the particulars of narrative, but it does provide a perspective from which to view the particulars. The multiplicity of actors and actions in the narrative may be reduced to a limited number of "character types" or spheres of action and a limited number of types of action or "functions."

Narrative may be seen as resting on profound ahistorical and general binary oppositions which are expressed in less profound and specific historical and cultural terms in the actual narrative. These oppositions must be mediated by a third category that is related to both realms in the actual narrative but which belongs to neither. Events which occur at different places in the actual narrative, then, are not seen primarily in relation to the development of the plot but in relation to each other. These events have a "paradigmatic" relationship with each other and as a bundle show the sort of solution or mediation which is taking place in the telling of the narrative. Hebrews speaks of Jesus the Son as reflecting the glory* of God* (1:1) and sharing the same flesh-and-blood nature of the children of God (2:14). Is it not possible to read the Gospels (at one level, at any rate) as portraying in narrative form this mediation presented in Hebrews in a didactic form?

Structuralist insights may help readers move beyond the view of the narrative as a one-dimensional story of events in the life of Jesus culminating with the crucifixion (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection* At a certain level each of the episodes is referring beyond itself to a more central reality. The different episodes are then seen not only as a way of moving the story forward but also in relation to a theme which is illuminated by each of the episodes.

The structuralists' concern with typologies led them to discern different types of narratives, and this insight is also applicable to Gospel study. Simple narratives tell of a change of a situation (from failure to success); complex narratives relate a simple change as it is embedded within or accompanied by another sort of action—like planning and learning. In ideological narratives the different actions in the narrative are explained by a commitment, an idea or an abstract rule. There are also narratives in which the importance is the perception which readers have of the event which is narrated.

1.2.3. Poststructural Insights. Poststructuralism grows out of structuralism and uses ideas implicit in structuralism to challenge the ideology of structuralism itself. Poststructuralism recognizes the existence of codes and the value of narrative structure, grammar and logic, but it disavows the assumption that there is an ahistorical structure determining the narrative on the surface level. Disavowed also, however, is the possibility of any final synthesis of meaning. For poststructuralists the structure of the text is such that it involves the reader in a process of analysis without a final synthesis or end. The text is like a group of threads braided together to form a core. Some of the threads move the story along in a linear temporal pattern but narratives should not be reduced to such elements. Other threads are permutable and allow for multival-ence and reversibility.

The Christian who wishes to benefit from poststructural insights must be able to accommodate a post-structural strategy and a firm commitment to a world which ultimately has meaning in terms of God's revelation in Jesus Christ. A poststructuralist ideology is not Christian faith.
1.3. Deconstruction.

1.3.1. Deconstruction and Poststructuralism. The term deconstruction results from the project of showing how the structural goal of accounting for the form and meaning of literary works is subverted by the way the texts actually work. In practice deconstruction depends on the appearance of a system of relationships which is then deconstructed by the appearance of another system of relationships which can be considered more natural with regard to the system being undone. This more natural system of relationships is substituted for the one deconstructed, but it too may be deconstructed.

1.3.2. Deconstruction in Gospel Study. The insights of deconstruction may enable us to understand and appreciate the succession of approaches in biblical studies; from dogmatic, to historical, to existential and literary approaches. We may even appreciate different levels of meaning in the early church. With the literal meaning, the things spoken about in the text were related to the real world (Gospel narratives were seen as recounting what in fact happened). Typological and allegorical meanings were gained by correlating the persons, actions and events in the Gospels with persons, actions and events in the OT and/or to the history of the church. Tropological meanings moved beyond these perspectives and sought the moral truth signified by a passage. By directing the reference of the passage to final things, yet another (anagogic) meaning was discerned.

A type of deconstruction results from the observation of the coexistence of different meanings and systems. Deconstruction may help contemporary readers/critics explain the coexistence in the Gospel of Mark of two portraits of Jesus—the divine Son of God* who reveals his power and wisdom in Galilee and the Son of man* whose passion is manifested in Jerusalem. No one portrait is able to exhaust the material of the text, and to subordinate one to the other causes a loss in both literary and religious terms.

1.4. Reader-Response Criticism. Reader-response criticism views literature in terms of readers and their values, attitudes and responses. The nature and role of the reader varies in the different forms of reader-response criticism, but in all forms there is a movement away from the view of interpretation as the determination by an autonomous reader of the meaning of an autonomous text. In one form (reader-reception criticism) an attempt is made to situate a literary work within the cultural context of its production and then explore the shifting relations between this context and the changing contexts of historical readers.
Another form (aesthetic-response criticism) emphasizes the process by which a reader actualizes a text. A text is marked by gaps which the reader must complete and blanks which the reader must fill in. Psychological approaches to the reader emphasize the stages of development of individual readers or the role played by the "psychological set" of readers.

The community influences the attention given by the reader and the kind of "actualization" made by the reader. To some extent, then, criticism involves the determination of the perspective from which reading will proceed and becomes a matter of persuasion as well as a matter of demonstration. Interest in and appreciation of "interpretative communities" in literary study may provide appreciation for and insight into the way different religious communities read the Gospels. Evangelicals as well as Roman Catholics are inevitably constrained by histories of interpretation, traditions and contemporary communities of faith. Meaning must always have some locale.

2. Developments in Gospel Study from a Literary Perspective.

The philosophical and religious context of the early church constrained the reading of the Gospels. Nevertheless, conventions of reading in the early church allowed attention to the literal level, levels beyond the literal and the life of readers (individuals and groups). With the critical approaches warranted by the world of the Enlightenment, the reference was taken to be history, at first the history recounted in the text (to be discounted or supported by critical study) and later the historical context of the formation of the tradition or of the final composition of the Gospels. With literary approaches in the 1960s there was a return to a variety of concerns comparable to the concerns of the early church.

2.1. Developments before Modern Literary Approaches.

2.1.1. Precritical Reading of the Gospels. In the reading of the Gospels in the precritical period, no distinction was made between the world depicted and the real historical world. Indeed, the Bible as a whole was seen as refering to the whole of historical reality. Past history of the Bible and the early church was involved as early biblical stories referred directly to specific temporal events and indirectly (as figures or types) to later stories and events. But the biblical world extended to the present, to the world of the reader of any age. Readers saw their own actions and feelings and the events of their world as figures of the biblical world and so were able to fit themselves into the biblical world.
The power of a precritical realistic reading extending from the OT to the readers' day depended in part on the fact that the world depicted in the Bible and the real historical world were not the ultimate reality. OT individuals and events were types of NT individuals and events, but the deepest meaning is not the historical in any sense. The Passover lamb may be a type which is made clear in the sacrifice of Christ but both of these refer to a heavenly sacrifice for the sins of every conceivable form of being.

2.1.2. Post-Enlightenment Reading of the Gospels. With the Enlightenment the historicity of literary and other cultural phenomena replaced the framework of the theological conceptualization of the ancient and medieval world. The realistic feature of biblical narrative was related consciously to historical reference. The role of the biblical stories was to enable readers to uncover the historical sequence of events to which they referred. Undermined was the correlation between the world of the reader and the biblical world made possible when both were seen as expressions of the pre-existing divine world. This diminished the potentiality of the narratives to allow readers to make sense of themselves in relation to the world of the narrative in a somewhat direction fashion.

2.1.3. Subordination of Literary Qualities. When literary qualities of the Gospels were noted and commented on, they were subordinated to dogmatic or historical interests, and they were not appreciated because they were not within the truth of contemporary thinking. In the period of the ancient and medieval church, Augustine noted the literary qualities of the Fourth Gospel (in comparison with the Synoptics). The divine nature of the Lord was set forth by the writer "in such a way as he believed to be adequate to men's needs and notions" (De cons. 1.4.7). Augustine, of course, sees no tension between the dogmatic nature of the Gospel of John, the author's creative formulation of materials and the facticity of the story. The writer of the Gospel "is like one who has drunk in the secret of His divinity more richly and somehow more familiarly than others, as if he drew it from the very bosom of his Lord on which it was his wont to recline when He sat at meat" (De cons. 1.4.7).

2.2. Development of Literary Insights and Approaches.

2.2.1. Early Beginnings. Concern with genuine literary matters began to surface in the 1960s and 1970s and became commonplace in the 1980s. The literary turn was prepared for in the attempt of R. Bultmann and the New Hermeneutic to prolong the text hermeneudcally by attention to its linguistic dimensions. Preoccupation with existential categories and the lack of interaction with genuine literary criticism hindered the task.

In his 1964 publication, The Language of the Gospel, A. Wilder advocated a move which takes advantage of literary insights. He expounds the NT as "language event" in terms of literary form with the conviction that "behind the particular New Testament forms lies a particular life-experience and a language-shaping faith." Wilder explicitly criticizes Bultmann's restriction of meaning to existential concepts. The view that the NT "tells us about ourselves, not about 'things' and the way they are and the way they happen," according to Wilder, results in a disparagement of "the whole story of man and salvation as the Bible presents it" (Wilder, 133). The literary criticism appropriate for NT study is not one which remains confined to forms and conventions. There is reference in the text but the reference is not the same as that in conventional study of the Gospels. Students of the NT can learn about its literary language and reference from students of poetry: "this kind of report of reality—as in a work of art—is more subtle and complex and concrete than in the case of a discursive statement and therefore more adequate to the matter in hand and to things of importance" (Wilder, 133).

At this point it should be re-emphasized that for the Christian, literary approaches to the Gospels must exist in relation to historical approaches and especially to the historical reality of jesus the Christ. Concentration on the literary alone would eventually lead to the same sort of protest made by disciples of Bultmann. They refused to be left with only a mythological Lord. We cannot be satisfied with only a literary Jesus. It should be noted, however, that the historical methods devised by scholars will never reveal the fullness of the meaning and significance of Jesus the Christ (see Historical Jesus). Literary approaches may assist in that task.

2.2.2. Structuralist Contributions. Wilder's work predates French Structuralism's attempt to move beneath the surface structure of a text with its historically constrained relationships to "deeper" ahistorical relationships. The structuralist turn provided impetus toward and ways of studying the relationships within the text. The structuralist interlude benefited the literary study of the Gospels, even though severely structuralist ideologies and models were not satisfying.
2.2.3. Redaction Criticism and Literary Criticism. The parables of Jesus were favorite texts for existential and structuralist exegesis, but literary study after structuralism moved beyond study of parables and other units to the literary study of the Gospels as wholes. When the Gospels were seen as forms to be correlated with their unique historical and sociological settings, redaction criticism* was born. But redaction criticism is not literary criticism. Redaction criticism seeks objectively to find the one correct theme, structure and historical setting. In literary study the historical setting of a text is seen as the originating circumstance and does not constitute a primary focus of study. The intention of the author to communicate certain christological, eschatological and other ideas is also relativized as literary criticism allows a variety of functions of texts and gives attention to the intention of readers (past and present).

The coordination of redactional-critical and literary-critical approaches is helpful, especially in order to guard against the ahistorical tendencies of some sorts of literary approaches. S. McKnight suggests that "a sharper profile will be obtained as one examines literary strategies in the light of the tradition-critical process, for one will be observing what the author is doing to the traditions (composition criticism)" (S. McKnight, 137).

3. The Gospels and Literary Conventions and Strategies.

The development of literary approaches to the Gospels has forced attention to the role and function of the Gospels and resulted in the recognition that the Gospels serve a variety of functions. The perception of the role and function of the Gospels influences the perception of genre and the strategies which are followed in reading and interpretation.

3.1. The Role and Function of the Gospels At Literature. A literary approach to the Gospels is not designed to reduce the Gospel text to dogma and history, but neither is it designed to reduce the text to a nexus of linguistic and literary data. What references and/or functions of Gospel texts are conceivable and satisfying in literary study? (Non-literary references and functions are not ruled out, of course.) Is there a function of Gospel texts comparable to the function of literary texts—a function which is faithful to the nature of the Gospels and which remains in a dialectical relationship to dogmatic and historical references? The Gospels may be viewed in terms of the discovery and creation of a world which sustains intellectual, spiritual and emotional vitality, a world which is a divine gift and not simply the consequence of human quest and achievement.
When the reference of the text is seen as a world of grace and truth, narrow dogmatic and historical references are relativized, no longer seen as the primary goal of study. This world-creating or world-revealing function of the Gospels is comparable to the way that art and poetry function in enabling readers to create worlds, to come to know who they are and where they come from and are going, and to understand better their place in life and relation to nature and their fellows.

3.2. The Question of Genre. The question of genre cannot be avoided, for every reader reads a text in the light of its presumed purpose and nature as a representation of reality and/or a work of art and in light of the conventions of that particular sort of writing. The question of the genre of the Gospels (see Gospel [Genre]) is intriguing as a historical question, and a particular Gospel may be compared formally and historically with the other canonical Gospels, non-canonical Gospels (see Gospels [Apocryphal]), ancient biographies and other narratives. When genre is approached as the question of how to read, the historical-critical question is transcended. Whatever hypothesis is accepted as the beginning point for reading must be tested and made precise in the process of reading, for the Gospel text will withstand attempts to reduce its potential to any a priori judgment Every Gospel creates its own conventions of reading while it maintains relationships with other forms of ancient and modern narrative. Readers must respond to the demands of genre, but they must also actualize the genre in the process of reading. That is, in the act of reading the Gospels the determination is made as to how the Gospels are to be read.

3.3. Form and Structure. Form is sometimes used as equivalent to genre, but it is most often used to describe a work's principle of organization. Attention has been given primarily to mechanic form, the shape which is imposed externally, much as a mold imposes a shape on wet clay. (Organic form, on the contrary, is concerned with the shape which develops from within, like a growing plant) At times the principle of organization is seen in terms of chronology. Each of the Gospels contains a passion narrative preceded by accounts of Jesus' words and deeds. In Mark and Matthew a distinction is made between an early ministry in Galilee* and a later mission and passion (see Passion Narrative) in Jerusalem. Luke makes this distinction, but in addition has a lengthy travel narrative connecting the two phases.

At times the different sorts of content have been the basis of structuring. Matthew has narrative and discourse material alternating in such a way that five books can be discerned, each consisting of a section of narrative and a section of discourse. This pentateuchal structuring is supported by the similarity of the conclusions of each of the five sections of discourse, something like "And when Jesus finished these sayings. . ." (7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; and 26:1). But a threefold structure is seen when 4:17 and 16:21 are taken as dividing marks. Each of these verses contains the words "from then Jesus began" with an infinitive and a summary of the content to follow. Other structures are dependent on readers observing relationships between earlier and later sections.

The threefold chronological pattern of Luke has been modified by attention to references to Jerusalem which appear at turns in the story. The conclusion of an initial section (1:5—3:38) indicates that Jerusalem is the site of Jesus' final temptation * A second section (4:1—9:50) concludes with Jesus setting his face to go to Jerusalem. The travel narrative as a whole is movement toward Jerusalem and can be divided into 9:51—13:35 (the beginning of the journey) and 14:1—19:27 (the conclusion of the journey). The final section (19:28—24:53) tells of the reign of Jesus in Jerusalem by means of crucifixion and resurrection.

Mark can be perceived as a story of Jesus' ministry in and around Galilee followed by a journey to Jerusalem and Jesus' activities there. But it can be read as a passion narrative, prefaced by a series of controversies which lead up to the passion. It can also be read as three successive and progressively worsening stages in the story of the relations between Jesus and his disciples (1:16—8:26; 8:27—14:9; and 14:10—16:8).

The Gospel of John can be divided mechanically into prolog, book of signs and book of passion. When weight is given to organic form, the Fourth Gospel may be compared with a musical fugue, with a theme announced and developed to a point after which other themes are introduced and interwoven with the earlier themes. The themes which appear are introduced in the prolog.

3.4. Plot Plot or narrative unity of the Gospels is related to but is not the same as form and structure. In some measure, the concept of "story" mediates form and plot for story normally refers to the synopsis of the temporal order of events in a narrative. In summarizing a work we say that something happened, then something else, then something else and so on. Plot goes beyond the chronological ordering and accounts for the relationships between the events and the organization of the events for the particular effect created. Luke-Acts provides directions for ordering the Gospel which are easily seen when a literary perspective is assumed. Readers are invited to read the Gospel in light of the perspective of Acts. Prologs tie the two works together, as do events in Acts which parallel those in the Gospel. Jerusalem is central in both works, with the Gospel moving toward Jerusalem and the book of Acts moving away from Jerusalem. There is a clear correlation between events predicted by characters in the Gospel and their fulfillment in Acts. Readers are prepared for this correlation between Luke and Acts by correlation within each of the writings. Jesus' declaration that a prophet is not acceptable in his own country is followed immediately by his own townspeople's rejection (Lk 4:16-30), and Agabus' prediction of Paul's suffering (Acts 21:10-14) comes true immediately (Acts 21:30-35). Just as Jesus' commission in Acts 1:8 guides the reader for the reading of the book of Acts, the prophecy of Simeon in Luke 2:34 prepares the reader for understanding the Gospel as the story of the prophet* Jesus who created a division among the people in his ministry.

The beginnings and endings of the Gospels are important from a literary perspective. The prolog of the Gospel of John prepares the reader for the entire Gospel. The infancy stories of Matthew and Luke (see Birth of Jesus) serve the same function for those Gospels. Mark is unique in that it lacks a full-blown prolog, contains a problematic ending and does not establish a clear and unambiguous set of connections among and between the episodes. The critical and imaginative competence and skill of readers are stretched in discerning the plot of Mark.

3.5. Character. Characters are necessary for the actions which move the story along, but actions help define characters, so there is a dialectical relationship between plot and character in the Gospels. In the Gospels characters are portrayed—their moral, emotional and volitional qualities are expressed—in what they say and do as well as in what is said of them. Of primary interest in literary study is the way that convincing portraits of Jesus, God and figures around Jesus are fashioned within the totality of the Gospel and how those portrayed persons are related to the rest of the story.

The Gospels differ widely in the way they utilize literary means to present portraits of Jesus (and other characterizations follow from the presentation of Jesus). John and Mark are at opposite poles. The Gospel of John utilizes a prolog, lengthy discourses of Jesus and a prayer to his Father, a series of signs, testimony of independent witnesses and explicit statements of the narrator to present an unambiguous picture of the messiahship and divine sonship of Jesus. In Mark there is no prolog, but the opening says that Jesus is the Christ,* the Son of God. Yet what seems to be so obvious at the beginning becomes problematic. Jesus is not Messiah in the traditional sense. What is revealed in the literary strategies is as confusing for the reader as Jesus' disclosure is to the disciples within the story.

God is a character in a literary sense in the Gospels. In the Gospel of John, God is characterized by Jesus. He is the one who sent Jesus. In Luke there is a process of deconstruction at work in the tension between revolutionary and conservative aspects of Luke's God. The purpose of God is universal salvation, and the story of Luke-Acts is a "dialogue between God and a recalcitrant humanity" (Tannehill) with God overruling as well as ruling. But Luke-Acts proclaims God's faithfulness to Israel.* The revolutionary and conservative aspects of the characterization of God creates a tension which is not clearly resolved in the story.

3.6. Narrative World and Rhetoric. The narrative worlds of the Gospels are important. The world may be considered a "poetic" (not a "fictional") world in that the writers craft a unified sequence and introduce characters and tell the readers (directly and indirectly) how those characters are to be considered and so on. But in a real sense, the world (or the values of the world) is profoundly true for the authors. So true that the Gospels are attempts to lead readers to affirm or reaffirm belief in such a world. The Gospels may then be called narrative rhetoric, and a literary approach will give attention to the means utilized in the Gospels to appeal to the reader.

3.7. Authors and Narrators. Literary criticism of the Gospels is concerned with authorship in quite a different fashion than is historical criticism. What sort of author is it who is leading readers to affirm belief? What can be discovered from the work itself? This author is called the "implied author" in literary criticism and is to be distinguished from the real author who can be given a name and address.

The narrator is also a literary figure. Literary criticism distinguishes between first- and third-person narrators and (with third-person narrators) between the omniscient and limited point of view. The omniscient narrator may be intrusive or unintrusive. The narrators of the Gospels are third person, omniscient and intrusive. Gospel narrators know what needs to be known about persons and events, even having access to the characters' feelings, motives and thoughts. The narrators not only tell the story, they introduce the story, provide explanations, translate terms, tell us what is known or not known by characters and express judgments directly and indirectly. Readers are influenced by the nature of the narrator. There is a correlation between the dependability of the narrator and the more ultimate trustworthiness and trust which are being manifested and elicited.

In conclusion, literary approaches to the Gospels complement conventional approaches. They may enable readers to rediscover value and meaning in the Gospels which have become problematic with approaches which distance texts for purposes of critical examination. The assumptions and strategies of literary criticism allow readers to interact with texts in critical and creative modes and fashions.

Logos is the transliteration of a common Greek word that generally means "word," "speech," "account," "story" or "message." Around 500 B.C. Greek philosophers began to adopt the word and use it to signify that which gives shape, form or life to the material universe. In the NT era this special use was operative alongside the more general use.

Logos is used 128 times in the Gospels (NA\textsuperscript{26}). The frequency of its occurrence is about the same in all four Gospels (Mt 32 x; Mk 23 x; Lk 32 x; Jn 40 x). Matthew and Mark use \textit{logos} in a non-philosophical sense. Luke (when read in the light of Acts) begins to use \textit{logos} in a more technical sense. The Johannine prologue uses \textit{logos} in a particular way to refer to Jesus.

1. The Synoptic Gospels
2. The Gospel of John

1. The Synoptic Gospels.

1.1. \textit{Matthew and Mark.} Matthew and Mark use logos fairly frequently with its general meaning of "speech" or "message." With verbs of financial accounting (synairō; apodidōmi) logos takes on the meaning of "an account" (Mt 12:36; 18:23; 25:19). Sometimes the word can bear the specific meaning of the "word of God" or the "word of Jesus" (e.g., Mk 2:2; 4:14-20 par.; Mt 15:6) where it may refer to the message of the Scriptures, of the gospel (see Gospel [Good News]) or of the kingdom (see Kingdom of God). In a very few instances logos describes the authoritative (see Authority) word of Jesus over evil (Mt 8:8, 16).

1.2. \textit{Luke.} Luke uses logos less frequently in the general sense of "speech" and more frequently for the particular "word" of Jesus, whether it be his message or his authoritative word (e.g., Lk 4:32, 36; 6:47; 9:26; 10:39). There is even an instance where Luke equates Jesus' "word" with the "word" of God (Lk 5:1). In his prologue Luke uses logos to refer very pointedly to the gospel (Lk 1:2; cf. Acts 6:4). Luke (especially in material peculiar to his Gospel) seems to use logos more frequently than the other Synoptics to refer to the authoritative teaching of jesus. This may be due to his desire to show continuity between the OT and the message of Jesus on the one hand, and the message of Jesus and the message of the apostles* in the book of Acts on the other hand.

In the Fourth Gospel almost every occurrence of logos occurs in some syntactical sequence with Jesus or God,* but it is not always easy to tell if there is an exact nuance to the word or if it refers generally to Jesus' speech. In a few instances it is used in the context of a fulfillment formula (Jn 18:9, 32), that is, Jesus' prophetic (see Prophets, Prophecy) word about himself is fulfilled. In John 2:22 there is an equating of the predictive nature of the Scripture and Jesus' word. The word of Jesus is even equated with the word of God (Jn 14:24; 17:14). But the use of logos in John 1:1, 14 has been the focus of much scholarly investigation, giving rise to as much literature and debate as any other single word occurring in the Bible.

2.1. The Religious/Philosophical Background of Logos in John. The main question arising out of John's use of logos in John 1:1, 14 concerns the source of his language. Scholars have assumed that by determining the source of John's language the meaning of the word would become clear. Is he borrowing the term from Hellenistic (see Hellenism) philosophy, from a proto-gnostic source, from Jewish ideas or from a combination of two or three of these? Many have asserted that in his prologue (Jn 1:1-18) John has taken over a so-called logos hymn and modified it to fit his story of Jesus. The milieu in which this logos hymn was composed has been a matter of debate. Was it Christian, Jewish, proto-gnostic or utterly pagan? Other questions center around the structure and meaning of the prologue as a whole as it now stands in the Gospel. The ultimate question is what did the Evangelist mean by using the term logos in John 1:1 and 14?

2.1.1. Platonism and the Logos in the Early Church. In the early church Justin Martyr (c.IOO-c.165) seems to have been the earliest proponent of a developed logos doctrine. Justin was a converted pagan philosopher who generally followed a Platonic-type philosophy. In Platonism and the neo-Platonism of Justin's day logos could denote the all-pervading Reason which gives form to and governs the universe (Justin Martyr Apol. 1.5, 46, 59; II.8, 13). Although in his extant writings Justin quotes the Fourth Gospel only once (Apol. 1.61), much of his imagery parallels that of John. It seems likely that he interprets the logos of John 1:1, 14 in the Platonic or neo-Platonic sense of Reason as it was used by Plato, Heraclitus, the Stoics and Philo. But for Justin the uniqueness of the Christian logos lies in the Incarnation (Justin Martyr Apol. 1.46; 11.10). Justin's bgos doctrine is paralleled or developed in Clement of Alexandria (c. 150-c. 220) and especially in Augustine (354-430) (Civ. D. 10; Conf. VII. 9).

2. 1. 2. Hellenistic Background. Since the rise of the historical-critical method the background of the logos concept in the Fourth Gospel has been sought out in various milieus. R. Bultmann popularized the theories of R. Reitzenstein and W. Bousset that an ancient pagan mythological speculation lay behind the Johannine idea of the logos. The origin of this myth* was not Jewish but was mediated to John via Jewish wisdom speculation. Bultmann, following Reitzenstein, believed that this Jewish source was an Iranian gnostic sect best exemplified in the writings of seventh-century Mandaeanism.

Others have proposed a Hellenistic-Jewish background found in Alexandrian Judaism and exemplified by the Wisdom of Solomon and in the writings of Philo. Although the Wisdom of Solomon generally uses sophia (wisdom) instead of logos, the former term is sometimes given the philosophical attributes of the latter (Wis 7: 15-8: 1).

Philo, the Jewish philosopher who flourished in Alexandria, Egypt, during the first Christian century, seems to combine two systems of thought in his philosophy: the divinely inspired writings of Hebrew prophets and the philosophical discussions current in his day. From the Hebrew Scriptures he gained the subject of his writings. From Platonism and stoicism he gained the hermeneutical axioms by which he interpreted this subject. For Philo, following Plato, there were two worlds, an ideal world of ideas of which God and immortality are a part and a phenomenal world which is a physical copy of the ideal. Unlike later gnostics Philo did not denigrate the physical for the sake of the ideal (Migr. Abr. 89-93). At times in Philo, logos stands for the word by which God created the world (Op. Mund. 20-25). At other times it refers to a mediator between the ideal and the phenomenal ("The same word both pleads with the immortal as suppliant for the afflicted mortality and acts as ambassador of the ruler to the subject" Rer. Div. Her. 205.)

2. 1. 3. Jewish Background. Still others have seen in the logos concept of John's prologue four more strictly Jewish ideas. First, the Jewish targums explained certain theological anthropomorphisms by attributing the activities of God on earth to his mèmrâ’—his word. For example, in Genesis 15:1 where the Hebrew text reads, "I will be a shield for you," Targum* Onqelos reads "My word [memrâ'] will be strength for you." Some have therefore thought that the background for John's use of logos was the Aramaic concept of memra as the explanation of God's relationship to creation.

Second, it could be that logos in John 1 is a reference to Wisdom* (hokmâh) in Proverbs 8: 22-31 and other Wisdom passages (e.g., Job 28). In Proverbs 8 Lady Wisdom claims to have existed with God before the beginning of the world. In 8:30 she even claims to be the artisan ('âmon) at God's side by which he fashioned the world. The motifs of Proverbs 8 are further developed in Sirach 1: 1-10 where wisdom is said to have been created before all else and was poured out on all God's works. In Sirach 24: 23-34 Wisdom is the Law* of Moses.

A third suggested Jewish/Hebrew background to John's logos is the Torah. In Psalm 119: 105 (LXX 118: 105) the Torah is called the Word of God (LXX ho logos sou). This is only one of many passages of this Torah Psalm which identifies the Law with God's Word. (In fact some manuscripts of the LXX substitute nomos [law] for logos in v. 105.) Later Jewish theology identified the Torah as one of the few things which existed before the creation.

A fourth Jewish background suggested by some is the probable Hebrew translation equivalent to logos tou theou (the Word of God) which is dâbar YHWH (the word of Yahweh). Like logos, dâbar can mean word, thing, matter, speech, cause, promise or plan. In the OT the word of the Lord came on or to numerous people (Gen 15: 1, 4; Hos 1: 1 and often in the prophets). In most of these instances the word of the Lord is a prophetic promise or judgment* which is sure to come to pass. Thus the word of the Lord in many contexts becomes a dynamic concept in that it accomplishes God's work (Is 6: 9-10; 24: 1-3; 40: 8; 45: 23; 55: 11). In some contexts the word of the Lord is even personified (Is 9: 8; Ps 107: 20; 147: 15, 18). This personification became even more pronounced in Wisdom 18: 15-17. John 1: 1, 14 picks up this theological motif of the dâbar YHWH which accomplishes God's work and then uses it to explain the Incarnation and to describe who Jesus is, the one sent from God to do his will.

R. Brown exemplifies the opinion of most recent scholars regarding the background to the Johannine logos when he says, "it seems that the Prologue's description of the Word is far closer to biblical and Jewish strains of thought than it is to anything purely Hellenistic" (1. 524). (See Schnackenburg. Cf. Dunn who places the concept in the context of Alexandrian Judaism best exemplified in Philo.)

2. 2. Logos within the Literary Context of the Fourth Gospel. When approaching the issue of backgrounds it is important to keep two things in mind. First, proper historical method dictates a comprehensive and reasoned evaluation of background material. Too often a supposed parallel surfaces which leads to further study in a particular corpus of literature to the neglect of other relevant bodies of literature (cf. Kysar).

Second, verbal similarities do not necessarily imply conceptual similarities. The use of similar words in seemingly similar ways can deceive us into thinking that two authors are discussing the same concept. Only when one document is understood in its own right can it be compared to another which must also be understood in its own right. This being the case, a person reading through the Philonic corpus and the Gospel of John will probably notice many verbal similarities, though they will undoubtedly come to the conclusion that John and Philo, when they use the word logos, are referring to different concepts which hardly overlap. For Philo the logos is the Reason inherent in the universe, whether that Reason be divine or human. Thus it can mediate between God and man. This neo-Platonic concept of the logos is foreign to Johannine thought. As the Gospel unfolds, Jesus, who is the logos, claims to have had a personal relationship with the Father before the Incarnation (Jn 17: 5). Any real similarities that exist between Philo and the Fourth Gospel are due to the fact that both Philo and John draw on the concept of the word of the prophets as the Word of God.

The corollary to this principle is that one must seek to understand words and concepts first and foremost within the immediate literary contexts in which they occur. Therefore, it seems preferable to search for the meaning of logos in the Fourth Gospel itself before looking at religious or literary backgrounds outside the Gospel (cf. Carter, 37).

A careful reading of John 1: 1 yields a wealth of information about the logos. The verse is divided into three simple clauses, each of which contains the imperfect of the verb einai ("to be"). In each of the clauses the verb has a different meaning. In the first clause it means "to exist." The logos existed in the beginning. The phrase "in the beginning" is an obvious allusion to Genesis 1: 1.
(LXX en arche; MT b're'sit). So John is saying that at the very beginning of creation the logos already existed. In the second clause the verb "to be" describes a relationship—the logos was with God in the sense of being in his presence. Therefore, the logos was distinct from God and at the same time in fellowship with God. In the third clause the verb "to be" is used in a predication in which the character or essence of the logos is defined—"The word was God."

The choice of words and their order is very significant in this third clause. If John had wanted to say that the word and God are the same being he could have written ho theos en ho logos. Or if he had wanted to say that the word was a god he could have written ho logos en theos. Or if he had wanted to say the word was divine he could have written ho logos en theios. As it stands, theos en ho logos could mean any of these three statements. But it could also mean the word was God in the sense that the church has explained the nature of Christ since Chalcedon. He is a part of the unity of the triune Godhead. E. C. Colwell has shown that definite predicate nouns preceding the verb do not need the article to show that they are definite. So a reference to the one God of the Bible is entirely possible in this third clause. The church has understood that Christ is deity based on this verse along with others (cf. Phil 2: 6; Col 1: 19; 2: 9; Heb 1: 3, 9). But to say that Christ is the only person in the Godhead is to neglect the second clause of the same verse. In later debates the church has interpreted the NT to say that the logos, with the Father and the Spirit is one of the three eternal and co-equal persons of the Godhead.

John 1: 3-4 describes the activity of the logos. He is the agent of creation ("all things came into being through him"), and he is the source of true life which is the light of all people. Later in the Gospel John expands on this latter activity of the word which gives life (Jn 6: 35, 48, 51, 58; 11: 25) and light (Jn 8: 12; 9: 1-12).

John 1: 14 describes the Incarnation of the logos. Here John uses a different "to be" verb (ginomai) which, to this point in the prologue he has reserved for created beings: "The word became flesh. " Note that John does not say the word became a man. He uses "flesh" (sarx) to signify the very nature of the Incarnation. Wesley captured the essence of john 1: 14 in his great Christmas hymn: "Veiled in flesh the Godhead see; Hail the incarnate deity; Pleased as man with men to dwell; Jesus our Immanuel."

Finally, after saying that the incarnate logos, Jesus Christ has replaced the Law given through Moses, * John identifies him as the monogenēs theos (the unique one of God) who reveals the unseen God. This logos has a personal relationship with the Father. This theme of sonship continues through the Fourth Gospel and infiltrates the rest of the NT canon (see Son of God).

2. 3. Conclusion. The meaning of logos in the Johannine prologue is clear. The Word is the person of the Godhead through whom the world was created, who took on human nature in history and who is the source of life and light for humanity. But why did John use logos to describe this person? If John was thinking of any of the particular background discussed earlier in this article, it is not yet clear which one he had in mind. But his use of logos in the rest of the Gospel (which is the only evidence we have of his intentions) seems to imply that the word he is speaking of is that prophetic word which goes forth from God's mouth to accomplish creation, judgment, redemption and renewal. John uses logos because it is the natural word for expressing the meaning of the Hebrew word dabar when that word was used in the context of God's revelation. Beginning with its first sentences the Gospel asserts that Jesus is God's final Revelator (cf. Heb 1: 1-2). This assertion corresponds to the evangelistic purpose of the Gospel (Carson) and fits well with recent hypotheses that the original historical context of the Fourth Gospel was a debate with first-century Judaism over the locus of revelation (cf. Carter, 47 n. 82).

LORD

The term kyrios ("Lord"), which became for the early church the central Christian confession regarding Jesus (cf. Rom 10: 9; 1 Cor 12: 3; Phil 2: 11), had a wide variety of uses in antiquity. It is necessary to explore some of them before examining how and whether Jesus, the earliest Christians and then the Evangelists used such a term or its Aramaic equivalent to say something essential or even extraordinary about the central figure of Christian faith.

2. Jewish Background
3. The Origin of the Christian Kyrios Usage
4. Jesus As Kyrios
5. Kyrios in the Gospels
7. Conclusion

1. Greek Usage.

The term kyrios was used both in religious and secular contexts in the NT era. On the one hand, both national and mystery religions, especially in the East (i.e., Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, but also in Greece and elsewhere), frequently used the term kyrios or its female equivalent kyria to refer to gods and goddesses such as Isis, Serapis or Osiris (see Hellenism). For instance, we have evidence of the use of the term in coundess papyri and inscriptions of Serapis (e.g., "I thank the Lord Serapis (to kyriō) that when I was in peril on the sea, he saved me immediately," Letter from Apion, soldier in the Roman navy, to his father, second century A.D.). Or again in a letter from a son to his mother, Nilus, in the second century AD. we read, "I make intercession for you day by day to the Lord Serapis" (tō kyriō). It is quite clear in these contexts that the term kyrios connotes a deity who can answer prayers and deserves thanks for divine help. This development seems to go beyond the use of kyrios in the period of classical Greek where the term did refer to the great power a god had over a person or group of persons but does not yet seem to have been a divine tide (cf. Pindar *Isth. 5. 53; Plato Leg. 12. 13).

Equally important for our purposes is the fact that the Roman emperor was as early as the time of Nero called kyrios with the sense of divinity (see Rome). Yet even though he was divinized, he was also known to be a human being. For instance, from an ostraca dated August 4, A. D. 63, we read, "In the year nine of Nero the Lord... (tou kyriou). " Even before this time, however, in the eastern part of the empire and in Egypt in particular the emperor was being called kyrios in a more-than-merely-human sense. Thus, for instance, Oxyrhynchus papyrus 1143, which dates to A. D. 1, speaks of sacrifices and libations "for the God and Lord Emperor" [Augustus]. Even in 12 B. C. we have an inscription to Augustus as theos kai kyrios, "God and Lord" (BGU, 1197, 1, 15).

As A. Deissmann (349-51) long ago argued, it is quite likely that the early church deliberately and polemically ascribed to Jesus titles that had already been applied to the emperor. The meaning of the term within the Pauline communities, namely an absolute divine being to whom one belongs and owes absolute allegiance and submission, becomes all the more evident in light of the Pauline language of self-reference. Paul speaks of himself and others as douloi, "slaves," in order to indicate their relationship to Jesus "the Lord" (Rom 1: 1; 13: 4). This term may be distinguished from misthios, or diakonos, terms used for hired servants who had certain rights and privileges. The doulos who served a kyrios was not free but was the property of his or her Lord. This was the normal terminology in various oriental religions to express the relationship of the adherent to the deity. No doubt to a significant degree this usage has derived from the more ordinary usage in the institution of slavery. The term kyrios had a perfectly normal, nonreligious sense in both classical and Koine Greek, meaning "master" or "owner" of some property (including human property).

The vocative form kyrie frequently was just a polite form of address like the English term "sir." This latter usage is in evidence not only in secular Greek literature but also appears at various points in the NT. For instance in Acts 9: 5 (and par.) Paul addressed the heavenly Jesus with the term kyrie. Since he is asking who he is addressing, it is unlikely that in this case the term means anything but "sir." Again in Mark 7: 28 we find the use of kyrie, in all probability indicating a respectful form of address, not a confession of deity. Once again, in Luke 6: 46 kyrie, kyrie may refer to a respectful form of address, not a confession of divinity. Luke 6: 46 seems to suggest that it is inconsistent to address Jesus in respectful terms as a great teacher* but not do what he commands. It is not impossible, however, that the use of màri, the Aramaic equivalent of kyne, was, at least in the context of Jesus' inner circle of disciples, * already taking on a deeper significance than a mere respectful form of address
There may be a clear distinction between the use of the term kyrios and its near synonym despotes. The latter term suggested arbitrariness while the term kyrios connoted the idea of legitimate authority (cf. Bietenhard, 510; see 6. below).

From these examples we can readily observe the scope of usage of the term kyrios in Greek literature. On the one hand it can have a perfectly mundane use to refer to the master or owner of slaves or some other sort of property such as a household or business. The term in the vocative could also be used as a respectful way of addressing a person, in particular a superior, who was not one's owner or employer. This second sort of usage had become so conventional that it often meant little more than our own use of the address "Dear Sir" in a letter. Yet early in the first century B.C., at least in the eastern part of the empire, the term kyrios, in the sense of divinity, was being applied not only to mythological gods like Serapis or Osiris, but also to one particular human being, the Roman emperor. In such a context it is understandable why Paul might say there are many so-called gods and lords, yet for Christians there is but one Lord, Jesus Christ (1 Cor 8: 5-6). Because of the use of kyrios in these more religious senses, W. Bousset argued that it was not until Christianity reached a mainly Greek or Hellenistic environment that the title "Lord" was applied to Jesus, and then under the influence of pagan usage. This conclusion can be shown to be incorrect by a study of the Jewish usage of kynos and its Aramaic cognates. To this we now turn.

2. Jewish Background.

In the Septuagint (LXX) the term kynos occurs over 9,000 times and in some 6,156 occurrences it is used in place of the proper name of God, Yahweh. This amounts not to a translation of the personal name Yahweh but a circumlocution meant to aid in avoiding saying the sacred Tetragrammaton. There are, however, some doubts as to whether the original compilers of the LXX actually in every case translated the Tetragrammaton with kyrios. Some older manuscripts have the Hebrew YHWH in the Greek text at some places, and at least one LXX manuscript from Qumran uses IAO for the Tetragrammaton instead of kyrios. The copies of the LXX which do have kynos for YHWH date from the fourth century A. D. on and appear to be Christian copies with Christian modifications. Yet J. A. Fitzmyer has produced evidence that early Jews did use the Greek kyrios as well as 'âdbn, or mâr’e, of Yahweh, and thus it is not impossible that early Jewish Christians transferred such a tide from Yahweh to Jesus (1979, 115-42 and 1981, 218-35). But we can no longer say with any assurance that this was done under the influence of the LXX. Examples of kyrios used of Yahweh can be found not only in Josephus and Philo but even as early as in the Wisdom of Solomon (some 27 times cf. Wis 1: 1, 7, 9; 2: 13). Of special significance is Josephus' remark that early Jews refused to call the emperor kyrios precisely because they regarded it as a name reserved for God (J. W. 7. 10. 1 §§418-19).

When in the LXX and other early Jewish literature kynos is used to translate the Hebrew word 'ādon, it is a matter of translation and not a circumlocution. Some 190 times in the I. XX 'ādon is translated kynos and refers to men who were lords or commanders in some sense. In fact there is also some evidence that 'âdbnay was being used as a substitute for YHWH in some cases at Qumran in their Hebrew biblical manuscripts. Equally interesting is the use of 'âdbnay in prayers of invocation at Qumran (cf. 1QM 12: 8, 18; 1Q 34).

The Aramaic use of mārē', or mārā', to refer to God as Lord can be traced back at least as early as Daniel 2: 47 and 5: 23, even though in these texts the term is not yet used in an absolute sense as a title. Evidence of a different sort comes to us from the Genesis Apocryphon (IQapGen). This Qumran document probably dates from about the turn of the era and provides us with examples of God being addressed in Aramaic as mārī, my Lord. This is the only known example of this usage in Aramaic. However, it is quite common to find the more mundane use of mari by a wife or servant of the husband or head of the household. Mār is the Aramaic word for "lord," but it is almost always found with various sorts of suffixes. In 11Q Targum of Job (11QtgJob) we have māre' as a rendering of the Hebrew word sadday (almighty). There are also some fragments from Cave 4 from the Enoch literature where mārē', or mārān, is used of God (cf. 89: 31-36), and the Greek version has ho kyrios. Further evidence of importance comes from the temple discovered at Gaza, which was called the Marneum, where a god called mar was worshipped (Johnson, 151).

L W. Hurtado has amassed material demonstrating the complex nature of early Jewish thought on such subjects as divine agents. He has shown that there is plenty of evidence that in early Judaism* the Jewish concept of the uniqueness of God could co-exist with the idea that God could give a unique place and role to a particular heavenly figure or agent. This included the idea that exalted patriarchs (e. g., Enoch or Moses) and principal angels* (e. g., Michael) could speak and act for God with divine authority and power (see Authority and Power). This evidence is significant because it indicates a larger context of divine agency in early Judaism by which even the first Jewish Christians could have understood Jesus.

Aramaic evidence of singular importance for our study can be found in 1 Corinthians 16:22 and in what is probably the earliest of extra-canonical Christian works, the Didache (cf. Did. 10.6). Here Jesus is referred to as Lord by the earliest Aramaic-speaking Christians (see Languages of Palestine) using the phrase maran atha, or more likely marana tha (cf. Rev 22:20, which is likely a Greek translation of this phrase. This last text makes clear that it is Jesus who is in view, as is also evident in 1 Cor 16:22-23). There are basically three ways the phrase marana tha could be rendered: (1) "Lord come"; (2) "Our Lord has come" or (3) even as a prophetic perfect "The Lord will come." Whichever rendering one chooses, and (1) seems most likely, especially in view of Revelation 22:20, a person who has died is being referred to as Lord. Since the first translation is the most likely, C. F. D. Moule's (41) pointed remark bears repeating: "Besides even if 'our Lord' is not the same as 'the Lord' absolutely, and even if the Aramaic märe had been used mostly for humans and not for God (which we have seen reason to question) one does not call upon a mere Rabbi, after this death, to come. The entire phrase, Maranatha, if it meant 'Come, our Master!' would be bound to carry transcendental overtones even if the maran by itself did not"

It is not completely clear whether marana tha was used to invoke Christ's* presence in worship* or was a wish prayer* for the return of Christ from heaven. * Nevertheless, on the basis of strong evidence that the Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christians, during and likely before Paul's time (i.e., the earliest Jewish Christians), called Jesus "Lord" or at least "our Lord," we must reject Bousset's argument for the origin of the christological tide kyrios in the Hellenistic mission of the early church.

It is striking that Paul, writing in the 50s to Greek-speaking Christians who very likely did not know Aramaic, does not bother to translate marana tha. This must surely mean that he assumes they understood the meaning of the phrase, which in turn suggests that it had long been a common invocation used by Christians. Consequently, the apostle sees no need to explain or translate it The origins of the Christian use of the term Lord for Jesus must be traced at least back to the earliest Aramaic-speaking Jewish-Christians. Can it be traced back even further?

4. Jesus As Kyrios.

Several texts seem likely to go back to a historical setting during the lifetime of Jesus. They may raise the question whether and in what sense Jesus may have been called Lord during his early ministry. We have already dealt with texts where the vocative kyrie was used, and we will not return to them here, as they probably offer us little help. Of more importance may be a text like Mark 11:3 where Jesus tells his disciples to go and get him a colt to ride into Jerusalem and to tell whomever may question, "The Lord has need of it." The Greek reads ho kyrios, and presumably, if this goes back to an actual command of Jesus, it is a rendering of the Aramaic märeʼ. There are several possible ways of looking at this text. On the one hand, even if it does go back to an utterance of Jesus, märeʼ could here mean either the owner or the master, in which case it would imply nothing about Jesus' divine status. Some commentators have speculated either that Jesus was the owner of the animal being requested (which the text does not really suggest) or that the owner of the animal was with Jesus and was loaning the animal to Jesus. This latter view also finds no clues in the text to give it credence. It is much more probable that the meaning here is much like what we find in Mark 14: 14, where Jesus is reported to have said, "The teacher says, Where is my guest room...?" If so, then "Lord" here may be no more than a respectful way of referring to a master teacher, just as we might speak of a master craftsman. It does suggest one who sees himself as having authority to command or commandeer certain things of people, whether they were disciples or not. It is not clear that this particular usage of martʼ bears more significance than this.

Support for this suggestion can be found in several places in the Fourth Gospel. Here we find that the two terms "teacher" and "lord" are juxtaposed (Jn 13: 13-16). It should also be noted that in the primitive resurrection account in John 20 we find Mary Magdalene calling her deceased teacher "my Lord" (20: 13), and when she actually recognizes the voice of Jesus speaking to her we hear the cry "Rabbouni" (20: 16), which is translated "Teacher." This text also seems to suggest that Jesus was called not only rabi, or rabbūni, during his ministry, but was probably also addressed by the term of respect mareʼ which would have connoted that Jesus was a great teacher who exercised authority over his disciples. The disciples looked to Jesus as master in that sense. Another piece of evidence which may support this line of reasoning is the use of slave and master language (Jn 15:15, 20) in referring to the relationship between Jesus and his disciples.

A much more crucial passage for our discussion is Mark 12: 35-37. Here Psalm 110: 7 is quoted, "The Lord said to my lord, sit at my right hand.... " Jesus then asks, "David himself calls him Lord: so how is he his son?" This text should not be abruptly dismissed as reflecting the later theology of the early church, especially inasmuch as there is extensive evidence that Jesus saw himself in messianic terms and at least indirecdy made messianic claims (see Witherington 1990). Indeed Mark 12: 35-37 reflects precisely the son of allusive, or indirect, manner that Jesus seems to have used in public to indicate how he viewed himself. His method was to allude to his significance in such a way as to lure his audience into careful and deep reflection on this important matter. The form of teaching here is characteristic of early Jewish teachers. Taking a puzzling text, they would raise questions about it in such a way as to challenge common misconceptions about various matters, in this case the nature of Messiah as a son of David (set Son of David).

Also favoring the authenticity of this tradition is the fact that it seems to suggest that Jesus challenges the idea that Messiah must be of Davidic origins, a fact which the early church went some lengths to demonstrate (e. g., Mt 1: 1-20; Lk 1: 27; 3: 23-38). In the text as it stands Jesus is suggesting that Messiah is David's Lord, and as such he stands above and exists prior to David. This is the reason Jesus raises the question of why the scribes call Messiah "David's son. " The idea of pre-existence, as Hurtado has shown (41-50), was not uncommonly predicated of God's divine agents in early Judaism.

It is then not inconceivable that Jesus here could have alluded to himself not only as Messiah but even as pre-existent Lord and been understood by his audience. V. Taylor (492-93) puts it as follows and deserves to be quoted at length:

... certainly a secret of Jesus concerning Himself is implied. His question is shaped by His estimate of Messiahship embodied in Himself. His purpose, however, is not to reveal this secret, which is and remains his own, but to expose the futility of Messianic hopes which do not rise above the earthly and human plane.... The allusive character of the saying favours the view that it is an original utterance; it half conceals and half reveals the 'Messianic secret'. It suggests, but does not state the claim that Jesus is supernatual in dignity and origin and that His Sonship is no mere matter of human descent. It is difficult to think that the doctrinal beliefs of a community could be expressed in this allusive manner. The intention in a doctrinal statement is that it should be understood, whereas the purpose of the saying is to challenge thought and decision. This is the very idiom of Jesus Himself as his message to the Baptist shows (Lk. vii. 22f.). But demonstrably, it is not the tone or the method of primitive Christianity.

This means that ultimately the proclamation of Jesus as Lord goes back to something Jesus suggested about himself, albeit obliquely, during his ministry and in public. Yet this does not explain when and at what point Jesus' followers took the hint and really began to see Jesus in this light. We have noted that the evidence is at best scant that during his ministry Jesus' disciples thought of him as mare' in any sort of transcendent sense (Lk 6: 46 may suggest this). What then prompted the confession of Jesus as Lord? Here we may consider clues from several sources.

First, there is the matter of the primitive confessional material Paul uses in Romans 1: 3-4. This text certainly suggests that Jesus assumed new functions, authority and power as a result of his resurrection. Indeed, he was given the new title "Son of God in power" as a result of the resurrection. Another piece of evidence comes to us from what is probably a christological hymn Paul is quoting in Philippians 2: 6-11. Here we are told that because of Jesus' giving up the status and prerogatives of "the being equal to God" and taking on the form not merely of a human being but of a slave, being obedient to God's plan even to the point of death, he has now been highly exalted and given the name which is above all names. Jesus moves from being a doulos to the kyrios. In the context of the hymn that name which is above all others is not Jesus, a name he already had, but the throne name he acquired when he assumed the functions of deity, ruling over all things. This name is kyrios. Acts 2: 36, which may reflect some of the early apostolic preaching, says, "Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly that God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom you crucified. " In view of the fact that Luke readily calls Jesus kyrios in his Gospel, it is most unlikely that he would have created a text like this which suggests, if not states, that lordship is most appropriately predicated of Jesus after his death (see Death of Jesus). This text seems to indicate that these tides are especially apt because of what God did for Jesus after he was crucified—namely, as Acts 2: 32 states, "This Jesus God raised up, and of that we are all witnesses."

Another hint comes from John 20: 18 which suggests that the earliest post-Easter proclamation of faith was, "I have seen the [risen] Lord." In short the evidence suggests that the confession "Jesus is Lord" arose as a result of the earliest disciples' experiences of the risen Christ (see Resurrection). Indeed, Paul suggests that such a confession could not arise until after the Lord had risen and the Spirit Holy Spirit) had descended on Jesus' followers, for he says, "No one can say 'Jesus is Lord' except by the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 12: 3).

While the ultimate ground for the confession of Jesus as Lord seems to go back to something Jesus alluded to during his ministry, the formal point of departure for such a confession by the disciples was their experiences of the risen Lord on and after Easter Sunday, as well as their reception of the Holy Spirit. As best we can tell the first to so confess Jesus seems to have been the person who first claimed to have seen Jesus risen—Mary Magdalene. In view of the negative view regarding a woman's word of witness that existed in many places in the first century, but especially in Palestine (see Witherington 1984), it is not credible that the early church invented the idea that Mary Magdalene was the first to claim, "I have seen the Lord." Indeed, the early witness list in 1 Corinthians 15: 5-8 is indicative of the tendency in the early church to move in quite the opposite direction and claim the prominence of the Twelve and the apostles* as witnesses (see Witness) of the resurrection.

We find further evidence that the experience of the risen Lord led to the full confession of Jesus' significance in John 20: 28, where the climactic confession in a Gospel full of confessions is ho kyrios mou kai ho theos mou ("My Lord and my God"). It may be that this material is included here because the Evangelist, writing toward the close of the first century, knew of the Emperor Domitian's (A. D. 81-96) practice of naming himself in official correspondence dominus et deus noster ("our Lord and God"). The Fourth Evangelist may have been countering such a claim. But even if this is so, it seems rather clear that John wishes to convey to his audience that the true confession of Jesus first came about as a result of seeing the risen Lord, both in the case of Mary Magdalene and Thomas. We conclude that Hurtado should be heeded when he says:

Rather than trying to account for such a development as the veneration of Jesus by resort to vague suggestions of ideational borrowing from the cafeteria of heroes and demigods of the Greco-Roman world, scholars should pay more attention to this sort of religious experience of the first Christians. It is more likely that the initial and main reason that this particular chief agent (Jesus) came to share in the religious devotion of this particular Jewish group (the earliest Christians) is that they had visions and other experiences that communicated the risen and exalted Christ and that presented him in such unprecedented and superlative divine glory that they felt compelled to respond devotionally as they did (121).

Christological convictions and confessions were first generated by the experience of the risen Lord and his Spirit. This leads us to examine how the term kyrios came to be used by the Evangelists, who were likely composing their Gospels during the last third of the first century A.D.

5. Kyrios in the Gospels.

The Synoptic Gospels, and Luke in particular, include nearly the whole range of uses of the term kyrios as we have discussed it. There are some 717 passages where the term kyrios occurs in the NT, and 210 of them can be found in Luke-Acts (another 275 are found in Paul). The fact that the majority of the uses of kyrios are found in the writings of Luke and Paul may be explained by the fact that they were in the main addressing Gentile audiences, or at least they were writing to areas where Greek language and culture were the predominant influences. In contrast to Luke kynos occurs only 18 times in Mark and 80 times in Matthew, while there are 52 instances in the Fourth Gospel.

5. 1. Kyrios in the Synoptics. A sampling of the various uses not referring to Jesus can now be given. In Mark and the Q* material God is never called kynos except in Mark 5: 19 and Mark 13: 20. Neither Matthew nor Luke follow Mark in either of these examples. In the Lukan parallel to Mark 5:19 we find ho theos ("God"; Lk 8: 39) instead of Mark's ho kynos, and Matthew does not include parallel material at all. In the Matthean parallel to Mark 13: 20 the First Evangelist uses the indirect form, "and if the days had not been shortened" (Mt 24: 22), instead of Mark's, "And if the Lord had not shortened the days... " This difference cannot be explained by the idea that Matthew and Luke do not call God kyrios, for quite clearly (especially in the birth narratives) both of these Evangelists do (cf. Mt 1: 20, 22, 24; 2: 13, 15, 19 with Lk 1: 6, 9, 11, 15, 17, 25, 28, 38, 45, 58, 66; 2: 9, 15, 22, 23, 24, 26, 39). We also find kyrios used of God in the resurrection material at Matthew 28: 2 and in two passages unique to the Third Gospel, Luke 5: 17 and 20: 37. Kyrie as a conventional address of respect is always used in the Gospels whenever a slave speaks to a master. However, it can also be found on the lips of Jews addressing Pilate (Mt 27: 63; see Pontius Pilate), of workers speaking to the owner of a vineyard (Lk 13: 8) of a son to his father when he works for him (Mt 21: 30), of Mary to the gardener (Jn 20:15) and, finally, on the lips of a Syro-Phoenician woman addressing Jesus (Mk 7: 28; Mt 15: 27). The use of the doubled form, kyne kyne, seems to reflect Palestinian usage (cf. Mt 7: 21, 22; 25: 11; Lk 6: 46).

Kyrios can be used to refer to the lord or owner of some property or estate, such as the owner of a vineyard (Mk 12: 9 and par.). We have already noted that Mark 11:3 and parallels likely reflects the same sort of usage. The term can also be used either of the master of a (free) steward (Lk 16: 3) or of an owner of slaves (almost always with a qualifier like "his" or "my"; cf. Mt 18: 25; 24: 45; Lk 12: 37, 42; 14: 23). But we do not find the Gospels using kynos either for the emperor or for any pagan deities.

There are, however, some examples where kyrios seems to refer to ability and the right to exercise authority and power. In these cases it amounts to a non-titular use without any transcendent implications. For instance, in Mark 2: 28 when Jesus says the Son of man is lord of the Sabbath, *he means he is one who exercises authority over the rules that govern the Sabbath. Of a similar nature is the non-titular use in Luke 10: 2 where God is said to be the one who controls the harvest; he is "the lord of the harvest."

5. Kyrios in Luke. Regarding the absolute use of the noun kyrios, Matthew and Mark do not use the term in a transcendent sense within their narrative frameworks of the sayings of Jesus (Mk 11: 3 is probably not an exception). But Luke, on the other hand, does employ such a usage. For instance, in Luke 7: 13 we read, "And the Lord (ho kyrios) had compassion on him. " Or in Luke 10: 5 the Evangelist writes, "And the Lord (ho kyrios) appointed seventy others... " Luke, as a Gentile* writing exclusively to a Gentile audience, shows no reticence in using ho kyrios of Jesus and thereby implying the transcendent religious sense of the term. This is not to say that Luke is being totally anachronistic, for he is usually careful not to place the term on Jesus' own lips or on the lips of his interlocutors in a sense or manner that it would not likely have been used during the ministry of Jesus. Some probable exceptions are found in Luke 1: 43, where Elizabeth speaks of Mary as "the mother of my Lord"; Luke 2:11, where Jesus is identified as "Lord" to the shepherds; and Luke 1:38, where Mary is called the handmaiden of the Lord, though here it seems to refer to Numerous other references in Luke's Gospel indicate the Evangelist's regular use of kyrios within the narrative framework of his account of Jesus' ministry (cf. 7: 19; 10: 1, 39, 41; 11: 39; 12: 42; 16: 8; 17: 5, 6; 18: 6; 19: 8a; 22: 61; 24: 3, 34). When he is speaking of Jesus, Luke is not reluctant to use the Christian title "Lord." The implication may be that Luke is suggesting that at least in being, if not yet fully in action or recognition, Jesus was already the kynos.

Luke does not seem to introduce the title into his Markan material (22: 61 might be an exception). This raises the question of whether Luke found this frequent use of the titular kynos in his own source material. However, where we find kyrios in material drawn from Q or L, it appears to be his own addition (cf. 7: 19; 10: 1; 11: 39; 12: 42; 17: 5-6). So on the whole it appears that most instances of the titular kynos in the Third Gospel are a result of Luke's editorial activity (cf. I. de la Potterie). There is some justification then for H. Conzelmann's claim that for Luke, Jesus is first of all the kynos who was given dominion by God and rules over the Christian community by means of the Spirit (176-79).

5. 3. Kyrios in Matthew. In the First Gospel strangers, enemies and Judas Iscariot (see Judas Iscariot) always greet Jesus with didaskale or rabbi, but never with kyrie, while the disciples and those who seek out Jesus for healing never use the former terms but always address Jesus as kyrie. So while J. D. Kingsbury (1975 "Kyrios") has perhaps made too much of Matthew's use of the vocadve kyrie, there is some justification for including some of these instances in a discussion of Matthew's christology.

The First Evangelist is not shy of using kyrios of Jesus. For example, in Matthew 3: 3 (following Mark 1: 3) he quotes Isaiah 40: 3 ("... prepare the way of the Lord... ") and implicitly applies to Jesus a title originally referring to Yahweh. This reference, however, only becomes evident from what follows in the narrative, not from the quote itself. On the other hand, within the temptation narrative (see Temptation of Jesus) Matthew 4: 7 ("You shall not tempt the Lord your God," Deut 6: 16) might at first glance seem to imply that kyrios refers to Jesus. But even though it is Jesus who is being tempted, two factors tell against this reading: (1) In 4: 10 Jesus uses the same language (quoting Deut 6: 13) and there it is rather clear that Yahweh is in view; (2) Jesus is quoting Scripture against the Devil (see Demon, Devil, Satan) and in both the quote that precedes... and the one that follows the reference to God is a reference to someone other than Jesus the speaker (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

Matthew 7: 21-22 is a more promising case, even though the vocative is used. Here it seems clear that it is disciples who have prophesied and done miracles in Jesus' name that call Jesus "Lord, Lord." Yet it is also clear from this text that calling Jesus "Lord" and even doing deeds and proclaiming words in his name is insufficient if one does not also hear and heed Jesus' words and do the Father's will.

There is a notable stress on the lordship of Jesus as the First Gospel works to its climax. Thus for instance in Matthew 22: 44 Jesus is clearly implied to be Lord, and in 24: 42 Jesus refers to himself as "your Lord" (note the parallel with Son of man in 24: 39). This last example is of course not an instance of the absolute usage ho kyrios. But taken together with some of the other texts already cited and the fact that Jesus is speaking of this Lord in the language of the Yom Yahweh (day of the Lord), we should surely understand ho kyrios to mean more than "master" in this instance.

Kingsbury (1975 "Kyrios") offers some helpful conclusions about the use of kyrios in Matthew, particularly his observation that the word is most often used in Matthew as a relational term—the master as opposed to the slave, the owner as opposed to the worker, even the father as opposed to the son (Mt 21: 28-30). However, none of these examples come from passages of christological significance. Yet it is telling that in the christological passages we have examined the relational character of the term is indicated by (1) the use of the vocative "Lord, Lord" in 7: 21-22; (2) the use of "your Lord" in 24: 42; and (3) the use of "my Lord" in the citation of Psalm 110: 1 in 22: 44. Kingsbury has shown, however, that kyrios is not Matthew's premier tide for Jesus. When it does bear christological weight it is usually explained or qualified by another tide and thus at most it should be regarded as an auxiliary christological tide in the First Gospel. We have also noted a certain allusive or indirect character in some of the christological passages (cf. 3: 3; 22: 44).

5. 4. Kyrios in John. John's christological use of kyrios is scant compared to Luke, yet more evident than in Matthew. Basically the tides Son, Son of God (see Son of God) or Messiah/Christ (see Christ) occur in John more frequently than Lord. This may seem surprising given the likelihood that it is the latest Gospel, written well after the confession "Jesus is Lord" would have been widespread in the church. While the address of the paralytic (vocative, kyrie) in John 5: 7 should not be counted as having christological weight, John's reference to Jesus as "the Lord" in 6:23 is a christological usage (if we do not follow the few Western manuscripts [D, 086, arm et al.] that omit the relevant phrase here).

Peter's address to Jesus, "Lord (kyrie), to whom shall we go?" (6: 68), may be intended to be seen as more than a respectful form of address, especially in view of Peter's confession in 6: 69. A christological meaning is possible but not as likely in the address of the woman caught in adultery (8: 11), though the pericope was not originally part of this Gospel. More clearly, the healed blind man clearly uses kyrie (9: 36) as a respectful form of address. The editorial commentary in 11: 2 provides us with a clear Christian use of ho kyrion. The blessing at the triumphal entry (see Triumphal Entry) in 12: 13 (citing Ps 118: 26) likely refers to God, not Jesus, as kynos. John 12: 38, citing Isaiah 53: 1, should likely also be seen in this way.

Peter's address of "Lord" in John 13: 6, 9, the narrative of Jesus' washing the disciples' feet, may have some christological implications in light of Peter's earlier use of the term in 6: 68-69. But we should not discount the possibility kyrie is here used as a term of respect for one's teacher. The same can be said of Peter's words in 13: 36-37 and Thomas's address in 14: 5. It may be of some significance that (1) Jesus does not call himself kyrios in the Fourth Gospel; (2) the Evangelist clearly does call Jesus kyrios in his editorial remarks and within the narrative framework; (3) up until John 20 whenever the term is found on a disciple's lips, it is always in the vocative, and none of these instances is clearly christological. In fact the words of Mary Magdalene in John 20: 13 ("my Lord"), which is not cast in the absolute form, is the first non-vocative use of kyrios by a character within the narrative, and even here it may not bear christological meaning.

This means that John 20: 18; 20: 28; 21: 7; and possibly the multiple examples of the vocative in 21:15-21, are the only clear references in this Gospel where a character in the narradve calls Jesus kyrios in the transcendent sense. This strongly suggests that the Fourth Evangelist is consciously trying to avoid anachronism in his use of this title and wishes to indicate that Jesus was only truly known and confessed to be Lord as a result of the disciples' encounters with the risen Lord.

Not surprisingly, the use of kyrios in Acts reflects some of the same sort of phenomena found in Luke's Gospel. The term appears frequency and is used in a variety of ways. Since Acts reflects the period of time after the resurrection of Jesus, it is hardly surprising that the confessional use of the term is even more plainly evident here than in the Gospel. Thus, for instance, Acts 1:21 provides us with the first juxtaposition of the absolute form of Lord with the name Jesus (ho kyrios jesous), a phenomenon which occurs regularly in the Pauline epistles (cf. also Acts 15: 11; 20: 35). Here too at the very beginning of the book the risen Jesus is addressed in prayer as kyrios (cf. 1: 24). We also find OT passages referring to Yahweh as Lord now being applied to Jesus (Acts 2: 25 using Ps 16: 8-11 ). We have already had occasion to refer to Acts 2: 36, but note that in 2: 34-35 we have yet another use of Psalm 110: 1 referring to Jesus, this time by Peter. It is not impossible that Peter was following the precedent of Jesus' own use of this text. At Acts 11: 16 we find an example of a saying from the period of the ministry (attributed to John in Mt 3: 11; cf. Jn 1: 26, 33, not to the kyrios). These examples are sufficient to show that the full range of early Christian uses of kynos are found in Acts in a way that is not true of the Gospels, including in Luke. The use of the phrase "the Lord" continued to be Luke's favorite designation for Jesus in his narrative material (cf. e. g., Acts 11: 21, 23, 24; 15: 35, 40).

Mention should also be made of the use of despotēs in Luke-Acts. In Acts 4: 24 God is addressed as despotēs in communal prayer, just as he is in Simeon's paean of praise in Luke 2: 29 {see Simeon's Song). This way of addressing God is common both in the LXX and in Josephus and reflects Hellenistic usage. Within the context of the NT it appears unlikely that this term connotes arbitrary power; more likely the one praying reflects a submission to the absolute power and authority of the despotēs. This would mean that while the worshippers would still see themselves as God's slaves and ascribe the appropriate antonym to God, the word no longer connotes what we mean by the English equivalent, "despot" But we must also bear in mind the likelihood that this usage in both the Gospel and Acts goes back to Luke's editorial hand, for certainly in the case of Simeon and possibly in the case of the Aramaic-speaking Christians of Acts 4, the language of prayer would not have been Greek.

7. Conclusion.

A somewhat clear development of the use of the term kyrios for Jesus of Nazareth can now be traced. The usage begins with indirect hints during the time of Jesus' ministry, through accounts of the experiences of the risen Lord, to the use of marana tha in early Palestinian Jewish-Christian contexts, to evidence of the christological use of the term in the narrative framework of Luke and John, and finally to the variegated use of the term in Acts. There it is used in combination with other names and titles, as a form of address to the exalted Christ, and in the transfer of reference from Yahweh to Jesus in quotes from the OT.

Interestingly, we do not find the use of the absolute or transcendent kynos in the narrative framework of Matthew and Mark, and there is some attempt by both Luke and the Fourth Evangelist to avoid anachronism by not placing the full Christian use of the term on anyone's lips during the ministry of Jesus. It is also significant that Luke-Acts and John intimate that the confession of Jesus as Lord arose as a result of the resurrection experiences. This of course did not prevent the Evangelists from sometimes calling the Jesus of the ministry "Lord" in their narratives, for it was "this same Jesus" whom God had raised from the dead who took on the tasks of Lord in earnest when he joined God in heaven. In other words, the continuity of usage of kyrios from before to after the death and resurrection in the Gospels reflects the belief in the continuity of personhood between the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus) and the risen Lord.

The use of the term kyrios in a religious sense was sure to be taken to imply Jesus' divinity, especially in the eastern part of the Roman Empire and in Gentile contexts. The evidence suggests that this remarkable mutation in the Jewish concept of monotheism took place in the earliest Palestinian Jewish-Christian community as a result of some hints from Jesus himself and especially as a result of the experiences of the risen Lord shared by some of the eyewitnesses of the life of the historical Jesus. The evidence we have studied indicates that the high christology of the early Christian church was not a new development of the late first century A.D.

Jesus brought into the world* a new emphasis on love which he demonstrated in his own life and which he made clear he expected his disciples* to produce too. For him love depends on the nature of the lover rather than that of the beloved. Jesus loved because he was a loving person, not because he found attractive qualities in those he loved. His followers are to be loving people, not simply to be drawn to attractive people.

1. Terminology
2. General Use
3. Divine Love
4. Human Love

1. Terminology.
In the Gospels the usual verb for "to love" is agapaō (sixty-three times), phileō occurs twenty-one times. The noun agapē is found nine times; philia not at all; the adjective agapetos fifteen times. Agapaō was replacing phileō as we see also in the LXX where Hatch and Redpath have four columns of references to agapaō with about half a column for phileō. There is a clear majority of references to the agapē words in the Gospels, but the important thing is not so much the words chosen as the meaning and associations the Evangelists put into them. Matthew has the love words a total of seventeen times, Mark nine, Luke eighteen and John fifty-seven; John has them more than all the others put together.

2. General Use.

Jesus sometimes speaks of love in the way anyone else would, such as the words "If you love them that love you" (Mt 5: 46; Lk 6: 32), a reciprocal love that anybody might practice. Similarly a slave might love one master but not another (Mt 6: 24), and it is not so very dissimilar with the centurion who loved the Jewish nation (Lk 7: 5) or the attitude of the forgiven debtor (Lk 7: 42; see Forgiveness of Sins). Even sinners* love those that love them (Lk 6: 32). It is in this spirit that John speaks of those who love human praise (Jn 12: 43). This sort of thing is the common stuff of humanity, and there is nothing remarkable about it. It is an important part of life, though the world's love may grow cold (Mt 24: 12).

3. Divine Love.

More significant is the sweeping statement that God loved "the world" and loved it so much that he gave his Son (Jn 3: 16). That the Father loves people is not often stated in set terms, but this love is implied throughout the Gospels. We see it, for example, in Jesus' statement that the Father cares for all creation, including the birds and the flowers, and therefore much more for people (Mt 6: 25-34); he sends his sunshine and rain on all, good and bad alike (Mt 5: 45). It is implied also in the address "Father," which brings the intimate language of the family, with all its overtones of love and care, into our understanding of the deity. There is no indication that any merit or attractiveness on the pan of people generates this love. On the contrary, it is common to all the Gospels that people are sinners (cf. Mt 7: 11; even when they do good deeds it remains that they are basically evil!). But God still loves them. The proposition "God is love" comes from 1 John 4: 8, 16, but the truth it expresses runs through the Gospels.
3. 1. Love within the Godhead "The Father loves the Son" (Jn 3: 35). A reason may be given for this, as when John quotes Jesus: "for this reason the Father loves me, that I lay down my life" (Jn 10: 17). This does not, of course, signify that it was the death of Christ that induced the Father to love people; Jesus is saying rather that his death (see Death of Jesus) is in the loving purpose of the Father (compare how when someone does a good deed, even though there was love before the deed, there may well be the response "I love you for that!"). Jesus may take the love of the Father for him as basic and reason from it: "Just as the Father has loved me, I also have loved you" (Jn 15: 9). That the Father loves him is so obvious that it does not require demonstration. Jesus simply assumes it and goes on from there. There is a similar appeal to the love of the Father as basic in the great prayer* in the upper room on the eve of the crucifixion when Jesus prays, "that the world may know that you sent me, and have loved me as I have loved them" (Jn 17: 23; cf. also 17: 24, 26).

In one way or another every occurrence of the word "beloved" in the Gospels refers to Jesus. When he was baptized (see Baptism) there was a voice from heaven* that greeted him as "my Son, the beloved" (Mt 3: 17; Mk 1: 11; Lk 3: 22), an experience repeated at the Transfiguration* (Mt 17: 5; Mk 9: 7; Lk 9: 35). Matthew makes use of the term in a quotation from Isaiah which he sees as fulfilled in Jesus (Mt 12: 18), and it occurs again in a parable which surely speaks to us about God's beloved Son (Mk 12: 6; Lk 20: 13). The Evangelists leave us in no doubt about the love of the Father for his dear Son.

The love of the Son for the Father is not mentioned so often. In fact it comes to expression once only in the whole New Testament, namely when Jesus says, "... but that the world may know that I love the Father... " (Jn 14: 31). This love is, of course, implied everywhere and very little in the Gospels makes sense apart from the truth that the Son loves the Father. The whole mission of salvation* on which Jesus was embarked was due to the divine love and the Son's part in that mission implies his love for the Father as well as the love of both for sinners. The love of the Son for the Father and of the Father for the Son is a necessary pan of understanding the divine salvation that was wrought in Christ.

3. 2. The Divine Love for People. God's love is a love for all those he has created (Jn 3: 16) and, of course, God loves those who love his Son (Jn 14: 23). This passage brings the further thought that the Father and the Son will both make their dwelling with the person who loves Jesus. The Father's love is not to be thought of as some lofty and ethereal emotion; it has its effects here on earth in the continual presence of the divine with the believer. The followers of Jesus are "perfected into one," and this is the mark whereby the world will know that the Father has both sent the Son and loved his followers just as he loves him (Jn 17: 23).

3. 3. The Son's Love for People. That Jesus loved his disciples is plain in the Gospel narratives, though this does not often come to clear expression. There are references to an unnamed disciple "whom Jesus loved" (Jn 13: 23; 19: 26; 20: 2; 21: 7, 20), and who has traditionally been understood to be the apostle John (see Disciples; Farewell Discourse). For our present purpose, more important than his identity is the fact that Jesus had a warm love for this man. And his affection for Lazarus is revealed in the way people told him of his friend's illness: "Lord, look, he whom you love is sick" (Jn 11: 3; cf. v. 36). John also tells us that Jesus "loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus" (Jn 11: 5), where the recital of each one separately indicates that Jesus did more than love the family in a general way; it points to an affection for each individual. Elsewhere we are told explicitly that Jesus loved one young man, who nevertheless declined to follow him and went away grieving (Mk 10: 21-22); Jesus' love was not confined to the disciples.

In addition to such statements about Jesus' love for individuals, there are references to his love for the disciples as a group. John prefixes his account of what happened in the upper room on the last night of Jesus' earthly life by saying that Jesus "loved his own who were in the world" and that "he loved them completely" (Jn 13: 1; or "to the end"; the Jerusalem Bible has "now he showed how perfect his love was"). John goes on to recount the story of Jesus' washing of the feet of the disciples, an action that proceeded from the perfection of his love.

Later in the same chapter there is the thought that Jesus' love sets the disciples an example: they are to love one another, Jesus says, "as I have loved you" (Jn 13: 34), an injunction he repeats later (Jn 15: 12). Their love will show itself in keeping his commandments and then the person who loves in this way will be loved by the Father "and I will love him" (Jn 14: 21). Jesus says that he has loved the little group just as the Father has loved him (Jn 15: 9).

All this amounts to an impressive indication that God does not merely tolerate sinners: he loves them. It has been no part of this article to traverse the Gospel teaching on universal sinfulness, but there can be no doubt that all four Evangelists express the reality and the seriousness of sin done before a holy and all-powerful God. But God for all his ability to punish and for all his own spodess purity does not regard sinners with aversion, but with love, with the costly love that we see in the cross where Jesus died to save them. The Evangelists do not specially draw attention to the love the cross implies (apart from Jn 3: 16), but the unforgettable picture they draw is that of a God of love who has done all that is necessary to bring salvation to unworthy and evil people. That is no ordinary love.

4. Human Love.

4. 1. The Love of People for God Jesus told the Pharisees* that "the first commandment" is "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind and with all your strength" (Mk 12: 29-30; cf. Mt 22: 37-38; Lk 10: 27). This puts love for God squarely at the heart of real religion: Nothing is more important than loving God. This love brooks no rival, and Jesus points to slavery to illustrate his point. "No one, " he says, "can be a slave to two owners" (Mt 6: 24; cf. Lk 16: 13). It was, of course, possible for a slave to have dual ownership, but he could not give the wholehearted service that slavery demands to more than one person. It is similarly not possible to give the wholehearted love that God demands to anyone other than he. Love to God is no tepid affair, scarcely raising a ripple in life. It is wholehearted devotion, involving all of life. Love for God suffuses the whole person. This kind of love matters much more than even the most important outward ceremonies (Mk 12: 33).

So it is that when Jesus is depicting a church* in decline he says "the love of the many will grow cold" (MI 24:12), where "love" may mean love for other people, but will surely include the love of God. Again, Jesus complains that the Pharisees, while punctilious in their tithing of herbs, neglect "justice and the love of God" (Lk 11:42), qualities that are at the heart of right religion. Similarly, John tells us that Jesus reproached those who "do not have the love of God within" themselves (Jn 5: 42). Such passages are explicit, but quite apart from them the general tenor of Jesus' teaching is significant. He does not call people to face up to a stern God who is eager to punish them, a God before whom it would be important to merit rewards by good works. He depicts a loving God, one who sent his Son to save them and to call them into an enriched life in which striving to avert punishment and merit reward is not the way. Rather, people are to trust God and respond to love with love. The whole of the Law* and the Prophets is summed up in two commandments to love (Mt 22: 40).

4. 2. The Love of People for People. Since Jesus emphasizes so strongly his love and that of the Father and since he calls on his followers to love God, it is not surprising that he also insists that it is important that they love other people. On the eve of the crucifixion John tells us that Jesus said to the disciples, "A new commandment I give you, that you love one another; as I have loved you, that you love one another. " He goes on to say that people will know that they are his disciples if they "love one another" (Jn 13:34-35). A little later he repeats it: "This is my commandment, that you love one another even as I have loved you" (Jn 15: 12). It is love that marks out the Christian from other people.

Perhaps nothing was more revolutionary in Jesus' teaching than his command that his followers love their enemies (Mt 5: 44; Lk 6: 27, 35). In every age it has been normal to love one's friends and hate one's enemies, and Jesus points out that words about hate have in popular understanding been added to God's command to love (Mt 5: 43). The Qumran scrolls contain the explicit command to "hate all the sons of darkness," a contemporary expression of the thought. But Jesus will have none of this. To love those who love us is nothing more than the way of the world and even sinners do this (Lk 6: 32).Repeatedly he insists that people must love their neighbors as they love themselves, as the commandment tells them (Mt 5: 43; 19: 19; 22: 39; Mk 12: 31). Love, not hate, is the mark of the Christian.

The importance of the love command cannot be overestimated. In Jesus' day the Jews discerned 613 commandments in the Law, and there were vigorous discussions about the relative importance of some of these (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Jesus swept aside all such deliberations with his revolutionary insistence on the centrality of love, and for good measure he added that the teaching of the prophets is included in this command. At one stroke he did away with any understanding of the service* of God that sees it as concerned with the acquiring of merit or with an emphasis on liturgical concerns. What matters may be summed up in one word: love. The love for which Jesus looks is not, of course, a meritorious achievement. It is the response to God's prior love, a wholehearted response to all that God is and has done for us. It is a love directed first to the God from whom love comes and then overflowing in love to people. It means that love is central to the whole way of life of the follower of Jesus (see Discipleship).
There is a very suggestive expression toward the end of the incident in which a sinful woman anointed Jesus' feet as he reclined at table in the house of a Pharisee. Jesus said of her, "Her sins, many as they are, have been forgiven, for she loved much" (Lk 7: 47). Loved whom? There is no object and the point appears to be, not that she loved any particular person, but that she had become a loving person (cf. E. Stauffer, "the person now has love, is filled with it, and is guided by it in all his actions, rather than that he is to show it to such and such people," TDNT 1. 47). Chrisdans are loving.

LUKE, GOSPEL OF

Luke's Gospel (see Gospel [Genre]) is the longest of the four Gospels. It is also the only Gospel with a sequel. By continuing his literary project into the Acts of the Apostles, Luke not only introduces us to Jesus and his ministry, but also to how that ministry relates to significant events in the early church * This enables Luke to discuss how God* brought his sal-vadon* in Jesus, how the church preached Jesus and how it carried out its mission to both Jew and Gentile. *

Luke's two-part work highlights God's plan. It explains how Jews and Gentiles could become equals in a community planted by God, even though that community was rooted in a promise to Israel. * More specifically, four issues would have posed problems for those who observed the church during Luke's time.

First was the question of salvation. How could Gentiles be included as God's people on an equal basis with Jews, extending even to matters like sharing table fellowship and eliminating the necessity of circumcision?

Second was the apparent paradox of the claim that God's plan was at work while Jews, the most natural recipients for the good news, were largely responding negatively. How could God's plan and God's messengers, especially Paul, meet so much hostility?

Third was the problem of explaining how the person and teaching of a crucified Jesus fit into this plan. How could Jesus continue to exercise a presence and represent the hope of God, when he was physically absent? How could the church exalt an absent and slain figure, and regard him as the center of God's work?

Fourth was the question of what it means to respond to Jesus. What is required and what can one expect for such a commitment? How should men and women live until the day Jesus returns?

Luke's Gospel and its sequel deal with all of these issues. His task is to reassure his readers of the place of Gentiles in the new community and the role of Jesus in God's plan (cf. Lk 1:4).

4. Conclusion

1. Authorship, Origin and Purpose.

The Third Gospel and Acts do not directly identify their author. We are left to examine the internal and external evidence and draw the most plausible conclusion.

1. 1. Internal Evidence for Authorship. Internal features draw our attention to two points. First, the author is not an eyewitness to most of the events in his two volumes, especially those tied to the ministry of Jesus (1: 1-2). Rather, he has relied on his study of traditions derived from eyewitnesses and ministers of the Word (1:2-4). Second, he presents himself as a companion of Paul in the so-called we-sections of Acts (Acts 16: 10-17; 20: 5-15; 21: 1-18; 27: 1-28: 16). This latter feature, though its significance is debated, narrows the search for possible authors.

Interpreters have debated whether the we-sections reflect the testimony of an eyewitness (Ellis) or are a literary device gauged to create the impression of an eyewitness (Haenchen and Vielhauer). Related to this issue is the question of how well the author of the Third Gospel knew Paul, since the we-sections portray its author as a travelling companion of Paul. Those who reject such a connection attempt to compare Acts' picture of Paul with the self-portrait of the Pauline epistles. They argue that the two pictures do not match in historical detail or in theological emphasis. In addition, the author fails to use the Pauline epistles to describe Paul's work and position.

Vielhauer argued that the Lukan Paul is too dissimilar from Paul as we know him from his letters for the author of the Third Gospel to have been a companion of Paul. But Fitzmyer has defended the connection, especially on the basis of the we-sections in Acts, arguing that a creative literary device cannot explain how the units appear and disappear in such an arbitrary manner (Fitzmyer 1989). He also notes that several "sailing" references, which would be candidates for such literary insertions, lack them (Acts 13: 4; 13: 13; 14: 26; 17: 14; 18: 18, 21; 20: 1-2). He suggests that Luke may have been only a junior companion, in contrast to Irenaeus' famous claim that Luke was "inseparable" from Paul (Harr. 3. 14. 1). In addition, Goulder has suggested that Luke may have known and alluded to Paul's letter to Corinth and, to a lesser extent, the letter to Thessalonica. Others have defended the compatibility of the portraits of Paul found in Acts and the epistles (Bruce 1975/76). From the internal evidence of Luke-Acts it appears that the writer knew Paul and was at least a second-generation Christian.

1. 2. External Evidence for Authorship The Pauline letters name some of Paul's traveling companions: Mark, Aristarchus, Demas and Luke (Philem 24; Col 4: 14). To this list one could add figures such as Timothy, Titus, Silas, Epaphras and Barnabas. Yet despite the wide selection of potential candidates, early-church tradition singles out one name as the author of these volumes: Luke. By A. D. 200 this tradition had become firmly fixed without any hint of contrary opinion.

Allusions to the Gospel appear early and exist in 1 Clement 13. 2; 48. 4 (late 90s) and in 2 Clement 13. 4 (c. 150). In addition a use of Jesus' teaching, similar to that found in Luke 10: 7, appears in 1 Timothy 5: 18. Numerous texts comment on the authorship of Luke-Acts. Justin (c. 160) in Dialogues 103. 19 speaks of Luke having written a "memoir of Jesus" and notes the author was a follower of Paul. The Muratorian Canon (c. 170-180) attributes the Gospel to Luke, a doctor, who is Paul's companion. Irenaeus (c. 175-195; Haer. 3. 1. 1; 3. 14. 1) attributes the Gospel to Luke, follower of Paul, and notes how the "we sections" suggest the connection. The so-called Anti-Marcionite Canon (c. 175) describes Luke as a native of Antioch in Syria (Acts 11: 19-30; 13: 1-3; 15: 30-35), commenting that he lived to be eighty-four, was a doctor, was unmarried, wrote in Achaia and died in Boeotia. Tertullian (early third century; Marc. 4. 2. 2; 4. 5. 3) calls the Gospel a digest of Paul's gospel. Finally, Eusebius (early fourth century; Hist. Eccl. 3. 4. 2) mentions that Luke was from Antioch, a companion to Paul and the author of the Gospel and Acts. The unified voice of these traditions regarding authorship enhances the identification of the Gospel with Luke, and also makes Luke's connection to Paul very likely.

1. 3. Luke the Man: A Gentile or a Semite? Most scholars see Luke as a Gentile, though they debate whether he is a pure Gentile or a non-Jewish Semite. An exception is Ellis, who argues that Luke was a Hellenistic-Jewish Christian. Ellis notes that Luke's knowledge of the OT is extensive; that Colossians 4: 10-11, with its reference to those "not of the circumcision," suggests merely that he is a Hellenist; and that evidences of the use of Palestinian language show Luke's Jewish roots. But Ellis's reading of Colossians 4 is not the most natural one.

Fitzmyer suggests Luke was a Semite, arguing from the evidence of the Colossians 4 text; the shortened form of Luke's name (which was a Greek form of a Latin name); and the details of the church tradition, which place him in Antioch of Syria. This view is quite plausible.

However, most scholars have argued that Luke was a non-Semitic Gentile. They too argue from Colossians 4; note the allusion of Acts 1:19, which gives the Semitic name for Judas's field and then refers to it being in "their" language; and mention the attention given to Hellenistic locales and the concern for Gentiles. These latter two arguments are not strong, since one could attribute these same concerns to a Jew like Paul. In sum, Luke was very likely a Gentile, though it is unclear whether he was a Semite.

1. 4. Sources of the Gospel and Its Tie to Acts. The problem of determining Luke's sources is intimately related to the complex issue known as the Synoptic Problem. * Numerous approaches to this issue have been suggested, but in terms of Luke's Gospel alone, his preface demands a hypothesis that accounts for several sources.

1. 4. 1. Luke and the Synoptic Problem. While some scholars maintain the two-Gospel hypothesis, which supports the chronological priority of Matthew, followed by Luke and Mark (Farmer), today most scholars maintain some form of the two-document hypothesis (sometimes called the four-document hypothesis). This view argues for the priority of Mark and its use by Matthew and Luke, who also used a "sayings" source known as Q.* In addition Matthew has special source material (M*), while Luke has his special material (L*). Thus the two common sources are Mark and Q while L and M constituted separate sources for Luke and Matthew respectively. Luke would have used Mark, Q and L.

   In all likelihood, Luke had access to Mark. Second, he had much special material (L). Third, he had traditions which also are reflected in Matthew, though often with some (even significant) divergence. In fact the Q material is so varied in character that some speak of a Matthean and a Lukan version of Q (see Marshall 1978, who often makes this distinction). This means that Q may not have been a fixed, written tradition, so much as a pool of widely circulating traditions. Given the amount of teaching and parables shared between Matthew and Luke, we cannot rule out the possibility that L and Q might have overlapped, with Matthew using Q and Luke using L (Though we will use the symbol "Q" we note the potential ambiguity of this source or set of sources.)

1. 4. 3. Q Material. When one turns to Q material, the picture is more complex. Problematic texts involve those sayings or parables* which one Gospel writer places in one location and the other Gospel writer includes in a very different location; those which one writer has together while another writer has separated; or those in which an account is rendered in significantly different terms.
Almost 250 verses of material not found in Mark, or slightly over twenty per cent of Luke's Gospel, might be called Q. The questionable Q texts tend to cluster in the central section of Luke's Gospel. This unit, Luke 9: 51—19: 44, is basically a combination of large amounts of L material with material having apparent parallels with Matthew. Given the amount of unique L material and the thematic character of some parts of this section, it is difficult to discern whether material is really from Q or from L.

Goulder has suggested a large amount of Lukan rewriting of Matthean material and has posited that little of L really comes from a source, but is actually reflective of Lukan emphases and elaboration. The problem with this approach is it means that Luke handled Markan material in a manner completely distinct from the way in which he handled Matthew (or Q), since Luke did so little to change the substance of his Markan material.

1. 4. 4. L Material. This unique L material is represented in about 455 verses of Luke, comprising just over forty per cent of the entire Gospel. Clearly there is much in Luke that is not found in the other Synoptics. This material not only contains a unique portrait of Jesus' infancy but also many fresh sayings and parables of Jesus.

1. 4. 5. The Third Gospel's Relationship with Acts. Luke structured his Gospel in anticipation of its sequel. This tie to Acts is seen in the repetition of the prolog (Lk 1:1-4; Acts 1:1; cf. Josephus Ag. Ap.). The relationship is seen also in the parallel themes which dominate the two volumes (Maddox; OToole). Jesus heals and so do Peter and Paul. Jesus must travel to Jerusalem, while Paul must go to Rome * Jesus is slain by opposition and so is Stephen. The account of the ascension also links the two volumes tightly together (Lk 24: 49-53; Acts 1: 1-11).

Efforts to note extensive parallels between Luke and Acts have generated scholarly discussion (Talbert 1974). Some of these connections may be overdrawn and subde, so each must be evaluated on its own merit. But there is no doubt that Luke intends to show parallels between the time of Jesus and the time of his followers. From Luke's perspective, to understand the emergence of the church one must understand Jesus and the plan of God.

1. 5. Luke As Historian. One other point emerges from an examination of Luke's use of sources. Although the issue of Luke as a historian has been strongly debated, it appears that Luke was careful with his material (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]).

On the one hand, many scholars understand him to have handled his sources with great freedom, either for theological (Goulder, Haenchen, Dibelius) or sociological (Esler) reasons. Among the items under scrutiny are the association of Jesus' birth with a census by Quirinius (see Birth of Jesus), his chronological placement of the rebellion under Theudas (see Chronology), the authenticity of certain parables and sayings, the reality of the miracles, his portrait of the trials of Jesus (see Trial of Jesus), the details of Jesus' resurrection, the authenticity of the speeches in Acts, his portrayal of early church harmony, the uniqueness of the meeting with Cornelius, the reality of the Jerusalem council and his portrait of Paul. These details must be examined case by case, and judgments will inevitably vary. This is due not only to the complexity of the evidence but also to differences in the interpreter's philosophical world views. Nevertheless, where we can examine Luke's use of his sources, we find him trustworthy (Marshall 1970). Investigations into his descriptions of settings, customs and locales reveal a consistent concern for accuracy (Hengel, Hemer).

This does not mean Luke does not rearrange material for emphasis, summarize events in his own language or emphasize aspects of his received tradition. The Lukan speeches summarize and proclaim as well as report. Luke shows an interest in both history and theology, twin emphases evidenced not only in his attention to the time sequence of events and teachings, but in their topical and theological relationship as well. He writes as a theologian and a pastor, but is directed by the history which preceded him. To underemphasize any element in the Lukan enterprise, whether pastoral, theological or historical, is to underestimate the depth of his writing.

1. 6. Purpose, Readership and Destination of Luke's Gospel. It is debated whether Theophilus (Lk 1: 4) was a Christian or was thinking of becoming one.
Numerous possible intentions for Luke's writing the Gospel and its sequel have been suggested (Maddox): (1) to explain why Jesus had not returned (Conzelmann), (2) to provide a defense brief for Christianity (Easton, Haenchen), (3) to defend Paul before Rome (Mattill), (4) to defend Paul before the community (Schneckenburger; Jervell), (5) to combat gnosticism (Talbert); (6) to evangelize (O'Neill), (7) to confirm the Word and the message of salvation (van Unnik, Marshall, O'Toole), (8) to present a theodicy of God's faithfulness (Tiede), (9) to provide a sociological legitimation of full fellowship for Gentiles and a defense of the new community (Esler). This plethora of credible suggestions is evidence of the complexity of the Lukan enterprise. Of all of these suggestions, those centering on God's role in salvation and the nature of the new community (views 7-9) are most likely to reflect Luke's most comprehensive agenda. An examination of the structure and theology of the Gospel will bear this out.

It is unlikely that Theophilus is only interested in becoming a Christian or is a Roman official who needs Christianity explained to him in order to accept it as a legitimate religion. Neither is Paul per se the object of defense. Too little of the Gospel deals with such legal, political concerns and too much focuses on issues other than evangelism. Paul's importance in the latter part of Acts is due especially to the mission and perspective he represents.

Luke 1: 3-4 suggest that Theophilus had received some instruction. The amount of detail in Luke-Acts devoted to faithfulness, Jewish-Gentile relations and clinging to the hope of Jesus' return suggests a Gentile who was experiencing doubt about his association with the new community. This setting is also suggested in the controversy over table fellowship, * the issue of Gentile inclusion, the detailed examples of how rejection was faced in the early church and the amount of attention devoted to ethical exhortation. Theophilus appears to be a man of rank (Lk 1: 3). Having associated himself with the church, he is undergoing doubt whether in fact he really belongs in this racially mixed and heavily persecuted community. The Gospel openly includes Theophilus in the new community, calling him to remain faithful, committed and expectant, even in the midst of intense Jewish rejection.

Given the magnitude of Luke's effort, it seems clear that he did not write for Theophilus alone but for any who shared this tension. Any Gentile who felt out of place in an originally Jewish movement would have recognized the reassurance Luke offers. Any Jew (or Jewish Christian) troubled by the lack of Jewish response to the gospel or the openness with which Gentiles were welcomed into it could see how God had given the nation multiple invitations to join in his renewed work. The Christian movement had not attempted to remove itself from Judaism, * it had been forced out. This exclusion becomes clear in Acts, but Luke carefully details the seeds of opposition being sown in the official Jewish rejection of Jesus (Lk 9—13; 22—23). For Luke the new community extends its blessings broadly, true to Jesus' preaching (Lk 4:16-30; 5:30-32; 19:10; 24:44-47) and God's direction (Acts 10:34-43; 15:1-21; 22:6-11; 26:15-20).

1. 7. Date. Several possibilities have been argued, but two factors set the outside limits for a possible date. The last event in Acts takes place in 62, thus establishing the earliest possible date for the completion of the two-volume work. On the other end, Irenaeus cites texts indisputably derived from Luke, thus setting the latest possible date as c. 170 (Haer. 3.13.3; 3.15.1). Three possibilities present themselves:

1. 7. 1. Second Century. A date in the early- to mid-second century (Knox, O'Neill) has been argued on the basis of comparisons with material from Marcion, Josephus, Justin Martyr or the Pseudo-Clementines. But against this approach is the fact that the tone of Acts does not really fit that of other letters of this period such as 1 Clement (AD. 95) and Ignatius (AD.117) (Ellis). In addition, it is hard to believe that such a late work would have ignored Paul's letters as much as Acts does. Finally, possible allusions in 1 Clement to Acts 13:22 (1 Clem. 18.1); 20:35 (1 Clem. 2.1) and 26 (1 Clem. 5.6-7) argue against this date. This factor also brings the upper limit for a date down to the mid nineties.

1. 7. 2. After the Fall of Jerusalem. The most popular view is a date sometime after the fall of Jerusalem (see Destruction of Jerusalem; Fitzmyer, Bovon, Kümmel, Danker, Tiede, Maddox, Talbert, Esler). The reasons set forth include: (1) the premise that Luke follows after Mark, which itself is a document of the sixties; (2) the picture of Paul as a hero figure needed time to emerge; (3) the portraits of churches like Ephesus require a period before the Domitian persecution of the mid nineties; (4) the Lukan apocalyptic discourse (see Apocalyptic Teaching), with its description of siege and its focus on the city, presuppose the fall of Jerusalem and require a period after A.D. 70; (5) the indications that Luke reflects a late, even "early Catholic," theology would place it toward the end of the first century.
Three of these arguments are not compelling in their force. It is not clear that (2) Paul needed time to emerge as a hero. Evidence from his episodes agrees with Acts, suggesting that he was a central figure in the church who generated some following and controversy. The portrait of the churches (3) which are not yet under Roman persecution can fit any time before Domitian or any time after Nero. The debate about early catholicism in Luke-Acts (5) continues, but it is by no means apparent that the perspective of these volumes requires a late theology (Marshall 1970).

Two arguments have more substance. The suggestion that Luke follows Mark (1) is likely. (Even if one thinks Matthew was written first, the problem remains. ) But this argument creates no more difficulty for an early date than does the fact that the last event in Acts occurs in the early sixties. How long must Mark's Gospel have been in circulation before it could have served as a source for Luke?

The most weighty argument is that Luke's eschatological discourses (Lk 19: 41-44; 21: 20-24) assume a post-70 date. Esler has argued that the details of these discourses cannot be attributed simply to "what inevitably happens in war, " because some of the features, such as building a circumvallation, the total destruction of the city or the marching off of all the captives were not the inevitable results of war. In so arguing, Esler has challenged C. H. Dodd's view that the language fits ancient military operations and parallels the LXX's descriptions of the sacking of Solomon's temple in 587 B. C. However, Esler has missed a key point of connection with the OT. The judgment* exercised is directed toward covenant unfaithfulness. As such, Luke's picture of the total destruction of Jerusalem, including its siege and total defeat, is what was to be expected of an act of God. There is no need to argue that the description of the fall of Jerusalem is language shaped in light of a past event.

The prediction of Jerusalem's fall is one that Jesus would have been capable of making solely on the basis of his knowledge of how God acts to judge covenant unfaithfulness. Luke has made no effort to update this Jesus tradition, he only clarifies that in the Temple's* collapse, the city is not spared either.

1. 7. 3. Before the Fall of Jerusalem. The third possibility is a date during the sixties (Bruce, Hemer, Ellis, Marshall). Arguments for this date include: (1) the picture in Acts that Rome knows little about the Christian movement and is still uncertain about where it fits among the religions of the empire suggests a date in the sixties; (2) the failure to note either the death of James (A. D. 62) and especially Paul (c. late sixties) would seem to indicate an earlier date; (3) the silence about Jerusalem's destruction, even in settings where it could have been mentioned (e. g., Stephen's speech in Acts 6—7; Paul's trip to Jerusalem Acts 21 — 23) is odd if the work was completed after 70; and (4) the amount of uncertainty expressed about internal Gentile-Jewish relations fits a setting parallel to the Pauline epistles, which deal with similar tensions (Rom, Gal, 1 Cor 8-10).

This last argument is most significant and to date has not been thoroughly developed. Several aspects of Acts suggest that Luke was addressing the concerns of an earlier period: (1) It presupposes a racially mixed community in its attention to potentially offensive details about the Law, table fellowship and other practices (Acts 6: 1-6, 10-11, 15); (2) its vigorous defense of the Gentile mission contrasts with the situation in the eighties when the Gentile character of the Christian movement was accepted; (3) it provides believers reassurance in the midst of intense Jewish pressure.

It is difficult to determine when in the sixties the account may have been written. Some argue that the ending of Acts indicates the date of completion. Others suggest that texts like Luke 11: 49-51 presuppose the start of the struggle with Rome and suggest a date in the late sixties. The fact that Paul's death is not mentioned may be an indication that the work was completed in the early to mid sixties rather than the latter third of the sixties. On the other hand, the necessity for Luke to have received and incorporated Mark might suggest a date in the mid sixdes. Given that the Gospel would have preceded Acts, a mid sixties date is slightly more likely. Luke might have left the end of Paul's career open ended because that is where matters stood when he wrote.

The Gospel may be viewed as follows, with the material devoted to Jesus' ministry being viewed geographically:

1. Introduction of John the Baptist and Jesus (1: 1— 2: 52)
2. Preparation for Ministry: Anointed by God (3: 1 — 4: 13)
5. Jerusalem: The Innocent Slain and Raised (19: 45-24: 53)

2. 1. Introduction of John the Baptist and Jesus (1: 1—2: 52). Following a preface in which Luke explains his task, the author launches into a comparison of John and Jesus, showing how both represent the fulfillment of promises made by God. John the Baptist* is like Elijah* (1: 17), but Jesus has Davidic roles to fulfill and possesses a unique supernatural origin (1: 31-35). John is forerunner, but Jesus is fulfillment. Everything in Luke 1—2 points to the superiority of Jesus.

Jesus' birth (see Birth of Jesus) takes place in humble circumstances, but all the figures surrounding his birth are pious and responsive to the hope of God (see Mary's Song; Simeon's Song; Zechariah's Song). Only the word of Simeon to Mary gives an ominous ring (2: 34-35). Jesus is the salvation of God (2: 30), but in the midst of hope is the reality that fulfillment comes mixed with pain. This section, dominated by OT allusions (see Old Testament in the Gospels), opens the Gospel with the twin themes of fulfillment and divine direction. These themes continue throughout the Gospel.

2. 2. Preparation for Ministry: Anointed by God (3: 1—4: 13). John and Jesus remain side by side as Jesus prepares for his ministry. John is the "One who goes before" (Is 40: 3-5; Lk 3: 1-6), while Jesus is the "One who comes" (3: 15-17). John baptizes Jesus, but the main feature of the baptism* is one of two heavenly testimonies to Jesus (3: 21-22; cf. 9: 28-36). The heavenly testimony calls Jesus the "beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." This fusion of Isaiah 42 and Psalm 2 marks out Jesus as a regal, prophetic figure, who as chosen servant of God brings God's revelation and salvation. The universal character of Jesus' relationship to humanity is highlighted in the list of his ancestors (3: 23-38; see Genealogy). He is "Son of Adam, Son of God." His first actions are to overcome temptations from Satan (see Temptation of Jesus), something Adam had failed to do (4: 1-13). So the section shows Jesus as God's anointed, a representative of humanity and one who is faithful to God.

2. 3. Galilean Ministry: The Revelation of Jesus (4: 14—9: 50). This section focuses primarily on the teaching of Jesus and his miraculous works. Major teaching blocks include his synagogue* declaration of the fulfillment of God's promise (4:16-30) and the Sermon on the Plain (6:17-49; see Sermon on the Mount). Both passages are unique to Luke. The synagogue speech represents Jesus' own understanding of his mission, while the sermon represents his fundamental ethic (see Ethics of Jesus) presented without the concerns related to Jewish tradition (cf. Matthew's Sermon on the Mount).

In the synagogue speech (4:16-30) Jesus raises the note of fulfillment through his appeal to Isaiah 61: 1 and 58: 6 (see Jubilee). God's promised anointing is fulfilled "today, " which in the Lukan context looks back to Jesus' anointing with the Spirit in Luke 3. Here is a reminder of his regal role. He will bring salvation to all those in need: the poor, the blind and the captive.

In chapters 4—9 Luke juxtaposes Jesus' work with the gathering of disciples* and the rising opposition. Jesus' ability to bring salvation is pictured in a series of miracles (4: 31-44), while disciples are called to be fishers of humankind (5: 1-11). The first hints of official opposition arise with the miracles suggesting his divine-like authority*: the Son of man* claims to forgive sins (see Forgiveness of Sins) and heals* on the Sabbath* (5:12-26). Levi, a hated tax collector (see Taxes), is called (5: 27-28), and four controversies emerge, one of which involves the type of company Jesus keeps, while the others center on the Sabbath (5: 29—6:11). Jesus gives a mission statement: his task is to call the sick to repentance (5: 32).

Subsequently, through a series of pericopae focusing on Jesus' calling of the disciples, his teaching and miracles, Luke concentrates on the question Who is Jesus? and the appropriate response to him. John the Baptist perhaps doubtful because of Jesus' style of ministry, wonders if Jesus is the coming one. Jesus replies that his eschatological works of healing and preaching affirm his status (7:18-35; cf. Is 29: 18; 35: 5-6; 61: 1). One is to respond to the Word, though many obstacles prevent response (8: 4-15). Jesus' miraculous work over nature (8: 22-25), over demons (8: 26-39), and over disease and death (8: 40-56) shows the extent of his authority and pictures his eschatological work This section moves from teaching and demonstration of authority to confession and call to discipleship. * Peter confesses Jesus to be the Christ* (9:18-20). Now Jesus explains what kind of Messiah he will be; he will suffer (9: 21-22). Those who follow him must have total commitment in order to survive the path of rejection that comes with following Jesus (9: 23-27).

The second heavenly testimony to Jesus comes at the Transfiguration* (9: 28-36). The divine voice repeats the endorsement made at the Baptism with one additional note: "listen to him" (Deut 18: 15). Jesus is a second Moses* who marks out a new way.
2. 4. Jerusalem Journey: Jewish Rejection and the New Way (9: 51—19: 44). This part of the Gospel is particularly Lukan, with over forty-four per cent consisting of material found only in Luke. There is a high concentration of teaching and parable. In fact there are seventeen parables, fifteen of which are unique to Luke. The journey to Jerusalem is not a chronological, straight line, since Jesus in 10: 38-42 is near Jerusalem, while later in the second he is back in the north. Rather, it is a journey in time within the context of the necessity of God's plan. Journey notes punctuate the section (9: 51; 13: 22; 17: 11; 18: 31; 19: 28, 44). Jesus travels to meet his appointed destiny in Jerusalem (13: 31-35).

The thrust of this section is that Jesus initiates a new way to follow God. Its theme is "listen to him." Since his way is distinct from that promulgated by the Jewish leadership, this section discusses how Jesus' teaching relates to the Judaism of his day. The difference provokes great opposition, a theme which dominates Luke 9—13. All are invited to follow the new way, but some refuse. The seeds of discontent which will lead to Jesus' death are manifest.

The section starts with the disciples learning the basics of discipleship: mission, commitment love for God, love for one's neighbor, devotion to Jesus and his teaching, and to prayer (9: 51—11: 13). In a critical section Jesus calls on the crowd to discern the nature of the times (12: 49—14: 24). Israel is turning away and the time for her to respond, without facing judgment is short (13: 1-9; 31-35). Nevertheless, blessing will still come.

From this point on most of the journey section concerns discipleship. In the face of such rejection disciples will need absolute commitment (14: 25-35). Their mission is to seek the lost just as God does (15: 1-32). God rejoices in finding lost sinners, * so Jesus' call is to pursue them. Discipleship expresses itself in service to others, so it is generous with resources (16: 1-31). In fact one is accountable to God for how they are used. Though false teaching is a threat, it is overcome with forgiveness of the brother or sister, deep faith and service (17: 1-10). The disciple is to live in hope of the king's return. Then the promise of the kingdom, already inaugurated and present will be consummated (17:11—18: 8). His coming will be a time of severe judgment but also vindication. The disciple is to live humbly, giving all and trusting all to the Father (18: 9-30).

Now Jesus turns to Jerusalem, renewing the display of his authority as he predicts his suffering and heals as the Son of David (18: 3243). Zacchaeus epitomizes the transformed sinner and rich man (19: 1-10). He is a picture of the mission of Jesus; he is the lost one who is sought and saved (19: 10). The parable of the pounds shows the need for faithfulness and the reality that the disciple as well as the nation are accountable to the king (19:11-27). Jesus enters Jerusalem as a king, but the leadership rejects the claim (19: 28-40). Jesus warns the nation that it has failed to respond to God's promise and faces judgment (19: 41-44).

Though opposition brings Jesus to his death, it brings far more tragic consequences on the nation of Israel.

In his concluding section Luke explains how Jesus died, why apparent defeat became victory and how God revealed who Jesus was. In addition, the task of disciples in light of God's acts becomes clear. Luke mixes fresh material with that found in the other Gospels.

In the light of the nation's refusal to accept him, Jesus predicts the fall of the Temple* and of Jerusalem, events which are a foretaste of the end (21: 5-38). The fall of Jerusalem will be a terrible time for the nation, but it is not yet the End, when the Son of man returns on the clouds with authority to redeem his people (Dan 7: 13-14). Disciples are to watch and be faithful.

Luke 22—23 pictures Jesus' movement toward the cross. Jesus is betrayed and yet is innocent but his death will initiate the New Covenant and will be a sacrifice on behalf of others (22: 1-20; see Last Supper). In his last discourse Jesus announces the betrayal, points out that greatness is in service, appoints eleven to authority, predicts Peter's denials and warns of rejection (22: 21-38). Jesus is in control even as his death approaches (see Passion Narrative).

As Jesus prays, and thereby exemplifies for his disciples the trust they must have in the midst of rejection, he is betrayed and arrested (22: 47-53; see Gethsemane). The trials center again on who Jesus is. The answer comes in Luke 22: 69. Jesus "from now on" will be shown to be the exalted Lord who is sealed with authority at the side of God. Messiahship means lordship (see Lord), authority over God's plan and salvation. Ironically and unwittingly, the Jewish leadership helps bring these things to pass. Jesus is on trial, or so it seems; but in fact he is the judge (22: 54-71; see Trial of Jesus).

But it is not the leadership alone that is guilty. As Pilate* and Herod debate what to do about Jesus, the people are given the final choice (23: 1-25). Despite Pilate's repeated protestations of innocence and Herod's similar reaction, the people ask for Jesus to be slain and Barabbas to be freed. Luke portrays Jesus' death with OT allusions picturing Jesus as an innocent sufferer who relies on God (23: 26-56; Ps 22: 8-9; 19; 69: 22; 31: 6; see Death of Jesus; Burial of Jesus).

Luke 24 presents three scenes of resurrection* and vindication. Luke 24:1-12 announces the empty tomb, but the news of the excited women is greeted with skepticism. The angelic (see Angel) announcement directed the women to recall the predictions of suffering (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). The experience of the Emmaus disciples pictures the reversal the resurrection brought to the despairing disciples (24: 13-36). Two disciples mourn the departure of the prophet of Israel who might have redeemed the nation. But Scripture and the revelation of Jesus himself show that God had a plan which included Jesus' death. God has indeed raised Jesus, vindicating both Jesus and the divine strategy. Despair turns to joy* when they understand the nature of God's plan and Jesus' role in it, a major note in Luke.

Just as Luke 1—2 opened with the hope of OT promises being fulfilled, so Luke 24 returns to the central theme of Jesus the Messiah as the fulfillment of God's plan and promise (24: 36-53). Jesus' final Gospel appearance yields a commission, a plan and a promise. Reminding them yet again that Scripture foretold the suffering and exaltation of Messiah, Jesus tells the disciples that they are called as witnesses (see Witness) to preach repentance. The plan is to go to all the nations, starting from Jerusalem. The promise is the "promise of the Father," the coming of the Spirit (24: 49). As the Baptist had promised (3: 15-17), so it has come to pass.

The ascension* of Jesus (24: 50-53) fulfills the exaltation Jesus predicted at his trial (22: 69). A dead Messiah does not represent the end of God's plan. In his exaltation Jesus is vindicated and the plan to reach all nations goes on. Jesus the Messiah is Lord of all, so the message can go to all (Acts 2: 14-40; 10: 34-43). The Gospel closes with the disciples rejoicing that out of the ashes of apparent defeat, victory and promise have arisen. Theophilus can be reassured (1: 1-4).

Our brief survey will outline the major strands and connections which show Luke's theological and pastoral concerns.

3. 1. The God of Design and Concern: The Plan. At the center of Luke's concern to reassure Theophilus is the detailed discussion of God's plan. Luke emphasizes and enunciates this theme more than the other Synoptic Evangelists.

3. 1. 1. The Plan. A number of uniquely Lukan passages bring out this theme (1: 14-17, 31-35, 46-55, 68-79; 2: 9-14, 30-32, 34-35; 4: 16-30; 13: 31-35; 24: 44-49), with one key text overlapping with the other Gospels (the inquiry of John the Baptist, 7: 18-35). In addition, Luke utilizes the suffering Son of man texts, a few of which are unique to him (9: 22, 44; 17: 25 [L]; 18: 31-33 [L]; 22: 22 [LJ; 24: 7 [L]). Acts also highlights the details of the plan (Acts 2: 23; 4: 27-28; 13: 32-39; 24: 14-15; 26: 22-23). The major elements of the plan are the career of Jesus, the hope of the spiritually humble and needy, the offer of God's blessings, the coming of the new era, along with the suffering which comes to Jesus and the division which comes to Israel.

3. 1. 2. The Plan’s Structure: Promise and Fulfillment. Supporting the theme of God's plan is the note of promise and fulfillment running throughout the Gospel and Acts, especially as it relates to the Scriptures. The appeal to the OT concentrates on three areas: christology, Israelite rejection/Gentile inclusion and justice in the end. The latter two themes are more prominent in Acts, as "the Way" (Acts 24: 14) is presented and defended from various charges, particularly as it is represented by the efforts of Paul among the Gentiles. Nonetheless, the theme of Gentiles and non-Jews responding to the gospel, while Israel stumbles, is present in numerous texts (2: 34; 3: 4-6; 4: 25-27; 7: 1-10; 10: 25-37; 11: 49-51; 13: 7-9, 23-30, 31-35; 14: 16-24; 17: 12-19; 19: 41-44).

3.1. 4. John the Baptist. John the Baptist is the bridge stretching between the old era of promise and the new era of inauguration (Lk 1—2; esp. 1: 76-79; 3: 4-6; 7: 24-35; 16: 16). Luke 7 is instructive here. John is the forerunner of Malachi's prediction, but beyond that John represents the greatest prophet of the old era (7: 27). Nonetheless, the new era is so great that the lowest member of the kingdom is higher than the greatest prophet of the old (v. 28). This passage presents the basic Lukan structure of the plan: the era of promise-expectation followed by the era of inauguration. The church's message of the gospel and Jesus' teaching on the end serve to clarify the timing and structure of the newly inaugurated era. The plan still has future elements to be realized (17: 21-37; 21: 5-38), but the basic turning point has come. So the second portion of the plan also has a subdivision, even though all of that era represents fulfillment. Those subdivisions are inauguration (Acts 2: 14-40) and consummation (Acts 3:14-26), the "already and not yet."

3.1. 5. Mission Statements. Other elements of the plan are seen in Jesus' mission statements where he outlines his task. Jesus has come to preach good news to those in need (4: 18-19), to heal the sick (5: 30-32) and to be heard, whether the message is communicated through him or his representatives (10: 16-20). He has come to seek and save the lost (19:10). This career is reviewed in Acts 10: 36-43.

3.1. 6. Geographic Progression. The geographic progression also reveals the movement's growth under the plan. The basic outline of the Gospel from Galilee to Jerusalem shows this growth, as does the necessity of Paul's going to Rome in Acts (Acts 1: 8; 19: 21; 23: 11).

3. 1.7. "It Is Necessary." Many passages declare that "it is necessary" (da) that something occur. In fact, 40 of 101 NT uses of dei occur in Luke-Acts. Jesus must be in his Father's house (2: 49), he must preach the kingdom (4: 43) and he must heal the woman tormented by Satan (13: 16). Certain events must precede the end (17: 25; 21: 9). Jesus must be numbered among the transgressors (23: 37). The Christ must suffer and be raised, and repentance for the forgiveness of sins must be preached. The necessity of the Son of man's suffering, already noted, is also a part of this theme. Acts continues to strike this chord (Acts 1: 11; 3: 21; 9: 6, 16; 13: 46; 14: 22; 19: 21; 23: 11; 25: 10; 27: 24).

3. 2. Christology and Salvation: Messiah-Lord, His Teaching and Work, and the Blessings of the Plan through Him. Jesus and deliverance stand at the center of the plan. Who is Jesus? What does he bring? How do we know he is God's chosen? These are central christological questions for Luke. In addition, there is the call to respond.
3. 2. 1. Christology: Messiah-Servant-Prophet to Lord. Luke carefully develops his portrait of Jesus, though this feature is not universally recognized. Some say that Luke's christology is more of a patchwork than a unified whole; it is a collection of a variety of traditions, "the most variegated in the NT" (Evans).

It is clear from a reading of Luke 1—2 that Jesus is introduced as a regal figure. Both the announcement to Mary and the remarks of Zechariah make the Davidic connection explicit (1:31-33, 69). In addition, the anointing of Jesus at his baptism appeals to a pair of OT passages, Psalm 2 and Isaiah 42, which bring together regal-prophetic images. The images of Servant* and prophet likewise come together in Simeon's remarks (2: 30-35), but the idea of a leader-prophet is a dominant christological theme in Luke.

Jesus' sermon at Nazareth (4: 16-30) likewise joins regal and prophetic motifs. Though Elijah and Elisha are elicited as parallels to Jesus' situation (4: 25-27), for Luke the anointing of Isaiah 61: 1 is in the aorist tense and looks back to the baptism with its regal-prophetic motifs. Even when the people recognize that Jesus is a prophet (7: 16; 9: 7-9, 19), it is qualified by Peter's confession that he is the Christ (9: 20) and Jesus' further explanation that his work will inevitably be that of a suffering Son of man. * In a tradition unique to his Gospel, Luke even relates Jesus' tide as "Son" to Jesus' messianic role (4: 41). The regal-prophetic mix reappears with the voice from heaven at the Transfiguration (9: 35; cf. Ps 2: 7; Is 42:1; Deut 18: 15).

When Jesus is presented as a prophet he is a leader-prophet one like Moses, so that even here the note of rule and direction is fundamental. In short, Luke regards Jesus' messianic role as pivotal for christology. Jesus' messiahship needs clarification and careful definition, and it is placed beside other expectations, but his messiahship is a category around which the other concepts revolve.

The prophetic motif plays an important role in the woes against the scribes (11: 47-51), the mourning for Jerusalem (13: 31-35) and the conversation on the Emmaus road (24: 19, 21). Yet even in texts like Luke 13: 31-35, the appeal to Psalm 118 ("Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord") expands in the Lukan presentation into a regal allusion (cf. the Triumphal Entry, 19: 38), since "the one who comes" is for Luke fundamentally an eschatological and messianic deliverer (3: 15-18; 7: 22-23; 19: 38). Again, on the Emmaus Road the disciples mix their perception of Jesus as a prophet with the hope that Jesus might "redeem" the nation (24: 21). For Luke the deliverer-regal imagery is never very Luke develops the elevated status of Jesus as he draws his Gospel to a close. While the authority of the Son of man is introduced as early as 5:24, this theme and his status as Lord become the focus of dispute in 20:41-44; 21:27 and 22:69 (cf. Acts 2:30-36; 10:35). The significance of Psalm 110 and its reference to Jesus is of signal importance to Luke. Following a three-step progression that bridges both Luke and Acts, the issue is raised (20:41-44), Jesus responds (22:69) and the message of Jesus' authority as Lord is proclaimed (Acts 2:30-36; see Franklin). The Synoptics share the first two texts, but Luke's sequence, ending with the detailed exposition of Acts 2, shows the importance of this dispute. Luke 22:69 makes it clear that "from now on" Jesus—the Messiah-Servant-Prophet—will exercise his authority as Lord at the right hand of God.

This is not to say that Luke does not use other titles alongside this basic portrait of Jesus' messiahship. Jesus is savior, or one who delivers (2:11; 1:70-75; 2:30-32; Acts 5:31; 13:23-25), as well as Son of David (1:27, 32, 69; 2:4, 11; 18:38-39; Acts 2:25-31; 15:16) or King (18:38). He is the Son, who relates to God as Father, even as divine testimony declares (1:35; 2:49; 3:21; 3:38; 4:3, 9, 41; 9:35; 10:21-22). Yet he is also Son of Adam, who grows in grace (3:38; 2:40, 52; Acts 2:22). He is compared to Jonah (11:29-32, message of repentance; see Sign of Jonah) and Solomon (message of wisdom,* 11:29-32). As Son of man he not only suffers and is exalted, but he also ministers (5:24; 6:5, 22; 7:24; 9:58; 11:29-32; 12:18; 19:10). Another frequent tide is Teacher* (7:40; 8:49; 9:38; 10:25; 11:45; 12:13; 18:18; 19:39; 20:21, 28, 39; 21:7; 22:11). The portrait of Jesus is variegated, but it is organized as well. Jesus bears authority as well as promise.

3. 2. 2. The Kingdom in Jesus' Teaching and Work. The Messiah brings the kingdom of God, * God's rule manifested on earth (4:18, 43; 7:22; 8:1; 9:6; 10:11). Here is a complex theme in Luke's Gospel. The kingdom is present now, but it comes in the future. It includes earthly hope, and yet has spiritual dimensions.

The kingdom as present reality is associated with Jesus' authority, well illustrated as he exercises his command over evil, spiritual forces. This also reveals the spiritual character of the kingdom. Jesus can speak of the kingdom as "near" (10:9). And as the seventy (-two) disciples exercise authority over demons, he sees Satan fall (10:18-19). In fact, Jesus says that if he casts out demons by the finger of God, then the kingdom has come upon those present (11: 20-23; see Demon, Devil). Asked by Pharisees when the kingdom would come, he could say the kingdom is "among you" (17: 21). The king, in one parable, departs "to receive a kingdom" (19: 14-15). In his hearing before the council of Jewish elders, * Luke makes it clear that from that point on Jesus will be at God's side (22: 69). Finally, the appeal to Psalm 110 depicts the presence of a regal authority, ruling from the side of God.

But the kingdom is also future (see Eschatology). Luke 17: 22-37 describes the judgment preceding its arrival. Here is the "not yet" aspect—the kingdom in consummation. Luke 21: 5-38 also describes the "time of redemption. " Here the imagery of the Day of the Lord abounds as evil is decisively judged. Within the space of a few verses (21: 25-27) allusion is made to a range of OT passages suggesting the cosmic disturbance associated with the Day of the Lord (Is 13: 10; Ezek 32: 7; Joel 2: 30-31; Ps 46: 2-3; 65: 7; Is 24: 19 (LXX); Hag 2: 6, 21; Dan 7: 13). OT hope and expectation is not dead, as Acts 3: 20-21 also makes clear. Jesus will return to fulfill the rest of the promise, a promise that will show itself visibly on earth to all humanity, as well as in the eternal benefits given to believers.

So the kingdom is earthly, that is, Jesus will rule as a Davidide on the earth and bring about total deliverance as he executes his sovereignty over all. Such hope is most strongly expressed in the narrative and songs of Luke 1: 32-33, 46-55, 69-75. The eschatological discourses and the remarks of Acts 1: 11 and 3: 18-21 show that the future hope has not been absorbed in the theme of present inauguration, but remains alive, connected to its OT roots. God is faithful and brings all of his promises to fruition.

But spiritual deliverance is also his. Zechariah's Song* (1: 78-79) makes this clear by speaking of Jesus as the rising sun who shines on those in darkness and leads them into the path of peace. The promise of the Spirit (3: 15-18; 24: 49; Acts 1: 8) and the hope of forgiveness of sins (24: 47) also belong to this emphasis. Jesus' authority over demons and other forces show that he is able to bring such promises to pass.

Those who are most obviously subjects of the kingdom and benefit from its presence are the disciples (18: 26-30). All of salvation's benefits are theirs. But potential beneficiaries also exist. Anyone who wishes to enter in is a potential beneficiary (13: 23-30; 14: 16-24; see 3. 3. 1. below). But there are also unwilling subjects who are accountable to him now and one day will face the

3. 2. 3. The Spirit. The Spirit as a central figure of redemption is viewed first as the one promised (3: 15-18) and then as a testifier and enabler of Jesus (3: 21; 4: 16-18). Later the full promise finally comes and the Spirit falls on all believers (Acts 2: 1-13). Acts 2: 14-21 (cf. Joel 2: 28-32) explains the event as the sign that the new era has come. The Spirit is the gift of the Father through the exalted Son. He is power (or enablement) from on high (24: 49; Acts 2: 30-36; 10: 44-47; 11: 15-16; 15: 8). The Spirit's presence is evidence that Jesus is raised and that Jesus directs his new community from the right hand of God. Luke reassures Theophilus that though the Messiah is dead and seemingly absent, he is present in the gift and presence of the Spirit he has sent (see Holy Spirit).

3. 2. 4. The Resurrection/Ascension. The key event at the center of God's provision of salvation is the resurrection*/ascension. * Among the Gospel writers, only Luke mentions and develops the ascension, an event which for him provides the link between Luke 24 and Acts 1 (its significance being further explained in Acts 2: 23-24, 30-36; 3: 14-15, 21; 4: 10-12; 5: 30; 17: 31). A risen savior is one who can both rule and consummate his promise. He is the one who can forgive and signify forgiveness by bestowing blessings (Acts 2: 21; 4: 12; 10: 43). Moreover, the ongoing reality of Jesus' authority is demonstrated in the activity of those who minister "in his name" (Acts 2: 38; 3: 6, 16; 4: 6, 10; 8: 11-12; 9: 27-28; 10: 48; 19: 5). In short, the ascension shows that he is Lord* (Franklin).

3. 2. 5. Salvation in Jesus' Teaching and Work. Jesus brings promise and salvation * Salvation involves sharing in hope, experiencing the kingdom, tasting forgiveness and partaking in the enabling power of the Spirit Just as Jesus' person reveals the character and ability of the bringer of blessing, his teaching and work explain and signify the desired results. Jesus was a teacher and wonder worker (4: 14-15, 31-32, 44; 6: 17-19; 7: 22). As we have seen, his teaching focused on the offer of the kingdom. This opportunity is pictured as the release and healing of Jubilee* (4: 16-21; cf. Lev 25: 10; Is 61: 1-2), but it also includes a call to ethical honor reflecting the experience of blessing (6: 20-49). The parables show the same dual concern. A few parables deal with God's plan (13: 6-9, 23-30; 14: 16-24; 20: 9-18), and in some of these a meal or feast scene is employed. The feast displays not only the joy of salvation but the table fellowship of the future, a reality in which the community can now partake without racial distinction (Aas 10—11, 15). There is to be unity among the people of God.

Beyond unity stands a call to an ethical way of life. The life of relationship with God, engagement in mission and ethical honor is to be dominated by love, humility, service and righteousness—the subject of most of the other parables (10: 25-37; 11: 5-8; 14: 1-12; 12: 36-49; 15: 1-32; 16: 1-8, 19-31; 18: 1-8; 19: 11-27). Jesus did not come just to rescue people for heaven, * but to have them come to know the transforming activity of God in their life. It is to this God that they are accountable. This is why commitment is so prominent in Jesus' teaching (9: 21-26; 57-62; 14: 25-34; 18: 18-30).

3. 2. 6. The Cross. Thus far in our survey of Jesus' work and teaching, little has been said about the cross (see Death of Jesus). This is because Luke gives Jesus' ascension and exaltation more prominence than he does the cross. Some scholars have gone so far as to deny that Luke ascribed a saving function to Jesus' death, arguing instead that Luke portrays Jesus as an example in his death (Büchele, Glöckner). While Luke does employ exemplary elements in his narrative of Jesus' death, and thereby addresses the needs of a church under pressure, to view Jesus' death solely as an ethical example is to miss other Lukan emphases.

Though the cross is less prominent for Luke than for Paul, its significance moves beyond an ethical or historical function and occupies an important theological position in Luke's teaching. Jesus, as was noted in examining Luke 22—23, is the righteous sufferer. But two texts cast light on the meaning of his death. Luke 22: 20 makes it clear that Jesus' death inaugurates the new covenant with God, while Acts 20: 28 argues that the church was, in Paul's words, "purchased" with Jesus' blood. Covenant inauguration and a soteriological transaction take place in Jesus' death. Two other images reinforce this view. The substitution of Jesus for Barabbas portrays the fact that Jesus took the place of the sinner, an exchange made all the more poignant when Luke notes that the people "with one voice" shared in this unrighteous choice (23:18-25). Jesus' offer of paradise to the thief as they die together (23: 43) shows that Jesus, despite his death, can offer life.

3. 2. 7. Miracles. Not only the resurrection, but the miracles, * in their display of the arrival of the new era, authenticate Jesus' role in the divine plan (7: 22; Acts 2: 22-24). In fact the scope of Jesus' works of healing* shows the breadth of Jesus' authority. He heals the sick; exorcises evil spirits, heals those generally called "sick"; and cures a variety of specific conditions: a flow of blood, a withered hand, blindness, deafness, paralysis, epilepsy, leprosy, dropsy and fever. He resuscitates the dead and exercises power over nature. Jesus' work testifies to his person and task. The fact that Acts records the disciples continuing to perform some of these works shows that authentication continues (Acts 3: 6, 16) and that Jesus' authority continues as well.

Luke's portrayal of Jesus is fundamentally concerned with his authority and then with the promise he brings. Jesus' saving work inaugurates the kingdom, delivers the sinner, * forgives sin, provides the Spirit, calls for a committed and faithful life lived in the context of hope in the future consummation, and makes all accountable to God's plan. In fact, all the covenant promises of God are inaugurated by Jesus. Luke sets forth the Abrahamic promise of blessing to the peoples of the earth as realized in Jesus (Acts 3: 22-26). So is the Davidic hope (1: 31-33, 69; 22: 69; Acts 2: 25-36) and the hope of the Spirit associated with the coming of the new era and new covenant (22: 20; Acts 2: 14-21). Theophilus should be reassured that Jesus can and does deliver on such promises. But who makes up the new community and what is it to be? How does christology relate to the content and task of the new community for Luke?

3. 3. The New Community. Within Luke's Gospel the new community formed around Jesus is not really an organized entity. There are the Twelve and the Seventy(-Two), but beyond these basic groups there is no formal structure. Rather, those who will become the new community of Acts are called disciples. In the Gospel this group is mostly Jewish, but there are a few hints that the benefits of Jesus' program can extend to Samaritans and non-Jews (3: 4-6; 4: 22-30; 7: 1-10; 13: 23-30; 14: 16-24; 17: 12-19; 20: 15-16; 24: 47). This multiracial theme becomes prominent in Acts, but more important to the Gospel is the fact that the message goes out to those on the fringe of society.

3. 3.1. The Beneficiaries of Salvation. Luke focuses on the reception of the gospel message by outcasts: the poor, sinners and tax collectors. In addition, women come in for special treatment For Luke the poor are materially and spiritually impoverished. The spiritual element is clearly indicated in 1: 50-53 and 6: 20-23, where the poor and humble are related to God's covenant promise or to the treatment of God's prophets. The poor or rejected are mentioned in several texts (1: 46-55; 4: 18; 6: 20-23; 7: 22; 10: 21-22; 14: 13, 21-24; 16: 19-31; 21: 1-4). Sinners are also highlighted as the special objects of the gospel (5: 27-32; 7: 28, 30, 34, 36-50; 15: 1-2; 19: 7). Tax collectors, culturally understood as betayers of their nation (see Taxes), are still noted as potential beneficiaries as well (5: 27-32; 7: 34; 18: 9-14; 19: 1-10).

Finally, Luke features the responsiveness of women* (7: 36-50; 8: 1-3; 8: 48; 10: 38-42; 13: 10-17; 24: 1-12). Often it is not just a woman but a widow who is cited, since she represented the most vulnerable status within society (2: 37; 4: 25-26; 7: 12; 18: 3, 5; 20: 47; 21: 2-3). Whether in parable or by example, these women show that they are sensitive to the message of Jesus. Though on the fringes of first-century society, they are in the middle of Luke's story. Often they are paired with men (2: 25-28; 4: 25-27; 8: 40-56; 11: 31-32; 13: 18-21; 15: 4-10; 17: 34-35; Acts 21: 9-10), a feature suggesting that the gospel is for both genders, as well as all races and social strata.

In short, the makeup of the new community is to know no boundaries. The good news is available to all, but society's weak and vulnerable are often most suited to respond to its message of hope and reliance on God.

3. 3. 2. The Terms and Pictures of Response. Luke uses three terms to describe response to the message: "repent," "turn" and "faith" (see Repentance). The term translated "repent" is rooted in the OT (Lk 11: 32) word 'sub, "to turn around." The Greek term metanoeô has to do with a change of mind. The point is that repentance involves a reorientation of perspective, a fresh point of view. When dealing with God's plan it entails seeing that plan in a new way and orienting oneself to it. For Luke the fruit of repentance expresses itself concretely. The particular expressions of repentance are illustrated in some material unique to Luke in which the Baptist replies to those who inquire "What should we do then?" Repentance expresses itself in everyday life, especially in how men and women treat each other (Lk 3: 7-14).

Four pictures of repentance stand out. Luke 5: 31-32 develops the observation that those who respond to Jesus come as those seeking a physician. Just as a sick patient in need of medical attention is totally reliant on the skill of the doctor, so the one who repents comes to God as if for healing. Luke 15: 17-21 portrays the repentance of the prodigal and indicates how a repentant heart makes no claims, being totally reliant on the mercy of the one entreated. Repentance involves a changed attitude toward sin, but the change primarily comes from recognizing that only God and his mercy can provide relief. Luke indicates the crucial role of repentance when, at the end of his Gospel, he summarizes the essence of the good news: "Repentance and forgiveness of sins will be preached in his name" (24: 47). The parable of the tax collector who in the Temple cries out "God, have mercy on me, a sinner" (18: 9-14) demonstrates the repentant response, though the term "repentance" is not used (cf. 19: 1-10).

"Faith"* (Gk n. pistis; v. pisteuö) also describes actions which bring credit and benefit to the bearer. Faith for Luke expresses itself concretely, whether as the faith of the paralytic's friends (5: 20), the faith of the centurion (7: 9) or the faith of the sinful woman who anoints Jesus (7: 47-50). The Samaritan leper and the blind man also have faith that Jesus can restore them to wholeness (17: 19; 18: 42). Faith believes and so it acts. In Acts those who responded were sometimes called "believers" to show the centrality of faith (Acts 5: 14; 15: 5). In short, faith is the recognition and persuasion that God had something to offer through Jesus—forgiveness and the blessings of promise— which one must actively embrace. Such people "call on the name of the Lord" (Acts 2: 21; cf. Rom 10: 13).

3. 3. 3. The Blessings of the New Community. Luke's Gospel employs various terms for the blessings on offer: forgiveness or release (1: 77 and 3: 3 as tied to John the Baptist; 4: 18; 24: 47; Acts 2: 38; 5: 31; 10: 43; 13: 38); life (10: 25; 12: 16, 21; 18: 29-30); peace (1: 79; 2: 14; 10: 5-6; Acts 10: 36) and, as we have seen, the kingdom and the Spirit

3. 3. 4. The Opponents of Salvation. In contrast to those who respond positively to the gospel, Luke identifies spiritual and human opponents of the new community. At the transcendent level the spiritual forces of evil (see Demon, Devil, Satan) stand resistant though powerless before the plan (4: 1-13, 33-37; 8: 26-39; 9: 1; 10: 1-12, 18; 11: 14-26; 22: 3). For Luke, God's struggle not only involves reclaiming humanity's devotion, but reversing the effects of the presence of evil forces.

On a human level the opponents are primarily the scribes* and Pharisees * When Jesus claims authority to forgive sin and challenges the Sabbath tradition (5: 24; 6: 1-11), their opposition becomes a regular feature of the narrative. The roots of this rejection go back to their refusal to respond to John the Baptist (7: 29-30). In three instances where Jesus is seated at table with Pharisees, they are warned (7: 36-50; 11: 37-52; 14: 1-24). In the journey section as well as in Jerusalem, it is the leaders who are at the center of Jesus' condemnation (11: 37-52; 12: 1; 14: 1-4; 15: 1-2; 16: 14-15; 19: 45-47; 20: 45-47). While the few exceptions, such as jairus (8: 41) and Joseph of Arimathea (23: 50-53), catch our attention, for the most part Luke sees the leadership standing opposed to Jesus and plotting his demise (6: 11; 11: 53-54; 20: 19; 22: 3-6, 31; 23: 3-5).

The crowd's (see People, Crowd) reaction to Jesus is mixed. They have interest in Jesus and yet their response to him is superficial and sometimes fickle. The transition occurs in Luke 9—13. Jesus offers many warnings to them in the crucial section of Luke 12: 49—14: 24. In addition he rebukes "this generation" in 11: 29-32, condemns various cities of Israel in 10: 13-16 (see Blessing and Woe) and tells a few parables about the failings of the nation (13: 6-9; 20: 9-19). The crowd's eventual response typifies the general response of most in Israel. Their rejection brings warnings of judgment but such warnings do not represent Jesus' anger. They picture prophetic regret as when Jesus weeps for those he warns (19: 41-44). In the end the crowd shares in the responsibility for Jesus' death when they ask for Barabbas (23: 18-25). At the final hour, on the road to the cross, Jesus delivers a prophetic message of judgment to the daughters of Jerusalem and their children (23: 27-31).

The response of most of Israel is a tragic one. It was in line for blessing, but has missed its day of visitation and now awaits judgment (19: 44). Now it is the "time of the Gentiles" (21: 24). Israel has not lost its place in God's plan, for the faithfulness of God's promise to it cannot be denied, but it is "desolate" until it acknowledges this Messiah (13: 34-35; Acts 3: 14-21). In Acts the nation is warned to change its mind about Jesus and repent (Acts 2: 22-24; 5: 27-32).

Luke has been accused of anti-Semitism* (Sanders), but this is a harsh judgment. Luke is arguing that it was the new community which was persecuted by those who failed to respond to the message of hope. Jesus and the disciples consistently offered the gospel to the nation and suffered while making the offer. The disciples did not create the division and did not bring violence to the Jewish community. Those who responded to Jesus were forced out as the persecution of Acts shows and as Jesus predicted (12: 1-12). The new community was not anti-Jewish; it was pro-promise. Consistently in Acts the new community suffers great risk as it returns to the synagogue to offer hope to the nation. Such enemies were to be loved and prayed for, as Jesus made clear (6: 27-36; 23: 34; Acts 7: 60).

3. 3. 5. A Source of Tension: The Issue of the Law. One of the primary causes of tension both in the Gospel and in Acts is the new community's relationship to the Law. At the same time, Luke's precise understanding of this issue has been a subject of ongoing debate in Lukan scholarship.

Some have argued that Luke displays a very conservative attitude toward the Law, conservative in the sense that the new community's existence and conduct is in keeping with the Law. There is but one Israel, one covenant, one Law, and the Jewish-Christian community in particular, along with its associate Gentile Christians, are the true heirs of the OT promise (Jervell). More recendy, Esler has argued that Luke maintains this position—untenable as it may be—out of the sociological motivation of legitimating the community (see Sociological Analysis of the Gospels).

Others (Wilson) suggest that Luke is ambivalent toward the Law. Luke sees Jewish Christians keeping the Law, while Gentiles are free from some of its demands (circumcision) and bound by others (idols, meat offered to idols, immorality).

Finally, it has been argued that Luke understands the Law to be part of the old era, but portrays the church as it slowly came to recognize that truth (Blomberg, Turner). Law was not regarded as binding, though the missionary praxis of the early church allowed its observance in matters where issues central to the new faith were not at stake. The latter view is well supported by the Gospel and Acts.

The Law or its associated traditions, especially Sabbath regulations (6: 1-11, esp. v. 4), are a central source of irritation in Luke's Gospel. It is important to note that the Sabbath challenge comes after Jesus' proclamation that new wine must come in new wineskins and that those who like the old will not try the new (5: 33-39). This remark was part of a dispute centered around Jesus' neglect of Jewish traditions related to cleansing (see Clean and Unclean). Jesus challenged the Law, at least in terms of its first-century Jewish interpretation, and Luke regards this challenge as the catalyst for Jewish opposition.

Acts throws further light on Luke's understanding of Law. The understanding that all foods are clean, the full table fellowship with the Gentiles and the refusal to circumcise Gentiles (Acts 10—11, 15) are vivid examples of the early church's rejection of some elements of the Law and the tradition which grew out of it. Luke's clear recounting of early Christians being charged by Jews with denying Mosaic customs, as well as his description of the early community's struggle with the issue of keeping the Law, shows an awareness of the ferment within the early community (13: 10-17; 14: 2-6; 23: 2; Acts 6: 11, 13; 15: 1-5; 21: 28; 25: 8). Luke's understanding is that the Law pointed to the promise (16: 16; 24: 45-47; Acts 26: 4-23; cf. Acts 3: 14-26 which cites Torah texts exclusively). While he openly describes the differences within the early church, the prevailing argument is that God gave evidence of his acceptance of Gentiles by pouring out the Spirit, before they were circumcised (Acts 11: 15-18) and gave a vision to Peter that commanded open table fellowship (Acts 10: 1-33). Luke portrays taking vows and observing other elements of the Law as optional, sometimes necessary for unity, but not to be confused with what is necessary for salvation (Acts 15: 22-29; 21: 17-26).

Luke's resolution is that Jewish Christians are free to observe such customs as long as they do not force Gentiles to do so. This distinction is crucial and not unlike the solution of Paul in Romans 13—14. On this view the Law cannot be held as binding. The many texts in Acts dealing with this issue reveal some of the concerns Luke wishes to address. They also presuppose a racially mixed community struggling with its relationship to its ancient roots. Luke is honest about these differences and forthright about the complex solution and compromise which emerged out of the concern for the church's unity. Moreover, his account indicates his endorsement of the resolution.

3. 3. 6. The Pressure and the Plan. In the face of opposition disciples were called to a strong commitment to Jesus, for it was inevitable that with a decision for Jesus, opposition would come. Indications of division and opposition come early in the Gospel (2: 34-35) and are constant throughout (8: 14-15; 9: 21-23, 61-62; 12: 4-9, 22-34; 22: 35-38). The disciples are pictured as shrinking back from responding boldly, as Peter's denial exemplifies. But in Acts the presence of the Spirit enables them to become consistently bold so that they truly exemplify the steadfastness and faithfulness that should mark a disciple.

The exhortation to steadfast discipleship surely reveals a facet of the Gospel's origin. For Theophilus and other Gentiles the pressure of conflict was the occasion for reassurance that they not only belonged in the new community but that they would partake of God's plan and blessing.
3. 4. The New Community: Mission, Ethics and Accountability. The new community had not chosen to separate itself from Judaism. It had presented itself as the hope of the nation but had been forced to become distinct. On the other hand, its new experience of the Spirit set it apart from the Jewish community. The Spirit not only evidenced the presence of the ascended Lord in their midst (Acts 2: 14-40; 11: 15), but enabled the new community to live by the principles Jesus had laid down—a life distinct from contemporary norms of piety and current cultural standards (12: 1; 14: 1-14; 22: 24-27).

3. 4. 1. Faith, Dependence and Commitment. The community was called to a fundamental reorientation toward God expressed as faith and repentance (see 3. 3. 2. above). This attitude of trust, so clearly indicated in Jesus' preaching, parables and encounters with individuals, not only begins the walk with God but sustains it (5: 31-32; 15: 17-21; with 12: 22-32). Disciples are to be totally focused on their walk with God. The path is difficult and requires self-reflection, total commitment, daily dedication and cross-bearing (9: 23; 9: 57-62; 14: 25-35).

The community was called to mission. While Acts details the early missionary activity of the community, the call to preach repentance and forgiveness to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, is spelled out in the Gospel (24: 47). The parables of Luke 15: 1-32 reflect the focus on the lost, as do the clear statements of Luke 5: 31-32 and 19: 10. Jesus' disciples were to follow him in reaching out to others.

3. 4. 2. Love for God and One's Neighbor. Devotion to God is highlighted in Luke 11: 1-13, a devotion expressing itself in dependent prayer. Devotion to Jesus is shown by Mary's choice to sit at Jesus' feet, absorbing his teaching and presence (10: 38-42). In addition, the care of one's neighbor is also an expression of such devotion (10: 25-37). In fact, what Jesus himself demonstrated, he calls his disciples to be: neighbors to all, without distinction of race or class.

3. 4. 3. Prayer. Jesus both models and encourages prayer* (11: 1-13; 18: 1-8; 18: 9-14; 22: 40). Prayer does not demand; it requests, humbly relying on God's mercy and will. It voices trust in God's care and provision of basic needs. It recognizes that in seeking forgiveness, men and women should be prepared to give it as well. And it looks with expectation to the eschatological consummation of God's kingdom.
3. 4. 4. Persistence and Watchfulness. Under the pressure of conflict and opposition, the community is to remain steadfast and faithful (8: 13-15; 9: 23; 18: 8; 21: 19; see 3. 3. 6. above). The church in Acts often exemplifies such persistence (Acts 4: 23-31). This attitude is related in turn to patience and expectation. Disciples are to fear God, not mortals (12: 1-12), recognizing that the Lord will return and that they are responsible to him (12: 35-48; 19: 11-27; 18: 8). Like the seed on good soil, they hear the Word, cling to it and persevere to bear fruit (8: 15).

It is here that eschatology makes its impact in Luke. Jesus represents both the present and the future. The promises which remain unrealized will be fulfilled (17: 22-37; 21: 5-38). The judgment* of Jerusalem is the guarantee and picture of the final judgment. The return will be a horrific period in which unbelieving humanity is severely judged and believers will suffer at the hands of unbelievers. Luke emphasizes that the coming of the Son of man places responsibility on disciples to be faithful and on all humanity to respond to the gospel. In Acts he will note that Jesus is the "judge of the living and the dead" (Acts 10: 42; 17: 31). While Luke indicates that the time of the return is unknown, it will come suddenly and the disciples must be prepared (12: 3540).

Scholars have debated whether Luke decries wealth per se. Zacchaeus, who generously gives half of his possessions to the poor and repays those he has wronged, hardly seems to have divested himself of every asset. His example suggests that the issue is not what a person has, but what a person does with his or her possessions. The disciples are said to have "left all" for Jesus (18: 28-30), a remark that includes family as well as resources. Yet later in the Gospel, under the pressure of Jesus' arrest, they exhibit fear and denial. The issue with resources, as with the other demands of discipleship, is not the perfection of the response or the parting with one's last coin, but the fundamental orientation of the response. Disciples are called to recognize that all of life belongs to God and comes from his hand. The rich man would not even consider Jesus' request to sell all, while the disciples and Zacchaeus had entered into the process. In sum, Luke warns that the hindrances to discipleship include not only confidence in resources, but the fear of other's opinion (12: 1-12) and the cares of life (8: 14).

4. Conclusion.

Luke's Gospel is pastoral, theological and historical. The reality of God's plan impacts how individuals see themselves and the community to which they belong. Old barriers of race are removed. New hope abounds. The message of Jesus is one of hope and transformation. Anyone, Jew or Gentile, can belong to the new community. At the center is Jesus, the promised Messiah-Lord, who sits at God's right hand exercising authority from above. He will return one day and all are accountable to him. His life, ministry and resurrection/ascension show he is worthy of trust. Just as he has inaugurated the fulfillment of God's promises, so he will bring them to completion. In the meantime, being a disciple is not easy, but it is full of rich blessing which transcends anything else this life can offer. This is the reassurance about salvation which Luke offers to Theophilus and others like him.

"M" TRADITION

The M tradition generally refers to all of the material in Matthew which is unparalleled in Mark or Luke or, more narrowly, to the discourse material which is found only in Matthew. Source-critical interests related to the Synoptic problem* have dominated reconstructions of M. Source critics (Streeter, Manson, Kilpatrick) generally agreed that M was a pre-Mat-thean written source (c. A. D. 65) which was Jewish-Christian in nature, polemical toward the scribes* and Pharisees* and was not as reliable as the other Synoptic sources (Mark, Q* and L) for conveying authentic teachings of Jesus (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]).

1. The Nature of the M Tradition.

To source critics the kind of Christian community which produced M seemed to be a Jewish-Christian community which felt obligated to keep both the Law* and the scribal traditions (5: 17-20; 23: 2-3). The M community also opposed the mission to the Gentiles* (10: 5b-7; cf. 28: 16-20). In light of this data, it was contended that M reflected either the Jewish-Christian group at Jerusalem which had James as its leader (Streeter, 232) or, more generally, the "Jewish-Chris-tians of Judea with their headquarters at Jerusalem" (Manson, 25). In either case M seemed to reflect a segment of Jewish Christianity which opposed the lax approach to the Law practiced by Pauline Christians in their mission to the Gentiles (cf. 5: 19 and Gal 2: 15-16).

Manson emphasized, however, that "M is not merely Christianized Rabbinism" since it also "shows clear traces of the influence of the teaching of John the Baptist" (p. 25). Teachings of the Baptist (e. g., 3: 7 par. Luke 3: 7 Q; see John the Baptist) are clearly put into Jesus' mouth in M (12: 34; 23: 33). Because of the Jewish-Christian polemical character of M and because of its handling of Jesus' sayings in light of John's preaching, critics have agreed that M's presentation of Jesus' teachings should be used cautiously in any reconstruction of Jesus' authentic sayings.
Although Kilpatrick also viewed M as a written source, he can be seen as one pointing the way toward redaction-critical studies of M since he did not see any reliable means for ascertaining what material is from M and what is from the final editor. He was reluctant, therefore, in assigning to M either a life-situation in early Christianity or a clear-cut ideology.

Redaction critics (see Redaction Criticism) tend to see M as either the Evangelist's original composition or as material incorporated by him as an integral part of the entire Gospel. In particular it has been emphasized that the source critic's understanding of the development of early Christianity have caricatured their views about the nature of M. It is now generally agreed that no easy distinctions like "Jerusalem" versus "Pauline" Christianity can be made when speaking of the character of early Christian communities.

The character of the community which produced M is still the focus of research, but scholars now view M as both written material and oral traditions which have been reworked carefully by the final redactor. The "Jewish" character of M is no longer characterized by general statements about the Jerusalem Church. Rather, it is seen as reflecting several stages in the specific relationship between the Matthean community and the Judaism within its particular locale (Brooks; Levine).

2. The Christology of the M Tradition.

Since the M tradition has been seen as a Jewish-Christian "corruption" of Jesus' teachings, very little has been done with the view of Jesus in M and with the role M plays in Matthean christology as a whole. Although some general agreement about the christology of M is discernible in the history of research, the following summary must be regarded as tentative since there is still no consensus about either the content of M or the history of its transmission.

The M tradition presents Jesus as the authoritative interpreter of the Law. * This role is particularly clear in the so-called antitheses of 5: 21-48, where we find the authoritative contrast of "You have heard that it was said [to the ancient ones], But I say to you.... " At the most, Jesus is presented in M as the giver of a New Law; at the least, he is the authoritative interpreter of the Law (Davies, 387-389). The M tradition does present Jesus' words as applicable to practical matters (e. g., 5: 31-32; cf. 19: 9), but this should not lead simply to the conclusion that Jesus is only a great rabbi (see Teacher).
In M Jesus is the founder of the end-time community, the church* (16: 18-19; cf. 18: 17), and his revelation is the standard by which God* will judge the community (5: 17-20; cf. 25: 31-46; see Judgment). Jesus also commissions its members for their limited mission to Israel* (10: 5-7). During the short interval before the end (10: 23), Jesus is the only teacher whose authority* God recognizes, as the intimate and exclusive phrases "my Father/your Father" suggest (6: 1-8, 16-18; 18: 19). Jesus' teaching, unlike Moses's, * is unmediated, and he is presented in M as having direct access to the Father. Thus M presents Jesus as the only authoritative interpreter of God's will. Jesus has the eschatological* authority to reinterpret what God gave to Moses at Sinai ("it was said... but I say"). Jesus can thus equate his eschatological teachings ("my yoke") with the final and complete will of God (11: 28-30; cf. 11: 25-27).

The M tradition presents Jesus in exclusive terms as the founder, the teacher and the one who commissions the end-time community under the sole authority of his heavenly Father (23: 8-10). These christological themes blend well with the entire presentation of Jesus in Matthew. The M tradition, then, should probably be viewed as representing a stage in the development of the Matthean community itself (Brooks) rather than as a foreign tradition which was incorporated into the Gospel only with great difficulty.

MAGI. See Birth of Jesus.
The Gospel according to Mark stands as one of the foundational documents of the Christian faith. Eclipsed for centuries as an abridged edition of the Gospels according to Matthew and Luke, this Gospel was rediscovered for its own sake in the nineteenth-century quests for the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus) and has risen to prominence in twentieth-century Gospel studies. Indeed the number of written works on Mark over the past forty years certainly rivals and may well surpass that written on Matthew and Luke combined.

1. Introduction
2. Mark's Narrative Pattern
3. Mark's Theology
4. Mark's Ending
5. Mark's Purpose

1. Introduction.

The Gospel according to Mark has raised numerous questions about its significance, authorship, date, place, audience and genre. Some of these issues are more critical than others for a proper understanding of Mark as a Gospel. Certainly the rediscovery of Mark as a narrative text to be viewed as a whole (see Literary Criticism) rather than merely a collection of its constituent parts has done much to recapture the dynamic thrust of the thought of this Gospel.

   1. 1. The Significance of Mark. How does this Gospel serve as a fundamental document for the Christian faith? Two contemporary NT scholars—one in Germany and one in the USA—have attributed the very story of Jesus found in all the Gospels to the creativity of the original author of this (B. Mack, Myth of Innocence, 1989) or its underlying (W. Schmithals, Das Evangelium nach Markus, 1979) Gospel. Mack goes so far as to attribute the "origin for the Christian view of Christian origins" to the genius of the writer of Mark's Gospel (357). These extreme views stem in part from the broad consensus that Mark's Gospel was indeed the first Gospel and provided the literary basis for the Gospels of Matthew and Luke (see Synoptic Problem).
Did Mark create the story of Jesus for the church (e. g., Schmithals, Mack) or did Mark create the literary genre (see Gospel [Genre]) of the Gospel (the broad consensus of NT scholars) for the church? In other words, just how foundational was Mark's Gospel as a document in the early church?

1. 1.1. "The Beginning of the Gospel." The first clue to the role of Mark's Gospel comes in the opening words: "the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Messiah [Christ], Son of God" (1: 1). Taken as an independent heading, as found in most English translations, and punctuated with a period at the end, the meaning of "beginning" and "gospel" can be and has been debated. For example, does "beginning" refer to: (1) the Gospel itself as the "beginning (either as a point in time or as the rudimentary elements) of the gospel" or (2) the "beginning section" of the Gospel of Mark—that is, the opening verses? Does "gospel" then refer to: (1) the message preached by Jesus Messiah, Son of God (cf. 1: 14; see Gospel [Good News]), (2) the message about Jesus Messiah, Son of God as understood and proclaimed by the church or (3) the story that follows as the Gospel?

The common Jewish formula for a scriptural citation, "as has been written by...," in 1:2 removes these ambiguities. This citation formula always links what has gone before to what follows. It never begins a citation by referring forward to what follows (e. g., 1: 4-8). Therefore, instead of placing a period at the end of "the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Messiah, Son of God" (1: 1), one must continue with "as has been written by the prophet Isaiah" (1: 1-2). Accordingly, Mark opens by stating that "the beginning" (1: 1) occurs "as has been written by the prophet Isaiah. " References—explicit or oblique—to Isaiah in the following verses set the boundaries of "the beginning of the gospel... as has been written by Isaiah the prophet. " Since Isaiah's promise underlies the coming of John the Baptist (1: 4-8, cf. Is 40; see John the Baptist), the baptism* of Jesus (1: 9-11, cf. Is 42: 1; 61: 1), Jesus' presence in the wilderness (1: 12-13, cf. Is 40; 65; see Mountain and Wilderness) and Jesus' proclamation of the "gospel of God" (1: 14-15, cf. Is 52: 7; 61: 1-2), 1: 1-15 represents the "beginning of the gospel about Jesus Messiah, Son of God as has been written by the prophet Isaiah... " (1: 1-2).

If 1: 1-15 represents the "beginning of the gospel... " in keeping with Isaiah's promise, then Mark 1: 16—16: 8 must be the rest of the "gospel concerning Jesus Messiah, Son of God" for which 1: 1-15 is "the beginning. " In other words, Mark refers to the following story about Jesus, which begins with the coming of John the Baptist (1: 4) and runs to the statement of the women's fear (16: 8), as the "gospel." The story about Jesus is the "gospel."

1. 1. 2. Gospel Narrative before Mark. Paul's "gospel" by contrast does not focus at all on the story of the earthly ministry of Jesus. Rather it centers on statements about what God* has done through Jesus' death (see Death of Jesus) on the cross and subsequent resurrection* Even the earliest Christian traditional expression of the "gospel" consists of creedal statements. "For I handed on to you [as tradition] of first importance what I in turn had received [as tradition]: 'that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures, and that he appeared to Cephas, then to the Twelve' " (1 Cor 15: 2-5). Did Mark then, in place of this propositional gospel encapsulated in pithy formulas, create what he calls "the gospel about Jesus Messiah, Son of God," a gospel in narrative form that focused more on Jesus' earthly ministry as well as his death?

The answer may well lie in Peter's sermon in Acts 10: 34-43. One finds in this brief summary the basic structure of the narrative Gospel common to Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. It sets the beginning with John the Baptist and runs through Jesus' ministry, death, resurrection and appearance to witnesses (see Witness), all accompanied by allusions to the Scriptures. In fact the reference to preaching the gospel of peace* of Isaiah 52: 7 stands as the backdrop for this Gospel (cf. Acts 10: 36).

If the outline of Peter's sermon in Acts 10: 34-43 reflects an early Christian form of preaching the gospel, then Mark would not have been the one to create the gospel in narrative form in contrast to the more propositional statement of the gospel as found in Paul. The use of the narrative or story of Jesus as the "gospel," consisting of traditional materials about his work and words, would antedate Mark's writing of his Gospel and preclude his having created the actual form and content of his Gospel (see Tradition Criticism). Where does Mark's foundational contribution then lie?

1. 1. 3. Gospel Narrative As Literary Form. On the basis of intensive comparative studies, a scholarly consensus affirms that Mark's Gospel was the earliest of the four Gospels (set Synoptic Problem). Furthermore, both Matthew and Luke appear to have used Mark's Gospel as the basis for writing their own. Luke 1: 1 actually notes that "many have undertaken to set down an orderly account (a "narrative") of the events that have been fulfilled among us."
Whether John's Gospel was familiar with this or all three Synoptic Gospels is still debated (see Synoptics and John), but his narrative does follow the same broad structure of Mark and the summary in Acts 10: 34-43. Therefore, Mark's foundational contribution lies in his having actually written the first of our four Gospels. He was the first to put into written or literary form a narrative of Jesus as the Gospel. Finally, Mark was the first and only Evangelist to refer to his narrative as "the gospel" (1: 1; cf. Lk 1: 1; Mt 1: 1). By the turn of the first century, the four Gospels were known as "the Gospel according to Matthew, Mark, Luke and John" respectively. Thus Mark's opening reference to his story as "the gospel" most likely set the stage for the use of that term as a literary designation for the four distinctive literary works we now call our Gospels.

1. 2. Authorship. Who was the innovative author of this foundational Gospel? Like the other three Gospels, this one is anonymous and contains neither allusions (cf. Lk 1: 1-4; Jn 21: 24) nor clues to authorship. Perhaps the author assumed the readers' knowledge of authorship (e.g., Lk 1: 1-4; Acts 1: 1). More likely the anonymity reflects the author's understanding that his Gospel was hardly a creative literary product but rather was an expression of the gospel from God promised by Isaiah (52: 7; 61: 1) and expressed in the teaching and stories of Jesus as preached in the early church (cf. 1: 1; 1: 14). Since no single author could lay personal claim to creating this Gospel, the Gospel is anonymous.

Traditionally, however, it became known as the "Gospel according to Mark." Apart from this title, which with the titles of the other Gospels may date from the end of the first century, Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, provides the earliest documentable testimony attributing a literary work to one named Mark But Papias, whose five-volume work Interpretation of the Lord's Sayings (c. A.D. 120/30) was cited by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3. 39. 15), claims to have learned this from another whom he calls the Elder: "And this is what the Elder said, 'Mark, who became Peter's interpreter, accurately wrote, though not in order, as many of the things said and done by the Lord as he had noted.' The subsequent extant testimony of the late second century (e.g., the anti-Marcionite prolog; Irenaeus Haer. 3. 1. 1; Clement of Alexandria as cited by Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6. 14; cf. 2: 15) appears to be derivative of this tradition.

Who was Mark? Despite the very common occurrence of Mark (Marcus) as a Roman name, the association by Papias and the early church tradition of Mark with Peter has led to identifying the author as the "John Mark" known elsewhere in the NT (1 Pet 5: 13; Acts 12: 12, 25; 13: 13; 15: 37-39 and in the Pauline corpus: Philem 24; Col 4: 10; 2 Tim 4: 11). Some more recent scholars have sought to distinguish between the Evangelist Mark, a companion of Peter (1 Pet 5: 13), and John Mark, the associate of Paul in Acts and the Pauline corpus. This distinction, however, requires special pleading. Apart from the absence of any solid basis for this distinction in the tradition, the mention of both Silvanus and Mark in 1 Peter 5: 12-13 makes clear that "Mark" was the "John Mark" of Acts and the Pauline corpus who with Silvanus (Silas) had also been a companion of Paul. Therefore, Mark was the companion of both Peter and Paul, a member of the primitive community in Jerusalem that met in the upper room of his mother's home (Acts 12: 12) where Jesus might have celebrated the Last Supper (cf. Mk 14: 14-15; Acts 1: 13-14; see Last Supper).

In any case, the question of authorship need not have a bearing on one's reading of the Gospel. The author makes no pretense of giving either his own or another's eyewitness account of any events of the Gospel. Furthermore, his identity neither assists one's understanding nor guarantees the accuracy of the details. Consequently, his identity remains merely a historical curiosity which the author fostered by his decision to remain anonymous.

1. 3. Date. When did the author write this foundational document? According to our earliest tradition (anti-Marcionite prolog; Irenaeus Haer. 3. 1. 1, c. AD. 160/80), Mark wrote after Peter's death in Rome, assumed to be c. A. D. 64-65 during Nero's rule. Clement of Alexandria (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 6. 14. 5-7) places the writing during Peter's time in Rome (c. AD. 45-65). Most scholars, however, follow the earlier tradition and debate only whether he wrote before or after the fall of Jerusalem in AD. 70 (see Destruction of Jerusalem).

The only relevant data in Mark may come in 13: 14, when read against the historical background of the Jewish War of A. D. 67-70. The Evangelist sets the discourse in 13: 3-37 in the context of the predicted fall of Jerusalem. Yet the reference to the "abomination of desolation" and the order for the Judeans to "flee to the hills" (see Apocalyptic Teaching) hardly makes sense after the destruction of the Temple. Not only does the "abomination" lack a personal referent in the events of the destruction of the Temple, but the summons to "flee to the hills" makes little sense after Rome completely surrounded Jerusalem with a tight military blockade in A. D. 67-69 preventing all entrance and exit. Perhaps a time c. A. D. 66-67, before the final siege of Jerusalem but when the inevitable end of Jerusalem and the Temple was in sight, corresponds more closely to the details than a date during or after the siege.
As with authorship, however, apart from 13:14 one gains little advantage in interpreting Mark's Gospel by having a precise date for its inception. The story stands without any direct connection to any current historical events. The nature of Mark's story, with its primary focus on Jesus' life and teaching as constitutive of the plot, may account for Mark's reticence to read his day and times back into the story of an earlier period. Consequently, the specific date of Mark's Gospel is more an issue of historical curiosity than a necessity or even an aid for correctly understanding Mark's text.

1. 4. Place. Where did Mark write this Gospel? Various locales, including Galilee, * the Decapolis, Tyre, Sidon, Syria, the East and Rome, * have been suggested. Traditionally, the anti-Marcionite prolog places it in the "regions of Italy, " with Clement of Alexandria locating it in Rome during Peter's ministry (Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2. 15; 6. 14. 6). John Chrysostom (Horn. Mt. 1. 3) even sets it in Egypt.

The diversity of proposed locales indicates how little evidence the Gospel itself gives in helping one determine its original setting. One of the strongest arguments for Rome or Italy, apart from the traditional association of the Gospel with Peter, lies in the numerous Latinisms, several of which Mark simply transliterates into Greek. Furthermore, Mark 12: 42 explains the "widow's mite," a Greek coin, as being a quadrans and "inside the courtyard" of 15: 16 as being "the governor's headquarters. " Both of the underlying Greek expressions would have needed little clarification for readers in the East whereas they might be unfamiliar to an audience in the West and support a setting in Rome. The argument from language (see Languages of Palestine), however, is hardly conclusive, since many of the Latinisms do reflect semi-technical expressions common to military and trade and would be found in any area, such as the East occupied by Roman forces.

As with date and author, the lack of explicit references supporting any one locale means that the issue of place has little to do with how one reads or understands the Gospel. Consequently, time and space locators in Mark belong strictly to the narrative rather than to the historical setting of when and where the Gospel was written.

1. 5. Audience. As with place and date one cannot specify the audience and occasion for this Gospel. The frequent explanation of Aramaic expressions as well as Jewish laws and customs may well indicate an audience unfamiliar with certain forms of Judaism. * To say more goes beyond the limits of the text. Consequently, this generic quality of Mark gives it a universal character that addresses the modern disciple in much the same manner as it did its first readers. It is the "gospel concerning Jesus Messiah, Son of God" that itself summons one to "repent and believe the gospel" that God has acted and will act again to effect his sovereign, saving rule in and through Jesus Messiah, God's Son.

1. 6. Mark As Story. Because the Gospels consist of episodes focusing on Jesus' ministry and teaching, the reader often concentrates more on the individual parts than on the whole. Such a reading has marked the popular reading of the Gospels on a personal and liturgical level. At the scholarly level much of twen-tieth-century Markan studies has specialized in decomposing the Gospel by delineating and analyzing the underlying traditional units (see Form Criticism), a study that has made us aware of the rich background of the Gospels' constituent parts. Yet Mark's opening statement about the "gospel concerning Jesus Messiah, Son of God" refers to the whole of Mark's narrative. The Evangelist wrote a story, a narrative. Consequently, aware of this rich traditional background, one needs to step back and look at the elements involved in this Gospel as a story in order to gain a better view of its message.

1. 6. 1. The Narrator's Role. The narrator provides the primary point of view for this story. As one who knows all the events of the story, the narrator also knows the thoughts, feelings, emotions and intentions of the story's many characters. Yet the narrator, distinguished from the author by such omniscience, never appears as part of the story or as one of the characters of the story. The story is told by one external to its events, who clearly shares the point of view of Jesus, who in turn shares God's point of view in the story. Therefore, one is led from the outset to trust the narrator.

1. 6. 2. Plot and Characters. The reader discovers the plot in the opening statement It revolves around the "good news about Jesus Messiah, Son of God" expressed in the events of the story. In other words, the plot consists in Jesus' effective proclamation in word and deed of the "gospel" from God that God's promised redemptive rule was at hand summoning people to repent (see Repentance) and respond in faith. * Mark wanted the reader to respond in faith, "to think the thoughts of God" (8: 33). This plot is carried by the ensuing conflict motif between Jesus and the demonic (e. g., 1: 12-13, 21-27; see Demon, Devil, Satan), between Jesus and the Jewish authorities (e. g., 2: 1— 3: 6; 12: 13-44), between Jesus and the Roman authorities (e. g., 15: 2-15), between Jesus and his family* (e. g., 3: 20-21, 30-35) and even between Jesus and his disciples* (e. g., 8: 14-21).

A corollary of this conflict motif is Jesus' identity. The leading character and protagonist of the story, his identity is made explicit to the reader as "Jesus Messiah, Son of God" at the outset in 1: 1 with accent on the "Son of God," confirmed by God through the voice from heaven* at the baptism (1: 11) and the Transfiguration* (9: 7), declared by the demons (1: 25; 3: 11-12; 5: 7), confessed by Peter (8: 27-29), personally affirmed by Jesus to the high priest (14: 61-62; see Priest and Priesthood), but declared openly without qualification for the first time at the crucifixion by the Roman centurion (15: 39).

Yet apart from the demons the full significance of Jesus' identity escapes the other leading characters of the story. This failure to recognize who Jesus was comes through in the rejection of Jesus by the religious authorities (e. g., 3: 22-30; 14: 63-65), his parents (e. g., 3: 21), his hometown (e. g., 6: 1-6) and even the misunderstanding of his disciples (e. g., 4: 35-41; 6: 45-52; 8: 31-33). Furthermore, Jesus' silencing of the demons and his disciples whenever his true identity is involved, as well as his exclusive use of the ambiguous "Son of man"* to refer to himself, enhances this "messianic secret."

The other leading role in this story is played by the disciples whose response to Jesus forms a major part of the plot. Called and privileged to be with Jesus (1: 16-20; 3: 7-12), privately taught by him (e. g., 4: 10-20, 33-34), commissioned to participate in his ministry (e. g., 6: 7-13, 30), they continually fail to understand him or accurately recognize who he really is and the implications of who he is for their discipleship* (e. g., 8: 27—10: 45). They waffle between having their mind on "divine things" and having their mind on "human things" (8: 33).

1. 6. 3. Narrative Space and Time. The story covers an indefinite time span between Jesus' appearance at the Jordan to be baptized by John and his death during a Passover celebration (see Feasts) in Jerusalem. The tight framework constructed from the movement around Galilee (1: 16—7: 23), then north and east of Galilee (7: 24-9: 29), back to Galilee (9: 30-52) and on to the Trans-Jordan (10: 1-52), ending eventually in Jerusalem (11: 1—16: 8), suggests a period of less than one year. One must not, however, assume that the author's desire to provide a connected narrative necessarily implies a short, chronologically arranged and comprehensive account of Jesus' ministry (see Chronology). The narrative space and time belong primarily to the story rather than to the events themselves as a comparison with the other Gospels, especially the Fourth Gospel, indicates.

2. Mark's Narrative Pattern.

A narrative often presents difficulties for one seeking to break it into discrete parts. This Gospel is no exception, as a quick review of the numerous suggested outlines in the commentaries will indicate. The edges are fuzzy at best, but a literary pattern suggests a threefold division (1: 1-15; 1: 16-8: 26; 8: 27-16: 8), with the two larger parts (1: 16—8: 26; 8: 27—16: 8) divisible into three sections respectively.

2. 1. Prolog (1: 1-15). The Gospel opens with a prolog, or a "beginning of the gospel," set against Isaiah's promise (1: 1-2). First, the coming, baptism and preaching of John the Baptist (1: 4-8) corresponds to Isaiah's promise of a "voice in the wilderness" who "prepares the way of the Lord" as the precursor. Then Jesus' baptism accompanied by the coming of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) and the voice from heaven echoes Isaiah 42: 1 (cf. Is 42: 1-2; 61: 1) and sets the stage for his being in the wilderness for forty days (1: 12-13) where he is sustained by the angels* in the company of the wild animals (cf. Is 65: 17-25). Finally, in summary fashion, having been anointed by the Spirit at his baptism and led by the Spirit into the wilderness, Jesus emerges to declare the "good news of God" that the "time has been fulfilled, God's redemptive rule has come" in keeping with Isaiah 52: 7 and 61: 1. By introducing the ensuing story in this way, the Evangelist shows the "gospel concerning Jesus Messiah, Son of God," to be Isaiah's promised "good news" of God's salvation* (cf. Is 52: 7; 61: 1).

2. 2. Part One (1: 16—8: 26). Jesus' ministry in public as the "Messiah, Son of God" runs from 1: 16 to 8: 26. This part consists of three smaller sections that seem to have a similar literary structure. Each begins with a story about the disciples (1: 16-20; 3: 13-19; 6: 7-13) and each closes with an ominous story of rejection or unbelief (3: 1-6; 6: 1-6; and 8: 10-21) followed by a summary (3: 7-12; 6: 6) or a story with the function of a summary (8: 22-26) that is related to the theme of the respective section.

2. 2. 1. The first of these (1: 16-3: 12) might be called "new wine in old wineskins" (see Wine). After calling the first disciples, it moves from a day in Capernaum to a series of conflicts issuing from Jesus' authoritative ministry (2: 1
2. 2. 2. The second section (3: 13—6: 6) might be called the "mystery of the kingdom of God" as seen in Jesus' words (3: 20-4: 34) and deeds (4: 35—5: 43).

2. 2. 3. In the third section (6: 7—8: 26) Jesus' ministry extends beyond the purity (see Clean and Unclean) boundaries of Galilee (cf. 7: 1—8: 9), but the motif of misunderstanding emerges more forcefully from the public's and Herod's misconceptions about Jesus (6: 14-16) to the disciples' own failure to understand (6: 45-52; 8: 14-21), despite the feedings of the five and four thousand. The healing of the blind man from Bethsaida (7: 22-26) appears to illustrate the disciples' myopic plight (see Blindness and Deafness). Though seeing, they need the "second touch. " Consequendy, they form the primary focus of Jesus' ministry from 8: 27-16: 8.

2. 3. Part Two (8: 27-16: 8). The final pan of Mark's story (8: 27—16: 8) clearly focuses on the death of Jesus Messiah, Son of God, and it also falls into three sections.

2. 3. 1. The first (8: 27-10: 52) revolves around a threefold pattern of a Son of man passion prediction (8: 31; 9: 31; 10: 33; see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection) followed by the disciple's failure to grasp the point that sets the stage for Jesus' teaching on discipleship (8: 32-38; 9: 32-10: 31; 10: 34-45). The healing of blind Bartimaeus (10: 46-52) and his enthusiastic response of joining Jesus "on the way" stands as a counterpoint to the disciples and the earlier, belabored healing* of the blind man of Bethsaida (8: 22-26).

2. 3. 2. The second section (11: 1—13: 37) sets Jesus in and around the Temple* in Jerusalem where the conflict mounts from his actions (11: 1-19) and teaching (11: 27—12: 44) in the Temple and across from the Temple (13: 1-37).

2. 3. 3. In the third and final section (14: 1—16: 8) one has the Last Supper, arrest, trial (see Trial of Jesus), crucifixion and burial of Jesus (see Burial of Jesus) "Messiah, Son of God" (14: 1—15: 47). Clearly, one finds the climax of the Markan narrative in the ironic indictment of Jesus by the Romans as the "king of the Jews" (15: 26), the taunts of the Jewish religious authorities of Jesus as "Messiah, king of Israel" (15: 32) and the declaration by the Roman centurion that he indeed was the "Son of God" (15: 39) after the Temple curtain had been torn in two (14: 38). On Easter morning the messenger at the tomb points beyond the story to Jesus' promised meeting with his "disciples and Peter" in Galilee (cf. 14: 28), despite their flight and denial (16: 7-8).

Woven together from isolated units, pre-formed blocks of traditional units and an extended unit underlying the passion narrative (see Passion Narrative), Mark has composed a moving story full of action and pathos. Far more than a scissors-and-paste product, this narrative forms a dramatic whole that derives its power from its being the "gospel concerning Jesus Messiah, Son of God." It makes a theological statement—a statement about God—focusing on God's awaited redemptive activity in history through "Jesus Messiah, Son of God."

3. Mark's Theology.

The Evangelist wrote a story, not a theology. Consequently, in describing Mark's theology one must select the leading motifs of the story and ask about their theological meaning.

3. 1. Kingdom of God. Mark programmatically summarizes Jesus' message at the outset of his Gospel in terms of the kingdom of God (1: 14-15; see Kingdom of God). One would, therefore, expect a strong emphasis on the kingdom to follow in his narrative. Yet for Mark "kingdom of God" hardly stands out in Jesus' ministry. Matthew refers to the kingdom of Heaven/ God approximately fifty times, Luke forty, but Mark only fifteen. Of these references, three occur in the parables* of 4: 1-34, three in the sayings about children* (10: 14-15) and three in the discussion of the rich (10: 23-25; see Rich and Poor). The usages are neither defined nor uniform.

3. 1. 1. Kingdom As Future Expectation. In the discussion with the disciples following the story of the rich man, Jesus refers to the kingdom as something one will enter (10: 23-25; so 9: 47 and 10: 15). The future moment (see Eschatology) also appears in Jesus' promise at the Last Supper about not drinking again until the kingdom (14: 25), in the description of Joseph of Arimathea as one "waiting expectantly for the kingdom of God" (15: 43), in the anticipation of the seed parables (14: 3-20, 26-29, 30-32) and above all in Jesus' assurance that some would "see the kingdom of God having come in power" (9: 1). This future expectation correlates with the references to the coming of the Son of man in judgment* in 8: 38; 13: 26-32 and 14: 62, and with the summons given the disciples to watch in 13: 33-37. The kingdom in Mark, therefore, maintains a distinctive future significance as the time of judgment and
3. 1. 2. Kingdom As Present Reality. At the same time, the possibility of a present reality of God's kingdom appears in the saying about receiving "the kingdom of God as a child" (10: 14-15), the prerequisite for eventually entering the kingdom (10: 15). Not only does one have here a difference in time between the kingdom present and the kingdom future, but one also has a different nuance in the meaning of the kingdom of God. To receive the kingdom as a child implies a personal experience of God's sovereign rule that qualifies one to enter into at least a fuller experience of God's sovereign rule or kingdom at a time in the future. In other words, to "receive the kingdom of God as a child" in the present does not exhaust the meaning or expectation of the kingdom of God in the future, nor does the anticipation of the future kingdom of God preclude an experience or reception of the kingdom of God in the present.

3. 1. 3. The Mystery of the Kingdom. This dual motif of the present and future kingdom of God correlates with Jesus' parables in Mark 4 about the "mystery of the kingdom of God" (see Parables). Each of the three seed parables (4: 5-20, 26-29, 30-32) refers to both the present and future dimensions of the kingdom. Indeed, for Mark the "mystery of the kingdom of God" (4: 11) lies precisely in this revelation to the disciples ("to you has been given") of what until then had been hidden about the kingdom of God. God's sovereign redemptive rule has come into history like a vulnerable seed (4: 3-9, 13-20) that grows inexorably until the day of harvest (4: 26-29) whose beginning is infinitely small but whose end is magnificently grand (4: 30-32).

3. 1. 4. The Inauguration of God's Sovereign Reign. This dual dimension of the kingdom present and yet future may well be deliberately reflected in the programmatic summary of Jesus' proclamation of the "gospel of God" (1: 14) in 1: 15: "The appointed time has been fulfilled, the kingdom of God has come, repent and believe the gospel." As the parallel construction indicates, "the appointed time" and the "kingdom of God" have come to pass at a point in history. Yet the Greek verb (engiken) describing the "presence" of the kingdom usually denotes nearness rather than presence, in other words, "the kingdom of God has come near." The apparent tension between the parallel construction and the lexical meaning of the verb affirms that the kingdom of God has come into history, "the appointed time has been fulfilled," even though the full appearance is yet to come ("near"). Both present and future dimensions are important for Mark. This programmatic summary at the outset of Mark's Gospel clearly indicates that the kingdom is the theme of Jesus' ministry.

For Mark, therefore, Jesus' ministry has to do with the inauguration of God's sovereign, redemptive rule, the kingdom of God, in history. The exorcisms of the demonic (e.g., 1: 21-27), healing of the sick (e.g., 2: 1-12; see Healing), fellowship with sinners* (2: 13-17), feeding the hungry (e.g., 6: 34-44), even the programmatic calling of the Twelve (3: 13-19), all give expression in Mark's story to Jesus' preaching of the "gospel of God, the time has been fulfilled, the kingdom of God has come... " as found in the programmatic summary of Jesus' ministry in 1: 14-15. Yet Jesus' earthly ministry does not exhaust the meaning or expectation of the kingdom of God. As seen in the declaration of the coming of the kingdom in power, * the references to the future dimension of the kingdom, the anticipation of the seed parables and the announcement of the coming judgment, Mark understood the kingdom to have a future chapter as well when God's redemptive rule will be revealed in the consummation.

3. 2. Christology. The correlation of eschatology and christology in Mark is evident in the opening statement about the "gospel concerning jesus Messiah, Son of God" (1: 1). Although one might render "Jesus Messiah" as "Jesus Christ"* (cf. most English translations), Mark's clear focus on Jesus as the "Messiah, Son of God" in his narrative, along with the programmatic summary of Jesus' ministry that centers on the coming of the kingdom of God, indicates that more was at stake in his use of "Christ" than simply a proper name. Mark wants to affirm that Jesus is the Messiah, the Anointed One, who inaugurated God's kingdom through his ministry.

3. 2. 1. Messiah. That Jesus is God's Anointed One, the Messiah (see Christ), is confirmed for the reader at the baptism, the first appearance of Jesus in the story (1: 11-15). The voice from heaven at the baptism (1: 11) calls Jesus "my son, " an echo of Psalm 2: 7 (cf. "You are my son, this day have I begotten you"). Since this psalm most likely was a royal psalm used at the coronation of the king in Israel, * the royal connotation of Jesus as the anointed king, the Messiah, would naturally follow. At the same time, the voice also declares Jesus to be the one with whom "I am well pleased, " an echo of Isaiah 42: 1. This passage introduces the Servant (see Servant of Yahweh) whom God equips with the Holy Spirit (Is 42: 1-2), an event portrayed in Mark 1: 9-11 by the coming of the Spirit at the baptism. Therefore, when Jesus appears "proclaiming the gospel of God" in 1: 14, set against the promise of Isaiah (cf. Mk 1: 1 -2), the reader recognizes Jesus' coming not only to fulfill the promise of the coming evangel of Isaiah 52:
7 who declares the good news of God's salvation and God's reign (i.e., the kingdom of God) but also to fulfill Isaiah 61:1 ("The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because the Lord has anointed me to proclaim the good news..."). Jesus then is the promised Anointed One (Messiah), as seen here by his calling, equipping and message.

Jesus' public ministry, as portrayed from the calling of the four disciples in 1:16-20 to the healing of the blind man of Bethsaida in 8:22-26, also demonstrates by word and deed his coming as the Messiah to announce and inaugurate God's promised redemptive rule in history. When Jesus asks the disciples then in 8:27 who the people say he is, the answer reveals the public's awareness of God's work in him—but only as a prophet (8:28; see Prophet and Prophecy). When Jesus asks the disciples who they say he is, Peter responds correctly, "You are the Messiah" (8:29).

After the arrest and during the trial by the Sanhedrin, * the high priest poses the question of Jesus' identity in terms of "the Messiah, Son of the Blessed" directly to Jesus (14:61), who answers affirmatively: "I am" (14:62). This led to the Sanhedrin's deliverance of Jesus to Pilate (15:1; see Pontius Pilate) who posed the same question in its more political form "Are you the king of the Jews?" To which Jesus answered more cryptically, "You say so." Despite Pilate's subsequent equivocation (15:6-15), he eventually sentenced Jesus to death under the charge that he was the "king of the Jews" (15:16-20, 26). The Jewish leaders, the chief priests and the scribes then taunted the crucified Jesus as "the Messiah, king of Israel" (15:32). Yet Mark intends the reader to see the irony in Pilate's accommodating indictment and the disbelieving taunts of the religious authorities, since Jesus was indeed the "Messiah, king of the Jews." The Transfiguration (9:2-9; cf. 9:1), which comes subsequent to Peter's confession (8:27-29), Jesus' mode of entry into Jerusalem on a young donkey (11:1-11), which fulfills the promise of Zechariah 9:9 about the coming of Israel's lowly king, and especially Jesus' own affirmative response to the high priest's question confirm for the reader that Jesus was indeed the "Messiah, king of Israel," whose coming had directly to do with the inauguration of the kingdom of God in history.

For Mark's narrative, however, Jesus' identity as Messiah can only be clearly understood in the light of the cross. No sooner did Peter correctly confess Jesus to be the Messiah (8:29) than Jesus announced that the Son of man must suffer, be rejected by the elders, * chief priests and scribes, be killed, and rise again after three days (8: 31). Peter’s negative response (8: 32) indicates the incongruity of such a possibility for the Messiah. Similarly, Jesus’ instructions that Peter, James and John not disclose their experience of his transfiguration until after the resurrection (9: 9) implies the necessity of his death as seen in the following dialog (cf. 9: 11-13). Finally, it hardly comes as coincidental that Jesus’ only explicit affirmation of his identity as "Messiah" takes place before the Sanhédrin (14: 61-62 in the trial scene that leads directly to his sentence to death by Pilate under the indictment "king of the Jews," a view certainly implicit in Peter’s confession (cf. 8: 32) and in the glory* of the Transfiguration (cf. 9: 1). Consequently, for the reader the Jewish religious leaders’ unbelieving mockery of the crucified "Messiah, king of Israel" declares in fact who Jesus really is.

Mark’s narrative, therefore, affirms the early Christian traditional statement of the gospel, "Christ (the Messiah) died for our sins according to the Scriptures..." (1 Cor 15: 3; cf. Mk 10: 45; 14: 22-24). Yet as crucial as Jesus’ death is to his identity as the Messiah for Mark, Jesus was not simply a dying Messiah, that is, a Messiah identified by his death. His earthly ministry, which led to Peter’s confession "You are the Messiah," and his promised future role in the kingdom when he "will drink it (the fruit of the vine*) new in the kingdom of God" on "that day" (14: 25; cf. 13: 32) are also essential ingredients in Jesus’ identity as Messiah. Mark’s "gospel concerning Jesus Messiah" (1: 1) is the "gospel from God" (1: 14) relating Jesus’ inauguration of God’s kingdom—God’s redemptive rule in history—in the present through a ministry culminating in his death and his continued role in the kingdom that is coming "in power" (9: 1) in the future.

3. 2. 2. Son of God. Jesus is also seen as "the Son of God" (see Son of God) in Mark. In fact some interpreters would say that "Son of God" is Mark’s particular designation for Jesus. It stands in the opening line of the Gospel alongside "Jesus Messiah" (1: 1). Though omitted by some early Greek manuscripts, "Jesus Messiah, Son of God" represents the preferable reading and stands in tandem in Mark’s narrative with the climactic concluding confession of Jesus as "Son of God" by the Roman centurion at the cross (15: 39). The identification of Jesus as God’s Son in 1: 1 also finds its confirmation by the voice from heaven that declares at the baptism, "You are my son" (1: 11). As noted above, this statement of sonship echoes Psalm 2: 7, with its royal overtones consistent with the joint expression "Messiah, Son of God" in 1: 1. Yet the voice also refers to Jesus as "my beloved son," a qualification foreign to Psalm 2: 7 but used in Gen 22: 2, 13, 16 (LXX) to refer to Isaac as Abraham’s (see Abraham) "only" or "unique" son. Therefore, as God's "beloved Son," Jesus has a special role (= "anointed king," Ps 2: 7) and relationship (= "my son, the only/beloved one," Gen 22) with God. The latter underlies the "beloved son" in the parable of the wicked vineyard keepers (12: 1-12), the reference to "the Son's" lack of knowledge in 13: 32, and certainly Jesus' prayer* to the "Father" (Abba) in Gethsemane* (14: 36).

Both Jesus' role and relationship as the Son of God may explain the demons' use of "Son of God" in addressing him. In the first miracle* of Mark's Gospel, an exorcism (1: 23-27), the demon addresses Jesus as "the Holy One of God," a designation suggesting a unique role and relationship of Jesus to God (1: 25), though not specifically identifying Jesus as the Son of God. But in a statement summarizing the demons' response to Jesus in 3: 11 they consistently address him directly as "the Son of God," and in 5: 7 the Gerasene demoniac addressed Jesus as "the Son of the Most High God" (5: 7). The Evangelist indirectly assures the reader of the validity of this identification by noting in 1: 34 that Jesus would not permit the exorcised demons to speak "because they knew him" and by noting in 3: 12 that Jesus ordered the demons, who had identified him as the Son of God, not to make him known. The exorcisms as such point for Mark to Jesus' authority as the Son of God to defeat Satan and his forces, a demonstration of the establishment of God's redemptive rule by conquering the enemy or "binding the strong man" (3: 22-27).

In the Transfiguration* scene, which follows Jesus' declaration that some standing with him would not "taste death until they see that the kingdom of God has come with power" (9: 1), the voice from heaven declares to Peter, James and John: "This is my beloved son... " (9: 7). The context appears to affirm Jesus' role as the Messiah, whose revelation, along with the coming of the kingdom with power, are anticipated by Jesus' Transfiguration and the disciples' experience on the mountain (see Mountain and Wilderness). Yet, as was the case with the demons, Jesus orders the disciples not to reveal what they had experienced, including his identity as God's Son, until after the resurrection (9: 9).

In the high priest's question—"Are you the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed?"
(14: 61)—the two designations of "Messiah" and "Son of God" explicitly come together again. Since "Son of the Blessed" represents a Jewish circumlocution for "Son of God," one has here an echo of the opening statement about "Jesus Messiah, Son of God" (1: 1). Obviously the high priest's question reflects the royal motif of sonship present in Psalm 2: 7, whose roots extend back to Nathan's promise to David that his son would know God as "father" and God would know him as "son" (2 Sam 7: 14).

After affirming that he was indeed the "Messiah, Son of the Blessed" (14: 62), Jesus immediately warns the Sanhedrin that they would see "the Son of man seated on the right hand of power and coming with the clouds of heaven" (14: 62). At that the high priest tore his clothes and charged Jesus with blasphemy (14: 63-64). The basis for this charge has been disputed. It most likely has more to do with Jesus' follow-up response when he appears to lay claim to God's role of judge (cf. the similar charge in 2: 7 for usurping God's right to forgive sins) than with his affirmative response to the question of his being the "Messiah, Son of the Blessed."

Finally, the passion narrative reaches a climax with Jesus' death, the rending of the Temple curtain, and the response by the Roman centurion in 15: 37-39. In contrast to the Jewish religious authorities who stood at the cross mocking Jesus as the "Messiah, king of Israel" (15: 32), the Roman centurion publicly declares, "Truly, this man was God's Son!" (15: 39). In this way the two designations, "Messiah" and "Son of God," come together once again, both qualified and clarified by the cross. Mark's opening statement about the gospel concerning "Jesus Messiah, Son of God" has now come full circle in these words from the final scenes at the cross.

Jesus for Mark, then, is the "Son of God" in his role as "Messiah, Son of God" (1: 1; 14: 61-62; 15: 32, 39). At the same time, as God's Son, Jesus has a special relationship with God that sets him apart (cf. 1: 11 and 9: 7, "my beloved son"; the Father and the Son, 13: 32 and 14: 36; and the "beloved son" of the vineyard owner, 12: 6). Nevertheless, the Roman centurion's climactic confession of Jesus as God's Son at the end of the passion narrative affirms for Mark and his readers that Jesus as "Son of God," like Jesus as "Messiah," takes on special coloring in the light of the cross.

3. 2. 3. Son of Man. Mark opens and concludes his narrative by identifying Jesus as the "Messiah, Son of God" (1: 1; 15: 32, 39; cf. 1: 11; 8: 29; 9: 9; 14: 61-62), but the designation that occurs most frequently is "Son of man" (see Son of Man). Appearing only twice and in close proximity in the first half of the Gospel (2: 10, 28), the expression appears thirteen times from 8: 31 through 14: 62. Contrary to "Christ" and "Son of God," "Son of man" is used exclusively by Jesus and always with reference to himself in Mark's narrative and never with the accompanying qualifications or reticence that mark the use of the other designations.

Twice Jesus uses "Son of man" to refer to his authoritative earthly ministry —"to forgive sins on earth" (2: 10) and as "Lord of the Sabbath" (2: 28). Each of these references in the first half of Mark's narrative do, however, carry an ominous tone. The former comes in the context of the charge of blasphemy, a capital crime (2: 7). The latter comes in the context of Sabbath* conflicts that culminate in a conspiracy to have him killed (cf. 3: 6). Three times Jesus uses Son of man to refer to the future coming of the Son of man as judge at the consummation (8: 28; 13: 26; 14: 62). And two of these references appear in the larger context of Jesus' impending death—8: 38 follows the passion prediction of 8: 31 and the reference to taking up one's cross (8: 34), while 14: 62 comes in the trial before the Sanhedrin and evokes the charge of the capital crime of blasphemy and its consequent death sentence (14: 64).

It follows, therefore, that the bulk of the Son of man references in Mark have to do specifically with Jesus' impending suffering and death. Three occur within explicit passion predictions about the suffering and death of the Son of man (8: 31; 9: 31; 10: 33). Five other usages echo motifs found in these passion predictions (9: 9, 12; 14: 21 [2x], 41). And 10: 45 explains the significance of the coming passion by declaring that the "Son of man came not to be served but to serve and to give his life a ransom for many. " Therefore, like "Messiah" and "Son of God, " "Son of man" also stands under the shadow of the cross in the multiple, direct references to his coming death, a shadow that hangs over even the references to the Son of man's authoritative earthly ministry and his coming role as judge at the consummation.

However, in contrast to the use of "Messiah" and "Son of God" in Mark, Jesus publicly and without qualification refers to himself as the "Son of man" before friend and foe—the disciples (8: 31, 38; 9: 9, 12, 31; 10: 33, 45; 13: 26; 14: 21, 41), the scribes* (2: 10), the Pharisees (3: 28) and the Sanhedrin (14: 62). Furthermore, Jesus never cautions against the use of this designation as he does with the use of "Messiah" and "Son of God. " Nor does he qualify it by the use of another clarifying designation or statement as he consistently does with "Messiah" and "Son of God. " Yet the reader never doubts from the first to the last occurrence that "Son of man" refers to anyone but Jesus. Consequently, for Mark "Son of man" functions simply as a self-designation by Jesus, a way of referring to himself without any inherent christological overtones, as with "Messiah" or "Son of God."

If Son of man has so little christological weight, why then does Mark have Jesus refer to himself as the "Son of man"? One can only hazard a suggestion. First, Mark's use most likely has its roots in Jesus' own ministry and choice of "Son of man" as a self-designation. Thus, Mark would simply have been faithfully reflecting the tradition stemming from Jesus' practice of using "Son of man" as a self-designation. Second, the extensive scholarly discussion of the background and meaning of "Son of man" indicates at least the ambiguity surrounding its meaning and use. It hardly seems to have given a clear messianic signal to the hearer, certainly not in Mark's Gospel. This ambiguity was appropriate not only to the hiddenness that marked Jesus' christological identity during his earthly ministry but was especially appropriate to the "messianic secret" in Mark which the nuanced uses of "Messiah" and "Son of God" reflected. Therefore, "Son of man" denoted a self-designation by Jesus but carried little of the christological or messianic overtones of "Messiah" and "Son of God" for Mark.

3. 3. The Messianic Secret. Since W. Wrede's epoch-making work The Messianic Secret (Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien, 1901), Mark's emphasis on the "messianic secret" has highlighted the discussion of Mark's theology. Without doubt this motif stands out in Mark's Gospel when compared to the other Gospels. A closer look shows that it correlates with Mark's christology as seen above.

3. 3. 1. Silencing the Demons. We find this motif first in Jesus' response to the demons. In the first miracle, an exorcism, the demon addresses Jesus as "Jesus from Nazareth... the Holy One of God" (1: 25). Jesus then rebukes the demon by silencing and exorcising him (1: 26). On the surface Jesus' command of silence offers little out of the ordinary for an exorcism, since the use of a name and the counter by a silence command represent the common ingredients of the power struggle between a demon and a first-century exorcist. The use of the name was a common attempt by either the demon or the exorcist to gain power or control and the silence command was a move to overcome that attempt in the exorcism.

Yet in Mark the use of the name by the demon and the silence command hardly have their typical exorcistic function. First, the demons or the demon possessed in Mark's Gospel are never in a power position with Jesus. The exorcisms are marked by a total absence of the demons' struggle or resistance to Jesus. Furthermore, their immediate reaction to Jesus betrays the recognition of their subjugation or defeat from the outset (cf. "You have come to destroy us," 1: 24; their prostration before Jesus, 3: 10; 5: 6; 9: 20). Second, Mark reveals his own understanding of the silence command to be a secrecy command in the summary statements of 1: 34 and 3: 11 where Jesus prohibits the exorcised demons from speaking "because they knew him" (1: 34) to be the "Son of God" (3: 10). Third, Mark's understanding that the silence command is a secrecy command rather than a part of the exorcistic pattern is further supported by the absence of any silence command in contexts where Jesus' identity was not an issue (cf. 5: 1-20; 7: 24-30; 9: 14-29). Consequently, Mark clearly qualifies the demons' cornea identification of Jesus as the Son of God by having Jesus silence them, commanding them to keep it a secret.

3. 3. 2. Silencing the Disciples. Similarly, Jesus gives a silence command to his disciples who know who he is. In 8: 30 Jesus prohibits the disciples from making public that he is the Messiah, as correctly confessed by Peter (8: 29) in contrast to the public's view of him as a prophet (8: 27-28; cf. 6: 14-16). In 9: 9 he prohibits Peter, James and John from making known what they had experienced at the Transfiguration, including the voice from heaven that identified Jesus as "my beloved son." But here we learn the temporal limits of this silence command. They were only to keep this a secret "until after the Son of man had risen from the dead." Consequently, Jesus' identity as the Messiah and Son of God could not be revealed publicly until after the cross and resurrection, a motif commensurate with Jesus' qualification of Peter's confession (8: 29) by his announcement of the coming suffering, death and resurrection of the Son of man (8: 31).

In other words Mark's messianic secret corresponds to his portrait of Jesus as Messiah, Son of God whose true significance could only be grasped in the light of the cross. Mark's portrait consistently identifies Jesus as Messiah, Son of God both in the light of his ministry on earth (cf. 1: 25; 3: 10; 8: 29) and his future glory (9: 7; cf. 9: 1). But he qualifies this identity by Jesus' death as the Messiah, Son of God (8: 30-31; 9: 9; 14: 61-64; 15: 25-32, 39). In so doing, the Evangelist accents Jesus' death as pan of the significance of Jesus' identity as Messiah, Son of God without denying the corresponding aspects of his earthly ministry or his future role. Therefore, Mark's messianic secret qualifies Jesus' identity as Messiah, Son of God without attempting in any way to conceal who Jesus really
3. 3. 3. Broken Silences. But what about the times when the silence command is broken? In the healing of the leper (1: 40-45; see Leprosy) and the deaf stutterer (7: 31-37), Jesus' silence command is explicitly broken (cf. 5: 20-21). And one can only assume the silence command to Jairus' family would be broken in view of the public awareness of the girl's death (5: 21-43).

Yet in none of these instances is Jesus' identity per se at stake, only his actions. Furthermore, these actions involve a healing. Silence commands were also characteristic of healing stories in the ancient world. They intended to keep the means or healing formulas a secret. Obviously, for Mark these silence commands no longer applied to Jesus' healing technique, since none is given in the cleansing of the leper (1: 40-45) and the formulas (Talitha cum and Ephphata) are actually translated for the reader (5: 41; 7; 34). Rather in these instances Jesus' silence command seems to evoke the opposite response in 1: 44-45 and 3: 37. When the opposite response is noted (cf. 5: 21-43), however, the contrary behavior results in large crowds (1: 45; 8: 1-8) and sets the stage for Jesus' next move in the story line (cf. 6: 1-6).

Therefore, these silence commands, once functioning as a part of the healing narrative, have little to do with the healing secret or the messianic secret in Mark and have more to do now with the story line of Mark's Gospel. These commands and their contrary behavior function as literary devices to set the stage by providing crowds for the next event in Jesus' ministry, a role not played by the other silence commands directed at the demons and the disciples.

3. 4. Discipleship. Mark's emphasis on discipleship becomes quite evident from the place he gives the disciples in the structure of his narrative (see Disciple; Discipleship). Not only does the story of Jesus' ministry open with the calling of Peter, Andrew, James and John (1: 16-20), but pericopes involving the disciples begin each of the three constituent sections (1: 16-20 in 1: 16-3: 12; 3: 13-19 in 3: 13-6: 6; 6: 7-13 in 6: 7—8: 26) of the second pan of the Gospel. In the third part (8: 27—16: 8) the disciples form Jesus' primary audience within the section (8: 27—10: 52). They accompany Jesus to Jerusalem as his constant companions in the second section (11: 1—13: 37) and remain on the scene in the final section (14: 1—16: 8) until their flight highlighted by Peter's denial (14: 50, 66-72). Despite their failure, the story ends as it begins, with a final reference to the disciples. The messenger at the tomb gives the women a message of hope for the disciples and Peter" (16: 7).

3. 4. 1. Who Are the Disciples in Mark? Actually, one finds both a narrower circle comprised of the Twelve who are called to be "with him" and specially commissioned to share in his ministry of teaching, healing and exorcism (3: 13-14; cf. 5: 18; 6: 7-13, 30) and a larger circle who also are called (e. g., Levi 2: 13), commissioned (e. g., 5: 19-20) "followers" (e. g., 2: 15-17). Both groups are beneficiaries of Jesus' miraculous works (e. g., 1: 40-45; 6: 45-52), teaching (e. g., 3: 20, 31-35; 4: 10-20) and company (e. g., 2: 15-17; 3: 13-14; 3: 20, 31-35). Yet most of the references to the disciples appear to denote the narrower circle and its members who are accorded special privileges (e. g., 5: 21-43; 9: 2-8; 14: 12-25) and given special teaching (e. g., 7: 17-23; 10: 10-12; 13: 3-37; 14: 22-25).

3. 4. 2. The Failure of the Disciples. Nevertheless, Mark portrays the disciples in a less-than-positive light. They fail to understand Jesus' teaching in parables (e. g., 4: 13, cf. 4: 34; 7: 18), on divorce* (10: 10-12) and especially about his coming death (8: 32-33; 9: 9-13, 32). They fail to understand what he does when he calms the storm (4: 35-41) and walks on the water (6: 45-52). Indeed, they fail to understand fully who he is, as seen by Peter's response to the passion prediction in 8: 31-33, a failure that constantly reappears throughout the section of 8: 27—10: 52, as well as in their behavior at his arrest and trial.

3. 4. 3. The Leaven of the Pharisees and Herod. One pericope in particular portrays their halting relationship with Jesus, the warning against the leaven of the Pharisees* and Herod* (8: 14-21). The warning comes at the end of the first half of the Gospel, which has focused on Jesus' public ministry (1: 16—8: 26), and follows the two feeding miracles (6: 34-44; 8: 1-9). And it is enclosed by a reference to Herod's question about Jesus (6: 14-17) and the Pharisee's request for a sign (8: 11-13). Within this context Mark points out the weakness in the disciples' faith relationship to Jesus.

First, recognizing their concern about having failed to bring sufficient provisions with them (8: 14, 16), Jesus warns the disciples about the "leaven of the Pharisees and Herod" (8: 15). Within the Markan context this can only refer to their failure like Herod (6: 16) and the Pharisees (8:10-12) to comprehend who Jesus really was. Second, Jesus specifically asks if they do not "perceive and understand" or if their "hearts are hardened" (8: 17; cf. 6: 52), a trait ascribed earlier to the Pharisees for their failure to recognize Jesus for who he was (3: 5). Third, citing the words of Jeremiah 5: 21, Jesus asks if having eyes they do not see and ears they do not hear (8:18). These words echo the motif first sounded in the earlier citation of Isaiah 6: 9 to describe "those outside" (4:12). Jesus' response to the disciples' concern about lack of sufficient provisions betrays a lack of faith (cf. 4: 35-41; 6: 45-52) dangerously comparable to the response of Herod, the Pharisees and the outsiders, despite their having been "given the mystery of the kingdom of God" (4: 11). Finally, Jesus asks the disciples specifically about the amount of leftovers from the feedings of the five and four thousand respectively (8: 19-20) before concluding once again with the question "Do you not yet understand?" (8: 21).

Although the disciples seem precariously close to the leaven of Herod and the Pharisees as they respond to Jesus in the hour of their own need (cf. 4: 35-41; 6: 45-52), their special role, privilege and response in the previous Markan narrative has shown them to be different. Yet, as the next story about the blind man (8: 22-26) indicates, their sight is at best partial. Their response to Jesus' teaching and his coming death in 8: 27—14: 63 demonstrates even more clearly their need for the second touch.

3. 4. 4. The Cost of Discipleship. Indeed their response and behavior following the three Son of man passion predictions in 8: 27—10: 52 become the basis for Jesus' teaching on discipleship in 8: 27—10: 52. Their failure to recognize his coming death in 8: 31-33; 9: 31-32; 10: 33 leads to Jesus' teaching about the cost of discipleship and the way of the cross (8-34-38), about status and kingdom conduct (9: 33—10: 31), and about the inverse nature of greatness illustrated ultimately by Jesus coming to serve as the Son of man (10: 34-45). In this way Mark uses the disciples as a means of addressing what discipleship really means when lived in the already/not yet of God's redemptive activity in Christ. Just as the way of Jesus Messiah, Son of God had to be set in the light of the cross, so those who would follow Jesus must see discipleship, with all its privilege and promise, set on "the way" of Jesus Messiah, Son of God.

As it now stands, 16: 8 offers the best attested ending of Mark's Gospel: "They went out and fled from the tomb, for they were trembling and astonished. They said nothing to anyone. For they were afraid. " The abruptness of this ending and the resurrection appearances in the Gospels of Matthew, Luke and John (implied by the promise of Mark 14: 7) have led to the conclusion that a more complete ending has been lost. The so-called shorter and longer endings (w. 9-20) to Mark's Gospel represent attempts to provide an appropriate ending. Yet both the external evidence drawn from the witness of the ancient manuscript traditions and the internal evidence based on vocabulary and style rule against the authenticity of any extant ending other than Mark 16: 8 as it stands. The evidence, however, obviously cannot prove that 16: 8 was the original ending, since a longer ending could have been lost prior to the earliest manuscript evidence we possess.

Indeed, Mark hardly intended for his readers to think that his story of "the gospel concerning Jesus Messiah, Son of God" (1: 1) ended with the women's failure. The evidence for this is varied: the Transfiguration, followed by the command that the disciples not reveal it until after the resurrection (9: 2-9), the promise of the coming of the Son of man in 13: 26 following a mission period entailing much suffering (cf. 13: 9-13), the warning to the Sanhedrin about the coming Son of man (14: 62). All of these elements correspond to the anticipation of the future found in the parables of the kingdom of 4: 1-34 and make clear that Mark's story, the "gospel," does not end with 16: 8. The cross and the empty tomb are not the end. Jesus' role as Messiah, Son of God, has a future chapter. Furthermore, Mark's readers certainly knew of the resurrection appearances and the mission of the church. The conviction that the story continued on doubtless led to the so-called shorter ending: "They promptly announced to Peter all they had been told. After these things Jesus himself sent the holy and imperishable proclamation of the eternal salvation from East to West through them."

Yet when one looks at Mark's narrative from the standpoint of a literary text, the present ending fits his literary pattern quite well. The ultimate climax of Mark's story comes at the crucifixion and death of Jesus with the ironic taunts of the Jewish leaders and the declaration by the Roman centurion that show Jesus to indeed be the "Messiah, Son of God," as introduced in the opening statement (15: 32-39; cf. 1: 1). Furthermore, the disciples have repeatedly failed throughout the narrative to grasp the total import of Jesus and his teaching. Their failure never altered Jesus' course as the "Messiah, Son of God" (cf. 4: 35-41; 6: 45-52; 8: 14-21; 8: 27-14: 63). Nor did this failure, as dangerous as it may have been for the disciples (cf. 8: 14-21), lead to Jesus' giving up on the disciples. In fact their most glaring failure comes in their flight at his arrest (14: 50) and Peter's denial (14: 66-72). Yet the message of 16: 7 is addressed to "the disciples and Peter."
The women, who enter the scene at the cross (15: 40-41), note Jesus' place of burial (15: 47) and come to the tomb to anoint him (16: 1), pick up where the disciples left off. But they too "are afraid" (cf. 4: 41; 6: 50). With a final touch of irony, one of Mark's favorite literary devices, the women fail to disclose (they "tell no one") Jesus' resurrection, even though commanded to do so (16: 7). But the leper at the beginning of the Gospel proclaims what he has been commanded to "tell no one" (1: 44-45; cf. 8: 36). On the one hand the present ending corresponds with Mark's portrait of the disciples, and on the other hand it leaves open both the future fulfillment of Jesus' promise to meet the disciples in Galilee (cf. Mk 14: 28) and the glorious future of the Parousia (13: 26-37).

5. Mark's Purpose.

Despite numerous attempts to find Mark's purpose in the theological struggles (e. g., christology) or social circumstances of the early church (e. g., the fall of Jerusalem), the rather generic character of the story (lacking specific clues about place and date of authorship) and the narrative integrity of the Gospel makes such historical or theological reconstructions at best speculative. Taken on its own terms, the leading characters—Jesus and the disciples—and the nature of the conflict motif provide the best clues for understanding the author's design in writing this Gospel.

Once again we appeal to 1: 1 as a statement of what the author intended to do, namely, write the "gospel concerning Jesus Messiah, Son of God. " For the Evangelist this Gospel clearly shows Jesus as coming to inaugurate God's sovereign rule, the kingdom, as seen in the programmatic summary of Jesus' ministry in 1: 14-15. At the same time God's sovereign rule, the kingdom, has a future component that will appear "in power" (9: 1) when the Son of man comes to bring God's salvation to its consummation (13: 26-37). But why did the Evangelist write this Gospel?

This "gospel" according to Mark corresponds to Isaiah's promised good news of God's rule and salvation (Is 52: 7) as proclaimed by Jesus (1: 14), but it contains within it the question of how God's promised sovereign rule could be both present and future. In what sense was Jesus "Messiah, Son of God, " since he was crucified rather than crowned in Jerusalem?

The confusion was no less intense in Mark's day than in Jesus' own experience. Drawing on the disciples, who doubtless reflect the confusion of jesus' followers, Mark uses them to illustrate the standpoint of his own privileged and perplexed community. By focusing on who Jesus was in his repeated reminders throughout the narrative (e. g., 1: 11; 1: 25; 1: 34; 3: 11; 5: 7; 8: 27-29; 9: 7; 14: 61-62; 15: 39), the Evangelist reassured his readers that Jesus was indeed the "Messiah, Son of God." This was seen not only in his authoritative defeat of Satan, his forgiveness of sinners, his healing the sick, his feeding the hungry and his raising the dead, but above all in his death (e. g., 8: 27-31; 14: 61-62; 15: 39).

By emphasizing in the seed parables (4: 1-20, 26-29, 30-32) that the kingdom is present but vulnerable, warning about troubling times (13: 3-37), issuing silence commands, hinting of a mortal conflict, making explicit statements of coming death, the rejection of family, friends and the religious establishment, and, finally, setting the centurion's climactic confession in the light of the cross, the Evangelist warns his readers against any triumphalist reading of the Gospel.

Mark's own readers needed to know that God had indeed acted decisively, "the time has been fulfilled" (1: 15) in Jesus Messiah, Son of God, but the way of discipleship was also the way of the cross (8: 34-38). Right thinking and right faith must issue in right living. Right living was the way of the cross.

We conclude that pastoral concern was foremost in Mark's mind as he wrote the "gospel concerning Jesus Messiah, Son of God." He wanted to address a community under duress, a duress that may well have given rise to questions about who Jesus really was and the nature of the kingdom he had come to inaugurate. This Gospel offered a renewed basis for their faith, made clear the trials and tribulations along the journey of that faith, and offered the hope of the kingdom future when the harvest, the full-grown mustard tree, the resurrection and the consummation of God's salvation would make all things right.

MARY'S SONG

The traditional name for Mary's hymn of praise in Luke 1: 46-55 is the Magnificat, a translation of Luke 1: 46 in Jerome's Latin text which begins: Magnificat anima mea Dominum ("my soul magnifies the Lord"). Perhaps the best known and loved of the four lyrical psalms in the Lukan infancy narrative (see also the Benedidus, Lk 1: 68-79; the Gloria in Excelsis, Lk 2: 14; the Nunc Dimittis, Lk 2: 29-32; see Birth of Jesus), Mary's Song has for centuries been incorporated into the liturgies, hymnody and art of many Christian traditions.
Some early textual traditions and patristic writers proposed that the hymn was originally attributed to Elizabeth, but the consensus of authoritative textual traditions, witnesses of the church and critical scholarship favors the traditional view in attributing the hymn to Mary. Attempts to identify the life setting of the Song have yielded proposals of an early Greek-speaking Jewish Christian community, and a Jewish-Christian circle of the poor ones, or armwim (a remnant of Israel's economically poor who lived in pious dependence on God*; see Rich and Poor). Certainly the Song's predominant dependence on the Septuagint (LXX) or Greek OT is indicated by the Greek forms of the OT verses involved.

Mary's Song echoes OT traditions in which men and women sang hymns of praise in response to God's mighty deeds in the life of the people Israel* (Moses, Ex 15: 1-18; Miriam, Ex 15: 19-21; Deborah, Judg 5: 1-31; see Worship). The close literary, stylistic and thematic parallels between Mary's Song and the Song of Hannah in 1 Samuel 2: 1-10 has led many interpreters to conclude that the Song of Hannah served as the model for Mary's sonorous poem. Mary, like Hannah, extols God's greatness (Lk 1: 46-49; 1 Sam 2: 1-10). Both Mary and Hannah are called God's "handmaiden," or "maidservant" underscoring their availability to God (Lk 1: 48; 1 Sam 1: 11). Both women acknowledge that God's purposes will be accomplished through the birth of their respective child (Lk 1: 32-35, 46-50; 1 Sam 1: 11, 21-28). Striking points of comparison have also been noted between Mary's Song and the Song of Moses (Ex 15: 1-18), the Song of Asaph (1 Chron 16: 7-36) and hymns of praise in the canonical psalms (Ps 33; 47; 136).

Structurally, this beautiful hymn of praise begins with an introduction (Lk 1: 46b-47) in which Mary proclaims Yahweh's greatness and recognizes Yahweh as her Savior. * The theme of salvation is thus sounded at the very outset of the poem. Verses 48-50 reveal Mary's motives for praising God. Mary was a mere Palestinian peasant girl, but God chose her as an agent through whom the divine promises would be fulfilled in the person of Jesus, the Son of God (Lk 1: 31-34; see Son of God). She is blessed, not because she is pregnant, or because of any intrinsic holiness or merit but because God's salvific purposes are being accomplished through her. Mary thus becomes one in a long line of recipients of God's grace and mercy* in salvadon history (Lk 1: 50).

Verses 51-53 set forth Yahweh's great deeds. The six verbs in the aorist tense (the simple past tense) in this section have been interpreted as referring to God's past redemptive actions toward Israel (e. g., the Exodus event, Deut 5: 15). As Luke is also interpreting in retrospect the significance of the life, death (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection* of Jesus (post-resurrection soteriology), the celebration of Yahweh's mighty acts in the career of Jesus may also be in view. The carefully constructed climax of this section betrays creative literary artistry with a concluding chiasm: mighty/humble: hungry/rich. Yahweh "puts down the mighty from their thrones" and "exalts those of low degree" (RSV). This reversal motif (cf. 1 Sam 2: 7-8; Job 5: 8-11; Is 2: 11; 5: 15-16; Ezek 17: 24; 21: 25-26; Mt 23: 11 -12; Jas 1: 9) suggests a new order of life and hope wherein God is at work in both the lives of individuals and in the whole social order. This emphasis forecasts a theme that Luke will develop in his succeeding Gospel narrative: God is not only mighty, holy and merciful toward all of those who fear God (Lk 1: 49-50, 54), but the dawning of the messianic age reveals God's continued deep regard for the widow, the orphan, the lowly, the hungry and the poor (Deut 15: 7-11; Lev 19: 9-18; Is 1: 12-17; Amos 2: 6-7). Jesus' programmatic statement in the Temple* affirms this concern about those on the social and economic margins of society (Lk 4: 18-19), as do the Lukan Beatitudes and Woes (Lk 6: 20-26; see Sermon on the Mount).

The poem concludes in verses 54-55 with a rehearsal of the availability of God's mercy in every generation, and that particularly through God's servant Israel. It is through the covenant that God made with Abraham* and his posterity that God's promises and mercy will extend to all peoples in all generations.

Mary's Song resonates with grateful and expectant joy. Mary as mother of the Son of the Most High (see Son of God) and the King in the line of David (Lk 1: 31-33; see Son of David) is presented as both lowly handmaiden and active (believing) agent in Christian salvation. This canticle of grace foreshadows several recurrent themes which will unfold in Luke's two-volume work Luke-Acts, including the use of speeches and citations to provide advance summaries of the Christian kerygma (Lk 3: 3-6; 4: 16-20; Acts 2: 17-21); the accent on the fulfillment of God's promises (Lk 7: 20-27; Acts 13: 16-40); the grateful celebration of salvation (Lk 2: 13, 20; 13: 17; Acts 2: 43-47; 3: 1-16; 5: 40-42); and the favor which Jesus showed toward women* (Lk 7: 12-17; 8: 1-3; 10: 38-42; 11: 27-28; 13: 10-17). The central theme of the Song, the celebration of God's fulfillment of the promises of old through the birth of Jesus the Christ, represents the heart of the enduring message and the empowering legacy of Mary's Song for generations of Christian believers.

1. The Origin of Matthew
2. The Structure of Matthew
3. The Theology of Matthew

1. The Origin of Matthew.

In order to find an adequate solution to the question of the origin of Matthew's Gospel, a series of interrelated questions must be answered: Who is the author or who are the authors? What is the date of its composition(s)? What is its relationship to the other Gospel traditions and Gospels? Satisfactory answers to each of these questions, however intertwined they may be, will yield the most probable solution to the mystery of Matthew's origin.
1. 1. The Papias Logion. A strategic place to begin is with the traditional view that the aposde Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew or Aramaic (set languages of Palestine). This tradition stems from the testimony of Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia (died c. A. D. 130). The record of Papias's statement about Matthew survives only in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3. 39. 16). It reads, "Matthew collected (synetaxato) the oracles (ta logia) in the Hebrew language (Hebraidi dialektō), and each interpreted (hêrmêneusen) them as best he could. " On first analysis the tradition of Papias appears to say that the aposde Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew or Aramaic, and various translations were made of his work. So it was apparendy understood, with minor modifications, in the early churches (for texts see Orchard and Riley, 111-226).

Irenaeus confirms this analysis, adding that the First Gospel was composed while Peter and Paul were founding the church in Rome (Haer. 3. 1. 1; from Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5. 8. 2). Eusebius corroborates the Semitic origin in a legend concerning Pantaenus, who reportedly discovered a Semitic Matthew, supposedly brought to India (or Arabia) by Bartholomew (Hist. Eccl. 5. 10. 3). Origen affirms this tradition, adding only that the First Gospel was written for Jewish believers (Hist. Eccl. 6. 25. 4). In addition to passing on these traditions, Eusebius himself states that the occasion for the First Gospel was Matthew's departure from Palestine (Hist. Eccl. 3. 24. 6). Further support for this traditional understanding of the origin of Matthew can be found in Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. 14), Epipha-nius (Haer. 30. 3) and Jerome (*Prol. in Matt.; Praef. in Quat. Ev.; Vir. 3).

In more recent times, however, this tradition has been given several interpretations. First, some scholars have argued that the aposde Matthew penned an original Aramaic Gospel which was later translated into Greek by an unknown Christian (though some have contended that Matthew himself also translated the work). This Greek Gospel, it is argued, is substantially the same as the Aramaic Gospel (see the NT introductions of D. Guthrie, T. Zahn and the commentaries of Lagrange, Tasker, Maier; see also Wen-ham).

Second, others have argued that Matthew himself composed an original Aramaic collection of the sayings of Jesus (sometimes clearly identified with Q*), and this was later translated and augmented with Markan traditions, probably after AD. 70 (see, with variations, the commentaries of Meyer, Hill, Allen, Plummer; see also Martin, Manson, Moule).
Third, some scholars have challenged this interpretation of the early Christian evidence. In effect these scholars contend that an original Aramaic Gospel is a faulty inference from the evidence and this contention is buttressed with the arguments that (at least) substantial portions of Matthew were not penned by Matthew and that the linguistic evidence suggests that the Gospel was originally composed in Greek (Nep-per-Christensen, Bacon, Strecker, Meier; the commentaries of Beare, Green, Grundmann, Schniewind; the introductions of Kümmel, Marxsen).

This variety of interpretations compels us to look again at Papias, the apparent source of most of the early church traditions.

First, in light of Eusebius's previous reference to Mark as an "arrangement of the Lord's oracles" (Hist. Eal. 3. 39. 15), wherein the same word oracles (logia) is used as in the Matthean reference, it is most probable that logia in "Matthew collected the oracles (logia)" refers to the entire Gospel, rendering the second interpretation discussed above unlikely. Second, although a majority of scholars have inferred that "in the Hebrew language (Hebraidi dialektō)" means a Gospel written either in Hebrew or Aramaic, recent scholarship has virtually overturned this interpretation.

It has been argued (1) that Matthew betrays no evidence of being a translated Gospel; (2) that the Greek expression Hebraidi dialektō, when investigated carefully in its Asia Minor context, means not "in the Hebrew language" but "in a Hebrew rhetorical style" (Kürzinger, 9-32; Gundry, 619-20); (3) that the context shows that Papias is comparing Matthew's style ("orderly" and "in a Hebrew style") with Mark's style ("chreia* form" [pros tas chreias], "not, indeed, in order"; 3. 39. 15), and (4) that "interpreted" (hêrmêneusen) in Papias's statement (3. 39. 16) most probably refers to the explanation and communication of Matthew's style by others rather than its translation (Kürzinger, 15-19; Gundry, 619). Prior to this statement about Matthew, Papias, according to Eusebius, had said that Mark was Peter's interpreter (hêrmêneutes). This most likely refers not to Mark's translation of Peter's words but to his interpretation and composition of Peter's words into the form of a Gospel.

In conclusion, the most recent scholarship on the Papias logion suggests that the traditional rendering is insufficient and should be understood now in the following manner: In contrast to Mark's unordered, chreia-style Gospel, Papias contends, Matthew composed a more Jewish, orderly styled Gospel. The original language, then, is of no concern to Papias. This suggests that the first interpretation is unlikely. In all likelihood our Gospel of Matthew was composed originally in Greek and in a Jewish style. But was the First Gospel composed by an apostle?

1. 2. Was the Author the Apostle? Although there is an impressive list of scholars who argue that the First Gospel was apostolic (the commentators: Zahn, Lagrange, Schlatter, Tasker, Albright and Mann, Maier, Gundry, Carson), there are several arguments that have been used to argue that the First Gospel was not penned by the apostle Matthew.

Foremost, it is argued that if the First Gospel used Mark as its primary source, it is most unlikely that an apostle (Matthew) would need to borrow from a non-apostolic source (Mark) (e.g., the commentators Allen, Schniewind, Grundmann, Beare; see also Bacon, Mar-dn). This observation appears most penetrating when one observes that, assuming Matthew used Mark, the supposed apostolic author largely copied Mark's account of his own call (Mt 9: 9-13 par. Mk 2: 13-17). However significant this objection may seem, and however many esteemed scholars rely on this source-critical argument, it is not finally persuasive. If one simply grants that Peter somehow stands behind Mark—and early Christian evidence supports this view (Eusebius Hist. Eal. 3. 39. 15)—thereby lending it some level of apostolic authority, then Matthew's use of Mark is hardly beneath apostolic dignity.

Second, it is argued that the author did not write the Gospel in Aramaic or Hebrew but wrote in Greek, and that therefore the author could not have been the apostle Matthew (esp. Strecker). This argument has some important features: To be sure, it is now clear that our present Gospel is most likely not originally an Aramaic or Hebrew Gospel. In fact, it often betrays its Greek origin in Greek word plays (e.g., 6: 16; 21: 41; 24: 30) and its dependence on the Septuagint (1: 23; 11: 10; 12: 21; 13: 14-15; 21: 16). However, evidence clearly pointing toward a Greek original is not proof of a Gentile (or non-apostolic) author. Matthew, having been a tax collector (see Taxes), would very likely have been quite versatile in several languages. The argument over language proves little.

Third, various scholars (e.g., Abel, Strecker) have pointed to features that suggest to them a Gentile author. These features include: (1) the universalism of the First Gospel (2: 1-12; 4: 14-16; 12: 21; 28: 19) when coupled with the condemnation of the Jewish nation (20: 1-16; 21: 28-32, 43; 27: 25); (2) the torture of 18: 34, which was not a Jewish practice (Jeremias 1972, 210-14); (3) the so-called misunderstood Hebrew parallelism of 21: 5-7; and (4) various other non-Jewish features (5: 43; 12: 11-12; 27: 5). For these scholars, this data points away from a Jewish (apostolic) author and toward a Gentile author. Without going into details regarding each of these pieces of evidence (and each of those listed in 2-4 is not easy to explain), it must be said that neither universalism nor a clear stance against unbelieving Judaism* (see McKnight, forthcoming) is evidence for non-Jewish authorship. There is nothing ideological in the First Gospel that is not also found in either the OT prophets or in the letters of Paul, sources which are clearly Jewish in origin.

A final argument lodged against apostolic authorship pertains to the date of the First Gospel. If we assume (as the majority of scholarship does) that Matthew used Mark (see Synoptic Problem), and if Mark was written in the late 60s, say 68-70 (but before the destruction of jerusalem in AD. 70 [see Destruction of Jerusalem]; see Hengel, 1-30), then it follows that the First Gospel was written sometime after AD. 70. Making allowance for enough time for Mark to circulate and gain authority, most scholars estimate that Matthew would have been written a decade later. If we grant that Mark could have been written as early as the mid-60s, we have the earliest possible date for Matthew between A. D. 75-80, with a date between A. D. 75-85 being widely held (the commentators Bonnard, Grundmann, Davies and Allison). Could the apostle Matthew have penned the Gospel that late? Perhaps so. Earliest Christian evidence does not suggest that Matthew died before A. D. 70 and so traditional authorship is not excluded even with a date as late as AD. 85.

It follows from the preceding arguments that the traditional view that the First Gospel was authored by the apostle Matthew is a reasonable position. However, this conclusion is not without problems. Several issues caution against regarding the authorship of the First Gospel a settled matter. (1) The later one dates Matthew after the destruction the less likely it becomes that its author was the apostle. Furthermore (2) its probable use of Mark and (3) its evidently Greek origin should give one pause. Further (4) the several problems with respect to Jewish customs make one hesitate in coming to a firm conclusion regarding authorship. (5) If Matthew used Mark, it is at best peculiar that Matthew would have recorded his own conversion by copying Mark (cf. Mt 9: 9-13 with Mk 2: 13-17). Finally (6) it needs to be noted that textual critics are agreed that the original copy of the First Gospel did not contain an ascription of authorship to Matthew. This means that the matter of authorship has nothing to do with canon or with interpretation of the original; it is simply an intriguing historical issue on which scholars have cast some illuminating, but not yet definitive, light.

2. The Structure of Matthew.

Over the last twenty years Matthean scholars have engaged in an important discussion centered on the structure of Matthew’s Gospel (see Bauer, 21-55). A summary of this discussion will permit the reader to gain a glimpse of the First Gospel in its entirety. Four major models for understanding the structure of Matthew have been proposed. Following an overview of these models, a synthetic proposal will be presented.

2. 1. Geographical-Biographical. The oldest, and perhaps simplest, is the geographical-biographical model. This proposal organizes Matthew according to a suggested outline of the life of Jesus as he moves through his Galilean and Jerusalem ministries. In his commentary on Matthew (1912) W. C. Allen proposed the following:

1. The Birth and Infancy of the Messiah (1: 1—2: 23)
2. Preparation for Ministry (3: 1—4: 11)
3. Public Ministry in Galilee (4: 12-15: 20)
5. Journey to Jerusalem (19: 1—20: 34)

Several features dominate this perspective on Matthew: (1) The view is harmonious with nineteenth-and early twentieth-century views of the life of Jesus; (2) the life of Jesus so predominates that a feature from Luke (the so-called travel narradve) finds its way into Matthew, though Matthew gives no serious attention to the travel at all (e. g., Mt 19: 1—20: 34); (3) the progress of Gospel studies in the last two centuries has drawn more and more attention to the various presentations of the Evangelists, and this aspect of Matthew has been completely neglected. Consequently, although many of the older commentaries used this essential outline (e. g., Zahn, Plummer, McNeile, Lagrange, Schlatter), few would follow it today. Rather, it is recognized that this approach reflects a preoccupation of the nineteenth-century Gospel studies: how to compose a life of Jesus (see Historical Jesus).

2. 2. Fivefold Discourse. Matthean scholarship changed when B. W. Bacon proposed his fivefold topical model (1918 and 1930). Bacon presented an entirely new oudine, one based on Matthew's clear alternation between narrative and discourse. Departing from the life-of-Jesus approach, he took a literary perspective. Moreover, Bacon argued, Matthew's use of five major discourses reveals a christological tendency: Jesus is a new Moses* who gives a new law* for the church. Bacon's proposal follows:

Preamble (1: 1-2: 23)

1. Book 1: Concerning Discipleship (3: 1—7: 29)
2. Book 2: Concerning Aposdeship (8: 1—11: 1)
4. Book 4: Concerning Church Administration (13: 54—19: 1a)
5. Book 5: Concerning the Judgment (19: 1b—26: 2)

Epilog (26: 3-28: 20)

Apart from relegating the passion (see Passion Narrative) and resurrection* narratives (26: 2—28: 20) only to an epilog, Bacon made a great advance for Matthean studies by paying attention to Matthew's own structuring devices. Accordingly, we are indebted to Bacon when we call attention to Matthew's major structural marker for the discourses (7: 28; 11: 1; 13: 53; 19: 1; 26: 1: "And when Jesus had finished these things ... "). We must also credit Bacon with transforming the obvious alternation between narrative and discourse in Matthew from a banal observation to a significant key to Matthew's structural plan. However, Bacon's suggestion of a Pentateuchal pattern behind Matthew's five discourses was not accepted and further modifications were made to his view (see esp. Farrer, Barr, Bauer).

2. 3. Chiastic/Concentric. Anticipating the trend of literary analysis, C. H. Lohr proposed that Matthew's Gospel was arranged chiastically (or concentrically). That is, each earlier section of the Gospel is related to a later section, which are in turn arranged in reverse order from the center ("F" below):

1. Narrative: Birth and Beginnings (1—4) A
2. Sermon: Blessings, Entering the Kingdom (5—7) B
3. Narrative: Authority and Invitation (8—9) C
4. Sermon: Mission (10) D
5. Narrative: Rejection by this Generation (11—12) E
6. Sermon: Parables of the Kingdom (13) F
7. Narrative: Acknowledgment by the Disciples (14-17) E'
8. Sermon: Community Discourse (18) D¹
9. Narrative: Authority and Invitation (19—22) C'
10. Sermon: Woes, Coming of the Kingdom (23—25) B'
11. Narrative: Death and Rebirth (26—28) A'

Lohr's theory (and those who have modified his essential view; see Bauer, Fenton, Gooding, Corn-brink, Rolland, Gaechter) has several important features. Besides recognizing Matthew's structural alternation between narrative and discourse, the proposal observes the connections between various sections of Matthew as well as the various topics that Matthew develops. However, Lohr's approach has been widely criticized for its failure to heed chronological features inherent to the text itself as well as its fancifulness in connecting various sections. One example will suffice: it may be structurally pleasing to say that chapters 1—4 are birth and beginnings and chapters 26—28 are death and rebirth, but this does not represent the theological and literary content of these important sections of Matthew. Any skilled literary artist (or homiletician) can find connections of this sort at the abstract level, but such constructions fail at the level of exegesis and details.

2. 4. Biographical and Theological. The fourth proposal, a biographical and theological model, has commanded the most discussion as well as consent This model, originally developed by N. B. Stonehouse and then improved by E. Krentz, has been fully worked out by J. D. Kingsbury and D. R. Bauer. In essence this model recognizes an essential biographical aspect to the drama of Matthew's Gospel but sees it as subservient to an overall theological program. Matthew leaves clues to this structure through a superscription device: namely, at 4: 17 and 16: 21 Matthew uses an expression ("From that time on Jesus began... ") that signals the outset of a new division. This provides a neat and useful threefold division to the Gospel.

1. The Person of Jesus Messiah (1: 1—4: 16)
2. The Proclamation of Jesus Messiah (4: 17—16: 20)
3. The Suffering, Death and Resurrection of Jesus Messiah (16: 21-28: 20)

The alternatives are clear: either the structural devices of alternating narratives and discourses, or the repetition of the formula at 4: 17 and 16: 21 are to be given the structural priority. Scholars have argued that (1) the additional use of the superscription formula at 26: 16 as well as (2) the essential use of Mark 8: 31 at Matthew 16: 21 (rather than a unique signal in Matthew) suggest that Kingsbury has gone too far in making Matthew 4: 17 and 16: 21 structurally determinative. In fact, it can be said that though 16: 21 may have been a major turning point in Jesus' actual life, it is not a necessary turning point in Matthew's structural plot Kingsbury has elevated to the level of a structuring device a Markan comment on the life of Jesus that Matthew has incorporated into his Gospel. In neither Gospel was it intended to play such a role.

2. 5. Considerations for Determining Matthew's Structure. In light of the above survey several features must be incorporated into any adequate proposal for understanding Matthew's structure.

First, it must determine the genre of the Synoptic Gospels and, in particular, the genre of Matthew (see Gospel [Genre]). P. L Shuler has investigated this matter recently with respect to Matthew and has concluded that Matthew is essentially encomium, or laudatory, biography (see Shuler, Aune).

Second, the structure needs to reckon with the clear theological tendencies of the author. Both redaction critics (see Redaction Criticism) and literary critics (Literary Criticism) have expanded our knowledge of the nature of a Synoptic Gospel in highlighting the Evangelist's contributions and literary strategies. The implication of these approaches for structure is a recognition that the Gospels, however biographical, are directed by an author's theological and literary designs. The authors of the Synoptics are more than historians.

Third, at times the structure of sections of Matthew may well be determined by the traditions and sources Matthew inherited. Thus, while we see major innovation on the part of Matthew in chapters 4—13 when compared to Mark, from Matthew 14 on we see very few deviations from the essential Markan structure. One gains the impression that church tradition had grown accustomed to what we now see in Mark and this tradition, rather than the Evangelist's own designs, controlled the direction of Matthew's pen.

Fourth, at times sections in Matthew may be controlled more by theme than by chronology and historical succession. Hence Matthew, in the interest of a more thematic arrangement, may at times reorder and relocate traditions found elsewhere in Mark or Luke. When we look at Matthew's discourses and compare their material with the same material found in either Mark or Luke, we often find that Matthew's arrangement differs and that Matthew's pattern seems to be thematic. For example, the material Luke relates in the context of two different missions (Lk 9: 1-6 [cf. Mk 6: 6-13]; 10: 1-12) Matthew records as only one mission (Mt 9: 36—11: 1). It is apparent that Matthew has thematically grouped material around "missionary instructions" rather than paying strict attention to chronology. (In the same discourse of Matthew, compare Mt 10: 17-25 with Mk 13: 9-13; Mt 10: 26-33 with Lk 12: 2-9; Mt 10: 34-36 with Lk 12: 51-53; Mt 10: 37-39 with Lk 14: 26-27 and 17: 33.)

Fifth, for a structural proposal to be complete it must pay special attention to Matthew's redactional alterations and arrangements. Hence, in reading a "red letter" edition of Matthew, it may at times be very important to give special attention to the black letters to observe Matthew's authorial angle. Whether that redaction of Matthew pertains to smaller (cf. Mt 11: 2 and 11: 19 with Lk 7: 18 and 7: 35; cf. Mt 8: 1-9: 35 to 10: 8 and Mk 6: 7 or Lk 9: 1-2) or larger (cf. the structural importance of Mt 4: 23 and 9: 35) units, painstaking observations of details distinct to Matthew are significant for determining Matthew's overall structure.

2. 6. A Proposed Structure. As Bacon and Lohr have observed, the most important literary and redactional feature of Matthew's Gospel is an alternation between narrative and discourse. Furthermore, five discourses stand out in relief on the Matthean landscape. These two features are crucial to Matthew's ordering of his material. The following outline organizing these two structural features under an essential biographical or chronological plot:

Prologue (1: 1-2: 23)

Introduction (3: 1—4: 11)

I. The Messiah Confronts Israel in His Galilean Ministry (4: 12-11: 1)

1. 2. Discourse: The Messiah's Call to Righteousness (5: 1—7: 29)

1. 4. Discourse: The Messiah Extends His Ministry (9: 36—11: 1)

This outline utilizes the guiding themes (see 3. below) of Matthew for its main points: Jesus as Messiah, kingdom, confrontation, etc. In addition, we make the following observations. First, it needs to be observed that Matthew has essentially two introductions, a prologue (1: 1—2: 23) and an introduction to the public ministry of Jesus (3: 1—4: 11). These two introductions stem from two essential traditions: the prologue is derived from Matthew's special material ("M"; see M Tradition) and the second introduction is a conflation of Mark's introduction with Q traditions on John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) and the temptation of Jesus (see Temptation of Jesus). Thus the problem of two introductions is essentially a source-critical matter (see Synoptic Problem); Matthew had at his disposal two different ways to begin his Gospel and he chose to use both.

Second, Matthew 4: 23 and 9: 35 are virtually identical in wording and form an inclusio around the material between them. In fact 4: 23 is an oudine of 5: 1—9: 34: Jesus is described in 4: 23 as one who teaches and preaches (5: 1—7: 29) and one who heals all diseases (8: 1—9: 34; see Healing). It appears that 4: 23 and 9: 35 are a literary device used by Matthew to announce to the reader what is coming (4: 23) in 5: 1 — 9: 34 and what has transpired (9: 35). This device of beginning and ending a section with the same literary form is called an inclusio. Furthermore, the essential unity of the first major section, 4: 12—11: 1, is seen in that the last element of 4: 23 and 9: 35 is then used for describing what the disciples* are to do—heal every disease and sickness (cf. 10: 1). In addition, Jesus' ministry of healing and casting out demons (see Demon, Devil, Satan) in 8: 1—9: 34 is then commanded of the disciples in 10: 8. What needs to be noted here is that the missionary commands of Matthew (10: 8) are much more complete than those of either Mark (6: 7) or Luke (9: 1-2), and the commands of Matthew are clearly a repetition of what Jesus has done previously.

Third, in light of these observations it follows that Matthew 4: 12—11: 1 is essentially a programmatic description of the ministry of Jesus directed toward those who wish to follow him as disciples. Put differently, in 4: 12—11: 1 Matthew presents Jesus in the fullness of his ministry, thereby enabling readers to decide how they will respond to him. It is therefore of no surprise that the section following 4: 12—11: 1 is primarily wrapped around various responses to Jesus (11: 2-20: 34).

Fourth, there are two sections in 11: 2—20: 34 that are organized around the twin response to Jesus: rejection by leaders and acceptance by the disciples.
These sections are 11: 2—12: 50 and 13: 54—17: 27, the latter section revealing both deeper acceptance by the disciples (cf. 16: 21—17: 27) and more radical rejection of Jesus by the leaders (cf. 14: 1-12; 15: 1-20; 16: 1-12). Between these two sections falls the third discourse (13: 1-53). To entitle this the "Discourse on Parables*" gives too much attention to form rather than content. Instead, chapter 13 is concerned with Jesus' parabolic teaching about the nature of the "kingdom of the heavens" (Matthew's literal rendering of a Jewish equivalent to "kingdom of God," hereafter translated "kingdom of heaven"; see Kingdom of God). Here we see that the kingdom (1) effects various responses (13: 1-9, 18-23), (2) comes silently and nonviolently (13: 24-30, 31-32, 33, 36-43), (3) calls for drastic commitment (13: 44, 45-46) and (4) has an ethical call that is rooted in God's* final judgment* (13: 47-50). Buttressing these teachings are comments by Jesus on the privileged knowledge of the disciples (13: 10-17) and the dawn of fulfillment in Jesus' parabolic teaching itself (13: 34-35). Those who can understand Jesus' teachings about the kingdom of heaven are compared to scribes who understand all things (13: 51-52).

Fifth, perhaps because of Christian familiarity with the final week of Jesus, several comments need to be made about how to read 21: 1—28: 20. To begin with, in light of Matthew's theology (and NT theology in general), readers need to bear in mind that this section is not just a rehearsal of the last week of Jesus for the convenience of historians or for the liturgical needs of church calendar. Rather, this section tells of the passion and vindication of Jesus that together bring about salvation* for the world. From the Matthean perspective these climactic events inaugurated the kingdom of heaven more fully than had any other event or set of events since the advent of John the Baptist (3: 2). Furthermore, there is an essential unity to 21: 1—25: 46: (1) Jesus enters Jerusalem as Messiah (see Christ) to display who he is (21: 1-22), (2) he enters into a contest with the Jerusalem authorities to demonstrate his wisdom and calling by God (21: 23—22: 46), and (3) he then warns the nation that judgment is coming because it has rejected God's appointed Messiah (23: 1—25: 46).

Due to a keen interest in end-time eschatology, * modern-day evangelicals have frequently separated 23: 1-39 from 24: 1—25: 46. This separation usually leads to major interpretive errors. It is important to recognize that 23: 1-39 leads into 24: 1-36; the rejection of Jesus Messiah by the leaders prompts Jesus to predict the destruction of Jerusalem (see Destruction of Jerusalem). Jesus predicts not the destruction of Judaism but the destruction of Jerusalem, thereby making it clear that he sees God's judgment directed primarily against the Jewish establishment centralized in Jerusalem (see Levine). It follows from this contextual tie (cf. 23: 36 and 23: 37-39 with 24: 1-3, 8, 33, 34 in their uses of "all these things") that the dominant concern of 24: 1-36 is the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70 and not a final tribulation at the end of history. Indeed, it is difficult to interpret 24: 29 ("immediately...") and 24: 34 in any other way than as a primary (if not total) reference to the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70 (see France, 333-48).

3. The Theology of Matthew.

By discussing Matthew's theology we do not imply that the evidence is sufficient for us to infer an entire systematic theology. Rather, what we find in the Gospel of Matthew is a record of the life of Jesus which has been shaped by Matthew in such a way that we can detect emphases and patterns of thought that are the author's. It is these patterns and themes that we describe when we outline Matthew's theology. Matthew certainly believed a great deal more than what we are able to infer, but these themes contribute to our understanding of biblical theology.

When scholars today discuss Matthew's theology as distinct from that of Mark, Luke or John, a subde but significant difference is being made between the theology of the Evangelist and the teachings of Jesus. Whereas the expression "teachings of Jesus" describes all that Jesus taught as it is found in the four canonical Gospels and elsewhere (with little appreciable being added by sources outside the canonical Gospels), an analysis of Matthew's theology studies the particular contributions and shaping of tradition observable in this particular Gospel. Accordingly, in describing Matthew's theology the scholar looks for the Evangelist's beliefs as they are embedded in the First Gospel and considers what his beliefs meant in their cultural and religious contexts.

There are four major themes in the First Gospel: (1) Christology, or what the Evangelist believed about Jesus Christ, who is the center of Matthew's theology; (2) the kingdom of heaven, which often reveals what he believed about God himself; (3) salvation-history, the conceptual and hermeneutical grid through which Matthew reads and interprets the past, present and future; and (4) discipleship, * the expectation laid upon humans in light of the dawn of the kingdom in Jesus Christ.

3. 1. Christology. There have been three major approaches to Matthew's christology. First, many scholars have found in the tides Matthew ascribes to Jesus the decisive clues for constructing Matthew's christology. This approach usually revolves around the centrality of "Son of God" (Kingsbury; see Son of God). This approach has the advantage of a clear organizational method for categorizing the evidence. But this method can neglect the fact that the tides ascribed to a person reveal only certain aspects of that person.

Second, others (esp. Hill, Verseput, France, Suggs) have argued that while Son of God is a central tide, it must be supplemented by addidional ideas in order to achieve a comprehensive and accurate portrayal of Matthew's christology.

Third, in essendal support of traditional interpretation of Matthew, B. M. Nolan has argued that Matthew develops a "royal christology" with the predominant category for Jesus being "Messianic King and Son of God."

The first two approaches emphasize an aspect or tide of Matthew's portrayal of Christ that is clearly present in the Gospel. But in each case the emphasis is reductionistic, whether or not the title is then augmented with other ideas. In what follows we propose that a larger synthesis, using both tides and functions, describes more comprehensively and accurately the christology of Matthew.

We may summarize Matthew's christology as follows: Jesus is God's Messiah who fulfills OT promise, reveals God's will and inaugurates the kingdom of heaven through his public ministry, passion and resurrection, and consequendy, reigns over the new people of God.

3. 1. I. Messiah. Even apart from the number of times the tide occurs in the First Gospel (1: 1, 16, 17, 18; 2: 4; 11: 2; 16: 16, 20; 22: 42; 23: 10; 26: 63, 68; 27: 17, 22), for Matthew Jesus is pre-eminendy the Messiah. The use of the term Messiah for Jesus implies a confession that in Jesus the OT promises of restoration and salvation are coming to pass (cf. 2: 4; 26: 63). For Matthew the term Messiah seems inherently to bear some concept of preexistence (2: 4; 22: 41-46). But primarily the Messiah fulfills the OT in his person and ministry (1: 1 —2: 23; 5: 17-48). Thus, according to Matthew's typological exegesis (see Typology), Jesus is a sort of new Moses, he brings a new Exodus, and he is a kind of new Israel (1: 18—2: 23; 3: 3; see the commentary of Davies and Allison; France, 185-91). Further, he brings the fulfillment of the Law* and prophets (3: 15; 5: 17-48; 12: 17-21; 13: 35; 21: 5, 16, 42; 22: 44; 23: 39; 26: 31; 27: 9, 35, 46) and has become the suffering and rejected Servant of Yahweh (3: 39; 22: 44; 23: 39; 26: 31; 27: 9, 35, 46)
As Messiah, Jesus is described at several crucial junctures in the Gospel as "Son of God." In fact J. D. Kingsbury has contended in numerous writings that Matthew regards Son of God as the central and most theologically laden term used for Jesus (see Kingsbury). Thus at 3: 17 the Father announces publicly "this is my Son" (cf. with Mk 1: 11 and Lk 3: 22: "you are my Son"); at 4: 3, 6 the devil addresses Jesus as God's Son; at 11: 27 Jesus refers to his special relationship to God as that of a son to a father; at 14: 33 the men in the boat, on seeing a marvel beyond description, confess Jesus as God's Son; at 16: 16 Matthew apparently glosses Peter's confession of Jesus as God's Messiah with "Son of the living God"; at 17: 5 the Father again announces to the inner circle that Jesus is the Son of God; at 24: 36 Jesus reveals that, in spite of his privileged knowledge of God's will, not even he, the Son of God, knows the date of the Parousia; at 26: 63 the high priest explains the term Messiah with "Son of God"; at 27: 40, 43 the passersby appeal to Jesus as Son of God to tempt him to come down from his ignominious crucifixion; and at 27: 54 the Gentile centurion confesses Jesus, in what is taken by many to be the climax of human perception in the First Gospel, to be the Son of God.

In light of the preceding survey, it is not surprising that many scholars have argued that "Son of God" is the most important tide in Matthew. While one cannot doubt its crucial or central role as a tide, the issue is not so much which tide is more important, but what does the First Gospel assert about Jesus in light of what he says, does and is called. Thus a more functional (and less titular) approach gives us a more comprehensive and accurate picture. And, while it may be true that Son of God is highly important, it remains the case that two of the instances of "Son of God" are explained by the concept of Jesus as God's servant (3: 17-4: 11; 16: 16 and 16: 21).

As Messiah, Jesus is also the destined king of Israel, in spite of his crucifixion. To be Messiah is to be the king of Israel (2: 2; 21: 5; 27: 2, 11, 29, 37, 42). But even though Jesus is Messiah, king of Israel, he is a unique king because he is God's unique Son and he reigns through his suffering (27: 11, 29, 37, 42; cf. also the rejection inherent at 2: 2 and 2: 1-12; see Hill, Ger-hardsson 1974).

3. 1. 2. Teacher and Preacher. For Matthew, Jesus Messiah reveals God's will. Jesus Messiah teaches and reveals God's will in his public ministry, but his teaching and preaching are largely ignored or rejected. Although the terms have fallen out of favor with Matthean scholars, teacher* and preacher are important categories for understanding the Jesus of Matthew. Even if it is clear that teacher (i. e., rabbi) is inadequate for fully comprehending the nature of Jesus' person and mission, Matthew evidently regarded this category as nonetheless vital for understanding him. Thus, the very structure of Matthew, punctuated as it is by five major discourses (nine chapters), leads the reader to think of Jesus as a great teacher, a special rabbi, a revealer of wisdom* (esp. chaps. 5—7; 13; 18). In scholarship's tendency to go beyond "teacher" for describing Jesus, it has bypassed this important category. To be sure, it is non-disciples in Matthew who describe Jesus as teacher (cf. 8: 19; 9: 11; 12: 38; 17: 24; 19: 16; 22: 16, 24, 36), while the disciples of Jesus never call him "teacher." On the other hand, Jesus does describe himself as teacher (10: 24, 25; 23: 8; 26: 18), and his ministry, according to Matthew, revolves around teaching God's will as revealed in the new age (3: 15; 5: 17-48; 11: 27; 13: 10-17; 23: 8). As teacher, Jesus will suffer (10: 24-25).

One of Jesus' messianic tasks is to preach the gospel of the kingdom of heaven (4: 17, 23; 9: 35), a message requiring repentance and obedience to God's will (4: 17). Interestingly, as the preacher of the gospel Jesus falls in line with the rejected prophets of Israel (5: 10-12; 23: 34-39; 24: 14) and John the Baptist (3: 1-2; 14: 1-13). A motif running through Matthew's presentation of Jesus as revealer of God's will is the rejection of his teaching and preaching (cf. 11: 1—12: 50).

3. 1. 3. Inugurator of the Kingdom. Another important feature of Matthew's christology is that Jesus Messiah inaugurates the kingdom of heaven, apparently in three moments or phases: in his public ministry, in his passion and in his vindicating resurrection. Each of these moments is important to the story line of Matthew and each is associated with the inauguration of the kingdom. Hence, we have chosen to speak of three "moments" or "phases" of the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven in Matthew. In the First Gospel it is absolutely critical to recognize that Jesus' primary calling is to inaugurate the kingdom of heaven.

In his public ministry Jesus anticipates the kingdom's inauguration (4: 17; engiken means "has drawn near but is not yet here"), but that kingdom begins to demonstrate its presence especially through Jesus' mighty deeds of wonder (see Kingdom of God). Thus Jesus points to his powerful miracles as evidence of the inauguration of the kingdom (11: 2-6; 12: 28; see Gerhardsson 1979; Held). As Son of David (see Son of David), Jesus is healer (9: 32-34; 12: 24), but it is also important to observe that Matthew connects Jesus' mighty works with his ministry as servant and his atoning sacrifice (8: 16-17; 12: 15-21; 27: 51-53; cf. Allison, 40-50). In Jesus' public ministry we must also observe that Jesus' revelatory teaching and preaching is an integral aspect of the beginning of the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven as Jesus teaches the "ethic of the New Era" or, as others have put it, "kingdom ethics." These teachings (e. g., 5: 17-20) are an integral aspect of the dawning of the kingdom (also Guelich, 134-74; Giesen; see Ethics of Jesus).

In his passion Jesus accomplishes the second phase of the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven (see Death of Jesus). Even if it is a commonplace to observe that the Gospels have given much attention to the passion story of Jesus—and so we point to the cruciform nature of the earliest Christian story about Jesus—it is nonetheless important to incorporate this very structure into our understanding of Matthew's theology. If it is true that Matthew anticipates to some degree the kingdom of God being inaugurated (cf. 4: 17; 20: 28), it is reasonable to expect that the passion itself, the story of Jesus' rejection and death, will be an important phase in its inauguration.

We can observe the importance of the passion for Matthew's telling of the story of Jesus in the fourfold prediction of Jesus' death and rejection (16: 21; 17: 22-23; 20: 18-19; 26: 2). As mentioned above, even the mighty miracles of Jesus are seen as proleptic realizations of the kingdom on the basis of the passion ministry of Jesus (8: 16-17). For Matthew, Jesus is the one who forgives sins (9: 6) and the Son of man (see Son of Man) who will ransom many through his self-sacrifice (20: 28). This latter passage clearly suggests an integral connection between the death of Jesus (see Death of Jesus), the forgiveness of sins (see Forgiveness of Sins) and the kingdom of God. And in the Last Supper Matthew again makes similar connections: Jesus' blood, forgiveness, anticipation of the consummation of the kingdom (26: 29).

When it comes to describing the passion itself, the Gospel writers are notoriously silent in their reflection on its soteriological significance. However, in Matthew we find several indications that Matthew, among other things, sees the kingdom of God being inaugurated through Jesus' passion and rejection (Allison, 40-50). First, the connection of Jesus' death (27: 50) with the resurrection of the holy ones (27: 51-53), with its clear allusion to Zechariah 14:
4-5 (LXX), indicates for Matthew that Jesus' death breaks the bonds of death and inaugurates the general resurrection (a clear end-time, or kingdom, expectation). Second, the confession of the Gentile* centurion (27: 54) may well be a sign of the commencement of Gentile salvation that was to occur at the end of history (universalism; cf. 2: 1-12; 4: 12-17; 8: 5-13, 28-34; 12: 38-42; 15: 21-28; 21: 33-46; 22: 1-14; 24: 14; 28: 16-20). And Matthew tightens the connection between Jesus' death, the resurrection of the saints and the confession of the Gentile centurion (and others with him) by adding "When... they saw the earthquake and what took place... " (27: 54 RSV). Finally, the connection of the themes of 26: 64 with their partial realization in 28: 16-20 suggests another instance wherein the passion and rejection of Jesus is described as the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven. Thus Matthew's treatment of his traditions, as well as his addition of new ones, indicates that he sees the death of Jesus as an important phase in the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven.

In his resurrection Jesus is vindicated, and this too is a phase in the inauguration of the kingdom. Matthew's narrative of the resurrection (27: 62—28: 20) gives indications of his seeing the resurrection of Jesus as the inauguration of a new epoch in history. The descriptive language of 28: 2-4, with its report of the earthquake, the descent of the angel* and the fear of the guards borrows heavily from language shared by texts rooted in Jewish eschatological speculation. As Allison has put it, "Matthew 28: 2-4 appears to recount the events of Easter morning as though they were events of the last times" (48).

Matthew's eschatological orientation becomes particularly apparent when we examine the Great Commission (28: 16-20). There we observe massive reorientations in history, revealing quite clearly that a new epoch has dawned as a result of Jesus' resurrection. First, although it is true that prior to his resurrection the Father has given Jesus personal authority* (5: 17-48; 7: 29; 21: 23, 24, 27) and authority over sickness and demons (9: 6, 8; 10: 1), that authority is only fully granted after his resurrection (28: 18: "all authority"). Christologically, Jesus has moved from one acting with authority within the narrow confines of Palestine to one who possesses universal sovereign authority.

Second, as with Mark and Luke, throughout Matthew's Gospel Jesus is regularly vindicated in the face of opposition. Thus, in line with the essence of a pronouncement story (see Form Criticism), Jesus is victoriously vindicated as God's special messenger (e. g., 12: 1-8). It follows that the resurrection of Jesus is God's unique and final vindication of his Son following a momentary victory by his opponents (cf. 27: 39-44 and 28: 1-10; Osborne, 73-98).

Third, Matthew's heavy emphasis on universalism (see 3. 1. 6. above) reaches its consummation in Jesus' command to disciple the entire world (28: 19). The people of Jesus includes those of all nations, all social levels and both genders (Levine, 165-92). What was previously prohibited (10: 5-6, "Do not go among the Gentiles") is now the culminating command (28: 19); those who were previously exceptions (8: 5-13; 15: 21-28) are now the focus. And, in continuity with the old era, the new era does not erase Israel from God's plan of salvation. On the contrary, the term nations includes Jews alongside Gentiles (see Levine, 185-92). A subtle reminder of Matthew's attempt to evangelize Jews may be observed in Matthew's narrative of the guards at the tomb, the appearance of the angel and the women's encounter with Jesus (27: 62-66; 28: 5-7, 9-10). The manner in which this material speaks about Jews and addresses Jewish concerns demonstrates a clear apologetic tendency. The rescinding of the previous prohibition against evangelizing the Gentiles and the proclamation of a new duty of evangelizing the nations reveals that Matthew sees the resurrection of Jesus as inaugurating a new age.

Finally, it is no overstatement to say that the Great Commission envisions the formation of a new people of God, founded no doubt on the disciples of Jesus. This new people of God Matthew calls "the church*" (16: 18; 18: 17). The commission to form this new people reveals that something new is happening as a result of Jesus' resurrection. Thus the final scenes of Matthew show Jesus now vindicated by God as Messiah, invested with all authority, and commissioning the disciples to disciple the world.

Although the three phases of the inauguration of the kingdom sketched above are only different (chronologically distinct) aspects of the ministry of Jesus, they each contribute to the inauguration of that kingdom. In general, through Jesus God inaugurated the kingdom of heaven; in particular, God has done this through Jesus' public ministry, his passion and most climactically through his resurrection. But what is the kingdom of heaven?

3. 2. The Kingdom of Heaven. In general, we can say the kingdom of heaven is God's reign through Jesus Christ over all people, and that those who repent (see Repentance) and believe (see Faith) in Jesus enter into God's reign in the present. The experience of God's sovereign reign brings with it righteousness* and joy* as well as the hope of its future consummation in glory* at the Parousia of the Son of man (see Apocalyptic Teaching). An inevitable consequence of the conviction that the kingdom of heaven has come through Jesus Messiah is the judgment against any who do not respond properly to Jesus Messiah.

For Matthew the kingdom of heaven (literally, "kingdom of heavens"); see Kingdom of God) is both present (6: 33; 11: 12; 12: 28; 13: 24-30, 36-43; 16: 19; 23: 13) and future (4: 17; 5: 19; 8: 12; 16: 28; 25: 1-13; 26: 29). This teaching both of the kingdom's presence and its futurity has led a vast number of interpreters to speak of "inaugurated eschatology" in the teachings of Jesus and the Evangelists (see Kingsbury, 128-60; Ladd; Jeremias). This article operates from this understanding and maintains that the essential orientation of Jesus himself did not revolve exclusively around the presence of the kingdom of God but around its potentiality or futurity and the impact that its nearness was to make on the present. Interpreters disagree on the time of its full realization. The following presentation works from a view that sees the kingdom being inaugurated in three phases (public ministry, passion and resurrection, to which Luke adds Pentecost). We also assume that the kingdom of God has a future finality to it that can be described as the consummation of the kingdom.

In its present aspects the kingdom (1) demonstrates itself in God's strength and power (10: 7-8; 12: 28; 16: 28; see Authority and Power); (2) is opposed by cosmic powers and their human allies (11: 12; 13: 24-30; 23: 13); (3) demands responsible, righteous behavior (4: 17; 5: 20; 6: 33; 7: 21; 13: 44-45; 18: 3, 23; 19: 12, 23-24; 21: 31-32; 24: 14); (4) is presently (for Jesus) Jewish but includes the unlikely or the marginal and will in the future be universal (5: 3, 10; 8: 11-12; 13: 31-32; 19: 14; 21: 31, 43; 22: 1-14; 23: 13; 24: 14); and (5) warns of judgment on those who do not respond appropriately (16: 19; 21: 43).

In its fixture aspects the kingdom of heaven (1) will be brought to consummation at the Parousia of the Son of man (13: 24-30, 36-43, 47-50; 16: 28; 25: 1-13); (2) will begin with a judgment by God (8: 12; 18: 3; 19: 23-24; 20: 1-16; 22: 1-14; 25: 1-13); and (3) will be characterized by God's final approbation of his people (5: 19; 8: 12; 11: 11; 13: 43; 18: 1, 3, 4; 20: 1-16; 25: 31-46; 26: 29). In spite of the importance of the kingdom of heaven for Matthew's theology, there has been very little scholarly discussion on the particular nuances of Matthew's view of the kingdom.

3.3. Salvation History. Salvation history is an expression scholars use to describe the manner in which God acts in the past, present and future in redeeming people from sin and calling them to become his own. In another sense, salvation-history refers to the development of God's salvific purposes in history. In this latter sense the expression is used for tracing the history of God's actions for the salvation of persons. In Gospel studies the expression salvation history is used similarly to the second sense: it refers to how each Evangelist conceives of God's history of redemption.

3. 3. 1. Proposals for Understanding Matthew's View of Salvation History.
The history of the discussion of Matthew's view of salvation history was initially shaped by H. Conzelmann's important study, The Theology of St. Luke (1960), which explored Luke's concept of salvation-history. Conzelmann concluded that Luke saw salvation history as divided into three periods: (1) Israel*; (2) Jesus, the "Center of Time"; and (3) the church. Conzelmann's work on Luke has led Matthean scholars to debate whether or not Matthew saw history in two periods (Israel and church/Jesus) or three (Israel, Jesus, church). There have been four major approaches to Matthew's view of salvation history. R. Walker has argued that Matthew's scheme of salvation history is oriented around mission. Three major periods emerge: (1) The pre-history of the Messiah; (2) the calling of Israel through John the Baptist, Jesus and the resurrected Lord; and (3) the Gentile mission beginning at AD. 70. Essentially, Walker sees the history of salvation in terms of the mission to the world. A-J. Levine also observes a mission pattern in Matthew, though she differs radically on how Matthew sees the future of Israel. Levine sees two axes in Matthew's salvation-history, one temporal and the other social. The temporal axis moves through two periods, from Israelite privilege to universalism, and the social axis represents the incorporation of the marginal elements of a patriarchal society into the new people of God. Unlike Walker, Levine sees the major shift coming at the Great Commission, not at A. D. 70.

Second, an ecclesiastical orientation has been articulated by W. G. Thompson. Emphasizing the present situation of Matthew's church, Thompson's detailed analysis of 24: 4b-14 has rendered three periods: (1) Abraham* and Israel, (2) Jesus' offer to Israel and its Jewish opposition, and (3) the church's offer to the Gentiles and its Gentile opposition. Thompson concludes that Matthew views the third period as largely future.

Third, J. D. Kingsbury has expounded a christological orientation to Matthew's salvation-history, demonstrating the importance of integrating the various motifs in Matthew's theology. Kingsbury sees two periods: (1) the time of Israel (ending with 3: 1) and (2) the time of Jesus Messiah (beginning with 3: 1 and ending with the Parousia). In the latter period there are three sub-periods: (a) John to Jesus, (b) post-Easter times and (c) the consummation of history at the end. Kingsbury bases his view on Matthew's non-distinction between Israel and the church, the "transparency of the disciples" (i. e., they are typological equivalents to the church of Matthew and not just historical figures) and the absence of time references related to the church. Although Kingsbury's analysis has thrown fresh light on Matthew's views, his neglect of significant events in Matthew's description of history and the future (including John the Baptist in 11: 11-12; the destruction of Jerusalem; the Gentile mission as seen from 10: 5-6 and 28: 16-20) call for a modification of his schema.

Fourth, an apocalyptic orientation has been utilized by J. P. Meier to explain the data in Matthew. Meier approaches Matthew from the perspective of Jewish apocalyptic* which sees major acts of God altering the course of history. Meier sees three periods: (1) Israel, (2) Jesus until the cross and resurrection, and (3) the consummation, which includes the Gentile mission.

3. 3. 2. A New Synthesis. In presenting a modification and synthesis of the above views, several introductory remarks need to be made. First, the issue of whether there are two or three periods in Matthew's scheme of salvation-history is a subordinate point to which the Evangelist seems oblivious. Second, Kingsbury is surely right in pleading for an integration of Matthew's view of history with his christology, particularly because the latter is the most important aspect of Matthew's theology. Third, one's view of the function of the canon as it relates to systematic theology or hermeneutics will undoubtedly influence how one perceives Matthew's view of salvation-history. For example, among evangelicals covenant theologians will tend to stress the continuities in Matthew's scheme, and dispensationalists will emphasize the discontinuities. Finally, one's view must derive from careful consideration of texts that speak in salvation-historical terms, texts that include 1: 1-17; 3: 1-12; 5: 17-20; 9: 14-17; 11: 2-19; 16: 13-28; 21: 33-22: 14; 23: 1-25: 46; 27: 51-53; 28: 1-10; 28: 16-20.

The following outline of Matthew's concept of salvation-history attempts to synthesize both the data and the scholarly positions sketched above. There are basically six periods in Matthew's scheme: (1) The time of anticipatory revelation and promise, (2) the time of transition with John the Baptist, (3) the time of the Messiah's inauguration of the kingdom of heaven, (4) the time of Israel's decision, (5) the time of all nations and (6) the time of the consummation.

(1) The Time of Anticipatory Revelation and Promise. In Matthew's perspective the past, particularly the period from Abraham to David and then from David until the birth of Jesus Messiah (1: 1-17), was a time of God's salvation but more especially the time of anticipatory promise. This period from Abraham onward pointed to, prefigured and awaited with promises the inauguration of the kingdom through God's Son. Thus the fulfillment of the OT in Jesus' ministry is an indication that the past is a time of promise and anticipation (1: 23; 2: 6, 15, 18, 23; 4: 12-16; 12: 15-21; 13: 35). This past was a time in which revelation was restricted to one nation, Israel (4: 12-16), and a time when God's Law was incompletely revealed (5: 17-48).

(2) The Time of Transition with John the Baptist. Although scholars have debated whether 11: 11-12 implies that John's ministry was prior to the inauguration of the kingdom or post-inauguration, it may be said with fairness that John was the transitional prophet* from anticipation to inauguration. Thus it is John who first announces the dawning of the kingdom and the call to the kingdom's righteousness (3: 2; 21: 28-32), who first announces the end of nationalism (3: 7-10), who points to the kingdom's Messiah (3: 11-12) and who, along with Jesus, "fulfills all righteousness" (3: 15; see justice, Righteousness; John the Baptist). Indeed, Jesus refers to John's transitional status by saying that he was greater than all humans prior to him but less than the "least" (mikroteros) in the kingdom of heaven (11: 11). John marks a decisive turning point in God's redemptive plan (3: 15; 11: 12).

(3) The Time of the Messiah's Inauguration of the Kingdom of Heaven and His Revelation of Its Ethical Standards. Jesus, however, is the one through whom the kingdom of heaven comes and this stage in history must be seen as the center of history in Matthew's scheme. It is Jesus who receives the Holy Spirit (3: 16; see Holy Spirit); who is the object of Satan's attacks against the dawning of the kingdom of heaven (4: 1-11; 11: 12); who not only announces the dawning of the kingdom (4: 17) but who also effects its powers (4: 23; 9: 14-17, 35; 11: 2-6; 12: 28, 43-45); who reveals God's radical will (5: 1-7: 29; 11: 25-27; 13: 10-17; 18: 1-19: 1; 23: 1—25: 46); who, on the basis of revealing God's will, forms a new people of God around him (4: 18-22; 5: 3-12; 6: 9-13; 7: 15-23; 12: 46-50; 16: 17-19; 18: 1—19: 1); and who inaugurates the world mission (8: 5-13; 10: 18; 13: 31-33; 15: 21-28; 21: 33-46; 22: 1-14; 24: 14; 28: 16-20). Most especially, as we have already noted (see 3. 1. 5—3. 1. 7 above), it is Jesus who inaugurates the kingdom of heaven through his public ministry, passion and resurrection.

The following two points, the "time of Israel's decision" and "time of all nations," may not in fact be separate periods for Matthew's view of salvation history. Instead, they may simply be two complementary aspects of the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven, one emphasizing the dilemma of Israel and the other the dilemma of the Gentiles.

(4) The Time of Israel's Decision. It is clear that Matthew's Gospel no longer distinguishes humans along ethnic lines, as in Jew versus Gentile (see esp. Levine), but it is also clear that the Evangelist and probably his early Christian community were struggling with the place of Israel in salvation history. Matthew's approach is to demonstrate that the true people of God are those who believe and obey Jesus (12: 46-50), those who are righteous according to Jesus' new standards (7: 21-23). In asserting this the First Gospel reveals that the privileged position of Israel as a nation (as seen in the time of anticipatory revelation) has been forfeited (21: 43). This is not to say that all Jews are condemned (that would be a racial comment, bordering on anti-Semitism*; see McKnight forthcoming), but that non-messianic Judaism is condemned. Further, it is to say that the former privileged position of the nation of Israel has been annulled and that all nations are now just as privileged as Israel formerly was (22: 1-14).

The evidence of Matthew suggests that this privilege began to be lifted during the ministry of Jesus (10: 13-15; 11: 20-24) but was not completely lifted until the destruction of Jerusalem. For Matthew the destruction of Jerusalem is the highly important and visible demonstration of God's judgment on unbelieving Judaism and its leaders. The destruction of Jerusalem highlights the tearing down of the centralized power in Jerusalem, emphasizing of course a judgment on the leaders and elite within Judaism. We may perhaps be justified in seeing the period from Jesus until the destruction as the one generation for decision regarding Jesus as Messiah.

Three pieces of evidence point to the conclusion that the destruction of Jerusalem renders a finality to Israel's mission. First, Matthew emphasizes the exclusive nature of the missions of John the Baptist, Jesus and the Twelve to Israel (10: 5; 11: 16-19, 20-24; 15: 24), showing that the time of the past, and of John, Jesus and the Twelve, was a time of mission directed almost exclusively toward Israel. Second, it is Matthew who highlights the significance of the destruction of Jerusalem in salvation history. The structure of Matthew's last chapters draws attention to the destruction as a judgment by God on unbelieving Judaism and its leaders (21: 1-25: 46; esp. 23: 34-39; 24: 1-2, 34). We catch a glimpse of this position in two parables: 21: 33-46 and 22: 1-14. In the former the lifting of the privilege is asserted (21: 43) and in the latter that lifting, graphically symbolized in the burning of the city, seems to be followed by a universal mission (22: 7-10). Third, the Gentile mission, or all-nations mission (since it is not limited to Gentiles only), is portrayed as something crucial but future. The mission to all nations is yet future for the Twelve (10: 18), since it is associated with end-time events (24: 14), and Jesus will only later command its commencement (28: 16-20).

Interestingly, Matthew gives no indication that the all-nations mission will take a central role prior to the time associated with the destruction of Jerusalem. While Jesus commands the mission after he is resurrected, the description of events between the resurrection and the destruction shows no traces of the importance of the all-nations mission. Rather, this is apparently the time for Israel's decision regarding Jesus.

(5) The Time of All Nations. Again, the lines are not drawn clearly: as in the Abrahamic promise (Gen 12: 1-3) and in periodic episodes in the OT (see Mt 1: 1-17), so in the ministry of Jesus there are occasional receptions of Gentiles* into the blessings of the covenant (perhaps 2: 1-12; 8: 5-13; 15: 21-28). Furthermore, the passion itself arouses a significant response of faith on the part of a Gentile (27: 54). And Jesus' final commission commands a mission to all nations (28: 16-20; see Levine, 165-92). However, even that commission is given special impetus by the destruction of Jerusalem, an event which turns the focus from Israel's decision to universal mission (21: 33—22: 14). Inasmuch as it was customary for Judaism at the time of Jesus to associate the fulfillment of the Abrahamic promise of universal salvation with the end times, it is perhaps not surprising that Matthew's Gospel makes the same connection.

At any rate, the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven in Jesus forces decisions on the part of both Jews and Gentiles, with Jesus' program emphasizing the non-ethnic character of the future subjects of God's kingdom. In light of Matthew's probable Palestinian origin and the time it took for the early church to incorporate Gentiles, we should not wonder at the ambivalence the First Gospel portrays with respect to the time of the all-nations mission and the place of Israel in God's new period of history.

(6) The Time of the Consummation. As with many early Christian writers, the end of history focuses on the return of Jesus (sometimes as the Son of man), the final judgment and the glorious salvation that God's people will inherit. For Matthew, Jesus, the Son of man, will return and bring all ordinary history to a close (25: 31-46). This end brings with it a universal and eternal judgment (8: 11-12; 13: 43; 16: 27-28; 19: 27-30; 24: 37—25: 46). This judgment is based upon a person's works (16: 27-28) and that person's association with Jesus (10: 32-33; 25: 31-46). The salvation described in the First Gospel is characterized by endless table fellowship (see Table Fellowship) with the Father and Son (8: 11-12; 26: 29), the glory of God's new people (13: 43) and the reign of the Twelve (19: 27-30).

3. 4. Discipleship. With the exception perhaps of Exodus or Deuteronomy, no other book of Christian Scripture is devoted as much to ethics as the First Gospel. The keynote of Matthew's view of discipleship is radical obedience to the teachings of Jesus, summarized at times with the term righteousness (5: 17-20) and at others with love* (22: 37-40). Disciples, or adherents (see Wilkins), are those who have radically conformed their lives to the teachings of Jesus. However, it must not be thought that Jesus expects perfection; indeed, in the pages of Matthew the disciples fail frequently. But a pattern is established in Matthew that has comforted countless followers of Jesus since then: failure is met by Jesus' stem rebuke; Jesus' rebuke gives way to instruction for future improvement; Jesus restores the repentant disciple (see 14: 15-21).

The importance of discipleship to Matthew can be seen in the final command of Jesus: "Go, make disciples in all the nations... " (28: 19; see McKnight 1988, 111). A disciple is here defined as one who is baptized (see Baptism) and has been taught to obey all the teachings of Jesus (28: 19-20). The essence of discipleship for Matthew is to form a new people of God that conforms to the entirety of the ethical demands of Jesus. For Matthew orthopraxis has as much importance as orthodoxy. Being a disciple is equivalent to being a Christian and to being in a position of final approval by God. The distinction between Jesus as "Savior" and Jesus as "Lord" is a modern one and wholly foreign to the message of Jesus and the Gospels.

3. 4. 1. Called by Jesus. A disciple is one who has been called by Jesus. Whereas in Judaism (as we have come to know it) the prospective rabbinical student would seek out his teacher and volunteer to be his student, Jesus himself sought out his own followers. These calls of Jesus are depicted by Matthew in an authoritative way (4: 18-22; 9: 9-13). At times he called disciples and others to deeper commitment (11: 28-30; 15: 13; 19: 21). Because being a follower of Jesus meant adherence to Jesus, both as a person and as a teacher, Jesus spoke harshly about superficial following (8: 18-22; 19: 16-22). Those who are called by Jesus share certain characteristics in their relationship to Jesus: first, they exercise faith in Jesus, whether understood as faith in Jesus' person as Messiah or in his ability to effect miracles* (8: 10, 13, 23-27; 9: 2, 22, 28-29; 13: 58; 15: 28; 17: 20; 21: 21-22, 32); second, they seek, receive and dispense the forgiveness of sins (6: 12; 9: 2-8; 9: IOI 3; 18: 23-35); third, they are privileged to receive the revelations of Jesus that pertain to the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven (11: 25-27; 13: 1-52; 16: 12, 17-21; 17: 1-13, 22-23; 20: 17-19; 26: 2); fourth, those called by Jesus are commissioned in various ways, including evangelism (4: 18-22; 10: 5-8; 28: 16-20), service to others (20: 24-28; 23: 11), and teaching (5: 19; 13: 51-52; 23: 8-10; 28: 20).

3. 4. 2. Radically Committed. Disciples of Jesus are marked by a radical commitment to the demands of Jesus. At times (apparently not always), the demand of Jesus challenged one's pattern of life and so called a person away from that pattern into the sphere of obedience to Jesus (see Commandment). For Matthew, there is no higher priority in life than obedience to Jesus, commitment to his righteousness and God's kingdom (6: 25-34; 8: 21-22; 10: 21-22). At times this implies rejection (5: 10-12) and relative loneliness (7: 13-14).

In light of the prior demand of righteousness, following Jesus may involve great costs, including perhaps job (9: 9), family* (10: 34-39), economic security (19: 16-30), physical comforts (8: 18-22; 23: 34-36) and social acceptance (10: 24-25). Ultimately, the real cost of following Jesus involves the self, which must be offered to the Lord (16: 24-28). All other "costs" are but consequences of this central cost.

3. 4. 3. Ethically Committed. Disciples of Jesus have an ethical commitment to the teachings of Jesus. Matthew uses a host of images and terms for proper behavior, including humility (5: 3; 16: 24-27; 18: 1-5), peacefulness (5: 9, 38-42; 17: 24-27; 22: 15-22; see Peace), honesty (5: 33-37), economic and material contentment (6: 19-34), fearless obedience (10: 26-33) and perseverance (24: 36—25: 46). The virtuous life for Matthew may be categorized under two central terms: (1) love and (2) righteousness.
(1) Love. God loves all persons and so Jesus' disciples are expected to be kind to all; they are not to observe ethnic and political lines in their treatment of others (5: 4445; see Love). God's non-parochial love is seen in his choice of certain women as part of the Messiah's heritage (1: 1-17), in his prompting of the Gentile Magi to be the first worshippers of the Messiah (2: 1-12), in his choice of "Galilee of the Gentiles" as the arena of the Messiah's ministry (4: 12-16) and in his generating faith in the heart of the centurion (8: 5-13) and the Syro-Phoenician woman (15: 21-28). God's universal love becomes the capstone of the entire Gospel as Jesus commands the eleven to disciple all nations (28: 16-20). Not only does God love all, he also responds to humans in mercy* and forgives their sins against him (6: 12; 9: 1-8, 13; 12: 7).

God's love, accordingly, becomes the paradigm for true human existence. The disciples of Jesus are to be loving toward all others. Jesus, according to Matthew, states that the greatest demand of the law is love (22: 3740) and sums up the ethical dimension of life with the Golden Rule (7: 12). Consequently, the final judgment of God will be based on whether humans have been loving, acting mercifully to those in need (25: 31-46), and whether or not they have been forgiving of others (18: 23-35). Love for the disciple is the love of God which manifests itself through the concrete behavior shown to others. Whereas in Matthew the term love primarily relates to one's relationship to others, the next term primarily relates to one's relationship to God and his will.

(2) Righteousness. Although Matthew does use the term righteousness for conformity to OT Law (e. g., 1: 19), his primary interest is in Chrisdan righteousness, that is, conformity to God's will as revealed by Jesus (see Justice, Righteousness). The term, accordingly, is one that nicely bridges the transition now taking place in salvation history and one that surely provides a touchstone with Judaism (see Przybylski).

Righteousness is a requirement for entrance into the kingdom of heaven. It outstrips the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees because it is behavior that conforms to the standard of the new salvation-historical era that Jesus inaugurates (5: 17-20). Thus righteousness is a virtue that Jesus praises (5: 6, 10). Furthermore, the disciples of Jesus are not to do their righteous deeds (works done in obedience to God's will) in order to be seen (6: 1-18). If righteousness is required for entrance into the kingdom, it must be pursued in the here and now (6: 33). As examples of righteousness, Matthew presents Joseph (1: 19), Abel (23: 35), those who respond properly to the Son of man (13: 43) and those who perform deeds of mercy (25: 37, 46). The Great Commission, in essence, exhorts the eleven to raise up disciples of Jesus who are righteous; that is, disciples who live out the teachings of Jesus (28: 20).

3. 4. 4. Recipients of God's Promises. Disciples of Jesus are recipients of God's rich promises. To those who follow Jesus in discipleship come the added blessings of receiving God's present and final promises. For the present the disciple of Jesus is promised physical provisions (6: 33; 19: 29), rest for the soul (11: 29) and Jesus' continual presence (28: 20). For the future the disciple is promised God's approval (6: 1; 10: 40-42; 16: 27; 20: 1-16), eternal life (19: 29) and table fellowship with the Father and the Son (26: 27-29).

MERCY

In discussing the concept of mercy we face the common difficulty of such studies that there is more than one English word that expresses the idea (e.g., compassion, pity), that the one English word might be used to render a number of Greek and Hebrew roots, each with its own shade of meaning, and that the one Hebrew or Greek root might be translated by more than one word in English. In short, we have a number of overlapping concepts, between which it is not always easy to know where to draw the line. As far as the Gospels are concerned, the Greek root most commonly translated into English by "mercy" is eleee-and we shall concentrate our attention on that, but not exclusively. Some reference will be made to other words of kindred meaning.
1. OT Usage

In the LXX the noun eleos is normally used for the Hebrew hesed which has to do with the attitude of a human or of God arising out of a mutual relationship. Bultmann defines it as "the attitude which one expects of the other in this relationship, and to which he is pledged in relation to him," but Andersen finds that "the formal, legal side of hesed as obligation and duty has been exaggerated. It is incidental and marginal. The heart of the matter is generous and beneficial action, not at all required." Hesed is used sometimes in a purely human context, as that between David and Jonathan and his house (1 Sam 20: 14-16), but chiefly the term is used of God's relationship with his people, and in this context the notion of grace rather than obligation comes to the fore. Indeed, contrary to the popular view that his hesed issued from his covenant with Israel, *it may be closer to the truth to turn that equation around and to speak of his hesed as issuing in covenant* And, when Israel broke covenant with God, what might otherwise have been described as the latter's faithfulness to the relationship becomes again his uncovenanted mercy, that is, the "steady, persistent refusal of God to wash his hands" of his faithless and erring people becomes "the essential meaning of the Hebrew word" (Snaith). Thus hesed is not something prescribed, it is "an expression of love and generosity," it is often "surprising, ingenious" and always "meritorious—the performer could not have been blamed for its omission" (Andersen). And yet the covenantal association remains. God shows his hesed especially to Israel, despite its persistent failure (Ex 33: 19; Is 63: 9).

God's mercy consistently manifests itself in his saving (see Salvation) acts: in forgiveness, whereby the individual or the nation is restored to a relationship with him (Deut 13: 17; 2 Sam 24: 14; 2 Kings 13: 23; Ps 25: 6; 40: 11; 51: 1; 79: 8; 103: 4; Is 54: 8; 55: 7; Lam 3: 32; Dan 9: 9, 18; Hos 1: 6-7; Joel 2: 18; Mic 7: 19; Hab 3: 2; Zech 1: 12, 16); in his deliverance of Israel from their enemies (Neh 9: 27-28; Ps 25: 6; 40: 11; 69: 16; 79: 8; Is 30: 18; Jer 42: 12); in the restoration of the exiles (Deut 30: 3; Is 14: 1; 49: 10, 13; Jer 12: 15; Ezek 39: 25). And his mercy has an eschatological dimension. From God's hesed flows the final forgiveness and redemption of his people (Deut 13: 17; Is 54: 8; 55: 3; Jer 33: 26; Mic 7: 20).
Less frequently (six times), eleos is used in the LXX for the Hebrew rah'amim (as is oiktirmoi, etc.), which appears to derive from the same root as rehem, "womb," and thus denotes the feeling of kinship between those born from the same womb or the motherly feeling of the one who has given birth (BDB). In more general terms it expresses familial love, * and God's mercy is sometimes defined in these terms. In Isaiah 49: 15 God is a "mother" to Israel; in Isaiah 54: 4-8, a "husband"; and in a number of references a "father" (Ps 103: 13; Is 63: 15-16; Jer 31: 20; cf. Hos 11: 1-4). Thus, if hesed expresses the idea of covenant love, that is the kindness that issues in and from a relationship (though it may well exceed the bounds of any obligations of that tie), rah'mim expresses the affective side of love, its compassion or pity. When used of God it expresses the thought, in Barth's phrase, that "the personal God has a heart" It denotes the seat of a feeling that is felt physically. The nearest approach in English to the sense of this word is "emotion," but the application of the word is not restricted to the emotions. It often expresses the outworking of the feeling in action: one demonstrates rah'mim (Zech 7: 9), one asks for it (Ps 69: 16) and looks for it in others (1 Kings 8: 50; Ps 106: 46). In effect, then, the meaning of this word is not unlike that of hesed, and in the language of later Judaism* the two are barely distinguishable (Bultmann). The sense of "faithfulness" can still be found in hesed, but for the most part both hesed and rah'mim express the idea of compassion (outworking in action) for the needy and the distressed.

2. NT Usage.

Some of the OT background outhined above is taken into the NT by other words, such as charis, "grace," and the words for forgiveness. But something of what the elee- root signifies in the LXX can still be found in the NT.

2. 1. 1. As Faithfulness. This sense of eleos is found especially in the canticles of Luke 1. Thus in Luke 1: 72, "to perform the mercy promised to our fathers" is the same as "remembering his holy covenant" and this thought of covenant and of God's covenant faithfulness similarly colors the other occurrences of eleos in this chapter (Lk 1: 50, 54, 58, 72, 78). However, it should be said again that with God mercy is never simply faithfulness, but goes beyond that obligation to grace. Israel had long since forfeited any claim on God, but still he showed mercy in visiting and redeeming his people (Lk 1: 68). This note of God's (merciful) visitation sounds particularly loudly in Luke (cf. 7: 16; Acts 15: 14), to which is added the thought of his compassion. In Luke 1: 78 he employs the striking phrase splagchna eleous, "bowels of mercy." Splagchna expresses the idea of "feelings" (see 2. 1. 2. below); the genitive eleous is one of kind: the kind of feelings God has are merciful. The thought has moved from hesed (in so far as there is a distinction of meaning) to rah'mim.

2. 1. 2. As Compassion in Action. God's visitation was in the person of Jesus and, in accordance with the note sounded in the opening chapters of Luke (see 2. 2. 1. above), those who came to him for help asked for it in terms of mercy (the verb eleeō, Mt 9: 27; 15: 22; 17: 15; 20: 30-31; Mk 10: 47; Lk 17: 13; 18: 38-39; cf. also Mk 5: 19; Lk 16: 24 where the mercy is attributed to God). His response is twofold: inward and active.

Inwardly, "he [Jesus] had compassion for them because they were... helpless." In such expressions (Mt 9: 36; 14: 14; 15: 32; 20: 34; Mk 1: 41; 6: 34; 8: 2; 9: 22; Lk 7: 13. Cf. also Mt 18: 27; Lk 10: 33; 15: 30 which portray such compassion in parables*), the Greek verb is splagchnizomai (cf. the noun splagchna above) which, like the Hebrew rah'mim (which the noun once translates in Prov 12: 10), denotes a feeling that is felt physically, an emotion. Literally, splagchnizomai means "to be moved in one's bowels." The Greeks regarded the bowels as the seat of violent passion such as anger and love; the Jews regarded them as the center of the more tender affections, especially kindness and pity. The "bowels" were for them what we mean by "the heart." When Jesus was confronted with human need, the Gospels say that he was moved in his bowels, as we might say, "his heart went out to these people" or "they broke his heart, " that is, he had compassion on them. This portrait of the divine visitor appears especially in Luke. Not that the words are more frequent there than elsewhere, but Menken has shown that where they do occur (splagchna in 1: 78 and splagchnizomai in 7: 13; 10: 33; 15: 20), in each case they constitute the turning point of the pericope, demonstrating that compassion is "the most important element" in the passage. This, of course, fits with the generally accepted view that this Gospel is especially concerned to show God's love for the needy, the poor (see Rich and Poor), the sinner and that this love manifests itself in Jesus.

But what he felt inwardly led to action: to the giving of sight to the blind (Mt 20: 34); to cleansing the leper (Mk 1: 41; see Leprosy); to teaching the ignorant (Mk 6: 34); to feeding the hungry (Mt 15: 32; Mk 8: 2); to raising the dead (Lk 7: 13). Thus, for Jesus to have mercy was to help the needy and the helpless. His desire was that men and women might be whole.

2. 1. 3. As Eschatological. The greatest need of humanity, from the biblical perspective, lies not only in the physical and temporal sphere but also in the spiritual and eternal. We are sinners, * separated from God, and in that sense already dead and liable to remain so for ever. Our problem is separation and our need is reconciliation, and God's mercy is, accordingly, directed especially to that end. This has been the goal of all his dealings with humanity, and it was reached with the advent of Christ* In Christ God's mercy in its final, fullest sense, was made manifest By the same token, God's covenant faithfulness was fully realized. What had still been future for the prophets-God's final forgiveness and redemption of his people—had now come about "God's eleos is his eschatological act in salvation history in Christ" (Bultmann; see Eschatology).

This theme is dealt with more explicity in the epistles (e.g., Eph 2: 4-10; Tit 3: 3-7) and, to that extent, lies beyond the scope of this article. Nevertheless, we may be sure that Jesus lived his life in the constant sense of God's saving mercy, giving expression to it in his own words and actions: "Be merciful, even as your Father is merciful" (Lk 6: 36); "love one another as I have loved you" (Jn 15: 12). He embodied the mercy of God; he was God's compassion in action: "I lay down my life (for the sheep)... this charge I have received from my Father" (Jn 10: 17-18; cf. 1 Pet 1: 3). On this basis, believers are said to have received mercy (2 Cor 4: 1; 1 Tim 1: 13, 16; 1 Pet 2: 10).

2. 2. The Mercy of One to Another. God's mercy to us is made necessary by our need and especially our sinfulness, and it has this objective: "That you might be children of your Father who is in heaven" (Mt 5: 45). The parable of the unmerciful servant (Mt 18: 23-35) expresses this objective negatively. Other teaching of Jesus, such as his commandment* that we love one another (Jn 13: 34-35; 15: 12-13; cf. 1 Jn 2: 5; 4: 12, 17), sets it forth in positive terms.

This is Jesus' teaching in the parables of the good Samaritan (Lk 10: 30-37) and the sheep and the goats (Mt 25: 31-46). Mercy should be manifested in giving help to the needy and the helpless (Mt 18: 27; Lk 10: 37; 16: 24). Beyond this, there are hints in the teaching of Jesus of the old idea of mercy as a communal obligation. Thus Jesus demanded of the Pharisees "mercy and not sacrifice" with respect to those whom they despised (Mt 9: 13; 12: 7; cf. Hos 6: 6). Again, he accused the scribes* and Pharisees* of neglecting "the weightier matters of the Law, " which included mercy (Mt 23: 23). "These you ought to have done, " he said, emphasizing their practice, "without neglecting the other."

MIDRASH

The Hebrew noun midrash (midras pl., midrasim) is derived from the verb diras, which means to "search (for an answer). " Midrash accordingly means "inquiry," "examination" or "commentary. " The word often refers to rabbinic exegesis, both with respect to method as well as to form. Scholars therefore refer to "midrashic" interpretation and rabbinic "midrashim." However, in recent years midrash has been discussed against the broader background of ancient biblical interpretation and textual transmission in general. It has become increasingly apparent that portions of the NT itself reflect aspects of midrash. Indeed, there has been considerable interest recendy in the question to what extent Jesus and the Evangelists may have employed midrashic exegesis.

1. Semantic Development
2. Rabbinic Midrash
3. Midrash in Jesus and the Gospels
4. The Gospels as Midrash

1. Semantic Development.

The verb daras occurs in a variety of contexts in the OT, meaning "to seek," "to inquire" or "to investigate." Scripture speaks of seeking God's will (2 Chron 17: 4; 22: 9; 30: 19; Ps 119: 10), making inquiry of God through prophetic oracle (1 Sam 9: 9; 1 Kings 22: 8; 2 Kings 3: 11; Jer 21: 2) or investigating a matter (Deut 13: 14; 19: 18; Judg 6: 29; cf. 1QS 6: 24; 8: 26). The nominal form, midras, occurs in the OT twice, meaning "story," "book" and possibly "commentary" (2 Chron 13: 22; 24: 27 cf. RSV).

In later usage there is a shift from seeking God's will through prophetic oracle to seeking God's will through study of Scripture. In later traditions we are told that Ezra the scribe "set his heart to search the Law of the Lord" (Ezra 7: 10). Other texts convey similar meanings: "Great are the works of the Lord, studied by all who have pleasure in them" (Ps 111: 2); "I have sought your precepts" (Ps 119: 45; cf. 119: 94, 155); "Observe and seek out all the commandments of the Lord" (1 Chron 28: 8). Although this "searching" of God's Law should not in these passages be understood as exegesis in a strict sense, it is only a small step to the later explicit exegetical reference of midrash: "This is the study [midras] of the law" (1QS 8: 15); "The interpretation [midras] of 'Blessed is the man... ' [cf. Ps 1: 1]" (4QFlor 1: 14). Indeed, the Teacher of Righteousness is called the "searcher of the Law" (CD 6: 7). Philo urges his readers to join him in searching (ereunan = darás) Scripture (Del. Pot. Ins. 17 §57; 39 §141; Cher. 5 §14). In rabbinic writings midrash becomes standard and its practice as an exegetical method was consciously considered.

2. Rabbinic Midrash.

In the writings of the rabbis midrash attains its most sophisticated and self-conscious form. In searching the sacred text the rabbis attempted to update scriptural teaching to make it relevant to new circumstances and issues. This approach was felt to be legitimate because Scripture was understood as divine in character and therefore could yield many meanings and many applications: " 'Is not my word like a hammer that breaks the rock in pieces?' [Jer 23: 29]. As the hammer causes numerous sparks to flash forth, so is a verse of Scripture capable of many interpretations" (b. Sank 34a; cf. m. 'Abot 5: 22).

2. 1. Rules of Midrash. According to early rabbinic tradition midrash could be practiced following seven rules (or middot) of Hillel the Elder (cf. t. Sank 7. 11; 'Abot R. Nat. [A] §37). All of these rules are utilized in the Gospels:

(1) Qal wàhômer. ("Light and heavy. ") According to this rule, what is true or applicable in a "light" (or less important) instance is surely true or applicable in a "heavy" (or more important) instance. This rule is plainly in evidence when Jesus assures his disciples (cf. Mt 6: 26; Lk 12: 24) that because God cares for the birds (light), they can be sure that he cares for them (heavy).

(2) Gii'erà såwà. ("An equivalent regulation. ") According to this rule one passage may be explained by another if similar words or phrases are present. Comparing himself to David, who on one occasion violated the Law* in eating consecrated bread (1 Sam 21: 6), Jesus justifies his apparent violation of the Sabbath* (Mk 2: 23-28).

(3) Binyan 'ab mikkâtûb 'ehàd. ("Constructing a father [i. e., principal rule] from one [passage]. ") Since God is not the God of the dead but of the living, the revelation at the burning bush, "I am the God of Abraham... " (Ex 3: 14-15), implies that Abraham* is to be resurrected. From this one text and its inference one may further infer, as Jesus did (Mk 12: 26), the truth of the general resurrection. *

(4) Binyan 'âb 'ass'ne k'tübim. ("Constructing a father [i. e., principal rule] from two writings [or passages]. ") From the commands to unmuzzle the ox (Deut 25: 4) and share sacrifices with the priests (Deut 18: 1-8) it is inferred that those who preach are entitled to support (Mt 10: 10; Lk 10: 7; 1 Cor 9: 9, 13; 1 Tim 5: 18).

(5) ICIâl ûp'rât ûp'rât ûk'lâl. ("General and partic-ular, and particular and general. ") When Jesus replies that the greatest commandment (the "general") is to love* the Lord with all one's heart (Deut 6: 4-5) and to love one's neighbor as one's self (Lev 19: 18), he has summed up all of the "particular" commandments* (Mk 12: 28-34).

(6) Kayyôfi' bo b'mâqôm 'ahêr. ("Like something in another place [or passage]. ") If the Son of man* (or Messiah; see Christ) is to sit on one of the thrones set up before the Ancient of Days (Dan 7: 9, which is how Rabbi Aqiba interprets Daniel's plural reference to "thrones, " cf. b. hag. 14a; b. Sanh. 38b), and if Messiah is to sit at God's right hand (Ps 110: 1), it may be inferred that when the Son of man comes with the clouds (Dan 7: 13-14), he will be seated at the right hand of God and will judge his enemies. This is evidently what Jesus implied in his reply to Caiaphas (Mk 14: 62).

(7) Dàbàr halámêd mëinyànô. ("Word of instruction from its context") This rule is exemplified in Jesus' teaching against divorce (Mt 19: 4-8). Although it is true that Moses* allowed divorce (Deut 24: 1-4), it is also true that God never intended the marriage union to be broken, as implied in Genesis 1: 27 and 2: 24 (see Marriage and Divorce).

Tradition holds that these rules were expanded to thirteen by Ishmael, a rabbi of the second century (cf. Bar. de Rabbi Ishmael §1 in Prologue to Sipra). Rabbi Eliezer ben Yose the Galilean is credited with further expanding these rules, particularly as they relate to the interpretation of narrative. He is probably the author of the tractate Thirty-Two Rules for Interpreting the Torah (also called the Baratta of Thirty-Two Rules; cf. beginning of Midrash Mishnat R Eliezer and beginning of Midrash ha-Gadol on Genesis). Unlike the seven middôt of Hillel the Elder, many of these later rules are contrived and atomistic (e. g., finding significance in the numerical value of the letters themselves) and have little or nothing to do with the literary or historical context of the scriptural passage under consideration. Most of these thirty-two rules, rules which made it possible to enjoy the "savory dishes of wisdom" (m. 'Abot 3: 18), were applied to homiletical, not legal, midrash.

2. 2. Halakah and Haggadah. Rabbinic midrash falls into two basic categories. These categories are distinguished not by method but by objectives. Halakah (h'ïâkâ from hâlak, "to walk") refers to a legal ruling (plural: h'läkdt). Hence, halakic midrash is in reference to legal interpretation. The purpose of halakoth was to build an oral "fence" around written Torah, making violation of it (written Torah) less likely (m. 'Abot 1: 1; 3: 13). Haggadah (haggadâ, lit "telling, " from the root mgad, "to draw") refers to the interpretation of narrative and is usually understood as homiletical or non-legal interpretation (plural: haggadût). Best-known is the Passover Haggadah (cf. b. Pesah. 115b, 116b). Haggadic midrash was much more imaginative in its attempts to fill in the gaps in Scripture and to explain away apparent discrepancies, difficulties and unanswered questions. Legal rulings were not to be derived from haggadic interpretation (cf. y. Pea 2. 6).
2.3. Rabbinic Periods. The rabbis of the pre-Mishnaic period (50 B.C.-A.D. 200) are referred to as the Tannaim (i.e., the "repeaters"), while the rabbis of the later period ("early": A.D. 200-500; "late": A.D. 500-1500) are called the Amoraim (i.e., the "speakers" from "mora', "interpreter"). Obviously the tannaitic traditions are of the greatest value for NT interpretation.

2.4. Rabbinic Literature. The legal corpus in which halakic concerns predominate is made up of Mishnah (lit. "repetition" or "[memorizable] paragraph"; c. A.D. 200), Tosefta (lit. "supplement [to Mishnah]"; c. A.D. 300) and Talmud (lit. "learning"); Palestinian [or Jerusalem]: c. A.D. 500; Babylonian: c. A.D. 600; note that the word for "disciple" is talmid, i.e., "one who learns"; see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Many of the halakoth found in the Mishnah date back in one form or another to the time of Jesus (e.g., cf. Mk 2:16 and m. Dem. 2:3 concerning being the guest of a non-observant Jew; Mk 3:1-6 and m. Sabbath 14:3-4; 22:6 concerning healing on the Sabbath; Mk 7:3-13 and m. Ned. 1:3 concerning qorban). It was believed that the oral Law ultimately derives from Moses: "Many rulings were transmitted to Moses on Sinai [and)... all of them are embodied in Mishnah" (y. Pesah 2.6).

Many of the non-legal works are called midrashim ("commentaries"). From the tannaitic period we have Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael (on Exodus), Sipre Numbers, Sipre Deuteronomy, and Sipra Leviticus. From the early Amoraic period we have Midrash Rabbah (on the Pentateuch and the Five Scrolls), Midrash on the Psalms; Pesiqta Rabbati, Pesiqta de Rab Kahana, Seder Elijah Rabbah and Midrash Tanhuma. Tannaitic tradition is often found in these writings as well (and when it is, it is called baraita).

2.5. Forms of Midrash. J. Neusner (1987) classifies midrash as three types: (1) paraphrase (e.g., the LXX and Targums*), midrash of the synagogue and of Diaspora Judaism; (2) prophecy (e.g., Qumran and Matthew), midrash of eschatologically oriented Judaism* and (3) parable* (e.g., Philo and the rabbis), midrash of the academies. Midrash operates at two levels: obvious and subde. M. Gertner (268) describes these levels as "overt" and "covert" midrash. To be preferred, however, is E. E. Ellis's use of the words explicit and implicit (1988, 703-709). Interpretive paraphrase, as in the I.XX, the Targum or even echoing older scriptural traditions in later scriptural texts, is covert or implicit, while citing Scripture (i.e., the lemma) and then interpreting it (i.e., the midrash or pesher) is overt or explicit. The rabbinic writings, the pesharim of Qumran and many passages of the NT (as seen particularly in Matthew, John and Paul) afford examples of explicit interpretation. The retelling of biblical history as seen in Jubilees, IQapGen (Genesis Apocryphon), Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities, Josephus' Jewish Antiquities and the Targums, represents implicit interpretation. The very manner in which the biblical narrative is retold in these writings brings to light new insights and new teachings. Its purpose is, in effect, to update Scripture. Matthean and Lukan rewriting of Mark may at places parallel this kind of midrashic paraphrase (see 4. below).

Some of the biblical exegesis found in the Gospels reflects midrashic principles. As were the students of the rabbis, the followers of Jesus were called "disciples"* (mathetes, i. e., "learner" = talmid). B. Gerhards-son and R. Riesner have argued that Jesus' teaching has been carefully preserved by his disciples, who had been taught according to rabbinic practices (see Teacher). Such comments as "you search the Scriptures" (Jn 5: 39; 7: 52; cf. Philo Det. Pot. Ins. 5 §13; m. Ber. 1: 15; b. Ta'an. 5b), "go and learn" (Mt 9: 13; cf. S. Elijah Rob. §18 [94]; Num. Hob. 8: 4 [on 5: 6]), "take my yoke upon you" (Mt 11: 29-30; cf. 'Abot 3: 5; m. Ber. 2: 2, 5) and "hear" (Mt 21: 33; cf. m. Ber. 2: 2; b. 'Sabb. 13b), found throughout the Gospels, echo the language of midrash and exegetical dispute (see Jn 3: 25: "a dispute [zêtêsis] arose between some disciples of Jesus with a Jew concerning purification"; cf. Acts 6: 9; 9: 29; 15: 7). Surely the comment "You search the Scriptures because you suppose that you find life in them" (Jn 5: 39) has in mind the widespread rabbinic conviction that "more Torah means more life" (credited to Hillel, cf. 'Abot 2: 8; cf. 2: 7) and that "Torah is for eternal life" (credited to Ishmael, cf. Mek. Pisha' §16 [on Ex 13: 3]). Specific exegeses preserved in the Gospels closely parallel, and at times are apparently pan of, midrashic interpretations of the first century.

3.1. Matthew. The Matthean infancy narrative (see Birth of Jesus) is rich with scriptural allusions and themes that to some extent reflect midrashic principles and practice. When the Evangelist presented the genealogy* of Jesus in three clusters of fourteen generations each (Mt 1: 2-17), he probably was hinting at the numerical value of the Hebrew name "David" (dwd, i. e., 4 + 6 + 4 = 14), the messianic father of jesus (Mt 1: 1). The "star" in Matthew 2: 7 very likely reflects Numbers 24: 17 ("a star shall come forth out of Jacob, and a scepter shall arise out of Israel"), as its interpretation in Midrash and Targum would seem to indicate (e. g., "... a mighty king of the house of Jacob shall reign, and shall be anointed Messiah, wielding the mighty scepter of Israel, " Tg. Ps. -J. ). Evidently both Philo (Proem. Poen. 16 §95) and Josephus (J. W. 6. 5. 4 §§312-13) understood Numbers 24: 17 as messianic. When the Evangelist tells us that Jesus' return from Egypt fulfilled Hosea 11: 1 ("Out of Egypt have I called my son"; Mt 2: 15), he has likely interpreted Hosea in light of the similar passage in LXX Numbers 24: 7-8 ("There shall come a man out of his seed, and he shall rule over many nations... God led him out of Egypt"). Dwelling in "Nazareth" fulfills the prophets (Mt 2: 23) probably because the three root consonants of "Nazareth" (nsr) are common to the word "branch" (neser), a word which has messianic overtones (cf. Is 11: 1 [lüftl Is 4: 2; 49: 6 [rwyry]; Jer 23: 5; 33: 15; Zech 3: 8; 6: 12 ["sprout, " semah\], cf. also Judg 13: 5-7 ["naza-rite, " n'zir]).

3. 2. Mark. In several places Mark's Gospel gives evidence that Jesus was acquainted with Israel's Scriptures as they were interpreted in the synagogue of his day (Chilton, 1984). When Jesus paraphrased Isaiah 6: 10, "... lest they repent and it be forgiven them" (Mk 4: 12), he has followed the Targum ("and it be forgiven them"), not the Hebrew ("and I heal them"). When Jesus cited Isaiah 66: 24 ("where their worm does not die and the fire is not quenched") as descriptive of Gehenna (Mk 9: 47-48), it is again clear that he had in mind not the Hebrew, which does not mention Gehenna, but the Targum: "for their spirits will not die, and their fire will not be quenched, and the wicked will be judged in Gehenna. " Jesus' reworking of Isaiah's Song of the Vineyard (Is 5: 1-7) into a parable directed against Jerusalem's religious leaders (Mk 12: 1-11), instead of the nation as a whole (as it is in Isaiah), likely reflected the Targum's insertion of "sanctuary" (Tg. Isa. 5: 2), and the rabbinic interpretation that Isaiah 5: 1-7 specifically predicted the destruction of the Temple and its altar (cf. t. Me'il. 1: 16; t. Sukk. 3: 15; Tg. Isa. 5: 5).

3. 3. Luke. One of the Lukan Evangelist's most remarkable accomplishments is the framing and enrichment of the infancy narrative in terms of the stories and language of the OT. Most impressive are the echoes of the infancy narrative of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam 1—2). Mary's Magnificat (1: 46-55; see Mary's Song) is modeled after Hannah's song of thanksgiving following the birth of Samuel (1 Sam 2: 1-10). In fact the Magnificat is replete with scriptural allusions (e. g., cf. Lk 1: 48 with LXX 1 Sam 1: 11; Lk 1: 50 with Ps 103: 17). When Luke wrote that "Jesus increased in wisdom* and in stature, and in favor with God and people" (2: 52), he undoubtedly had in mind the similar progress report concerning Samuel: "Now the boy Samuel continued to grow both in stature and in favor with the Lord and with people" (1 Sam 2: 26). Borrowing from older scriptural traditions to tell the biblical story, as undoubtedly Luke regarded the story of Jesus, was very much part of the biblical retelling that is seen in books such as jubilees, Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities and the Targums.

3. 4. John. The opening verses of the Johannine prolog reflect midrashic interpretation at many points. We are told that the Word [logos*] existed with God from the beginning, that all things were made through the Word and that the Word was the source of light and illumination (esp. Jn 1: 1, 4-5, 9). All of these ideas are found in the midrashim and Targums: "You find that at the very beginning of the creation of the world, the King Messiah had already come into being" (Pesiq. ft 33: 6); "By my Word [memra] I have perfected the heavens" (Tg. Isa. 48: 13; cf. 45: 12); "And the Word of the Lord said, 'Let there be light' " (Frg. Tg. Gen. 1: 3); "The earth was void and empty and darkness was spread over the face of the abyss. And the Word of the Lord was the light and it shone... " (Tg. Neof. Exod. 12: 42; cf. Gen. Rab. 1: 6 [on Gen 1: 1]).

The Fourth Gospel presents us with an interesting comparison between Jesus and Jacob. When Jesus tells the astonished Nathanael, "You will see heaven opened and the angels* of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man" (Jn 1: 51), he has alluded to Genesis 28: 12 where the Patriarch Jacob saw the staircase of angels in a dream. According to midrashic tradition the angels came down to gaze upon Jacob, because his image was on God's throne in heaven* (Frg. Tg. Gen. 28: 12; cf. Gen. Rab. 68. 12 [on 28: 12]). Indeed, one interpretation understands that the angels ascended and descended on Jacob, and not simply on the staircase (On. Rab. 69. 3 [on 28: 12]). The Fourth Evangelist probably would like his readers to view Jesus as superior to the patriarch, for Jesus, not Jacob, is the true image of God, and it is Jesus the Son of man, not Jacob, upon whom the angels ascend and descend. A similar concern likely underlies Jesus' encounter with the woman at the well (Jn 4: 10-26). "When our father Jacob lifted up the stone from upon the mouth of the well, the well surged up, and continued to surge up for twenty years" (Frg. Tg. Gen.28: 10). In contrast Jesus offers water that will "surge up" not for twenty years but for an eternity (Jn 4: 14).

4. The Gospels As Midrash.

Recently some have argued that the Gospels themselves, in their entirety, represent instances of midrashim. J. Drury suggests that the variations in the Synoptic parallels may represent midrashic embellishment and creation. M. D.
Goulder has argued that the Gospels are midrashim whose contents have followed primitive Jewish-Christian lectionaries. One scholar has suggested that Mark's Gospel constitutes a "gigantic midrash" on the Hexateuch and Lamentations (Derrett 1. 38; see also D. Miller). Another scholar (Maynard) has argued that the Fourth Gospel is a midrash of the three Synoptic Gospels. But these conclusions are problematic.

Has Mark really produced a midrash on various OT books? On the contrary, he has not given us an interpretation of the Hexateuch; he has given us an interpretation of Jesus. It is true that this interpretation of Jesus has been influenced by OT themes, and perhaps a few specific passages, but it is surely inaccurate to describe Mark as a whole as a midrash on parts of the OT. B. D. Chilton (1986) has offered a more accurate assessment. According to him, the Gospels share certain affinities with midrashic paraphrase (as in 2. above) and probably should be regarded in places as "midrashic" but not "midrash, " as "targumic" but not "targum. " Reaching a conclusion that is compatible to Chilton's findings, F. G. Downing has compared the Evangelist's use of sources, particularly Luke's use of Mark, to Josephus' use of the LXX. It is probably best to conclude, therefore, that the Evangelists' interpretation of the OT and their respective presentations of the story of Jesus are to an extent midrashic in character, but not midrashim.

MILITARY

During the lifetime of Jesus military establishments were maintained in Judea for policing, customs (see Taxes) and defensive duties, and some of Jesus' teaching reflects this situation (Mt 5: 41; 22: 7; Lk 21: 20). Care must be taken to distinguish between the situation in Judea proper (with Samaria), which was under direct Roman jurisdiction (see Rome) throughout the ministry of Jesus, and in the separate tetrarchies of Herod Antipas (Galilee* and Perea) and Herod Philip (the northeastern areas; see Herodian Dynasty); these rulers each had their own military establishments (e. g., Lk 23: 11) modelled on the Roman pattern.

The imperial Roman army was a professional organization raised by recruiting rather than by conscription. Its major units were called legions (about twenty-five in number at this time), each of about 6,000 men, subdivided into ten cohorts (nominally 600 men); each cohort was divided into three maniples, and each maniple into two centuries. Alongside these infantry formations were groups of "auxiliary troops," including infantry and cavalry formations (for the latter see Acts 23: 23). Most of the legionaries and nearly all of the auxiliaries were natives of the various Roman provinces, and the former group became Roman citizens if they did not already have this status when they enlisted. Jews were exempted from Roman military service. The legionaries took an annual direct oath of allegiance to the emperor. Legionaries normally served for twenty years, and auxiliaries for twenty-five years, and on retirement they generally settled in the provinces where they had been stationed. Some were settled into "colonies," towns founded or extended to provide retirement homes for such veterans.

Syria, as a major province under a high-ranking military governor, had four legions to defend the eastern Roman frontier. Judea was administered as a separate area, or provincia, under a governor of lower rank (a praefectus) with much more limited forces. Pilate's troops were auxiliaries estimated at about 3,000 men. Antipas and Philip had armies that probably consisted of Jews and non-Jews and may have had some officers and men drawn from the Roman army. Soldiers were among the audience of John the Baptist (Lk 3: 14; see John the Baptist); these would have been forces serving Herod Antipas in Perea. They acted to some extent as a peace-keeping and police force (and could be used to carry out a death penalty, Mk 6: 27). John did not condemn their profession but urged them to avoid acting unjustly in carrying out their duties and to be satisfied with their admittedly low wages rather than to rob and steal to supplement them.

A story common to Matthew (8: 5-13) and Luke (7: 1-10) tells of a centurion who sought healing from Jesus for his servant. Where Mark refers to centurions by their Latin name, kentyrion, Matthew and Luke have the Greek equivalent hekatontarches. Since there was no Roman military presence in Galilee before A. D. 44, the reference will again be to one of Herod Antipas's troops, which could nevertheless have included Roman soldiers. This man was well disposed to the Jews and enjoyed their esteem because he had built a synagogue * This implies that he gave a substantial donation toward the building costs. We do not know at what level a centurion was paid, but he corresponded to a lower-ranking officer in a modern army. He is a significant figure in the Gospels because he showed faith* in Jesus and took the initiative in approaching him; he thus prefigures later soldiers like Cornelius (Acts 10) who were attracted to the Jewish religion and responded to the gospel (see Gospel [Good News]).

According to the first three Gospels the people who arrested Jesus were a crowd [see People, Crowd] armed with swords and clubs sent by the Sanhédrin. * This group included the Jewish Temple* guards (Lk 22: 4, 52). In the Fourth Gospel the arresting party included "a detachment of soldiers" (Jn 18: 3); the word used could refer to a "cohort" of 600 soldiers, but this is most unlikely, and it is more probable that a "maniple" of no more than 200 men is meant. Although some scholars have argued that John has here unhistorically involved the Gentiles* along with the Jews in the arrest of Jesus, there is nothing improbable about the Jewish authorities seeking the help of a Roman police force in arresting a person who could well be represented as a possible leader of violent revolution (see Revolutionary Movements).

Jesus himself responded to his arrest in a peaceable and nonviolient manner (see Peace). Although he predicted that his coming would bring division and "the sword" rather than peace (Mt 10: 34), he rejected violence: the saying in Luke 22: 36 is grimly ironic and was never meant to be taken literally, as verse 38 shows.

The crucifixion itself was carried out under the orders of Pilate, the Roman governor (see Death of Jesus). Although his headquarters were in Caesarea on the seacoast, he maintained a military presence in Jerusalem at the Fortress of Antonia, adjacent to the Temple. It was a detachment of his soldiers who mocked Jesus (Mk 15: 16-20) and who then carried out the crucifixion under the command of a centurion (Mk 15: 39, 44-45). Later, according to Matthew (Mt 27: 62-66; 28: 4, 11-15), a Roman guard watched over his tomb to prevent any attempt at removing the body of Jesus. Again, it is noteworthy how the (presumably non-Jewish) centurion is impressed by the manner of Jesus' death. He comments that Jesus was "the Son of god" (so NIV, but the Gk could equally mean "a son of God, " i. e., a person of more than ordinary human character; see Son of God), or, as Luke has it, "a righteous man" (Lk 23: 47). The centurion may have meant little more than that Jesus was an innocent victim whose manner of dying showed his extraordinary character; the Evangelists saw that his words could have a deeper significance than he may have intended.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES

In biblical scholarship the English word miracle normally denotes a supernatural event that is, an event which so transcends ordinary happenings that it is viewed as a direct result of supernatural power. In the Gospels such events are due to the exercise of God's* power (see Authority and Power)—whether directly or through human or superhuman agents—and reveal and/or effect his saving or judging purposes. Though some writers use miracle with enough latitude to include (predictive) prophecy (see Prophets, Prophecy), it is more common to restrict it to supernatural events in the space-time world. In contrast to miracle, miracle stories denotes relatively self-contained narratives in which an individual miraculous happening constitutes the, or at least a, major focus of the account. Unless one regards narratives describing angelophanies (see Angels) as miracle stories, Jesus is the subject of all such Gospel stories. Various summaries of Jesus' healings* and exorcisms (e.g., Mk 1: 32-34, 39) are not ranked as miracle stories since they do not relate individual miracles. Such texts will be subsumed under the broad category "miracle traditions."

2. Tradition History and Historicity
3. Significance of the Miracles

1. Miracle Traditions According to the Gospels.

In a sense the Gospels testify to the truth of Goethe's description of miracle as "faith's favorite child. " For example, they narrate or refer to no less than thirty-four specific miracles (exclusive of parallels) performed by Jesus during his earthly ministry. In addition there are fifteen texts (again, exclusive of parallels) that narrate or refer to Jesus' miraculous activity (almost always healings and exorcisms) in summary fashion. Beyond this, there are miracles in which Jesus is the object of the miraculous action (including the virginal conception [see Birth of Jesus], baptism, * Transfiguration, * resurrection* and ascension*) and several (at least seven) epiphanies of the risen Christ. When one includes the angelophanies, portents, and texts which refer to the disciples' miracles, the degree to which miracles dominate the Gospels becomes apparent.

1. 1. The Synoptic Gospels Compared with the Fourth Gospel. The miracle traditions of the Synoptic Gospels evince several affinities. It is especially noticeable that the triple tradition contains eleven accounts of miraculous deeds performed by Jesus (excluding the baptism and Transfiguration pericopae), whereas only two (possibly three) Johannine miracles (feeding of the five thousand; walking on the sea; healing of official's son?) have Synoptic parallels. Of these, only the feeding of the five thousand appears in all four Gospels. For the Synoptic Evangelists Jesus' miracles are dynamais, "deeds of power." Semeia, "signs," used consistendy in the Fourth Gospel, never denotes Jesus' miracles in the Synopdcs (see John, Gospel of). Conversely, Jesus' antagonists demand a sign (Mk 8: 11 par.), and future false Christs/prophets will perform "signs and wonders" (Mk 13: 22; Mt 24: 24). In Luke, however, this avoidance of "sign/s" for Jesus' miracles is insignificant; after all, the Evangelist repeatedly describes miracles of Jesus and the apostles as "signs and wonders" in Acts (e. g., Acts 2: 22, 43). Matthew's convictions are more difficult to determine, though it seems clear that he regarded Jesus' resurrection as a sign—perhaps the only sign—of Jesus (Mt 12: 39-40). Mark's Gospel never brings "sign/s" into positive connection with Jesus' ministry, but twice devalues it (Mk 8: 11-12; 13: 22). Perhaps Mark regarded the use of "sign/s" for Jesus' miracles as a flagrant contradiction of Jesus' refusal to furnish any sign (Mk 8: 12). Furthermore, dynamais accords better with Mark's emphasis on Jesus as the strong and Spirit-filled Son of God (e. g., Mk 1: 7-8, 10; 3: 27; 5:1-8; see Holy Spirit; Son of God).

In the Synoptics Jesus' miracles are closely related to his proclamation of the advent of the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God). Especially in summaries and in pericopae describing the mission efforts of the disciples, the preaching of the kingdom and the performance of healings and exorcisms (see Demon, Devil, Satan) are carefully coordinated (e. g., Mk 1: 39 par.; 3: 14-15 par.; 6: 12-13 par.). In one saying of Jesus transmitted in Matthew and Luke this relationship is defined: "... if it is by the finger [Mt: "Spirit"] of God that I cast out the demons, then the kingdom of God has come to you" (Lk 11: 20; Mt 12: 28 NRSV). Thus the Synoptists regarded Jesus' miracles, perhaps especially his exorcisms (never mentioned in the Fourth Gospel), as one mode of God's assertion of his royal power, so that while the kingdom in its fullness still lies in the future, it has already become a reality in Jesus' words and works. Of course, the Synoptists' linkage between Jesus' miracles and the assertion of God's power against evil, demonic forces closely coheres with their use of dynameis, "deeds of power," for Jesus' miracles.

The noun pistis "faith," or the verb pisteuein, "to believe," plays a fairly dominant role in the Synoptic miracle stories. However, unlike the Fourth Gospel, where miracles ideally result in pistis, the Synoptic narratives regularly present pistis on the part of the suppliants (or their representatives) as a prerequisite for receiving miraculous help (cf. e. g., Mk 2: 5 par.; 6: 5-6 par.). This is not to say, however, that the Synoptic Evangelists failed to appreciate the ability of the miracles to engender faith. This is particularly true of Luke, as can clearly be seen in Acts (e. g., 2: 22; 13: 6-12; 14: 3; see Achtemeier).

Finally, the Synoptics agree in emphasizing the miracle-working of the disciples. Various texts note or imply that the disciples, commissioned and empowered by Jesus, effected exorcisms and healings as they helped Jesus proclaim the coming of the kingdom (e. g., Mk 3: 14-15; 6: 7, 12-13).

1. 1. 1. Mark. Mark can truly be called a Gospel of miracles, for the amount of narrative relating miraculous events in proportion to the entire Gospel is the highest among the canonical Gospels. The vast majority of these miracles are directly related to Jesus. In three cases (baptism, Transfiguration, resurrection) Jesus is, as it were, the object of the miracle. In most cases, however, he is the subject, performing eighteen specific miracles. Also, as in the other Gospels, there are summaries of Jesus' miracle-working activities (Mk 1: 32-34, 39; 3: 10-12; 6: 5, 54-56).

In the history of Markan interpretation scholars have often grappled with two interrelated issues: the so-called messianic secret and the function of Jesus' miracles within the Gospel as a whole (see Mark, Gospel of). Long ago W. Wrede argued that the injunctions to secrecy following some of Jesus' miracles (Mk 1: 44; 5: 43; 7: 36; 8: 26) were part and parcel of an early Christian effort to harmonize the contradiction between the original Christian belief that Jesus became Messiah upon his resurrection and a growing conviction that Jesus must have also been the Messiah during his earthly life. This tension is resolved if Jesus revealed himself to his disciples as the Messiah during his ministry but kept it a secret until his resurrection (cf. Mk 9: 9).
Bultmann agreed with Wrede's analysis of the secrecy motif and further argued that within Mark, Jesus' miracles function positively as proofs that Jesus is the Messiah. And in Mark, he argued, the title denotes a mythological figure: the Son of God, whose being is permeated by the Spirit of God and whose divinity is revealed by stunning miracles.
While Bultmann's understanding remained dominant for a time, the 1960s and 1970s saw a spate of works which argued that Mark employed the messianic secret as a theological means of subordinating the significance of Jesus' miracles.
to the proclamation of his death (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection. T. Weeden, for example, argued that Mark intended to attack heretical Christians whose christology is best subsumed under the rubric theios anēr, or divine man (see Divine Man/Theios Anēr). "In such a perspective Jesus is characterized as the epiphany of God..., who intervenes in human affairs to work miracles.... He is imbued with the power and authority of God, and possesses supernatural knowledge and wisdom... " (55). Correspondingly, these heretics practiced a type of discipleship* whose primary criterion of success was "the quantity, magnitude, and spectacular character of their miraculous acts and pneumatic experiences" (60). True, in the first half of the Gospel Jesus behaves as a theios anēr, but this "theios anēr position is set up only to be discredited by Jesus once the disciples confess to that position" (164). Weeden, however, is unconvincing. The essential arguments against this type of interpretation are assembled, among others, by Theissen. He asks the obvious question: "Can Mark really have told sixteen miracle stories in order to warn against belief in miracles?" (294). In addition, the Transfiguration (Mk 9: 2-8) and three other miracles (Mk 9: 12-29; 10: 46-52; 11: 12-14, 20-21) occur after the first passion prediction. Even the passion narrative contains miracles (Mk 15: 33-38; see Passion Narrative).

In view of these and other objections it has become more acceptable to interpret Jesus' miracle-working in Mark more positively. It is doubtful that the command to secrecy following the miracles is cut from the same cloth as the command to keep Jesus' divine sonship/ messiahship secret. Jesus, for example, frequently performs miracles in public (in synagogues, * packed houses, etc. ). Mark 1: 43-45, which contains the first command to keep a miracle secret, in conjunction with Mark 1: 38 shows that the leper's disobedience resulted in a frustration of Jesus' plans, namely, to preach in other towns (cf. also Mk 7: 24 with 7: 36). Thus Mark may well have understood the four prohibitions in practical-strategic terms.

Jesus' miracles portray him as he is described by the Baptist: the mighty one—mightier than John—who acts in the power of the Spirit (Mk 1: 7-8). As such he silences and expels demons (Mk 1: 21-27; 5: 1-20; 7: 24-30; 9: 14-29) since he has overpowered and bound the strong man, Satan (Mk 3: 22-27). Wind and sea obey him (Mk 4: 41), and power proceeds from him and immediately cures a woman beyond the help of physicians (Mk 5: 29-30). Little wonder then that in Mark his miracles are called dunameis, "deeds of power." And yet this powerful Son of God treads the path to horrible suffering and death in Jerusalem. This juxtaposition naturally heightens the narrative tension and serves to underscore the enormity and humiliation of the self-offering of the Son of man as a ransom for many (Mk 10: 45; see Ransom Saying).

Jesus' miracles are also closely connected to the proclamation of the coming kingdom of God and the related presentation of Jesus as a teacher. * A comparison of Mark 1: 21-27 with 1: 14-15 and 1: 39 reveals a Jesus who repeatedly proclaimed/taught concerning the kingdom of God in various synagogues and who exorcised demons. Similarly, Mark 3: 20-29 implies that Jesus' exorcisms are to be construed as successful attacks of the reign of God against the kingdom of Satan. In the context of miraculous activity Jesus is addressed as "teacher" (Mk 4: 38; 5: 35; 9: 17), and the teaching of Jesus and his apostles* is closely linked to miracle-working (Mk 6: 2, 30, 34-44). Thus Mark—as well as Matthew and Luke—viewed these miracles as episodic manifestations of the advent of the kingdom of God.

Bultmann was therefore correct in his assessment of the positive function of the Markan miracles. However, in light of Jesus' refusal to provide a sign to skeptics (Mk 8: 11-13), it is perhaps more accurate to view them not as proofs of Jesus' messiahship (see Christ) but as means of re-presenting the messianic Son of God, through whose miraculous ministry, death and resurrection God had inaugurated his long-awaited rule.

To Bultmann's view of the Markan miracles as proofs for the divinity of Jesus belongs the later attempt to classify Mark as an aretalogy, a Hellenistic biographical narrative aiming to glorify and propagandize for a theios anêr. Although this hypothesis has become less popular, G. Theissen has argued that the structure of ancient miracle stories, pressing forward as they do toward wonder/acclamation, has heavily contributed to the overall structure of Mark's Gospel. Thus Mark, Theissen surmises, purposefully suppressed tides in the acclamations of the miracle stories in order to create a powerful tension only released in the centurion's confession: "Truly this man was God's Son" (Mk 15: 39 NRSV). One should observe, however, that most ancient miracle stories do not conclude with titular acclamations. Moreover, Theissen unfortunately viewed the centurion's confession as enabled by miraculous cosmic signs (Mk 15: 33, 38), rather than by Jesus' loud cry (Mk 15: 37, 39). A titular confession prompted by the resurrection would have made his theory more plausible.

Mark, like the other Synoptists, presents pîstis ("faith") as a precondition for the reception of a miracle. Mark's contribution, however, is to forge a close link between faith and struggle: pistis is concretely demonstrated when the one(s) seeking a miracle encounter(s) a barrier which is subsequently overcome through determined struggle (Mk 2: 4-5; 5: 27-34, 35-36; 7: 27-29; 9: 22-24; 10: 47-52).

1. Matthew. Matthew, according to the two-source hypothesis (see Synoptic Problem), has taken over almost all of the Markan miracle traditions, although he has abbreviated the miracle stories. On the other hand, Matthew contains additions. The infancy story contains angelophanies and the account of the star, but most importantly the account of the virginal conception (Mt 1: 18-25; see Birth of Jesus). Matthew lacks three Markan miracles from the period of Jesus' ministry (Mk 1: 23-28; 7: 31-37; 8: 22-26), but contains six additional ones: Matthew 8: 5-13; 9: 32-33; and 12: 22 belong to or have parallels in Q; Matthew 9: 27-31 is very similar to Mark 10: 46-52; Matthew 14: 28-33 and 17: 24-27 are unique to Matthew. In the passion narrative Matthew adds that when Jesus died an earthquake shattered the rocks and many saints emerged from their tombs (Mt 27: 51-53). Likewise, only Matthew describes a later earthquake occurring when an angel descended and rolled the stone from Jesus' tomb (Mt 28: 2). The Evangelist concludes his Gospel with a christophany in Galilee, another account peculiar to this Gospel.

When one examines Matthew's miracle traditions along with those of Mark and Luke, several Matthean predilections surface. Two such are the phrases, "according to your faith be it done to you" (Mt 8: 13; 9: 29; 15: 28) and "x was healed from that hour" (Mt 8: 13; 9: 22; 15: 28; 17: 18). Matthew is also fond of repetition (Mt 9: 32-34/12: 22-24; 9: 27-31/20: 29-34; 12: 38-39/16: 1-4). Is this also related to the doubling of Markan characters in Matthew 8: 28 and 20: 30?

Three Matthean changes vis-à-vis Mark result in a heightening of Jesus' dignity. Thus characters in Matthean miracle traditions are much more apt to address Jesus as "Lord" (kyne: Mt 8: 2, 6, 8, 25; 9: 28; 15: 22, 25; 17: 4; 20: 31, 33). Likewise, suppliants or witnesses "worship" Jesus (proskynein: Mt 8: 2; 9: 18; 14: 33; 15: 25). Finally, Matthew insists that Jesus performed a miracle for all who needed it, or that all the sick were brought to him (Mt 4: 23-24; 8: 16; 12: 15; 14: 35; 15: 37).

Scholars have long noted that Matthew is a Gospel of fulfilled Scripture, and this concern has influenced its miracle traditions (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology). The virginal conception fulfilled Isaiah 7: 14 (Mt 1: 22-23); Jesus' exorcisms and healings fulfilled Isaiah 53: 4 (Mt 8: 17); and Jesus' miracles described in Matthew 11: 5 correspond to Isaianic prophecies. Furthermore, Matthew rewrites a Markan summary (Mk 3: 7-12) so that Jesus no longer prohibits demons from revealing his identity but rather forbids the healed to make him known (Mt 12: 15-21). This in turn is interpreted as a fulfillment of the unobtrusive and gende ways of God's servant (Is 42: 1-4; see Servant of Yahweh). The desire to show fulfilled prophecy may also explain the tendency to underscore Jesus' healing ministry (cf. Mt 4: 23; 10: 1, 7-8; 12: 15-16 with their Markan counterparts; see also Mt 9: 35; 14: 14; 15: 30; 19: 2; 21: 14-15). For this activity Matthew could adduce OT prophecies (Mt 8: 17; 11: 5; 12: 18-21). Twice Matthew notes the accusation that Jesus performed his miracles by Beelzebul's power (Mt 9: 34; 12: 24; cf. 13: 56). He also knows that false prophets will try to legitimate themselves by miracles (Mt 7: 15-23; 24: 24). It is therefore very important for this author, perhaps a Jewish-Christian "scribe"* (Mt 13: 52) and certainly one vitally concerned about the fulfillment of the Law* and Prophets (Mt 5: 17-20), to show that Jesus' miracles were in accord with the Torah and thus were of divine origin. This subordination of miracle to Torah, rooted in Deuteronomy 13: 1-5, has possibly influenced Matthew's decision to present the Sermon on the Mount (cf. esp. Mt 5: 17-20; see Sermon on the Mount) prior to any individual miracle stories.

Held, observing Matthew's abbreviations and expansions of Mark, concluded that the Evangelist intended primarily to provide instruction to the church* concerning christology, faith and discipleship. Christological themes have already been noted: Jesus' fulfillment of OT prophecy and his status as the Lord* who is to be worshiped (see Worship). Instruction on faith is also important to Matthew, though Theissen has noted that Matthew's dropping of pistis from three Markan stories retold in Matthew 9: 18-26; 17: 14-21; and 20: 29-34 militates against "Held's view that the motif of faith is Matthew's critical principle of selection for including Markan miracle stories" (137). On the other hand, rebuke of the disciples for little faith does play a more prominent role in Matthew than in Mark (cf. Mt 14: 31; 17: 20). Finally, Held identified Matthean changes that evince an interest in the nature and demands of discipleship (e. g., Mt 9: 8; 14: 28-33).

Matthew made a noticeable change in the way his miracle stories are ordered within the overall story of Jesus' ministry. After a brief summary of Jesus' message and ministry (Mt 4: 23-25), he initiates his account of Jesus' work with an extensive account of his teaching, the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5—7). Only then does he narrate a series of miracle stories (Mt 8—9). Moreover, the Sermon and the narratives of the following two chapters appear to constitute one major unit in Matthew's structure, judging from the similar summaries (Jesus taught, preached and healed) which form an inclusio (Mt 4: 23-25; 9: 35-38). On the other hand, Kingsbury, noting the mention of Jesus' teaching and preaching in Matthew 11: 1, envisions chapters 8—9 as part of a section comprising Matthew 4: 17—11: 1 in which Jesus conducts a Galilean ministry of teaching, preaching and healing. In turn, this section would constitute the first major subdivision of Matthew 4: 17—16: 20, over which he places the rubric "The Proclamation of Jesus Messiah" (17).

But what is the function of the miracles within this unit? There are ten miracles in chapters 8—9, but the presence of pericopae that do not narrate miracles and the merciful nature of Jesus' miracles make it unlikely either that these chapters intend to present the Messiah of deed (alongside the Messiah of word) or that Jesus is being portrayed as the new Moses. * The themes of faith and discipleship surface several times, but it is difficult to subsume every pericope in chapters 8—9 under either heading. Gnilda has suggested that the principal message concerns Jesus the Son of God and the Son of David (see Son of David), who acts with grace toward his people and who is to be encountered in faith and in willing discipleship. Luz has recently proposed that chapters 8—9 recapitulate the history of the Matthean church. The attempt to comprehend the precise import of these two chapters will no doubt continue.

1. 1. 3. Luke. The contours of the miraculous in Jesus' life, according to Luke's Gospel, are interesting to trace. Like Matthew, Luke commences with birth narratives which relate angelophanies and the virginal conception. Gabriel, in fact, draws a direct link between this generation by the Holy Spirit and Jesus' identity as "Son of God" (Lk 1: 35). Between Matthew's five and Luke's three angelophanies there is no overlap. Luke's presentation of Jesus' miracles largely corresponds to those of Mark and Matthew, yet there are interesting modifications. All of the Markan miracles appear in sequence in Luke save the cursing of the fig tree (cf. Lk 13: 6-9) and the five miracle stories within Luke's so-called great omission (Mk 6: 45—8: 26). Luke also included a healing (Lk 7: 1-10) and an exorcism (Lk 11: 14) belonging to the Q* material. And finally, Luke contains seven specific miracles unique to this Gospel, including the notice concerning the exorcism of seven demons from Mary Magdalene (Lk 8: 2) and a report of the healing of the ear of the high priest's servant (Lk 22: 51; cf. also 5: 1-11; 7: 11-17; 13: 10-17; 14: 1-6;
Luke, of course, concludes with the Easter story. However, in his story the women* received the Easter news from two men wearing dazzling clothes (Lk 24: 4). Subsequently, Luke narrates two christophanies and refers to a third, all of which occurred on Easter Sunday: an appearance to the Emmaus disciples (Lk 24: 13-35), a reference to an epiphany before Simon (Lk 24: 34) and an evening appearance before the eleven and others (Lk 24: 36-49). At this point Luke shows more affinity with the Fourth Gospel than with the other Synoptics. Mark contains no resurrection appearances, and Matthew's only one is situated in Galilee. On the other hand, John knows a christophany to the disciples on Easter evening (Lk 20: 19-23), and Magdalene had an encounter with two angels in white (Lk 20: 11-13). Finally, Luke concludes his Gospel by narrating the ascension more fully described in Acts 1: 1-11.

In various ways Luke left his stamp on the traditions passed on by him. For example, certain vocabulary preferences are evident. To convey the immediate occurrence of the miracles he prefers the literary term parachrēma (Lk 4: 39; 5: 25; 8: 44, 47, 55; 13: 13; 18: 43) to euthus (Mk) or eutheōs (Mt). Like Matthew, he expands Mark's use of kyrēs, "Lord," both in direct address (Lk 5: 12) and as an appellation in the third person (Lk 7: 13; 13: 15), but his frequent use of epistala, "master," is unique (Lk 5: 5; 8: 24, 45; 9: 33; 17: 13). Luke also prefers the verb iaomai, "to heal" (Lk 5: 17; 6: 18-19; 7: 7; 8: 47; 9: 2, 11, 42; 14: 4; 17: 15; 22: 51) more than do his Synoptic counterparts.

Comparison with the other Synoptics also reveals characteristic emphases in the Lukan miracle traditions. For all the Synoptists the miracles of Jesus are dynameis, "powerful deeds," but Luke stresses that they are the result of the dynamis, "power," which is at Jesus' disposal (Lk 4: 36; 5: 17; 6: 19; 8: 46), which he shares with his disciples (Lk 9: 1), and which therefore enables them to crush the enemy's dynamis (Lk 10: 19). Perhaps this emphasis is related to Luke's inclination to describe illness as astheneia, a bodily "weakness" (Lk 4: 40; 5: 15; 8: 2; 13: 11-12). Busse, on the basis of such texts as Luke 4: 39 and 13: 11, 16, argued that for Luke all sickness was caused by demons. Perhaps, but Luke never expressly affirms it, and some healings are narrated without explicit mention of demons or exorcistic motifs.

It has long been recognized that Luke redacted his sources to emphasize the praying of Jesus (see Prayer), and twice this motif appears in Luke's miracle stories (Lk 5: 16; 9: 29; cf. 3: 21). Theissen observed that Luke on three occasions records that Jesus prayed shortly before divine power was manifested through or in him (Lk 5: 16-17; 6: 12-19; 9: 29). This shows, according to Theissen, that Luke viewed Jesus' dynamis as a dynamic, not a Static, phenomenon and accords with a Lukan tendency to emphasize the work of God behind and above Jesus' ministry. Accordingly, in several miracle story endings the suppliant and/or the witnessing crowd (see People, Crowd) "give glory to God" or in some other way acknowledge God's acuity (Lk 5: 25; 7: 16; 9: 43; 13: 13; 17: 15, 18; 18: 43; 19: 37).

One may deduce from Acts 3:22-23 and 7:37 (cf. Lk 9:35) that Luke viewed Jesus as the Mosaic prophet predicted in Deuteronomy 18:15, 18. This prophet christology also makes itself felt in the Gospel, especially in those passages which relate Jesus' prophetic status to miracle-working (Lk 7:16; 24:19). Luke seemingly borrowed hues from the Elijah-Elisha narratives (see Elijah and Elisha) to paint his portrait of Jesus (Lk 4:25-27; 7:11-17; 9:62), but it is unlikely that he presents him, even in a qualified sense, as Elijah redivivus (cf. Mal 4:5-6). It is the Baptist who comes in the "spirit and power of Elijah" (Lk 1:17), and Jesus declares John to be the coming messenger of Malachi 3:1 (a figure probably generally identified as the returning Elijah of Mal 4:5-6; see John the Baptist).

Finally, Theissen has called attention to how Luke's salvation-history schema has influenced his retelling of the miracle stories. Just as God's plan of salvation, anticipated in the OT, reached its denouement in the "today" of Jesus' ministry (Lk 4:21), so those who witnessed the forgiving (see Forgivenness of Sins) and healing of the paralytic declare, "We have seen strange things today" (Lk 5:26 NRSV [my emphasis]). Likewise, those who are confronted with Jesus' raising of the widow's son exclaim that now at last in Jesus, "God has looked favorably on his people" (Lk 7:16 NRSV).

1.2. The Fourth Gospel. Miracle plays a dominant role in the Fourth Gospel, and especially in this domain the distinctive Johannine perspective becomes evident. Jesus' miracles, for example, are set within the context of the one grand miracle, the incarnation of the Logos* (Jn 1:14). Thus the Fourth Gospel contains no birth narratives, but in its prologue directs the reader all the way back to the preincarnate Son.

As in the Synoptics, Jesus receives the Spirit at his baptism (Jn 1:32-34). The Fourth Gospel also agrees that Jesus performed many miracles during his ministry, but it narrates only seven—far fewer than in the Synoptics. The feeding of the five thousand (Jn 6:1-15), Jesus walking on the sea (Jn 6:16-21) and probably the healing of the nobleman's son (Jn 4:46-54) have Synoptic parallels, but the other four, including the raising of Lazarus* (Jn 11:1-44), are unique. Alongside these seven "signs" and predictive prophecy (attested in all the Gospels), the Johannine Jesus displays supernatural knowledge of hidden realities (Jn 1:47-49; 2:24-25; 4:16-19; 5:6?; 6:64, 70-71; 13:1; 21:6). While not entirely absent from the Synoptics, this feature is more pronounced in John.

The premier miracle of the last half of the Fourth Gospel is Jesus' resurrection/return to the Father. As noted above, John's resurrection narratives have interesting points of contact with Luke's: the two figures who convey the Easter message to Mary/the women, a resurrection appearance to the disciples on Easter and explicit mention of Jesus' ascension (though apparently understood differently). Nevertheless, the following miraculous elements are unique to John; a christophany to Mary Magdalene (Jn 20: MI 8), Jesus' bestowal of the Holy Spirit on his disciples on Easter evening (Jn 20:21-22), a christophany to his disciples a week later (Jn 20:26-29) and, yet later, an early morning christophany to seven disciples (Jn 21:1-23).

On one level the miracle stories of the Fourth Gospel are similar to those of the Synoptic tradition. Three have Synoptic parallels, and of the remaining four, two are healings (from lameness, blindness), one a "gift" miracle (the production of wine from water) and one a resuscitation (Lazarus)—three types which have Synoptic parallels. Nevertheless, the Johannine presentation is distinctive.

In the first place, while in the Synoptics Jesus' miracles are normally called dynameis, "mighty deeds," the Fourth Evangelist repeatedly calls them sêmeia, "signs." He emphasizes that Jesus performed many signs, but scholars generally agree that he chose to narrate only seven. Since these appear within the first twelve chapters, R. Brown chose to label these chapters the "Book of Signs." Also, Burge has noted that most of the twenty-seven instances of ergon, "work," in the Fourth Gospel refer to Jesus' signs, although "work/s" includes more than signs (Jn 14:10; 17:4).

Whereas in the Synoptics the dynameis are closely correlated with the kingdom of God, proclaimed and proleptically established in Jesus' words and deeds, the Johannine sêmeia are said to evoke faith in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God (Jn 20:30-31). The framework of the Johannine signs (especially the "I am" sayings; set "I Am" Sayings) shows that the Evangelist has by no means simply adopted a traditional linguistic usage (cf. e.g., Acts 2:22; Rom 15:19). "Signs" are precisely what the Johannine miracles are, for in very concrete, physical ways they point to the deep and crucial truth about Jesus (and God), namely, that he is the absolutely unique Son of God who descended from heaven to reveal the Father and through whose "lifting up" on the cross, resurrection and return to the Father believers receive the Holy Spirit and thus eternal life.* The signs, in other words, point to the present glory* of the exclusive mediator of eschatological salvation and also portend the salvation* to be enjoyed by the beneficiaries of the completion of his messianic work (cf. Jn 7:37-39).

Secondly, among the Johannine signs there are no exorcisms. In fact, Jesus' exorcisms are not even mentioned in John. In the Fourth Gospel it is in the "hour" of Jesus that the devil, the ruler of this world, makes his supreme assault against Jesus (Jn 13:2, 27; 14:30), but through Jesus' "lifting up" he is "cast out" (Jn 12:31-32).

Thirdly, while the Fourth Gospel knows that faith is a prerequisite for miracles (Jn 4:50; 11:40), its emphasis is on the hope that retelling the signs will engender faith (Jn 20:30-31). Thus in the Fourth Gospel Jesus takes the initiative in performing signs, in fact, many signs (Jn 7:31; 11:47; 12:37; 20:30) "which no one else did" (Jn 15:24). The Fourth Gospel does not devalue faith based upon witnessing or hearing about signs unless such faith is less than a commitment to Jesus as (what the Evangelist understands by) the Christ, the Son of God. On the other hand, the Fourth Gospel does critique the demand to see signs before coming to faith (Jn 4:48; 6:30; 20:24-29).

2. Tradition History and Historicity.

2.1. Miracles of the Birth Narratives. In the Matthean infancy narratives appear five angelophanies, the story of the star and the account of the virginal conception. This last-mentioned miracle is also presented in Luke, along with three angelophanies. Strictly speaking there are no parallels between these two sets of angelophanies, though it is true that both Gospels contain an angelic announcement of Jesus' birth (Matthew's to Joseph; Luke's to Mary). Because there is such little overlap between these birth narratives (cf. Fitzmyer, 1.307), it is difficult to trace their tradition history (see Tradition Criticism). Alongside appeal to the Evangelists' own creativity, a bewildering assortment of oral and written sources have been postulated, but no consensus has emerged. At any rate one thing is clear: Assuming that Matthew and Luke independently composed their birth narratives, both were relying on older tradition containing the virginal conception and probably an angelic announcement of Jesus' birth. The tradition of the virginal conception, therefore, predates Matthew and Luke, but by how long? Some conclude that it is a late creation since no other NT author—including the earliest, Paul—betrays knowledge of it (except perhaps the author of the Fourth Gospel [Jn 8:41; cf. Mk 6:3]). But can one show the probability that a given author would have mentioned it had he known about it? Moreover, some explain this silence by appeal to a "birth secret" (cf. Lk 2:19, 51) which was not divulged until considerably later (see Birth of Jesus).

There have been a variety of efforts to explain the origin of belief in the virginal conception without recourse to the supernatural, but each is beset with difficulties. It is not clear that Isaiah 7:14, either in the MT or LXX, speaks of a virginal conception, and a messianic interpretation of this text in pre-Christian times is not forthcoming. In an allegorical exegesis of the birth of Isaac, Philo (Cher. 43-52) employs the pagan notion that a woman might become pregnant through the spirit, power or breath of a god (Aeschylus Suppl. 17-19; Plutarch Ser. Num. Pun. 4; Mor. 9.114-19). Yet Philo only uses this notion to explain the generation of virtue in the soul; there is no evidence that he or any other Jew believed that Isaac or anyone else had been fathered by God's Spirit apart from a human father. That the tradition of Jesus' virginal conception arose from a direct assimilation to pagan stories of gods copulating with mortal women is virtually excluded by the intensely Jewish ambience of the birth narratives. In sum, historical analysis of the tradition that Jesus had no biological father can yield neither proof nor refutation.

2.2. Miracles Performed by Jesus. Among NT scholars there is almost universal agreement that Jesus performed what he and his contemporaries regarded as miraculous healings and exorcisms. This judgment is based primarily on several sayings of Jesus which, when evaluated against widely recognized criteria of authenticity (see Form Criticism), prove to be utterances of Jesus (Mt 12:28 par. Lk 11:20; Mk 3:23; Lk 13:32; Mt 11:4-6 par. Lk 7:22-23; Mt 13:16-17 par. Lk 10:23-24). To this evidence one may add the fact that Jesus' exorcistic and/or healing activity is attested in every stratum of Gospel material (Q* Mark, M,* L,* John) and in a variety of literary forms (sayings, miracle stories, summaries, controversy stories, the so-called legends and the passion narratives [Mk 15:31 par.]). Outside of early Christianity Jesus was also known as an exorcist/healer in the magical papyri (PGM 4.3019-30) and within later Jewish circles (e.g., t. Hul. 2:22-23). Despite the recent, highly speculative reconstruction of Christian origins by B. Mack, who argues that Jesus was not a miracle worker, sober historical analysis will continue to affirm the high probability that Jesus performed healings and exorcisms.

Evidence that Jesus raised the dead and performed so-called nature miracles is less pervasive. Only Jesus' revivification of the dead is attested in a saying (from Q) which scholars have frequently judged authentic (Mt 11:4-6 par. Lk 7:22-23). However, since Matthew, Luke and John contain at least one revivification and/or nature miracle not found in Mark, it is highly improbable that all such stories in Mark are Markan creations. We can, therefore, safely say that revivification and nature miracles were attributed to Jesus at some point prior to Mark. Of course, those who deny in principle the possibility of supernatural events reject such miracles (with the exception perhaps of revivifications which could be explained on naturalistic grounds). On the other hand, those who believe that Jesus was raised from the dead are naturally open to the possibility that some such miracles actually occurred.

While most scholars agree that Jesus performed exorcisms and healings (and possibly deeds regarded as revivifications), many would be wary about claiming that any one of the miracle stories of the Gospels is based on actual reminiscence. This obviously raises questions concerning the source(s) employed by the Evangelists. To the degree that one is sure of the traditional link between Mark and Peter, or that John Zebedee was the ultimate authority for the Johannine signs, one will be very open to the historicity of these stories. These two hypotheses, however, have been—perhaps unwisely—widely abandoned. At the very least, it is virtually certain, as we have seen, that some if not all of the Gospel stories antedate Mark. Among the traditions designated as Q there are two miracle stories (Mt 8:5-13 par. Lk 7:1-10 [Jn 4:46-54 is possibly a variant]; Mt 12:22-23 par. Lk 11:14). Various scholars have also attempted to delineate prior oral or written catenae, or chains, of miracles which were incorporated into the Gospels. Achtemeier (1970, 1972), for example, argues that two such catenae lie behind the Markan miracle stories appearing in Mark 4:35—6:44 and 6:45—8:26. Many Johannine scholars have appealed to a signs source to explain the composition of the Fourth Gospel. Recendy Mack has endeavored to find at the root of all these catenae a Christian effort to transform Jesus into a miracle worker.
In reality, however, these source theories involve a high degree of speculation (cf. Koch), and Mack's reconstruction in particular is not likely to inspire confidence. Source analysis may help to show that the miracle stories had an existence prior to their inclusion in the Gospels, but this fact does not in itself yield a verdict on historicity (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]).

Skepticism concerning the probable historicity of any particular miracle story has also been fueled by the conviction that those who formulated these accounts assimilated Jesus to the typical miracle-working divine man (theios ariā) familiar to the Hellenistic world (see Hellenism). Nevertheless, the theios anēr hypothesis and its implications for the tradition history of the miracle stories is much weaker than its advocates realize. As its weaknesses are exposed elsewhere (see Divine Man/Theios Anēr), it will suffice here to note that (1) one can posit several reasons why the earliest Aramaic-speaking church would have narrated Jesus' miracles (see 3.2 below), and that (2) in fact a significant number of respected Gospel scholars have argued that at least a few of the miracle stories circulated in the earliest church.

Though one would be hard pressed to prove that some of the miracle stories did not originate among Hellenized Christians, one can with confidence exclude few if any from the early Aramaic-speaking church. Such early circulation would not in itself prove historicity, but with all other things equal this fact would enhance the case for historical verity. R Pesch has thoughtfully pointed to elements within healing and exorcism stories that argue for their historicity, though some may hesitate to agree that some narratives contain elements which make historicity improbable.

2.3. Resurrection/Discovery of the Empty Tomb. Whether Jesus rose from the dead is a complex philosophical, theological and historical problem. This complexity is demonstrated in the work of W. Pannenberg, the theologian who more than anyone else in this half century has pressed for recognition of the historicity and centrality of Jesus' resurrection. Of this fact, however, all historians are confident: that very shortly after Jesus was crucified, his disciples became convinced by multiple visionary appearances of Jesus (1 Cor 15:5-8) that God had restored his life and ushered him into the heavenly world. Thus the resurrection belongs to the bedrock of Christian belief (see Resurrection).

Many, however, would refrain from saying the same about the story of the discovery of the empty tomb. Bultmann argued that it was not part of the early passion narrative, but late apologetic (see Passion Narrative). Some scholars have since credited Mark with its origin. Pesch (1974), on the other hand, has argued cogently that it formed the conclusion of the old Jerusalem passion narrative. Yet he maintains that it was not based on a historical report, but was freely constructed after a pattern attested in the Jewish as well as in the Greco-Roman world: the unsuccessful search for the translated or resurrected person.

It is true that difficult questions face the defender of the substantial historicity of the empty tomb story. Why, for example, does the empty tomb tradition not surface in the early confessional statement quoted by Paul in I Corinthians 15:3-7, in his own words, or in the sermons of Acts? Yet an impressive list of exegetes have concluded that jettisoning a historical core for the empty tomb story presents even more formidable problems. When Jesus' resurrection was first proclaimed, why did the authorities not exhume the corpse? Even if it had decayed beyond recognition, its presence in Joseph's tomb—a detail with strong historical credentials—would have been damning. And if the authorities themselves had discovered it empty, would they have revealed it? And had they done so, would Christians have not heavily exploited that fact? Moreover, if the empty tomb narrative had been freely constructed, would a few women have been chosen as witnesses of the opened and empty tomb? Why not some or all of the eleven disciples? Finally, as Craig has argued, the discovery of the empty tomb on Easter Sunday following Good Friday offers the only really satisfying explanation of the creedal affirmation, "He was raised on the third day." While belief in Jesus' resurrection does not necessarily hinge on the historicity of the empty tomb story, a variety of historical considerations make the latter plausible.

3. Significance of the Miracles.

3.1. Miracles of the Birth Narratives. As different as they are, the Matthean and Lukan birth narratives converge in situating Jesus' nativity in a matrix of miracles. In general the angelophanies underscore the importance of Jesus' birth for salvation history. Matthew's five dream-angelophanies reveal God's ability to uphold his divine plan, prophesied in Scripture, over against historical ambiguities and Herod's machinations. Specifically, the angelic annunciation of Jesus' birth (to Joseph [Mt] and Mary [Lk]) is appropriate for the messianic scion of David, just as angels heralded important figures of the past: Isaac, Moses (e.g., Josephus Ant. 2.210-16) and Samson.

Matthew's star, connected to the oracle of Numbers 24:17, portends the birth of "King David's greater Son" (cf. e.g., 4QTestim 12-13). According to Kee, Matthew's portents at Jesus' birth and death are to be interpreted in light of Roman historical tradition, in which such portents demonstrate the divine governance of history in the rise and fall of emperors. Thus the perceptive will see in the star a disclosure of God's purpose in history, centered upon Jesus the king.

The virginal conception, like the angelophanies and the star, exalts Jesus and links him to OT history and expectation. Several key Israelite figures (e.g., Isaac, Joseph, Samson, Samuel) were born to barren women blessed by God. On the other hand, none was born to a virgin. R. Brown has called attention to this same "step-parallelism" between the birth accounts of John and Jesus in Luke. Such a unique origin was fitting for God's eschatological plenipotentiary, to whom worship would be the appropriate response. At some point this miraculous conception was regarded as the fulfillment of Isaiah 7:14 (Mt 1:22-23; allusion in Lk 1:26-31)—a promise given to the "house of David"—and associated with the title Son of God (Lk 1:35).

3.2. Miracles Occurring in Jesus' Ministry. Almost all scholars believe that Jesus saw a direct connection between the miracles he performed and his proclamation of the coming of God's kingdom (see Kingdom of God). In the opinion of advocates of consistent eschatology, Jesus viewed his miracles as signs that the kingdom of God was on the verge of bringing the present age to an end. C. H. Dodd, the principal voice of realized eschatology, argued on the basis of his interpretation of Matthew 12:28 and Luke 11:20 that Jesus saw his miracles as actual expressions of God's reign, already fully present in his ministry. According to others, however, Jesus performed his miracles knowing that in his ministry the reign of God was being inaugurated, yet also intending his miracles to portend the cosmic renewal that the future consummation of the kingdom would entail.

This connection between Jesus' miracles and his message about the advent of the kingdom accounts for most if not all of the miracles attributed to him in the Gospels. According to Isaiah, in the future era of salvation—the "kingdom of God" in apocalyptic thought—the deaf will hear, the blind will see, the lame will walk and the mute will sing (29:18-19; 35:5-6; 61:1). Beyond that, both the OT and intertestamen-tal apocalyptic* know that the "age to come" will mean resurrection for the dead (Is 26:19; Dan 12:1-3). Although the OT has little to say about demons or exorcism, several noncanonical apocalyptic authors expected the advent of the kingdom to spell doom for Satan and his demonic Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20).

One can even posit an eschatological/apocalyptic background for the so-called nature miracles (set Eschatology). All three gift or provision miracles (feedings of five thousand and four thousand; Cana wine miracle) actualize and foreshadow the messianic feast (Is 25:6-9; 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:4; Mt 8:11 par.), characterized by an abundance of bread*—the eschatological equivalent of the manna miracle (2 Apoc. Bar. 29:7-8; cf. Jn 6:4, 14, 30-31; Rev. 2:17)— and wine* (2 Apoc. Bar. 29:5-6). The two rescue miracles, Jesus' calming of and walking on the sea, are meaningful against the horizon of Yahweh's assertion of his sovereignty over the sea in creation (Job 26:12-13; Ps 74:12-15), the Exodus (Ps 77:16-20) and the eschaton (Is 27:1; cf. Rev 21:1). As apocalyptic also looked for divine judgment* on God's enemies, it is tempting to see in Jesus' cursing of the fig tree an acted parable* threatening the Jewish nation with disaster in the absence of repentance* (cf. Mk 11:13; Mic 7:1-6; Jer 8:13). Even the visionary experiences of Jesus' baptism and Transfiguration fall within the orbit of apocalyptic eschatology insofar as (1) literature of the latter type often employed vision as a revelatory medium, and (2) the two visions in question have eschatological content

The miracles of Jesus are, however, not only integrally related to the coming of the kingdom, but also support and promote the identity of Jesus as God's eschatological agent, the Messiah (see Christ). It is admittedly difficult to produce pre-Christian texts in which the expected Messiah appears as a miracle worker, but considerable evidence suggests that by the first Christian century at least some Jews saw Moses and the saving events of the Exodus period as prototypical of the Messiah and the liberating events of his reign. This typology probably lies behind the sign prophets of Josephus (see Revolutionary Movements), the reaction of the crowd in John 6:14-15, the behavior of the false christs of Mark 13:21-22 and parallels, and the description of the miracle working of the Davidic Messiah of 4 Ezra 13:32, 50. One thing is certain: at least as early as Luke-Acts—and probably much earlier—Jesus was regarded as the predicted mosaic prophet of Deuteronomy 18:15, 18 (Acts 3:22-23; 7:37), and thus his miracles appear as "signs and wonders" standing in a typological relation to those that Moses performed (Acts 2:22; see Prophets, Proph-ecy).

Other factors also contributed to the christological significance of Jesus' miracles: (1) they document qualities expected in the shepherd-Messiah (see Shepherd, Sheep)—compassion and mercy* (esp. emphasized in Mt); (2) they demonstrate God's approbation of Jesus and his ministry, on the basis of the deeply rooted scriptural principle that miracles (performed within the framework of divine revelation) legitimate divinely authorized agents; and (3), aside from pre-Christian messianic expectations, their transmission and repetition are inevitable, given the desire of early Christians to glorify and exalt their Messiah.

3.3. Resurrection/Discovery of the Empty Tomb. In the historical-theological context in which belief in Jesus' resurrection originated, certain implications of this divine action were present from the beginning: Jesus was truly God's Messiah, and his resurrection marked the inauguration of the eschatological resurrection, though an interval of time would separate Jesus' resurrection from that of believers (1 Cor 15:20-28).

The Gospels proclaim the resurrection by narrating both the story of the empty tomb and—collectively—at least seven epiphanies of the risen Christ. The empty tomb story is narrated first but the significance of the vacant tomb does not emerge until Jesus' continued existence is revealed by angelic mediation and/or a christophany. In light of these divine revelations, however, the mystery (or misinterpretation) of the empty tomb is clarified, for the dominant Jewish notion of resurrection would have required that the earthly body of Jesus be transformed into the glorified body, hence resulting in an empty tomb.

In conclusion, taken as a whole the Gospels testify that Jesus performed many miracles and in addition that breathtaking wonders marked both the beginning and end of his earthly life. While this composite picture does not admit of scientific proof, the evidence at hand is sufficient to challenge the honest inquirer to consider seriously the Christian conviction about the identity of Jesus, and to perceive in him and his ministry the inauguration of the reign of God expected in Jewish apocalyptic. For believers these expressions of God's royal and benevolent power constitute a continual reminder of the divine power available in weakness for the church militant and in unveiled glory for the church triumphant.

MOSES

The Gospels present Moses as the mediator of the Law* and more significantly as one who foretold and foreshadowed Jesus' coming. Jesus is presented as a prophet* like Moses (Deut 18:15-19) and as a lawgiver like Moses (not as merely an interpreter of Moses).

1. Moses As Mediator of the Law
2. A Prophet/Lawgiver Like Moses
3. Conclusion

1. Moses As Mediator of the Law.

In the Synoptics the expressions "the Law/book of Moses" (Mk 12:26; Lk 2:22; 24:44) or simply "Moses" (Lk 16:29, 31; 24:27) appear to denote the Pentateuch. Most references tie Moses to specific laws, such as those concerning circumcision (Lk 2:22; cf. Lev 12:2-8; Ex 13:2, 12), the offering after the cleansing of a leper (Mt 8:4 par. Mk 1:44 and Lk 5:14; cf. Lev 13:49; 14:2-32; see Leprosy), honoring parents (Mk 7:10; cf. Ex 20:12; 21:17; Lev 20:9), divorce* (Mt 19:7-8 par. Mk 10:3-5; cf. Deut 24:1-4) and levirate marriage (Mt 22:24 par. Mk 12:19 and Lk 20:28; cf. Deut 25:5). Only one passage refers to narrative, namely the dialog at the burning bush (Mk 12:26 par. Lk 20:37; cf. Ex 3:6). In the above passages Jesus, the Pharisees,* the Saddu-cees, and in one instance the Evangelist Luke, regard Moses as the mediator of the Law. Matthew 23:2 refers to "Moses' seat" (cf. Ex 18:13), an office in which the scribes* and Pharisees claim to carry on the exposi-tion of the Law.
In the Fourth Gospel Jesus acknowledges that Moses gave the Law (Jn 7:19 [8:5]) and—with qualification—circumcision (Jn 7:22-23), while the Pharisees profess that God* spoke to Moses (Jn 9:28-29). John 1:17 implies a comparison and contrast in both the content and means of revelation: "For the Law was given (edothe) through Moses; grace and truth came into being (egeneto) through Jesus Christ.

2. A Prophet/Lawgiver Like Moses.

2.1. The Transfiguration. In the Synoptics the Transfiguration* is the key passage drawing parallels between Moses and Jesus. There Moses and Elijah* appear together with Jesus (Mt 17:1-9 par. Mk 9:2-10 and Lk 9:28-36). Various conjectures can be made as to why these OT characters appear. They, like Jesus, fasted for forty days (Ex 24:18; 34:28; 1 Kings 19:8), saw a theophany on "the mountain" (Sinai/Horeb, Ex 19—24; 32—34; 1 Kings 19:8-18) and experienced a remarkable departure from this life (Deut 34:1-6; 2 Kings 2:1-12). Moses and Elijah are also mentioned together in the closing verses of Malachi (Mal 4:4-6). In view of the coming "day of the Lord" Malachi enjoins the people to "remember the Law of Moses my servant, which I commanded him at Horeb" and are promised that the Lord "will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the day of the Lord."

In connection with this appearance of Moses the Synoptics note several parallels between Moses and Jesus. The Transfiguration occurred "after six days" (cf. Ex 24:16, although Luke reads "about eight days"). Jesus ascended a mountain ("a high mountain" in Matthew and Mark, "the mountain" in Luke; cf. Ex 19:3, 20; 24:9-18; 34:24), bringing three disciples* with him (cf. Ex 24:1, 9). We read that Jesus was "transfigured" (Matthew, Mark and Luke), that "the appearance of his face was altered" (Luke) and "his face shone" (Mark; cf. Ex 34:29-35). Moreover, Peter's suggestion to "make three booths" is reminiscent of the booths in the wilderness. The visual and auditory elements also evoke the memory of Moses: "A cloud came and overshadowed them" (cf. Ex 19:9,16; 24:15-18; 34:5); "A voice came out of the cloud" (cf. Ex 24:16); "This is my son; listen to him." Here the heavenly voice identifies Jesus as the prophet-like-Moses promised in Deuteronomy 18:14-19, a passage in which "listening" is the leitmotif throughout (Deut 18:14,15, 16,19). The additional words of Matthew ("with whom I am pleased") and Luke ("my chosen") allude to the suffering servant of Isaiah 42:1: "my chosen one in whom I delight" (see Servant of Yahweh).
Luke notes two other Mosaic parallels. He alone informs us of the subject of Jesus' conversation with Moses and Elijah, who "appeared in glory and spoke of his departure [exodos]." As Moses had led an exodus of liberation, so Jesus would lead his. In addition, Luke tells us that the disciples "were afraid as they entered the cloud" (9:34; cf. Ex 19:16; 20:18-21).

The mere fact that Moses and Elijah appear and converse with Jesus shows that they authenticate his mission. Moreover, the convergence of these parallels indicates that Jesus is being portrayed as a new Moses with a new revelation of God as significant as the Mosaic Law. In view of Jesus' recent revelation that he would suffer rejection (Mt 16:21 par. Mk 8:31 and Lk 9:22), the Transfiguration of Jesus in the company of two OT witnesses affirms him as God's spokesperson nonetheless. The sudden disappearance of Moses and Elijah after the pronouncement of the Father may suggest that Jesus alone will fulfill what they had begun.

2.2. Mountain Typology. Mark and especially Matthew feature the symbol of the mountain, which serves as a place of revelation for Jesus as it had for Moses (see Mountain and Wilderness). In the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:1; 8:1; cf. esp. Ex 19:3; see Sermon on the Mount) and in the antitheses "you have heard that it was said ..., but I tell you" (Mt 5:21-48), Jesus adopts the role of lawgiver-like-Moses. Likewise, the eschatological discourse is given "on the Mount of Olives" (Mt 24:3 par. Mk 13:3; contrast Lk 21:1, 5, 37-38 but note 22:39; see Apocalyptic Teaching). After feeding the five thousand in a "deserted place" (erēmos, the LXX and NT term for the "wilderness/desert" where Israel had wandered and Moses provided manna, Ex 16:1, 3, 10, 14, 32; cf. Deut 8:2; Jn 3:14; 6:31; Acts 7:36), Jesus "went up on the mountain to pray" (Mt 14:13, 15, 23 par. Mk 6:32, 35, 46). Matthew reinforces the parallel to Moses' being alone on Sinai by adding the words "by himself and "he was there alone." Finally, the Great Commission was given from "the mountain where Jesus had told them to go" in Galilee (Mt 28:16; see Resurrection).

The Synoptics also note that it was on a mountain that Jesus appointed his twelve disciples (Mk 3:13-14 par. Lk 6:12-13). Of these disciples it is later said that they "will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Mt 19:28 par. Lk 22:29-30). The Twelve may be reminiscent of the twelve tribes and especially of the twelve tribal leaders (Num 1:4).

2.3. Events in Moses' Life Foreshadowing Jesus' Life. Matthew's telling of jesus' infancy (Mt 2) is similar to that of Moses (see Birth of jesus). The lives of both are threatened by the political leader of the region, who slaughters many innocent children, and both enjoy a narrow escape. Both return to the land of their birth at a divine command, whose wording is very similar (Ex 4:19; Mt 2:20).

John notes two events in Moses' life that foreshadow Jesus' life and work. Moses and the bronze snake (Num 21:8-9) parallels Jesus on the cross in that both are "lifted up" and both yield life from death when looked upon—the difference being that gazing on Jesus produces eternal life (Jn 3:14-15). While Moses gave manna to the people, who later died, the Father gives "the true bread from heaven," which is Jesus and which yields life* eternal (Jn 6:32-35, 49-51, 58; see Bread).

Other key Mosaic motifs, such as the Passover lamb whose bones are not to be broken (Ex 12:46; Num 9:12; cf. Jn 19:36) and "the blood of the covenant" (Ex 24:8; cf. Mt 26:28 par. Mk 14:24 and Lk 22:20), foreshadow Jesus' sacrificial death, although explicit reference to the person of Moses is lacking.

2.4. Moses Foretells Christ Both Luke and John claim that Moses foretold the Christ. According to Luke 24:25, 27, Moses may be classified among the prophets. The claim that Moses foretold Christ's sufferings (Lk 24:26-27, 44-46) seems remarkable since the Pentateuch contains no such explicit prophecy. The answer to this problem may be found in the other half of Luke-Acts, where in Stephen's speech the Deutero-nomic promise of a "prophet like Moses" (Deut 18:15) appears in the context of the people's rejection of Moses (Acts 7:35-39; cf. Peter's sermon in Acts 3:18,22-23). As Moses the prophet was rejected by his own people, so was Jesus. It is, in fact, a distinctive emphasis of Deuteronomy that Moses suffered Yahweh's anger (vicariously?) solely on account of the people (Deut 1:37; 3:26; 4:21; 34:4; contrast Num 20:12). Luke's account of the Transfiguration may also imply a connection between the prophet-like-Moses and experience of suffering rejection. Only Luke records that Moses spoke with Jesus of his impending "exodus" in Jerusalem (Lk 9:31). Both before and after this announcement of Jesus as the Deuteronomic Moses-like prophet (Lk 9:35; see 2.1. above), Jesus reveals that he will be rejected in Jerusalem (Lk 9:22, 4345).

Equally remarkable in Luke 24:26-27, 4446 is the claim that Moses foretold that Christ* should "enter into his glory" and "rise (anastēnai) from the dead." A closer investigation of Yahweh's promise to Moses that "I will raise up for them a prophet like you" (Deut 18:15, 18) shows that the LXX translates the Hebrew verb qûm (Hiphil, "to raise up") with anastēsō/ei ("to raise up"), which is also used of Jesus' resurrection* in the NT. Elsewhere in Luke, Jesus claims that Moses spoke of resurrection in the book of Exodus: "That the dead are raised, even Moses showed" (Lk 20:37 referring to Ex 3:6; cf. Mk 12:26; Mt 22:31-32; also note Lk 16:29-31).

In the Fourth Gospel Jesus' disciples claim that Moses foretold his coming (Jn 1:45). While the Jews assert a clear either/or distinction between being a disciple of Moses or of Jesus (Jn 9:28-29), Jesus asserts that Moses in fact wrote about him and that Moses will thus be their accuser (Jn 5:45-46). (Similarly, in Mt 23:2-3 Jesus faults the Pharisees not with propagating the authority of Moses, which Jesus apparently endorses, but with their failing to "practice what they preach.") That the priests and Levites expected "the Prophet" to come is evident from the question they pose John the Baptist (Jn 1:21, 25; see John the Baptist). (Note that these verses distinguish the Messiah, Elijah and the Prophet as separate figures: cf. Jn 7:40-41; and note Mt 16:14-16 par. Mk 8:28-29 and Lk 9:19-20.) In fact, some of the people, after seeing Jesus' miracles* (Jn 6:14) and hearing his words (Jn 7:40), confess that he is "the Prophet"

3. Conclusion.

With Jeremias we must affirm that "Moses is for later Judaism the most important figure in salvation history thus far," but at the same time "the Moses/Christ typology did not exercise a central or controlling influence on NT Christology" (Jeremias 849, 873; see further 849-64 for the development of the Moses tradition in Judaism*—esp. the Messiah as a second Moses, along with contrasts and comparisons with the NT). The points of contact between Moses and Jesus noted in the Gospels are points of continuity. Each figure endorses the other, but Jesus is presented as one greater than Moses. In the Synoptics this is especially clarified in the Transfiguration, where both Moses and the heavenly voice endorse Jesus' work and where Jesus alone remains to fulfill God's work. In John's Gospel, while Moses' work is recognized as providing life out of death, Jesus' provides eternal life (note also the implied contrast in Jn 1:17).

Both Matthew and Luke move beyond Mark in amplifying Moses' foreshadowing of Jesus. Matthew alone draws parallels between their birth narratives and highlights the mountain motif as the place where both mediated between God and the people. In the Synoptic account of the Transfiguration Luke alone notes that Jesus' death and resurrection should be seen as a kind of Mosaic Exodus. And only Luke indicates that much of Jesus' post-resurrection teaching consisted of explaining how Moses' teaching prophetically spoke of the Christ's sufferings and glory.*

John's Gospel is also clear that Moses foretold Jesus' coming. John makes explicit what is only implicit in the Synoptic account of Jesus' feeding of the five thousand; his Gospel presents the event as a parallel to Moses' providing manna. He also uniquely parallels Moses' lifting up the bronze snake and Jesus' being lifted up on the cross.

MOUNT OF OLIVES. Set Apocalyptic Teach-INC; GETHSEMANE; MOUNTAIN AND WILDERNESS

MOUNTAIN AND WILDERNESS

In the Gospels geographical facts are the vehicles of literary and theological ideas. What matters primarily is not on which mountain or in what part of the wilderness any particular event occurred but the typological or symbolic significance of a given loca-tion.

1. Mountain
2. Wilderness

1. Mountain.

Most of the mountains in the Gospels carry theological meaning because they can be related to (1) Sinai; (2) speculation about Zion; or (3) the eschatological prophecy in Zechariah 14:4 about the Mount of Olives.

1.1. Terminology. In the LXX and Josephus* to oros can mean not only "(the) mountain" but also "mountainous area" or "(the) hill country." But "(the) mountain" is the more common meaning of the Greek expression, and as there were other words available for "mountainous area" and "(the) hill country," and as in several Gospel texts to oros must mean "(the) mountain" (e.g., Mt 5:14; 17:1), it seems best to render to oros consistently by "(the) mountain."

1.2. Jewish Background. In Jewish literature mountains are associated with numerous themes, including power (Jer 51:25; Dan 2:45), revelation (Jub. 1:2-4; 2 Apoc. Bar. 13:1), antiquity (Prov 8:25; Job 15:7), eternity (Gen 49:26; Ps 125:1) and pagan religion (Is 14:13; 16:12). But the most important fact is that several mountains were the scenes of theophanies and/or played crucial roles in salvation-history, as the names Moriah, Nebo/Pisgah, Carmel and especially Sinai and Zion attest. Around the latter two there gathered relatively well-defined clusters of motifs (Sinai: Moses,* wilderness, Law*-giving; Zion: kingship, Jerusalem,* Temple,* inviolability).

While Sinai only occasionally appears in material about the latter days (e.g., in 1 Enoch 1:4 it is the place of future judgment and in Liv. Proph. Jer. 11 —19 the ark and the saints will be gathered to Sinai, where they shall be protected), Zion is prominent in Jewish eschatology.* In the OT and elsewhere Zion is to be the place of Israel's congregating (Jer 31:1-25; Tob 14:5-7), the goal of the Gentiles' pilgrimage (Is 2:2-3; Zech 2:6-12), the site from which the eschatological Torah will be promulgated (Is 2:2-3; Mic 4:2), the location of the enthronement of God or his representative (Mic 4:6-7; Pss. Sol. 17:21-46) and the home of the new temple (Jub. 1:29).

1.3. Jesus' Ministry. The following Gospel texts place Jesus on a mountain: Matthew 4:8; 5:1; 14:23 par. Mark 6:46; Matthew 15:29; 17:1 par. Mark 9:2 and Luke 9:28; Matthew 21:1 par. Mark 11:1; Matthew 24:3 par. Mark 13:3; Matthew 26:30 par. Mark 14:26 and Luke 22:39; Matthew 28:16; Mark 3:13 par. Luke 6:12; Mark 5:5, 11 par. Luke 8:32; Luke 4:29; 21:37; John 6:3, 15; 8:1. Christian tradition has repeatedly sought to identify the several unnamed mountains in these texts (e.g., Tabor has been thought the site of the Transfiguration*). It is not possible, however, to link more than a very few events with known mountains, at least with any degree of probability. The Gospels explicitly identify only three mountains: the Mount of Olives (Mk 11:1; 13:3; 14:26), the hill on which Nazareth was situated (Lk 4:29) and Mount Gerizim (Jn 4:20-21; see Archeology and Geography).

Given the regularity with which the Gospel tradition, in all its strands (Mk, Q* M,* L,* Jn), has Jesus on a mountain, the association may be accepted as historical. Perhaps Jesus sometimes retired to mountains for solitude. It is also just possible that mountains held some symbolic or theological significance in his own thinking; but no specifics can be credibly hazarded.

1.4. Parallels with Sinai. In accordance with the conviction that Jesus fulfilled the oracle of Deuteronomy 18:15,18 (cf. Acts 3:22-23), the Gospel writers and those who passed on the tradition before them drew parallels between Jesus and Moses. In this way Sinai made its presence felt. For instance, in Matthew 17, Mark 9 and Luke 9, Jesus is transfigured on a "high mountain." This recalls Sinai. Sinai was thought to have been "high" (Philo Vit. Mos. 2.70; Josephus Ant. 3.76), and there are numerous parallels between Mark 9:2-9 par. and traditions about Moses on Sinai (see especially Ex 24 and 34). Both Jesus and Moses were transfigured by light; both were accompanied by a select group of three and both went up on the seventh day. In addition, both transfigurations were associated with a descending cloud; in both incidents a voice came forth from that cloud and in both cases those who saw the radiant figure became afraid. Furthermore, Moses and Elijah,* who appeared and conversed with the transfigured Jesus (see Transfiguration), are the only OT figures of whom it is related that they spoke with God on Sinai. Clearly the Gospel story was told in such a fashion as to call to mind the theophany on Sinai. (This holds for all three Synoptic accounts.)

Matthew 5:1 ("and going up on a mountain he sat down") and 8:1 ("coming down from the mountain") are also illuminated by Sinai. Not only does the wording of the Greek sentences resemble OT texts about Moses (e.g., Ex 19:3; 32:1; 34:29; Deut 9:9 LXX), but the Sermon on the Mount* follows a series of events which is closely paralleled in the story of Moses as it is known from Scripture, Josephus* and other sources (e.g., prophecy of Israel's savior, a father's uncertainty about his wife's pregnancy, the slaughter of Jewish infants by a wicked Gentile king, a return from exile after those seeking the savior's life have died, crossing of the waters/baptism* [cf. 1 Cor 10:1-5], temptation* in the wilderness for forty years/days); and in some Jewish texts Moses sits on Sinai (Ezekiel the Tragedian, Exagōgē 67-82; b. Meg. 21a-b; b. Sota 49a; the notion is based on a possible translation of Deut 9:9 MT: "and I sat on the mountain forty days and forty nights"). The Sermon on the Mount is obviously some sort of counterpart to the giving of the Law on Sinai.

John 6:3 reads: "Jesus went up to the mountain and sat down there with his disciples" (cf. 6:15, where Jesus is alone on the mountain; this is reminiscent of Ex 24:2; 34:3 LXX). This verse, which so closely resembles Matthew 5:1-2 and its OT parallels, heads a chapter filled with explicit correlations between Jesus and Moses. Here too, then, Jesus on the mountain is like Moses on Sinai. In this way it is plain that Jesus fulfilled the eschatological expectations of Judaism,* according to which the last redeemer (Messiah*) will be like the first redeemer (Moses; cf. also Mk 3:13?).

1.5. Zion Typology. In Matthew 15:29 Jesus goes up and sits on a mountain (cf. 5:1-2). This mountain is a place of gathering, healing* and feeding. Also, 15:30-31 may well allude to Isaiah 35:5-6, part of an eschatological prophecy concerning Zion (cf. Origen Comm. Mt. 11:18). All this suggests a Mount Zion typology (see Donaldson). In Jewish expectation Zion is the eschatological gathering site of Israel (see section 1.2), a place of healing (Is 35:5-6; cf. Mic 4:6-7) and the location of the messianic feast (Is 25:6-10; Pesiq. R. 41.5). Matthew 15:29-38 seemingly interprets the ministry of Jesus as the fulfillment of the Jewish hopes surrounding Zion.

How does this relate to the fact that elsewhere in Matthew the mountain motif is so clearly linked to Sinai (see section 1.4)? Already in the OT Sinai and Zion are closely associated, as in Psalm 68, and this is true also in later Jewish tradition (e.g., Liv. Proph.Jer. 11-19; Tg. Neof. Ex 4:27; Midr. Bab. Ps 68:9). A key text in this regard is Isaiah 2:2-3: "Torah shall go forth out of Zion." Here Mount Zion functions as the eschatological Sinai, the mountain of the Law. In view of this, the Sinai and Zion parallels should not be set over against each other. The two go hand in hand. Both make Jesus the eschatological counterpart of Moses.

It is sometimes suggested that Matthew 5:14 ("a city set on a mountain cannot be hid") has in view eschatological Zion or the New Jerusalem. It was expected that Zion would be raised to a great height and shed its light throughout the whole world (Is 2:2-4; 60:1-22; Sib. Or. 5:420-23). But the reference is uncertain. The verse is perfectly understandable without it referring to any particular city, and the wording lacks a definite article ("a city"). Furthermore, the parallel in 5:15 (one does not hide a lamp under a lampstand) speaks against the proposal: any lamp would fit the bill.
1.6. The Mount of Olives. Zechariah 14:4 reads: "In that day his feet will stand on the Mount of Olives . . . and the Mount of Olives will be split in two from east to west ..." This eschatological prophecy makes Jesus' choice of the Mount of Olives as the site for his eschatological discourse (Mk 13 par.) appropriate (note also Acts 1:11, which links the Parousia and the Mount of Olives). But there may also be an allusion to Zechariah's prophecy in Mark 11:23 (true belief can cast "this mountain" into the sea). In its context 11:23 could allude to the Mount of Olives (cf. Mk 11:1) and so to Zechariah 14:4, which foresees the splitting of that mountain. One additionally wonders whether Matthew 27:51-53 does not draw on Zechariah 14:4 (interpreted, as in the Targum,* as a prophecy of the resurrection*). In both texts there is a resurrection of the dead immediately outside Jerusalem, an earthquake occurs, the same verb is used (schizō, "to split," in the passive) and the resurrected ones are called hoi hagioi ("the holy ones").

1.7. A Literary Function in Matthew. The mountain in Matthew 4:8 (the Lukan parallel, presumably following Q, has no mountain) serves a literary function. It relates a scene near the beginning of the Gospel to the Gospel's conclusion. In 4:8 the devil (see Demon, Devil, Satan), on a mountain, offers Jesus, who has yet to suffer and die, all the kingdoms of the world. But in 28:16-20, again on a mountain, Jesus, who has been crucified,* declares himself to have all authority* in heaven and earth. The lesson, made plain by Matthew's redactional insertion of a mountain into the two scenes, is that only after the passion,* and only from God, can Jesus accept legitimate authority.

2. Wilderness.

The wilderness is significant primarily because of its association with New Exodus themes.

2.1. Terminology. In the Gospels he eremos refers to an abandoned or uncultivated place, not necessarily a desert. In the LXX the word translates several Hebrew equivalents, including midbār, "rābâ and negeb—words with different shades of meaning.

2.2. Jewish Background. The Law was handed down in the wilderness of Sinai, and the entry into the promised land was preceded by Israel's desert wanderings. Thus, despite the tradition of disobedience and murmuring in the desert and the fact that there is no nomadic or desert ideal in the OT, the time in the wilderness was sometimes described in glowing terms (e.g., Is 63:11-14). Moreover, it came to be held that a return to the wilderness and a Second Exodus would herald the messianic age, and the blessings of the new age were moved to the period of the wandering and vice versa—not unnatural developments given that the desert had been a place of revelation and Israel's constitution. Pertinent texts include Isaiah 35:1-2; 40:3-5; Hosea 2:14-23; Ezekiel 20:33-44; 1QS 8:12-16; Revelation 12:6, 13-14.

That the expectation of a return to the desert could be taken literally is shown by the activity of the Jews at Qumran (they chose to dwell in the desert in fulfillment of Is 40:3-4; see Dead Sea Scrolls), by the behavior of certain so-called prophets (Josephus, J. W. 2.259, 261; 6.351; 7.438) and by the warning in Matthew 24:26.

2.3. Jesus' Ministry. Jesus, like John the Baptist* (Mt 11:7; Lk 7:24; Mk 1:3-4; Jn 1:23), spent time in the wilderness (Mt 4:1 par. Mk 1:12 and Lk 4:1; Mt 14:13, 15 par. Mk 6:31-32, 35 and Lk 9:12; Mk 1:35 par. Lk 4:42; Mk 1:45 par. Lk 5:16; Jn 11:54). The motivation for withdrawal was probably not to enact a New Exodus (although this is a possible explanation of John's behavior) but simply a desire to escape on occasion the crowds and the demands of ministry. This would concur with the tradition stating that Jesus' retreats to the wilderness were occasions for prayer* (Mk 1:35; Lk 5:16).

2.4. New Exodus. The theme of returning to the wilderness in fulfillment of eschatological expectation dominates Mark 1:1-13. John dwells in the wilderness and calls Israel thence to be baptized. He is the fulfillment of Isaiah 40:3 LXX (a voice crying in the wilderness). Jesus himself first appears in the wilderness and there undergoes temptation.* In addition, two of the three OT texts combined in verses 2-3 (Ex 23:20; Mal 3:1; Is 40:3) have to do with the wilderness tradition (Ex 23:20 is about an angelic guardian [see Angels] and guide for the desert, and Is 40:3 explicitly refers to the desert). The concentrated focus on the wilderness means that the story of Jesus begins as a Second Exodus. Beginning and end mirror one another (cf. 1 Cor 10:1-5).

The theme would seem to be continued in Mark 6:30-44, where Jesus in the wilderness gives rest (cf. Deut 3:20; 12:9-10) and feeds the people (cf. Ex 16; Num 11). There are several other parallels here between Jesus and Moses (e.g., Mk 6:34 recalls Num 27:17), and one suspects that Mark intended 6:30-44 to call to mind Exodus 16 and Numbers 11: like Moses Jesus fed Israel in the wilderness. (That Jesus himself had similar thoughts has sometimes been suggested but cannot be affirmed or denied: the data are quite insufficient.)

Whether Matthew and Luke saw a New Exodus theme in the feeding of the five thousand is not so clear. But in John 6:31 and 49, in a discourse following the miraculous feeding, reference is made to Israel eating manna "in the desert" (cf. 3:14). It is true that the Fourth Evangelist places the feeding near a mountain (6:3), not "in the wilderness." But John 6:3 alludes to Sinai (see section 1.4. above), and Sinai and the wilderness were firmly linked ("the wilderness of Sinai" being a fixed expression) and in some contexts "the mountain(s)" and "the wilderness" were almost interchangeable (note Mt 18:12 par. Lk 15:4). So the story in John 6 apparently takes place in the wilderness, and the explicit reference to the desert in verses 31 and 49 means that the theme of the eschatological return to the wilderness is present.

We have already observed (see section 1.4) that Matthew 1—8 draws extensive correlations between the story of Moses and the Exodus and the story of Jesus. Here we may note that Israel’s time in the wilderness has its parallel in Matthew 3—4, where Jesus in the wilderness passes through the waters of baptism and then enters the desert to undergo temptation. Once again the wilderness setting is at the service of the New Exodus motif.

2.5. The Wilderness and Demons. In the temptation narratives Jesus confronts Satan in the wilderness. In Luke 8:29 we are told that the Gerasene demoniac was driven into the desert by a demon. And in Matthew 12:43-45 and its parallel Luke 11:24-26 the unclean spirit who has been cast out "passes through waterless places." These texts are illumined by the Jewish belief that the wilderness, being beyond the bounds of society, is the haunt of evil spirits (see Lev 16:10; Is 13:21; I Enoch 10:4-5; Tob 8:3; 4 Macc 18:8; 2 Apoc. Bar. 10:8; see Demon, Devil, Satan). The idea dominated later Christian monasticism.

MYTH

Myth is a term of at best doubtful relevance to the study of Jesus and the Gospels. The basic problem lies in defining the word itself, since the definition used will determine not only its relevance but also point to the solution of the further problems it poses.

1. Defining "Myth"
2. D. F. Strauss
3. R. Bultmann
4. Myth and Miracle
5. Myth and Midrash

1. Defining "Myth."

In current study of religion the usage of "myth" tends to be restricted to the following sense: a narrative of origins, a study of the beginning of all things, a story of primordial time. If that is taken to be the primary meaning it obviously will have little or no relevance to the study of Jesus and the Gospels.

However, that primary meaning leads at once into secondary meanings. For a myth is also a story of beginnings, of fundamental events, told to explain current beliefs and practices. It narrates the origin of the world in order to inform as to what is (still) basic to the world. Moreover, a myth tells a story of a time before all history, of a time beyond the reach of recordable history. Not only so, but a myth typically speaks of gods and superhuman beings and is an attempt to express the human sense of the sacred in words.

With these attenuated meanings the possibility of "myth" becoming a relevant category increases. For the Gospels are about beginnings, events which remain fundamental for Christianity. They narrate events—virginal conception, miracles,* resurrection*—which can properly be said to transcend history. And some of the stories involve angels* and demons {see Demon, Devil, Satan), and all are about one whom Christians recognize as God* incarnate.

Such a use of "myth" carries an immediate corollary: "myth" is something other than "history," and is defined in large part by that contrast. Thus the definition of myth depends on the definition of history. And history from its earliest usage (the Greek word, historia) has denoted knowledge or information obtained by systematic observation. It follows that the more positive the weight given to "history," the more negative the sense of "myth." Consequently, myth may mean anything from an untrue or unbelievable story (history as the measure of what is believable), through the sense of a narrative embodying unverifiable claims (history as the study of the verifiable), to the sense of that which expresses truths beyond the reach of history (history as limited to analysis of the observable).

If "myth" is to be used as a category in the study of Jesus and the Gospels, therefore, two preliminary points must always be made: (1) The term is not being used in its (current) primary sense; and (2) its precise force depends on the meaning and scope attributed to "history."

The fact that "myth" even appears here as a subject related to the study of Jesus and the Gospels can be attributed almost entirely to the use made of the term by two NT scholars.

In the nineteenth century "myth" came into prominence as a category to describe the miraculous in the Gospels, first with regard to the virginal conception and resurrection of Jesus. Since "myth" was used as a category to describe the foundational stories of other religions, including miraculous births and the like, why should it be withheld from the equivalent stories about Jesus? So the reasoning ran. This attitude was the corollary to a growing confidence in history as able to ascertain "what really happened."

D. F. Strauss (1808-1874) extended the use of "myth" to cover all the miraculous in the Gospels. He also shifted the focus of myth from the story of a miraculous occurrence to the story of a miraculous occurrence. For him myth was the expression or embodiment of an idea—not in a historical event (history cannot observe a miracle, only claims to a miracle) but in a narrative. In the case of the Gospels the idea or conviction was the messiahship of Jesus. The stories were the vehicles by which that idea was expressed. Their unhistorical character (the burden of Strauss's exegesis) should simply focus attention the more firmly on their principal function: to express Christian belief in the messiahship of Jesus.

With Strauss the category of miracle in the Gospels was thus completely transformed from something positive (a proof of Jesus' messiahship) to something problematic (the claim to miracle more disconcerting to the historian's critical scrutiny than the claim to messiahship). In previous centuries such accounts had raised few questions for those who took for granted a continuous traffic between heaven and earth, between the spiritual and the natural, between God, spiritual powers and creation. But now the realm of the observable had begun to determine the scope of the reasonable. For a history concerned with the (in principle) observable trail of cause-and-effect events, the suggestion that observable events might be caused by the intervention of forces from outside the historian's range of observation had to be treated as an explanation of last resort. In reality such an explanation was unnecessary in virtually every case, since other explanations from within observable history could be found which were quite sufficient to account for the facts. So in Strauss's case the theory of myth became a way of explaining the stories of miracles in the Gospels without recourse to miraculous events.

Strauss's contribution was fundamentally flawed therefore in that his critique depended both on the older concept of miracle (divine intervention in human affairs) and on the then-young historical method confident of its ability to determine facts in a wholly objective way. On the more positive side, his focusing on the narrative rather than on the historical events behind the narrative gave a greater priority to the text itself than to the work of historical reconstruction. And in so doing, he brought firmly into play the recognition that factors other than an unvarnished desire to record bare facts will have come into play. Of lasting value is his still valid insight that a claim to miracle may simply divert attention from the purpose intended by the story of the miracle, leading to a focus on the problem of the claimed miracle itself.

3. R. Bultmann.

A century after Strauss, R. Bultmann (1884-1976) revived the category of myth as a tool in interpreting the NT. His definition of the concept, however, was very imprecise and his use of it rather idiosyncratic. Nevertheless, his 1941 essay was exceedingly influential in the post-war hermeneutical debate and poses issues of continuing significance.

For Bultmann myth is not simply about miracle or a story of miracle. It is rather about the way in which reality as a whole is conceived. In specific terms, myth is a primitive, pre-scientific way of conceptualizing reality. The pejorative note is clear ("primitive"). The ancients conceived of the cosmos as a three-storied structure, with events on earth attributable to spiritual powers from above (or below) and mental disorders attributable to the activity of demons. That world view has been long superseded and is no longer even possible for the products of a modern scientific education. "It is impossible to use electric light and the wireless and to avail ourselves of modern medical and surgical discoveries, and at the same time to believe in the New Testament world of demons and spirits" (Bultmann, 5).

It is important to grasp at once that Bultmann's concern here was primarily apologetic. It is obvious that he shared in an uncritical way the presumption of pre-Einsteinian physics that the cosmos was a closed continuum of cause and effect which would sooner or later yield up all its secrets to the all-conquering march of scientific inquiry. But his designation of the ancient world view as mythical was not simply a reflection of the modern disparaging the primitive. It was also a way of removing the mythical from the realm of the scientific and objective. If the Gospel miracles are not scientific descriptions of maladies or cures, then they are about something else, a something else not vulnerable to objective analysis or scientific reductionism. Bultmann's endeavor was therefore aimed at expounding this "something else."

Here the further dimension of Bultmann's understanding of myth becomes crucial. For him myth was not simply the ancients' way of conceptualizing the world. It was their way of expressing their experience of reality. The early Christians' understanding of the death and resurrection of Jesus, in particular, was their way of expressing the gospel,* that is, their experience of the gospel. This is the "something else" which comes to mythical expression in the miraculous accounts of the Gospels—namely, the kerygma, the gospel proclaimed and realized in the experience of faith.*

This understanding of myth leads immediately into Bultmann's program of demythologizing. For Bultmann this is not to be understood as stripping away the mythical expression of the gospel, as though an objective gospel or objective facts would thereby be left exposed to view. For that would leave the gospel once again vulnerable to scientific scrutiny and verification. Worse still, it would miss the character of myth as expressing the initial experience of the gospel. Demythologizing is rather a matter of experiencing again the gospel and of re-expressing that encounter in the conceptuality of today, though never in such a way that the gospel becomes a mere object For Bultmann that was only possible in a Christian form of existentialist philosophy. But his apologetic concern retains validity even though his particular solution has not provided a lasting answer.

Strauss and Bultmann were children of their time, both in posing myth as a problem and in the solutions they offered. But the issues they highlighted have to be dealt with in our own terms.

A common feature in the previous sections is the contrast between myth and history—myth as doing something which history does not and cannot do. Traditionally that contrast has given myth a negative connotation, because history was presented as very positive. To say a Gospel miracle is "unhistorical" is generally reckoned, understandably, a very negative judgment. But if history is a more limited discipline, confined in scope to the observable and ascertainable, then language is needed to describe a more penetrating analysis which goes beyond these limits. In which case it becomes possible to retain myth in a positive sense to describe what goes beyond history, even when it speaks of events which are also historical. All this becomes important in a day when history is no longer seen as simply delivering objective information, but as depending on subjective judgment and as involving some kind of two-way encounter between historians and their sources. Here myth can retain a place of considerable importance, even if as a shorthand for the historian's ideological presuppositions, world view, assumptions regarding the beginnings and stuff of reality. In the particular case of miracle, the greater humility of modern physical scientists is also an important factor. For if the cosmos as a system is not closed, even if only at the edges, new possibilities are opened up for conceptualizing influences acting within and upon that system. And if a unified field theory is achievable only at the level of the cosmos in its totality, the Christian may be forgiven for suggesting that God seems to provide the missing factor to complete the equation. In which case "miracle" becomes a category once again by which such influences within and from "beyond" the system can be described, with "angels" and "demons" simply older conceptualizations of such influences appropriate to an earlier stage of human understanding.

A further weakness of the historical method is that it cannot cope with the wholly unique. Historical judgment depends so much on comparing like with like and on analogy ("this is how people generally react in such circumstances") that the tendency is always to discount any unusual or unique features. But Christian claims for Jesus major precisely on his uniqueness. And the whole point of Christianity's central claim, that Jesus was raised from the dead, is that he alone has so conquered death. Myth here could be an appropriate category, not simply because history cannot reach beyond death, but also because in this case it is dealing with a primary event By which I mean (the account of) a happening which explains other events but which is not explained by them. The very (historical) fact that it was the category of eschatological (see Eschatology) resurrection which was used from the beginning, rather than, say, visions of the dead Jesus, or translation to heaven or even survival of the soul, points in this direction.

Bultmann's program of demythologizing also retains some validity, at least to the extent that it highlights the problem of translating from one culture and world of meaning to another. Translation of the Gospels is not simply a matter of finding the English (or whatever) words and idioms most nearly equivalent to the original Greek. It is also a matter (in pulpit and study group and classroom) of translating what was not simply expressed but also experienced within one way of conceptualizing reality into the expressions of contemporary experience (including religious experience). And that may not be as straightforward as it sounds. The classic example here is the ascension* of Jesus. The very word ascension ("going up") is an expression of an assumption that heaven is "up there." To demythologize the ascension is not to deny that Jesus "went to heaven"; it is simply to find a way of expressing this in language which takes it out of the realm of current or future space research.

5. Myth and Midrash.

Finally, it is important to remember that the word myth is most properly used when it means a story or account, whether of supernatural agents or of miraculous events. And a story which embodies and expresses claims which cannot be expressed in any other way. Here the closeness of myth's likeness to history has been misleading. Myth in fact is the equivalent in words of the sacred place and sacred ritual in religion, and so is closer to poetry, say, than to history (bearing in mind, of course, that poetry can also serve a historical function).

Here we recall the lasting value of Strauss's otherwise destructive contribution. To say the Gospel miracle stories are myth is to recognize that they are more than history. To reduce them to a record of historical facts, then, is to lose their point and, as Bultmann saw so clearly, to make the gospel they express vulnerable to scientific dispute. That there is something important here has been confirmed by the fuller exegetical recognition of what may simply be called "midrashic" features in the various Gospel accounts (see Midrash). That is, accounts which function in at least some degree as expositions of OT Scriptures, as drawing their significance from these Scriptures and as told in such a way as to make this significance clear to the readers who know their Scriptures.

The clearest example is probably Matthew's account of the temptations of Jesus (see Temptation of Jesus), which may properly be described as a sort of midrash on Deuteronomy 6—8 (Mt 4:1-11). But the birth narratives (see Birth of Jesus) seem also to be modelled in part at least on such OT figures as Abraham* and Sarah and the parents of Samuel, and the story of the magi is in some measure built around Numbers 24:17. To take one other example, the echoes of the story of Jonah in the account of the stilling of the storm can hardly be denied (Mk 4:35-41). In each case stories are being told not solely, or perhaps even primarily, to convey historical information. They are being told to evoke this response: Here is the one who triumphed where Israel failed, who fulfilled ancient prophecy, who is greater than Jonah. Likewise, the different conclusions to the story of the walking on the water in Matthew and Mark serve as clear indications that the narrators have their own (and different) points to make (Mt 14:33 par. Mk 6:51-2). In the Fourth Gospel such notes as John 2:11, the potent use made of such symbols as water* and light,* and the intermeshing of miracle and discourse, are even clearer indicators that John tells his stories of Jesus' miracles not so much as proof, but more as demonstration ("signs") of Jesus' status and of the significance of his ministry.

In all this the power of such stories is the power of poetry and symbol. And "myth" remains a possible way of indicating that potency. This is not to say that myth and history are outright and mutually exclusive opposites. On the contrary, as poetry and symbol speak to rational mind as well as to emotion and spirit, so myth can also communicate history; or, perhaps better, a story can contain both myth and history. The point of recognizing mythical elements in a Gospel story, however, is to insist that its full significance can neither be found solely at the straightforward historical level nor, therefore, be disputed by purely historical analysis. In other words, to say "myth" is not to say "untrue." As prose history is not the only way to express historical truth, so there are other ways of expressing the truth of Jesus than through the medium of historical narrative. If "myth" helps to express this important insight, then perhaps it has some continuing relevance for the study of Jesus and the Gospels after all.

Exegesis is the art and science of interpreting biblical texts. Normally exegesis takes the form of an exposition of the text: linguistic, historical, literary, theological and—nowadays—sociological, psychological or political. Narrative exegesis contains similar elements but takes the form of a story instead of an exposition. Though the story is in some respects a fiction, it is constructed on the basis of many small pieces of evidence. To do justice to narrative exegesis it is necessary to consider influences upon it, examples of it and characteristics it possesses.

1. Influences on Narrative Exegesis
2. Examples of Narrative Exegesis
3. Characteristics of Narrative Exegesis

1. Influences on Narrative Exegesis.

What has influenced biblical scholars to adopt this mode of presenting their findings? While indirectly the growing interest in sociological* and literary* approaches to the NT set the scene for the development of narrative exegesis, of themselves these have not been sufficient to produce it

1.1. Sociological Analysis. Sociological enquiry into the NT has produced a thicker description of the broader, everyday first-century context of the Gospels and which the Gospels themselves reflect. We now know more about, and can more accurately interpret, the setting of Jesus and his first followers. This lays the basis for a fuller description of the way in which both Jesus and the early Christians interacted with, and were shaped by, their social and cultural environment. As a result we are in a better position to see what it was like to walk and talk in the first century.
1.2. Literary Analysis. The renewed interest in a literary approach to the NT includes a stronger appreciation of the role, intention and character of stories and storytelling. The Gospels have provided a focus for much of this work, not just individual pericopes or particular features of Jesus' teaching such as parables* or miracles,* but also the Gospels as a whole, read as integrated narratives. This contemporary interest in narrative elements in the Bible, in structural analysis of texts and in reader-response theories opens up the possibility of interpreting the Bible in a way that resonates with its form as well as its content.

2. Examples of Narrative Exegesis.

Although sociological and literary investigations have provided a background for the development of narrative exegesis, the key motivation among those engaged in it seems to have been the desire to communicate the results of their research more effectively.

In recent years several disciplines have stressed the fundamental role of story in human understanding, both for the individual and community. This emphasis can be found in anthropological, psychological and philosophical studies. While interest in stories has always been pan of pedagogy and homiletics, mostly it has been their secondary illustrative character that has been discussed, rather than their integral or elemental character.

Again, while various experiments in biblical fiction writing have been conducted (e.g., the unashamedly popular writings of Lloyd Douglas, the more literary works of Howard Fast, the philosophical novels of Nikos Kazantzakis), these have not been designed chiefly for historical instruction and have generally contained a considerable amount of fabrication. (Cinematic reconstructions along similar lines, viz., so-called biblical epics and other films, could also be discussed.) Mention should also be made here of the imaginative reconstructions of biblical passages for devotional purposes, a tradition that stretches back to Thomas à Kempis and is carried on today by M. Kel-sey and others.

However, these approaches to learning theory or story-telling do not appear to have directly stimulated those who have carried out narrative exegesis. Their decision to do so seems to have arisen from more practical considerations, such as the desire to communicate the results of scholarly investigation in a more graphic way, for a broader lay audience, in a more holistic fashion or to engage hearers more personally with the text. Some of these examples of narrative exegesis first came to expression in workshops or addresses before taking written form.

Beginning in the late 1970s, the main experiments in narrative exegesis have been carried out independently of one another in various countries and with different constituencies in view. Alongside a few representations of OT exegesis, the first examples concentrating on the NT focused chiefly on class tensions (W. Hollenweger) and churchgoing generally (R Banks). Attention to the Gospels concentrated first on miracle-stories (W. Hollenweger) and attitudes to children (H.-R Weber) but has since, in the most extended exercise in narrative exegesis yet to appear, concerned itself with the impact of Jesus on his contemporaries (G. Theissen).

3. Characteristics of Narrative Exegesis.

According to G. Theissen, "The basic structure of narrative exegesis consists of historical reconstructions of patterns of behavior, conflicts and tensions, and its superstructure consists of fictitious events in which historical source material is worked over in a poetic way" (19). These two aspects of the enterprise require further elaboration.

In the first instance the narrative exegete approaches the task no differently from any other scholarly investigation of biblical texts. Traditional textual, linguistic and historico-critical methods are all utilized, though more attention may be accorded to sociological—and increasingly anthropological and psychological—approaches as well. It is especially this second group which provides a fuller understanding of the ethos and context of the original situation described in the Gospels, and also shapes perceptions of divergences between the first-century cultural world and our own.

Instead of presenting this material as an ordered discussion of evidence and its interpretation, narrative exegesis weave their findings into a story. While this contains a partially fictional element, if responsibly conducted, it will have its basis in first-century materials. At this stage various devices may be employed, such as third-person description, memories of a participant, eyewitness reports of an outsider. The stories may also contain other compositional devices such as the building of tension, a climatic confrontation, the resolution of differences. At this level there is always the danger of artificial characterization, inadequate plotting or propagandist writing. But where these are largely avoided there are also substantial gains in vividness of presentation and reader involvement. Importandy, narrative exegesis is accessible to the broadest range of people, sometimes even children, yet allows each to engage with the material at the level most appropriate to them.

NAZARENE

1. The Problem
2. The Gospel Data
3. Proposed Solutions
4. A Linguistic Solution

1. The Problem.

The English term Nazarene renders two Greek words, nazarenos and nazōraios. Grammatically speaking, both are apparently gentilic adjectives, that is, adjectives derived from a proper noun. The first form is a type of gentilic almost unknown from earlier Greek, although it is represented in the Gospels by several examples—such as "Magdalene"—and in approximately contemporary Greek documents found near the Dead Sea. By virtue of its unexplained development it is somewhat problematic, but any problems related to this form pale in comparison with those touching nazōraios.
In both cases the central problem concerns the relationship of the Greek form to a putative underlying Aramaic gentilic meaning "the man from Nazareth." Given the Semitic name for Nazareth, Nos’rat or Naṣṣeret—known only from postbiblical texts—the expected Aramaic form would be nāṣrāyā/nāṣrā’ā. From either possibility we would anticipate Greek renderings of nasarēnos and nasaraioi. What then is the explanation and significance of the aberrant forms we actually encounter, in which s, replaces s, and ō appears where we should expect only a very short semi-vowel (shwa mobile, usually understood to be of indifferent vocalic quality)? Scholars have offered both linguistic and theological explanations.

2. The Gospel Data.

It is important to notice that the Greek terms do not occur haphazardly, but rather they appear in more or less complementary distribution according to Gospel author. Numerous scholars have suspected that this distribution may be theologically meaningful. The chart illustrates the data:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Nazōraios</th>
<th>Nazarēnos</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Matthew</td>
<td>3x</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mark</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>4x</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luke</td>
<td>1x</td>
<td>2x</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John</td>
<td>3x</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

As shown, nazōraios appears seven times in the Gospels, and nazarenos occurs six times. Although an exact count is complicated by the fact that in five instances there are textual variants (with both options supported by significant textual witnesses), the only really uncertain case is Luke 24:19. In that verse it is impossible to decide which is the original reading. Accordingly, Matthew and John use only nazōraios, Mark uses only nazarenos, and Luke uses now one, now the other. The three instances of Lukan usage constitute a paradigm of the redactional difficulties (see Redaction Criticism) involved with these terms, for the Gospel once follows Mark (Lk 4:34 par. Mk 1:24), once changes Mark's nazarēnos to nazōraios (Lk 18:37 par. Mk 10:47—although some witnesses to Luke give nazarenos), and once, in the instance referred to above (material peculiar to Luke's Gospel) it is uncertain whether it followed Mark or not (see Synoptic Problem). In the NT as a whole nazōraios easily predominates over nazarenos, but neither form occurs outside the Gospels and Acts. Early in the history of the church nazōraios apparently took on a new connotation, for according to Acts 24:5 the Christians were called by its plural nazōraioi.

3. Proposed Solutions.

3.1. "A Man from Nazareth." Linguistic explanations for the original significance of nazōraios focus on whether it is possible to construe it as a gentilic from the name Nazareth. Scholars are divided, but the majority believe it is possible. Unfortunately, they have lacked the means to explain rigorously and precisely how the word acquired the problematic ō. The question of the z is less difficult, for in Greek texts of the OT there are numerous instances of this equation of Semitic ? with Greek z. For example, in several uncials at Judges 1:5 Greek adōnizedek corresponds to the Hebrew name "dōnišedeq. Similarly, Hebrew mibṣār at Genesis 36:42 is rendered mazar by the most important manuscript of the Greek OT, Codex Alexandrinus.

But in the view of many scholars, attempts to use these same LXX manuscripts to explain the ō have not been as successful. The proponents of this approach have not appreciated the fact that, in contrast to the z, here we are dealing with a vowel. The difference is that unlike the consonantal text of the MT, the vowels often represent a late—perhaps fourth- to ninth-century AD.—traditional reading of the text Hence, in comparing LXX manuscripts with the MT, it is incorrect to assume, as have these proponents, that the ancient translators rendering the Hebrew into Greek necessarily vocalized any given word as it is now found in the MT. Indeed, it is precisely the differences between the vocalization systems underlying the LXX and the MT which provide insight into pre-Masoretic Hebrew. Unconvinced, then, by such methodologically problematic explanations of the ō, a significant minority of scholars have argued that the word nazōraios cannot be connected with the town of Nazareth. In their view, nazōraios originally arose from another Aramaic word, and was only later and secondarily attached, by folk etymology or punning, to the town name.

3.2. "One Taking a Vow." Those who reject the derivation of nazōraios from Nazareth attempt to derive it from various other Aramaic words. The best suggestion connects it to the root nzr, meaning "to vow," "to abstain." The argument here invokes a reasonably well-attested Aramaic deverbal nominal pattern, the nomen agentis qātōl (originally qātul). This pattern is known from Imperial Aramaic and the Hebrew Bible portions dealing with Balaam, and was still productive in Syriac and Samaritan Aramaic—and thus, perhaps, in Palestinian Aramaic of Jesus’ day. In Syriac, for example, any verb in the simple stem can form a nomen agentis by means of this pattern. The hypothetical form nāzōrā' would mean "the one taking a vow," especially a Nazirite vow. This Aramaic word would indeed then come into Greek as nazōraios. Advocates of this suggestion suppose that the Aramaic term originally attached to the adherents of an ascetic Jewish sect in first-century Palestine. Religio-political sects of that period, such as the Pharisees* and Sadducees (set Judaism), regularly took names which stressed their devotion to God. Thus Pharisees means "the separated ones," ostensibly referring to the group's higher standards of ritual purity (see Clean and Unclean). Nāzōra would fit this pattern, and according to this view Jesus belonged to such a group. Seeking to anchor the group historically, it is common to suggest that John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) was its founder or leader, and that Jesus was originally his follower. Hints of such can be found in the Gospels and Acts according to a certain reading of the text.

Commonly, advocates turn to the so-called Mandaic connection to flesh out the picture further. The Man-daeans, an Aramaic-speaking group of obscure origins who lived in southern Babylonia, also called themselves "Nasoraeans." They had forgotten the significance of the term, but some scholars have found evidence of a connection to first-century Palestine in elements of their liturgy. Yet their literary works and written liturgy date some six to eight centuries after the time of Jesus; using them to explain the term nazōraios is a case of explaining an obscurity by appealing to something obscure. Less questionable evidence linking Jesus to a group of "vowers" may perhaps appear in Matthew 2:23, and here theological explanations enter the picture.

Matthew 2:23 says that Jesus and his family returned from Egypt to live in Nazareth "so that what was spoken through the prophets might be fulfilled, 'He shall be called a nazōraios.' " The text is a famous crux because no OT passage straightforwardly connects a messianic figure with Nazareth. How, then, could Jesus' return to that town relate to a prophetic declaration? An answer may be found in the Greek text of Judges 13:5, 7, if one agrees that nazōraios does not mean "man from Nazareth" but rather refers to an ascetic baptistic sect. The Greek text of Alexandrinus reads, "so that the child shall be sanctified to God as a Nazirite from the womb." If the Matthean tradition referred to this text (Judges was a book of the "prophets" in Jewish parlance), then here may be additional support for the view connecting nazōraios with the hypothetical Aramaic
On this reading of Matthew 2:23, the original denotation has been lost, and the term nazōraios has been reinterpreted to cement a connection between Jesus and Nazareth which was never in view in the OT passage. Understood in this way, this text and a few other tenuous bits of evidence combine in favor of divorcing nazōraios from the town name. But it is important to realize how much conjecture and how little hard evidence goes to support the derivation from the hypothetical nāzōrā. It should be emphasized that this nomen agentis is unattested even in those Aramaic dialects wherein the pattern was widely productive. Further, the advocates of this solution do not explain why the early traditions did not simply use the common form "Nazir" (i.e., "Nazirite") if they wanted to denominate Jesus as one who had taken such a vow. And it is further significant that some Gospel texts seem baldly to assert that nazō.raios/ nazarenos means "man from Nazareth" (e.g., Mt 26:69 compared with Mt 26:71; Mt 21:11; Jn 1:45). These traditions cannot easily be explained away, and certainly deserve the benefit of any doubt.

4. A Linguistic Solution.

As we noted above, the reason some scholars rejected the meaning "man from Nazareth" in the first place was the lack of a persuasive explanation for the ō of nazōraios. It now appears that such an explanation is possible, based on Hebrew and Aramaic documents roughly coeval with the NT, the Dead Sea Scrolls (see Dead Sea Scrolls). The clearest evidence actually occurs in a Hebrew text, lQIsa\(^1\), but since Hebrew and Aramaic had entered into an adstratum linguistic relationship already in the Persian period, the careful use of such evidence is legitimate. In comparing lQIsa\(^1\) with the MT, it is striking that its scribe sometimes wrote the schwa mobile (the semi-vowel we would expect in a putative nāšērāyā) with the grapheme for an o/u vowel. He did not make this substitution in every case, but only when the schwa mobile was followed by the bilabial b or an r (which in Aramaic generally patterns with the gutturals, but which in the Hebrew of the MT is reconstructed as a trilled letter), and even then not always. Thus for MT peri, "fruit," at Isaiah 10:12 of lQIsa' the text reads pwry, probably vocalized as pri, or perhaps even pöri. In the same way, at Isaiah 37:38 one encounters hwrrt (=h"rārāt or hörārāt) for MT "rārāt, "Ararat."

It is not necessary to multiply examples, although there are a fair number of other instances of the phenomenon; the import of this observation for the problem of nazōraios is by now clear. In at least some spoken Hebrew and Aramaic dialects of the time of Jesus (the probable provenance of lQIsa' is Jerusalem), r could influence a preceding reduced vowel, causing it to be pronounced further back in the mouth. It could then assume an o tone. This pronunciation was previously unknown to scholars, for it was not ordinarily represented in standard written speech. It was an oral phenomenon. In the case of nāsrāyā, application of the principle leads to nāsrāyā or nāšrāyā'. Either Aramaic possibility could lead to Greek nazōraios, while not applying the shift could yield nazarenos.

It must be admitted that this solution is based on relatively meager data; that, however, is by no means a count against it. All the solutions to the problem at hand similarly work with few hard facts. Andquity simply did not provide any more; thus any solution must be considered tentative. But if the present solution be correct, the ö is accounted for, and exotic derivations are ruled out. If it is correct, then nothing precludes the straightforward understanding of both Greek terms as "the man from Nazareth." And, if it is correct, then the tradition of nazōraios may well stem from Jerusalem, where lQIsa' probably originated, rather than from Galilee. * Based on the fact that the early church was centered in Jerusalem, and considering the dialect affinities of the remnants of Aramaic contained in the Gospels, that connection is only to be expected.

NEW BIRTH

The term "new birth" embraces two Greek expressions found in the Gospels: palingenesia (Mt 19:28; variously translated as "the renewal of all things" [NIV], "the world that is to be" [NEB], "the new world" [RSV]) and gennēthēnai anōthen (Jn 3:3, 7; "to be bom again" or "to be born from above"). These two expressions point to the saving activity of God* in imparting spiritual life to his people and in restoring all of creation. This activity has both present and eschatological* dimensions, reflecting jesus' teaching of the presence and future coming of the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God).

1. Cosmic New Birth
2. Personal New Birth
3. New Birth and the Kingdom of God

1. Cosmic New Birth.

In Matthew 19:28 Jesus promises his disciples* who have left everything to follow him that in the palingenesia, when the Son of man (see Son of Man) sits upon his glorious throne, they too will occupy positions of glory.* This saying roughly parallels Luke 22:30 in which Jesus locates this exaltation simply, "in my kingdom." The redaction history of this logion is disputed, but the comparative rarity and difficulty of the term found in Matthew's account supports the view that he found it in his sources.

Palingenesia is found elsewhere in the NT only once (Tit 3:5) and there in a very different context, but it had a long history in Hellenism,* especially in Stoic circles where it was used to depict the rebirth of the universe, including human souls, after the cosmic conflagration (cf. Chrysippus Stoic 2.191; Boethus Sidonius Stoic 3.265). Philo used the term both for the restoration to life of individuals (e.g., Cher. 114; Poster. C. 124) as well as of the reconstitution of the world after the Flood (Vit. Mos. 2.65), while Josephus* used palingenesia to refer to the re-establishment of Israel* after the Exile (Ant. 11.66).

Though the term itself is distinctively Greek, the concept of cosmic rebirth is very much at home in Jewish thought In the OT language of restoration and renewal, and explicitly in Isaiah 65:17 and 66:22 which express the hope of a new heaven and a new earth, we encounter a notion found widely in Jewish apocalyptic* (cf. 1 Enoch 45:4-5; 72:1; 91:16; 2 Apoc. Bar. 32:6; 44:12; 57:2; Jub. 1:29; 4 Ezra 7:31), at Qumran (cf. 1QH 13:11-12; 1QS 4:25) and in the targums (cf. Tg. Oruj. Deut 32:12; b. Sanh. 92b, 97b; also, the Kaddish Prayer:
"Magnified and sanctified be His Great Name in the world that is to be created anew . . ."). The birth of this new age is often associated with the pouring forth of God's Spirit (e.g., Is 32:15; Joel 2:28-29; Jub. 1:23; 1QS 4:19-21; see Holy Spirit). The NT also looks forward to the eschatological new birth, as Jesus answers the disciples' question about the end of the age by warning of wars, famines and earthquakes as "the beginning of birth pains" (Mt 24:8) which point to the time of the coming of the Son of man. This ushers in "the age to come" (cf. Mt 12:32), which elsewhere in the NT is also pictured as the new heaven and new earth (cf. 2 Pet 3:13; Rev 21:1,5).

The cosmic new birth represents a moral transformation of the world order accomplished by the power of God. At the end of this present age, "the Son of Man will send out his angels to weed out of his kingdom everything that causes sin and all who do evil... Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Mt 13:41, 43 NIV). Those who have served Jesus in lowliness will be exalted to his right hand in exaltation (Mt 19:28).

2. Personal New Birth.

The imagery of personal or individual new birth is found in the teaching of Jesus only in the Fourth Gospel. In his dialog with Nicodemus, Jesus asserts, "Truly, truly, I say to you, unless one is born again, one cannot see the kingdom of God" (Jn 3:3). The Greek word translated "again" or "anew" (anōthen) can also be rendered "from above" (cf. Jn 3:31; 19:11, 23). In this case both senses contain truth, but the former translation is slightly better-suited to the context Nicodemus's response, "Surely one cannot go into the mother's womb a second time and be born!" (3:4), suggests that he understood "again," and this makes his baffled reaction more understandable. On the other hand, "from above" would give emphasis to the divine origin of this new birth—it is of God (cf. 1:13) through the mysterious work of the Spirit (3:5-6,8). To be born of God by the Spirit is not the natural state of men and women, implying that it must be a second birth (cf. 3:6).

2.1. Born of Water and Spirit In response to Nicodemus's incredulity Jesus repeats his initial assertion, now describing this new birth as one "of water and spirit" (3:5). The meaning of this phrase has been much debated with several major lines of interpretation claiming adherents.
First are those who contend that "water"* in this context must refer to baptism. It is argued that in the context of the Gospel narrative John's (see John the Baptist) baptism* would be assumed, signifying Nicodemus's need for repentance as a prerequisite for the Spirit's work in his life. In the context of the early church, however, "water" would suggest Christian baptism, which was both the prerequisite and the occasion for the bestowing of the Spirit. But a mysterious work of divine power, not an external rite, is at issue here. From this view the role and response of Nicodemus is intelligible.

A second approach attempts a physiological interpretation of "water," either as a reference to the waters of birth associated with the rupture of the fetal water sac, or to the rabbinic use of "water" (may as well as tipah, "drop," cf. Pirqe 'Abot 3.1) to denote the male semen. Both literal and figurative uses of this birth imagery have been suggested, understanding the phrase to refer in turn to physical and spiritual birth, or understanding the phrase as a hendiadys denoting a spiritual birth alone. The paucity of references to these uses of the term "water" and the difference in the contexts of those references from that in the Gospel diminish the strength of these interpretations.

A third view, going back at least to the time of Origen, understands "water and spirit" as a figurative expression referring to the cleansing and purifying work of God's Spirit. In the OT both water and spirit are symbols of God's renewing, life*-giving activity (cf. Is 55:1-3; Jer 2:13; 17:13; Ezek 37:1-14; 47:9; Zech 14:8; cf. also Jub. 1:23-25), and both are sometimes used in the same contexts: "I will sprinkle clean water on you, and you will be clean;... I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit in you" (Ezek 36:25-26 NIV; cf. Is 32:15-17; 44:3-5; also 1QS 4:19-21; Jn 7:37-39).

This imagery was something that "a teacher of the Jews" (Jn 3:10) ought to have recognized. The fact that both nouns are governed by a single preposition (ek) and that both are anarthrous suggests that they should be understood together as a conceptual unit describing the nature of this new birth rather than the agents or instruments of it. It is a "water-spirit" birth as opposed to the birth which is "of flesh" (3:6). In this birth one shares in the nature of God as "spirit" (cf. Jn 4:23) through the life-giving activity of the Holy Spirit (cf. Jn 5:21; 6:63). Just as natural life is a result of God's breathing spirit into the first human (cf. Gen 2:7; 6:3; Job 34:14-15; Eccles 12:7), so eternal life is a consequence of God's giving his Holy Spirit to human life through a new birth. Moreover, it is the birth of the new age which was to come, the age of the Spirit.
2.2. New Birth and Discontinuity. Integral to the teaching of the new birth is the notion that natural growth and development will not suffice. A radical discontinuity with the past and a fundamental internal change is required if one is to enter the kingdom of God. This element of newness featured prominently in Jesus’ ministry. Though he claimed to fulfill the Law* and the Prophets (Mt 5:17), and in that sense stood in continuity with the OT, he also instituted a "new covenant" (Lk 22:20; see Last Supper). The least in this new dispensation is greater than the greatest of those of the old (Mt 11:11); the new wine* requires new wineskins (Mk 2:21-22).

Jesus also taught the need for a radical change of life. Unless a person changes and becomes like a child,* they will never enter the kingdom of heaven* (Mt 18:3). In John's Gospel this transformation is put in the starkest terms: "I tell you the truth, whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life and will not be condemned; he has crossed over from death to life" (Jn 5:24 NIV). But this momentous change was also ascribed in Luke's Gospel to the repentant (see Repentance) prodigal son who "was dead and is alive again" (Lk 15:24).

2.3. New Birth and Divine Life. The new birth not only speaks of a fundamental internal change but more specifically of a new origin and source of life. Though Israel is called the Lord's "firstborn son" (Ex 4:22; Deut 32:6; Jer 31:9; Hos 11:1), this relationship is more properly ascribed to divine election than to divine procreation (even Ps 2:7, referring to the begetting of the king, is set within the context of the Lord's covenant with Israel). But with the prominence of the tide "Son of God" (see Son of God) given to Jesus and perhaps the interest in the role of the Spirit in his birth (Mt 1:18-25; Lk 1:26-38; cf.Jn 8:41-42), the theme of divine sonship is broadened in the NT, particularly in the Johannine literature.

John opens his Gospel prolog with a statement that all who believe in the name of Jesus are born of God (1:13). This divine begetting is referred to five times in the Nicodemus pericope of John 3. In addition John's First Episide speaks eight times of being born of God (2:29; 3:9 [twice]; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18 [twice]). Being a child of God is not simply a covenant relationship. It involves a change in the heart, as the Spirit who gives new life (Jn 5:21; 6:63) is imparted to the believer. In this sense the Johannine teaching goes far beyond the rabbinic notion that "the proselyte is like a new-born child" (b. Yebam. 22a).
Moral transformation is the expected consequence of this new birth, resulting in righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness) and love* (1 Jn 3:9; 4:7; 5:18). Jesus, the Son of man (see Son of Man) who has his origin in heaven* (cf.Jn 3:13), now allows the believer to share in his own source of life. The Spirit, mediated by Jesus, is the agent of regeneration, and apart from his mysterious work one cannot see the kingdom of God (cf.Jn 3:5-8).

3. New Birth and the Kingdom of God.

The OT prophets had spoken of a future day of restoration and glorification of Israel when the Lord would pour out his Spirit on his people and manifest his rule in righteousness among the nations (e.g., Joel 2:28—3:2; Is 2:1-4; 65:17-25; Ezek 37:15-28). Jesus' reference to the palingenesia, or "restoration of all things," reflects this view (Mt 19:28). The reign of God will one day come to earth (see World) through a cosmic rebirth when the Son of man sits on his throne of glory.

However, Jesus also spoke of the kingdom of God as a present reality to be entered in this present age (Mt 12:28). In his ministry the life of the future had come near, and his teaching concerning the personal new birth points to that invasion of the future into the present.

The future age of restoration would be characterized by the work of the Spirit transforming the hearts of God's people (Jer 31:33; Ezek 36:26), and this transformation is just what Jesus promised and required in his words concerning the new birth. The coming kingdom could be entered now by the work of the life-giving Spirit who was at work in Jesus' ministry. Moreover, in the promise of eternal life to those who believe in him (Jn 3:15), Jesus linked the kingdom of God with eternal life, also a feature of the eschatological age, and drew them both into the present experience of his hearers. In Jesus the coming kingdom had drawn near, but one could enter only through new birth by the Spirit.

OATHS AND SWEARING

Oath taking was a prevalent practice that was much abused in the time of Jesus. In the OT one was enjoined to swear by the name of God* (Deut 6:13; 10:20) as a sign of allegiance to the Lord rather than idols. Not only do pillars of the OT swear oaths (Gen 14:22; 21:24; 47:31; Josh 2:12), God does as well (Gen 22:16; 26:3; Is 45:23; Ezek 17:19; Amos 6:8; 8:7; Sir 44:21; Wis 12:21). False oaths or violations of oaths were considered to be a profanation of the name of God, something that God would severely punish (Ex 20:7; 1 Kings 8:31-32; Wis 14:30-31). Jesus' reference to oaths and vows in the fourth antithesis of the Sermon on the Mount* (Mt 5:33) has no exact parallel in the OT but reflects a combination of texts (Lev 19:12; Num 30:2; Deut 23:21-23; Ps 50:14; Zech 8:17) that were intended to safeguard their sanctity and to ensure that they were kept. In keeping with his demand for a greater righteousness* (Mt 5:20), Jesus prohibits all swearing (Mt 5:34). The plain sense of holös ("at all") allows no exception.

1. Oaths in Contemporary Judaism
2. Jesus' Rejection of Oaths

1. Oaths in Contemporary Judaism.

Jesus was not alone in his opposition to oaths. Josephus* says of the Essenes: "Any word of theirs has more force than an oath; swearing they avoid, regarding it as worse than perjury for they say that one who is not believed without an appeal to God stands condemned already" (J.W. 2.8.6 §135). This stance was rooted in a pious abhorrence of using the name of God in an oath (CD 15:1-5; 1QS 6:27), and Philo viewed it as a testimony of their love* for God (Quod Omn. 84). On entrance into their society, however, new members were "made to swear tremendous oaths" regarding the practice of piety and secrets of the sect (J.W. 2.8.6-7 §§139-42; see CD 15:5-6; 1QS 5:7-8). The Essenes also permitted swearing a judicial oath (CD 9:9-12), but one could only swear by the curses of the covenant and thereby not become liable to death for profaning the name by breaking the oath (CD 15:1-5).

Philo also looked askance at oaths, but his reasoning has a Hellenistic (see Hellenism) tint: not swearing best suits "a rational life which has been taught to speak the truth so well on each occasion that its words are regarded as oaths." To swear truly is only second best, he wrote, "because the mere fact of swearing casts suspicion on the trustworthiness of the man." (Dec. 84; see Spec. Leg. 2:1-8). For Philo, "the good man's word should be an oath, firm, unswerving, free from falsehood, planted in truth" (Spec. Leg. 2:2). He roundly condemned taking oaths to disguise the truth because it is the height of profanity to implicate God in knavery, and he criticized the habit of many to fill up the gaps in their talk with oaths (Dec. 92; see also Spec. Leg. 2:6; and Sir 23:9-10). He was by no means as radical as Jesus, because he advised that one should swear an oath only after examining whether a matter is important enough to warrant it, whether one knows all the facts, and whether one is pure from lawlessness, bodily pollution and evil-speaking (Dec. 93; see Spec. Leg. 2:6).

When Herod (see Herodian Dynasty) demanded oaths of loyalty from his subjects, the Essenes were excused; but Josephus reports that Pollion the Pharisee* and Samaia and his disciples also refused to take the oath and were not punished (Ant. 15.10.4 §§368-72). This suggests that others were sensitive about oaths; and, according to the Mishna, one who wants to become an associate "may not be profuse in vows" (m. Dem. 2:3). Rabbinic literature (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings), however, devotes significant attention to oaths and vows. The Mishna tractate Sebu'ot addresses the issue of what constitutes valid oaths, and Nedarim does the same with vows and their annulment.

The rabbis carefully distinguished between oaths and vows. In a vow a person pledges before God that some item or act is forbidden to him or another. Oaths are of two kinds (m. Sebu. 1:1; 3:1, 5). In assertive oaths, persons swear that they have or have not done something, usually in a judicial context to substantiate or reject testimony. Voluntary oaths are similar to vows in that persons swear that they will or will not do something. This kind of oath was a prominent element of everyday life.

The development of divine circumlocutions and ersatz oaths, the subject of Matthew 5:34b-36 and 23:16-22, probably arose from a desire to avoid profaning the holy name (Ex 20:7). Because of a pious fear of real oaths (see Deut 23:23; Eccles 5:4; Sipre Deut 265 [on 23:23]), substitute oaths were in vogue among the populace. Lieberman argued that the rabbis sought to correct the abuse of vows and oaths. Unschooled in the fine points, the masses tended to confuse the distinctions between oaths and vows, to regard substitute oaths as valid, and to use them on all occasions. Some rabbis acquiesced to the widespread practice of the masses, but others protested against the use of invalid oaths. The latter stressed that valid oaths were sacred and not to be transgressed but taught that some oaths were not binding. The rabbis were no less concerned than Jesus to make clear that an oath was no substitute for habitual veracity, and it is not legitimate to infer from Jesus' attack in Matthew 23:16-22 that the scribes* and Pharisees employed oaths for dishonest advantage. They were concerned about the legal niceties of oaths and vows.

While many may have lamented the abuse of oaths, Jesus differed from all others by rejecting them entirely. In Matthew 5:34-36, he scorns the pious effort to skirt around the name of God in oaths by using such terms as "heaven"* and "earth" (see m. Sebu. 4:13; Philo Spec. Leg. 2:1), and "Jerusalem" (see m. Ned. 1:3; t. Ned. 1:2, 3). He demonstrates from the OT that each circumlocution directly involves God and is therefore a valid oath. He condemns swearing by one's head (or life) because it usurps God's jurisdiction over one's life. Consequently, Jesus not only prohibits valid oaths, he prohibits even so-called substitute oaths. An oath is an oath regardless of how oblique the reference to God.

Some have mistakenly taken Jesus' statement in 5:37, "Let your 'yes' [be] 'yes' and your 'no,' 'no,' " to be simply another version of a substitute oath (see b. Šebu. 36a; 2 Enoch 49:1-2), but this would controvert what Jesus just said forbidding all oaths. The doubling of the words intensifies the "yes" into a real "yes" and the "no" into a real "no" (see Jas 5:12; b. B. Mes. 49a). Some scholars also argue that what Jesus says in Matthew 23:16-22 contradicts 5:34. Jesus is not endorsing oaths "by the temple," etc.; he is indicting Pharisaic logic about what makes a valid oath. To think that one who swears by the Temple, altar or heaven has not sworn by the living God is nonsense. God cannot be evaded through word games. This woe (see Blessing and Woe) does not sanction swearing but lampoons a disingenuous casuistry that Jesus considered to be a symptom of the blindness of his opponents.
In Matthew 26:63 the high priest abjures Jesus by the living God to speak under oath (see m. Š.ebu. 4:13). Some conclude that Jesus' response in Matthew 26:64 accepts the oath demanded. Others consider Jesus' answer to be simply an assertion or an evasion that reflects his refusal to swear, and this would stand in stark contrast to Peter's swearing that he was not a disciple (Mt 26:74). Peter's oath and Herod's frivolous vow that led to the death of John the Baptist* (Mk 6:23) are two illustrations of the truth of Jesus' statement in Matthew 5:37 that anything more than "yes" or "no" is from "evil" or from "the evil one," the father of lies (Jn 8:44).

In some respects Jesus accords with Jewish tradition that one way to avoid violating oaths is to avoid them altogether. While others advocated total honesty, Jesus demands it and insists that honesty needs nothing to prop it up. Disciples are to speak the truth as a matter of course because they are inwardly pure in heart, not because it has been imposed by external necessity. Jesus rejects substitute oaths because they are a legal mirage. He rejects valid oaths because they diminish the demand for absolute truthfulness at all times. Their use either implies that one is normally untruthful or that one need only be truthful when swearing an oath. He also assumes that humans are bound to God in all of life, not just when they call upon God as a witness, since they will be accountable for every idle word (Mt 12:34-37).

Another reason Jesus rejects oaths is that they guarantee the veracity of a human statement by calling God as a corroborating witness. It is probable that Jesus viewed this to be an infringement on God's majesty, since it requires God to bear witness to fallible human statements and, in effect, reduces God to an object of human manipulation. In forbidding oaths, Jesus ignores the practical problems this would create for his disciples in society since oaths were required in all manner of disputes. With the advent of the kingdom of God* all such concerns are superseded.

OLD TESTING IN THE GOSPELS,

It is difficult to overemphasize the importance of the function of the OT in the Gospels. It is readily apparent that the Jewish Scriptures were foundational to many of Jesus' teachings and probably to his self-understanding as well. Specific OT passages and themes lie behind many of the parables* and often lie at the center of debate between Jesus and his opponents. The relationship of Jesus to the OT was not lost on the Evangelists. They sought in various ways to show how Jesus understood Scripture, fulfilled Scripture and was clarified by Scripture. In fact there is no significant idea developed in the Gospels that does not in some way reflect or depend on the OT.

2. Phenomena
3. Jesus' Use of the OT
4. The OT in Mark
5. The OT in Matthew
6. The OT in Luke
7. The OT in John

1. Text Types.

Citations of the OT in the Gospels reflect the Hebrew (Mt 11:10,29; Mk 10:19; 12:30; Lk 22:37), the Greek (Mt 18:16; 21:16; Mk 7:6-7; 10:8; Lk 4:18; 23:46; Jn 12:38), and the Aramaic (Mt 4:10; Mk 4:12; 9:48). Given the nature and origin of the material, the respective contexts of the Evangelists and the fact that they wrote their Gospels in Greek, such diversity is hardly surprising. But citations attributed to Jesus also reflect the same diversity. Since Jesus likely did not speak much Greek, he probably did not quote the Greek version (LXX; see Languages of Palestine). But the Greek citations are not necessarily inauthentic, that is, deriving from the Greek-speaking church rather than from Jesus. In many cases Jesus' citations of Scripture have been assimilated to the wording of the Greek, especially when the point that he had made was not lost in such assimilation.

2. Phenomena.
In the Gospels the OT is quoted with introductory formulae (e.g., "in order that it be fulfilled"), and sometimes without; it is often paraphrased and many times alluded to through the use of a few key words or phrases. At other times the Gospels reflect OT themes and structures. With regard to exegetical style, scholars have pointed to parallels with pesher as practiced at Qumran (esp. Matthew) and parallels with rabbinc midrash* (esp. John). In Jesus and the Gospels the OT has three principal functions: (1) legal, (2) prophetic and (3) analogical. Legal interpretation has to do with determining what is required of the one that has faith* in God. Prophetic interpretation has to do with what has been fulfilled in Jesus' advent and what is expected to be fulfilled in the future. Analogical interpretation has to do with comparisons. Typology is a familiar form of analogical interpretation. Several examples of these principal functions are considered in the following sections.

3. Jesus' Use of the OT.

Every attempt to evaluate the role that the OT played in the ministry of Jesus involves the question of authenticity (see Form Criticism). According to the criterion of dissimilarity the presence of the OT in the dominical tradition might be owing to pre-Christian Jewish usage, or to later Christian interpretation and not to Jesus himself. Strict application of this criterion, however, is unwarranted and uncritical. One should expect that a Palestinian Jew who preached in Israel's synagogues* and taught disciples* who regarded him as Israel's Messiah (see Christ), the fulfillment of prophetic expectation, would surely make frequent appeal to the Scriptures. And this Jesus does. He quotes, alludes to and interprets Scripture to advance legal opinions, to prophesy or to make comparisons between himself and/or his ministry and the OT. Each of these aspects contributes significantly to our understanding of the historical Jesus. And it is ultimately Jesus' use of Scripture that lies behind the function and interpretation of the OT in the Gospels.

3.1. Legal. According to Matthew 5:17-20 Jesus held the Jewish law* in high regard. Not only has he come to fulfill the Law (and the prophets), "not an iota, not a dot will pass from the Law until all is accomplished. Whoever then relaxes one of the least of these commandments ..." (Mt 5:18). This assessment of the complete and permanent value of the Law was shared by Jesus' contemporaries: "Be heedful of the light [i.e., least] commandment as of a grave one, for you do not know the grant of reward for each commandment" (m. 'Abot 2:1; 4:2: "Run to do a light command"; cf. b. Sank 107a).
Matthew 5:21-48, probably a selected and edited compilation of Jesus' legal interpretation of Scripture, provides several important examples. Six times Jesus says, "You heard that it was said," then quotes from the Mosaic Code (Mt 5:21 [Ex 20:13; Deut 5:17]; Mt 5:27 [Ex 20:14; Deut 5:18]; Mt 5:31 [Deut 24:1 ]; Mt 5:33 [Lev 19:12; Num 30:2]; Mt 5:38 [Ex 21:24]; Mt 5:43 [Lev 19:18]) and often a rejoinder: "But I say to you." (This mode of speaking was not unknown among the rabbis; cf. b. Ye'bam. 65a, where Rabbi Ammi [3rd to 4th century A.D.] began his challenge to biblical interpretation that supported polygamy with the words "But I say.") Jesus is not controverting Scripture (see Mt 5:17-20), but its popular interpretation (for this reason Jesus' statements are often referred to as "antitheses"). Jesus' interpretations, nevertheless, do not always necessarily contradict those of his contemporaries. For example, when Jesus said, "Love* your enemies" (Mt 5:44), he was not saying anything new. Not only did the Law teach this (see Ex 23:4-5), the rabbis taught the same thing also. Commenting on Leviticus 19:18 ("Love your neighbor as yourself"), a verse which Jesus also cites (see Mk 10:19), Rabbis Aqiba, Ben Azzai and Tanhumah find in this command "a great principle of Torah," one that requires the faithful not to curse those who curse them (Gen. Rab. 24.7 [on Gen 5:1]; Sipra Im. on 19:18; see also m. Abot 4:24; b. Meg. 28a; cf. Mt 5:11).

But Jesus' interpretations do bring to light implications of the Law that might have gone unrecognized by many of his contemporaries: One might not actually commit murder, but one might hate his neighbor (or people outside of one's community; cf. 1QS 1.10); one might not actually commit adultery, but one might lust for another person; and one might take revenge thinking that the Law allowed for it, etc. Jesus' interpretations, however, are not unparalleled, for there are several sayings of the rabbis that approximate them (on hatred see b. B. Mes. 58b; on lust and divorce see b. Yoma 29a; on swearing see Sir 23:9-11; on revenge see b. Yoma 23a; on love of one's enemies see b. Ber. 10a).

In most respects Jesus' view of the legal portions of Scripture was essentially that of his Palestinian contemporaries. When tempted (see Temptation) by the Devil (Mt 4:1-11; Lk 4:1-13), Jesus responded with appropriate citations from Deuteronomy 8:3 ("One does not live by bread alone"); 6:16 ("You shall not tempt the Lord your God") and 6:13 ("You shall worship the Lord your God"). When asked what the greatest commandment was, Jesus cited Deuteronomy 6:4-5 ("Hear O Israel . . . love the Lord your God with your whole heart . . ."); cf. Mk 12:29-30) and Leviticus 19:18 ("You shall love your neighbor as yourself; cf. Mk 12:31).
Deuteronomy 6:4-5 was part of the Shema that an observant Jew was to recite twice a day (cf. m. Ber. 1:1-4). The idea of loving one's neighbor as oneself and so fulfilling the whole Law is found in Jewish sources: "This [Lev 19:18] is a great principle in the Torah" (Sipra Lev. on Lev 19:18; cf. Gen. Rab. 24.7 [on Gen 5:1]). The two commandments in combination are probably alluded to in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: "Each of you speak the truth clearly to his neighbor. . . . Throughout all your life love the Lord and one another with a true heart" (T. Dan 5:2-3); "Love the Lord and the neighbor" (T. Iss. 7:6); and are probably what Philo referred to: "Among the great number of particular propositions and principles, two, as it were, stand as preeminent topics: one of duty toward God in piety and holiness, one of duty toward people in generosity and justice" (Spec. Leg. 2.15 §63). When the young man asked Jesus what he must do to inherit eternal life, Jesus responded, "You know the commandments . . .," and then cited approximately half of the Decalog (Mk 10:19; cf. Ex 20:12-16 [Deut 5:16-20]).

In condemning legalism and hypocrisy (Mk 7:1-23; see Hypocrite), Jesus argued that the Pharisaic qorban tradition (cf. m. B. Qam. 9:10; m. Ned. 1:1; 9:1) controverted God's commands: " 'Honor your father and mother'; and 'He who speaks evil of father or mother, let him surely die' " (Mk 7:10; cf. Ex 20:12 [Deut 5:16] LXX Ex 21:17). Herein we find an important difference between Jesus and the Pharisees.*

On another occasion Jesus cites Hosea 6:6, "I desire mercy, not sacrifice" (Mt 9:13; 12:7), to defend his habit of fellowshipping with "tax collectors and sinners" (Mt 9:10). According to the rabbis, one was to avoid the company of sinners* (t. Dem. 3:6-7; b. Ber. 43b). But the citation of Hosea did not imply that Jesus was opposed to the cultus, as is seen when he urged his followers to be reconciled before offering something upon the altar (Mt 5:23-24). Moreover, implicit in Jesus' command not to take oaths (see Oaths and Swearing) is a profound respect for Jerusalem and the Temple* (Mt 5:34-35; cf. Is 66:1). Indeed, Jesus' action in the Temple (Mk 11:15-17) was likely a call for greater respect for Temple worship.*

The Gospels, however, do provide several episodes where the activity of Jesus and his disciples was thought to break the Law. Perhaps best-known was the frequent charge that Jesus violated Sabbath* laws, even when he healed (see Healing) someone (cf. Mk 2:23-28; 3:1-6; Lk 13:10-17; 14:1-6; Jn 5:1-18; 9:1-34). To be sure, the rabbis taught that the "saving of life overrides the sabbath"
After all, "the Sabbath was given to [people], not [people] to the Sabbath" (Mek. Šabbata §1 [on Ex 31:12]). This reasoning obviously parallels Jesus' claim that "the Sabbath was made for humanity, not humanity for the Sabbath" (Mk 2:27). (It is possible, of course, that the tradition in Mekilta is dependent on Jesus.) But in cases where a person's life was not in immediate danger, some rabbis felt that healing activity was unnecessary and so constituted a violation of the Sabbath. Indeed, the Essenes were even more strict in their interpretation of Sabbath laws (CD 11:13-14: "If a [beast] fall into a cistern or into a pit, let it not be lifted out on the Sabbath"; cf. Mt 12:11: "Who among you, having a sheep that falls into a pit on the Sabbath, will not lay hold of it and lift it out?"). Obviously the difference between Jesus and his opponents lay in the interpretation and application of the Sabbath laws; they did not dispute their validity.

Jesus applied Mosaic Law to settling disputes among his disciples, enjoining that "every word be confirmed by the evidence of two or three witnesses" (Mt 18:16; cf. LXX Deut 19:15). On the permanence of the marriage* union, Jesus cited texts from Genesis: "God made them male and female" (Mk 10:6; cf. LXX Gen 1:27; 5:2); and "For this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh" (Mk 10:7-8; cf. LXX Gen 2:24). Jesus' legislation is clearly at variance with some of the more permissive interpretations of Deuteronomy 24:1: "The School of Hillel says, 'Divorce is permitted] if she spoils the cooking'. . . Rabbi Aqiba says 'Divorce is permitted] if he has found another more beautiful than she, as it is said ...' " (cf. m. Git. 9:10). In this case the Essenes apparently held to Jesus' view (cf. llQTemple 57:17-18: "And he must not select in addition to her another woman because she, and she alone, will remain with him all the days of her life"; cf. CD 4:20-21, where Gen 1:27 is cited).

It is clear from his interpretation of the legal portions of Scripture that Jesus was committed to the essentials of the Jewish faith, even if some of his interpretations apparently were at variance with, at times even stricter than, those of his contemporaries. The chief difference between Jesus' interpretation of Scripture and that of many of his contemporaries is seen in the relationship between the Law and people. When it came to morals (e.g., divorce) Jesus' interpretation was stricter than most of his contemporaries. When it came to cultic laws (e.g., the Sabbath) Jesus' interpretation was comparatively lenient. Jesus' emphasis seems to have fallen on compassion as over against holiness (see Law).
3.2. Prophetic. Jesus cites Isaiah 61:1-2 as fulfilled in, and perhaps the occasion for, his public ministry: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor . . ." (Lk 4:18-19; cf. Lk 7:22 par. Mt 11:5). Jesus' interpretation of Micah 7:6 ("For I have come to set a man against his father, and a daughter against her mother ..." [Mt 10:35-36]) is similar to the messianic interpretation of this text in Jewish sources (cf.Jub. 23:16,19; m. Sota 9:15; cf. b. Sota 49b; b. Sanh. 97a).

Apparently the rabbis also believed that division within families (see Family) would take place in the time of the Messiah. The theme of division is reflected in the allusion to Psalm 6:8 ("Depart from me, you evildoers") in the sayings concerning false prophets (Mt 7:23; see Prophets and Prophecy). The early Christian understanding of John the Baptist* as the fulfillment of Malachi 3:1 ("Behold, I am sending my messenger to prepare the way before me") apparently derives from Jesus (Mt 11:10).

Jesus explains the incomprehension and unbelief of his contemporaries in terms of Isaiah's strange commission from God: "in order that they may indeed see but not perceive, and may indeed hear but not understand; lest they should turn again, and be forgiven" (Mk 4:12, alluding to Tg. Isa. 6:9-10; cf. Mt 13:14-15, which cites LXX Is 6:9-10). But even Jesus' disciples are rebuked in similar terms: "Having eyes do you not see, and having ears do you not hear?" (Mk 8:18; cf. Jer 5:21; Ezek 12:2; Is 6:9-10). Jesus castigates Israel's religious leaders: "This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me; in vain do they worship me, teaching human precepts as doctrines" (Mk 7:6-7, citing LXX Is 29:13; see Hardness of Heart).

Many of Jesus' prophetic statements looked to fulfillment in the future. In alluding to Isaiah's oracle against Babylon ("will you be exalted to heaven? You shall be brought down to Hades" [Is 14:13, 15]) Jesus offered the cities that have rejected him a grim warning of coming judgment* (Mt 11:23). Jerusalem itself received a warning no less foreboding in language borrowed from Jeremiah 22:5 ("Behold, your house is forsaken and desolate" [cf. Mt 23:38]). The thought is completed in the reference to Psalm 118:26: "Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord" (Mt 23:39). The prophetic implication is that Jerusalem will be in a state of spiritual desolation until Jesus returns at the Parousia and is properly received.

Jesus predicted Jerusalem's impending fate (see Destruction of jerusalem) in terms of Daniel's "abomination of desolation" (Mk 13:14; cf. Dan 11:31; 12:11). The eschatological day will approach "... suddenly like a snare; for it will come upon all who dwell upon the face of the whole earth" (Lk 21:34-35; cf. Is 24:17). When these things happen, "they will begin to say to the mountains, 'Fall on us,' and to the hills, 'Cover us' " (Lk 23:30; cf. Hos 10:8; see Apocalyptic Teaching).

Jesus described his impending arrest and crucifixion in the words of Zechariah 13:7: "I will strike the shepherd and the sheep will be scattered" (Mk 14:27). Jesus told his troubled disciples: "And then they will see the Son of man coming in clouds with great power and glory" (Mk 13:26; cf. Dan 7:13). Before the high priest, Jesus similarly predicted: "You will see the Son of man seated at the right hand of Power, and coming with the clouds of heaven" (Mk 14:62; cf. Ps 110:1 + Dan 7:13; cf. b. Sank. 96b-97a where Messiah is called bar naphle, that is, "son of the fallen (tent of David)" [MT Amos 9:11] or "son of the cloud" [LXX Dan 7:13]; see Son of Man).

Jesus apparently understood himself in terms of Daniel's "son of man," to whom the kingdom* would be given (cf. Dan 7:14; 1 Enoch 69:29; Pss. Sol. 17:44), and his disciples as the "saints" to whom judgment would some day be given (cf. Dan 7:22). This is likely what lies behind Jesus' saying, "Truly, I say to you, in the new world, when the Son of man shall sit on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Mt 19:28; cf. Lk 22:28-30: "... I assign to you, as my Father assigned to me, a kingdom . . . that you may . . . sit on thrones judging . . ."). It is likely that Psalm 122:3-5 ("Jerusalem ... to which the tribes go up . . . There thrones for judgment were set, the thrones of the house of David") has also contributed to this eschatological saying. Both passages, Daniel 7 and Psalm 122, are cited side by side in a rabbinic exegesis that anticipates the day when God and Israel's elders will sit in judgment on the peoples of the world (cf. Tanhuma, Qedoshim 1.1). Elsewhere, Rabbi Aqiba interpreted the plural "thrones" of Daniel 7:9 as implying that the Messiah would take his seat next to God himself (b. Sank 38b; b. hag. 14a). Finally, Jesus warns his followers of the judgment of Gehenna: "where their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched" (Mk 9:48; cf. Tg. Isa. 66:24). According to Jesus, when the Son of man comes, "he will repay everyone for what he has done" (Mt 16:27; cf. LXX Ps 61:13).

3.3. Analogical. This category includes typology and other points of comparison. Jesus explicitly compared his ministry to the ministries of Elijah and Elisha (Lk 4:25-27; cf. 1 Kings 17:1-16; 2 Kings 5:1-14; see Elijah and Elisha). Later deeds resemble the exploits of these prophets of old (compare Lk 7:11-17 with 1 Kings 17-24 and 2 Kings 4:32-37; Lk 9:51-56 with 2 Kings 1:9-16; Lk 9:61-62 with 1 Kings 19:19-21). The kingdom is compared to the crop that grows of its own accord and then is harvested (Mk 4:29; cf. LXX Joel 3:13). Jesus enjoined his listeners to take his yoke upon them and "find rest for [their] souls" (Mt 11:29; cf. Jer 6:16). Jesus may have presented himself here as the personification of Wisdom* (compare Sir 51:23-27; cf. Mt 11:19, where Jesus apparently did identify himself with Wisdom). The rabbis spoke variously of taking upon oneself the yoke of the kingdom, the Law or repentance (b. Ber. 10b; m. 'Abot 3:5; b. 'Abod. Zar. 5a).

The comparison with Jonah (see Sign of Jonah) is one of the most significant and one of the most debated: "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale, so will the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Mt 12:40; cf. Jon 1:17). In Matthew (12:38-39) the "sign of Jonah" has something to do with Jesus' resurrection* (cf. 3 Macc 6:8). In Luke (11:31-32) it appears to be no more than Jesus' preaching. In a late rabbinic work Jonah's remarkable deliverance is described as a sign to the heathen (Pirqe R El. §10). Not only is Jesus greater than Jonah, he is also greater than Solomon, who was visited by the "queen of the South" (Mt 12:41-42; cf. 1 Kings 10:1-10).

When he took action in the Temple, Jesus said: "'My house shall be called a house of prayer* for all the nations.' But you have made it a 'den of robbers' " (Mk 11:17; cf. Is 56:7 + Jer 7:11). Isaiah 56 anticipates the day when all peoples will gather at Jerusalem to worship the Lord. By crowding the Temple's "court of the Gentiles" with sacrificial animals, the ruling priests made it difficult to pray and so showed callous disregard for Gentile* worshippers. Jeremiah 7 is a prophetic indictment of a violent and avaricious priesthood (see Priest and Priesthood), one destined to come under divine judgment. In alluding to this passage Jesus implied that the ruling priests were corrupt and possibly violent. Other Jewish sources reflecting upon the pre-70 AD. ruling priesthood paint a similar picture (cf. Josephus, Ant. 20.8.8 §181; 20.9.2 §§206-207; 2 Apoc. Bar 10:18; m. Ker. 1:7; t. Yoma 1:6-7; t. Menah 13:18-22; b. Pesah. 57a). As a rejoinder to the chief priests' indignation over the children's (see Child, Children) shouts of acclamation (which hark back to the triumphal entry; see Triumphal Entry) and the citation of Ps 118:26, cf. Mt 21:9), Jesus replied: "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings you have brought perfect praise" (Mt 21:16; cf. LXX Ps 8:3, one of the Hallel Psalms that small children were taught; t. Sota 6:2-3).
Jesus' parable of the wicked vineyard tenants begins with an important allusion to Isaiah's Song of the Vineyard (see Vine): "A man planted a vineyard, and set a hedge around it, and dug a pit for the wine press, and built a tower" (Mk 12:1; cf. Is 5:1-2). Whereas Isaiah's original song indicted all of Judah (cf. Is 5:3, 7), Jesus' parable limits the indictment to the Jewish religious leaders (cf. Mk 12:12). His application likely reflects exegetical traditions current in his time (cf. Tg. Isa. 5:1-7; t. Me'il. 1:16; t. Sukk. 3:15, where the song's "tower" is explicitly identified as the Temple, and the "wine vat" the altar). At the conclusion of the parable Jesus quotes Psalm 118:22-23: "The very stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner; this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes" (Mk 12:10-11). The rejected stone of Psalm 118 is to be understood as further explanation of the significance of the rejected son of the parable. The Targum's* paraphrase "the son which the builders rejected" (based upon a play on the words "son" [ben] and "stone" [eberi]), and the rabbis' custom of referring to themselves as the "builders" (cf. b. Šabb. 114a; b. Ber. 64a [in a positive sense]; CD 4:19; 8:12, 18 [in a negative sense]; cf. 1 Cor 3:10), likely facilitated Jesus' comparison.

Many of Jesus' parables either reflect or are based on the OT. The parable of the sower (Mk 4:3-9) may illustrate the truth of Isaiah 55:10-11 that God's Word is always fruitful, giving bread* to the sower (see also Jer 4:3 ["sow not among thorns"]; Is 6:13 ["the holy seed"]). The parable of the mustard seed (Mk 4:30-32) alludes to passages that speak of worldwide kingdoms (cf. Ezek 31:5-6; Dan 4:9, 18). The parable of the good Samaritan (Lk 10:30-37) is surely based on the story of the merciful Samaritans* in 2 Chronicles 28:8-15 (see v. 15, where the naked and wounded Judeans are clothed, provided with food and drink, anointed, carried on donkeys and taken to Jericho by Samaritans).

The parable of humility (Lk 14:7-14), in which Jesus urged his hearers to recline at the lower positions around the table, is based on the advice given in Proverbs 25:6-7: "Do not put yourself forward in the king's presence or stand in the place of the great; for it is better to be told, 'Come up here,' than to be put lower in the presence of the prince" (cf. Sir 3:17-20). The excuses proffered by the invited guests of the parable of the great banquet (Lk 14:15-24; cf. m. Abot 4:16: "[Prepare to] enter the banqueting hall") approximate those found in Deuteronomy 20:5-7.

The parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32) is probably commentary on the Deuteronomistic legislation concerned with the rights of inheritance of the first-bom son and of the punishment for a rebellious son (cf. Deut 21:15-17, 18-21). Similarly, the parable of the lost sheep (Lk 15:3-7; cf. Mt 18:12-14) may reflect the command to restore a lost sheep or ox to its owner (Deut 22:1-4; cf. Jer 31:10-14, parts of which read: "He who scattered Israel will gather him, and will keep him as a shepherd keeps his flock."... Then shall maidsens rejoice . . . and the young men and the old shall be merry.

Legislation concerning displaced or runaway servants (Deut 23:15-16) and the charging of interest (Deut 23:19-20) may underlie the parable of the dishonest manager (Lk 16:1-8). The parable of the rich fool may echo the words of the Preacher (Eccles 8:15: "to eat and drink, and enjoy himself"). The saying about salt (Mk 9:50; Mt 5:13) may reflect Job 6:6 ("Can that which is tasteless be eaten without salt?"). The parable of the dishonest judge (Lk 18:1-8) likely reflects Sirach 35:12-20. Jesus' statement "All who exalt themselves will be humbled; and all who humble themselves will be exalted," found sometimes appended to his parables (Lk 14:11; 18:9-14; cf. Mt 23:12), derives from Ezekiel 21:26 (cf. Job 22:29; Prov 29:23). When in the parable of the fig tree (Mk 13:28-31) Jesus says, "Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will not pass away" (v. 31), he not only echoes various OT passages that speak of the abiding permanence of God's Word (cf. Is 40:8; 55:11; Ps 119:89), he has implied that his words equal the very words of God.

In defending the hope of the resurrection, Jesus cites the words spoken from the burning bush: "I am the God of Abraham,* and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob" (Mk 12:26; cf. Ex 3:6,15). His point here is that God would not identify himself with the names of the dead, but with the living. With the citation "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand till I put your enemies under your feet" (Mk 12:36; cf. LXX Ps 109:1), Jesus startled his hearers by suggesting that the Son of David (i.e., the Messiah; see Christ; Son of David) is in fact greater than King David (not lesser as might be implied by his identification as the Son of David). Jesus' interpretation of this verse provides important evidence that Jesus understood his messiahship in terms very different from those of his contemporaries.

When Jesus asked God to forgive his executioners "for they know not what they do" (Lk 23:34), he alluded to Numbers 15:25-31 in which forgiveness is allowed for those who sin ignorantly. In quoting Psalm 22:1, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mk 15:34), Jesus identified himself with the righteous sufferer who endures insult and injury but anticipates divine vindication. At the moment of his death Jesus again identified with the righteous person who has been ill, tormented and abandoned by friends: "Father, into your hands I commit my spirit!" (Lk 23:46; cf. Ps 31:5; see Death of Jesus). This particular verse was sometimes cited by observant Jews before going to sleep (cf. b. Ber. 5a).

4. The OT in Mark.

Virtually all uses of the OT references in the Gospel of Mark are derived from the tradition. Although some have found extensive OT typology underlying this writing (usually based on the hexateuch), while others have concluded that the Markan Evangelist had little or no interest in the OT, it is likely that a mediating position is most accurate. When the Markan Jesus cries out, "Let the Scriptures be fulfilled" (14:49), he probably has given expression to a viewpoint not too different from that of the Evangelist's.

4.1. Legal. In a dispute with the Pharisees and scribes* concerning eating with ceremonially unclean hands (7:1-23; see Clean and Unclean), the Evangelist Mark (or possibly the tradition before him) comments: "Thus he declared all foods clean" (7:19). Evidently this is a traditional extension of Jesus' interpretation of the Mosaic dietary laws. (See also Mark's description of the Pharisaic "tradition of the elders"* in 7:3-4.) In light of this example, and judging by the way the laws of the Pentateuch are regularly presented in Mark in a favorable light (7:10; 10:4, 19; 12:19, 29-30), it is evident that the Markan Evangelist understood Jesus as upholding the Law, but possessing a power that transcends it.

4.2. Prophetic. Mark apparently defines the good news (see Gospel [Good News]) of Jesus Messiah in terms of the fulfillment of Isaiah's oracle of salvation* and deliverance: "Behold, I send my messenger before your face, who shall prepare your way; the voice of one crying in the wilderness: Prepare the way of the Lord, make his paths straight" (1:2-3; cf. Mal 3:1 + LXX Is 40:3). In other words, the good news of the Christian message is the fulfillment of that for which Israel had for many years longed. Qumran (1QS 8:12-14; 9:19-20; see Dead Sea Scrolls), as well as others (Bar 5:7; T. Moses 10:1-5), also understood Isaiah 40:3 as a prophetic text that spoke of restoration. At Jesus' baptism the heavenly voice echoed the words of Psalm 2:7: "You are my beloved Son; with you I am well pleased" (1:11; cf. Gen 22:2; Ex 4:22-23; Is 42:1). With this utterance Jesus' identity is made clear. Such recognition will not come forth from a human being until Jesus' death on the cross (cf. Mk 15:39). At the Mount of Transfiguration (see Transfiguration), where Jesus conversed with Moses, the heavenly voice once again spoke, only this time addressing the disciples: "This is my beloved Son; listen to him" (9:7; cf. Ps 2:7; Gen 22:2; Deut 18:15). The injunction to listen is probably an allusion to Deuteronomy 18:15 ("The Lord your God will raise up for you a prophet like me [Moses]... listen to him"). These citations and allusions strongly suggest that Mark understood Jesus as the fulfillment of Jewish messianic expectation. As God's beloved Son and as the prophet who was to come (see 8:28), Jesus was the long-awaited Messiah of Israel.*

The function of Scripture in the passion narrative (see Passion Narrative) would also suggest that Jesus was understood in terms of the righteous sufferer. There are three principal allusions or citations: the dividing and casting lots for Jesus' clothing (15:24; cf. Ps 22:18); the cry of abandonment (15:34; cf. Ps 22:1); and the giving of vinegar to drink (15:36; cf. Ps 69:21). Although it is possible that these allusions are not to be understood as fulfillments of Scripture, since after all not one is introduced as a fulfillment (compare Matthew and John), the earlier declaration, "Let the Scriptures be fulfilled" (14:49), uttered at the moment of the arrest, probably requires that they be so understood.

4.3. Analogical. When Mark tells the reader that Jesus "had compassion on [the people], because they were like sheep without a shepherd" (6:34; see Shepherd and Sheep), he has alluded to Moses* and his successor, Joshua, who had together functioned as Israel's shepherds: "Moses said to the Lord, '... appoint a man over the congregation ... that the congregation of the Lord may not be as sheep which have no shepherd.' And the Lord said to Moses, 'Take Joshua [LXX: Jesus] the son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit...' " (Num 27:17-18). The Mount of Transfiguration (9:2-8) contains numerous allusions to the theophanic traditions associated with the giving of the Law at Sinai: "after six days" (9:2; Ex 24:16); Moses/Jesus accompanied by three companions (9:2; Ex 24:9); mountain setting (9:2; Ex 24:12); Jesus and Moses together (9:4; Ex 24:1-18: "Jesus" in LXX); transfigured appearance (9:3; Ex 34:29-30); divine presence attended by cloud (9:7; Ex 24:15-16); heavenly voice (9:7; Ex 24:16); fear (9:6; Ex 34:30); "Hear him" (9:7; Deut 18:15). When the enthusiastic crowd (see People, Crowd) cries out, "Hosanna! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord! Blessed is the kingdom of our father David that is coming!" (Mk 11:9-10; cf. Ps 118:25-26), they have messianically interpreted this Hallel Psalm, one often cited as a greeting for pilgrims approaching Jerusalem for a religious Larger portions of Mark may reflect biblical themes. For example, the miracle stories (see Miracles and Miracle Stories) of Mark 4—8 parallel several of the elements found in Psalm 107: Deliverance from hunger and thirst in the wilderness (Mk 6:30-44; 8:1-10,14-21; cf. Ps 107:4-9; see Mountain and Wilderness); deliverance from imprisonment (Mk 5:1-20; 6:13; 7:24-30; cf. Ps 107:10-16); deliverance from sickness (Mk 5:21-6:5, 13, 53-56; 7:31-37; 8:22-26; cf. Ps 107:17-22; see Healing); and deliverance from peril at sea (Mk 4:35-41; 6:45-52; cf. Ps 107:23-32). The citation of Ps 118:22-23 ("The very stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner ..."), the apparent conclusion and explication of the parable of the wicked vineyard tenants (12:10-11), seems to lie at the heart of Mark's polemic against the Temple establishment of Jesus' day. Jesus found the Temple buzzing with religious activity, but it was as fruitless as the barren fig tree (11:11-21; see Cleansing of the Temple). The parable of the wicked vineyard tenants (12:1-12) implies that the religious leaders will lose their stewardship. The scribes are described as those who devour the estates of widows (12:38-40), while the widow who gave her last penny (12:41-44) is probably to be understood as a tragic example of the oppression that the Temple establishment inflicted upon the poor.

The magnificence of the Temple (13:1), as implied by the context, only testifies to its oppression. But the Temple will be destroyed (13:2). After his arrest Jesus is accused of threatening to destroy the Temple (14:58). Literally such an accusation is false, but theologically it is actually quite true. When Jesus died, the veil of the Temple was torn (15:38), the meaning of which is probably that Jesus' prophecy of the Temple's destruction has begun to be fulfilled. It was at the moment of his death and the tearing of the veil that the centurion confessed Jesus to be "Son of God"* (15:39). Mark's point in all of this is probably to show that Jesus, the rejected stone (or "son," as in the parable of the wicked vineyard tenants), has replaced the Temple, which at the time of his writing probably had been destroyed. The Temple that was "made with hands" has given way to the Temple "not made with hands," a Temple founded upon the rejected stone.

5. The OT in Matthew.

The extensive use of the OT in the Gospel of Matthew is well known. The Matthean Evangelist was keenly interested in showing how Jesus fulfilled every aspea of Scripture. All three components of the Hebrew Bible—legal, prophetic and wisdom/praise—have been fulfilled in Jesus. Not only has he personally fulfilled the requirements of the Law, but he is the Law's master interpreter. He not only fulfilled messianic prophecies, he is Israel's greatest prophet. Finally, he is the incarnation of Wisdom* itself, a master teacher who was unparalleled.

5.1. Legal. Matthew's interest in Jesus' halakah is plainly evident Jesus is not only the fulfillment of the prophetic Scriptures, but the legal Scriptures as well (cf. 3:15: "to fulfill all righteousness"). The arrangement of the Sermon on the Mount* (chaps. 5—7) is the clearest example of this interest. In chapter 5 Jesus makes it clear that his intention was not to break the Law, not even the smallest commandments (5:17-20). Indeed, as the antitheses illustrate (5:21-48), Jesus' ethical requirements are more stringent. In chapter 6 Matthew underscores Jesus' demands for religious purity and sincerity. Hypocrisy, whether Gentile or Jewish, is roundly condemned. It is Matthew who records Jesus' command to do what the scribes and Pharisees teach when they "sit on Moses' seat" that is, when they teach the Law of Moses (23:1-3). It is their hypocrisy that the Matthean Jesus condemns (23:3-12).

From time to time Matthew qualifies Mark's presentation of Jesus' interpretation of the Law. Whereas in Mark 10:11-12 Jesus states that divorce and remarriage (see Marriage and Divorce) constitute adultery, Matthew (19:9) states that remarriage constitutes adultery "except for unchastity." Matthew goes on to add a saying of Jesus on men who make themselves eunuchs for the kingdom (19:10-12).

5.2. Prophetic. At many points in his narrative Matthew describes such-and-such event as something that happened "in order that" a certain Scripture "be fulfilled." Five times in the infancy narrative various Scriptures are introduced this way: 1:23 (cf. LXX Is 7:14); 2:6 (cf. Mic 5:2); 2:15 (cf. Hos 11:1); 2:18 (cf. Jer 31:15) and 2:23 (probably alluding to the nēzer ["branch"] of Is 11:1; cf. Is 4:2; Jer 23:5; Judg 13:5). Jesus' ministry in Galilee is said to fulfill Scripture (4:15-16; cf. Is 9:1-2). Jesus' ministry of healing is said to fulfill the task of the Suffering Servant (set Servant of Yahweh): "He took our infirmities and bore our diseases" (8:17; cf. Is 53:4). Jesus' peaceful style of ministry is said to fulfill yet another aspect of the role of the Servant: "Behold, my servant whom I have chosen ... He will not wrangle or cry aloud ..." (12:17-21; cf. Is 42:1-3 + LXX 42:4). Moreover, Jesus' habit of teaching by means of parables fulfilled Scripture: "I will open my mouth in parables, I will utter what has been hidden since the foundation of the world" (13:35; cf. Ps 78:2). Jesus' entry into Jerusalem, mounted on a donkey, also fulfilled Scripture (21:4-5; cf. Is 62:11 + Zech 9:9). (Note how many messianic passages from Isaiah have been quoted or alluded to.) Judas' (see Judas Iscariot) betrayal of Jesus for thirty pieces of silver, and the subsequent purchase of the potter's field, also fulfilled Scripture (26:15; 27:9-10; cf. Zech 11:12-13 + Jer 18—19, 36). Finally, Jesus' arrest fulfilled Scripture (26:54, 56).

5.3. Analogical. Scriptural themes and echoes may be heard in Matthew's infancy narrative (see Birth of Jesus). Jesus' brush with death and flight to Egypt to escape Herod likely mirror the similar experience of the infant Moses, who was threatened by Pharaoh. Matthew's grouping of OT citations is also noteworthy: Five times in the infancy narrative Scripture is cited as "fulfilled." Five scriptural topics are discussed in the Sermon on the Mount (5:21-48). This parallelism may suggest that Matthew is trying to show how Jesus is the fulfillment of both prophetic and legal portions of Scripture. Matthew presents Jesus' teaching in five major discourses (chaps. 5—7, 10, 13, 18 and 23—25), ending each with something like "when Jesus finished these sayings" (cf. 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1).

Matthew's arrangement may have been an attempt to present Jesus' teaching (see Teacher) in a way that parallels that of Moses, whose Law is presented in five major books, and whose discourses sometimes close with words like "when he finished speaking all these words" (cf. Num 16:31; Deut 32:45). The resurrected Jesus standing before his disciples on the mountain (28:16-20) once again is presented as the new Moses. But Jesus is greater than Moses, for "all authority* in heaven and on earth has been given to" him (28:18).

Because Luke is usually viewed as the Gospel for Gentiles,* and because it does not regularly cite Scripture with the formula "in order that it be fulfilled," as do Matthew and John, the significance of this Evangelist's use of the OT is often underrated. The OT (i.e., the LXX) plays a very important role in this Gospel. The Evangelist not only cites specific passages and alludes to many others, he borrows its vocabulary and imitates its style. It is probable that the Evangelist understood the story of Jesus (the Gospel) and the early church* (the book of Acts) as the continuation of the biblical story. This may be implied, at least in part, when the risen Jesus told his disciples that "everything written about me in the Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms must be fulfilled" (24:44-47; cf. 24:26-27).

6.1. Legal. Although Luke is not nearly as concerned with the legal aspects of the Scriptures, there are indications that the Evangelist wished to portray Jesus and his parents as pious, observant Jews (see Birth of Jesus). At the end of eight days the infant Jesus was circumcised (2:21) in compliance with the Law (Gen 17:12; Lev 12:3; m. Šab. 18:3). The Evangelist is then careful to note that in observing the Mosaic laws of purification, Joseph and Mary brought the infant Jesus to Jerusalem (2:22). This they did in compliance with the laws concerning the firstborn (2:23; cf. Ex 13:2,12, 15) and purification of the mother (2:24; cf. Lev 12:8). Although the Evangelist concedes that there are sins from which people "could not be freed by the Law of Moses" (Acts 13:39), he felt that it was important to record Paul telling Governor Felix that he believed "everything laid down by the law" (Acts 24:14). Luke has not denigrated the Law; he believed that only through faith in Jesus could one overcome the problems of sin and unbelief.

6.2. Prophetic. Luke's prophetic perspective is clearly seen in his summarizing statements. Five times Jesus spoke of scriptural fulfillment (4:21; 18:31; 21:22; 24:25-27, 44-47; cf. 22:16). In Acts the Lukan Paul told the synagogue of Antioch: "And when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, they took him down from the tree . . ." (Acts 13:29). But there are several specific prophetic fulfillments that are distinctive to Luke. The angel* Gabriel told Zechariah that he was soon to have a son who "will go before [the Lord] in the spirit and power of Elijah,"* to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children" (1:17; cf. Mal 4:5-6; Sir 48:10; the passage is alluded to in Mk 9:11-12 par.). After John's birth, Zechariah again alludes to the prophecy of Malachi: "And you, child, will be called the prophet of the Most High; for you will go before the Lord to prepare his ways" (1:76; cf. Mal 3:1). In the same canticle Zechariah proclaims that God's salvation will "give light to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death" (1:79; cf. Is 9:2; portions of this passage are cited in Mt 4:15-16). One of the most significant citations is found in Luke's extension of the quotation from Isaiah 40: "The voice of one crying in the wilderness ... and all flesh shall see the salvation of God" (3:4-6; cf. LXX Is 40:3-5). By extending this traditional prooftext to include Isaiah 40:5, the Evangelist has underscored the universal mission of the Christian message. The preaching of John was not simply to bring about Israel's repentance and salvation, but the repentance and salvation of "all flesh."
The prophetic use of Scripture is also seen in Jesus' oracles predicting the doom of Jerusalem. When Jesus wept over the city and described the coming disaster (19:41-44), he borrowed vocabulary and imagery from the prophets who had spoken of the first destruction of Jerusalem (cf. Is 29:3; Jer 6:6; Ezek 4:2; see Destruction of Jerusalem). This tragedy will befall the holy city, "because [it] did not know the time of [its] visitation" (19:44; cf. LXX Jer 6:15: "in the time of their visitation they will perish"; Wis 3:7; 1 Pet 2:12). In his eschatological discourse (see Apocalyptic Teaching) the Lukan Jesus repeats his dire prediction concerning Jerusalem's fate (21:20-24). The inhabitants of the city should flee the coming wrath, "for these are days of vengeance, to fulfill all that is written" (21:22; cf. LXX Hos 9:11: "the days of vengeance have come"). According to Luke 21:24 the people of Jerusalem "will fall by the edge of the sword" (cf. Sir 28:18) and will "be led captive among all nations" (cf. LXX Deut 28:64); Jerusalem itself "will be trodden down by the Gentiles" (cf. LXX Zech 12:3), "until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (cf. Tob 14:5; Rom 11:25). When led away to crucifixion (23:26-31), the Lukan Jesus one last time warns of Jerusalem's coming destruction: "Then they will begin to say to the mountains, 'Fall on us,' and to the hills, 'Cover us' " (23:30; cf. Hos 10:8).

6.3. Analogical. At several points and in a variety of ways the Evangelist draws comparisons between Jesus and great figures of Israel's biblical history. The story of Jesus' birth is told with the story of Samuel in mind. Mary's Magnificat (1:46-55; see Mary's Song) is modeled after Hannah's song of thanksgiving following the birth of Samuel (1 Sam 2:1-10). In fact, the Magnificat is replete with scriptural allusions (e.g., compare 1:48 with LXX 1 Sam 1:11; 1:50 with Ps 103:17). When Luke wrote that "Jesus increased in wisdom and in stature, and in divine and human favor" (2:52), he undoubtedly had in mind the similar progress report concerning Samuel: "Now the boy Samuel continued to grow both in stature and in divine and human favor" (1 Sam 2:26). The Evangelist apparently exploited comparison between Jesus and the prophets Elijah and Elisha. When the disciples recommend that fire be called down from heaven to destroy the Samaritans (9:54), the reader is reminded of the fire that Elijah called down from heaven (2 Kings 1:10, 12). (For further examples see 3.3. above.) Luke's Gospel also compares Jesus with the Suffering Servant (see Servant of Yahweh) who would be "reckoned with transgressors" (22:37; cf. Is 53:12) and who, "as a sheep led to the slaughter," would not "open his mouth" (Acts 8:32-33; cf. Is 53:7-8).

Perhaps the most ambitious comparison that Luke has produced is between Jesus and Moses.* Not only has Luke explicitly cited parts of Deuteronomy 18:15-19 as fulfilled in Jesus (cf. Acts 3:22-23; 7:37), he apparently has arranged the contents of his so-called central section (9:51 — 19:27) to correspond to the contents and order of Deuteronomy 1—26. But Luke's point in doing this was not simply to underscore the conviction that Jesus was indeed the prophet-like-Moses, rather, Luke wished some of the main concepts of Deuteronomy to be refracted through the dominical tradition. He apparently wanted his readers to study the materials of the central section in the light of the parallel passages and themes from Deuteronomy. Thus, the central section and Deuteronomy, by being set side by side, are mutually illuminating. This feature is readily seen in numerous examples.

When the legist acknowledged that it was the Samaritan, the one who "showed mercy," that fulfilled the Great Commandment (10:37; see Commandment), he thereby alluded to Deuteronomy's command that Israel in occupying Canaan not show mercy to the resident nations (cf. Deut 7:2, 16). This command was given lest foreigners cause Israel to break its covenant with God. Ironically, it was the foreigner, the Samaritan, who in showing mercy fulfilled the covenant. The Mary and Martha episode in Luke 10:38-42, in which Martha is busy preparing food while Mary sits listening to Jesus, illustrates the truth of Deuteronomy 8:3 that "one does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of the Lord." The excuses of those invited in the parable of the great banquet (Lk 14:15-24) approximate the excuses for not participating in holy war (Deut 20:5-7). The parable of the lost sheep (Lk 15:3-7) falls opposite legislation requiring lost sheep and oxen to be returned to their owners (Deut 22:1-4). The parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32) contrasts with Deuteronomy's legislation upholding the rights of inheritance for the oldest son (Deut 21:15-17) and that concerning the punishment of a disobedient and drunken son (Deut 21:18-21). The parable of the dishonest steward (Lk 16:1-8) is set over against laws concerned with the treatment of unemployed slaves (Deut 23:15-16).

7. The OT in John.

The formal usage of Scripture in the Fourth Gospel underscores the movement from Jesus' ministry of signs (chaps. 2—12) to his passion (chaps. 13—20). In the first half of the Gospel Scripture is introduced in a variety of ways, usually with the word written (1:23; 2:17; 6:31, 45; 7:38, 42; 8:17; 10:34; 12:14). In the second half Scripture is invariably introduced "in order that it be fulfilled"
(12:38, 3940; 13:18; 15:25; 19:24, 28, 36, 37). What is the meaning of this pattern? Whereas Jesus' ministry of signs was in keeping with scriptural requirements and expectations, his rejection (first formally acknowledged at 12:37 in reference to his ministry of signs) was in fulfillment of scriptural prophecy. Herein lies the Fourth Evangelist's apologetic: Rejection and crucifixion did not disprove Jesus' claim to messiahship (a position likely held in the late first-century synagogue); on the contrary, they proved it, as seen in the numerous fulfillments of Scripture. Consequently, we should not be surprised that the fundamental function of the OT in the Fourth Gospel is christological.

7.1. Legal. The Fourth Gospel provides few examples of the legal use of Scripture. In 7:14-24 Jesus complained that Jewish interpretation of the laws of Sabbath* (Ex 20:8-11) and circumcision (Lev 12:3) were inconsistent and unjust. This argument to some extent parallels that of Rabbi Eliezer (c. AD. 90): "If one supersedes the Sabbath on account of one of his members, should he not supersede the Sabbath for his whole body [if in danger of death]?", (t. Šab. 15:16). The question that Nicodemus put to the Pharisees ("Our law does not judge people without first giving them a hearing to find out what they are doing, does it?" [Jn 7:51 NRSV]) may have in mind the provisions of Deut 1:16-17; 17:6. The closest parallel, however, comes from the "oral law": "People pass judgment on a person if they hear his words; if they do not hear his words they cannot establish judgment on him" (Exod. Rab. 21.3 [on Ex 14:15]).

In a textually uncertain passage Jesus was asked what should be done with the woman caught in the act of adultery, in light of the Law's command that such an offender be stoned (Jn 8:5; cf. Lev 20:10). Jesus' gesture of writing on the ground may very well have been a deliberate allusion to Jeremiah 17:13 ("all who forsake thee [God] shall be put to shame; those who turn away from thee shall be written in the earth"), which would imply that the woman's accusers were unqualified to pass judgment on her.

In 8:17 Jesus alluded to Deuteronomy 19:15: "In your Law it is written that the testimony of two people is true." But even here the point is christological: not only does Jesus bear witness to himself; so does his Father (cf. 8:18). Other examples of legal interpretation also reflect christological interests. After Jesus was arrested and interrogated, Pilate told the Jews: "Take him yourselves and judge him by your own Law" (Jn 18:31). Jesus was judged by the "law," and was found deserving of death: "We have a law, and by that law he ought to die, because he has made himself the Son of God" (Jn 19:7). The law that was being referred to here is probably the command not to follow a prophet who introduces other gods (Deut 13:1-11) or the command against blasphemy (Lev 24:16), since Jesus' claim to be God's Son was considered by Caiaphas to be blasphemous (Mk 14:61-64). This same idea may lie behind the Talmudic tradition: "[Jesus] is going to be stoned because he ... led Israel astray" (b. Sank 43a; cf. 107b; b. Sab. 104b; b. Sota 47a).

7.2. Prophetic. In the Fourth Gospel it is John the Baptist* himself who said: "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, 'Make straight the way of the Lord' " (Jn 1:23; cf. LXX Is 40:3). The prophetic interpretation, however, is essentially the same as that found in the Synoptics. Similarly, Micah 5:2 is alluded to in the question about Jesus' origin: "Does not the Scripture say that the Christ is descended from David, and comes from Bethlehem?" (Jn 7:41-42). Jewish rejection and unbelief not only fulfilled prophecy: "Lord, who has believed our report, and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?" (12:38; cf. LXX Is 53:1); it was God's will: "He has blinded their eyes and hardened their heart, lest they should see with their eyes and perceive with their heart, and turn for me to heal them" (12:40; cf. Is 6:10; see Blindness and Deafness; Hardness of Heart). Judas's betrayal also fulfilled Scripture: "The one who ate my bread has lifted his heel against me" (13:18 NRSV; cf. Ps 41:9). Many of the elements of the passion fulfilled details of prophetic Scripture: "They hated me without a cause" (15:25; cf. Ps 69:4); "They parted my garments among them, and for my clothing they cast lots" (19:24; cf. LXX Ps 21:19); "I thirst'... vinegar" (19:28-29; cf. Ps 69:21); "Not a bone of him shall be broken" (19:36; cf. Ex 12:46); and "They shall look on him whom they have pierced" (19:37; cf. Zech 12:10; see Death of Jesus).

7.3. Analogical. At several points in the Fourth Gospel comparison is made between Jesus (as well as other characters) and OT figures and themes. In these examples Scripture is explicitly cited. When Jesus told the impressed Nathanael, "You will see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man" (1:51; cf. Gen 28:12), he compared himself implicitly with the patriarch Jacob. According to rabbinic tradition (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) the angels descended in order to look at Jacob (cf. Gen. Rab. 70.12 [on Gen 29:10]; Frg. Tg. Gen 12:28). The point seems to be that now it is Jesus who is the gateway between heaven and earth (cf. Jn 14:6). The zeal that Jesus showed for the Temple, the house of God, is comparable to David's zeal: "Zeal for your house will consume me" (2:17; cf. Ps 69:9). Of those who believe in Jesus it is said: "And they all shall be taught of God" (6:45; cf. LXX Is 54:13). In "consuming" Jesus, who is the "bread of life" which "came down from heaven" (cf. 6:35-65), Christians absorb God's teaching (much as the rabbis believed that in consuming the manna, the wandering Israelites absorbed Torah; cf. Philo, Mut. Nom. §§253-263; Mek. Bešallah §1 [on Ex 13:17]). In justifying his divine sonship, Jesus reminded his opponents of what Scripture has said to them: "I said, 'You are gods' " (10:34; cf. Ps 82:6). If regarded as "gods, sons of the Most High," for receiving the Law at Sinai (cf. b. 'Abod. Zar. 5a), then how can Jesus be justly accused of blasphemy when, as the Word of God sanctified and sent from heaven, he rightly has claimed to be the "Son of God" (Jn 10:35-36)?

In John the cry of the crowd, "Hosanna! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord" (12:13; cf. Ps 118:25-26), takes on added meaning that extends significantly beyond what is present in the Synoptic tradition (cf. Mt 21:9). The Fourth Gospel, mindful of the importance of the name of God (see Name, Naming), points out that Jesus has come in the Father's name, has worked in the Father's name, and has declared the Father's name (cf. 5:43; 10:25; 17:6,11,12, 26). The citation from Psalm 118 is therefore particularly appropriate in the Johannine context. Finally, comparison is made between Jesus and the gentle King Messiah of whom it is said: "Fear not daughter of Zion; behold, your king is coming, sitting on an ass's colt!" (12:15; cf. Is 40:9 + Zech 9:9).

There are many significant allusions to scriptural passages and themes. The Johannine Prolog (1:1-18) echoes biblical wisdom traditions at many points: "From the beginning with wisdom the Word of the Lord perfected the heavens and the earth" (Tg. Neof. Cen 1:1; cf. Jn 1:1); "In the beginning [arche] he created me [Wisdom]" (Sir 24:9; cf. Jn 1:1); "He established me in the beginning [archel]" (LXX Prov 8:23; cf. Jn 1:1); "Before the mountains were shaped, before all the hills, he begets [genna] me" (LXX Prov 8:25); "I am the word which was spoken by the Most High" (Sir 24:3; cf. Jn 1:1); "He gave authority [exousia] in Jerusalem" (Sir 24:11; cf. Jn 1:12); "Your all-powerful word [logos] leaped from heaven, from the royal throne, into the midst of the land" (Wis 18:15; cf. Jn 1:1, 14); "My Creator . . . said, 'Dwell [kataskēnoun] in Jacob' " (Sir 24:8; cf.Jn 1:14); "Who has seen [heoraken] him [God] and can describe [ekdiēgēsetai] him?" (Sir 43:31; cf. Jn 1:18).

The final paragraph of the Prolog (Jn 1:14-18) deliberately contrasts Jesus with Moses. Jesus is the incarnate Word of God (see Logos), "full of grace and truth" (Jn 1:14), the very virtues with which God himself abounds (Ex 34:6). In Jesus is seen the glory* that Moses had hoped to see in God (Jn 1:14; Ex 33:18).
In Jesus people "have received (new) grace* in place of (old) grace" (Jn 1:16). Whereas the Law was given through Moses, grace and truth* were realized through Jesus the Messiah (Jn 1:17). And finally, although no one can see God (Jn 1:18)—not even Moses ("no one can see my face and live" [Ex 33:20]), who was permitted no more than a fleeting glance of God's retreating back (Ex 33:20-23), Jesus existed with God face to face ("in his bosom" [Jn 1:18]; cf. "with [pros] God" [Jn 1:1]) for all eternity.

Comparisons between Jesus and Moses are seen in many places in the Fourth Gospel. Some are explicit: "Of whom Moses wrote in the Law we have found" (Jn 1:45, probably alluding to the promise of Deut 18:15-18); "Just as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up" (Jn 3:14; cf. Num 21:9); "If you had believed Moses, you would have believed in me, for that one wrote concerning me" (Jn 5:46); "Moses has not given to you the bread* from heaven, but my Father gives you the true bread from heaven" (Jn 6:32; cf. 6:31-35, citing LXX Ps 77[78]:24, which in turn is alluding to Ex 16:15; Num 11:7-9); "If a man receives circumcision on the Sabbath lest the Law of Moses be broken, are you angry with me because I made a whole man well on the Sabbath?" (Jn 7:23); " 'You are a disciple of [Jesus]; we are disciples of Moses' " (Jn 9:28). Other comparisons involve no more than important verbal parallels (as, in these cases, seen clearly in the LXX): "This is indeed the prophet who is to come" (Jn 6:14; cf. Deut 18:18); "I who speak to you am he" (Jn 4:26; cf. Deut 18:18); "though he had done so many signs before them, yet they did not believe in him" (Jn 12:37; cf. Num 14:11; Ex 4:30-31); "For God sent the Son into the world" (Jn 3:17; cf. Num 16:28); "I speak as the Father taught me" (Jn 8:28; cf. Exod 4:12); "I do as the Father has commanded me" (Jn 14:31; cf. Lev 16:34; Num 27:22); "and he will enter and he will go out and he will find pasture" (Jn 10:9; cf. Num 27:21); "The Good Shepherd lays down his life for his sheep" (Jn 10:11; cf. Num 27:17).

PARABLE

The English word parable refers to a short narrative with two levels of meaning. The Greek and Hebrew-words for "parable" are much broader. Jesus' parables are both works of art and the weapons he used in the conflict with his opponents. They were the teaching method he chose most frequently to explain the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) and to show the character of God* and the expectations God has for people. Despite the tradition that argues Jesus' parables have only one point, many parables convey two or three truths, and there may be several correspondences between a specific parable and the reality it portrays.

1. History of Interpretation
2. Definition of Parable and Related Terms
3. Characteristics of the Parables
4. The Use of Parables Prior to Jesus
5. Distribution of the Parables in the Gospels
6. The Authenticity of the Parables
7. The Purpose of the Parables
8. Guidelines for Interpretation
9. The Teaching of the Parables

1. History of Interpretation.

A history of interpretation is virtually a prerequisite for studying Jesus' parables. That history must be framed in relation to the work of A. Jülicher, a German NT scholar whose two-volume work on the parables (1888, 1889) has dominated parable studies, even though it has never been translated.

1.1. Before Jülicher. Throughout most of the church's history Jesus' parables have been allegorized instead of interpreted. That is, people read into the parables elements of the church's theology that had nothing to do with Jesus' intention. The best-known example of this is Augustine's interpretation of the parable of the good Samaritan (Lk 10:30-37) in which virtually every item was given theological significance: the man is Adam; Jerusalem is the heavenly city; Jericho is the moon, which stands for our mortality; the robbers are the devil (see Demon, Devil, Satan) and his angels* who strip the man of his immortality and beat him by persuading him to sin; the priest and Levite are the priesthood (see Priest and Priesthood) and the ministry of the OT; the good Samaritan* is Christ*; the binding of the wounds is the restraint of sin; the oil and wine are the comfort of hope and the encouragement to work; the animal is the Incarnation; the inn is the church; the next day is after the resurrection of Christ; the innkeeper is the apostle Paul; and the two denarii are the two commandments* of love* or the promise of this life and that which is to come (Quaest. Evan. 2.19). Similarly, Gregory the Great allegorized the parable of the barren fig tree (Lk 13:6-9) so that the three times the owner came looking for fruit represent God's coming before the Law* was given, his coming at the time the Law was written, and his coming in grace and mercy in Christ. The vinedresser (see Vine) represents those who rule the church, and the digging and dung refer to the rebuking of unfruitful people and the remembrance of sins (Horn. 31). Some, such as John Chrysostom of the school of Antioch and John Cabin did not allegorize the parables, but until the end of the nineteenth century allegorizing was the dominant means of interpretation.

1.2. Jülicher. Although others before him had argued against allegorizing, Jülicher's two-volume work on the parables sounded the death knell on this interpretive procedure. Jülicher denied that Jesus used allegory (a series of related metaphors) or allegorical traits (where a point in the story stands for something else in reality). Where allegory or allegorical traits occur, such as in the parable of the sower and the parable of the wicked tenants, the Evangelists are to blame. Jülicher viewed Jesus' parables as simple and straightforward comparisons that do not require interpretation. They have only one point of comparison: between the image and the idea being expressed. That one point is usually a general religious maxim. The parables are extended similes, whereas allegories are extended metaphors. Like metaphors, allegories are inauthentic speech and must be decoded. Jesus' purpose was not to obscure, therefore his parables cannot be viewed as allegories.

1.3. After Jülicher. All subsequent studies of the parables have had to deal with Jülicher's views. There were early attacks on Jülicher's arguments, particularly by P. Fiebig (beginning in 1904), who argued that Jülicher derived his understandings of parables from Greek rhetoric rather than from the Hebrew world where allegorical parables are common. Others recognized that Jülicher had thrown out allegory, a literary form, while the problem was allegorizing, the interpretive procedure of reading into the parables a theology that Jesus did not intend. Few today would accept Jülicher's descriptions of metaphor or his argument that the parables give general religious maxims. There have been devastating critiques of his description of allegory, but even so, people often still speak of one point for parables and are suspicious of any parts of Jesus' parables that have allegorical significance. In addition, there have been several stages through which parable interpretation has gone.

1.3.1. C. H. Dodd and J. Jeremias. The Dodd and Jeremias era of parable studies extends from 1935 to roughly 1970, although Jeremias' book on the parables is still influential. Jeremias' work was an extension of Dodd's and both were influenced by Jülicher. Both Dodd and Jeremias tried to understand the parables of Jesus in their historical and eschatological context (see Eschatology). Both attempted to remove allegorical elements from the parables. Dodd understood Jesus' message as realized eschatology: the kingdom had already arrived. Parables about harvest are not about a coming end time but about the time of Jesus' earthly ministry.

Jeremias sought to provide historical and cultural evidence for understanding the parables and, under the influence of form criticism, to ascertain a given parable's original form by stripping away allegorical features or other additions supplied by the early church. Typically this led to a reconstruction of the supposedly original form of a given parable. Almost invariably the context in the Gospels, the introductions, the conclusions, and any interpretive comments were considered secondary. Such shortened, de-allegorized forms are close to the versions of the parables in the Gospel of Thomas, a collection of sayings of Jesus dating probably from the second century (see Gospels [Apocryphal]). The relation of the Gospel of Thomas to the canonical Gospels, its date and its character are all debated. The fact that Jeremias and others had suggested shorter forms of the parables before the discovery of Thomas was made known has erroneously led some to argue that Thomas preserves the original form of some of the parables.

While granting the presence of the kingdom in Jesus' ministry, Jeremias described Jesus' message as an eschatology in the process of realization. In his parables Jesus presented people with a crisis of decision and invited them to respond to God's mercy.* Jeremias' influence has been so strong that N. Perrin argued that future interpretation of the parables should be interpretation of the parables as Jeremias has analyzed them (101).

1.3.2. Existentialist, Structuralist and Literary Approaches. Several modern approaches to parables have grown out of philosophical currents and partly out of dissatisfaction with the focus of Dodd and Jeremias on a historical approach. While seeking something more than the merely historical, however, these approaches still follow Jeremias in stripping off allegorical and interpretive additions. The new hermeneutic of E. Fuchs and E. Jüngel focused on the power of Jesus' parables to bring to expression the reality to which they point. The parables are viewed as "language events" (Sprachereignisse). In the parables Jesus expresses his understanding of his own existence in such a way that this existence is available to his hearers. The parables are a summons to this existence.

Similarly, G. V. Jones, A. N. Wilder and D. Via all have focused on the artistic and existential character of the parables. Especially for Via the parables are not bound by the author's intention. They are aesthetic works which address the present because in their patterns is an understanding of existence that calls for decision.

K. Bailey's work on the parables is noteworthy because of his detailed focus on the rhetorical structure of the parables as well as his interpretation in light of the Palestinian mindset, a mindset he encountered as a missionary in Lebanon.

In the decade between 1970 and 1980 structuralist approaches dominated parable studies. Structuralists were not concerned for historical meaning or the author's intention. Rather they sought to compare both surface and deep structures of various texts; that is, they sought to compare the movements, motives, functions, oppositions and resolutions within texts. At times structuralist analyses have been helpful, such as J. D. Crossan's identification of the categories of advent, reversal and action as basic to understanding the parables. The kingdom of God comes as advent as a gift of God, as a reversal of a person's world, and as an empowering for action. For the most part, however, structuralist studies have been dominated by technical jargon and have not provided much additional insight.

The 1980s witnessed several discernible shifts in parable studies, largely because of the influence of literary criticism (see Literary Criticism). Although a concern for redactional emphases of the Gospel writers has been a focus since the 1950s, literary concerns have led to much more attention on the technique and purposes of the Evangelists in the composition of their works. Literary criticism has also tended to emphasize a reader-response approach in which a text's meaning is determined by the interaction of the reader with the text. This approach is highly subjective and yields a variety of meanings, all of which are considered correct. Such a polyvalent understanding of texts invites the interpreter to be a "trained player" and read texts with as many different associations as desired. For example, the parable of the prodigal son can be read in light of Freudian psychology in which the prodigal, the elder brother, and the father reflect the id, the super-ego, and the ego. It can be read just as legitimately in other contexts with this method. However, such subjective readings of the parables are not interpretations at all; they are retellings of the stories in new contexts. To understand the message of Jesus one will have to do justice to the historical context in which the parables were told.

1.4. Interpretations Based on Comparisons with Jewish Parables. An alternative trend in recent parable studies focuses on insights gained by studying early rabbinic parables (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Comparing Jewish parables to Jesus' parables is not new. P. Fiebig had already done this in combating Jülicher's approach, and about the same time A. Feldman had collected Jewish parables that made such comparison easier. Now approximately 2,000 rabbinic parables have been collected. In recent years several works have appeared that discuss parable theory in light of rabbinic parables and rethink previous theories and interpretations. Most important of these is the research of D. Flusser, a Jewish NT scholar whose primary work has not yet been translated into English. Flusser's work, and that of other scholars focusing on Judaism, challenges the conclusions not only of Jülicher, but also of Jeremias, of the reader-response approaches and of much of NT scholarship. Flusser acknowledges a thoroughgoing editing of the parables by the Evangelists, but he is optimistic about the reliability of the Gospel material. He argues that the contexts of the parables are usually correct and that the introductions and conclusions to the parables are necessary and usually derive from Jesus. He views the Gospel of Thomas as dependent on the Synoptic Gospels and as unimportant for researching the words of Jesus.

The distance some recent studies have moved from the works of Jülicher and Jeremias is evidenced in C. Blomberg's treatment of the parables. Blomberg argues that the parables of Jesus, like the rabbinc parables, are allegories and usually have two or three points to make, depending on the number of main characters the parable has.

2. Definition of Parabole and Related Terms.

The Greek word parabole has a much broader meaning in the Gospels than the English word parable. It can be used of a proverb (Lk 4:23), a riddle (Mk 3:23), a comparison (Mt 13:33), a contrast (Lk 18:1-8) and both simple stories (Lk 13:6-9) and complex stories (Mt 22:1-14). This range of meaning derives from the Hebrew word māšal which is usually translated by parabole in the LXX (28 of 39 occurrences). In addition māšal can be used of a taunt a prophetic oracle or a byword. A māšal is any dark saying intended to stimulate thought.

The concept of a parable needs to be clarified beyond distinguishing the wide meanings of the words parabole and māšal. Four forms of parables are often distinguished: similitude, example story, parable and allegory. A similitude is an extended simile (an explicit comparison using "like" or "as"). It is a comparison relating a typical or recurring event in real life and is often expressed in the present tense. The parable of the leaven (Mt 13:31-32) is a similitude. An example story presents a positive or negative character (or both) who serves as an example to be imitated or whose traits and actions are to be avoided. Either explicitly or implicitly the example story says, "Go and do [or do not do] likewise" (cf. Lk 10:37). Usually only four Gospel parables, all in Luke, are identified as example stories: the good Samaritan, the rich fool, the rich man and Lazarus, and the pharisee and the tax collector. A parable is an extended metaphor (an implied comparison) referring to a fictional event or events narrated in past time to express a moral or spiritual truth. The parable of the banquet (Lk 14:15-24) would fit this definition. In this classification system an allegory is a series of related metaphors, and the parable of the sower would be an example of an allegory.

Although this fourfold classification is popular, many scholars find it unworkable. Some object to the category "example story," but as long as one does not overlook that more may be involved in these stories than merely providing an example, this is a helpful classification. Clearly these stories are different from other parables in some respects. More troublesome is the supposed distinction between parable and allegory, which is among the most debated issues in NT studies. For some, such as M. Boucher, allegory is not a literary form at all, but a device of meaning; therefore, all parables are allegorical either as wholes or in their parts. Parables rarely have only one correspondence between the story and the reality being reflected, even though one should not view interpretation of the parables as the process of deciphering points. Parables are best defined as stories with two levels of meaning; the story level provides a mirror by which reality is perceived and understood. In effect, parables are imaginary gardens with real toads in them.

3. Characteristics of the Parables.

Parables tend to be brief and symmetrical. They often make use of balanced structures involving two or three movements. They typically omit unnecessary descriptions and frequently leave motives unexplained and implied questions unanswered. They usually are taken from everyday life, but they are not necessarily realistic. Because of hyperbole or elements of improbability they often are pseudo-realistic and have elements that shock. For example, it is unlikely that anyone in first-century Palestine would owe a 10,000-talent debt (several million dollars) as in the parable of the unforgiving servant (Mt 18:23-35). In addition, parables elicit thought. Twenty-two parables start with a question such as "Who from you ... ?" or "What do you think ... ?" Parables frequently cause a hearer to pass judgment on the events in the story and then require a similar judgment about religious matters. Often the parables require a reversal in one's thinking. The despised Samaritan is a neighbor; the tax collector (see Taxes), not the Pharisee,* is righteous (injustice, Righteousness). The crucial matter is placed at the end of the parables, and correspondingly, "the rule of end stress" requires that the interpretation focus on the end of the parable. Although the parable of the wicked tenants has christological implications, most parables are theocentric in that they focus on God, his kingdom and his expectations for humans. Consequently, the parables are often invitations to changed behavior and discipleship.* The degree to which the theological referent is transparent varies from parable to parable.

4. The Use of Parables Prior to Jesus.

Jesus was not the first person to teach by parables and stories. There are both Greek and Semitic antecedents, but there is no evidence of anyone prior to Jesus using parables as consistently, creatively and effectively as he did. There are so many rabbinic parables similar to the ones Jesus told that some scholars argue Jesus drew from a fund of popular stories or at least that he drew his themes and structures from such a fund. As always with the rabbinic evidence, the problem is that these writings are later than the time of the NT. Because there is so little actual evidence of teaching in parables prior to Jesus, some scholars argue that Jesus' use of parables was entirely new. There are no parables so far from Qumran and none in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha (excluding the so-called Similitudes of Enoch, which are apparently later in origin). Virtually none of the rabbinic parables is from as early as the first half of the first century. In addition to the problem of date, rabbinic parables, all of which are in Hebrew rather than Aramaic, primarily are used as a means to interpret Scripture, whereas Jesus did not use parables this way.

The OT does provide seven parables which are antecedents to Jesus' parables: Nathan's parable to David about the poor man and his lamb (2 Sam 12:1-10); the woman from Tekoa's story about her two sons (2 Sam 14:5-20); the prophet's acted parable condemning Ahab (1 Kings 20:35-40); the song of the vineyard (Is 5:1-7); the eagles and the vine (Ezek 17:2-10); the lioness and her cubs (Ezek 19:2-9); and the vine (Ezek 19:10-14). (Only Ezek 17:2-10 is explicitly called a māšal. In addition, Judg 9:7-15 and 2 Kings 14:9 contain fables.) Of these OT parables only Nathan's parable of the poor man and his lamb is a true parallel to the parables of Jesus.

5. Distribution of the Parables in the Gospels.

Approximately one-third of Jesus' teaching is in parables. The Greek word parabole occurs fifty times in the NT, and except for Hebrews 9:9 and 11:19 all the occurrences are in the Synoptic Gospels. Parables appear in all strata of the Synoptics. If one accepts the four-source hypothesis of Gospel origins, parables make up about sixteen per cent of Mark, about twenty-nine per cent of Q* about forty-three per cent of M* and about fifty-two per cent of L* John does not have story parables, but does have forms that would fit the broad sense of māšal such as the good shepherd (Jn 10; see Shepherd and Sheep) and the true vine (Jn 15). (John uses the word paroimia four times. This word is similar in some respects to parabole.)
An exact number of the parables cannot be given since there is no agreement among scholars as to which forms should be classified as a parable. There are thirty forms explicitly labeled parable, but this includes proverbs (Lk 4:23); riddles (Mk 3:23); short sayings (Mk 7:15) and questions (Lk 6:39). There are at least forty parables on a more restricted definition, but as many as sixty-five if one includes such items as Jesus' saying about a person with a beam in his or her eye trying to get a speck out of the eye of another (Mt 7:3-5).

The parables are thematically arranged in the Synoptics. Mark has only four story parables: in chapter four the sower, the mustard seed, the seed growing... secretly; and in chapter twelve the wicked tenants. Except for the seed growing secretly, Matthew and Luke have Mark's story parables and both of them have the parables of the leaven and of the lost sheep. Both Matthew and Luke have parables about guests who reject invitations to a feast (Mt 22:1-14; Lk 14:16-26) and about servants who are entrusted with money to invest (Mt 25:14-30; Lk 19:11-27). However, the wording is not close in either of these parallels, and whether Matthew and Luke are reporting the same parables or only similar parables is debated. Jesus, no doubt, told some of the parables more than once and offered several variations on the same basic structure. Matthew has arranged most of his parables in chapters 12—13, 18 and 20—25. He has at least twelve parables that are unique to him. Luke has placed most of his parables in chapters 10—19 of his so-called travel narrative. Luke has at least fifteen parables that are unique to him.

Fourteen parables occur among the sayings of the Gospel of Thomas, three of which are not recorded in the canonical Gospels. The Apocryphon of James also has three parables not recorded in the canonical Gospels.

6. The Authenticity of the Parables.

Even scholars who are persuaded that the Gospel parables include additions by the early church still view the parables as providing some of the most authentic and reliable teaching from Jesus (see Form Criticism). Supporting evidence for this confidence is strong:

(1) The parables reflect the clarity and eschatology of Jesus' preaching and his conflict with Jewish authorities.

(2) They reflect daily life in Palestine.

(3) Little evidence exists that parables were used frequently prior to Jesus.

(4) In view of the fact that parables do not appear in the NT outside the Gospels and rarely in other early Christian literature, the early church shows no propensity for creating parables.

At the same time critical scholarship has gone to great lengths debating the authenticity of both the parts and the whole of specific parables. The so-called Jesus Seminar has even produced a Red Letter edition of the parables of Jesus which prints the wording of the parables in red, pink, gray or black reflecting the opinions respectively that Jesus said those words, said something like those words, did not say those words but expressed similar ideas, or did not say those words and the ideas are from a later time. Only three parables represented in the canonical tradition are printed entirely in black (the tower builder and the warring king, both in Lk 14:28-32, and the fishnet, Mt 13:47-50), and only four more in which all accounts are printed entirely in gray. (However, in these cases preference is often for the version of the parable in the Gospel of Thomas.)

While this underscores the confidence expressed in the parable tradition, the assumptions and procedures adopted by the Jesus Seminar and many other scholars are unacceptable. The Jesus Seminar, like so many earlier scholars, has succumbed to the tendency to find a Jesus who is amenable with modern expectations. Far too much preference is given to the Gospel of Thomas, which appears to derive from a second stage of the oral tradition. Furthermore, the rejection of the introductions and conclusions of the parables and of any allegorical significance is unjustified in light of recent research on Jewish parables. The oral tradition no doubt shaped the parables, and the Evangelists have clearly edited them in keeping with their stylistic tendencies and theological purposes. We can and should identify many such changes. However, any attempt to identify the ipsissima verba (the exact words) of Jesus is naive at best The Gospels present the ipsissima vox (the very voice) of Jesus, and nowhere is that voice so clearly heard as in the parables.

7. The Purpose of the Parables.

Often it has been said that the parables of Jesus are not merely illustrations of Jesus' preaching but are themselves the preaching. Clearly the parables are to engage and instruct, but it is not fair to say that the parables are themselves the preaching. Parables demand interpretation; they point to something else. They are not merely stories to enjoy. They hold up one reality to serve as a mirror of another, the kingdom of God. They are avenues to understanding, handles by which one can grasp the kingdom. Jesus told parables to confront people with the character of God's kingdom and to invite them to participate in it and to live in accordance with it.

Mark 4:10-12, however, seems to say the exact opposite. On the surface these verses argue that Jesus gives the secret of the kingdom only to his disciples. "To those outside all things are in parables in order that seeing they may see and not see, and hearing they may hear and not understand, lest they turn and it be forgiven them" (Mk 4:11-12). The latter part of this saying is from Isaiah 6:9-10.

An understanding of Mark requires attention to his technique, structure and theological emphases. Mark uses the technique of bracketing to provide insight into the individual sections of his Gospel. For example, the cleansing of the Temple (11:15-19; see Temple Cleansing) is bracketed by the cursing of the fig tree (11:12-14) and the lesson drawn from the withered fig tree (11:20-25). Furthermore, the material in 4:1-34 has been carefully arranged:

4:1-2—Narrative introduction telling that Jesus taught parables from a boat

4:3-9—The parable of the sower

4:10-12—Jesus alone with disciples with whom he contrasts those who are outside

4:13-20—Interpretation of the parable of the sower

4:21-25—Parabolic sayings about hearing

4:26-32—Parables of the seed growing secretly and the mustard seed

4:33-34—Narrative conclusion summarizing the intent of this section

Some argue that this structure is chiastic, with the center of the chiasmus being the interpretation of the parable of the sower. (Chiasmus is a poetic a b b' a' pattern.) Note that in 4:35-41 Jesus and his disciples are back in the boat. This section picks up chronologically where 4:9 seems to have left off. Therefore, 4:10-34 comprise a thematic arrangement by the author. Note also that 3:31-34, with its focus on Jesus' family standing outside seeking him and 4:10-12 with its focus on those outside bracket the parable of the sower just as the parable of the sower and its interpretation bracket 4:10-12.

The dominant theme in the whole chapter is "hearing," which is mentioned thirteen times. Isaiah 6:9-10, which is quoted in a version similar to the targum* on Isaiah, was a classic text on the hardiness of people's hearts as they refused to hear God's prophetic word Hardness of heart (see Hardness of Heart) is an important theme for Mark and is even possible of Jesus' disciples. (Note Mk 8:16-21, which uses words similar to Is 6:9-10, but this time drawn from Jer 5:21 or Ezek 12:2.)
Several scholars have tried to soften the impact of Mark 4:12 by interpreting hina ("in order that") as expressing something less than purpose. T. W. Man-son suggested hina was a mistranslation of the Aramaic de which can mean "who." Accordingly, he would translate, "... all things come in parables to those outside who see indeed, but do not know ..." (76-78). J. Jeremias argued hina was shorthand for hina plerothê ("in order that it might be fulfilled"). Others suggest hina should be interpreted as "because" as in Revelation 14:13, especially since the parallel in Matthew 13:13 has hoti ("because"). Jeremias' suggestion is helpful, but these explanations are unnecessary. They only mark the difficulty people have with the possibility that Jesus told parables to prevent understanding. Scholars have often attributed this to "Mark's parable theory," rather than to Jesus. Mark, however, does not have a theory that parables prevent understanding (cf. Mk 12:12).

The intent of Mark 4:10-12 is clear if one pays attention to the context. The kingdom is a kingdom of the word, and the issue is how people hear and respond to the word. The parable of the sower is a parable about hearing. In Mark 4:10-12 the Evangelist shows what typically happened in Jesus' ministry. (Note the use of the Grk imperfect tenses in Mk 4:101 indicating what happened customarily.) Jesus taught the crowds, but his teaching called for response. Where people responded, additional teaching was given. The pattern of public teaching followed by further private teaching to a circle of disciples* is used elsewhere by Mark (7:17; 10:10). The strong words in Isaiah 6:9-10 were not an indication that God did not want to forgive people. They were a blunt statement expressing the inevitable. People would hear, but not really understand.

The hardness of heart and lack of receptivity that Isaiah encountered were mirrored in the ministry of Jesus. The issue is whether one's heart will be hardened or whether one will hear and respond obediently. Even receiving the message with joy is not sufficient (4:16). What is required is hearing that leads to productive living. That this is Mark's intent is clear from the summary in 4:33: "With many such parables he was expressing the word to them, even as they were able to hear." The saying in 4:22 is also an important guide to understanding Mark's intent: "Nothing is hidden except that it should be revealed." This saying seems to be Mark's understanding of the parables. Parables hide in order to reveal. Even though some would respond with hardness of heart and lack of hearing, Jesus taught in parables to elicit hearing and obedient response.
8. Guidelines for Interpretation.

The interpretation of the parables is not a scientific procedure, but guidelines can be offered to enhance understanding and prevent abuse of the parables.

(1) Analyze the sequence, structure and wording of the parable, including any parallels in the other Gospels. Plot the movement of the parable, and note any specific structure such as parallelism or chiasmus. For example, there are significant parallels between the prodigal and the elder son in Luke's parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32). Significant changes in wording between the various accounts need to be understood in light of the redactional purposes of the Evangelists (see Redaction Criticism). One should not assume any particular Gospel always gives the earliest version of a specific parable. Certainly one should not excise the introductions and conclusions to the parables.

(2) Note cultural or historical features in the parable that provide insight. Most of the parables contain such features that require investigation. For example, the impact of the parable of the pharisee and the tax collector (Lk 18:9-14) is strengthened if one is aware that these two men probably went to the Temple* to pray* at the time of the morning or evening atoning sacrifice. In effect, the tax collector prayed, "Let the sacrifice result in mercy for me."

(3) Listen to the parables in the context of the ministry of Jesus. Modern readers are often so familiar with the parables that they miss the shock that Jesus' hearers would have felt. We tend to have negative views of Pharisees and are not surprised to hear Jesus say that the tax collector was declared righteous instead of the Pharisee. Jesus' hearers would have assumed that the Pharisee was a righteous man and that the tax collector was a cheat. We are not surprised that a Samaritan helps a victim (Lk 10:30-37), but Jesus' hearers, like the scribe to whom he spoke, could hardly say "Samaritan" and "neighbor" in the same breath. Parables often force such reversals in our thinking.

(4) Look for help in the context, but know that the context of many of the parables has not been preserved. The parable of the wicked tenants (Mt 21:33-44 and pars.) must be seen in light of the question about the authority* by which Jesus does his acts (Mt 21:23-27). On the other hand, Matthew 13 provides a thematic grouping of eight parables on the kingdom, the contexts of which have not been preserved.
(5) Note how the parable and its redactional shaping fit into the plan and purposes of the Gospel in which it appears. Most of the parables have been arranged thematically by the Evangelists to highlight Jesus' message. With such arrangements the Evangelists show their own theological tendencies. For example, Luke's parables appear primarily in his travel narrative (9:51—19:48), which is chiastic in its structure. Luke is concerned about prayer, wealth and the outcasts. Not surprisingly, Luke has arranged parables on prayer in 11:5-13 and 18:1-14, on wealth in 12:13-21 and 16:1-31, on invitations to a feast (particularly invitations to outcasts; see Table Fellowship) as reflective of the kingdom in 14:7-24, and on the joy of recovering that which was lost in 15:1-32. In addition to the kingdom parables in chapter 13, Matthew has placed two parables in the context of his "ecclesiastical discourse" in 18:10-14, 21-35 and has also grouped three parables on Israel's rejection of God's invitation in 21:28—22:14 and seven more on eschatology in 24:32—25:46. Matthew and Luke differ on the placement of some of the parables as well. For example, Luke has the parable of the lost sheep (15:1-7) in a context dealing with the repentance of sinners, but Matthew has this parable in a context dealing with an erring disciple. Jesus surely told some of the parables more than once, but such variations may result from intentional editorial activity.

(6) Determine the function of the story as a whole in the teaching of Jesus and for the Evangelists. There may be more than one truth to the parable and several correspondences between the parable and the reality that it reflects. This is not, however, a license to allegorize. Some parables even have two climaxes. (Note the parable of the prodigal, or more aptly tided the parable of the father and his two sons, in Lk 15:11-32 and the parable of the wedding feast in Mt 22:1-14, although the latter could be a joining of two parables.) Any correspondence between the parable and the reality it reflects will probably be limited to the main characters in the story. Details should not be allegorized and parables should not be pushed beyond their purpose. The goal is to hear the intention of Jesus as conveyed by the Evangelists. A helpful way to determine the function of a parable is to ask what question it seeks to answer. Sometimes the question is explicit, such as in the parable of the good Samaritan (Lk 10:25-37) which addresses the question "Who is my neighbor?" At other times the question is implicit, such as in the parables of the warring king and the tower builder, which address the question "Is it easy to be a disciple?"

(7) Determine the theological significance of the story. What the parable teaches about God and his kingdom should be reflected elsewhere in the teaching of Jesus. There is no suggestion that we are to reduce the parable to theological propositions, but the parables do express theology. Again, the details of parables should not be pushed. For example, while Matthew 18:34 may underscore the seriousness of God's judgment it does not mean that God has tormentors!

(8) Pay special attention to the end of the parable. The rule of end stress recognizes that the most important part of the parable is the conclusion where the parable often requires a decision or forces the hearer to reverse his or her way of thinking. The end of the parable of the wicked tenants (Mt 21:33-44) is a quotation from Psalm 118:22 which via a wordplay forces the religious authorities to realize that they, the "builders" of the Jewish nation, have rejected God's Son (see Son of God). Whatever else may be true in the parable of the lost sheep, the focus is on the joy* at recovering that which was lost.

9. The Teaching of the Parables.

The primary focus of the parables is the coming of the kingdom of God and the resulting discipleship that is required. When Jesus proclaimed the kingdom he meant that God was exercising his power and rule to bring forgiveness,* defeat evil and establish righteousness in fulfillment of the OT promises. In Jesus' own person and ministry these acts were happening, and the kingdom was made available to people. The kingdom comes with limitless grace, but with it comes limitless demand. That is why it is impossible to speak of the kingdom without at the same time speaking of discipleship. While a number of Jesus' parables anticipate a future aspect of God's kingdom, much of the focus is on the kingdom as present and available to Jesus' hearers. The kingdom is both present and still awaits consummation in the future. With the focus on the kingdom as present comes an invitation to enter the kingdom and live according to its standards. Prayer and the use of wealth are two areas of kingdom living that are treated specifically in the parables.

9.1. The Kingdom As Present. A short parable in Matthew 12:29 is one of the strongest statements about the presence of the kingdom, and this parable also has christological implications. In response to the charge that he cast out demons by the power of Beelzebub (Mt 12:24), Jesus pointed to the activity of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) in his ministry as proof that the kingdom was present (Mt 12:28). The parable in Matthew 12:29 argues that no one can enter and plunder the house of the strong man unless he first binds the strong man. Clearly Jesus viewed his ministry as binding Satan and plundering his house.

While all the parables are kingdom parables in one sense, the parables in Matthew 13 are grouped specifically to provide insight into the kingdom. The Parable of the Sower indicates that the kingdom involves the presentation of a message and the necessity of a response that leads to productive living. Several parables in this section seem designed to answer questions from Jesus’ hearers about his claims that the kingdom was present. The Parable of the Wheat and the Tares seems designed to answer the question "How can the kingdom have come if evil is still present?" The kingdom is present and growing even in the midst of evil, and judgment will take place in the future. Therefore, the kingdom invites both involvement and patience. The twin Parables of the Mustard Seed and the Leaven both address the question "How can the kingdom be present if the results seem so small?" The beginning may be small, but the effect will be large and extensive. The twin Parables of the Treasure and of the Pearl both underscore that the kingdom is of ultimate value and is to be chosen above all else. In his section on kingdom parables Mark includes the Parable of the Growing Seed (Mk 4:26-29) which stresses that the kingdom is God's work and not the result of human action.

Other parables also emphasize the present aspect of the kingdom. The parables of the banquet (Lk 14:15-24) and of the wedding (Mt 22:1-14) affirm that all is ready and people should come now (Lk 14:17; Mt 22:4). The banquet theme is used to express other points as well. These parables and several others point to the refusal of many of the Jewish people to respond to Jesus’ message. With parables like that of the barren fig tree (Lk 13:6-9) they mark a crisis of decision which should lead to repentance. Furthermore, the banquet parables and parables like that of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32) in effect proclaim that God is having a celebration and ask people why they are not joining in.

The kingdom is revealed as an amazing expression of God's grace. The Gospels do not record that Jesus taught about grace, but no other word summarizes so well the effect of the kingdom. The invitation to outcasts in the banquet parables is obviously an expression of grace. The parables of the two debtors (Lk 7:41-43), of the lost sheep, lost coin and prodigal son (Lk 15), of the unmerciful servant (Mt 18:23-35) and of the laborers in the vineyard (Mt 20:1-16) all point to God's eagerness to benefit people by seeking them, forgiving them and accepting them. The parable of the laborers in the vineyard also offers a critique of those who think God's grace should be given out based on merit.
9.2. The Kingdom As Future. Jesus' teaching on the future aspect of the kingdom is seen most clearly in those parables that speak of judgment* or of a master who returns to settle accounts. The parables of growth also point to the future as a time of harvest. Particularly in Matthew, parables of judgment point to a separation between those who were obedient, faithful, prepared or merciful, and those who were not. The first group enters the kingdom and experiences praise and joy. The other group suffers punishment or destruction. Either explicitly or implicitly, judgment is based on whether one has shown mercy. Not all judgment parables are about the future. Some speak of judgment that is more immediate, such as the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31) or the parables that express the crisis facing the Jewish people (Lk 13:6-9). Even so, future judgment is a major theme in Jesus' parables.

Parables about the future are not intended to satisfy curiosity. They are intended to alter life in the present. By focusing on judgment and the Master's return, the focus of these parables is to encourage faithfulness, wisdom and preparation. These themes are expressed in the parable of the faithful and unfaithful servants (Mt 24:45-51 and Lk 12:41-48), the parable of the ten maidens (Mt 25:1-13) and the parable of the talents (Mt 25:14-30 with a possible parallel in Lk 19:11-27). These themes are also stressed in parables about the present. (Note especially Lk 16:1-13.) Both present and future eschatology have as their goal right living in the present.

9.3. Discipleship. Since discipleship is the main purpose of Jesus' teaching, the parables focus on this theme frequently. In many cases discipleship is the assumed subject. Elsewhere the concern for discipleship is explicit. In the twin parables of the tower builder and the warring king (Lk 14:28-32), people are warned to consider the cost for being a disciple is no easy task. The parable of the owner and his servant (Lk 17:7-10) views obedience as an expectation, something people should do, rather than something noteworthy. (Contrast the parable in 12:37 which tells of a master serving his servants because they were faithful!) The parable of the two builders describes the wise person as the one who hears and does Jesus' teachings. As elsewhere, the wise person is the one who understands the eschatological realities and lives accordingly. Likewise, the parable of the two sons (Mt 21:28-32) stresses the importance of obedience over against the intent to do the Father's will. Where obedience is made specific, the focus is on the necessity of doing acts of mercy. (Note especially Mt 18:33; 25:32-46 and Lk 10:25-37.) One cannot experience the grace of the kingdom without extending that grace to others.
9.3.1. The Right Use of Wealth. While the use of money is a frequent subject in the teaching of Jesus, Luke has a particular focus on the right use of wealth (see Rich and Poor). Several of the parables unique to him discuss this theme. The rich fool (Lk 12:16-21) thought only of his own enjoyment in the use of his wealth. He failed to consider the source of his wealth or the fact that life consists of much more than possessions. Verse 20 suggests that life is on loan from God and that we are accountable to him for it. The parables and sayings in Luke 16 provide some of the most direct teaching on wealth. The parable of the dishonest steward is debated because there is uncertainty whether his reduction of the amounts owed was a reduction of his own commission, the reduction of the illegal usurious portion that would go to his owner, or merely a rash act counting on the master's mercy. The intent of the parable is still clear. Jesus' point in Luke 16:8-9 is that people in this world understand the shrewd use of resources better than his disciples understand the economics of the kingdom. Jesus' disciples should make friends for themselves by the right use of "unrighteous mammon," money that tends to lead to unrighteousness. By the right use of wealth in acts of mercy, they make friendships with eternal benefits (cf. 12:33). The parable of the rich man and Lazarus poignantly makes the same point. This parable is not intended to provide a description of judgment so much as it is to underscore the eternal consequences of failing to show mercy. To be a disciple of the kingdom is to have one's priorities reorganized with regard to finances.

9.3.2. Prayer. Another redactional concern which Luke conveys through parables is his focus on prayer.* Two of these parables, that of the friend at midnight (Lk 11:5-8) and the wicked judge (Lk 18:1-8), are contrasts between human responses to requests and the way God responds to prayer. The friend at midnight is not about persistence. The word anaideia in 11:8, which is sometimes translated "persistence," actually means "shamelessness" and almost certainly refers to the boldness of the man knocking. The point of the parable is that if a human responds to such knocking, how much more will God respond to the prayers of his people (cf. Lk 11:13). Similarly, the unjust judge acts on behalf of the widow so that she will not keep pestering him. But the parable indicates that God is not like the unjust judge; rather, he will adjudicate the cause of his people quickly. Luke gives his readers confidence that God hears and responds to prayer. The remaining parable on prayer, that of the pharisee and the tax collector, emphasizes the humility and repentance with which one should approach God.

PASSION NARRATIVE
The dramatic story portraying and interpreting the events of Jesus' suffering and death (see Death of Jesus). In the Synoptic Gospels the account of the Jewish plot against Jesus' life during the Feast of Unleavened Bread (see Feasts) is usually regarded as the beginning point of the passion narrative; its finale is marked by Jesus' burial (see Burial of Jesus). Thus the passion narrative in the Synoptics is found in Matthew 26-27, Mark 14-15 and Luke 22-23. The parameters of the Johannine account are less easily determined, for material otherwise found in the Synoptic passion narrative is scattered throughout John 10—19. The extant remains of the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (c. AD. 125) constitute a narrative of Jesus' passion and resurrection, beginning with the story of Jesus before Pilate (see Pontius Pilate). According to long-standing and widely held views, the story of Jesus' suffering and death was the first among the developing Gospel traditions to achieve written form (see Tradition Criticism).

1. The Formation of the Passion Narrative
2. The Role of the OT in the Passion Narrative
3. The Genre of the Passion Narrative

1. The Formation of the Passion Narrative.

The origins of the passion narrative have been widely debated (see Green, 9-14). Early in this century the form critics observed the passion narrative's relative self-sufficiency and coherence, its chronological and topographical cohesion, and the fundamental correspondence of narrative sequence among the four Gospel accounts (see Form Criticism). They found that unlike other Gospel segments, this one did not dissolve easily into component parts. On this basis they insisted on the existence of a connected story of Jesus' passion long before the composition of the Gospels. From this consensus arose widely divergent opinions regarding the narrative's sources, content and purpose. One particularly widespread thesis postulated an evolutionary, multi-stage process of growth, from a primitive outline (such as Mk 10:33-34; Acts 13:27-29; or 1 Cor 15:3-5) to a short account beginning with Jesus' arrest Additional materials were thought to have been appended to this brief story to achieve the expanded narratives of our four Gospels. A number of multi-source theories have also been championed.

During the 1960s, however, the whole notion of a primitive narrative of Jesus' passion was called into question. A few independent passion traditions might have existed from earliest times, it was alleged, but Mark composed the first passion account from beginning to end. W. H. Kelber developed this view further, arguing that Mark constructed the first passion narrative largely from OT texts and reflection on the OT against the backdrop of Jesus' execution (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology). This basic thesis claims a growing number of adherents, especially in North America.

This is not to say, however, that study of the early formation of the passion narrative has ceased. Some recent proposals have taken up a number of earlier, form-critical observations and argued them with a greater degree of sophistication. Combining this line of study with additional support from new source- and redaction-critical studies, research on the literary forms of antiquity, and observations regarding the enigma of Jesus' death in its milieu, these scholars support with renewed vigor the probability of an early, written, self-contained passion narrative. These studies focus on the formation of the passion story within the context of early Christian worship*—the commemoration of the death of Jesus by Christians during the Jewish Passover celebration (Trocmé) or the regular celebration of the Lord's Supper* (Green). D. Crossan also supports the idea of a primitive, self-contained narrative of Jesus' passion. His point of departure, however, is the apocryphal Gospel of Peter, which he regards as best embodying this primitive passion account. For him, the first passion story was practically devoid of historical reminiscence, but was created under the influence of passion prophecy.

With the influx of newer literary-based methods into Gospels research, the question of the origins and development of the passion narrative is being eclipsed (e.g., Karris; see Literary Criticism). This has led to a healthy emphasis on understanding the theology of the passion narratives within their larger Gospel contexts. Unfortunately, however, some redactional and literary studies of the passion accounts have been carried out under the assumption of a high level of creative license on the part of the Gospel writers. Thus, the relatively late development of the passion tradition is not argued but presupposed.

In any case, the crucial importance of understanding how the earliest Christians came to terms with the suffering and death of the one they proclaimed as Messiah (see Christ) is reason enough to continue raising the question of the formation of the passion narrative.

2. The Role of the OT in the Passion Narrative.
In order to understand the passion narratives, we must come to terms with the use of the OT in these accounts. Not only does a widely held thesis maintain that the substance of the passion story derives from Christian reflection on the OT, but OT references play a crucial interpretative role in the story of Jesus' death.

2.1. The OT: Creative Agent? Kelber and Crossan are only two among many voices arguing that the passion story was either largely or entirely created out of OT texts. According to this thesis, early Christians knew almost nothing of the events of Jesus' suffering and death, so they turned to the OT (prophecy of his passion) for information and inspiration.

The initial query that might be raised against this theory is, In the context of hermeneutics in late Judaism, was it a matter of course that narratives were worked up from OT texts? Was the procedure posited by Kelber and Crossan commonplace in the interpretive milieu of late Judaism and early Christianity? In fact, recent research on this question points to a negative verdict (Moo). Indeed, studies of the use of the OT at Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls), among apocalyptists (see Apocalyptic) and in post-biblical historiography indicate that the direction of influence was primarily from event to Scripture rather than vice versa. Biblical texts were adapted to fit events more readily than were events created to fit biblical texts.

Those who regard the passion narrative as a midrash* on selected OT texts must overcome the additional obstacle presented by the narrative itself. Biblical references abound in the passion narrative, but follow no discernible pattern as might have been determined by an OT passage or passages. Although some OT texts reappear in the passion story (e.g., Ps 22 and Is 53), "... the biblical allusions in the passion narrative have almost no continuity and seldom concern the same book twice in succession, while the themes vary from one allusion to the next" (Trocmé, 58).

Still further, we should note that not every aspect of the passion story can be accounted for by an appeal to the creative role of the OT. A list of such elements in Mark might include the anointing* at Bethany (14:3-9), the singing of a hymn after the Last Supper (14:26), the sword incident at the arrest (14:47), the reference to the fire at the courtyard (14:54), the mention of Simon of Cyrene and his two sons (15:21), the hour-scheme at the cross (15:25, 33), and the tearing of the temple veil (15:38). Clearly, factors beyond the influence of the OT were at work in the formation of the passion narrative.
Finally, evidence from the Gospel passion narratives themselves supports the conclusion that passion events were primarily interpreted by, not created from, the OT. For example, just as Psalm 41:9 explains the problem raised by Judas Iscariot* (cf. Mk 14:18; Jn 13:18), so Zechariah 13:7 justifies the flight of the disciples (Mk 14:27, 50; Mt 26:31, 56). For this reason, some have judged that the citation was placed on Jesus’ lips by the early church. Even if this were true, however, it remains evident that the reason for doing so would have been to downplay the scandalous character of the disciples’ flight at Jesus’ arrest. If Jesus’ suffering and death were God’s will, why did the disciples flee? According to Zechariah 13:7, this, too, was foretold as part of the divine plan. That is, an historical event, the flight of the disciples, gave rise to a riddle which was solved with recourse to the OT. The OT interpreted, but did not create, this problematic event.

To give an example of a different sort, a number of canonical and extra-canonical texts demonstrate that it was understood that Jesus was nailed to the cross (Jn 20:25; Acts 2:23; Col 2:14; Cos. Pet. 6.21; Justin, Dial. 97; and perhaps Lk 24:39; see Death of Jesus). Aside from the fact that this detail has a good claim to being historically accurate, it is remarkable that, in not mentioning this detail in the crucifixion story itself, early Christians bypassed an excellent opportunity to show one more substantial intersection between the fate of the Suffering Righteous in Psalm 22 and Jesus. In Psalm 22:16 (21:17 LXX) we read: "they pierced my hands and feet" It is true that the reading of the (possibly corrupt) MT would not have suggested this correspondence ("as a lion my hands and feet"), but elsewhere in the passion story references to Psalm 22 employ the Greek version. If the passion narrative depended heavily on the creative role of the OT, we would have expected "passion prophecy" to have rendered this connection explicit.

If the best way to describe the relationship of the OT to the passion narrative is not with reference to its creative role, what is a more appropriate explanation?

2.2. The OT: Interpretive Agent One way of grappling with the crucial role of the OT in the passion narrative is to begin by recognizing the enigma of Jesus' death. Jesus' public humiliation and execution on a cross ran counter to practically every strand of first-century messianic expectation. The cross of Christ constituted a scandal of no mean proportions. How could it be explained? The answer could only be cast in terms of God's will, his redemptive plan, and it was to the OT that early Christians went in search of ways of making sense of the death of their Messiah.

In the process of working out the significance of Jesus' death in a narrative context early Christians employed the OT at a number of levels. In some cases they incorporated direct citations of OT materials into the passion story (e.g., Lk 22:37, citing Is 53:12; Mk 15:34, citing Ps 22:1). In other instances allusions to OT texts were woven into the narrative material. Thus, for example, language from Isaiah 50:6 has been borrowed in the account of Jesus' mockery in Mark 15:19; Matthew 27:30 and John 19:1, 3. In this way, Jesus is identified typologically as the Isaianic Servant of Yahweh.*

The framers of the passion tradition were not interested in specific OT texts only. These Christians were convinced that, whatever God's plans for redemption were, they were all fulfilled in Jesus. Hence, in the passion narrative we read that "the Son of Man* will go just as it is written about him" (Mk 14:21) or "the Son of Man will go as it has been decreed" (Lk 22:22). These are probably not allusions to specific OT texts, but rather intentionally general references to the divine will.

Moreover, throughout the passion narratives there are evidences of the interpretation of Jesus' suffering and death along larger, typological lines (see Typology). For example, in many ways the passion accounts portray Jesus against the interpretive framework of the Suffering Servant of the Lord. "Like the Servant, Jesus (1) is God's chosen one who will complete his mission through suffering; (2) willingly submits to his divine mission; (3) is innocent; (4) maintains his silence; (5) dies 'for many'; (6) is 'handed over'; (7) is abused; (8) is 'numbered with transgressors'; (9) anticipates his vindication; and (10) is vindicated after maltreatment" (Green, 317-318). Similarly, especially in the Markan and Matthean passion accounts, Jesus is the Suffering Righteous One.

By these means we are instructed that, far from being a contradiction of the divine will, far from being an inexplicable puzzle in redemptive history, Jesus' suffering and death was actually willed by God. Whether by slightest allusion or explicit citation, the use of the OT in the passion story underscores the necessity of Jesus' death in God's salvific plan.

3. The Genre of the Passion Narrative.

The centrality of the passion of Jesus to redemptive history is suggested not only by the use of the OT in its interpretation, but also by the genre within which it is related. In fact the genre, or literary form, of this story is a significant indicator of the passion narrative's meaning and antiquity.

Recent studies in genre have isolated the traditional literary schema known to some as the genre of "court conflict" to others as the "story of the vindication of the innocent sufferer" (see Crossan, 297-334; Green, 169-173). Set against a legal or royal setting, the protagonists in these stories are recognized for their outstanding qualities; their lives are endangered, usually through evil schemes; though innocent they are persecuted; and finally, they are vindicated. In the earlier examples of this genre (e.g., the story of Joseph, Gen 37—42), the protagonist is rescued from death; however, with time, the genre was transformed so that vindication comes after death (e.g., 2 Macc 7; Wis 2, 4—5). Significantly, within the development of this genre, Isaiah 52:13—53:12, which combines the twin motifs of vindicated innocence and vicarious death, comes to play a pivotal role.

The parallels between this genre and the passion narratives of our Gospels are remarkable. They demonstrate further the possibility of an early, self-contained passion narrative constructed along the lines of this readily available literary convention. Moreover, they underscore the intimate relation of Jesus' passion with God's redemptive activity, and especially with the interpretation of innocent death found in Is 52:13-53:12.

References to peace (usually eirēnē) in the teaching of Jesus and the Gospel writers can be fully appreciated only in the light of the Hebrew concept of šālôm, Jewish expectations concerning the coming kingdom of peace and the violence of first-century life in Israel.

1. šālôm
2. Kingdom of Peace
3. Peace and Violence
4. Conclusion

1. šālôm

The Hebrew term for peace means "well-being" (e.g., Num 25:12; Ps 38:3; 73:3; Jer 14:13; cf. P. B. Yoder). It covers health, prosperity, security, friendship and salvation.* It is the desired experience of individuals, families and Israel* as a nation. It is present because of God's own presence and his favor toward his people. The Greek term eirēnē in classical Greek literature means little more than absence of war. In the NT, however, it incorporates the breadth of meaning conveyed by the Hebrew šālôm.

This can be sensed in passages like Mark 5:24-34. Verse 29 reports the physical healing* of a socially and religiously unclean woman (see Clean and Unclean). Jesus, not content to provide mere physical relief, exposes the woman's secrecy, publicly discloses her faith* and her healing, and thus effectively restores her to community and wholeness. Jesus "saves" her (5:34). His final "Go in peace" is more than a parting blessing. It is the bestowal of šālôm, the gift Jesus gives whenever he ministers to needy people.

2. Kingdom of Peace.
Peace was central to the eschatological (see Eschatology) expectations of the OT prophets. The messianic child would be a "Prince of Peace" (Is 9:6). He was expected to come in peace, to end warfare and to proclaim peace throughout the land (Zech 9:9-12). He would reunite families (Mal 4:6); he would decimate Israel's enemies in order to bring lasting peace to Jerusalem (meaning "city of peace") (cf. Is 66:10-16). With his first coming, Jesus fulfilled some of these expectations.

Through his caring ministry, his miraculous works (see Miracles and Miracle Stories), his gift of salvation, his offer of acceptance and community to outsiders, Jesus gave a foretaste of that eschatological well-being. Yet, instead of reuniting families, he divided them (Lk 12:51-53). Instead of destroying Israel's national enemies, he rejected the revolutionary option, preached non-violence (Mt 5:38-48) and suffered a violent death at the hands of enemies he loved and forgave (Lk 23:34). Jesus planted the seeds of the "Kingdom of Peace." Its harvest awaits his Second Coming.

In John's Gospel "Peace be with you" (20:19,21,26) is Jesus' post-resurrection greeting to his followers. It is, however, more than a greeting. It is the bestowal of eschatological peace on those who join his victory over death. It is the fulfillment of Jesus' earlier promise that his followers will have tranquility, harmony and security in Jesus while still living in a troubled world (14:27; 16:33).

In Matthew and Mark peace is a gift from God that must be experienced and shared in human relationships. Jesus called his followers to live at peace with each other (Mk 9:50), and he empowered them to bestow peace on those who are worthy (Mt 10:13). "Blessed are the peacemakers," said Jesus, "for they will be called God's children" (Mt 5:9). Peacemaking will sometimes be unsuccessful (Mt 10:34-37). Moreover, peacemaking is costly. It involved a cross for Jesus, and it involves a cross for his followers (Mt 10:37-39). According to Jesus and the Evangelists, no cost is too great for the privilege of receiving, experiencing and sharing God's peace.

Luke's Gospel develops the idea that peace comes to those who prove worthy. The shepherds hear the angels* proclaiming that with the arrival of the savior, peace is available "on earth" to people "on whom God's favor rests" (2:14; see Birth of Jesus). But on whom does God's favor rest? Throughout Luke's gospel, "peace on earth" comes to outcasts, disciples, foreigners, any who will receive God's grace and respond with faith. But peace on earth does not come to Jerusalem, the city of peace (a play on words Luke may have intended to be understood as irony). On the contrary, Jerusalem (through its leaders) rejects Jesus and therefore proves unworthy (19:42). God's favor cannot rest there.

The Jerusalem crowd ironically praises the "King of Peace" by shouting "Peace in heaven!" (19:28-38). There can be no "peace on earth" for Jerusalem. The city missed its chance to receive God's eschatological šālôm. Jerusalem is not even destined for a minimal peace defined as absence of war, for foreign enemies will serve as instruments of God's judgment* on the city that failed to recognize and accept God's offer of peace (19:42-44). Yet God's favor still rests on the faithful in Israel. Those who have accepted Jesus receive God's šālôm. To them the risen Christ announces, "Peace be unto you" (24:36).

3. Peace and Violence.

Jesus promised his followers the blessing of being in God's family if they would be "peacemakers" (Mt 5:9), respond non-violently to aggressors (5:38-42) and even love their enemies (5:43-48).

Luke's Gospel has been the center of pacifistic interpretations of the Gospels. J. H. Yoder argues persuasively that both Jesus and Luke are self-consciously instructing Christian hearers/readers to adopt the pacifistic model of Jesus in contrast to the violent political options available to Jesus, his followers, the early church and modern Christians. Christians are called to be peacemakers in situations of interpersonal, national and international conflict.

Jesus' words to his disciples to "buy swords" (22:35-38) has been variously judged as ironic, symbolic and unhistorical. Given the time designations marking Jesus' passion as the turning point ("then ... but now"), however, it probably signifies the hostility with which Jesus' disciples will be confronted (cf. Mt 10:34-36/Lk 12:51-53; cf. Lampe). On any reading it is clear from 22:49-51 that Jesus did not endorse his disciples' use of their swords. Armed conflict—so to speak—is permitted only with demonic enemies (11:21-22). Only in relation to Satan's kingdom does Jesus come as a divine warrior, leading his followers into battle (10:17-19; cf. Rom 16:20).

4. Conclusion.

Jesus proclaims and brings God's šālôm. Eschatological peace on earth comes only to those on whom God's favor rests. Jesus' followers join him in combatting demonic evil, while loving human enemies. Like the kingdom of God, the eschatological peace Jesus and his followers proclaim and practice is already but not yet. The church's task is to bring about God's peace "on earth as it is in heaven."

PEOPLE, CROWD

The crowd is the gathering of the nameless common people of Palestine who provided an audience for Jesus' public ministry. The crowd is the recipient of his teachings (see Teacher) and beneficiary of his healings. The portrayal of the crowd in each Gospel not only helps set the scene for a teaching or healing of Jesus, but is a significant part of the theology of the Gospel as a whole.

1. Terminology
2. General Portrayal
3. Specific Portrayals

1. Terminology.

Several Greek terms make up the topic people/crowd: ochlos ("crowd" or "throng"), laos ("people"), plēthos ("multitude" or "number") and polloi
("many"). These terms are almost completely limited to the Gospels and Acts. Ochlos, lao and plēthos are synonyms (Mt 27:24-25; Mk 3:7-10; Lk 6:17; 7:24, 29; 8:42, 47). They are often contrasted with the authorities, Pharisees* and scribes* (Mt 14:5; Mk 11:32 par. Mt 21:26 and Lk 20:6; Mk 12:12 par. Mt 21:46 and Lk 20:19). Plēthos, absent in Matthew and not used of the crowd in John, is used in Mark and Luke to describe the wide appeal of Jesus and his message with the populace (Lk 6:17 par. Mk 3:7-8; Lk 8:37; 23:27).

2. General Portrayal.

Jesus is most frequently portrayed encountering crowds during his extensive ministry in Galilee.* It was composed of day laborers, farmers and fishermen of both Gentile* and Jewish background from Galilee and the surrounding regions. These regions included Judea, Galilee, Decapolis, Trans-Jordan, Tyre and Sidon (Mt 4:25; Mk 3:7-8; Lk 6:17-18; see Archeology and Geography). During his stays in Jerusalem at the close of his ministry, Jesus encountered a crowd composed mainly of Jews drawn from all over the Hellenistic world (see Hellenism) who had come to the city to celebrate the Passover (see Feasts).

The crowd was originally drawn to John the Baptist's* proclamation (Lk 3:7, 10, 15, 18), but was subsequently attracted to Jesus throughout his public ministry. His teaching and miracles* drew them, especially his healings (Mk 1:32-34 par. Lk 4:40-41; Mt 15:29-31 ), but they also came simply to be fed (Jn 6:26). The crowd was comprised of thousands (Mt 14:21; Lk 8:9 par. Mt 15:38 and Lk 12:1), a feature reflected in the Johannine hyperbole "the whole world has gone after him" (Jn 12:19). The crowd is often referred to as following Jesus (Mt 4:25; 8:1; Mk 3:7; Lk 7:9; Jn 6:2, 5). It presses intensely around him (Mt 5:31 par. Lk 8:45), once even necessitating that a ship take him away (Mt 3:9). The people were partially spurred by messianic hopes (see Revolutionary Movements), for at the feeding of the five thousand they almost proclaimed him king (Jn 6:15).

The crowd was astonished by Jesus' teaching, particularly because he did not teach like the rabbis* by quoting other authorities, but taught with his own authority* (Mt 7:28-29; 22:33; Mk 1:22,27 par. Lk 4:32, 36; Mk 6:2 par. Mt 13:54; Mk 11:18; Lk 4:22). As expected, the crowd also marveled at his miracles (Mk 2:12 par. Mt 9:8 and Lk 5:26; Mt 9:33; Mk 7:37 par. Mt 15:31; Lk 7:16) and exorcisms (Lk 9:43; 11:14; see Demon, Devil, Satan). Even so, the crowd was divided in its opinion of Jesus, thinking him to be John the Baptist, Elijah,* a prophet* (Mk 8:27-29 par. Mt 16:13-16 and Lk 9:18-20), the Messiah (Jn 7:40-43; see Christ), an agent of Satan (Lk 11:15-16) or simply someone leading the people astray (Jn 7:12).

The governing authorities disdained the crowd, thinking it could easily be led astray (Jn 7:45-49; cf. 7:12). However, the authorities often considered the power of the crowd when formulating policy. Herod Antipas (see Herodian Dynasty) hesitated to kill John the Baptist for fear of the crowd which thought that John was a prophet (Mt 14:5). Josephus* (Ant. 18.118) records that John so inspired the crowd that Herod feared rebellion. The leadership of Israel* was afraid of affronting the crowd's opinion that John the Baptist was a prophet (Mk 11:32 par. Mt 21:26 and Lk 20:6; Mt 21:46). The crowd's belief that Jesus was the Christ motivated the leadership to arrest Jesus before even more people could become his followers (Jn 7:31-32, 45-49; 11:47-53). However, they carefully plotted strategy for the arrest because of the potential for rioting (Mk 11:18 par. Lk 19:47-48; Mk 12:12 par. Mt 21:46 and Lk 20:19; Mk 14:1-2 par. Mt 26:3-5 and Lk 22:2), hiring Judas* to betray Jesus in the absence of the crowd (Lk 22:6).

In turn the crowds also feared the leadership and could be influenced by it (Jn 7:12-13). An armed crowd was present at the arrest of Jesus (Mk 14:43 par. Mt 26:47 and Lk 22:47). Once arrested, the crowd was easily swayed to turn on Jesus (Mk 15:11 par. Mt 27:20; Jn 19:15; cf. Lk 23:18). Pilate condemned Jesus against his will and under the pressure of the crowd, which in turn had been swayed by the leadership (Mk 15:15 par. Lk 23:24). The crowd did, however, repent once it witnessed the crucifixion (Lk 23:48; see Death of Jesus).

Jesus' reaction to the crowd was typified by compassion (Mt 9:36; Mk 6:34 par. Mt 14:14; Mk 8:2 par. Mt 15:32). It is noteworthy that in Luke Jesus is portrayed as having compassion for the individual rather than the crowd (7:13; 30:33; cf. 15:20). Jesus taught the crowd (Mt 5:1-2; 7:28-29; Mk 7:14 par. Mt 15:10), usually with parables* (Mk 4:33-34 par. Mt 13:34-35). He healed many of its number (Mt 14:14 par. Lk 9:11), fed them (Mk 6:41 par. Mt 14:19 and Lk 9:16; Mk 8:6 par. Mt 15:36; Jn 6:11) and prayed for them (Jn 11:42). He even considered them closer than his own relatives (Mk 3:31-35; see Family). He often withdrew from the crowd for prayer* and rest after teaching them and/or performing miracles (Mt 8:18; 13:36; Mk 4:36; Mk 6:45-46 par. Mt 14:22-23; Jn 5:13; 6:15). Because of its diverse opinions of him, its lack of understanding and the ease with which it was swayed, Jesus did not place great confidence in the profession of the crowd (Mt 13:10-17; Mk 8:27-29 par. Mt 16:13-16 and Lk
As an actor within Gospel narrative, the crowd is a "chorus which confirms Jesus' words and acts by joy, admiration, astonishment and fear . . ." (Meyer and Katz, 586). Rhetorically, the crowd functions as an artificial proof, that is, a proof not manufactured by the Gospel writers. The crowds provide an implicit eyewitness testimony to verify the narrative of the Gospels.

3. Specific Portrayals.

The Synoptists in particular were very careful to identify the particular audience of virtually every facet of Jesus' ministry. Interpretation of the Synoptics as a whole and in part must account for the audience of each pericope. We are particularly indebted to Minear's groundbreaking studies of the crowd for each of the Synoptic Gospels.

3.1. Mark. Mark carefully differentiates between audiences composed of laos ("people"), ochlos ("crowd") and disciples.* In Mark "people" is never Jesus' immediate audience, except in 7:6 where he attacks the scribes and Pharisees described as "people." In 11:32 and 14:2, the only two other Markan occurrences of "people," it is used of the crowd as the source of fear for the authorities. With one exception (10:1) Mark always uses the singular of "crowd" (ho ochlos), indicating that he is thinking of the crowd as a unified group. Matthew and Luke use a mixture of singular and plural. In Mark the specific designation "disciple" is limited to the Twelve.

In his study of discipleship* in Mark, Best concludes that ". . . the crowd possesses no unitary role in the gospel" and "the crowd is a vague amorphous mass of men" (392). He argues that the crowd does not function as disciples in working for Jesus or receiving private instruction. Rather, the disciples are merely drawn from the crowd. However, Malbon compares the activities of the disciples and the crowd in relation to Jesus and proves just the opposite is the case in Mark. The crowd (ochlos) is not merely a mixed group of onlookers, but disciples. The crowd and the disciples are portrayed both in their strength and their weakness to serve as realistic models of Christian discipleship for the reader.

Jesus calls both the disciples and the crowd to follow him and teaches them the price that following him requires (8:34—9:1). As he did with the disciples, Jesus calls the crowd as a group to follow him (8:34) and calls out individuals from the crowd to follow him (2:13-14; 10:46-52). Also, as did the disciples, the crowd does follow Jesus (2:15; 3:7; 5:24), including specifically named individuals (2:14; 10:52; 15:40-41).

Both the disciples and the crowd are taught by Jesus. Jesus is often portrayed teaching the crowd without the subject being specified (2:13; 4:1-2; 6:34; 7:14; 10:1). He often withdrew from the crowd to give the disciples more detailed instruction on what he had already taught them in the presence of the crowd (4:10-34; 7:17-23; 9:28; 10:10-12). In particular, in private Jesus instructed the disciples about the passion and resurrection* of which the crowd was not informed (8:31; 9:31). Jesus commands both the crowd (4:3, 9; 7:14) and the disciples to hear (4:23; 8:18) and both the crowd (3:8; 4:12; 6:2; 12:37) and the disciples heard (8:18; 11:14).

Both the disciples and the crowd share in amazement at Jesus. The crowds are amazed at his teaching (1:22, 27; 6:2; 11:18), healings (2:12; 5:33; 7:37; 9:15) and exorcisms. The disciples are amazed at his teaching (10:24, 26), his power over the sea (4:41; 6:51), at the Transfiguration* (9:6) and his prediction of the passion and resurrection (9:32; see Predictions of Jesus' Death and Resurrection). However, the disciples' amazement is never at healing (except perhaps 5:42), the usual object of the crowd's amazement.

The crowd is the chief beneficiary of Jesus' ministry of teaching and healing, whereas the disciples are Jesus' assistants in these activities. Jesus healed (1:34; 3:10), taught (2:2, 13; 4:1-2; 7:14; 10:1) and fed the crowd (6:4142; 8:7-8). Unlike the crowd, the disciples assist Jesus in feeding (6:41; 8:6), teaching (3:14; 6:12, 30) and healing (3:15; 6:7,13). At the end of Jesus' life, both disciples and crowds abandon him (15:8, 11, 15).

Through the disciples and the crowd, Mark presents a composite picture of fallible followers to show that discipleship is demanding, inclusive and difficult. Through the disciples and the crowd the demand to follow is extended to the larger group of hearer/readers. This extension comes in Jesus' statements of the "whoever" type addressed to both groups, and in Jesus' statements about "many" and "all" which usually refer to crowds but are spoken to the disciples (4:23; 8:34, 35; 9:35, 41, 42; 10:15; 11:23). An example is, "If any want to become my followers, let them deny themselves and take up their cross and follow me" (Mk 8:34 NRSV).
3.2. Matthew. Matthew is careful to distinguish laos ("people") and ochlos ("crowd"). People is used in Matthew in the LXX sense of the naddon of Israel (2:4; 21:23). Only in one place do crowd and people describe the same group (27:24-25). Matthew refers to the "crowd" (ochlos) more than the other Synoptists, often adding it to tradition borrowed from the Markan account (4:25; 7:28; 8:1; 13:34,36; 14:5; 21:8-11; 22:33). Whereas Mark prefers the singular, Matthew prefers the plural "crowds" (ochloi). When Matthew uses the singular it is usually incorporated from Mark (Mt 13:2b par. Mk 4:1b).

Overall, the crowds are presented positively in Matthew, responding to Jesus' message from the start of his ministry. The crowds do not press or jostle Jesus as in Mark and Luke (cf. 9:1-2 with Mk 2:3-4 par. Lk 5:18-19; 9:22 with Lk 8:45-48). As in Mark, the crowds follow Jesus, usually expressed with the verb "to follow" (akolouthēō) signifying qualitative allegiance (4:25; 8:1; 14:13) and discipleship (4:20, 22; 8:22-23; 9:9; 19:27-28). The crowds hear Jesus' teaching, particularly as the designated audience of two of the five sermons in Matthew (5:1-2; 13:1-2). The crowd is astonished at his authoritative teaching (7:28; 22:33) and healing (9:8, 33; 12:23; 15:31). They accept Jesus as a prophet (21:11,26,46) and proclaim him to be the Son of David* (12:23; 21:9).

However, a clear distinction between the crowd and the disciples is maintained. In contrast to the crowds who are followers of Jesus, the disciples are a more limited group of chosen trainees and successors of Jesus in healing and teaching (10:1—11:1; 28:16-20). Unlike the crowds, the disciples share Jesus' ministry of teaching (11:1) and healing (10:1, 8). Like the disciples, the crowds abandon Jesus in the end (26:55; 27:20).

Doyle has noted that the first reference to the crowd in a passage is plural; those that follow singular (13:2a, 2b; 21:8-11 is the exception in the reverse). The singular is used where the crowd is portrayed in a non-following role: the mourners for a little girl (9:23, 25), those that fear the authorities (14:5; 21:26); the crowd as mere background (8:18; 17:14) and the arresting mob (26:47). The crowd at Jesus' trial is singular when set against Jesus (26:47; 27:15, 24) and plural when for him (26:55; 27:20). Two exceptions to this pattern are 15:10 and 20:29 where the singular is used, but the crowd is positively related to Jesus.

3.3. Luke. Luke's conception of the audience of Jesus varies from the very similar portrayals of Mark and Matthew. In Luke laos ("people") takes a wider role. Laos with the article retains its specific LXX connotation of Israel as the covenant people (1:10,17, 21, 68, 77; 2:32; 7:16; 20:1 ; 23:2, 13; 24:19), but can also be used more generally of crowds (9:12-13).

Unlike Matthew and Mark, in Luke the people are less guilty of Jesus' death. They did not turn against Jesus and demand his crucifixion (cf. 23:18-25). There is only a passing reference to God's wrath on the people (21:23). Instead "people" is associated with the women* who faithfully follow Jesus to his execution (23:27, 35). The cry "Let his blood be on us and on our children!" (Mt 27:25) is not found on the lips of the people, nor are the Isaianic denunciations of Mark 7:6-7 par. Matthew 15:7-9 (Is 29:13) or Matthew 13:14-15 (Is 6:9-10; see Hardness of Heart) preserved by Luke. The rulers of the people are clearly more responsible for Jesus' death.

In Luke the crowd (ochlos) refers either to potential believers who become disciples or to enemies of Jesus who turn against him through the influence of the leadership. The crowd primarily wants to hear Jesus' teaching and see or personally experience the miracles (5:15). They misunderstand the mission of Jesus and are criticized by him (12:54-56). The crowd (ochlos) is distinguished from the people (laos) and the disciples. It is a group drawn from and representing the people (3:7-22; 8:47), and consists of potential disciples (9:10-11, 18-19; 12:1). Unlike Mark and Matthew where the crowd is composed of followers of Jesus, in Luke the crowd must respond to Jesus' proclamation to become followers. In Luke the crowds "constitute a neutral, anonymous, undifferentiated entity, a necessary but indistinct part of the stage setting . . ." (Minear, Nov T 1974, 87). Like the people (laos), the crowd (ochlos) is less guilty of Jesus' death in Luke than in Matthew and Mark. They are associated with the betrayal and execution of Jesus, but not as directly (cf. 22:47; 23:4).

3.4. John. As in Luke, the two uses of laos ("people") in John refer to the Jews as a theocratic people. However, in John the word refers to the people of God incorporating more than the Jewish nation, for now it is the new people of God formed by the death of Jesus (11:50; 18:14). When John refers to numbers of people in other contexts he uses ochlos. The only use of laos for the multitude (8:2) is found in the interpolation of 7:53—8:11. In John "crowd" (ochlos) is used almost exclusively in the sense of the 'am hā'āres, "people of the land" (Jn 7:31-49).

The Pharisees appear in our sources as a distinct party in Judaism of the late Second Temple period, with their own vision of what Israel's* standing as God's covenant people entailed. Characteristic of the Pharisaic position was their adherence to a body of traditional material (Gk paradosis) handed down "from the fathers," which defined correct behavior in a number of ways and which represented both an interpretation of and a supplement to Pentateuchal Law.* In the Gospels Pharisees are generally (though not quite universally) depicted as opponents of Jesus, critical of his behavior, hostile in their questions, malicious in their deliberations. In turn, their piety is attacked as hypocritical, their spiritual leadership is declared bankrupt, and they are charged with leading the nation to its doom. Through all the polemic the significant role played by the Pharisees in Jewish life in first-century Palestine is apparent.

1. Sources.

Historical reconstruction must begin with an awareness of the problems posed by the nature of our sources. The Gospels will be treated in a later section. Here we focus on Josephus* and rabbinic literature (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings).

1.1. Josephus. In his autobiographical Life Josephus claims that he acquired firsthand knowledge of various Jewish schools of thought, then chose to govern his life according to the norms of the Pharisees (Life 10-12 §2). This suggests that Josephus, as a Pharisee, can be counted on to provide an informed and sympathetic picture of the party. Unfortunately, matters are not so simple.

First, to a surprising extent what Josephus actually writes about the Pharisees is negative, at times sharply so. Such passages are commonly thought to have been uncritically reproduced from sources harboring ill will for the Pharisees (see Schwartz). An alternative explanation questions Josephus's claim to be a Pharisee, noting that his writings betray little evidence of support for peculiarly Pharisaic beliefs and practices. The problem remains unresolved (see Mason).

Second, Josephus describes the various Jewish parties (which he calls haireseis, or philosophical schools) in terms familiar to his Gentile readers. The Pharisees he compares with the Stoics (Life 12 §2). He notes their belief in the immortality of the soul (Ant. 18.1.3 §14), in the resurrection* of the righteous (J.W. 2.8.14 §163) and in a fate which determines some, but not all, human actions (so Ant. 13.5.9 §172; cf. 18.1.3 §13; J.W. 2.8.14 §162-163). Their simplicity of life and deference to elders are also noted (Ant. 18.1.3 §12). While Pharisaic belief in resurrection was certainly characteristic, Josephus's depiction misleads by focusing on matters readily comprehensible to his readers while omitting issues of legal observance which in fact marked the dividing lines between parties.

Third, some scholars (e.g., J. Neusner) have suggested that Josephus in his Antiquities (which, in this respect, is contrasted with his Jewish War) produced propaganda for the Pharisees, exaggerating their influence on the people in order to convince the Roman authorities that any government installed in Palestine needed Pharisaic support to survive. The suggestion, while a healthy reminder that Josephus's intentions must be taken into account, seems ill-founded. The evidence for considerable Pharisaic influence is not restricted to the Antiquities. Moreover, references to Pharisaic influence in the Antiquities are, considering the bulk of the work, few and confined to its later sections. Negative assessments of the Pharisees are also found (especially 17.2.4 §41-45). Had Josephus been motivated by the propagandistic purpose ascribed to him, he was singularly optimistic in hoping that the proper Roman officials would read the twenty books of his history with unflagging attention, ignore negative depictions of the Pharisees, link in their minds the few scattered references to Pharisaic influence in Books 13 and 18, and draw the correct conclusions—without authorial prodding.

1.2. Rabbinic Literature. The use of rabbinic materials for our purposes is also problematic. Josephus's writings at least come from the first century; rabbinic literature from centuries later. Some of the references it contains to the pērūṣîm clearly intend a party (rival to the Sadducees) in the years before A.D. 70, though the historical value of even these traditions is not assured. Other references to pērūṣîm do not relate to the Pharisees.

Most vexed is the broad question of the relation between the Pharisees and subsequent rabbinic Judaism (see Judaism). A longstanding tradition interprets the post-70 period in Judaism as marking the triumph of Pharisaism over its rivals. The rabbis are seen as successors to the Pharisees, and rabbinic materials (often cited as the "Pharisaic-rabbinic tradition") are used to reconstruct Pharisaic positions. There are, to be sure, good reasons for positing substantial continuity between the Pharisees and the rabbis of the later period Men called Pharisees in the NT and Josephus are recognized as authorities in rabbinic literature (Gamaliel; Simeon, son of Gamaliel). Pharisaic adherence to an extrabiblical "tradition from the fathers" corresponds nicely with rabbinic insistence on the validity of the oral as well as the written Torah. Belief in the resurrection is championed by both Pharisees and rabbis against opponents who deny it. When rabbinic literature juxtaposes positions of the Pharisees with those of the Sadducees (or others), the rabbis align themselves with the former. Nonetheless, it is an oversimplification to speak of the "Pharisaic-rabbinic tradition," nor can rabbinic literature be used uncritically as evidence for Pharisaic positions. In part, the question must be put to each tradition in the rabbinic texts whether it in fact preserves memories from the pre-70 period. If this is granted, we must still ask whether it is Pharisaic positions which are represented. Rabbinic Judaism was open to many influences not specifically Pharisaic, and it is perhaps significant that the rabbis did not choose to see themselves as Pharisees. According to Cohen the post-70 period marks not the triumph of Pharisaism but the end of sectarianism as it was known in the period prior to the destruction of Jerusalem (see Destruction of Jerusalem).

2. Name and History.

The derivation, force and use of the name "Pharisee" are all disputed. Commonly the name is traced to the Hebrew pe'rūšîm and taken to mean "separatist" It is then debated whether the term's connotations were good or bad, and whether it was first used by Phari sees of themselves or of Pharisees by opponents. Recently, Baumgarten, noting that an evident claim of the Pharisees was to be the party of akribeia, of scrupulous exactness in their observance of God's laws, has suggested that behind the name "Pharisee" may lie the Hebrew pārōšîm, "specifiers" (i.e., of the correct understanding of the divine requirements).

Typically, the circumstances surrounding the origin of the Pharisaic party are lost to the historian's view. Many scholars see them as spiritual descendants of the Hasidim, a group of pious Jews who attached themselves to the Maccabean opposition to the Seleucid King, Antiochus IV Epiphanes (see Kampen). In the narrative of Josephus, Pharisees first appear in connection with the reign of John Hyrcanus. They are presented as a group with a defined set of laws and views of punishment which are alternately espoused and abrogated by Hasmonean monarchs. Herod's wrath is said to have been roused by the Pharisees, many of whom he is purported to have killed.

The character of the Pharisaic movement after the time of Herod is, again, in dispute. Neusner, granting that the Pharisees were a political force until Herod's time, claims that they then evolved into a non-political group concerned primarily with the preservation of ritual purity for the eating of ordinary meals: a political party became a table-fellowship sect. Not unrelated is the observation, noted above, that Neusner believes Josephus in his Antiquities has grossly exaggerated the power of the Pharisees in the pre-70 period. In fact they did not, Neusner insists, control the religious or political institutions of pre-destruction Judaism. But the distinction between political party and table-fellowship (see Table Fellowship) sect is a false one. Pharisees committed themselves to the scrupulous observance of a particular understanding of Israel's Law (cf. Phil 3:5). Since requirements of tithing and ritual purity (see Clean and Unclean) form a part of Israel's sacred tradition, it is likely that Pharisees of all periods followed a distinctive view of these requirements and, in order to ensure their observance at mealtimes, were restrictive in the company they kept (a "separateness" reflected in the usual understanding of the name Pharisee). In all periods, then, Pharisaism would have functioned in part as a table-fellowship sect.

But a party acknowledged to be the most accurate interpreters of Israel's Law could hardly have confined its attention—in any period—to tithing and ritual purity. A more comprehensive agenda is both inherently likely and attested by the sources. Were the Pharisees, then, a political party? Again, the designation misleads. Pharisees were drawn from all classes and professions of Jewish society; many would not have been involved in politics at all. On the other hand, since Pharisaism was based on a view of what Israel's responsibilities under the covenant entailed, those Pharisees who occupied positions of influence and power naturally did what they could to promote the acceptance of Pharisaic norms. In this sense Pharisees were involved in politics from Hasmonean times until the destruction of Jerusalem, though undoubtedly the effectiveness of their involvement underwent shifts.

In any case, given the diversity of first-century Jewish Palestine, Pharisees of necessity competed with rival groups for influence and power. Whereas they might at times succeed in influencing the proceedings of particular religious and political institutions, they controlled none. It is hard to believe, for example, that Sadducean priests would have taken directions from Pharisees in conducting Temple* worship. Nor should Pharisaic dominance of the Sanhedrin* or even the synagogues* be assumed. That the Saddu-cees could count on support from the priestly aristocracy underlines a further dilemma facing the Pharisees: with no certain power base, they needed to be aggressive both in attracting members and in promoting their views.

The evidence suggests that they achieved considerable success. Josephus describes the Pharisees as the leading sea (J.W. 2.8.14 §162). Both the rabbinic and Cospel materials appear to support the view that Pharisaic influence with the masses exceeded that of their rivals. Pharisaic claims of scrupulous piety and the preservation of ancestral laws were accorded wider circulation and support than any slogans the Sadducees or Essenes could devise (Life 191 §38; J.W. 1.5.2
Indeed, the latter groups may have suffered in public estimation by their association, in the case of the Sadducees, with the Roman occupiers of the land (see Rome), and, in that of (some) Essenes, with none but themselves. Popular support was undoubtedly the main base of what influence the Pharisees possessed.

The Pharisees emerge then as an organized party of members committed to a particular understanding of Israel's Law, maintaining its practice themselves and advocating its adoption by others. Where rulers could be influenced, Pharisees lobbied for their views. Moreover, Pharisees were sufficiently schooled in the ways of the world to participate in councils and coalitions with rivals when the situation required it and common goals could be established (e.g., J.W. 2.17.3 §411; Life 20-23 §5). In this respect they functioned as a "political interest group" (Saldarini). On the other hand, competition with rival groups was fierce and, fueled by the fervor of religious conviction, mutual denunciations were harsh. The tone of the pre-70 party debates found in rabbinic literature, the polemic against opponents found in the Dead Sea Scrolls (the Pharisees are apparently reproached as "seekers of smooth things"; see Dead Sea Scrolls), and the controversies and condemnations which fill the pages of the Gospels all attest to the bitter divisiveness which marked and (according to rabbinic literature) marred pre-destruction Judaism.

As far as we can tell, Pharisaism was a phenomenon of the pre-70 period. To depict the post-70 situation as the triumph of the Pharisees is oversimplistic and misleading. It was not until years later that the rabbis established effective leadership of the people; when they did so, they did not appear as Pharisees.

3. The Tradition of the Pharisees.

The adoption by Pharisees (and by later rabbis) of non-biblical prescriptions as binding law was on their pan programmatic; for opponents, it served as an easy target for attack (Ant. 13.10.6 §297; Mk 7:6-13; perhaps 1QH 4:10). Much work remains to be done to define (where possible) the precise content of the Pharisaic tradition.

Particular attention was clearly given to matters of ritual purity and tithing, since the failure of the general populace to observe these laws according to Pharisaic norms compelled the Pharisees to regulate their own affairs in such a way as would ensure that their food was properly prepared. Many of the rulings preserved in rabbinic literature which can be traced with some confidence back to the Pharisees of the pre-70 era are in fact "party law" of this kind: not prescriptions thought to represent God's will for all Israel but necessary adaptations and applications of Pharisaic ideals to a situation in which the majority of Jews (the so-called people of the land) were, by Pharisaic standards, insufficiently observant Rabbinic literature attests to distinctions drawn between the "people of the land," the "reliable" (i.e., people who could be trusted to observe certain requirements of purity and tithing), and full-fledged "associates" who had pledged to conform with defined standards, including the attempt to maintain ritual purity while eating ordinary meals. Relations between ordinary people and such associates inevitably required some definition. For example, the associate could not eat with outsiders. To some extent tithes had to be paid on what was purchased from a non-member, while foodstuff that was wet (and hence specially susceptible to impurity) could not be purchased from outsiders. The state of the rules for associates in the time of Jesus is not known, nor can we be sure that all Pharisees were associates. But these rules do seem to reflect Pharisaic ideals and illustrate the Pharisaic goal of maintaining higher standards of ritual purity than were observed by ordinary Jews.

Generally, NT references are insufficiently specific to be of much help in defining Pharisaic legal positions. As exceptions we may note the use made of Mark 7:10-12 by A I. Baumgarten and of Matthew 23:16-22 by S. Lieberman.

In proclaiming to Israel the dawning reign of God, Jesus demanded a response quite different from that sought by the Pharisees, who summoned the nation to adhere to Torah's laws as interpreted by Pharisaic scribes. Since both were competing for the allegiance of the masses, conflict and mutual attempts to discredit might seem inevitable. Any perceived departure from Torah on the part of Jesus or his disciples was liable to be attacked by Pharisees. Disputes arising from apparent violations of Sabbath laws are especially frequent in the Gospels. Pharisees could be counted on to cite Deuteronomy 24 against Jesus' (widely attested) condemnation of divorce (Mk 10:2-9). Again, Jesus' open association (even at mealtimes) with notorious sinners could hardly have passed uncontested, providing as it did a stark contrast with Pharisaic efforts to cultivate careful adherence to the laws and Pharisaic scruples about mealtime company. In each of these cases, the Pharisees appear in the Gospels appropriately enough as the party advocating precision (akribeia) in the interpretation and performance
The seriousness with which Pharisees would have regarded Jesus' departures from their norms is a matter of some debate. In a lengthy review of the issue E. P. Sanders (1990) has suggested that even if the conflict stories in the Gospels are historically reliable (and Sanders regards this as dubious), no significant conflict was involved. Disputes between groups within the Pharisaic movement, he suggests, were at least as substantial as were Pharisaic differences from the Sadducees. Yet the Pharisees had learned to tolerate those who did not share their views, worshiped with them at the Temple, and certainly did not regard those whose opinions on details of observance differed from their own as "sinners"* outside the pale of true Israel.* The latter category was restricted to those who lived in flagrant transgression of the fundamental laws of Israel's covenant J. D. G. Dunn, responding to an earlier form of Sanders's position (1985), thinks such a "quietistic" portrayal of Pharisees, absorbed in their own affairs and uncritical of others, highly unrealistic. And that Pharisees would have labelled outsiders to their ranks as "sinners" he finds plausible, given the evidence for contemporary usage of the term to disparage outsiders to one's faction.

On the latter point and as far as the Gospel evidence is concerned, Sanders's position is to be favored. The "sinnen" whose company Jesus kept were not so merely from a factional, Pharisaic viewpoint: It is not simply Pharisees, but "this generation," which reproaches his behavior (Mt 11:16-19). Furthermore, the use of the term for tax collectors (see Taxes) and prostitutes* (Mk 2:16; Lk 7:37; 19:7; etc.) and Jesus' acceptance of it as a designation of his companions (Mk 2:17; cf. Lk 7:47; Mt 21:31) make it clear that the notoriously wicked are intended.

On the other hand, there seems little point in attempting to establish how Pharisees would have responded to Jesus, or how accurately the Gospels portray their response, on the basis of the degree to which he departed from their norms. That would be a pressing issue only if deviation from Pharisaic standards constituted a crime for which Jesus was formally charged, but the Gospels do not suggest this happened. They do depict Jesus as rousing Pharisaic hostility by his actions, a claim which is not easy to dismiss. After all, the passion with which a person responds when their convictions are ignored and their sensibilities offended often says more about their personality, and even about other aspects of their relations with the offender, than about the seriousness of the offense.
Moreover, the tolerance which Sanders finds characteristic of the Pharisees as a group (a tolerance which, incidentally, he believes they had only recently learned, and which he maintains without considering the behavior of Paul the Pharisee) can hardly be guaranteed of all its members.

Finally, tolerance, even if a part is not the whole explanation for Pharisaic worship with Sadducees and others at the Temple: Their own commitment to the institution, combined with the impossibility of dictating its procedures, must surely be taken into account. The broad picture of Pharisees in conflict with Jesus seems well rooted in the Gospel tradition. It also seems consistent with, and inevitable in the light of, their different understandings of the divine will.

For Jesus' part the "old wineskins" could not contain "new wine" (Mk 2:22; see Wine). Believing that a new divine initiative had begun, the Jesus of the Gospels is exasperated by Pharisaic failure to discern and respond to the significance of the moment (Mk 2:19; 8:11-12; cf. Mt 21:28-32; 23:13). In the well-known parable* of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32) Jesus defends his association with "sinners" by arguing in effect that God is even now demonstrating his love to the most profligate of his people. Those of the Pharisaic ilk are represented in the figure of the sulking older brother, whose offended sensibilities keep him from partaking of the family feast.

The criticisms directed in the Gospels against the Pharisees go beyond their failure to respond to the message of the kingdom. Pharisaic claims of meticulous observance are depicted as leading both to pride (Mt 23:5-7; Lk 11:43; cf. Ant. 17.2.4 §41) and to contempt for the less observant—an unwarranted contempt since the latter in turn are portrayed as more sensitive to their failings, more open to Jesus' proclamation of God's sovereignty and love* (Lk 7:37-50; 15:1-32; 18:9-14; 19:1-10). Again, the attention to the minutiae of tithing and ritual purity required by Pharisaic scruples would inevitably appear to an opponent with a different focus as evidence of distorted perspectives; hence the attack on those who tithe mint, dill and cummin while neglecting the essentials of the Law; the charge that cleansing cups is combined by Pharisees with inner corruption (Mt 23:23,25-26; cf. the charge of corruption in Ant. 17.2.4 §41-45). Jesus' penchant for the striking picture and his attacks on expressions of Pharisaic piety are both to be recognized in the caricature of people who strain out gnats and swallow camels (Mt 23:24), or who turn the appointed hour of prayer* into a recitation of their merits (Lk 18:9-12).
Charges of this sort are rooted in different views of Israel's task and opportunity, and were certainly raised already in the lifetime of Jesus. That confrontation continued in the post-resurrection period can be seen in the attempts of the Pharisee Paul to show his "zeal" for his ancestral faith by persecuting the church (Phil 3:5-6; cf. Gal 1:13-14). The Gospels' depictions of Pharisees reflect both memories from the career of Jesus and subsequent developments in the Christian communities.

4.1. Mark. Mark's community was scarcely one which experienced Pharisaic opposition at firsthand; indeed, the Evangelist must explain Jewish customs for his readers (7:1-4). Part of the reason Pharisees are remembered may well be that some account had to be given, in a Gospel of the crucified Son of God (see Son of God), of how his appearance roused hostility. Conflicts arise over Jesus' association with sinners (2:16) and the failure of Jesus or his disciples to conform to norms of fasting* (2:18), Sabbath observance (2:24; 3:2) and purity (7:5). The propriety of divorce* is also disputed (10:2-9). The confrontations are said to lead Pharisees to plot against Jesus (3:6). Further inquiries, with malicious intent are brought to Jesus (8:11; 12:13). The Markan Jesus responds, sometimes sharply (cf. 7:6-13), to such queries, but otherwise he devotes no attention to Pharisees.

Clearly the teaching of the Pharisees represented no attraction for Mark's readers. On the contrary, the old order has passed for Mark (2:22). Its food laws, the subject of considerable controversy in parts of the early church, are perceived in Mark as irrelevant and unproblematic (7:19). Consequently, the Pharisaic endeavor can only be seen as serving no purpose. But the hostility which the Pharisees showed toward Jesus remains a part of the tradition and determines their portrayal as hypocrites, unfaithful to God's Word in the past (7:6-13) and insensitive to his dealings in the present (8:11-12). Worth noting, however, is Mark 12:28-34. Since the scribe who admired Jesus' reply to the Sadducees was probably a Pharisee, the passage suggests that there were Pharisees whose views of what is fundamental overlapped substantially with those of Jesus. But Mark himself makes no mention of the scribe's party affiliation.

4.2. Matthew Matthew's community, which includes both Jewish and Gentile Christians, clearly lives in an environment with a noticeable Jewish presence. Relations are tense, and the Matthean community perceives itself to be the object of persecution (cf. 5:10-12; 10:17-18; 23:34). Much in the Gospel is intended to support Matthew's claim, maintained in the teeth of Jewish counter-claims, that the appearance of Jesus represents the climax of Israel's sacred history (most emphatically, 5:17) and that followers of Jesus—Jews and Gentiles alike—have displaced the unbelieving and disobedient "sons of the kingdom" as the people of God (8:10-12; 21:43). Great emphasis is placed on the differences to be observed between the piety of those who follow Jesus and that of Jews who do not: The latter is portrayed as superficial, hypocritical (see Hypocrite) and ostentatious (5:20; 6:1-18). Pharisees, the epitome of such religiosity (23:4-7), are always hostile to Jesus in Matthew's Gospel, and the attention paid to their teaching witnesses to its relevance for Matthew's readers (especially chap. 23).

Though some would see in Matthew a Christian response to Pharisaic hegemony within Judaism of the post-70 period, it is unlikely that contemporaries perceived Judaism in those terms. The roots of the anti-Pharisaic polemic are better seen in the factiousness prevailing before the war. On the other hand, Garland has shown the Evangelist's intention in assembling the "woes" of Matthew 23 (see Blessing and Woe): The chapter reaches its climax in verses 35-39 (see v. 38) and is deliberately juxtaposed with prophecies of Jerusalem's destruction in chapter 24. Thus the Evangelist is attributing Jerusalem's devastation to divine judgment* on the sins of the "scribes and Pharisees" as false leaders of the people.

4.4. John. As a rule, John paints Judaism with a broad brush. Jesus' opponents appear often simply as "Jews" without more specific identification (John, Gospel of). Where Pharisees do figure, they are often represented as holding positions of power and acting in collaboration with other authorities (3:1; 7:32, 45; 11:47, 57; 12:42; 18:3). One at least is sympathetic toward Jesus (3:1; 7:50-51), but hostility predominates. The opposition of Pharisees is perceptively motivated in their own terms in 9:16; elsewhere it is attributed to spiritual obstinacy (9:39-41).

5. Conclusion.

Gospel texts depicting certain Pharisees, when detached from their historical context and seen as portraying Jewish piety as a whole, have prevented Christians from arriving at a sympathetic understanding of Judaism. The concern of much contemporary scholarship to portray Judaism (and Pharisaism) in its own terms represents an important corrective. But it must be combined with an insistence on reading the Gospels in their historical setting. Pharisees and the earliest followers of Jesus—all Jews—stood for alternative visions of the destiny and responsibilities of Israel. Doubtless there lie at the root of some of the mutual denunciations instances of abuse and the failure of behavior to match ideals, At a deeper level, however, lay the conflict of convictions deeply held about the course which Israel must pursue, and that from which they must turn, if they were to fulfill their divine calling (cf. Rom 10:2; the career of Paul saw him fervently maintain both sides of the dispute). First-century Judaism was the setting for many such disputes, the result of common convictions about Israel's past combined with different readings of what Israel's God now demanded of his people.

PONTIUS PILATE

Roman governor of Judea A.D. 26-36/37 (see Rome) who was involved in the trial of Jesus in AD. 33.

1. Sources for Pilate
2. Reign of Pilate
3. Trial of Jesus
4. Recall of Pilate

1. Sources for Pilate.

The little that is known of Pilate is from the account of his governorship of Judea in Josephus* (Ant 18.2.2 §§35; 3.1-2 §§55-62; 4.1-2 §§85-89; J.W. 2.9.2-4 §§169-77), from an episode given in Philo (Leg. Gai. 299-305), from his participation in the trial of Jesus (see Trial of Jesus) recorded in the four Gospels, and from a brief mention by Tacitus that the execution of "Christus" was by Pilate in the reign of Tiberius (Ann. 15.44.4). Also, in 1961 an incomplete inscription was found in Caesarea which gives the correct technical tide of his position as praefectus ludaeae, a military title of a commander of auxiliary troops (500-1,000 soldiers) rather than procurator, a financial officer of a province, or governor, a general term for leader which is consistently used in the NT.

2. Reign of Pilate.

According to Philo it seems that Pilate obtained his position via his mentor Sejanus, the commander of the Praetorian Guard (Philo Leg. Gai. 159). Pilate is described by his contemporary Philo, and later by Josephus, as being one who was greedy, inflexible, cruel, and who resorted to robbery and oppression (Philo Leg. Gai. 301-2; Josephus Ant. 18.3.1 §§55-59; J.W. 2.9.2-4 §§169-77).

Pilate is known to have treated Jewish customs with contempt (see Judaism). Almost immediately upon his arrival in Palestine in AD. 26, he was at odds with the Jews. His first act of provocation against the Jews was the introduction into Jerusalem of Roman standards with embossed figures of the emperor. Previous prefects had been careful not to offend Jewish religious views by not allowing any sign of emperor worship when the troops entered Jerusalem. This act of Pilate aroused great indignation on the part of the Jews, and as a result they sent a delegation to Caesarea who pled for five days for removal of the standards. Pilate on the sixth day ordered a detachment of soldiers among the crowd, and at a given signal they would draw their swords. When this occurred, all the Jews bared their necks and stated that they would rather die than transgress their laws. Pilate, realizing that this might lead to a national revolution, removed the offensive images from Jerusalem (Josephus J.W. 2.9.2-3 §§169-74; Ant. 18.3.1 §§55-59; see Revolutionary Movements).

Josephus's second recorded conflict was when Pilate seized funds from the sacred treasury known as the Corbonas in order to construct an aqueduct. Later, when Pilate visited Jerusalem, the Jews besieged him with angry clamor and he, seeing the possibility of an uprising, ordered his soldiers to mingle among the crowd dressed as civilians armed with hidden clubs. When the protest became more pronounced, the soldiers, on a prearranged signal, drew the clubs from under their tunics and began to beat the protestors, killing many (Josephus J.W. 2.9.3 §§172-74; Ant. 18.3.2 §§60-62).

The final conflict recorded by Josephus is one that caused Pilate's dismissal. In A.D. 36 a Samaritan* false prophet promised his followers that he would show them the sacred vessels which, according to tradition, Moses had buried on Mount Gerizim. Many believed him and gathered with arms at a village at the foot of the mountain, but Pilate blocked the projected route with a detachment of cavalry and heavily armed infantry. Some of the followers were killed in battle, others were imprisoned, still others fled. The more prominent prisoners were later executed. The Samaritans complained to Vitellius, prefect of Syria, who shortly afterwards sent Marcellus to take temporary charge of Judea, ordering Pilate to report to Tiberius Josephus Ant. 18.4.1-2 §§85-89).

Philo, who extols Tiberius's liberal policy toward the Jews, records the episode when Pilate had set up gilded votive shields bearing the name, though not the image, of the emperor in the former palace of Herod in Jerusalem (an incident to be distinguished from his earlier placement in Jerusalem of standards bearing the embossed figure of the emperor). Prominent Jews, including the four sons of Herod, appealed to Pilate to remove the shields. But when he refused to hear their request, they wrote to the Emperor Tiberius. Upon receiving the letter, Tiberius was enraged and immediately replied, ordering Pilate to remove the shields from Jerusalem and place them in the temple of Augustus at Caesarea (Leg. Gai. 299-305). Unlike the previous incident of the standards, prominent Jews and Herod's sons were able now to write directly to Tiberius, an event made possible by Sejanus's execution by Tiberius on October 18, AD. 31. Tiberius was now trying to reverse Sejanus's anti-Semitic policies and hence gave a quick response to the Jews' request.

But why would Pilate have done such a thing when he had already been defeated in the incident of the standards? It seems that with the removal of his mentor Sejanus, whose anti-Semitic policies he had followed, Pilate wanted to dissociate himself from Sejanus and ingratiate himself with Tiberius. Consequently, he brought into Jerusalem shields that had no image but bore the name of the emperor. But the plan backfired and Tiberius was sorely displeased. The most likely time for this incident to have occurred is at a Jewish festival when the sons of Herod would have been in Jerusalem, possibly the Feast of Tabernacles in a.d. 32.

The NT mentions a little-known incident of Pilate mixing the blood of the Galileans with their sacrifices (Lk 13:1). The interpretation of this incident seems to intimate that Pilate had killed some Galileans when they were offering sacrifices at Jerusalem. Although nothing else is known of this event, it fits the assessment of Josephus and Philo regarding Pilate's brutal character.
3. Trial of Jesus.

The Jewish leaders brought Jesus to Pilate early on Friday morning of passion week, accusing Jesus of setting himself up as king (Mt 27:1-2,11-14; Mk 15:1-5; Lk 23:1-5; John 18:28-38). When Pilate found no wrong in Jesus, and when the Jewish leader suggested that Jesus had caused trouble both in Judea and Galilee, Pilate sent Jesus to Herod Antipas who was ruler over Galilee (Lk 23:6-12). Herod took no action and sent him back to Pilate, who then wanted to release him. However, Pilate finally gave in to the pressure of the Jewish leaders when they threatened him with the accusation of not being a friend of Caesar (Mt 27:15-26; Mk 15:6-15; Lk 23:13-25; Jn 18:39—19:15). Hence the Gospels portray Pilate in the trial of Jesus as one who was weak and willing to comply with the wishes of the Jewish leaders against his own desires.

This profile of Pilate's character is quite different from that given by Philo and Josephus. Historical explanations vary according to the dating of the crucifixion. If Jesus was crucified in a.d. 30, Pilate may have been trying to be conciliatory toward Herod Antipas (see Herodian Dynasty) because of the little-known episode of Pilate mixing the blood of the Galileans—Antipas' citizens—with their sacrifices (Lk 13:1). If Jesus was crucified in a.d. 33, the removal of Pilate's mentor Sejanus, and his failure to ingratiate himself with the emperor, may have broken Pilate's backbone and left him fighting for political survival. He might then have handed Jesus over to Herod Antipas in order to prevent Herod from making another unfavorable report to Tiberius as he had done within the last few months (as one of the sons of Herod). In this event, Herod Antipas took no action and handed Jesus back to Pilate so that Pilate could gain no advantage, for Herod also had been a friend of Sejanus.

One further problem needs to be addressed Luke states that Pilate and Herod became friends from that day forward (Lk 23:12). If this took place in a.d. 30 (see Chronology), it would imply that the settlement between Pilate and Antipas regarding Pilate's slaying of the Galileans accounts for the enmity that was overcome (Lk 23:12). But there was a fierce battle after Sejanus's death in a.d. 31, and thus some would conclude that if Jesus was executed in a.d. 30, Luke is in error regarding the relationship between Pilate and Herod. Another criticism from scholars holding to a.d. 30 crucifixion is that the portrayal of an anemic Pilate in the Gospels (compared with the Pilate of Josephus and Philo) betrays the anti-Semitic bias of the Evangelists (see Anti-Semitism). Pilate is absolved from blame and the Jewish people are held responsible for Jesus' death (see Death of Jesus).

However, if Jesus was crucified in a.d. 33, the reconciliation of the enmity between Pilate and Herod Antipas becomes more historically realistic. The Jews, having only recently received the news of Sejanus's death (possibly during the winter of 32/33 or early 33), threatened Pilate that if he did release Jesus, he was not a friend of Caesar (Jn 19:12). Pilate realized that if he did not comply, the Jews would regard him as still being a friend of Sejanus and/or friendly toward his policies which Tiberius had now repudiated. Hence Pilate's compliance with the Jews during the trial of Jesus would be fully understandable in light of recent events that made him more cautious.

4. Recall of Pilate.

Because of the Samaritan complaint to Vitellius, prefect of Syria, Pilate was deposed at the end of a.d. 36 or at the beginning of 37. He arrived in Rome after Tiberius's death (March 16, 37). There are no records of his life after his travel to Rome, and he may well have been exiled to the southern part of France. The Christian tradition reported by Eusebius is that Pilate committed suicide after his trial of Jesus (Eusebius Hist. Eccl 2.7).

PRAYER
1. Jewish Prayer at the Time of Jesus

The Jews (see Judaism) were a praying people. Their sacred writings contain many prayers which no doubt were regularly used as such, and the Qumran Scrolls (see Dead Sea Scrolls) and Jewish apocrypha and pseudepigrapha attest a continuing creativity in Jewish formulation and practice of prayer. The Temple* was called a "house of prayer" (Is 56:7), and the sacrifices were accompanied by prayers (Sir 50:19; Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.196; Lk 1:10), so that the hour of sacrifice (morning and evening) could be called simply "the hour of prayer" (Acts 3:1; see Cohen). The Jewish meeting places (synagogues*) were also distinctive in the ancient world precisely as places of prayer and could be represented simply by the word prayer, given an extended meaning to signify "prayer-house" or "place of prayer" (Josephus Life 277; Ag. Ap. 2.10; see LSJ and BAGD, proseuchê). The synagogue prayers were probably not said in unison but by the person called on by the ruler of the synagogue to lead in prayer, with the congregation responding, "Amen" (cf. Neh 8:6; 1 Chron 16:36; Tob 8:8; 1QS 1:20; 1 Cor 14:16; m. Ber. 8:8; m. Ta'an. 2:5). Every adult member was entitled to exercise this privilege (cf. m. Meg. 4:6). Prayer would be offered standing (cf. Mt 6:5; Mk 11:25; Lk 18:11; m. Ber. 5:1).

The prayer of prayers for the Jews subsequently, but probably at the time of Jesus too, was the Shemoneh Esreh, the Eighteen Benedictions. It was probably given this form in the period AD. 70-100, but several at least of the more elaborate eighteenfold form would certainly have been known to and used by Jesus. Characteristic of each is the final response or blessing (hence the tide): "Blessed are you, Lord . . ."—"shield of Abraham," "who makes the dead alive," "who delights in repentance," "rich in forgiveness," "who humbles the insolent," "who builds Jerusalem," "who hears prayer."

Another ancient Jewish prayer whose earliest form probably goes back to the time of Jesus, the Qaddish, is of particular interest to Christians, since it may well have been used by Jesus in formulating the Lord's Prayer. The earliest form known to us begins thus:

Exalted and hallowed be his great name in the world, which he created according to his will.

May he establish his kingdom in your lifetime and in your days, and in the lifetime of the whole household of Israel, speedily and at a near time.

The fact that these prayers were already so well established does not signify a high degree of formalism in Jewish prayer at the time of Jesus. On the contrary, the different forms of these prayers shows that they are part of a developing tradition. The innovativeness of Jewish practice is clearly indicated also by the continuing composition of psalms and prayers (as again at Qumran and in the Hellenistic synagogal prayers preserved in the Christian Apostolic Constitutions). And we should also note the rabbinic rulings preserved in Mishnah, Berakot 4:3-4, to the effect that it is necessary to pray only the substance of the Eighteen Benedictions unless the pray-er's prayer "is fluent in his mouth," and that a mechanical repetition of prayer is no (real) supplication.

The tradition of every Jew praying twice a day, at sunrise and sunset, at the third and ninth hours, the hours of sacrifice, is very old (Ezra 9:5; Dan 9:21; Jdt 9:1; Pss. Sol. 6:4); it is attributed to Moses* by Josephus* (Ant. 4.212), was certainly the practice of the Essenes (as can now be seen particularly from the fragmentary 4Q 503), and was regularized in the Mishnah as an accompaniment to the saying of the Shema (m. Ber. 1:1-4). But there is also the old tradition of prayer at mid-day (the sixth hour), giving three hours of prayer (Ps 55:17; Dan 6:10; m. Ber. 4:1; implied also by 2 Enoch 51:4; Acts 10:9; Did. 8.3).

Also to be noted is the established tradition of giving thanks to God* before a meal (Deut 8:10), carefully regulated at Qumran (Josephus J.W. 2.131; 1QS 6:4-5) and in the Mishnah (m. Ber. 6-8), and followed both by Jesus (Mk 6:41 par.; 8:6-7 par.; 14:22-23 par.) and by the first Christians (Rom 14:6; 1 Cor 10:30; 1 Tim 4:4). The typical thanksgiving over the bread would be: "Blessed are you, Lord, who brings forth bread from the earth."

2. Jesus’ Practice of Prayer.

We do not know for certain but may assume that Jesus was brought up to say the Shema and the Eighteen Benedictions twice a day (cf. Mk 12:29). The fact that he regarded the Temple pre-eminently (?) as "a house of prayer" (Mk 11:17 par.; cf. Is 56:7), or is so remembered, suggests that prayer was central for Jesus within the much larger ritual and sacrificial ritual focussed on the Temple (contrast Mt 17:24-6). And it was evidently his regular practice to attend the synagogue on the Sabbath* (Lk 4:16), when he would no doubt join with the rest in the prayers; although the particular occasions recalled by the Evangelists speak only of his teaching and preaching (Mk 1:21-29 par.; 1:39 par.; 3:1 par.; 6:2 par.; Mt 9:35; Lk 4:15-16; 13:10).

However, Jesus' own practice of prayer is vividly recalled in all the Gospels. Mark 1:35 recalls an occasion when Jesus had gone off "a great while before day" to "a lonely place" to pray. And again in 6:46 he went off again alone, up the mountainside (see Mountain and Wilderness) to pray, evidently through the evening and into the night Mark's third account finds Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane* (14:35-42), when again Jesus is recounted as praying well into the night. Two points are worthy of note. (1) Although his praying covered the usual times of prayer, morning and evening, his need of prayer, at least on these occasions, went far beyond the formal saying of prayers. (2) Each of the occasions recalled by Mark seems to have been a time of decision and temptation (see Temptation of Jesus) regarding the character and emphases of his vocation. This would explain the longer time spent in prayer on these occasions. Consequently, the Markan account should not be regarded as indicating Jesus' normal practice of prayer.

Matthew follows Mark's second account (Mt 14:23), and both Matthew and Luke record the Gethsemane prayer (Mt 26:36-46; Lk 22:40-46). Matthew and Luke (Q*) also share the record of Jesus' prayer in Matthew 11:25-26 and Luke 10:21. But in addition Luke records a further eight occasions when Jesus prayed—following his baptism* (3:21), following his early success (5:16; equivalent to Mk 1:35), prior to his choosing the Twelve (6:12-13; see Disciple), prior to Peter's confession (9:18), on the mountain of Transfiguration* (9:28-29; closely parallel to 3:21), prior to his teaching the Lord's Prayer (11:1) and twice on the cross (23:34 and 46; see Death of Jesus). Why Luke contains so many extra recollections of Jesus at prayer is not clear, but it certainly matches the emphasis he also gives to Jesus' teaching on prayer (see 5. below). Evidently, only Luke wants to present Jesus as a model of prayerful piety (Lk 11:14; cf. Lk 3:21-22 with Acts 1:14 and 2:14; Lk 6:12-13 with Acts 13:2-3; and Lk 23:34 with Acts 7:60). But we need not doubt that he was able to draw on a substantial living memory of Jesus as a man of prayer.
The instances recorded by the Fourth Evangelist on the other hand, are curiously stylized and artificial: in 11:4142, he prays not for his own benefit but "on account of the people standing by"; in 12:27-28, he denies the sort of distress and petition the Synoptics attribute to him in Gethsemane; in 17:1-26, without parallel in the other Gospels. John's purpose is clearly very different from Luke's on this topic: to portray Jesus as the incarnate (Son of) God rather than as the Jewish Messiah (Son of God*) dependent on prayer (see Christ).

In short even when the Evangelists' pastoral and apologetic motivations are discounted, the evidence is still clear and consistent: that Jesus was a man of prayer whose natural response particularly to situations of crisis and decision was to seek God alone in prayer.

A great deal has been made during the past forty years of Jesus' style of address to God and its significance. Jeremias made the case for Jesus having regularly addressed God by the Aramaic word 'abbā (see Languages of Palestine); and he also noted that 'abbā' was "a child's word"; and this led too quickly to the conclusion that 'abbā meant "Daddy"—an early conclusion which Jeremias soon qualified, but which has come back to haunt the study of the Gospel traditions ever since.

The basic evidence is clear and Jeremias's initial conclusion probably sound. The key evidence is the appearance of abbā itself in Mark 14:36. Added to that is the clear attestation that the same form was used by the early Christians (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6). Two points of significance are to be noted in the last two passages. (1) The Aramaic word was retained in the worship* of the Greek-speaking churches. This must mean both that this particular prayer address had become so established among the earliest Palestinian believers and so precious for them that it was carried over into Greek-speaking worship. That is to say, its continuing value lay not in its meaningfulness to Greek speakers but in the meaningfulness of the living tradition of prayer which it expressed. (2) It is remembered as a word particularly associated with Jesus: to say abbā is to share in a common sonship and a common inheritance with Jesus (Rom 8:16-17; Gal 4:6-7; cf. 8:29). This must mean that the word was recalled as a word particularly and peculiarly associated with Jesus' own sonship to God (see Son of God). Were it a common prayer idiom of (some) Jews at the time of Jesus (as some have suggested, without supporting evidence), it would not have had this significance of linking the one who said abba so distinctively and directly with the sonship of Jesus.

It is true that abbā occurs nowhere else in the Gospels, including the traditions of Jesus' prayers. But in each stratum of the Gospel tradition Jesus is recalled as praying, and on each occasion the address is patēr/pater ("Father"; Mk 14:36; Mt 11:25-6 par. Lk 10:21; Lk 23:34, 46; Mt 26:42; Jn 11:41; 12:27-28; 17:1, 5, 11, 21, 24-25). In the light of Romans 8:15-17 and Galatians 4:6-7 Jeremias's conclusion must be judged fair: that underlying the Greek patēr, or "Father," was the Aramaic 'abbā. In this case the further conclusion is sound: that 'abbā' was Jesus' regular and characteristic address to God. The only recorded prayer of Jesus which does not address God as "Father" is Mark 15:34 (par. Mt 27:46)—"My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" But here the words are those of Psalm 22:1, and the very sense of forsakenness which they express may well be sufficient explanation of why the more familiar 'abbā' did not come so naturally to Jesus' lips on that occasion.

Jeremias made the further claim that this form of prayer address was without parallel in Palestinian piety. This was overstating the case, since there are records of individuals addressing God as "Father" with a degree of intimacy which could have been expressed in the Aramaic 'abbā' (Wis 14:3; Sir 23:1, 4; 51:10; 3 Macc 6:3, 8; m. Tā'an. 3:8). Nevertheless, the typical address to God, as in the Eighteen Benedictions, is a good deal more formal and had the practice been widespread among the Jews it could hardly have been regarded as distinctive of Jesus and his disciples, as a distinctive hallmark of the Spirit of the Son, in the way that Romans 8:15-17 and Galatians 4:6-7 clearly imply. So the likelihood remains that Jesus was marked out among his fellow Jews at least in the fact that 'abbā' was his characteristic and regular form of address to God in prayer.

The reason why 'abbā' would be so little used is presumably because it was typically a family word, or expressive of a degree of intimacy with reverence which would be characteristic of children (but not just little children) within the family circle, or of disciples of a loved and revered teacher. This more qualified statement of the case can probably be defended quite adequately even in the face of the criticisms brought against the more simplistic equating of 'abbā' with "Daddy." If so, we may still deduce that the reason why Jesus used the word so regularly in prayer was that he experienced his relationship with God through prayer as such a relation of intimacy and reverence. The earliest disciples likewise retained the usage because they too experienced prayer thus prompted by the Spirit as a relationship of sonship— but not of a sonship independent of Jesus' sonship. Rather, their relationship was dependent on his abbā sonship and shared in his inheritance as God's Son.

The importance of this conclusion for the larger concerns of Christian theology can hardly be underestimated. (1) The subsequent classic Christian understanding of Jesus as God's Son is firmly rooted in Jesus' own sense of intimate sonship to God. It is not that a unique category was thrust upon Jesus (the Son of God) to give him a status he had not claimed. It is rather that a less specific term of relationship (God's son), shared by angel,* king, righteous individual or charismatic rabbi, and indicating God's approval and evident favor, became filled and absorbed by the distinctive character of Jesus’ sonship, and thus came to be seen as uniquely applicable to him (see Son of God). (2) This Christian assertion did not begin as a theological assertion but in Jesus' own experience of intimate sonship and specifically in his experience of prayer. So too it was confirmed in the earliest days of Christianity by the first Christians' shared experience of sonship, in the shared experience of prayer, as a participation in his sonship or, alternatively expressed, as an access to God as Father in prayer through and by virtue of Jesus' own sonship. This integration of christology, soteriology and spirituality, of doctrine and experience, is thus at the heart of Christianity.

Jesus not only lived out the practice of prayer, but prayer was also one of the most consistent themes in his teaching. Moreover, the teaching reflects the practice—another integration fundamental to Christianity. This is evident at once in the opening of the Lord's Prayer. Since it is the single most important part of Jesus' teaching on prayer and the most characteristic prayer of Christians from then on, it will be given particular attention.

4.1. The Form of the Prayer. The Lord's Prayer is preserved in two forms: Matthew 6:9-13 and Luke 11:2-4 (Did. 8:2 is virtually the same as Matthew).
While it is possible that Jesus taught the twofold form on different occasions, it is more likely that Luke's form is nearer the original length and that Matthew reflects a process of liturgical elaboration. There are a number of reasons for this conclusion.

(1) It is highly unlikely that the teaching of Jesus was preserved and passed on in rigid, unchanging forms, either in Aramaic or in Greek (see Tradition Criticism). The clear testimony of the Synoptic traditions is that the words and deeds of Jesus were recalled in varied form and patterns (see Form Criticism), with particular wording adapted or recast as between Gospels. Otherwise we would have three Gospels saying precisely the same things in precisely the same words, which is manifestly not the case.

(2) Teaching of Jesus which was used in worship would be particularly subject to liturgical elaboration— that is, to a development of form shaped by the character of the worship or to make it more usable in worship. Here the clearest signs are the fuller form of Matthew's first line (more sonorous and easier for a congregation to say than Luke's abrupt "Father"), the elaborations of lines 4-5 and 10 (coming, as we might expect, at the end of each of the two halves of the prayer), and the subsequent addition of the familiar conclusion "For yours is the kingdom . . . " (clearly a later addition, as all modern translations indicate, and evidence that liturgical development continued after the Gospels had been written, with Did. 8.2 as an early stage in the process—"For yours is the power and the glory for ever"). The different forms of "the words of institution" at the Last Supper (see Last Supper) attest the same process (Mk 14:22-24 par.).

(3) The prayer itself seems to be a development from or (in part at least) an adaptation of a contemporary Jewish prayer (see 1. above). The process reflected in the different versions of Matthew and Luke and subsequently is thus of a piece with evolving patterns of prayer in the Judaism* of Jesus' day (see 1. above).

(4) Luke presents the prayer precisely as a badge which was designed to mark out the disciples of Jesus from those of John the Baptist (Lk 11:1-2; see John the Baptist). This suggests that the Lukan form is closer to what Jesus taught as the prayer peculiar to his disciples.

(5) Luke's use of "Father" (line 1) probably presupposes the Aramaic 'abbā\ and provides the undergirding for Romans 8:15-16 and Galatians 4:6-7 with their implication that the disciples' abbā prayer was a conscious echo of Jesus' own prayer style (see 3. above).

At the same time it would be widely accepted that Matthew's wording is closer to an underlying Aramaic original (particularly lines 6-7), while Luke reflects a certain degree of adaptation (lines 6, 8) to take account of the longer time span envisaged by the churches of his day (as also in, e.g., Lk 19:11).
However, these issues are not of great importance so far as the significance of the prayer itself is concerned. What does matter is (1) that Jesus thought it of sufficient importance to teach his disciples a model prayer; (2) that it was a prayer which both drew on Jesus' and the first disciples' Jewish heritage and marked out those who used it as identified with Jesus; and (3) that, whether taught by Jesus in two forms or used by the first Christians in two forms, it is both the same prayer and yet a living and adaptable form. To be noted is the fact that the different forms of the Lord's Prayer in modern liturgies express the same sense of the living vehicle of communication with God and not a petrified formula or talisman whose virtue lies in precise reproduction of a set pattern. The fact that the Lord's Prayer has thus provided a vehicle of living prayer for nearly two millennia says much for the spiritual power of these words and for the spiritual insight of the one who taught them.

4.2. The Content of the Prayer. The opening of the prayer at once marks out its character as the prayer of Jesus and the attitude it expresses. This is clearer in the Lukan form ("Father"), which almost certainly reflects Jesus' own style of addressing God and which therefore also indicates Jesus' intention that his disciples should share in his own sense of intimate sonship to God as Father (see 3. above). The point is obscured in Matthew's version, whose more stately formulation ("Our Father who is in the heavens") is more like the language used in several of the Eighteen Benedictions (see 1. above). Matthew's form thus underscores the extent to which the spirituality of the Lord's Prayer is consonant with and grows out from that of Jewish prayer as attested both in the OT and for the time of Jesus. But Luke's brings out more the intimate boldness of the Jesus prayer and underscores the directness of the link between Jesus' prayer style and that of the first Christians (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6). However, the two versions (of Matthew and Luke) are not at all at odds with each other. In both cases the first note struck is that of the dependence and trust of the pray-er on God. In fact all three Evangelists emphasize the need for the disciples to recognize their littleness before God if they are to enter the kingdom of God (Mt 18:3; Mk 10:15; Lk 18:17); and the Q tradition elsewhere takes pains to inculcate an attitude of trust (see Faith) in God as Father (Mt 7:7-11 par. Lk 11:9-13; Mt 6:25-34 par. Lk 12:22-31; see 5.1. below). The strength and outworking of this basic conviction was and remains a distinctive feature of Christianity.

4.2.1. First Petition. The first petition reflects the significance of a person's name in the ancient world. To act in the name of someone was to exercise that person's power and authority. To call on the name of someone was to put oneself under that person's protection and command. That is to say, the name of the person used in such formulae indicated the perceived significance of that person or, as we might say, that person's effective reputation (effective in that others could act confidently on the basis of that reputation; so in modern formulations like "His name carries weight" or "His name is mud"). The request here, then, is that God might be known for who he is, that people might recognize and acknowledge the power and authority (see Authority and Power) of God as God.

Of central importance, however, is the fact that the name of God is the name as evoked or used by human creatures. The possibility that God's name might not be set apart, that God's holy otherness might not be recognized, arises from the fact that humankind uses that name and abuses that name. Almost certainly there is an allusion here to the complaint of the prophets (as in Is 52:5 and Ezek 36:17-23) that Israel by its conduct and disloyalty had dishonored God's name, caused God's reputation (that which he was known as) to be despised and profaned. The point is that God had committed his name to his chosen people ("the God of Israel"), so that their failure redounded to his discredit. As Ezekiel goes on to show, God would vindicate his name precisely by restoring and renewing his scattered people (Ezek 36:24-36). All this indicates that the prayer for God's name to be made holy is a prayer that God may so act in his creation, and particularly through his people, that the rest of humankind may in turn come to honor him as God. In this again the petition taught by Jesus grows out of Jewish self-consciousness and hope (see 1. above on the Qaddish).

4.2.2. Second Petition. Like the opening words, the second petition both reflects contemporary Jewish prayer (the Qaddish). and brings to focus one of the most characteristic features of Jesus' preaching (the kingdom of God; see Kingdom of God). As is now generally recognized, "the kingdom of God" denotes God's kingly rule, God himself in the exercise of his royal power or authority. The request, then, is that this rule might be manifest and effective throughout the world* (cf. Dan 2:44). Whether this means the end of the world (or simply of the present world order), and how the request fits into the other emphases in Jesus' kingdom teaching must be dealt with elsewhere. What is notable here is that it is the future emphasis which Jesus enshrined in the prayer he taught his disciples as their distinctive prayer. Here again the attitude of dependency and trust in God for the future is underscored.

In some manuscripts the second petition in Luke reads, "May your Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us." It is undoubtedly late, and presumably reflects a concern lest Christian aspiration be too much oriented to the (still distant?) future. But as a replacement for the kingdom petition, it recognizes that the kingly rule of God is exercised through the Spirit (cf. Mt 12:28; see Holy Spirit); and as a petition made regularly, it expresses recognition of the prayer's repeated need of enabling and cleansing (see Clean and Unclean) by the Spirit of God.

4.2.3. Third Petition. The third petition is in effect an expansion of the second: Where God's rule is acknowledged, God's will is done. Implicit is the confession that God's will is not done on earth, and that there will always be a tension between the divine will and the actuality of human structures and relationships until the kingdom comes. As (probably) an elaboration of the second petition, it is likely to be characteristic of other interpretative additions to the Jesus tradition—that is, not a wholly new element, but an explanation of an established element, spelling out its implications.

In the transition from the first to the second half of the prayer two important features need to be noted. (1) The fact that the first two/three petitions are prayers for God, for his name, kingly rule (and will). Only in the second half does the prayer turn to human needs. The priority is clear and matches Jesus' prioritizing of the Law elsewhere: "The first (commandment*) is ... You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart.... The second is this, You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Mk 12:29-31 par.). The implication is the same as in Luke 12:31 and Matthew 6:33: "Seek (first) his kingdom and . . . these things shall be yours as well"; the life which sees its first priority as its right ordering before God can put its needs confidently before God. (2) The transition from second person singular ("your name," "your kingdom," "your will") to first person plural ("our bread," "our debts," "us"). The pray-er prays to God alone, but not for the pray-er alone. There is no selfish self-seeking or attempt to steal advantage over another. The pray-er prays as part of and on behalf of the whole community of those dependent on God. The one is benefitted only by that which benefits all.

4.2.4. Fourth Petition. The precise force of the fourth petition has always been a matter of some unclarity, principally because the word usually translated "daily" (epiousios) occurs only here (and Did. 8:2) in ancient literature. Since the word is unknown elsewhere, most attempts to translate it are derived from the Greek form of the word itself. This allows three main alternatives: (1) from the noun meaning "substance, being, essence."—so "bread* for subsistence, necessary for existence"; (2) from the verb "to be"—so "bread for the present (day), for today”; (3) from the future tense of the verb "to come"—so "bread for the coming (day), for the future" (see Fitzmyer). It is not possible to choose between these with any confidence, and perhaps at least a degree of ambiguity was intended. (1) is favored by Fitzmyer. It focuses on the actual needs of the pray-ers (cf. Prov 30:8). (2) seems to have been favored by Luke since he renders the verb in the present tense ("keep on giving us") and since he reads "each day" instead of "today." It emphasizes the continuous and repeated, day-by-day, dependence of the pray-ers on God's provision. (3) is favored by Jeremias and Brown. It may be implied by the positioning of "today" in a place of emphasis: "give us today the bread of the future." And it ties in with the eschatological (see Eschatology) emphasis of the second petition and possibly also the final petition: "give us the bread of the kingdom, the bread of salvation." In this case it would accord with the tension evident elsewhere in the Gospels and Paul between a salvation already begun and in process but not yet complete. What sustains the disciple now are resources from beyond the constraints of the present, from the future which God will bring about and has already achieved in raising Christ from the dead (see Resurrection).

However, whatever the precise emphasis, the petition is a powerful expression of trust and dependence: Give us what we need, not what we want, or even what we think we need, but what God sees our need actually to be. The more material needs are in view, the clearer the implication that God is concerned for the provisions of these needs. The modern interpreter should certainly hesitate long before reading any kind of dichotomy between spiritual and material needs here. Note also the implication that a concern to satisfy material wants rather than needs falls outside the scope of this prayer, and so also outside the primary concerns of the God to whom this prayer is addressed.

4.2.5. Fifth Petition. The fifth petition is one of the most frightening requests that can ever be put to God—that he should forgive us just as we forgive others, that God should measure his forgiveness in accordance with the forgiveness we have actually extended to others (see Forgiveness of Sins). As Jeremias notes, this is the one condition that Jesus sets for the one who would pray this prayer—readiness to forgive. Thus is underlined the importance for community of a giving and receiving of forgiveness, and the interdependence of divine forgiveness with human forgiveness (cf. Sir. 28:2). No wonder Jesus made this one of the most important emphases of his teaching on prayer (see 5.2. below)—a fact underlined by the way Matthew has appended to the Lord's Prayer one of the most important words of Jesus on the subject, introducing it as an explanation ("for") of that prayer, and thus implying that it is the element of the prayer most needing reinforcement. To be noted is the fact that the prayer does not envisage a forgiveness restricted to those within the community of discipleship*—"as we forgive those in debt to us/ everyone who is indebted to us," not "as we forgive one another in our mutual indebtedness." The refusal to extend forgiveness beyond the church is a barrier to divine forgiveness for the church.

4.2.6. Sixth Petition. The final petition reflects the ambiguity in Jewish talk of "testing." It can have both the negative sense of "temptation" and the positive sense of "proving"—reflecting the common experience of trying situations, which, depending on the response of the person being thus tested, can be either negative (destructive of relationship) or positive (maturing of character). That God provides such tests is a common thought in the Jewish Scriptures (Gen 22:1; Ex 15:25; 16:4; 20:20; Num 14:22; Deut 8:2; 13:3; etc.); faith/faithfulness is demonstrated by such trials (Ps 26:2-3; Jdt 8:25-26; Sir 2:1; Wis 3:5-6; 1 Macc 2:52). The ambiguity is reflected elsewhere in the NT, particularly in James (1:12 and 13-14). The petition here shows full awareness of this ambiguity. It does not hesitate to attribute testing to God, while at the same time expressing an understandable anxiety lest the outcome of the testing be negative. It is a prayer of conscious and confessed human weakness; it makes no pretense of confidence in its own strength and commitment; rather it expresses an unconditional abandonment to the will and grace of God. The closest parallel is thus Jesus' own prayer in Gethsemane (Mk 14:36; cf. Mt 26:42 and Lk 22:42, both of which closely parallel the petition of Mt 6:10). The expanded Matthean form expresses the implied awareness that the real threat is not the trial itself, but of succumbing under trial to the destructive power of evil (or the evil one; see Demon, Devil, Satan). It is the fear of how one will fare in one's own unaided human strength which inspires the petition. But the confession of such fear, without pretense or excuse, is itself a confession of faith. Whether the thought is of all trials throughout the life of discipleship or of the final eschatological trial, the final tribulation which will usher in a new age (as in Rev 3:10, and probably by implication in Mk 14:36, 38) or both, is unclear. The distinction may not be important since any and every trial can be decisive in the growth (or destruction) of faith.

The prayer is amazingly comprehensive despite its brevity. It sets human need within a heavenly perspective and in accord with divine priorities. It prays for "us" without being narrowly or exclusively introspective. And it covers the needs of present (bread sufficient), past (healing of memories and relationships) and future (preservation within a threatening environment). Words with such timeless relevance, and yet able to express specific and occasional needs, make the prayer truly unique, constantly repeatable without degenerating into vain repetition because expressive of all human condition of whatever time or place.

The chief notes of the Lord's Prayer are emphasized elsewhere in Jesus' other teaching on the subject

5.1. Trust Matthew prefaces the Lord's Prayer with the word of Jesus assuring disciples that God knows their needs before they ask (Mt 6:8), a point beautifully elaborated in the second half of the chapter (6:25-33 par. Lk 12:22-31). The same attitude is encouraged in the equally beautiful exposition of God as the Father to whom requests should be made known in full confidence (Mt 7:7-11 par. Lk 11:9-13). Common experience indicates that a human father delights to give good things to his children; how much more the heavenly Father. (Luke's version expresses the belief that the Holy Spirit is the best "good thing" that anyone can receive from God.)

Note well that the teaching here does not assure askers that they will get whatever they ask for. Rather the assurance is given that whatever they receive from God will be good. It is such confidence in the goodness of God which Jesus inculcates here rather than any presumption that the pray-er knows best It is prayer with this confidence, rather than insisting on our own way, which Jesus thus encourages. The teaching occasioned by the cursing of the fig tree seems, on the other hand, to encourage a boldness of faith in asking for specific things (Mk 11:22-24 par. Mt 21:21-22; cf. Mk 9:29). But the conditional clause "without doubting" may reflect Jesus' own experience on specific occasions of a God-given conviction which was itself God's means to achieve the desired end. Faith "without doubting" is an open channel of God's power such as is given to few humans to experience and express.

It should also be noted here that in Matthew's Gospel the teaching of 6:8 is contrasted with a praying which is public, pretentious and empty repetition (Mt 6:5-8). A similar contrast is implicit in the parable* of the Pharisee* and the tax collector (Lk 18:11, 13; see Taxes), the latter being heard for his simple honesty and refusal to make excuse or offer justification for his conduct (Lk 18:13).
(Compare Mk 12:40 par. Lk 20:47 which speak dismissively of long prayers which are a cloak for greed.) The implication is clear: not the amount of praying makes the difference (Jesus and his disciples were criticized for not praying enough, Lk 5:33), but the attitude of humble, unpretentious, unconditional trust is what matters.

5.2. Forgiveness. As already noted, Matthew appends a further word about forgiveness to the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:14-15 par. Mk 11:25-26). The point is strikingly reinforced in the parable of the unmerciful servant-forgiven much and yet unwilling to forgive little (Mt 18:23-35; note the moral at the end: v. 35)— appended by Matthew to the teaching on the need to be ready to forgive a fellow disciple not just seven times but seventy times seven (Mt 18:21-22 par. Lk 17:4). It is also implicit in the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector, where the Pharisee's dismissive disregard for the tax collector is an important part of the story (Lk 18:11; cf. the attitude of the older brother in the parable of the prodigal son, Lk 15:28-30). As indeed it is also in Jesus' instruction that his disciples should pray for those who persecute them (Mt 5:44 par. Lk 6:28). The point can be put in different ways, each emphasizing the interrelatedness of divine and human forgiveness. Refusal to grant forgiveness demonstrates that forgiveness has not been received. Where there is no human forgiveness offered or received, God's forgiveness is absent. Genuinely to forgive is to open oneself to divine forgiveness, is indeed to become in some measure a channel of divine forgiveness. It is recognition of the need for divine forgiveness which opens the eyes to the need for human forgiveness; it is the experience of God's forgiveness which enables forgiveness to be offered and received on the human level. As with the interdependence of love* of God and love of neighbor, so with the interdependence of divine and human forgiveness (cf. Lk 6:37). Since the church* can be defined as that community which prays the Lord's Prayer, so it can be defined as the community in which forgiveness (acceptance) is genuinely given and received as expressive of and enabled by the forgiveness/acceptance of God.

5.3. Persistence. The implication that the Lord's Prayer is a daily prayer, the Christian equivalent of the Shema and the Eighteen Benedictions, is matched by a striking emphasis in Luke's account of Jesus' teaching on the need to persist in prayer. Thus, Luke has appended to his version of the Lord's Prayer the parable of the friend at midnight (Lk 11:5-8), where the point seems to be the shamelessness of the petitioner knocking on his friend's door at midnight, persisting in his request despite the lateness of the hour. The point would be lost if the shamelessness referred to the sleeping neighbor (Bailey, Brandon), but the "him," "his" throughout the verse refers to the petitioner, and Luke follows it with the encouragement to persistence in asking, seeking, knocking (present tenses: "go on asking . . ."; Lk 11:9-13 par. Mt 7:7-11). It is also Luke who records the parable of the unjust judge and Luke who says that Jesus told the parable with a view to emphasizing the need to pray and never give up; and the parable ends with talk of God's chosen ones crying to him day and night (Lk 18:1-8). The point in both parables, of course, is one of contrast: if a sleeping neighbor and dishonest judge will act in response to persistent request, how much more God.

Here too the meaning should not be wrested so as to imply, for instance, that persistence will always get its way with God, even if the petition is contrary to God's will. In one case the petitioner had the sacred obligation of hospitality as his spur; and in the other the implication is that the widow (a disadvantaged and often oppressed status) had right on her side over against the dishonesty of the judge. The point is rather the refusal to look elsewhere for the help that only God can give, and the need for constancy of reliance upon and openness to his provision, in the confidence that it will be both fair and generous. The need for a prayerful watchfulness in the face of threatening trial (Mk 13:33, some manuscripts; Mk 14:38 and par.; Lk 21:36) underscores the same point in terms similar to that of the final petition of the Lord's Prayer.

5.4. Communal. Finally, we should note Matthew 18:19, a reminder that the Lord's Prayer speaks always of "us" and never of "me." It is a reminder too that the will of God will rarely be wholly clear to an individual alone and that God usually works through a community of like-motivated, mutually interdependent and mutually supportive people. It is such a community which is the more likely to be able to pray in confidence regarding God's will, to pray, and praying also to act, in the name of Jesus.

PREACHING FROM THE GOSPELS

Since the Gospels are a unique genre (see Gospel [Genre]) of biblical literature, preaching from the Gospels presents a distinct set of challenges. On the one hand, the Gospel genre is a form of preaching, and therefore contemporary preaching from the Gospels conforms well with the nature of this genre. On the other hand, in the Gospels contemporary preachers are faced with the complexities of various homiletical horizons (e.g., that of Jesus and of the Gospel writers), four different Gospels (see Canon) about the same historical Jesus, and numerous human characters who threaten to upstage Jesus in the sermon. The challenge is to preach sermons that do justice to the complexities of the Gospels while they speak relevantly to the church here and now.
The Gospels communicate "the good news" (to euangelion) about "Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Mk 1:1; see Gospel [Good News]). As good news addressed to the church, the written Gospels themselves are a form of preaching (kerygma). Moreover, the Gospels are rooted in the preaching of Jesus and the apostles: "Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of God,* and saying, 'The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe the gospel' " (Mk 1:14-15 RSV; cf. Mt 10:7; 28:18-20). Since the Gospels are formed out of early Christian preaching and are themselves a form of preaching, contemporary preaching from the Gospels is not contrary to their nature but is a natural extension of the Gospel genre. This affinity of the Gospels and preaching facilitates contemporary preaching of Gospel passages, for the message and its objective are given in the Gospel itself. Other characteristics of the Gospels, however, complicate their preaching today and require careful reflection.

2. Various Homiletical Horizons.

In preaching from the Gospels one of the first issues confronting preachers is which homiletical horizon is the proper level for interpretation and preaching. Redaction criticism (see Redaction Criticism) distinguishes various life settings in the Gospels. For preaching purposes, two life settings other than the contemporary horizon are important: (1) the life setting of the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus) as he preached to the disciples,* the Jewish leaders and the crowds (Sitz im Leben Jesu) and (2) the life setting of the Gospel writers as they used the oral and written traditions about Jesus to write the Gospels for their churches (Sitz im leben des Verfassers).

2.1. The Horizon of Jesus. Many preachers almost automatically opt for the horizon of the historical Jesus, preaching sermons on Jesus calling his disciples, Jesus healing* the sick, Jesus challenging the Pharisees,* etc., and applying the message from that original horizon to the church today. The question may be raised, however, if this approach does full justice to the written text. To be sure, this method uses the written text, but only as a transparent window-pane through which to view the historical Jesus and his words and actions. The Gospels, however, as a comparison of the four will show, are not transparent windowpanes but distinctly colored presentations of the historical Jesus. To look right through the written text to Jesus’ historical horizon is to miss the kerygmatic point made by the Gospel writer in a later horizon. This method fails to do full justice to the inspired Gospels.

2.2. The Horizon of the Evangelist Other preachers seek to preach the Gospels from the homiletical horizon of the Gospel writers. They try to detect the message Matthew proclaimed to the Jewish Christian church or the message Luke formulated for the church of Theophilus, and then transfer that message to the church today. For support, this approach can appeal to the fact that the church received as God's inspired Word the written Gospels and not our reconstructions of the historical Jesus. As well, it can appeal to Jesus' promise to his disciples, "When the Spirit of truth comes, he will guide you into all the truth" (Jn 16:13 RSV). Only after Jesus' resurrection* and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) did the apostles* begin to understand what had taken place in Jesus (see Lk 24:25-27; Jn 14:25-26; 16:12-15). By itself, however, this method of focussing on the horizon of the Gospel writer also fails to do full justice to the Gospels as we have them. For it tends to slight the historical referents in the Gospels; it tends to overlook the very reason for which the Gospels were written, namely to convey the meaning of the life, death* and resurrection of the historical Jesus.

2.3. Working with Both Horizons. A more thorough approach than either of the above seeks to work with both ancient horizons. This procedure naturally gives rise to the question, Which horizon has priority, that of the historical Jesus or that of the Gospel writer? Although the horizon of Jesus is chronologically prior, one learns about the historical Jesus only through the later Gospel writer. Hence one's interpretation needs to begin with the horizon of the Gospel writer.

By studying the composition of a Gospel in its own historical context and by comparing it with the other three Gospels, one becomes aware of the differences among the Gospels: They offer not four identical photographs of Jesus but four unique portraits. These distinct views of what Jesus did and taught are not, as is often supposed, a liability for contemporary preaching but an advantage. They are a liability only when one allows a naturalistic or immanentistic historical-critical method to use the variations in the Gospels to undermine their fundamental historicity (see Greida-nus, 24-47, 268-77). But for contemporary preachers who assume the Gospels' basic historicity (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]), these distinct views of the Gospel writers are an advantage. For the portrait each Gospel writer paints of Jesus reveals the homiletical use to which he put the received traditions (see Tradition Criticism). Each unique slant may reveal the relevant point for a particular early Christian church. That homiletical point, it should be emphasized, is made by proclaiming "all that Jesus began to do and to teach" (Acts 1:1). In spite of the variations, therefore, the horizon of the Gospel writer in the early church is firmly linked to that of the historical Jesus.

This connection between the two ancient horizons enables contemporary preachers to use the Gospels for exploring the horizon of the historical Jesus. They can probe for the point Jesus made as he taught his disciples or the crowds (see People, Crowd) with sayings, parables* or miracles (see Miracles and Miracle Stories). Next they can investigate how Matthew, Mark, Luke or John, in a later setting, used that original message or event to bring the same or a revised message for a different time and place. And finally they can reflect on the significance of this point for the church today.

In the sermon itself one need not necessarily begin with the horizon of the Gospel writer but can frequently start with the point made by Jesus in his historical horizon, next show how the Gospel writer applies this to the church in his day, and finally show the implications of this point for the church today.

For example, if one preaches on the conclusion of Matthew's Gospel (28:16-20), one can begin at the level of Jesus commissioning his eleven disciples, "to make disciples of all nations" and promising them for this awesome task his abiding presence. Next one can show how Matthew in his later horizon introduces this mandate with a reference to "the mountain" (v. 16; see Mountain and Wilderness), thus reminding his Jewish readers once again that Jesus is indeed the new Moses,* the new mediator between God and his people, the Law* giver of the new covenant (cf. Ex 19:20; Mt 5:1; 17:1). Matthew further notes that the disciples "worshiped him" (v. 17) as Jews would worship* only God. This sets the stage for Jesus' astounding statement "All authority* in heaven and on earth has been given to me" (v. 18). The King of kings himself commands not only the original disciples but through them the early Christian church to go and "make disciples of all nations" (v. 19). Along with this mandate the early church receives also the empowering promise "I am with you always, to the close of the age" (v. 20). Matthew makes this promise (which forms an "inclusion" with the Immanuel of 1:23) the grand finale of his Gospel. Once the message has been understood in both of these horizons, its implications for the church today will be evident: The Lord* of the church commands and empowers also his church today to make disciples of all nations (see Gentiles) because he is Lord of all.

3. The Homiletical Significance of Four Gospels.

The validity of this double-horizon approach is borne out by the fact that the Bible contains four different Gospels about the historical Jesus. This biblical given can be made homiletically fruitful by discovering the specific objective or goal of each Gospel writer and by comparing their parallel passages.

3.1. The Objective of Each Gospel

Luke and John explicitly state their homiletical objectives. Luke writes Theophilus, "It seemed good to me also, having followed all things closely for some time past, to write an orderly account for you, most excellent Theophilus, that you may know the truth concerning the things of which you have been informed" (Lk 1:3-4 RSV). Even more precisely, John writes his audience that "Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name" (Jn 20:30-31 RSV). Although Matthew and Mark do not mention their objectives explicitly, redaction criticism, or more precisely, composition criticism can help bring them to light. One of Matthew's objectives, clearly, is to persuade his audience that Jesus of Nazareth was indeed the promised Messiah (see Christ), the long-awaited King of Israel.* One of Mark's objectives, by contrast is to demonstrate to his audience that Jesus Christ had freely chosen the road of suffering and that his followers should be prepared to do the same (cf. Mk 8:31-38). These homiletical objectives—"that you may know the truth," "that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ" etc.—are beacons lighting the way to understanding the specifics of each Gospel.

3.2. Comparing Parallel Passages.

The specifics of each Gospel can be discerned even more exactly when, because of double or triple traditions, one has opportunity to compare parallel Gospel passages (see Synoptic Problem). Most biblical scholars hold that Mark was the first Gospel and that Matthew and Luke used Mark (or his source Urmark) and other sources in writing their Gospels. Consequently, any variations from a Markan passage might indicate the specific interests of Matthew or Luke. Although this procedure frequently works, there are too many variables to accept it as foolproof. Since preachers are primarily interested in discerning the specific emphases in each Gospel and each passage (rather than who changed what), the most dependable method for them is carefully to compare the parallel Gospel passages in the light of the different objectives of each writer (see Fee, 39-40, 103-116). Such a comparison will reveal the kind of material each Gospel writer selected for transmission and how they rearranged and/or modified it. This information, in turn, will lead to understanding the homiletical interests and purposes of each writer and provide insight into the point of the preaching text (Greidanus, 271-73).

For example, if one preaches on Luke 18:15-17, the story of people bringing their children (see Child, Children) to Jesus, a comparison with Mark (10:13-16) and Matthew (19:13-15) will enable one to discern Luke's homiletical interests. First in contrast to Mark and Matthew, Luke precedes this story with the parable* of the pharisee and the tax collector (see Taxes). Thus Luke sets this story about children in the context of proper humility: "he who humbles himself will be exalted." Second, in contrast to Mark and Matthew, Luke changes the Greek word for children in verse 15 to a word denoting infants or babies. Thus Luke sharpens Jesus' point for his particular audience: "Whoever does not receive the kingdom of God like a child [the way a helpless baby receives its nourishment] shall not enter it" (v. 17 RSV). A sermon on Luke 18:15-17, therefore, would seek to emphasize our utter inability to contribute anything toward receiving the kingdom of God and encourage us to place our full trust in our heavenly Father who provides this wonderful gift for his children free of charge.

All four Gospel writers intend to preach Jesus Christ For example, in his second volume Luke writes, "In the first book, O Theophilus, I have dealt with all that Jesus began to do and teach, until the day when he was taken up" (Acts 1:1-2 RSV). The new literary criticism (or narrative criticism; see Literary Criticism) confirms that Jesus is central in the Gospels: he is described as "the central figure," "the subject around which every narrative turns" (Achtemeier, 53), "the major character," "the protagonist," "the supreme exponent of God's evaluative point of view" (Kingsbury 1988, 10-13, 36). In sermons that would be true to the Gospels, this centrality of Jesus may not be subverted.
4.1. The Peril of Anthropocentrism. Unfortunately, in contemporary "biographic" and "character preaching," Jesus is frequently upstaged by the other characters in the Gospels: Mary or Peter or Thomas receive center stage. Often this switch is made for the sake of relevance: the characters are sketched as warning examples whose attitudes and actions the hearers ought to avoid, or as good examples the hearers ought to emulate. In spite of good intentions, however, this kind of example or moralistic preaching cannot be recommended, for it turns the christocentric Gospel message into an anthropocentric sermon and in the process loses the real relevance of the Gospel. One important question preachers need to ask is, Was this the intention of the Gospel writer? Did he intend to portray these characters as moral examples for the early Christians?

4.2. The Role of Gospel Characters. One must grant of course, that these human characters play their parts in the Gospels and may not simply be ignored in preaching. The question is, If they may not upstage Jesus, what is the place of Mary, Peter or Thomas in the sermon? Genuine biblical preaching, it seems fair to suggest, should seek to give the same place and function to these persons in the sermon as they have in the Gospels. In other words, preachers need to ask how the Gospel writer has used these characters in presenting his Gospel.

Narrative criticism has shown that some characters function simply as catalysts for other characters to exhibit their traits or to move along the action in a scene. Other characters, however, function as foils to contrast and highlight certain traits of Israel or of the disciples. For example, Matthew contrasts the magi's faith in Jesus and later that of the Roman centurion with Israel's unbelief (Mt 2:1-12; 8:5-13), and he contrasts the faith of the leper and that of the father of an epileptic with the disciples' "little faith" (Mt 8:2, 26; 17:14-21; see Kingsbury 1988, 25-27). When we realize that Matthew's Jewish audience would tend to recognize itself in Israel and more particularly in the disciples, his polemical as well as his homiletical point comes into view.

4.3. The Story of Jesus the Christ Further, it is clear that the characters in the Gospels function not independently but as parts of an overall plot. This fact would also argue against the practice of isolating characters for the sake of presenting them as moral examples for the congregation. For the narrative structure entails that these characters ought to be understood and preached in the context of the whole story. That whole story, of course, is the story about Jesus Christ. Thus every character in the Gospels stands in relation to Jesus, and every Gospel sermon, also when dealing with these characters, can be genuinely christocentric.

Contemporary preachers need only follow the lead of the Gospel writer. For example, when Matthew (11:2-6) uses John the Baptist's* doubt to emphasize that the very miracles that made John doubt are proof that Jesus is the promised Messiah, contemporary preachers can follow suit. When Luke (19:1-10) uses the wealthy, chief tax collector Zacchaeus to proclaim that Jesus is able to save even rich sinners (see Rich and Poor; Sinner), contemporary preachers can make the same use of Zacchaeus. By thus following the lead of the Gospel writers, contemporary preachers can pay appropriate attention to the various human characters while retaining center stage for Jesus and his teachings.

4.4. Christocentric Preaching and Theocentric Preaching. The Gospels themselves, of course, are not independent stories either but now form an integral part of the Bible and its all-encompassing story. This unity of the Gospels and the Bible elucidates how christo-centric preaching is related to theocentric preaching. The one story the Bible relates is the history of God's kingdom (see Kingdom of God) which began with God's good creation (Gen 1), continued its up-and-down course despite the fall into sin (Gen 3:15), and will come to completion with the new creation (Rev 21—22). The Gospels proclaim that the coming of Jesus is God's mightiest act in this history of God's coming kingdom. The Word that was with God in the beginning "became flesh and dwelt among us," proclaims John (1:1,14). In the coming of Jesus, God's promised King has come, preaches Matthew, for Jesus is the Messiah, the great Son of David (see Son of David), "God with us" (1:1-23). Consequently, christocentric preaching is theocentric preaching.

Jesus himself preached "the gospel of the kingdom" (Mt 4:23), defeated Satan, the pretender to the throne, and established a major beachhead for God's kingdom on earth (Mt 12:28). Jesus in turn commanded his disciples and church to spread the gospel of the kingdom and "make disciples of all nations" (Mt 10:7; 28:19). The Gospel writers responded to this mandate by writing their Gospels, thus spreading into the world the good news of the kingdom of God that has come in Jesus Christ. By preaching these Gospels today, contemporary preachers can transmit the same good news of Jesus Christ and his kingdom. With the Gospels they can challenge their hearers with the broad vision of the kingdom of God that has come on earth and is still coming.

5. Preparing Gospel Sermons.
The Gospels, it was observed above, are formed out of early Christian preaching and are themselves a form of preaching. By their very nature, therefore, the Gospels are well suited to be sources for contemporary preaching.

5.1. Selecting Preaching Texts. In order to conform to the Gospels as preaching, contemporary preachers should select as preaching texts not isolated fragments of the Gospels but complete literary units. Form criticism (see Form Criticism) has shown that the basic preaching units underlying the written Gospels are the pericopes—roughly corresponding to paragraphs in our English Bibles. These pericopes will frequently make excellent preaching texts. "When the pericopes of the Gospels are taken as texts for preaching, one is in close touch with their original intent and purpose" (Smith, 20). Naturally, these literary units, whatever their size, must now be interpreted in the light of the whole written Gospel and ultimately in the light of the whole Bible.

Sometimes, for the sake of congregational retention, one may wish to select as preaching text a very brief text, perhaps the heart of a pericope. At other times, especially with scenic narrative, it may be advisable to select several consecutive pericopes. Whether short or long, preaching texts must be literary units. Frequently, rhetorical criticism (see Rhetorical Criticism) can help discover ideal preaching texts in the Gospels by identifying rhetorical structures such as repetition, inclusion and chiasm which mark the limits of literary units.

Since these pericopes now proclaim their message in the context of a particular written Gospel, it is not advisable to create one's own preaching text by combining verses from different Gospels. Such a hybrid preaching text mixes decidedly different literary and historical contexts and makes it extremely difficult if not impossible to do justice to the intention of each Gospel writer.

The Gospels lend themselves well to series of sermons on consecutive pericopes. Scenic narratives in particular, as well as composite discourses (e.g., Matt 5—7, 10, 13, 18, 24—25), are excellent sources for consecutive treatment. By preaching a series of sermons on similar Gospel pericopes, preachers can take advantage of the similarity by sketching the background material only once and concentrating in subsequent sermons on reinforcing and expanding the main point. For the sake of retaining interest, however, a series should seldom extend beyond five or six sermons on the same material or topic.

5.2. Stating the Theme and Objective. Once the preaching text has been tentatively selected, one should formulate its theme and objective. The theme is the main thought of the text: a brief assertion (subject and predicate) of what the text is saying. The objective or goal is what the Gospel writer is trying to accomplish with this theme. The sermon theme functions as a magnet for attracting and selecting only appropriate ideas for the sermon. The objective functions as a compass for setting the direction and focus of the sermon for the desired congregational response. Although the textual theme needs to be reviewed in the context of the whole Gospel and the Bible before it can be used to construct the sermon, as a rule Gospel themes can serve directly as sermon themes.

5.3. Choosing the Sermonic Form. The preacher also needs to choose an appropriate form for the sermon. The form of a Gospel sermon can be either narrative or didactic (teaching), or a combination of these forms. Ideally, the form of a specific sermon should do justice to the form of the preaching text and its objective. In general a narrative text from the Gospels would be best served by a narrative sermon form (see Narrative Exegesis), while a didactic text from the sayings would be best served by a logical, didactic form.

In addition to choosing the appropriate sermon form, preachers need to decide whether to develop this form deductively or inductively. Deductive development states the theme at the beginning and leads (duces) from this theme the particular points. Inductive development, by contrast, begins with the particulars and leads them (induces) into the theme. Deductive development is effective in a didactic sermon, for it enables one to state the theme at the beginning of the sermon and to explain, expand and reinforce it throughout the sermon. Inductive development, by contrast, is especially effective in a narrative sermon, for it creates suspense regarding the outcome of the sermon and may stimulate greater congregational involvement in discovering the point of the narrative.

Various combinations of deductive and inductive development are possible, such as inductive-deductive (also known as the "plain style sermon") and deductive-inductive (see Greidanus, 141-56). Preachers should choose a sermon form which, on the one hand, shows respect for the preaching-text and, on the other hand, pays attention to congregational interest and involvement. In addition preachers need to be aware of their own strengths since different forms require different skills.

6. The Relevance for Today.
Without relevance there is no sermon, for a sermon is God's relevant word for his church today. This definition of a sermon makes relevance a crucial issue for preaching. How does one preach relevant sermons from the Gospels?

6.1. Discovering the Original Relevance. The first requirement for relevant preaching of the Gospels is the recognition that they were extremely relevant in their own historical horizons. The Gospels were God's astonishing, comforting, imploring good news to various early Christian churches. This original relevance implies that the Gospels need not be made relevant, least of all by questionable methods such as moralizing or spiritualizing. Instead of trying to make the Gospels relevant for today, preachers need only discover that past relevance and seek to transfer it from the early church to the church today.

To discover that past relevance, contemporary preachers should ask, What was the Gospel writer's objective with this passage? What response did he seek from his hearers with this particular message? Was he aiming at the response of faith? or repentance? or trust? or obedience? or thanksgiving? The particular response sought reveals the specific relevance of this message for an early Christian church. The remaining problem for contemporary preachers is how to transfer this past relevance from the early church to the church today.

6.2. Transferring the Original Relevance to Today. For transferring relevant preaching from the past to the present one needs to appreciate the continuity that obtains in the one kingdom-history. Although this kingdom history forges forward, resulting in discontinuities between different historical horizons, these discontinuities occur within the one kingdom history which is characterized by the overarching continuities of the constancy of God (Yahweh), his covenant faithfulness to his people, as well as the similarity of his people throughout the ages. These overarching continuities enable one to observe analogies between the early Christian church and the church today and between the situation they faced and the situation we face today. As a result, preachers can draw parallels between the early church and its historical circumstances and the contemporary church and its circumstances. These parallels form a bridge across the historical-cultural gap—a bridge for transferring God's relevant message from the horizon of the early Christian church to the church today.

By making use of these analogies to extend the Gospel message from the past to the present, preachers will be under less pressure to make the text relevant by questionable means. Given the obvious analogies between the church then and the church today, there is no reason to seek relevance in spiritualizing the original Gospel message or in presenting certain Gospel characters as moral examples for today's congregations (see further Greidanus, 175-81).

When the relevance of a passage for one's congregation has been clearly discerned, the preacher is ready to start writing the sermon with that relevance in mind. This procedure ensures that relevance will not be confined to an application at the end of a lengthy exposition, but that it will permeate the sermon from its introduction to its conclusion.

PREDICTIONS OF JESUS' PASSION AND RESURRECTION

Acts 3:22 and 7:37 identify Jesus as a prophet*-like-Moses* (quoting Deut 18:15). Jesus is thus viewed by the early church as the proclaimer and interpreter of God's past, present and future counsel. According to the Gospels Jesus' prophetic ministry ranges from his proclaiming the nearness of the kingdom of God (Mk 1:14-15; see Kingdom of God), the prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem (see Destruction of Jerusalem) and the Temple* (Mk 13:2; Lk 13:33-
35) to the prediction of his Parousia as the Son of man* (Lk 17:24). Of particular interest, however, are those predictions of Jesus which focus on his own immediate future. They testify to an inescapable crisis in the earthly life of Jesus. These latter predictions will be explored, paying particular attention to the relationship between implicit and explicit predictions of Jesus' death* and resurrection.*

1. The Account of the Gospels
2. Implicit Predictions of Jesus
3. Explicit Predictions of Jesus
4. Jesus As Proclaimer and Interpreter of His Destiny
5. Conclusion

The Synoptic Gospels in particular contain repeated predictions of the passion* and resurrection of Jesus. In the second half of each of the Synoptics three major passion and resurrection predictions serve as significant landmarks in the unfolding narratives. Like birth pangs signalling a delivery, they point to Jesus' inescapable mission awaiting him in Jerusalem. Each of the Synoptic Gospels reports the predictions within the same thematic context. The first prediction follows Peter's confession, the second prediction follows the narrative of the Transfiguration and the healing* of the epileptic boy, the third prediction essentially follows the discourse with the rich young man (note Mt's insertion in 20:1-16). Except for Luke 18:35-43, all three predictions in each of the Synoptic accounts are followed by a discipleship* theme stressing the common future of rejection and vindication that will be shared by Jesus and his disciples *

1.1. The Predictions in Mark. The three major Markan predictions (8:31; 9:31; 10:32-34) are most conspicuously placed within their narrative context. Mark 8:27-32 denotes a clear change of focus from chronicling the demonstration of Jesus' exousia ("power") to the final test of his exousia. Furthermore, Mark 8:27-32 leads to the first instruction of the disciples that the Son of man must die and rise after three days. Mark 10:32-34, on the other hand, is placed immediately prior to the entry into Jerusalem via Jericho. Mark clearly presents a climactic development beginning with the first prediction focusing on rejection, to the theme of being delivered into the human hands and finally to humiliation and death in the third prediction.
1.2. The Predictions in Luke. While Luke displays great similarities to the arrangement of the Markan narrative, the passion and resurrection predictions (9:18-22; 9:44 and 18:31-33) take a subordinate place within the overriding theme of the necessity to hasten to—and suffer in—Jerusalem (see Lk 9:51; 13:33).

1.3. The Predictions in Matthew. Matthew appears to be least concerned among the Synoptic Evangelists to emphasize these predictions (Mt 16:13-23; 17:22b-23 and 20:17-19). Nevertheless, in Matthew's section prior to the passion narrative we may notice a certain significance attributed to these predictions as well.

1.4. The Predictions in John. John refers to the impending crisis in terms of the "lifting up" (hypsoō) of the Son of man. By means of this verb both crucifixion and exaltation may be implied (Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34). The latter concept is closely related to the glorification (doxazō; see Glory) of the Son of man (Jn 12:23; 13:31; 17:5; 21:19). The most explicit statement recorded in John is the Temple* saying in 2:19-22 (cf. Mk 14:58 par. Mt 26:61; Mk 15:29 par. Mt 27:39). Jesus predicts the tearing down and raising up of his body within three days.

2. Implicit Predictions of Jesus.

Certain redactional (see Redaction Criticism) and form-critical (see Form Criticism) analyses of these explicit predictions have led exegetes like G. Strecker to the conclusion that historically there is little authentic data to be derived from these sayings. According to these exegetes they more or less appear to bear the mark of predictions after the event. Especially the third major passion and resurrection prediction seems to betray post-Easter knowledge (see 3.1. below). To arrive at a historically convincing view regarding Jesus' predictions of his immediate future, it is crucial to consider implicit predictions alluding to a crisis-event of rejection and vindication.

2.1. References to Rejection and Vindication. The Gospels transmit a rich cluster of rejection-vindication sayings. It includes the eschatological prospect (Mk 14:25 par. Mt 26:29 and Lk 22:16, 18), the cup metaphor (Mk 10:38-39 par. Mt 20:22-23; Mk 14:36 par. Mt 26:39 and Lk 22:42; John 18:11), the metaphor of baptism* (Mk 10:38-39 par. Mt 20:22-23; Lk 12:50), the metaphor of the hour (Mk 14:35, 41 par. Mt 26:39, 45; Lk 22:53), the parable of the wicked tenants

2.1.1. The Eschatological Prospect. The matrix of the eschatological (see Eschatology) prospect spans a great arch between the death of Jesus and the consummation of the kingdom in the Messianic banquet (see Table Fellowship). Jesus views his death not as a cul-de-sac but rather as a necessary passage leading eventually to the consummation of the kingdom of God.

2.1.2. The Metaphors of the Cup, Baptism and the Hour. The metaphors of the cup and baptism in particular refer to the impending crisis in terms of a severe yet temporary outpouring of divine judgment.* Against the background of the OT (For cup see e.g., Is 51:17-23; Jer 25:15-29. For flood/baptism: Job 9:31; Ps 18:17; 32:6; 42:8; 69:2, 14-15; 124:4-5; 144:7; Is 8:7-8; 43:2; Jon 2:4) these metaphors refer to internal (cup) and external (baptism) inundation in the wrath of God. Luke 12:49-50 clearly establishes the fact that this event of divine judgment is temporary and not permanent. Jesus' inundation in judgment is followed by the outpouring of the fire of division upon the earth as well as suffering for the disciples (see Mk 10:38-39).

2.1.3. The Parable of the Wicked Tenants. The authentic citation of Ps 118:22 at the end of this parable (1) confirms the eschatological prospect by stating the fact of rejection and vindication and (2) proclaims the establishment of the messianic foundation stone. By indirectly identifying himself as the rejected stone (i.e., son of the vineyard owner), Jesus views his impending rejection as a step toward the establishment of a new messianic rule. Despite (and we might add "through") rejection God will establish his Messiah (see Christ).

2.1.4. The "Sign of Jonah " Saying. The Sign of Jonah (see Sign of Jonah) is the vindication of the preacher (Jonah/Jesus) as an eschatological warning to repentance* While refusing to give a heavenly and visible sign demanded by the Pharisees,* Jesus promises the sign of the invisible yet consequential divine vindication of the mortally endangered preacher.

3. Explicit Predictions of Jesus.

Only against the background of these diverse intimations of rejection and vindication can a historical and material investigation of the explicit predictions of death and resurrection promise to be convincing. The segregated investigation of Jesus' implicit predictions and his explicit intimations has been the Achilles heel of modern exegesis. If Jesus, however, spoke about his impending rejection and vindication in the terms outlined above, the question of the historical authenticity of death and resurrection predictions appears in a considerably different light. In addition, arguments adduced against the authenticity of death and resurrection predictions are frequently based on uncertain source-critical and form-critical grounds.

3.1. Explicit References to Passion and Resurrection

Detailed investigation of the three major Synoptic passion and resurrection predictions (see references cited in 1.1-3 above) yields the observation that each of them possesses its own linguistic and contextual integrity. Each prediction functions within a plausible historical setting (note especially the first prediction at the beginning of the journey toward Jerusalem, the third prediction immediately prior to entry into Jerusalem). Multiple attestation and Semitic coloring (see especially the first and second predictions) further support that which the Synoptic Evangelists claim to transmit namely, genuine predictions of the historical Jesus.

Some exegetes, such as F. Hahn, argue that the available form of the predictions reflects post-Easter redaction, while a core goes back to Jesus' vague prediction of a crisis event. Most notably, the detailed descriptions contained in the third prediction appear to support this argument. Jesus predicts his being delivered up to the chief priests, being condemned to death, being delivered up to the Gentiles,* being mocked, insulted, spat upon and scourged, being killed and raised after three days. Detailed comparison, however, between the third Markan passion and resurrection prediction (Mk 10:33b-34) and the Markan passion narrative (see especially Mk 14:43-44; 14:64; 15:1; 15:20, 31; 14:65; 15:19; 15:15; 15:24 and 16:6) shows that both in terms of the sequence of events and in word usage the third passion prediction precedes the very old Markan passion narrative. J. Jeremias adds the observation that this most detailed prediction contains no features which would not be generally known in capital proceedings in Palestine at the time of Christ. Further detailed study discloses the weakness of arguing that these predictions were composed in part or in total after the event.

3.2. The Relationship to Passion-Parousia Sayings

C. H. Dodd and more recently K. Berger (among others) have suggested that Jesus' words about his impending crisis may have been sufficiently ambiguous to have been the source for both resurrection and early Parousia sayings. Matthew 10:23; Mark 9:1 (par. Mt 16:28 and Lk 9:27); Mark 13:30 (par. Mt 24:34 and Lk 21:32) as well as Luke 17:24-25 and Mk 14:62 (par. Mt 26:64) seem to suggest the imminent occurrence of the Parousia. It is indeed true that we do not possess any saying of Jesus which directly relates the events of death-resurrection and Parousia to each other. However, three factors distinguish the vindication/resurrection sayings from the early Parousia sayings, and thus call into question the argument that they were originally interchangeable.

First, there is a difference regarding time references. While the vindication/resurrection event occurs immediately following rejection and death, the Parousia event is merely an imminent event (compare the specific three-day reference to speedy recovery with vague time frames in Mt 10:23 and in Mk 9:1 and 13:30).

Second, the vindication/resurrection sayings convey a degree of urgency absent in the early Parousia sayings (compare dei, "one must," in Mk 8:31 and mellei, "one will have to," in Mk 9:31 with the general anticipation of fulfillment regarding the Parousia sayings). While the vindication/resurrection occurs in the paradoxical context of die judgment of the righteous, the Parousia marks the triumph of the Son of man (Mt 10:23).

Third, the references to vindication/resurrection display a different relationship to the event of rejection and death. While references to vindication/resurrection following rejection and death function as complementary contrasts, death-Parousia sayings merely display a loose connection to one another (see Mk 14:25; Lk 13:35 and Lk 17:24-25; the inverted order of Parousia-death in the latter example illustrates the loose connection between the two events). It is therefore most convincing to argue that Jesus predicted his immediate vindication/resurrection from rejection/death side by side with his imminent Parousia.

4. Jesus As Proclaimer and Interpreter of His Destiny.

Historiographical research frequently separates the facts of history from their interpretation by following generations. On the basis of the preceding observations we conclude that Jesus functions as the divine interpreter of his own history. The disciples are being given interpretive keys by which they may eventually understand the events of the death and resurrection of the Messiah.
The following specific points may be noted:

4.1. The Anticipation of Death. Schürmann and others have emphasized the fact that Jesus' message inherently carried an element of danger. Jesus' claim to exousia (Mt 5:17-48), his controversial inclusion of sinners in the offer of entry into the kingdom and his opposition to the ruling clergy of his day (cf. Mk 6:1-6 par. Lk 1:14-30; Mk 12:1-12 par. Mt 21:33-46 and Lk 20:9-19) suggest that Jesus must have been facing the possibility of death. This prospect would have been all the more likely in light of the execution of John the Baptist and the rejection of Jesus' own message by the religious authorities. The predictions of rejection and death (e.g., Lk 17:25; Jn 10:11; 12:7) thus operate in a realistic historical setting.

4.2. The Resurrection Assurance. Jesus' predictions of vindication and resurrection (see also Mk 9:9 par. Mt 17:9; Mk 14:28 par. Mt 26:32) mark the first step toward interpreting the event of his death as a God-intended, universally significant event. Far from being a fateful and tragic end of Jesus' ministry, the cursed event has a particular meaning before God.

4.3. The Ransom Saying. Jesus reportedly interpreted his death as a ransom (see Ransom Saying) for many, thus alluding to Isaiah 53:11b, 12b. This Son of man saying, which stands up as authentic under critical scrutiny (Page), marks the interpretive teaching of Jesus as the foundation of early Christian belief in the sacrificial death and justifying resurrection of Jesus.

5. Conclusion.

Mark 9:10 reports that prior to Easter the disciples were unable to understand Jesus' teaching regarding his resurrection. This suggests that resurrection predictions were not as explicit in the ears of the disciples as they now appear in the light of 1 Corinthians 15:4. Hearing them as predictions of a Messiah, whose eternal reign rather than death was expected (Dan 7:13-14), the consternation on the part of the disciples is understandable. Furthermore, from the perspective of the disciples resurrection was to occur at the end of the age to all people (Dan 12:2). Their lack of understanding Jesus' reference to his individual resurrection is therefore all the more plausible. In the minds of the disciples both rejection/vindication and death/resurrection predictions were, before the Easter event, opaque and offensive teachings of Jesus as Messiah. After the resurrection, however, Jesus' predictions took on a new dimension and provided the disciples with a framework for interpreting these wholly unparalleled events which had taken place before their eyes according to the divine will.

PRIEST, PRIESTHOOD

1. Introduction
2. Priesthood in the NT Period
3. Individual Priests in the Gospels
4. Chief Priests

1. Introduction.

Israel itself was to be a "kingdom of priests" (Ex 19:4-6); however, early on in the nation's history a priestly order was constituted within Israel* and charged with representing the people before God* through the cultic affairs of the tabernacle/temple and performing sacrifices. After the Exile priests played a primary role in the reorganization of the people (see Judaism). While their political power waxed and waned in the centuries leading up to the NT era, among the people of God their positions of influence continued to receive divine legitimation until the final destruction of the Temple* by Rome (see Destruction of Jerusalem); after all, theirs was the exclusive right to perform sacrifices (cf. Ex 28—29; Lev 8—10) on behalf of God's people. Moreover, following the Exile, the Temple and its priesthood became the destination of an increasing flow of tithes and taxes,* adding to the centrality of the priesthood on the sociopolitical stage of Palestine at the turn of the era (see Schürer, 2.257-74). This portrait of priestly power and privilege concerns especially those priests residing in Jerusalem, and not so much those priests of lower status, such as Zechariah (mentioned in Lk 1), from villages and more rural areas.

The functions of priests were many, primary among which was the offering of sacrifices. Duties of ordinary priests included pronouncing blessings (see Blessing and Woe), providing Temple music (vocal and instrumental), policing the boundaries of the Temple area, blowing trumpets on various festive occasions, inspecting and repairing the grounds and buildings of the Temple, fixing the sacrificial limits of worshippers according to their ability to pay, collecting tithes and maintaining the Temple treasury, inspecting diseases and performing purification rites (cf. Mk 1:44), and evaluating problems resulting from contact with dead bodies and bodily emissions (see Clean and Unclean).

Up to and during the time of Jesus, the high priest served both political and cultic roles; he was the only priest who could perform the great sin offering on the Day of Atonement, involving entry into the Holy of Holies.

2. Priesthood in the NT Period.

In the first half of the first century AD. the basis of priesthood continued to be genealogical, involving Levites (a member of the tribe of Levi) and priests (a Levite descended from Aaron). A third group, the Zadokites (those who traced their ancestry back to Zadok, priest during the time of David and Solomon), probably served priestly functions during this period as well. In the Qumran community the Zadokite priests were especially revered (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

The zenith of priestly influence was attained during the Hasmonean era (c. 165-63 B.C.), and at least one ruler (John Hyrcanus, who ruled 135-104 B.C.)
was able to combine kingship and priesthood. The Testament of Levi, with its anticipation of a "new priest" whose star "will rise in heaven like that of a king" (T. Levi 18:2-6) may also date from this period (cf. Ps 100:4; Zech 6:12-13). Later rulers, however, were less successful in perpetuating the union of king and priest, and with the arrival of Herod the Great (36-4 B.C.) the situation changed dramatically (see Herodian Dynasty).

Under Herod the high priesthood lost much of the power it had previously enjoyed. Like the earlier Hellenists, Herod usurped the right to appoint the high priest. Moreover, he kept in his own quarters the high priest’s sacred vestments.

Following the death of Herod, the Romans (see Rome) ruled Palestine more directly, and during this period the high priests worked closely with the Roman procurators and prefects. This in itself is evidence that high priests typically arose from the party of the Sadducees (see Judaism), since other Jews would not have been so quick to embrace as political partners these alien overlords. Sadducees, however, were more concerned with the continuing status of the Temple and its cult among the people of God than they were fearful of religious compromises in the context of first-century political exigencies.

From the point of view of the common folk, resentment toward Roman occupation combined with the divine legitimation of the Temple and its priesthood to grant the high priest far-reaching power and lofty status within the nation. This perception was bolstered by the high priest's role as president of the Sanhedrin.* With the Roman government moved to Caesarea, the high priest had no rival except when the procurator journeyed to Jerusalem.

The immense power of the high priest before and after Herod is crucial to an understanding of the NT period. The high priest had the power to collect taxes, supervise both the Temple and the Sanhedrin, and represent the Jews in all their dealings with Rome.

Within the Gospels three individuals stand out in connection with the priesthood: Zechariah, Annas and Caiaphas.

3.1. Zechariah. Luke alone mentions Zechariah, naming him as the father of John the Baptist (3:2; see John the Baptist) and relating the story of John's extraordinary birth (1:5-80). According to Luke, Zechariah is a priest in the order of Abijah—a designation reflecting the division of the priests into groups due to their excessive numbers (cf. 1 Chron 24:10; Neh 12:4, 17; Josephus Ant. 7.14.7 §§ 363-67). Each group served in the Temple twice each year for one week. During their Temple service, duties were divided among the priests by lot, with the greatest honor falling to the one chosen to enter the Temple and burn incense. Luke narrates that Zechariah was chosen for this exceptional duty, which could be performed by a priest only once in his lifetime.

In the opening of his story, Luke is primarily concerned with the tragedy of Zechariah and Elizabeth's life. She also comes from a priestly family (Lk 1:5); hence, their marriage protected the purity and dignity of the priesthood. Their tragedy consists in this: They are blameless before God, yet childless, and beyond the age of childbearing (Lk 1:6-7). Undoubtedly, Luke is drawing a parallel between these two and such OT precedents as Abraham* and Sarah (Gen 18:11) and Hannah (1 Sam 1:1-2). Given these OT stories of divine intervention in cases of childlessness, we are not surprised to discover that God has heard their prayers* (Lk 1:13) and will provide a son. Zechariah receives the message with unbelief, seeking a sign (Lk 1:18; cf. Lk 11:16, 29-30), with the result that he loses his speech until the moment when Gabriel's words are fulfilled. After John's birth and naming, in which Zechariah shows his obedience, his voice returns to him and he is enabled by the Spirit to prophesy concerning the coming redemption and the role of his son in God's salvific work (Lk 1:64, 67-69; see Zechariah's Song).

3.2. Annas. Annas, high priest from A.D. 6-15 (Josephus Ant. 18.2.1-2 §§26-34), is mentioned twice each by both Luke (Lk 3:2; Acts 4:6) and John (Jn 18:13, 24). Luke's apparently anachronistic reference to Annas as "high priest" (Lk 3:2: "the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas") may reflect Luke's dependence on a group who refused to acknowledge Annas's deposition (cf. Acts 4:6; Schürmarin, 151). It is more likely that this language reflects the continued use of the title for Annas after his departure from the office and, even more so, his continued power and influence, underscored by the fact that five of his sons (as well as his son-in-law, Caiaphas [see 3.3]), were appointed to the office of high priest.

John's introduction of Annas in the narrative of Jesus' trial (see Trial of Jesus) is puzzling from both literary and historical points of view. Thus, after Jesus' arrest he is taken to Annas (Jn 18:13), even though Caiaphas is clearly high priest during this time (Jn 18:13b-14). Then, in John 18:19, "the high priest questioned Jesus," but the name of this "high priest" is not given, so we are left to assume from John 18:24 that it was in fact Annas who interviewed Jesus about "his disciples and his teaching." Hence, in spite of the fact that John knows of the role of Caiaphas and the Jewish leadership in Jesus' trial (Jn 11:47-53; 18:3, 12, 24, 28), he narrates no trial before the Sanhedrin.

In relating the story along these lines, John is almost certainly drawing on early tradition about the trial of Jesus, and it seems to be a tradition with some contacts with the pre-Lukan material. This is suggested not only by the narrative seams in this account but also by John's apparent lack of interest in Annas elsewhere in his Gospel (see Dauer, 62-99; Green, 272-75). On the other hand, the Fourth Evangelist is clearly aware of material like that found in the Synoptic versions of the hearing of Jesus before the Sanhedrin (cf.Jn 2:9; 10:24-26, 33, 36; 18:24, 28). In refocusing the trial scene first on Annas' participation, then on the hearing before Pilate (see Pontius Pilate), John may be motivated by his interest in sharpening the role of the Romans in the whole process of the arrest and trial (Rensberger).

3.3. Caiaphas. Joseph Caiaphas, son-in-law of Annas, is mentioned in Matthew 26:3, 57; Luke 3:2; John 11:49; 18:13-14, 24, 28. He was high priest from AD. 18-36/37 (Josephus Ant. 18.2.1-2 §§ 26-34). As both Matthew and John note, he was high priest during the time of Jesus' arrest trial and execution.

His portrayal in the Gospel of John is that of a champion of political expediency. Speaking to the Jewish council, he remarks, "You do not recognize that it is expedient that one person die for the people, rather than the whole nation perish" (Jn 11:50). Ironically, Caiaphas thus unwittingly prophesies the sacrificial nature of Jesus' death for all people (Jn 11:51-52; cf.Jn 18:14). The political savvy of the high priest shown in this context is fully consonant with the fact that, apparently through diplomatic finesse, Caiaphas was able to remain in office for such a long period of time.

John's repeated reference to Caiaphas as high priest "in that year" (Jn 11:51; 18:13) has sometimes been taken as evidence of the Evangelist's lack of understanding of the high priest's office, as though John thought the high priesthood rotated on an annual basis. Today, however, there is widespread agreement that "that year" refers to "this particularly memorable year"—namely, the year of Jesus' redemptive death (see Death of Jesus).

Found more than sixty times in the Gospels and Acts, archiereis is typically translated "chief priests." In the Gospels, they appear as a group in opposition to Jesus (Lk 19:47; 20:19; 22:2, 4, 52; 23:4-5, 10, 13; 24:20). Josephus* also speaks of "chief priests" (e.g., J. W. 2.16.2 §336), but neither the Gospels nor Josephus provide much information more specific about their identity. Schrenk, followed by many others, holds that they are "an established college with oversight of the cultus, control of the temple, administration of the temple treasury, and supervision of priestly discipline" (Schrenk, 270-71). According to the Gospels, they were members of the Sanhedrin (cf. Mk 14:53; Lk 22:66). The chief priests were centered in Jerusalem, the socioreligious and economic center of Palestine, and the Gospels consistently refer to them in this locale (e.g., Mt 2:4; 16:21; 20:18; 21:15, 23, 45; passim). Together with the high priest, they would have been the bearers of significant power and privilege within the Judaism of Jesus' day.

1. OT Background
2. Terminology of the Gospels
3. General Remarks about Prophets
4. People Identified as Prophets
5. Jesus as Prophet
6. Early Christian Prophets
7. Prophets and the Gospel Tradition

1. OT Background.

The Gospel writers say much about prophets and prophecy. Their understanding of who these people were and the nature of the phenomenon is primarily informed by the OT. Hence, a brief survey of the nature and contribution of the OT prophets is necessary.

1.1. Terminology. The Hebrew term most commonly translated "prophet" is nābî'. Etymologically it means "one called [of God]," but it was also used to refer to a speaker, a preacher or a spokesperson [for God]. Older OT terms for prophet were rō'eh or hōzeh, and referred to "seers," people who had the ability to see what others could not see, especially things concerning the divine will.

1.2. The Work of a Prophet. OT prophets were people who had a special encounter with God* and who, as a result, received a message directly from God (cf. Num 22:8-9; 1 Kings 22:14). This message came to them in many different ways—dreams, visions, moments of ecstasy, external voices, internal voices, etc. (cf. Num 12:6; 1 Sam 3:3-9; 1 Kings 13:18-22; Is 1:1; Ezek 3:14)—but the word was always God's and never the prophet's. The prophets' message—or the word of the Lord through the prophet—took many forms: proclamations of divine judgment (2 Kings 1:6), divine salvation (2 Kings 20:6) or judgment and salvation (Is 65:7-8); oracles of woe (Is 5:8-23) or assurance (Jer 30:10-11); admonitions to the people to do what they were failing to do (Amos 4:4-5); judicial speeches (Hos 4:1-3); and symbolic dramatic acts in which the prophet acted out the content of the message to impress it on the minds of the people (Is 20:2-4; Jer 28:10). Sometimes prophets predicted what was yet to come (cf. Ezek 20:45-48), but the verb "to prophesy" does not in itself mean "to predict [the future]." Its primary meaning is simply "to do the work of a prophet," which was to be God's spokesperson.
The prophets themselves were of various kinds and from different walks of life. Some of them were itinerants like Elijah* and Elisha, holy men and miracle workers. Some were ecstasies (cf. 1 Kings 19:19-24). Some gathered around a prominent person to form groups or schools of prophets (2 Kings 2:3-7). Some were localized, attached even to the Temple in Jerusalem and closely associated with the priesthood (cf. Jer 1:1). Others stood outside the social structures of their day, acting as reformers who called Israel back to the covenant God had made with them and from which they had departed.

1.3. Prophetic Inspiration. But the hallmark of a prophet, that which enabled these men and women to speak for God, was their inspiration by the Holy Spirit. They were a "Spirit-bearing people" (Hos 9:7 LXX). The prophet was the one who could say, "I am filled with power, with the Spirit of the Lord" (Mic 3:8) or "The Spirit of the Lord speaks by me; his word is upon my tongue" (2 Sam 23:2). Thus when prophets spoke with the Spirit on them or in them (cf. Ezek 2:2), they spoke with the authority* of God. It was this that gave weight and significance to their message. And so it is that the phrase "Thus says the Lord" runs throughout the writings of the prophets (Is 7:7, passim). It was the Spirit catching away the prophets and lifting them up into communion with God (cf. Ezek 3:12-14) that gave them superhuman undemanding. It was the Spirit that gave them their prophetic immediacy of insight into the will of God so that their hearers recognized in their message an authority unlike that of their merely human advisers or teachers—a message that in reality was the revelation of the mind of God to their minds by persons especially endowed with the Spirit.

1.4. The Cessation of Prophecy. Theologically speaking, it may be argued that God would never leave himself without a witness. And among historians of the period "it has become increasingly recognized that prophecy did not disappear in Judaism* during the Hellenistic and Roman periods" (Aune). Nevertheless, the popular opinion at the beginning of the NT era, fed no doubt by important OT texts, some authoritative teachers, as well as other Jewish literature, seems to have been that God's prophets were no more, and prophecy was a thing of the past.

The Talmud illustrates this opinion: "When Hag-gai, Zechariah and Malachi, the latter prophets, were dead, the Holy Spirit departed from Israel" (b. Sota 48b). Josephus also maintains, "... From Artaxerxes to our time our history is also depicted, but it does not deserve the same credibility as the earlier work, since the prophets have no true successors" (Josephus, Ag. Ap. 1.8; cf. Ps 74:9;

But whatever the popular opinion concerning prophets and prophecy may have been, at the very beginning of the Gospel narratives there is not only renewed interest in the Spirit of God, but this Spirit is said to be once again at work in the lives of humans. It is as though the writers of these Gospels wished to awaken within the minds of their readers an awareness of the present reality of the Spirit and to create within them a new spiritual excitement. Not only do the Gospel writers say that the Spirit was active at Jesus' birth (Mt 1:18; Lk 1:35), baptism (Mt 3:16; Mk 1:10; Lk 3:22; Jn 1:33) and temptation (Mt 4:1; Mk 1:12; Lk 4:1), but indications run throughout the Gospels that the Spirit was at work in others as well. This is especially true of the early chapters of Luke where several individuals experience the working of the Spirit: John the Baptist* (1:15); Elizabeth (1:41); Zechariah (1:67; see Zechariah's Song); and Simeon (2:25, 26; see Simeon's Song). Luke in particular (though the other Gospel writers concur) seems to be saying that the longed-for universal age of the Spirit (cf. Joel 2:28, 29) had at last arrived (Lk 4:18, 19; cf. Is 61:1-3) and that the age of prophets and prophecy, if it had indeed died out, was now being re-born.

That the Evangelists believed a new era of prophecy had arrived can be seen from the number of times they refer to prophets and prophecy in their writings, and from the varied terms they use.

The most frequently used term, ἐπὶ τῆς (prophētēs), means "one who speaks forth," being derived from the two Greek words pro ("before") and phēmi ("speak"). From ancient times this word was used of one who speaks for a god and interprets that god's will to people. In the Gospels it means, as did the Hebrew nābî which it translated in the LXX, a person who expounds the will of the one true God, one who speaks forth the words of God under the influence of the Holy Spirit* (Lk 1:67), one who speaks for God. Prophētēs is used thirty-seven times in Matthew, only six times in Mark, twenty-nine times in Luke and fourteen times in John. The Gospels account for 86 of its 144 occurrences in the NT.

The verb prophēteuō shows up much less frequently, appearing only nine times in the Gospels. It essentially means "to do the work of a prophet," which more narrowly means "to proclaim a divine revelation" (cf. Mt 7:22), "to reveal prophetically what is hidden" (cf. Mt 26:68) or "to foretell the future" (cf. Jn 11:51). Only once does the noun prophéteia occur and then, as would be expected, it refers to the prophetic word uttered by a prophet, which in reality is the word of the Lord spoken through the prophet to the people (Mt 13:14).

Prophētis ("prophetess"), a related word, also appears in the Gospels, though only once (Lk 2:36). Yet its single occurrence is sufficient to indicate that women, too, played an important role in expounding the word of the Lord to his people, of seeing into and giving expression to the will of God (cf. Acts 2:17-18; 21:9).

But wherever there is the true prophet or prophetess, there is also the threat of counterfeits. Hence, the word pseudoprophētēs also shows up in the Gospels-three times in Matthew and once in both Mark and Luke. With this word Jesus warns that there will be those who will come falsely claiming to speak for God and, if possible, will lead God's people away from the truth (Mt 7:15; 24:11, 24; Mk 13:22; Lk 6:26).

3.1. References to the OT. In some instances the Gospels link "the prophets" with other terms to create phrases such as "the Law and the Prophets," "the Prophets and the Law," "Moses and the Prophets" or "the Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms" (Mt 5:17; 7:12; 11:13; 22:40; Lk 16:16, 29, 31; 24:27, 44; Jn 1:46). In these cases the word "prophets" is used in a most general way, referring not to any specific prophet or group of prophets, or even to individual writing prophets such as Isaiah or Jeremiah. Rather, expressions such as "the Law and the Prophets" were commonly used by Jews of Jesus' day and by Jesus himself to refer to the OT in its entirety.

3.2. Proverbial Sayings. The stories of God's prophets had often ended in disappointment and even tragedy. Their faithful and truthful proclamation of the word of the Lord to God's people often led to the prophet's rejection and ostracization by those same people. Against this background proverbial sayings about prophets sprang up and were readily understood in Palestine: "A prophet has no honor in his own country or among his own relatives or in his own household [though he might have it elsewhere]"; "It is not possible for a prophet to perish outside of Jerusalem" (Mt 13:57; Mk 6:4; Lk 13:33; Jn 4:44).
3.3. General References. There are still other general remarks about prophets in the Gospels. These do not identify the prophets. They do not set them completely apart from others. They occasionally include people one would not usually consider to be a prophet. Nevertheless, these general remarks continue to emphasize the role of prophets—probing, seeking, eagerly desiring to perceive and understand the mysteries of God, and then suffering for their efforts. Jesus is recorded as having said to his disciples,* "Truly, I say to you that many prophets and just people longed to see what you see and they did not see, and to hear what you hear and did not hear" (Mt 13:17). Luke reports that Jesus spoke of the blood of all the prophets which had been spilled from the foundation of the world to the present generation (Lk 11:50).

4. People Identified as Prophets.

4.1. OT Prophets. All of the Gospel writers make reference to OT prophets, but Matthew does so more frequently than the rest. He seems especially concerned to show that the presence of Jesus in the world, the events of his life, the things that he did and said, even his betrayal and death, were in fact the fulfillment of the words of the ancient prophets (Mt 1:22; 2:15, 17, 23; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:35; 21:4; 26:56; 27:9).

Whatever initial meaning their words may have had, for Matthew their ultimate meaning was realized in Jesus. Hence, over and over, almost like a refrain, he writes, "[This all happened to Jesus] in order that the word of the prophet might be fulfilled." This "word" predicted his virgin birth, where he was to be born, his descent into and return from Egypt, the killing of the innocent children precipitated by his birth, the fact that he would be called a Nazarene and many other events (Mt 1:23; 2:5-6, 15, 17-18, 23, etc.; cf. Lk 18:31-34). For the Evangelists, and Matthew in particular, the message of the prophets concerned Jesus. But lest anyone should think this message came from the prophets themselves, Matthew is careful to remind his readers that the word was in fact spoken by the Lord through the prophet (cf. Mt 1:22; 2:15). The prophet is always the channel through whom God's message comes.

4.1.1. Anonymous Old Testament Prophets. When the word "prophet" is used in the Gospels it most often refers to the OT prophet. Many times, however, these OT prophets are not identified, a fact that again underscores the idea that in and of themselves the prophets were of little importance in comparison to the message they proclaimed—it was the message of the Lord that was of supreme Although not named, these special people, nevertheless, faithfully proclaimed the word of the Lord (cf. Mt 1:22), were persecuted by those to whom they proclaimed this word (Mt 5:12; Lk 6:23) and were murdered for their faithfulness (Mt 23:30-31, 37; Lk 11:47-48; 13:34). But God did not abandon them, and Jesus affirms that they all are in the kingdom of God along with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Lk 13:28).

4.1.2. Specific Old Testament Prophets. On the other hand, a few OT prophets are singled out and identified by name: Isaiah is the prophet most often referred to (Mt 3:3; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:35; Mk 1:2; Lk 3:4; 4:17; Jn 1:23; 12:38) and then Jeremiah (Mt 2:17; 16:14; 27:9). Only two other so-called writing prophets are mentioned by name—Jonah (Mt 12:39; see Sign of Jonah) and Daniel (Mt 24:15). The only additional OT figures that are designated as prophets by the Gospel writers are Elijah (Mt 16:14) and Elisha (Lk 4:27).

4.1.3. The Abiding Message of the Prophets. Whether the prophets were named or unnamed, it was their message that was all-important. But it is worth noticing that their message, though spoken centuries before the Gospels, was nevertheless to be understood as having abiding significance and to be applied to contemporary events. Jesus chides his disciples for having failed to do this: "O foolish people, and people slow of heart to believe all that the prophets spoke. Was it not necessary for the Christ to suffer and to enter into his glory?" Then he began with Moses and continued on through the prophets to interpret for them from all their writings those things they had written about himself (Lk 24:25-27).

4.2. Instances of Prophets and Prophesying in the Gospel Story.

4.2.1. Zechariah. The Gospel writers do not restrict their comments about prophecy and prophesying to the OT prophets. Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, though not explicitly referred to as a prophet by the Evangelists, has the marks and performs the work of a prophet. Luke says that he was filled with the Holy Spirit and only as he was thus inspired did he prophesy. As Luke tells the story, it is clear that Zechariah had been granted special divine insight into the nature and calling of his own son and was thereby enabled to predict John's ministry of going before the Lord to prepare his way (Lk 1:67-76).

4.2.2. Elizabeth. Elizabeth also spoke prophetically. She is not called a prophetess, nor is the verb prophēteuō ("to prophesy") used to describe her words when she cried out with a loud voice and blessed Mary, the mother of Jesus, who had come to visit her (see Mary's Song). But it is said of her as it was said of Zechariah: she "was filled with the Holy Spirit. . ." (Lk 1:41). "Having the prophetic Spirit she is able to know the past and see what is hidden without anyone telling her. She thus greets Mary as the mother of the Messiah." (Friedrich, 835).

4.2.3. Simeon. Though a mere man (anthrōpos, Lk 2:35), Simeon, like the prophets of old, experienced the Holy Spirit coming upon him and revealing to him something that he could not otherwise have known—that he would not die until he had seen the Lord's Christ (Lk 2:25-27). Furthermore, the Spirit directed his movements so that he came into the Temple at the precise moment the parents of Jesus brought him into the Temple court.

4.2.4. Anna. Though Luke knows and records Anna's lineage, he mentions her solely because she was a prophetess, a person of the Spirit who was enabled to see what others could not see of things divine. Coming suddenly upon the infant Jesus in the Temple as his parents were presenting him to the Lord, she saw in him something that made her break out in praise to God and speak knowingly of him to all those around her who were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem (Lk 2:36-38).

4.2.5. Caiaphas. Most surprising is the remark that Caiaphas, who certainly was no friend of Jesus, prophesied about Jesus that he would die in behalf of the nation and thus spare the nation. Caiaphas was not a prophet yet apparently he was, if only for a moment, granted the powers of a prophet by the Spirit of God. As a result he predicted correctly the course of Jesus' life (Jn 11:49-51).

4.2.6. John the Baptist. The Gospel writers all indicate that John the Baptist was a genuine prophet who stood in the tradition of the OT prophets. Luke records that Zechariah, his father, was the first to designate him as such (Lk 1:76). The crowds of common people held him in high esteem as a prophet (Mt 14:5; 21:26; Lk 20:6). Even a delegation sent to him from the Jews—apparently the Jewish elite—in Jerusalem was forced to ask whether or not he was "the prophet" (Jn 1:21, 25). Jesus is recorded as having affirmed that John was indeed a prophet, though more than a prophet, or perhaps even the greatest of all prophets (Mt 11:9-10; Lk 7:26-28).

Like the OT prophets "the word of the Lord came to John" and started him on his prophetic ministry (Lk 3:2; cf. Jer 1:1-2; Hos 1:1). Like them he confronted those in high places, in his case openly denouncing Herod's evil ways (Mk 6:18; cf. 2 Sam 12:1-14; 1 Kings 21:17-26). As with many prophets before him, he lost his life for his temerity (Mk 6:18-28). Like them he thundered against the sin of the people and called them to return to God and his ways which they had forsaken (Lk 3:7-14). In this regard his baptism* played a large part in his ministry. It was not proselyte baptism, intended to initiate Gentiles* into the Jewish community, nor was it like that practiced at Qumran, for all were invited to come. Rather, as his preaching was a prophetic call to the people to repent, so his baptism was a dramatic prophet-like act which sealed their repentance.

John the Baptist was such a powerful figure, and was held in such high esteem as a prophet by the masses, that it was only natural for some to begin to think that he was "the prophet" (cf. Jn 1:21, 25; 7:52 p66]). They presumably had in mind the prophet like Moses, whom God would raise up from among the people and to whom the people would listen (Deut 18:15). This eschatological prophet would inaugurate the age of salvation. There are hints that a sect later arose from among the followers of John the Baptist, claiming that the Baptist was the Messiah (see Christ). It may be that certain NT writers, and the Fourth Evangelist in particular, were at pains to counter and correct these claims (cf.Jn 6:1-9, 21, 26, 32-33, 35; 3:27-30). Although the Gospel tradition regards John as a great prophet (cf. Mt 11:8-9), it nevertheless refuses him the title of Messiah. He is the eschatological forerunner of the Messiah, who would prepare the way for the Messiah's coming (Mt 3:1-3; Mk 1:2-6; Lk 3:36).

5. Jesus As Prophet.

5.1. Jesus' Popular Acclaim As Prophet. The Gospels make it clear that the masses saw in the words and actions of Jesus convincing evidence that he was a prophet. For example, like the OT prophets he pronounced on the people threats of judgment to come (cf. Mt 11:21-24; 23:13-29; L.k 6:24-26) and offered them promises of blessings from God (Mt 5:3-11; 13:16-17; Mk 10:29-30). He, too, had an ability to see what ordinary people could not see. He surprised people with what can only be called supernatural knowledge or insight by the Spirit (cf. Mk 2:5, 8; Lk 9:47; Jn 2:24-25). He, too, had visions (Mk 3:10), heard the voice of God (Mk 3:11) and was caught up in moments of ecstasy (Lk 10:21). He, too, performed miracles* and did mighty works—even raising the dead to life—that made the people marvel and fear (Lk 7:11-16; cf.l Kings 17:17-23). He, too, acted out his message in dramatic form (Mk 11:13-14, 21; 11:15-17). When the thousands were fed by Jesus from a very small supply of food, they concluded that he was the long-expected prophet (Jn 6:17). When the crowds at the Feast of Tabernacles listened to Jesus teach and heard his claims, they were certain that he was the prophet (Jn 7:40).

Both individuals and the masses saw in Jesus a prophet like the classical OT prophets. The Samaritan* woman called Jesus a prophet (Jn 4:19). The blind man to whom Jesus restored sight said, "He is a prophet" (Jn 9:17). Two of Jesus' own disciples spoke of him "as a prophet mighty in deed and word in the sight of God and all the people" (Lk 24:19). The demand of the guards given to Jesus as he was on trial, "Prophesy!" (Mk 14:65; Mt 26:68; Lk 22:64), which was not part of the usual games played by the Roman soldiers with the condemned prisoner (Jeremias, 78), makes it certain that they too were aware that Jesus was perceived as a prophet (see Trial of Jesus).

5.2. Jesus’ Prophetic Self-Understanding. The Gospel writers record that Jesus regarded himself as a prophet.

5.2.1. The Nazareth Episode. The story that Luke tells of Jesus' return to his own home town of Nazareth (Lk 4:16-30), where he read and expounded Isaiah 61:1, confirms this (see Jubilee). It is true that many have understood Luke to be presenting Jesus here as one who viewed himself as the Servant of the Lord (see Servant of Yahweh) or, because of the reference to the anointing in Isaiah 61, as the kingly or priestly Messiah. But several factors make this unlikely.

First, the Isaiah 61 passage is not part of the Song of the Servant. To conclude that it speaks of the Servant is to import that idea into the text.

Second, kings and priests (see Priest and Priesthood) were not the only OT figures who were anointed (cf. 1 Kings 19:16; 2 Kings 2:9, 15). Therefore, the simple mention of an "anointing" should not be taken as proof that a kingly or priestly Messiah was intended, especially when the Lukan context of the quotation from Isaiah makes no mention of a royal or priestly function belonging to Jesus.

Third, the OT designated prophets as the anointed of the Lord (Ps 105:15; 1 Chron 16:22). Interestingly, the Targum* on Isaiah 61 is introduced with the words "the prophet said," implying that the very prophet who sketched for Israel the summit of its glory in chapter 60 is now in chapter 61 himself expressing gratitude to the Lord for having given him such an exalted commission.

Fourth, the idea of prophets as anointed servants of the Lord is clearly found in later pre-Christian Judaism (cf. CD 2:12; 6:1; 6QD 3:4), and the "herald of good news" in Isaiah 52:7 shows up in 11QMelch 18 as one "anointed with the Spirit" (Fitzmyer, 530).

Fifth, Jesus, in the immediate context of this synagogue sermon, places himself among the prophets. His sermon was given with such power and authority that those who heard it, even though they had known him from childhood and were familiar with his humble origins, were both astonished at his words and angry with him because he of all people dared to teach them (Lk 4:22; Mk 6:2; Mt 13:54). Hence, instead of welcoming him and accepting his message they were repelled by him, rejecting him and his message (Lk 4:29; Mk 6:3; Mt 13:57). Jesus' response to them came in the form of a familiar proverb: "No prophet is welcome in his own country" (Lk 4:24; cf. Mk 6:4; Mt 13:57). By quoting a proverbial saying and applying it to himself he accepted the popular estimation of who he was and of what he was doing (cf. Mt 16:14; 21:11, 46; Mk 6:15). He did not hesitate to identify himself with the prophets (cf. also Lk 13:31-33).

Finally, as Fitzmyer has pointed out, to so understand the Isaianic anointing as applied by Jesus to himself "makes it intelligible why Jesus is compared to Elijah and Elisha in the verses toward the end of the episode. Elisha in particular is introduced as 'the prophet'; implicitly, Jesus is suggested to be such too" (Fitzmyer, 530).

5.2.2. The Amen Formula. Still another example, strengthening the presumption that Jesus thought of himself as a prophet, is the extraordinary formula "Amen, I say to you" (see Amen). Several astonishing features of this formula emerge: (1) no exact Hebrew equivalent to this phrase has yet been discovered; (2) it is found only in the Gospels, yet in all four Gospels; and (3) it was always and only spoken by Jesus as an introduction to and an endorsement of his own words—never (as in its closest OT equivalent) as a response affirming the words of someone else. Hence, it is a completely new way of speaking, "a highly characteristic mode of speech for which there is no parallel" (Manson, 107). But what did Jesus intend by this new way of speaking? What was the significance of this formula? Luke, who retains "amen" as the only foreign word in either his Gospel or Acts, and who uses the amen-formula most sparingly of all the Evangelists (only 6 times), may provide a clue to the answers of these questions. It is instructive to note where Luke places the very first instance of Jesus speaking these extraordinary words, "Amen, I say to you." He places them in the context of the Nazareth synagogue sermon (discussed above), where Jesus consciously identifies himself, his words and his works with the prophets (Lk 4:24; cf. Mt 13:57; Mk 6:4). Thus, by using the amen-formula initially as an introduction to Jesus' saying that "no prophet is ever welcome in his native place"—a saying by which Jesus set himself among those prophets who were rejected by their own people—Luke seems to understand the formula as a pattern of speech characteristic of the prophets. This is to say, that Jesus' introductory expression, "Truly (amēn), I say to you," although recognizably different in form, may nevertheless have been viewed by Luke as similar in meaning to that introductory formula of the OT prophets—"Thus says the Lord"—by which the word of the Lord came to the people.

Such an understanding seems to be confirmed by Mark. The amen-formula first appears in Mark at the end of a section where Jesus repeatedly laid claim to being a person who possessed the Spirit. In the Judaism of Jesus' time to possess the Spirit was almost always a mark of prophetic inspiration: "Truly (amēn), I say to you, people will be forgiven for their sins . . . but whosoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit never has forgiveness'—for they had said, 'He has an unclean spirit' " (Mk 3:28-29; Mt 12:31-32; Lk 11:14-15, 17-23; 12:10). Hence, although the amen-sayings are unique and point to the uniqueness of Jesus, at the same time they are in harmony with the "Thus says the Lord" of the OT prophets and point to his unity with them. Long ago the prophet Micaiah had defined perfectly the scope of prophetic authority when he stated: "What the Lord says to me that will I speak" (1 Kings 22:14). Thus, Jesus' "Amen, I say to you" should not be understood to mean "I say this," that is, "I alone, on my own initiative, by virtue of my own divine authority say to you!" Rather, he means, "I, as God's unique messenger, with God's authority and power, say this to you!"

The point is substantiated in the Fourth Gospel when Jesus is himself quoted as saying, almost in the words of Micaiah, "My teaching is not mine, but his who sent me" (Jn 7:16) and again, "The words that I speak to you, I do not speak on my own authority [or on my own initiative]" (Jn 14:10). Without doubt Jesus' "Amen, I say to you" exceeded anything spoken by the OT prophets, if for no other reason than that he, unlike them, had been given the Spirit without measure (Jn 3:34). And yet with this formula he was in essence saying the same thing they had said before him, but with a sharper point: "You must listen to what I have to say, because the words I speak are not mine; they are the very words of God" (Jn 3:34).

5.2.3. More Than a Prophet It would be incorrect, or at least inadequate, simply to conclude that Jesus viewed himself as a prophet and no more than a prophet, or that the Evangelists did the same. The Evangelists are careful to avoid that conclusion. For example, they record that when certain people came to Jesus and asked for a sign, he would only give them the sign of Jonah (see Sign of Jonah) saying, "As Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the great fish, so the Son of Man will be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. The people of Nineveh will rise up against this generation at the judgment and condemn it, for when Jonah preached they repented, and here is one greater than Jonah" (Mt 12:38-41; Lk 11:29-32). In effect the Evangelists claim that Jesus was saying that the Ninevites, strangers to Israel, had been able and willing to admit that the authority and presence of the true God was with the prophet Jonah. But in his own person Jesus stood as one significantly greater than Jonah, and yet his own people could not recognize him and give him that respect and belief which must be offered to him.

We conclude, then, that though Jesus did understand himself as a prophet—a Spirit-inspired and Spirit-empowered person—and his ministry as a prophetic ministry, yet neither Jesus nor the Evangelists would have stopped there. For both Jesus himself and the Evangelists he was "a prophet, yes, but more than a prophet" (cf. Mt 11:9; Lk 7:26); he was the unique Son of the Father (Mt 11:26-27), the Son of God* (Mk 1:1).

Not only was Jesus considered to be a prophet in the new era that was dawning, but Jesus spoke of prophets yet to come. As he sent his disciples out to minister he instructed them that those of them who would receive a prophet in the name of a prophet would share with that prophet in the prophet's reward (Mt 10:41). From this statement we conclude that Jesus was aware of the presence of genuine prophets in his time, or in a day soon to come, who would need assistance from his followers and protection. He promises that whatever his followers might do for the benefit of these prophets simply because they were prophets, with no ulterior motive in mind, would be remembered [by God] and rewarded [by him] in the day of judgment.*
Furthermore, the Evangelists record the following words of Jesus: "Look! I [or "the wisdom of God"] will send prophets to you, and wise ones and scribes [apostles]. Some of them you will kill and crucify; some of them you will beat up in your synagogues*; some of them you will persecute from city to city" (Mt 23:34; Lk 11:49). Although one may not be able to ascertain precisely the words of Jesus lying behind this particular saying, nevertheless, it is clear that whatever the exact words may have been, they predicted prophets yet to come. These were prophets that the Wisdom of God or Jesus himself (as the Wisdom of God?; see Wisdom) would send out into the world with a message just as authoritative as any proclaimed by Isaiah, Jeremiah or any other classical OT prophet. Here, then, is at least a hint of the early Christian prophets who were to play so prominent a role in the church in the years following the death,* resurrection* and exaltation of Jesus.

It is clear from the letters of Paul that this word came true. There were in the early church* people filled with the Spirit endowed by the Spirit with the gift of prophecy, who ranked in importance with the apostles* (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 4:11) and together with the apostles formed the foundation on which the church is built (Eph 2:20). Their principal work was to build up, exhort and encourage believers in Christ (1 Cor 14:3). But that was not the whole of their work. They, like their OT counterparts, were empowered to see by the Holy Spirit what others could not see—divine mysteries—and to know what others could not know (cf. 1 Cor 13:2). They were gifted to receive revelations from God or from the risen exalted Christ (1 Cor 14:30; Rev 1:1, 4-5), and were commissioned to communicate that revelation to the Christian community.

A particular line of reasoning has emerged in NT scholarship, linking the role of early Christian prophets with certain sayings of Jesus in the Gospel tradition. Christian prophets are known to have played an important part in the early days of the church, being people of the Spirit whose words and actions were especially prompted by the Spirit (Acts 11:27-28; 13:2) and whose revelations came from the exalted Christ (cf. Rev 1:10 with 4:1-2). These revelations were regarded as originating not with the prophet's will, but with the Lord, being occasioned by the prophetic Spirit resting on them and filling them (2 Pet 1:20-21). It has been suggested that some of the Gospel sayings attributed to the Jesus of history were actually spoken by the resurrected, exalted Christ and communicated to his church through his prophets—only later to find their way back into the Gospel tradition.

A considerable amount of evidence has been accumulated to support this conclusion (see Hawthorne), and strong arguments have been mounted against its possibility (Aune, 23345; Hill, 174-185). If the possibility should be granted that words of the exalted Lord spoken through his prophets existed side by side with those of the earthly Jesus, and as a consequence the two were mingled together, it would not mean that the sayings originating with Christian prophets are in any way inferior to the so-called genuine sayings of Jesus. As E. E. Ellis has concluded, "Granting the prophets' credentials, [their] saying is as genuine a word of the Lord as a verbatim saying from the pre-resurrection ministry. For 'authenticity' has to do with the authority by which a word of Jesus comes to us, not with the ability of scientific historians to give the word a certain ratio of historical probability" (Ellis, 172).

PROSTITUTE
Although the term "prostitute" (pornē) occurs rarely in the four canonical Gospels, it has long been assumed that Jesus gathered around himself various outcasts of Greco-Roman society, particularly prostitutes. The roots of this image of Jesus stem from the tradition that Jesus was known for eating (see Table Fellowship) with "tax collectors and sinners" (see Taxes; Sinner), which is the more common phrase found in the Gospels. This tradition is early, as it occurs in Q* as well as in Mark (2:15-16) and is taken over by the later Evangelists (Lk 5:27-30; 7:34; 15:1-2; Mt 9:10-11; 11:19). Moreover, the frequent identification of the central woman disciple* of Jesus, Mary Magdalene, as a reformed prostitute, as well as Gospel depictions of Jesus' sympathy for other women, such as the "sinner" who anoints Jesus at a meal (Lk 7), the Samaritan* woman (Jn 4), and the woman taken in adultery (now following Jn 7) have also contributed to the idea that actual prostitutes numbered among the followers of Jesus and that Jesus was unusually compassionate toward such women (see Women).

Nowhere in the Gospels is it explicitly stated that Jesus dined with prostitutes. Although Matthew also uses the phrase "tax collectors and prostitutes" (Mt 21:31-32), this phrase is not actually used to describe Jesus' dining company, but is rather a comment by Jesus to his opponents that "tax collectors and prostitutes" will get into the kingdom (see Kingdom of God) before they do, as even these social outcasts have a greater faith* than do the Pharisees.* However, although Jesus is only accused of eating with "tax collectors and sinners," there is still reason to include prostitutes in this image as well. Connected to this tradition is that of Jesus being a "wine* bibber" and a "glutton" (Q), which adds to the association of Jesus with banquet revelry.

Given the context and setting of banquets (symposion) as we know them from both pagan and Jewish literature of the Greco-Roman period, the image created by such an accusation would still include prostitutes of various sorts; courtesans, flute girls and the like were part and parcel to the banquet scene, and as a banquet topos prevailed in the art and literature of the Greek and Roman periods. Moreover, tax collectors, as a stereotype of despicable people, were rhetorically connected in Greco-Roman literature with those who trafficked in prostitution, particularly the "brothel-keepers" (pornoboskoi). One could therefore argue that although the term "sinners" would not necessarily be equated with "prostitutes" or even include them, in the context of banquet imagery the accusation of eating with "tax collectors and sinners" would at least evoke an image of men who ate and drank with courtesans.
For example, in Luke 15, after the Pharisees chide Jesus for the fact that tax collectors and sinners come to hear his teaching, Jesus tells the story of the prodigal son who wastes his father's money on "loose living" (Lk 15:13 RSV), which includes squandering it on prostitutes (Lk 15:30). It is also likely that Luke intends to portray the "sinner" of Luke 7 as a prostitute or at least as one guilty of sexual sin. Matthew's shift to "tax collectors and prostitutes" (Mt 21:31) is therefore understandable. In the context of banquet imagery the "flute players" found in Matthew 9:23 might also be considered as another possible reference to prostitutes in the Gospels.

Although the historical veracity of the image created by the accusation that Jesus ate with "tax collectors and sinners" has been disputed, it is clear that the early church grasped this image as being central both to their portraits of Jesus and to their own self-understanding as a Christian community.

A related term in the Gospels is porneia, which is usually translated "fornication," "adultery" or simply "unchastity." This term occurs primarily in the context of Matthew's exception to the divorce prohibition (Mt 5:32; 19:9; see Marriage and Divorce), but it is also that which defiles a person from within (Mk 7:21; Mt 15:19). This usage is not unexpected, as the paradigmatic moral failure in much of Greco-Roman literature involved sexual immorality, especially on the part of women, who were often first accused of unchastity whenever they failed morally or overstepped their ideal womanly roles.

PURITY. See CLEAN AND UNEFFECT.
For over a century "Q" has been used to refer to the 230 or so sayings of Jesus which Matthew and Luke share, but which are not found in Mark (see Synoptic Problem). In 1861 H. J. Holtzmann built on earlier discussion of the sources of the Gospels and claimed that Matthew and Luke had drawn on two main sources: Mark's Gospel and a collection of the sayings of Jesus. The latter soon came to be referred to by German scholars as Quelle ("source"). In 1890 J. Weiss abbreviated Quelle to Q; this quickly gained wide acceptance.

In the twentieth century the Q hypothesis has been the basis of nearly all serious study of the origin and development of the Gospel traditions. This article sets out the main reasons why Q has been accepted so widely. It also includes discussion of the two most influential rival hypotheses. The final section sketches the very different ways the theological perspective of Q has been understood.

1. Terminology and Importance of the Q Hypothesis
2. The Case for the Q Hypothesis
3. The Nature and Extent of Q
4. The Case against the Q Hypothesis
5. The Theology and Purpose of Q

1. Terminology and Importance of the Q Hypothesis.

1.1. Terminology. The term Q has been used in several ways, with resulting confusion. (1) For some scholars Q is simply a shorthand way of referring to non-Markan traditions shared by Matthew and Luke: Q traditions may have existed in a number of short written documents or collections of oral traditions. (2) Some scholars see Q as a cycle of oral tradition which circulated in the early church with a fairly fixed order. (3) Most recent writers assume that Q existed as a written document which disappeared shortly after it was incorporated by Matthew and Luke into their Gospels. They accept that with few exceptions
Luke has preserved the original order of the Q traditions, though not necessarily the original wording. Hence it has recendy become customary to refer to Q passages with the Lukan chapter and verse numbers. For example, Q 7:22 is a reference to the Q tradition which lies behind Luke 7:22.

1.2. Importance. The Q hypothesis is important in current study of the Gospels for two quite different reasons.

1.1.1. Q As Authentic Jesus Tradition. Q traditions are often considered to be particularly important in attempts to reconstruct the teaching of the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus). Many early supporters of the Q hypothesis believed that Q provided direct access to the authentic teaching of Jesus (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). More recendy, the criterion of "multiple attestation" has attracted wide support in discussions of the authenticity of the Gospel traditions: traditions found in several strands of the Gospel tradition (Mark, Q traditions found only in Matthew [M*] or only in Luke [L*], traditions behind the Fourth Gospel) are more likely to be authentic than traditions less widely attested.

1.1.2. Q As Representative of Diversity in Early Christianity. In recent yean some have claimed that the existence of Q underlines the diversity of earliest Christianity. Since Q did not contain passion (see Passion Narrative) or resurrection* traditions, the Q community's understanding of the Christian faith differed markedly from Paul's or Mark's strong emphasis on the centrality of the cross (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection. Q is alleged to represent a very early form of Christianity in which (for example) Jesus was understood to be God's* Wisdom,* or Wisdom's representative, or in which expectations of the imminent return of Jesus as an apocalyptic* "Son of man"* figure were dominant.

2. The Case for the Q Hypothesis.

Five main arguments have been advanced in support of the view that both Matthew and Luke used Q as a primary source as well as Mark. Although some are stronger than others, taken cumulatively these arguments confirm that there are good grounds for accepting that both Matthew and Luke used Q.

2.1. Verbal Agreement. There is often very close verbal agreement between Matthew and Luke which extends over several verses. As examples, the following passages should be compared carefully:

Matthew 3:7-12 par. Luke 3:7-9,16-17

In line after line of the Greek text (and even in an English translation) there is such close verbal correspondence that it is probable that Matthew and Luke are drawing on traditions from the same source. If both Evangelists drew on independent traditions (i.e., oral traditions which had not been collected into a source), very much greater divergence in wording would be expected. This observation is supplemented by an appeal to Markan priority: even though Matthew and Luke are two very different Gospels, they have both used Mark. Thus it is likely (so the argument runs) that where they agree closely in non-Markan sections, they are both using a common source.

Although in many of the non-Markan passages which Matthew and Luke share the verbal agreement is striking, in the following three passages (and in many others) it is not Both Matthew and Luke include the parable* of the man who built his house on the rock (Mt 7:21, 24-27 par. Lk 6:46-49), but the wording differs considerably. In Matthew 23:4, 6-7, 13, 23, 25-27, 29-32, 34-36 par. Luke 11:39-52 a large number of similar sayings are found in the same order; in some sayings the wording is very close, but in others there is striking variation. Matthew and Luke both include what is clearly the same parable of the pounds, but their versions of the lengthy parable differ in numerous details (Mt 25:14-30 par. Lk 19:11-27).

Supporters of Q account for the differences in the wording of non-Markan traditions in two main ways. Since both Matthew and Luke often revise the wording of Mark quite extensively, we should not be surprised to find that they have also done so with the second main source which they have utilized. This is a plausible argument, and in some passages the Evangelists' redaction of Q can be discerned with little difficulty (see Redaction Criticism). But why have the Evangelists revised some Q traditions quite considerably but not others? Many scholars suggest that the variations in some passages are so great that it is likely that Matthew and Luke drew on two different editions of Q. In other words, Q was revised and even extended (perhaps more than once); it was utilized at different stages in its evolution by Matthew and by Luke. Some writers use the abbreviation $Q^\text{Mt}$ and $Q^\text{Lk}$ to refer to the versions of Q used by Matthew and Luke. Some such explanation seems necessary to account for the close verbal similarity in some passages but differences in others.

2.2. The Phenomena of Order. Although Matthew weaves his sources together (especially in the five large discourses) and Luke places them in "strips" or blocks, there are some significant agreements in the order in which the non-Markan traditions are found in Matthew and Luke. These agreements in order cannot be coincidental and strongly suggest the use of a common source. For example, the following individual sayings or small units appear in Matthew in the same order Luke 3:7-9, 16-17; 4:1-13; 6:20b-21, 22-23, 29, 30, 32-35, 36, 37-38, 4142, 4344, 46, 4749; 7:1-10, 18-23, 24-26, 27, 28, 31-34, 35. In at least 85 per cent of the Q traditions it is possible to ascertain the common order or to determine which Evangelist disturbed the common order (Kloppenborg, 80).

The phenomena seem to rule out the possibility that both Evangelists were drawing on independent oral traditions. Why should so many traditions appear in both Gospels in the same order, especially when there is often no obvious reason for their juxtaposition? At the very least Matthew and Luke seem to have drawn on a cycle of oral traditions with a fairly fixed order. The phenomena of order are so striking that they strongly suggest that Q was a written document

2.3. Doublets. In several passages in Matthew and Luke we find that essentially the same tradition is repeated; these repetitions are known as doublets. They occur where Matthew and Luke both use the Markan form of a saying, but elsewhere they also both include a non-Markan or Q form of essentially the same saying. The following two doublets are particularly striking (though there are many more):

The presence of so many doublets is taken by many scholars to suggest or even confirm that Q was a written document rather than a set of oral traditions. If Matthew and Luke drew on oral traditions (so the argument runs), we might have expected that an oral Q tradition would have been conflated with the similar Markan saying.

2.4. Q As a Coherent Entity. The Q material hangs together as an entity. With one exception, the narrative of the healing of the centurion's son (Mt 8:5-13 par. Lk 7:1-10), the Q traditions are all sayings of Jesus. Many supporters of the Q hypothesis go further and claim that the non-Markan traditions shared by Matthew and Luke betray a similar theological outlook and belong to a similar literary genre (see 4. below). Q did not survive beyond its incorporation into Matthew and Luke, but the Gospel of Thomas, which was discovered in 1945, does consist of a collection of sayings of Jesus. This suggests that other collections of the sayings of Jesus may have been made in the early church.

This general line of argument is obviously less compelling than the preceding three, but its force should not be underestimated. Both in terms of content and literary genre, traditions which are found only in Matthew (M traditions) or only in Luke (L traditions) are much more disparate than Q traditions.

2.5. Other Explanations Are Less Satisfactory. On close inspection rival explanations of the non-Markan material shared by Matthew and Luke are much less plausible than the Q hypothesis. Downing (NTS 37 [1991]) has added fresh considerations in support of this conclusion. He has shown that the redactional methods involved in the two-Gospel (Griesbach) hypothesis and in the claim that Luke used Matthew are quite unlike the ways ancient writers handled their sources. On the other hand, Matthew and Luke use Mark and Q in ways which do bear comparison with well-established conventions in antiquity. This important observation strengthens still further the conclusion that the case for Markan priority and Q is far stronger than the case for any of the rival solutions of the Synoptic problem.

The cumulative force of the five preceding arguments is very impressive, but the case for Q falls short of absolute proof. Even the strongest supporters of Q accept that the hypothesis is less securely established than Markan priority. However, Q remains a valid working hypothesis for serious study of the Gospels.

3. The Nature and Extent of Q.

The evidence is marginally stronger for concluding that Q was a written document rather than a collection of oral traditions which were transmitted with a fairly fixed order. However, comparative studies of the transmission, revision and expansion of oral and of written traditions in antiquity urgently need to be undertaken.

Although most of the early supporters of Q believed that it was a collection of sayings in Aramaic (and therefore earlier and more reliable than traditions which circulated in Greek), this view is not now widely accepted. It was based partly on one interpretation of the comments of Papias (early second century) which were quoted by Eusebius (at the beginning of the fourth century): "Matthew collected the sayings \([\text{\textit{ta logia}}]\) in the Hebrew language \([\text{i.e., perhaps Aramaic}]\) and each one interpreted [or translated] them as he was able." However, since Papias also uses \(\text{\textit{ta logia}}\) to include Mark's \textit{narratives}, as well as sayings of Jesus, most scholars now conclude that Papias was referring to canonical Matthew and not Q. If so, Papias's phrase "in the Hebrew language" may either be a reference to the Jewish features of Matthew's Gospel or a mistake.

Several scholars have claimed that some Q traditions which differ considerably in Matthew and in Luke rest on the Evangelists' differing, or even in some cases mistaken, translations of underlying Aramaic traditions. However, the linguistic evidence is not clear-cut, and Matthew's and Luke's knowledge of Aramaic is not demonstrable (see Languages of Palestine). On the other hand, there is some linguistic evidence which supports the conclusion that Q was composed originally in Greek. Since there is often close verbal correspondence in Matthew's and Luke's Q traditions, it is probable that they were both drawing on traditions in the same language, that is, Greek.

Q was probably originally a little larger than the 230 or so verses shared by Matthew and Luke. Since both Matthew and Luke omit some Markan material, why should we suppose that they have both incorporated Q in full? Hence some of the traditions found only in Matthew or in Luke (M or L) may have belonged originally to Q though the precise extent of such additional Q traditions is far from clear. Two examples will show just how difficult it is to be sure. Matthew 11:28-30 follows immediately after a Q block and (according to some) even though these verses are not found in Luke, they may have belonged to Q. However, if they did belong to Q why did Luke omit traditions which he surely would have included if he had known them? Luke 4:16-30 is at least partly independent of Mark Did Luke include some Q traditions in this important passage, even though there is no trace of non-Markan material in the equivalent passage in Matthew? Since some of the non-Markan traditions in Luke 4:16-30 cohere well with a number of Q traditions, several scholars accept this suggestion.

4. The Case against the Q Hypothesis.

Until two decades or so ago the two-document hypothesis (i.e., Markan priority and Q) was accepted widely by scholars from very different backgrounds. Earlier objectors to the Q hypothesis had made little headway. Some claimed that the alleged contents of Q are so heterogeneous that it is unlikely to have existed as a distinct source; this point will be discussed below. Others noted that no other writing quite like Q seems to have existed in the early church—though the discovery of the Gospel of Thomas (see Gospels [Apocryphal]) partly undermined this point. Other objectors claimed that the considerable variations in the proposed reconstructions of Q eroded confidence in the hypothesis. More recently, however, reconstructions have shown that there is broad agreement about the contents of Q.

Since 1965, however, there have been several fresh attempts to undermine the Q hypothesis by offering alternative explanations of the evidence. Two rival hypotheses have been vigorously supported and must be considered seriously, even though they have not attracted wide support. On the two-Gospel hypothesis (to be distinguished from the two-document hypothesis), which was first set out in 1789 by J. J. Griesbach and which has recently been defended vigorously by W. R. Farmer and others, Luke has used Matthew, and Mark has used both the earlier Gospels. Other scholars (most notably A. M. Farrer and his pupil M. D. Goulder) retain Markan priority and dispense with Q by claiming that Luke has used Matthew. Both solutions of the Synoptic problem eliminate the need for any form of the Q hypothesis by claiming that Luke used Matthew.

4.1. Did Luke Use Matthew? If this claim is accepted, there are major implications for our understanding of the origin, transmission and development of the Gospel traditions. On this view the earliest form of the traditions must always lie behind Matthew's Gospel, not Luke's; hence, Matthew is particularly important in historical reconstruction. If Luke has used Matthew, then he has used this major source extremely freely indeed: He is the first "interpreter" of Matthew, which he has dismantled in order to write his own very different Gospel. For the following reasons, this alternative to the Q hypothesis is most unlikely.
4.1.1. The Matthean Discourses. If Luke has used Matthew, what has happened to Matthew's five impressive discourses? On this view a small part of Matthew's Sermon on the Mount in chapters 5—7 reappears in Luke 6:20-49 (see Sermon on the Mount), but the rest of the material is either scattered (apparently haphazardly) right through Luke's Gospel and set in very different contexts, or it is omitted completely. Why would Luke wish to do this? Matthew's other discourses have been treated similarly. For example, Matthew's second discourse in chapter 10 reappears in no fewer than seven different chapters in Luke!

While attempts have been made to account for Luke's rather odd treatment of the Matthean discourses, they have convinced few. M. D. Goulder (1989) recognizes that Matthew's fifth discourse poses particular difficulties for his hypothesis. He has to concede that Luke has carefully separated the Markan and non-Markan parts of Matthew 24—25. The former are included in Luke 21, the latter are isolated (by marking a copy of Matthew with a pen!) and included in Luke chapters 12—13, 17 and, we may add, 19. This is a tortuous explanation of Luke's methods, to say the least 4.1.2. The Matthean Expansions of Mark. If Luke has used Matthew, we would expect him to have adopted some of the expansions and modifications Matthew makes to Mark. But hardly a trace of them can be found in Luke. Where Matthew and Mark have the same tradition, Luke opts for Mark's version and ignores Matthew's; at the same time he rearranges Matthew very considerably. Why did Luke find Matthew so unattractive, when in almost all other parts of early Christianity it became the favorite Gospel?

Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi provides a good example. At Luke 9:18-21 Mark's account (Mk 8:27-30) has been used, but there is not a sign in Luke of the major addition Matthew makes to Mark at 16:16-19. Here several sayings of Jesus addressed to Peter, including the words "On this rock I will build my church" have not been used.

Why, then, does Luke omit so many of Matthew's numerous expansions of Markan material? This point has often been pressed by those who deny that Luke has used Matthew. Goulder replies as follows. Luke has a "block policy": "when he (Luke) is treating Markan matter he has Mark in front of him, and he has made it his policy not to keep turning up Matthew to see what he has added. . . . Luke does not include the additions because he had decided on a policy which involved letting them go” (Goulder, 1.44). This leads Goulder to suggest that once a Markan block has been dealt with, Luke sometimes comes back to Matthew's additions to Mark: some of the additions are transferred to other contexts, some are ignored unintentionally, some are rewritten.

4.1.3. Agreements of Matthew and Luke against Mark. There is a further phenomenon which seriously erodes the plausibility of Goulder's hypothesis: the minor agreements of Matthew and Luke against Mark. Goulder appeals (as have other scholars) to the minor agreements in order to undermine the Q hypothesis and also to offer clear-cut support for Luke's use of Matthew. The minor agreements, however, can be turned against his own hypothesis.

On Goulder's explanation of the minor agreements, in Markan contexts Luke sometimes prefers Matthean words or phrases. But Goulder also insists that in Markan contexts Luke makes it his policy not to keep turning up Matthew to see what he has added. There is clearly an important flaw in his case against Q. The claim that the minor agreements undermine the Q hypothesis must either be abandoned, or we must accept that in passage after passage Luke has had Matthew in front of him and has redacted Matthew quite perversely. For on Goulder's view Luke has repeatedly retained quite tiny modifications Matthew has made to Mark in front of him and has redacted Matthew quite perversely. For on Goulder's view Luke has repeatedly retained quite tiny modifications Matthew has made to Mark (the minor agreements); at the same time Luke has ignored numerous major Matthean additions or modifications to Mark which would have suited his purposes, and transferred or rewritten only some of them.

4.1.4. Variations in Similar Non-Markan Traditions. Where Matthew and Luke contain similar non-Markan traditions, most scholars accept that it is very difficult to decide which Evangelist has the earlier form of the tradition. But scholars who claim that Luke has used Matthew must accept that it is always Luke who has changed Matthew's earlier form of the tradition. Their attempts to defend this view often look like special pleading.

For example, if Luke has used Matthew, then he has abbreviated Matthew's earlier and fuller version both of the Beatitudes (Mt 5:1-12; see Sermon on the Mount) and of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:9-13; see Prayer). Why should Luke wish to do this? In both cases it is difficult to discover plausible reasons; it is much less difficult to suppose that while Luke has retained Q traditions with few changes, Matthew has expanded them.

4.1.5. Variations in Placing Q Sayings Relative to Markan Contexts. After the temptations of Jesus (Mt 4:1-11 par. Lk 4:1-13), Luke and Matthew never use the Q sayings they share in the same Markan context. If Luke has used Matthew, then he has carefully removed every non-Markan (Q) saying from the Markan context it has in Matthew and placed it in a different context!

One final point sums up several of the above observations. If we accept that Luke has used Mark, then with the help of a synopsis we can readily discover the changes of various kinds which he has made to Mark. On the whole he has retained the order of Mark's traditions and has considerable respect for their content, especially when he is quoting sayings of Jesus. If Luke has also used Matthew, we would expect him to have modified his second source in broadly similar ways. But this is by no means the case.

4.2. Conclusions. Enough has been said to show that it is by no means easy to suppose that Luke has used Matthew. However, it is as difficult to falsify this hypothesis as it is to establish conclusively that Matthew and Luke both used Q. At the end of the day we are left to balance probabilities. Redaction criticism (see Redaction Criticism) does in fact offer a way forward, for the results which rival theories offer at the redactional level can be compared. For example, if for the sake of argument we were to assume that Matthew's main source was Luke's Gospel, it would be possible to examine the modifications made by Matthew and then to consider whether this hypothesis offers a more coherent explanation of Matthean redaction than the assumption that Matthew's sources were Mark and Q.

The two-Gospel (Griesbach) solution of the Synoptic problem can be tested along these lines, as can the proposal that Luke has used Matthew. While it is possible to offer some explanation of Lukan and Markan redaction of Matthew on the Griesbach hypothesis, Markan priority offers a much more plausible and coherent account of the origin and distinctive purpose of Matthew and Luke. So too with the claim that Luke has used Matthew. This hypothesis is not, as is sometimes claimed, the simplest solution of the Synoptic problem. On this view Luke has used his sources in an extremely complex set of ways. His redaction of Matthew and of Mark cannot readily be explained as the result of his own literary or theological preferences.

On the other hand, the success of redaction criticism in clarifying the literary methods and distinctive theological emphases of Matthew and Luke on the assumption of dependence on Mark and Q is an important argument in favor of the two-source hypothesis. While some of the arguments which were used in the past to support this solution of the Synoptic problem have now been shown to be reversible or, in one or two cases, untenable, no more satisfactory account of the phenomena presented to us by the text of the three Synoptic Gospels has yet been produced.

5. The Theology and Purpose of Q.

Were Q traditions brought together simply as an anthology or summary of the sayings of Jesus? How coherent are they? Do they contain one primary theological perspective? Were Q traditions selected, arranged and modified for particular theological or pastoral reasons? Discussion of these questions has been approached from three quite different angles.

5.1. The Relationship of Q to the Earliest Kerygma. At the turn of the century several writers on the purpose of Q accepted that it must have contained an account of the death and resurrection of Jesus as well as a collection of his sayings. However, since in their passion and resurrection narratives Luke and Matthew share no more than a few phrases which are not found in Mark, it is impossible to sustain this view.

In his influential study of Q( 1907) Harnack insisted that Q was a source of unparalleled value. It had been compiled without any discernible bias, "whether apologetic, didactic, ecclesiastical, national or anti-national" (171). Mark had exaggerated apocalypticism and subordinated the "purely religious and moral element" of Jesus' message (250-51). Q, on the other hand, was a relatively complete account of "the message of Jesus" which expressed clearly the very essence of Christianity for twentieth-century men and women.

Harnack's theological presuppositions were challenged by Barth and Bultmann who insisted that proclamation of the cross and the resurrection, not the teaching of the historical Jesus, was at the heart of the earliest Christian preaching. Harnack's confidence in Q as "the message of Jesus" was also challenged by the work of the first form critics (see Form Criticism). They insisted that since all the Gospel traditions have been shaped by the faith and the needs of the post-Easter communities, not even Q provides direct access to the teaching of Jesus.
So what was the relationship of Q to the kerygma or proclamation of the earliest post-Easter communities? M. Dibelius (1919), B. H. Streeter (1924) and T. W. Manson (1937) all saw Q as a supplement to the early kerygma of the cross and resurrection of Jesus. Q traditions were used as ethical guidance and encouragement for those who had accepted the kerygma.

Although this general view held sway for some time, it was strongly challenged by H. E. Tödt (1956). Tödt noted that many Q traditions are not hortatory and argued that the purpose of Q can be uncovered by elucidating the Q community's use and development of Son of man sayings. The community did not develop a passion kerygma, but was convinced that Jesus, who had re-established fellowship with his followers as the risen one, is also the one who, as the coming Son of man, will be the eschatological guarantor of that fellowship.

Tödt's proposals depended heavily on an unlikely view of the Son of man traditions in Q but other scholars followed his lead and showed that Q traditions had been arranged and shaped in the light of christological concerns. Stanton (1973) drew attention to the importance of the accounts of the baptism* and temptations of Jesus (see Temptation of Jesus) which stood at the beginning of Q; together with Matthew 11:2-6 par. Luke 7:18-23 (and related passages) they confirm that for the Q community the prophetic eschatological (see Eschatology) promises were being fulfilled in the actions and words of Jesus. The past of Jesus (including his rejection by those to whom he was sent), as well as his soon-expected Parousia, was important to the Q community (see Apocalyptic Teaching).

5.2. Redaction-Critical Studies. In the 1950s the ways the four Evangelists reshaped and arranged the traditions at their disposal were studied intensively. It soon became possible to show that "redaction" of earlier traditions had been carried out in accordance with particular theological emphases. Discussion of Q from this perspective was pioneered by D. Lührmann (1969) and has been continued by a number of scholars. Attention is focused on the ways originally separate traditions have been linked together in Q and on sayings which have been "created" by the Q community in order to clarify or interpret earlier traditions. Separation of original tradition and later redaction is obviously much more difficult and hypothetical than it is in the case of Matthew's and Luke's redaction of their sources, but that has not deterred scholars from trying to discern the primary purposes of the compiler(s) of Q.
It is possible to demonstrate that several blocks of Q traditions share strikingly similar literary features or theological emphases. For example, R. A. Piper (1989) has shown that Q traditions include a number of collections of proverbs, or aphorisms, which develop an argument in similar ways. D. R. Catchpole (1992) argues that many Q traditions reflect the call of Jesus to Israel*: a radical commitment to God's will in light of the imminent end-times is expected; some traditions reflect concern over the delay of the Parousia.

But it is not easy to discern the overriding concern of the final redactor of Q. Hence it is no surprise to discover that some have suggested that Q traditions underwent two or more major redactions. Reconstructions of possible stages in the development of Q traditions are likely to be influenced strongly by the investigator's presuppositions concerning the transmission and development of Gospel traditions, and even by views on the development of earliest Christianity.

5.3. The Literary Genre of Q. Since an appreciation of the literary genre of a writing is a crucial first step in interpretation, it is surprising that earlier writers on Q paid so little attention to its literary genre. J. M. Robinson (1964) remedied this in a bold claim that Q was part of a "trajectory" of sayings genres which extended from Proverbs to Gnostic writings (especially the Gospel of Thomas) and the rabbinic tractate m. 'Abot. On this view the wisdom sayings in Q are dominant, and Jesus is portrayed primarily as the representative of the heavenly Sophia (Wisdom).

Robinson's proposals have been refined and extended in J. Kloppenborg's major study (1987). Kloppenborg notes that the writings with which Robinson associates the literary genre of Q are much more homogeneous than Q itself. He argues that the formative component of Q consisted of a group of six "wisdom speeches" which were hortatory in nature and in their mode of argumentation similar to other wisdom writings. This stratum was subsequently expanded by the addition of groups of sayings which adopted a critical and polemical stance with respect to Israel; the temptation story (Mt 4:1-11 par. Lk 4:1-13), which was the final addition to Q gave it a more biographical cast.

M. Sato (1988) argues that the literary genre of Q is comparable with OT prophetic writings. In all three of the main stages of Q's composition, many individual Q traditions are prophetic in form and in emphasis. Whereas for Kloppenborg prophetic traditions in Q are subsidiary to wisdom traditions, for Sato precisely the reverse is the case. Debate on the genre of Q is likely to continue for some time.

We may now be reasonably certain that Q existed as a written document; its 230 or so sayings of Jesus were used and partly reinterpreted by both Matthew and Luke. But we can be less certain about Q's earlier history, literary genre, overall theological perspective and purpose. Although clusters of traditions with related themes can be identified, Q contained such varied material that it is unwise to claim that it had one primary theological perspective or that it was used in the early church in any one specific way. The Q hypothesis will continue to be prominent not only in nearly all serious study of the Gospels, but also in discussion of the origin and nature of the earliest expressions of Christian faith.

RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS

1. The Roots of the Rabbinic Movement
2. The Transition to Rabbinic Judaism
3. The Emergence of Rabbinic Literature
4. The Use of Rabbinica in Understanding Jesus and the Gospels

1. The Roots of the Rabbinic Movement.

In its earliest phase the rabbinic movement may be identified with Pharisaism. The Pharisees* are portrayed by Josephus* as being critical of the Hasmo-nean priesthood. Their expression was at first political (Josephus Ant. 13.10.5-6 §§288-98) and could extend to violent action, as in the demand that the counselors who advised Alexander Jannaeus to kill some of their sympathizers should themselves be executed (Josephus J.W. 1.5.2-3 §§110-14). At base, however, the orientation of the Pharisees was toward the achievement and maintenance of purity (see Clean and Unclean). The purity they strived for had to do fundamentally with making offerings, people and priests (see Priest, Priesthood) fit for the cult of sacrifice in the Temple.* For that reason the issues of the personnel of the priesthood, the sorts of animals and goods that might be brought, and their permissible proximity to all sources of uncleanness were vitally important.

1.1. Hillel. By the dawn of the present era the Pharisees found a distinguished teacher in Jerusalem in the person of Hillel. Hillel is justly famous for the dictum, uttered some twenty yeats before Jesus, "That which you hate, do not do to your fellow; that is the whole Torah, while all the rest is commentary thereon" (b. Šabb. 31a). The saying is striking, but it can also be misleading. In context Hillel is talking to an impatient proselyte who wishes to learn the Torah while he stands on one foot; his impatience has just won him a cuff with a measuring rod from Shammai, the rabbi with whom Hillel is programmatically contrasted in Mishnah. Obviously, Hillel has no overt desire to reduce the Torah on the grounds of principle, and he goes to tell the proselyte, "Go and learn it." In other words, the Gentile* is told that the revelation to Moses is the expression of the best ethics, and for that reason the whole should be mastered.

In any case, Hillel was understood among the Pharisees as having come to prominence for adjudicating quite a distinct issue: whether the Passover could be offered on the Sabbath.* Hillel first offers a scriptural argument for accepting the practice: since other forms of priestly service are permitted, so is the slaying of the lamb. His hearers are unimpressed until he simply states that he learned the position in Babylon, from Shemaiah and Abtalion, distinguished predecessors in the movement Their authority is sufficient to displace the current leaders of Pharisaic opinion, the sons of Bathrya (cf. t. Pesah. 4.13-14; y. Pesah. 6.1; y. Šabb. 19.1; b. Pesah. 66a).

The latter story may appear the more arcane, but it is also more redolent of Pharisaic culture. Hillel consistently involved himself in cultic questions and disputes in Jerusalem. His position also is said to have convinced another teacher,* Baba ben Buta, to provide cultically correct beasts in great numbers for slaughter, with the stipulation (against the school of Shammai) that the offerer lay hands on the victim immediately prior to the killing (cf. t. ḥag. 2.11; y. ḥag. 2.5; y. Beṣa 2.4; b. Beṣa 20a, b; see 4.3. below).

Moreover, the basis of Hillel's authority was not so much—as has been seen above—any scriptural expertise as his mastery of what he had been taught by previous masters. Hillel embodies the Pharisaic principle that the "chains" of their tradition were normative for purity. Such chains were understood to have been developed from Moses to the Prophets, after that by Ezra and "the men of the great congregation," and then by teachers who were generally invoked as "pairs" (m. 'Abot 1:1-18). The last "pair" was Hillel and Shammai, from which point the Pharisees acknowledged that division increased in Israel (b. Soṭa 47b; b. Sank 88b; t. Soṭa 14.9; t. ḥag. 2.9; t. Sank 7.1; y. ḥag. 2.2; y. Sank 1.4). The notion of primeval unity disturbed by recent faction is probably mythical, but it is plain that the Pharisees developed their oral tradition by means of a structured understanding of the past as well as by mnemonic techniques.

1.2. Pharisees. The term Pharisee is probably an outsiders' name for the movement, and may mean "separatist" or "purist"; participants in the movement appear to have referred to their ancient predecessors (after Ezra) as "the sages" or "the wise," and to their more recent predecessors and contemporaries as "teachers" (cf. rab in m. 'Aboth 1:6, 16; sophistēs in Josephus). The normal, respectful address of a teacher was "my great one" or "my master," rabbî. In the Gospels people address Jesus as "rabbî" more frequently than by any other tide. Moreover, Jesus had a characteristic interest in purity, and a dispute concerning appropriate sacrifice in the Temple cost him his life.

The Gospels as they stand allow the straightforward deduction that Jesus' followers called him "rabbî" (Mt 26:25, 49; Mk 9:5; 10:51; 11:21; 14:45; Jn 1:38, 49; 3:2; 4:31; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8); they likewise allow the straight-forward inference that he is most naturally to be associated with the Pharisees of his period. But in the course of the twentieth century scholars have expressed reservations regarding this finding, bearing in mind the danger of identifying Jesus with the rabbinic movement after A.D. 70. The latter movement was more systematized than the Pharisees before A.D. 70, amounting to the established power within Judaism.* Unfortunately, anxiety with respect to the danger of anachronism can result in the far greater error of locating Jesus within sectarian Judaism (as if orthodoxy existed in early, pluralized Judaism). Worse still, Jesus might be placed within no Judaism at all.

During the time of Hillel and Shammai, and until AD. 70, Pharisaic teaching was targeted at the conduct of the cult in the Temple, but its influence was limited. Nonetheless, Pharisees appeared to have succeeded reasonably well in towns and villages. Even in Galilee* they urged local populations to maintain the sort of purity which would permit them to participate rightly in the cult. Josephus' fellow in the armed resistance against Rome* and his arch-rival, John of Gischala, may well have been representing Pharisaic interests when he arranged for Jews in Syria to purchase oil exclusively from Galilean sources (Josephus J.W. 2.21.2 §§591-93). In any case, it does appear plain that some Pharisees supported the revolt of AD. 66-70 while others did not (see Revolutionary Movements). But while many priests and Essenes perished in the internecine strife of the revolt and in the war with the Romans, and while the aristocracy of scribes* and elders* in Jerusalem was discredited and decimated, the Pharisees survived the war better than any other single group. They were well accepted locally, had long ago accommodated to some marginality, and survived with their personnel and their traditions comparatively in tact.

Rabbinic literature itself personifies the survival of the movement in a story concerning Rabbi Yoḥanan ben Zakkai. According to the story Yoḥanan had himself borne out of Jerusalem on the pretense that he was dead, only to hail Vespasian as king. On his ascent to power Vespasian granted Yoḥanan his wish of settlement in the town of Yavneh, the group of Rabbi Gamaliel, and medical attention for Rabbi Zadok (cf. b. Git. 56a, b). In that Josephus claims similarly to have flattered Vespasian (J.W. 3.8.9 §§399-408) and to have seen in his coming the fulfillment of messianic prophecy (J. W. 6.5.4 §§310-15), the tale is to be used with caution. But it remains expressive of the rabbinic ethos.

2. The Transition to Rabbinic Judaism.

With the foundation of academies such as the one at Yavneh after AD. 70, one may speak of the transition of Pharisaism to rabbinic Judaism. The rabbis, those who directly contributed to rabbinic literature and to the Judaism which is framed by that literature, belonged to a movement much changed from the popular puritanism of the Pharisees. Initially this was for reasons not of their own making.

2.1. The Wider Application of Tradition. The sort of leadership which a Yohanan ben Zakkai might offer became suddenly attractive in the absence of priestly, Essene or scribal alternatives. The target of the tradition's application became correspondingly wider. The Pharisaic/rabbinic program was applied not simply to issues of purity and sacrifice, but to worship generally, to ethics and to daily living.

Yoḥanan is explicitly attributed with the view that the world, which had been sustained by the Law,* the Temple and deeds of faithful love,* now was to be supported only by the last two of the three ( ‘Abot ft Nat. 4). Moreover, on the basis of his tradition he specifically adjudicated how feasts might be kept in the gathering for reading, prayer and discussion which was called a "congregation," or "synagogue"* (k'nēset, also applied to buildings erected for the purpose of such gatherings; cf. m. Sukk. 3:12; m. Roš Haš. 4:1, 3, 4). The development of that sort of worship as a replacement for activity within the Temple was not without analogy during the period prior to A.D. 70. Mishnah (m. Ta'an. 4:2) envisages a system in which priests, Levites and lay people alike gathered in local synagogues while their representatives were in Jerusalem.

The germ of such piety perhaps lay in the priestly system of courses of service which allowed for a substantial population of priests, divided into twenty-four courses. During the course of the week a given course was appointed to cover, a few priests were chosen to officiate in Jerusalem. Meanwhile, the remainder may have gathered and read the appropriate lections in the villages of Judea and Galilee where they normally lived (1 Chron 24:1-19; Josephus Ant. 7.14.7 §365-67). The inclusion of the faithful in Israel in such meetings was a natural development under the rabbis, and general meetings for prayer and instruction had long been a customary feature of Judaism in the Diaspora. It was therefore natural that worship in synagogues should develop as something of a replacement for worship in the Temple.

2.2. The Consolidation of Power. However, the transition from Pharisaism to rabbinic Judaism was not accomplished immediately after AD. 70, nor was it simply a matter of the same movement with the same personnel carrying on in a totally new environment. The environment was new, of course, and uniquely favored the emerging authority of rabbis. But the Pharisees of the period were sufficiently flexible to accommodate an influx of priests and scribes into their ranks after the destruction of the Temple. The priestly interest of the Pharisaic movement of course, was historically organic, and the references to priests in stories and teachings from the time of Yohanan (cf. Rabbi Yosi the Priest m. 'Abot 2:8) and well into the second century is striking. Moreover, the consolidation of the rabbis' power after AD. 70, predicated as it was on local influence, could only be assured by means of the control of local adjudication, as well as worship and study. The tendency of scribes to align themselves with the Pharisees, together with priestly adherents and sympathizers with the movement, assured the emergence and the success of the rabbis.

The triumph of rabbinic authority assured the continuing influence of the priests in decisions regarding purity, in blessings and in receipts of payment of redemption and of tithe. At the same time, scribal influence in the production of written materials and the convocation of formal courts is also striking. Nonetheless, the functional consolidation of the power of the old groups and factions was only achieved during the time of Rabbi Judah (toward the end of the second century) with the emergence of a patriarchate recognized and supported by the Romans.

2.3. The Priority of Learned Consensus. In the wake of A.D. 70 and the Roman confiscation of the tax formerly paid for the Temple, neither Jerusalem nor its environs was amenable to the maintenance of a hub of the movement. During the second century centers in prosperous Galilee, such as Usha and Beth She'arim would eclipse even Yavneh. Later yet, metropolitan cities such as Sepphoris and Tiberias were the foci of leadership. There was at first nothing like a central leadership or even a common policy, but rabbinic Judaism was constituted in the Pharisaic, priestly and scribal quest for the purity of the nation. The health of the movement required a shift from the highly personal authority of the Pharisees to some notion of learned consensus.

Just that shift is reflected in a Talmudic story concerning a great teacher, Rabbi Eliezer ben Hyrcanus. The story has it that against a majority of his colleagues, Eliezer held that a ceramic stove, once polluted, might be reassembled, provided the tiles were separated by sand. The majority taught that the result would be unclean; such materials should never be used again. Eliezer's correctness was demonstrated by a tree which was uprooted at his behest by a stream which ran backwards at his command, by a building he similarly demolished, and by a voice from heaven. Despite all that the majority held that its decision was binding (b. B. Meš. 59a, b). As the rudiments of an institution emerged, Eliezer's personal authority clearly diminished; the rabbis of the second century were to stress a rational, consensual achievement of purity, and by the time of the Talmud that was held to be a greater purity than charismatic authority could achieve.

2.4. The Failure of Popular Messianism. The historic concern for the Temple as the actual focus of purity nonetheless resulted in a final and nearly disastrous attempt—encouraged by some rabbis—to free and restore the holy site. The most prominent rabbinic supporter of that attempt was Aqiba, a student of Eliezer's renowned for his expertise in the tradition. Aqiba supported the claims of one Simeon bar Kosi-bah to be the new prince of Israel, acting in conjunction with a priest named Eleazar. Simeon's supporters referred to him as Bar Kokhba, "son of a star," projecting onto him the messianic expectations of Numbers 24:17, while his detractors came to know him as Bar Koziba, "son of a lie" (see Revolutionary Movements). His initial success and military acumen is attested in letters he sent his commanders during his revolt and regime, which lasted from AD. 132 until 135. This time the response of the empire was even more definitive than it had been in A.D. 70. The emperor Hadrian ordered the remnants of the Temple taken apart and new shrines built in the city. Jerusalem itself was now called Aelia Capitolina, Jews were denied entry, and Judea became Syria Palaestina.

The rabbis survived by disowning the aspirations embodied by Aqiba, but keeping much of his teaching. "Aqiba, grass will grow out of your jaw, before the son of David comes" (y. Ta'an. 4.7; cf. Lam. Rab. 2.2.4); that is to say, the Messiah is to be of David (see Son of David), not of popular choosing, and his time cannot be pressed. But the greatness of the rabbinic response to national defeat and their consequent redefinition of Judaism consisted less in their formulation of a particular teaching regarding messianism (which emerges in any case from time to time in many forms of Judaism) than in their textual constitution of a form of thought, discipline and life—the Mishnah.

3. The Emergence of Rabbinic Literature.

3.1. Mishnah. Rabbis such as Aqiba had taught their own norms, which came to be known as halakhoth (*ḥ*ālāḵōṯ, pl. of *ḥ*ālāḵ, "the way"), and had their disciples learn them by heart. A disciple (talmīḏ) might himself internalize what he learned (his teacher's mišnā, or "repetition"; pl. mišnāyōṯ), and proceed to promulgate both it and his own halakhoth. But after the failure of Bar Kokhba, the rabbis engaged in an extraordinary synthetic effort under Rabbi Judah ha-Nasi (or "the Prince," in stark contrast to Bar Kokhba's aspirations) to assemble the mishnayoth commonly held to be worthy.

Certain features of the work are both striking and of paradigmatic importance for rabbinic Judaism. First and foremost the Mishnah represents earlier traditions forced into a dialectical relationship; argument exists in an eternal present between positions which earlier had been separated by time and/or geography. The principal contribution of Mishnah is precisely this invitation to dialectical reasoning concerning purity, unconstrained by history or chronology. However, it must be said that the often uneven synthesis is presented in a definite plan of tractates which typically address the topic of their title, arranged within orders (*s*ēḏārīm). Each order presupposes the agricultural activity the rabbis came to see as normal for Israel. As rabbis, they implied, we speak of the purity we may achieve for a Temple which should always have been, but we do so in the knowledge that the Israel we address and which supports us is more a collection of farms than a nation. Paradoxically, however, Rabbi Judah's move from Beth She'arim to Sepphoris signalled the emergence of rabbinic authority within cities, and in close association with Roman power. In reading the Mishnah, anachronism must be taken into account at several levels.

Among formative events in the history of Judaism the radical centralization accomplished under Rabbi Judah ranks with Ezra's reform. But where Ezra's program was located in a particular city (which could only be Jerusalem), Judah's was headquartered in one (whether Beth She'arim or Sepphoris) but...
located in the mind. The Mishnah which emerged was a pattern of reflection which enabled any rabbi anywhere to join in the reflection and the discipline of keeping or making Israel pure. Sanctity in that sense could become the project of the learned in any place. The emergence of Mishnah, of course, called into question its status as compared to Scripture, and the revolt under Bar Kokhba radically raised the issue of the status of those works which had promised the speedy rebuilding of the Temple after A.D. 70 (cf. 2 Esdras and the Targum of Isaiah).

The priestly canon, represented (although oddly counted) by Josephus (Ag. Ap. 1.8 §39), had already called for the recognition of twenty-four books. The rabbis could both invoke the support of that group and control messianic yearnings by insisting that those who read books outside that canon would have no part in the world to come (m. Sanh. 10:1). Nonetheless, the issue of messianism was more accidental than systemic; it needed to be addressed by the rabbis—and it was definitively addressed—but the crucial matter was the relationship between Scripture and Mishnah. That relationship required several centuries to resolve.

3.2. Midrash. Midrash* may be said to be a category of thought and literature which seeks the resolution of Scripture with the teaching of the rabbis. It is true—as is frequently reported—that the noun derives from the verb dāraš, meaning "to inquire," but that fact is largely beside the point. Formally, any midrash will cite the scriptural locus under consideration, somewhat in the manner of the pesherim of Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls), but typically exegesis is not the point of the exercise. Rather, the citation becomes an occasion to invoke the rabbinic teaching which may be associated with Scripture at that juncture. The relative autonomy of that teaching from any text is usually apparent in what are called the tannaitic or halakic midrashim. "Tannaitic" refers to the Tannaim ("the repeaters," the rabbis of the mishnaic period, although the ascription is traditional, derived from the Aramaic tēnā', "repeat"), while "halakic" refers to the substance of their teaching. Such documents include two midrashim on Exodus, each called the Mekilta (which means "measure"); one is ascribed to Rabbi Ishmael and another (although it is clearly to be dated to a later period) to Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai, both of whom lived during the second century. Leviticus receives similar treatment in Sifra (or Sipra, meaning "book"), and Numbers and Deuteronomy in Sifre (or Sipre, meaning "books").
The influence of Rabbi Ishmael is apparent in the attribution to him (as to Hillel earlier) of rules (middōt) of interpretation. The rules by no means govern what rabbis may teach, but they do represent the evolving grammar of the association of that teaching with Scripture. Formally, the middōt set out the patterns of similarity, analogy and logical categorization which might permit scriptural patterns to be adduced in support of a given teaching or assertion. Their application may be observed within rabbinic discussion, but they more aptly describe the sort of inference involved in interpretation than provide the program by which that association was effected. The clear impression conveyed by Mekilta (in both traditions), Sifra and Sifre is that the biblical text is an occasion for the exposition of fundamentally rabbinic ideas and modes of thought.

3.3. Tosefta. Despite the triumph of Rabbi Judah's experiment, the third century saw a crisis in the understanding of what might be done with Mishnah. The crisis is visible in two dilemmas. The first dilemma concerned Scripture, as discussed above. The second was even more basic, in that it involved how the discussion occasioned by Mishnah was to be handled. If the question of Scripture turned on the issue of the rabbis' authority in respect of the past as embodied in the canon, the latter question turned on the issue of their authority in respect of that of their successors. Mishnah considered a dialectic of eternal purity, but how was that dialectic, once it was consigned to writing, to be related to rabbinic discussion in the present? Both dilemmas receive a tentative treatment in the Tosefta (or Tosepta). The term means "addition," in that the corpus was seen as an addendum to the Mishnah in later centuries.

In fact, however, the Tosefta is to some extent a fresh Mishnah which incorporates the work of later rabbis and brings their views into a pattern of discussion with those of the Tannaim. Nonetheless, the Tosefta is essentially conservative in its reliance on the materials and the structure of Mishnah, and it does not promulgate the radical notion—adumbrated in 'Abot, a tractate appended to the Mishnah around A.D. 250—that, alongside the Torah written in Scripture, Moses received an oral Torah which was passed on through the prophets and sages, and finally to the rabbis. Tosefta represents a greater comprehensiveness in its supplementation of the Mishnah. But it points to the necessity of the daring it lacks: To elevate rabbis not merely by including their teaching, but by permitting them to engage directly in dialog with their illustrious predecessors in Scripture and memory.

3.4. Talmud. The relative comprehensiveness of the Tosefta did not assure its triumph. Mishnah was not superseded by it, nor by any subsequent work within the rabbinic tradition. Moreover, even the rabbis accorded Scripture privilege, in that the capacity to cite a text in order to demonstrate or illustrate a point was privileged. The problem of how to address the present with the eternal truth of the tradition (and vice versa) was met by means of an innovation.

The rabbis as expositors (Amoraim, from "interpreter," as distinct from Tannaim, "repeaters") undertook to treat Mishnah as Scripture. That is, they generated a commentary on Mishnah, which became known as Talmud (talmûḏ, a noun meaning "learning"). The commentary (as in the case of midrash) is more a matter of using a text as an occasion on which to associate teaching than it is an exposition or exegesis. But the Amoraim triumphantly accomplished what the rabbis of the Tosefta did not: Mishnah was preserved, and at the same time its generative activity and logic was perpetuated in the present. The ideological advance which allowed that accomplishment was the doctrine that Torah was known orally, not only in writing.

3.4.1. The Jerusalem Talmud (c. A.D. 400). The Talmud of Jerusalem, or the Yerushalmi, was the last great product of rabbinic Judaism in Palestine (as it came to be called in the Roman period). Sociologically, it was difficult to maintain the sort of discipline of purity the rabbis practiced—and wished others to practice—in a territory recently vanquished by the Romans. The Hadrianic prohibition of circumcision may or may not have been a great impediment (depending upon time and place within the history of the empire), but the incursion of Roman institutions and culture, even at a local level, was a reality from the second century in a way it was not earlier.

Toward the end of the period of the Palestinian Amoraim, the very patriarchate which had sealed the victory of the rabbis in the redaction of Mishnah, appears to have become more aligned with the local aristocracy. Progressive urbanization was not congenial to the maintenance of rabbinic power in Palestine. Moreover, Babylonia during the third century saw the rise of the Sassanids and their form of Zoroastrianism, whose policy toward the practice of Judaism was relatively tolerant. The economic life of the Jews in Babylon, located in largely autonomous towns and villages and supported by agriculture, was better suited to the rabbinic ethos than the increasing syncretism of the Roman Empire from the second century. Particularly, the Sassanids encouraged or tolerated (in varying degrees over time) the formation of the academies in places such as Sura, Pumbeditha and Nehardea, which were the dynamos of rabbinic discussion.

3.4.2. The Babylonian Talmud (c. 6th cent.). The rabbis of Babylon gave Judaism its distinctive character, at least until the modern period. This character was and is conveyed in their monument (probably completed during the sixth century), the Babylonian Talmud, or the Babli. It is a more comprehensive and subtle treatment of the Mishnah than the Yerushalmi, often employing rich, narrative means which permit of the contemporation of the rabbinic ethos. Each rabbi is here to some extent a Moses* of his own, as when Moses himself is said to visit the academy of Aqiba and to observe to God that the discussion is so complex, his own unworthiness is obvious (b. Menah. 29b). But the rabbis are also respectful tradents, as when Rab Joseph of Pumbeditha, the blind master, acknowledges that without the Targum he would not understand Scripture (b. Sank 94b). Their knowledge and expertise is functionally infinite: a rabbi can be consulted regarding the vision of God's chariot, how to make love or to relieve constipation. Although the Talmud (and Babli for practical purposes is the Talmud) is vast, its very range is a succinct statement of its intent: To transform the whole of life with the light of the Torah as interpreted by the rabbis.

3.5. Targums and Midrash Rabbah. Their energy and their resources enabled the rabbis of Babylon to see to the completion of the standard recension of the targums (see Targum) and to the publication of as definitive a form of the midrash as was ever produced. Midrash Rabbah presents not only the biblical books used for festal and commemorative occasions (Esther, Ruth, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations) but also the Pentateuch. The confidence of the rabbis of Babylonia in their own ethos was so great that the comment upon Scripture might include explicit narrative concerning rabbis, as well as exposition and discourse. Midrash Rabbah was likely completed during the eighth century, and it represents the confidence that Torah, whether in Scripture or Talmud, is fundamentally one. The interweaving of Scripture and rabbinic teaching is also represented in the homiletic midrashim of a later period: The Pesiqta Rabbati, the Pesiqta de-Rab Kahana and Tanhuma.

3.6. The Sefer Yesirah The rabbinic period closes with the rise of Islam and the subsequent reaction of the Geonim, the successors of the rabbis who maintained and extended rabbinic Judaism with a distinctively academic, and sometimes rationalistic, bent. Increasingly, their work is of a literary nature and takes the rabbinic canon as a fact which is to be acknowledged, rather than achieved. Moreover, a tendency toward philosophy and esoterism becomes manifest.

The Sefer Yesirah or "book of formation," is a good representative of a work which is transitional between the Amoraim and the Geonim, and was perhaps composed during the seventh century. It builds on a mystical tradition reaching back at least until Yohanan ben Zakkai, according to which it is possible to see the chariot (the Merkabah) of Ezekiel 1, and to know the structure of the creation. But where the rabbis held that such experiments were a matter for private exposition (and then under tight controls, cf. b. Šabb. 80b; b. ḥag. 11b, 13a, 14b), the Sefer Yesirah commences a tradition of literary and rational esoterism which is more typical of the Qabbala of the Middle Ages than of the Judaism of the rabbis. The dialectic of the rabbis was rooted in the oral argument which produced their literature and which their literature was designed to serve. When the logic of literary discourse takes over, the constitution of the Judaism which is reflected is no longer, strictly speaking, rabbinic.

4. The Use of Rabbinica in Understanding Jesus and the Gospels.

Rabbinic literature plainly developed in a way which makes it unlike the Gospels; in social and religious terms, the writings of rabbinic Judaism and early Christianity are not directly comparable. For that reason the existence of an alleged parallel in rabbinica to a passage in the Gospels is not to be taken by itself as proof that Judaism was the origin of the motif at issue. (Sometimes, the term parallel is only useful when it is borne in mind that the adjective describes lines which do not in fact meet.) Moreover, the very program of the rabbis, of taking up a perennial discussion of purity and promulgating that as Torah caused words or sayings to be ascribed anachronistically to their predecessors. The attribution of positions to any rabbi, particularly of the Tannaitic period or earlier, is to be used only with caution.

4.1. Anachronisms. The earlier reference (see 1.1. above) to Hillel's teaching concerning love is a case in point Hillel was revered as the progenitor of the patriarchate and was even—over the course of time-endowed with Davidic ancestry (Gen. Rab. 98), which reinforced the claim to authority of any patriarch descended from him. By the time of the Amoraim a rabbi was understood to render with his own halakah the functional equivalent of Torah, and that is precisely what Hillel does in the story. In a single stroke he defeats the glib request of the proselyte and the rude exclusivism of Shammai. Hillel becomes what any Amoraim wanted to be: a hero for the Torah who succeeded because he understood the force of the Torah. In that this story of Hillel is consistent with the ethos of the Amoraim and appears only at this stage of the Babli (b. Šabb. 31a), its emphasis on learning the whole of Torah should not necessarily be ascribed to Hillel himself.

4.2. Analogies. On the other hand, the ubiquity of a form of what is commonly known as the Golden Rule makes it unwise to deny Hillel may have said something such as ascribed to him in the Babli. The story as it stands may reflect the ethos of the Amoraim, but a statement of Hillel's may lie at its point of origin. Negatively formulated as an imperative against doing what one finds loathsome, the maxim appears to have circulated generally during the ancient period (cf. Confucius Analecta 15.23; Tob 4:15; Ep. Arist. 207; Eusebius Praep. Ev. 8.7 [for its citation of Philo]; T. Naph. [Hebrew] 1:6; 2 Enoch 61:1, 2; Sextus Senten-tiae 89 [and 210b]). It has also influenced the form of the Golden Rule in the Didache (1:2; cf. Arts 15:20, 29 in Bezae; Rom 13:10): Whatever you wish not to be done to you, do not do to another.

Given that the proverbial form of the Rule (i.e., in the negative) is the form that predominates in Christian antiquity, there is no question of attempting to argue that Hillel's version specifically influenced Jesus' saying. Further, the negative form of the Rule is as common in the Christian tradition as in many others; there is no need or reason to posit some specific source (such as Hillel's dictum) for a conventional statement.

Indeed, the feature which may be significantly distinctive in the maxim as attributed to Jesus in Matthew 7:12 and Luke 6:31 is that its form is positive. Although the substance of the teaching is proverbial, and far from unique, there is unquestionably an unusual element in the application of its principle. The active desire to do to others the good one wants for oneself is evidently a more aggressive version of the imperative not to inflict the harm one would avoid. The significance of what is attributed to Hillel in the Babli is not that it can be established to provide a parallel to Jesus' teaching from the first century, but that it establishes by contrast that, in rabbinic Judaism and probably in the Pharisaic circles of early Judaism, the proverbial, negative form of the maxim was current. Even that marginal insight is only obtainable when Babli is read within the terms of reference of earlier documents. There is no question of a critically acceptable, direct comparison between Jesus and Hillel on the basis of the Gospels and the Babli alone.

4.3. Milieu. As has already been mentioned (see 1.1. above), Hillel is reported to have taught that offerings should be brought to the Temple, where the owners would lay hands on them and then give them over to priests for slaughter (cf. t. ḥag. 2.11; y. ḥag. 2.3; y. Beṣa 2.4; b. Beṣa 20a, b). His perennial and stereotypical disputants, the house of Shammai, resist insisting that the animals might be handed over directly. One of the house of Shammai (named Baba ben Buta in the Babli and Tosefta), however, was so struck by the rectitude of Hillel's position that he had some 3,000 animals (a number specified only in the Yerushalmi) brought to the Temple and gave them to those who were willing to lay hands on them in advance of sacrifice.
Generally speaking, the haggadah (ḥaggadal, "narration, instruction") concerning Hillel, Baba ben Buta and the sheep is more characteristic of the Pharisaic/rabbinic program than is the vignette containing the Golden Rule. Moreover, the broader attestation of the story within the two Talmuds and its appearance in the Tosefta indicate that it may reflect an actual dispute. Finally, although Hillel's disputants are stereotypical, it is striking that in Beṣa 20a (cf. t. ḥag. 2.11) Hillel pretends the animal is a female for a shared sacrifice (zibḥê ṣelāmîm) in order to get it by the disciples of Shammai. That is, the Babli's version of the story assumes that the followers of Shammai are in actual control of what worshipers do in the Temple. The haggadah is a far cry from the sort of tale in which Hillel is portrayed as the prototypical patriarch of rabbinic Judaism.

In one sense the tradition concerning Hillel envisages a movement opposite from that of Jesus in the Temple (Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:15-17; Lk 19:45-46; Jn 2:13-17; see Temple Cleansing): Animals are introduced, rather than their traders expelled. But the purpose of the action by Hillel's partisan is to enforce a certain understanding of correct worship, and that is also the motivation attributed to Jesus in the Gospels. Hillel's halakah, in effect, insists on the participation of the offerer by virtue of his ownership of what is offered, an ownership of which the laying on of hands is a definitive gesture (cf. b. Pesah. 66b). The house of Shammai is portrayed as sanctioning sacrifice, without mandating that sort of emphatic participation on the part of the offerer. Although nothing like the violence of Jesus is attributed to Baba ben Buta, he does offer an analogy for a forcible attempt to insist on correct worship in the Temple on the part of a Pharisee.

Mishnah itself reflects a concern to control commercial arrangements connected with the Temple, and such concern is also somewhat analogous to Jesus' action in the exterior court. The following story is told concerning one of the successors of Hillel (m. Ker. 1:7):

Once in Jerusalem a pair of doves cost a golden denar. Rabban Simeon ben Gamaliel said: By this Place I will not rest this night before they cost but a [silver] denar. He went into the court and taught: If a woman suffered five miscarriages that were not in doubt or five issues that were not in doubt she need bring but one offering, and she may then eat of the sacrifices; and the rest is not required of her. And the same day the price of a pair of doves stood at a quarter denar each.
Although the story requires more effort to understand than the one concerning Hillel, it rewards the attention required. The assumption of the whole tale is that a pair of doves might be offered by a woman as both a burnt offering and a sacrifice for sin in order to be purified after childbirth; the second of the two would be offered normally, while the first—in the case of poverty—might take the place of a yearling lamb (Lev 12:6-8). The story also assumes that from the point of view of purity miscarriages and unusual issues of blood akin to miscarriages should be treated under the category of childbirth. That association is characteristically Pharisaic, as is the issue of when the woman might be considered entitled to eat of offerings. The Pharisees defined purity as fitness to take part in sacrifice and in meals which—in their teaching—were extensions of the holiness of the Temple.

Simeon's anger, which causes him to swear by the Temple (cf. Mt 23:16-22), is therefore motivated to some extent by economic considerations. His response is, like that of Jesus, to teach in the court of the Temple, where such offerings would be brought But his action there is far less direct than that of Hillel or Jesus. Instead of importing more birds or releasing those bought at an extortionate price, he promulgates a halakah designed to reduce the trade in doves, no matter what their price.

If a woman may await several (up to five) miscarriages or flows of blood and then offer a single pair of doves and be considered pure enough to eat of the animal offering, the potential revenue from sales of doves would obviously decline. In effect, Simeon counters inflationary prices with sacrificial monetarism. The political lesson was quickly appreciated (on the very day, if we believe the story), and prices went even lower than Simeon had intended. Presumably there was no reason for him to continue promulgating his view in the court of the Temple, and both he and the traders were content with the settlement

The date of the Mishnah, as compared to the Tosefta, the Yerushalmi and the Babli, makes its material, when in any way comparable to the Gospels, of immediate interest to the student of Jesus' life and teaching. For all its complexity the haggadah in the mishnaic tractate Keritot is vitally important for appreciating the sort of Pharisaic intervention in the operation of the Temple which was considered possible during the first century. (Perhaps the story concerning Simeon is more complicated precisely because it is closer to particulars of Pharisaic concern than the later haggadah concerning Hillel and Baba ben Buta.) Hillel, Simeon and Jesus are all portrayed as interested in the animals offered in the Temple to the extent that they intervene (or, in the case of Hillel, a surrogate intervenes) in the exterior court in order to influence the ordinary course of worship. To that extent we may say that rabbinic traditions and writings provide a context within which it is possible to interpret a well-attested action of Jesus.

4.4. Summary. The usefulness of the documents of rabbinic Judaism for interpreting Jesus and the Gospels is qualified by three critical considerations, each of which we have observed in the examples provided above. First, the relatively late date of the literature must be taken into account although the continuities between rabbinic Judaism and Pharisaism of the first century suggest some analogies between the Gospels and rabbinica Second, a recognition of the social and religious transformations involved in the emergence of rabbinic Judaism must alert the reader to the possibility of anachronistic attributions or to the presentation of early teachers as spokesmen of later theologies. And finally, we must understand that the initial target of inquiry is the recovery of the milieu of early Judaism. That is, we should seek not so much particular events and sayings paralleled in the Gospels but to recapture the matrix of the Christian faith, as it is reflected indirectly both in the Gospels and in rabbinica.

Ransom Saying

The ransom saying consists of the second half of Mark 10:45 (par. Mt 20:28) where Jesus says: "For even the Son of Man* did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many." It is extremely important because it purports to show the significance Jesus attached to his death (see Death of Jesus). Any attempt to determine how Jesus understood his mission or to trace the development of the christology of the early church* must take this saying into account.

1. Context
2. Background
3. Authenticity
4. Meaning

The saying appears at the climax of a dispute about greatness precipitated by the request that James and John receive positions of honor in the coming kingdom. In his response to the sons of Zebedee (Mt 20:22-23 par. Mk 10:38-40) Jesus asks them whether they can drink the cup he drinks or (Mk only) be baptized with the baptism* he is baptized with. Then he calls the disciples* together and proceeds to teach them that true greatness consists in service* (Mt 20:25-28 par. Mk 10:42-45). This teaching culminates in the ransom saying. In it Jesus sets himself forth as an example of selfless service and at the same time clarifies what he meant by the reference to the cup and baptism.
The saying plays a vital role in its broader as well as its immediate context. It provides a climax to the section of the Gospel narratives which begins with Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi. The confession has a pivotal function in the Synoptic Gospels. From that point on the narratives focus on the passion (see Passion Narrative), and Jesus begins to give explicit teaching about the necessity of his death. In addition to more veiled references there are three major passion predictions attributed to Jesus (Mt 16:21 par. Mk 8:31 and Lk 9:22; Mt 17:22-23 par. Mk 9:31 and Lk 9:44; Mt 20:18-19 par. Mk 10:33-34 and Lk 18:31-33; see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). Each of these is followed by some indication of the failure of the Twelve to comprehend what Jesus meant and by instruction concerning discipleship. The third of these prophecies is given while Jesus and his disciples are on their last journey to Jerusalem and precedes the selfish request of James and John. All three Gospels portray Jesus as being preoccupied with his death from the time of Peter's confession onwards, and the ransom saying reveals how he understood it. Coming just before the arrival in Jerusalem, it helps explain the reason for the journey to the holy city and the suffering that awaits Jesus there.

2. Background.

There used to be a virtual consensus that the ransom saying was based on the description of the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 52:13—53:12 (see Servant of Yahweh), but an essay by C. K. Barrett has convinced many scholars to look elsewhere for the background to the saying. His study shows that there is little verbal similarity between the saying and the Septuagintal version of Isaiah 53. Nevertheless, Barrett may be faulted for treating linguistic parallels separately from conceptual parallels, concentrating too narrowly on parallels to Isaiah 53:12 and underestimating the cumulative significance of the parallels. Though Barrett disputes this, it remains likely that the ransom saying was formed on the basis of Isaiah 53. Both combine the ideas of servanthood and atoning death and speak of the servant voluntarily "giving his life." The Greek lytron ("ransom") in Matthew 20:28 and Mark 10:45 corresponds to the Hebrew 'āšām ("guilt offering") in Isaiah 53:10, despite the fact that it is not used to translate it elsewhere. Most importantly, both use the phrase "for many" to indicate who benefits from the servant's death.

There are two major alternatives to the view that the ransom saying alludes to Isaiah 53. The first is that it draws on the general conception in late Judaism that the suffering of martyrs has atoning efficacy. This idea comes to expression in 4
Maccabees 6:28-29 where Eleazer prays, "Be merciful to your people and let our punishment be a satisfaction on their behalf. Make my blood their purification and take my life as a ransom for theirs" (cf. 2 Macc 7:37-38; 4 Macc 17:21-22). This, however, fails to account for the emphasis in the Gospels on the death of Jesus as a scriptural necessity. The other option is that the ransom saying is based on a corporate interpretation of the "one like a son of man" in Daniel 7. The "Son of man" tide probably was derived from Daniel 7, but although that chapter speaks of the sufferings of the "saints of the Most High," it does not associate suffering directly with the "son of man," and it is unlikely that it was interpreted as doing so in the first century (see Son of Man). Isaiah 53 is much more credible as the background for the saying than either of these alternatives.

3. Authenticity.

There is considerable disagreement over whether the ransom saying should be accepted as an authentic saying of Jesus. Four arguments have been advanced against its genuineness. First, it has been said that the idea of death as ransom is foreign to the preceding context and destroys the analogy between the behavior of the Son of man and that expected of the disciples. This argument wrongly assumes that the transition from the thought of a life of exemplary service to that of a unique, atoning death is awkward. Having introduced himself as a servant, it was only natural that Jesus should go on to speak of the supreme demonstration of his servanthood in his death. A similar combination of ideas can be found in John 12:23-27; Philippians 2:5-8; 1 Peter 2:21-25; and 1 John 3:16.

Second, it has been alleged that the tense of the main verb, "did . . . come" (ἠλθὲν), looks back on the life of Jesus as being in the past. This allegation is unwarranted. The verb simply expresses a consciousness of having been divinely commissioned for a special task. There are many sayings in which Jesus speaks of "coming" or "being sent." Some of these—for instance Luke 12:49, "I have come to bring fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled!"—clearly originated during the lifetime of Jesus. This motif is deeply imbedded in the Gospel tradition and must go back to the historical Jesus.

Third, the saying has been assailed on the grounds that it presents an interpretation of Jesus' death not otherwise attested in his teaching. Older critics thought it had been influenced by Pauline conceptions of the atonement, though this hypothesis has largely been abandoned. In opposition to those who suggest that the saying is without parallel in Jesus' teaching, it must be noted that it is not at all out of character with what Jesus taught about his death. There is abundant evidence that Jesus anticipated that his life would end violently and that he believed this had been prophesied in Scripture. It is inherently probable that he would have reflected on the meaning of this. If, as Luke 22:37 suggests, he did so in the light of Isaiah 53, the authenticity of the ransom saying is perfectly credible. That it expresses the mind of Jesus is confirmed by the presence of similar ideas in the words over the cup at the Last Supper* (Mt 26:28 par. Mk

The final and most substantial argument against the genuineness of the saying is based on its absence from Luke 22:25-27, which otherwise parallels Matthew 20:25-28 and Mark 10:42-45 quite closely. Luke presents the same main thoughts in the same sequence, and many believe that he is relating the same conversation, with his version being closer to what Jesus actually said. In response to this the following observations are in order. (1) The Semitic character of the version in the first two Gospels suggests that it is more primitive than that in Luke. (2) It is unwarranted to assume that the version with the from his special source(s) rather than from either Matthew or Mark, and there is no reason to think that he intended to suppress the theology of the saying. (4)
Luke places his account in a different historical setting than the other Evangelists, and it is not at all certain that he is describing the same incident (5)
Even if the placing of the saying in its present location was editorial, the saying itself could be genuine.

All things considered, it is more probable that the saying originated in the mind of Jesus than in the early church. It coheres well with Jesus' preoccupation with his death toward the end of his life, especially if he saw himself in the role of the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53. In addition, its simplicity suggests that it was the fountainhead of the Christian understanding of redemption. The evidence of early and widespread belief in the redeeming efficacy of Jesus' death (cf. 1 Cor 15:3; 1 Pet 1:18-19) is most easily explained if it goes back to something Jesus himself said.

4. Meaning.

"Son of man" is an exalted title and implies that Jesus has the right to be served (cf. Dan 7:13-14), but according to Matthew 20:28 and its parallel Mark 10:45, the purpose of his coming to earth was to serve others. This service included giving his life for them after the pattern of the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 53.

Jesus characterizes his death as a "ransom" (lytron), employing a word that does not appear elsewhere in the NT (a related word antilytron, also translated "ransom," is used in 1 Tim 2:6). In extrabiblical sources lytron denotes the price paid to free slaves, and it is likely that it has this meaning here, though obviously it is used in a metaphorical sense. Some scholars think that when used with reference to God, the term refers to deliverance in a general way, without implying anything about cost. It appears that the related verb lytroō can describe an act of deliver-ance which does not involve payment, but it is doubtful that lytron is ever used in this way. It specifically designates the means of deliverance and always seems to include the notion of cost. When used metaphorically, however, it need not imply that payment is given to a particular individual, and the NT references to redemption never specify to whom the ransom is paid. In this case the term stresses that the emancipation of the many was accomplished at great cost, namely the death of the Son of man.

If the idea of cost attaches to lytron, the use of this word suggests that the death of Jesus had a substitutionary significance. The presence of the idea of substitution receives further support, if, as argued above, the ransom saying is indebted to Isaiah 53, where the servant is pictured as suffering vicariously. In any case there can be little doubt that the Evangelists thought in terms of substitution, since the saying calls to mind the question "What can a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Mt 16:26 par. Mk 8:37), which Jesus addressed to the disciples in the teaching he gave on discipleship* after the first passion prediction. This passage, which echoes Psalm 49:7-9, indicates that those who forfeit eternal life* cannot buy it back. With the ransom saying Jesus claims that he can do for others what they cannot do for themselves.

The idea of substitution is reinforced by the use of the preposition anti after lytron. This preposition normally indicates a relationship of equivalence or exchange. It is most often rendered "instead of" or "in place of." This is the only place in the NT where it is used with reference to those who benefit from the death of Christ, and some have suggested that in this instance it means "on behalf of" and has no substitutionary implications. In view of the context, however, it is preferable to understand the preposition as having its customary sense.

The far-reaching effects of the substitutionary death of Jesus are indicated by the phrase "for many." Some scholars believe that the term "many" (pollōn) was intended to have an inclusive rather than exclusive sense, and that it may be seen as synonymous with "all." Others think, largely on the basis of the way the term "many" (rabbîm) is used in the Qumran literature, that it refers to the elect community. Certainly "many" stands in contrast to "one" not "all," and the basic idea is that the death of Jesus brings benefit to a great number of persons.

REDACTION CRITICISM

Redaction criticism is a historical and literary discipline which studies both the ways the redactors/editors/authors changed their sources and the seams or transitions they utilized to link those traditions into a unified whole. The purpose of this approach is to recover the author's theology and setting. Redaction criticism is the third of four "schools" of criticism developed in this century to study the Gospels and other biblical narratives: Form criticism,* which seeks the original or authentic tradition behind the final form found in the Gospels but tends to assume that the Evangelists were mere scissors-and-paste editors who artificially strung together the traditions they inherited; tradition criticism,* a stepchild of form criticism, which tries to reconstruct the history or development of the Gospel traditions from the earliest to the final form in the Gospels but often ignores the contribution of the Evangelists; and literary criticism,* which bypasses the historical dimension and studies only the final form of the text assuming that the value of the Gospels is to be found apart from considerations of originating event or author. Redaction criticism originally developed as a corrective to areas of neglect in form and tradition criticism, but it functions also as a corrective to excesses in literary criticism.

1. The Process of Redactional Inquiry
2. The Origins of Redaction Criticism
3. The Methodology of Redaction Criticism
4. The Weaknesses of Redaction Criticism
5. The Place and Value of Redaction Criticism

Redaction criticism must build upon the results of source criticism, for the final results are determined in part by one's choice of Markan or Matthean priority (see Synoptic Problem). The most widely held hypothesis remains the Oxford, or four-document, hypothesis of B. H. Streeter, who taught that Matthew and Luke utilized two primary sources, Mark and Q,* along with their own secondary sources (M* and L*). Redaction critics begin with this assumption and study the alterations which the Evangelists made to their sources. This means that redactional study is most relevant for Matthew and Luke, less so for Mark (we don't know what sources he may have used) or John (independent for the most part from the Synoptics; see Synoptics and John).

Redaction critics work also with the results of form and tradition criticism, assuming the process of tradition development but studying primarily the final stage, the changes wrought by the Evangelists themselves. When examining Luke's redaction of the crucifixion narrative (see Death of jesus), these scholars ask which of the three "last sayings" peculiar to Luke (23:34, 43, 46) may have been added earlier by the community and which were added by the Evangelist. They believe that these changes to the tradition provide a clue to the Evangelist's theological intentions and the life-situation (Sitz im Leben) of his community.

This is accomplished by asking why the changes were made and by seeking consistent patterns in the alterations made by the redactor. Such modifications denote redactional interests or theological tendencies on the part of the Evangelist who introduced them. In Luke's crucifixion narrative two such tendencies might be noted: a christological stress on Jesus as the innocent righteous martyr (exemplified also in Lk 23:47, "Surely this man was righteous [dikaios]") and an emphasis on the crucifixion as a scene of worship (seen in the absence of negative aspects like the earthquake, in the redaction of the taunts which in Luke are contrasted with Jesus' prayer* for forgiveness,* and in the fact that two of the sayings are prayers).

Finally, the setting or situation of the Lukan church is reconstructed by asking what led to these changes. This is of course a speculative enterprise, but most critics believe that sociological factors hinted at in the text were behind the pastoral concerns which determined the final form. Thus redaction criticism is interested in both the theological interests and the ecclesiastical situation behind the Gospel texts.

2. The Origins of Redaction Criticism.

There were several precursors to this movement, such as W. Wrede's "messianic secret"; N. B. Stonehouse's study of christological emphases in the Synoptic Gospels; R H. Lightfoot's Bampton lectures of 1934, which studied Mark's theological treatment of his sources; or K L. Schmidt's form-critical treatment of the Markan seams. Like the origins of form criticism via three German scholars working independently in post-World-War-1 Germany (Schmidt, Dibelius, Bultmann), redaction criticism began in post-World-War-2 Germany with three independent works—those of Bornkamm, Conzelmann and Marxsen.

G. Bornkamm launched the movement with his 1948 article, "The Stilling of the Storm in Matthew," later combined with articles by two of his students in Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew. He argued that Matthew not only changed but reinterpreted Mark's miracle story (see Miracles, Miracle Stories) into a paradigm of discipleship* centering on the "little faith" of the disciples as a metaphor for the difficult journey of the "little ship of the church." In a 1954 article, "Matthew As Interpreter of the Words of the Lord" (expanded to "End-Expectation and Church in Matthew" and included in the volume mentioned above) Bornkamm considered Matthew's Gospel as a whole, stating that for Matthew eschatology* is the basis for ecclesiology: the church* defines itself and its mission in terms of the coming judgment.*

N. Perrin states, "If Günther Bornkamm is the first of the true redaction critics, Hans Conzelmann is certainly the most important" (28). Conzelmann's study of Luke began with a 1952 article, "Zur Lukasanalyse," later expanded into The Theology of St. Luke (1954). He challenged the prevalent view by arguing that Luke was a theologian rather than a historian; the delay of the Parousia led Luke to replace the imminent eschatology of Mark with a salvation-historical perspective having three stages—the time of Israel, ending with John the Baptist; the time of Jesus (the "center of time," the original German book title); and the time of the church (see Luke, Gospel of). According to Conzelmann the kingdom (see Kingdom of God) in Luke has become virtually a timeless entity, with the Parousia no longer the focus. Mark's brief interim has become an indefinite period, and the church is prepared for prolonged conflict in the lengthy period before the final judgment.

W. Marxsen in his Mark the Evangelist (1956) was the first to use the term Redaktionsgeschichte, and the first and most influential portion of his work described the differences between form and redaction criticism, asserting that form-critical research has missed the third Sitz im leben (after the situations of Jesus and the early church), namely that of the Evangelist. His method is called "backwards exegesis," which interprets each pericope from the perspective of those preceding it. By this theory Mark used the John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) story not to tell what happened but rather to provide a base for what came after, the story of Jesus. Marxsen's actual theory regarding Mark was much less influential; he stated that Mark wrote to tell the church to flee the terrible persecution during the Jewish War of A.D. 66 and to proceed to Galilee* where the imminent return of the Son of man (Parousia) would take place.

3. The Methodology of Redaction Criticism.

The difficulty in redactional research is determining with some degree of probability that a redactional nuance is present in the text. The discipline is prone to highly speculative theories because the methodology as well as the thoroughness of the search completely determines the results. Marxsen, on the one hand, makes Mark a Jewish-Christian work centering on an imminent Parousia, while Weeden, on the other hand, turns Mark into a Hellenistic work countering a "divine man" heresy (see Divine Man/Theios Aner) by recasting Mark's battle with his opponents in the form of a dramatic conflict between Jesus (= Mark) and his disciples (= Mark's opponents). Few interpreters have followed either theory because both failed to consider all the evidence. The key to redactional study is a good synopsis of the Gospels, which becomes the basis for the research. A scholar compares the Gospel accounts, compiles the differences and then studies the resultant data by means of the following stages of analysis.

3.1. Tradition-Critical Analysis. The historical development of the pericope from Jesus through the early church to the Evangelist is determined by applying the criteria of authenticity to the passage: (1) Dissimilarity (the tradition is authentic if it exhibits no ties to Judaism* or the church); (2) multiple attestation (the pericope is repeated in several of the primary sources like Mark, Q, M, L or in more than one form); (3) divergent patterns (it is contrary to emphases in the early church); (4) unintended evidence of historicity (details which suggest an eyewitness report); (5) Aramaic or Palestinian features (Semitic constructions [see Languages of Palestine] or Palestinian customs which point to a early origin); and (6) coherence (it is consistent with other passages proven reliable on the basis of other criteria). These in and of themselves do not prove authenticity, of course, but they can demonstrate that the tradition goes back to the earliest stages and they do shift the burden of proof to the skeptic.

These criteria were originally developed under a so-called hermeneutic of suspicion which assumed that the stories were "guilty unless proven innocent," that is, they were nonhistorical unless shown otherwise. However, it has repeatedly been shown that the criteria when used in this manner have proved inconclusive, and most today use them more positively to trace the text's development. In this way tradition criticism provides the data for the form-critical and redaction-critical stages which follow. Nevertheless, demonstrating the text's reliability (the positive side) is an important step in itself since it grounds the interpreters in history and forces them to realize that they are not just tracing the ideas of Mark or Matthew (a danger of redactional study) but also the very life and teachings of the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus).

Tradition criticism used in this way is an important step prior to carrying out redactional study. Its primary value lies in the area of historical verification, for it links redactional study with the quest for the historical Jesus and anchors the results in history. One danger of redaction criticism is the tendency of many critics today to take an ahistorical approach—to study the Gospels as purely literary creations rather than as books which trace the life of Jesus. Tradition criticism provides a control against such tendencies. Moreover, the study of the history of the development of the text, though admittedly speculative at times, leads to greater accuracy in identifying redactional tendencies. By tracing with greater precision how an author is using the sources and how the sources have developed, the results of redactional criticism will be established on a stronger data base.

3.2. Form-Critical Analysis. Before beginning the detailed study of a pericope it is crucial to determine the form it takes, since the interpreter will apply a different set of hermeneutical principles to each sub-genre in the Gospels. A pericope can take the form of a pronouncement story (the setting and details lead up to a climactic saying of Jesus); miracle story (some emphasizing the miracle or exorcism, others discipleship,* christology, cosmic conflict or the presence of the kingdom); dominical saying (further classified by Bultmann as wisdom logia, prophetic or apocalyptic* sayings, legal sayings or church rules, "I" sayings and similitudes); parable (further subdivided into similitudes, example stories, and one-, two- or three-point parables depending on the number of characters involved); event or historical story (episodes in Jesus' life like the baptism* or Transfiguration*—often labeled "legends" because of their supernatural nature); and passion story (considered a separate type even though the passion narrative contains several actual "forms"; see Passion Narrative). In the final analysis the formal features help more in the stage of composition criticism than in redactional study, but these are two aspects of a larger whole and therefore form-critical analysis is an important part of the redactional process.

3.3. Redaction-Critical Analysis The interpreter examines the pericope and notes each time the source (Mark or Q) has been changed in order to determine whether the alteration is redactional or stylistic; that is, whether it has a theological purpose or is cosmetic, part of the Evangelist's normal style. While this process is obviously more conducive for Matthew and Luke, since sources in Mark are so difficult to detect and John is so independent, most scholars believe that a nuanced redaction criticism may still be applied to Mark and John (though without many of the source-critical techniques). The principles which follow are intended to guide the student through the process as it applies to all four Gospels. There are two stages—the individual analysis of a single pericope, and holistic analysis which studies redactional strata that appear throughout the Gospel. These aspects work together, as the data emerge from the individual studies and are evaluated on the basis of recurring themes in the whole.

3.3.1. Individual Analysis The text of the synopsis should first be underlined with different colors to denote which readings are unique to a Gospel, which are paralleled in Mark and Matthew, Mark and Luke or Matthew and Luke (Q), and which are found in all three. The next step is to evaluate the data. S. McKnight (85-87) notes seven ways the Evangelists redact their sources: (1) They can conserve them (important because this also has theological significance for the Evangelist); (2) conflate two traditions (as in the use of both Mark and Q in the temptation story of Matthew and Luke); (3) expand the source (e.g., Matthew's added material in the walking-on-the-water miracle, Mt 14:22-33; cf. Mk 6:45-52); (4) transpose the settings (as in the different settings for Jesus' compassion for Jerusalem in Mt 23:37-39 and Lk 13:34-35); (5) omit portions of the tradition (e.g., the missing descriptions of demonic activity in the healing* of the demon-possessed child, Mt 17:14-21; cf. Mk 9:14-29; see Demon, Devil, Satan); (6) explain details in the source (e.g., Mark's lengthy explanation of washing the hands, Mk 7:3-4; or Matthew changing "Son of man"* to "I," 10:32; cf. Lk 12:8); or (7) alter a tradition to avoid misunderstandings (as when Matthew alters Mark's "Why do you call me good?" [Mk 10:18] to "Why do you ask me about what is good?" [Mt 19:17]).

By grouping the changes the student can detect patterns which point to certain theological nuances within the larger matrix of the story as a whole. Each change is evaluated in terms of potential meaning; that is, does it possess theological significance as it affects the development of the story? For instance, Matthew changes the endings of both Mark 6:52 ("Their heart was hardened," cf. Mt 14:33, "Surely you are the Son of God") and 8:21 ("Don't you understand yet?" cf. Mt 16:12, "Then they understood . . ."). In both Gospels these two sets of endings conclude the group of stories centered on the feedings of the five thousand and four thousand. It is likely that the differences are due to Mark's stress on the reality of discipleship failure and Matthew's emphasis on the difference that the presence of Jesus makes in overcoming failure.

3.3.2. Holistic Analysis. The individual analysis is now expanded to note the development of themes as the narrative of the whole Gospel unfolds. Decisions regarding single accounts are somewhat preliminary until they are corroborated by the presence of similar themes elsewhere. Also, these steps enable one to discover redactional emphases in Mark and John, for which the interpreter has difficulty noting sources.

The "seams" in a Gospel are the introductions, conclusions and transitions which connect the episodes and provide important clues to the theological purpose of the author. They often contain a high proportion of the author's own language and point to an Evangelist's particular reasons for including the pericope. For instance, the two seams in Mark 1:21 and 3:1 provide a synagogue* setting for the christo-logical emphasis on Jesus' authority in word and deed as he confronts the Jewish leaders. Also, the summaries in a Gospel are redactional indicators of theological overtones. An example of this would be Matthew 4:23 and 9:35 (introducing the Sermon on the Mount [see Sermon on the Mount] and missionary discourse, respectively), which contain similar wording and summarize Jesus' itinerant missionary activity. The threefold emphasis on teaching, preaching and healing are major theological emphases in Matthew.

Editorial asides and insertions are key indicators of the theological direction a narrative is taking. John has long been known for his tendency to add explanatory comments to describe the significance more fully, as in his famous commentary (3:16-21) on the soteriological significance of the Nicodemus dialog (3:1-15). In similar fashion, repeated or favorite terms show particular interests. Again, John is the master of this technique; nearly every theological stress is highlighted by terms which appear nearly as often in his Gospel as in the rest of the NT together (e.g., alētheia [85 of the 163 NT uses; see Truth], zōē [66 of the 135 NT uses; see Life], or kosmos [105 of the 185 NT uses; see World]) and by word groups of synonymous terms (e.g., the two terms for "know," two for "love"* or five for "see").

Finally, theme studies (McKnight calls this "motif analysis") trace the development of theological emphases within the Gospel as a whole. Here one reads through the Gospel, noting the theological threads which are woven together into the fabric of the whole. For instance, one of Mark's primary themes is discip-leship failure, introduced in Mk 4:38, 40 and then emerging as a major emphasis in the "hardened heart" passages of Mk 6:52 and 8:17 (see Hardness of Heart). The passion predictions are contrasted with the disciples' failure (Mk 8:31-33; 9:31-34; 10:32-40). Chapter 14 contains several scenes of failure (Mk 14:4-5,10-11,17-20, 27-31, 37-40, 50-51, 66-72), and the Gospel ends on a note of discipleship failure (Mk 16:8).

Mark is a special test case for holistic analysis and for redaction criticism as a whole. If one accepts the prevalent theory of Markan priority, then there are no obvious sources (Matthew and Luke have Mark and Q) with which to compare Mark in order to determine redactional peculiarities. The traditions behind Mark are very difficult to detect, and no scholarly consensus has yet emerged as to their identity. As a result there is a bewildering array of theories regarding the redactional nature of the Second Gospel. In order to overcome these problems, R. Stein (positive regarding the possibilities) and M. Black (skeptical about the possibilities) have proposed several criteria for redactional research: (1) Study the seams, insertions and summaries; (2) determine whether Mark has created (a controversial criterion) or modified traditional material; (3) note Mark's process of selecting and arranging material; (4) ask whether Mark has omitted material (also controversial because the question always arises whether Mark has omitted an emphasis or been unaware of it, e.g., the famous Matthean addendum to the divorce* passage, "except for adultery"); (5) study Mark's introduction and conclusion; and (6) elucidate Mark's vocabulary, style and christological titles. When all these tools are used together, the Gospels of Mark or John open themselves to redactional study.

3.4. Composition-Critical Analysis. The task is incomplete so long as one focuses only on the redactional changes, so most recent redaction critics wish to study the traditions included as well as the redactional modifications. Obviously, each Evangelist unified tradition and redaction into a larger whole in producing a Gospel. It is erroneous to examine only the redaction.

3.4.1. The Structure. The way the Evangelist arranges material tells a great deal about the meaning of the whole. At both the micro and macro levels the rearrangement of the inherited tradition is significant. In the temptation narrative Matthew and Luke reverse the last two temptations (see Temptation of Jesus). Most believe that Matthew contains the original order and that Luke concludes with the Temple* temptation due to his special interest in Jerusalem and the Temple (Lk 4:9-12). But it is also possible that Matthew concludes with a mountain scene for thematic reasons (Mt 4:8-10; cf. 5:1; 8:1; 14:23; 15:29; 17:1). At the macro level, one could note the quite different things which Mark and Luke do with Jesus' early Capernaum-based ministry, with Mark placing the call to the disciples first, due to his discipleship emphasis (Mk 1:16-20), and reserving the rejection at Nazareth for later (Mk 6:1-6), while Luke begins with Jesus' inaugural address and rejection at Nazareth (Lk 4:16-30) in order to center upon christology, reserving the call of the disciples for later (Lk 5:1-11).

3.4.2. Intertextual Development. Each Evangelist arranges pericopes in such a way that their interaction with one another yields the intended message. Intertextuality at the macro level is the literary counterpart to redaction criticism at the micro level, for the Evangelist uses the same techniques of selection, omission and structure in both. This is exemplified in Mark's strategic placing of the two-stage healing of the blind man in Mark 8:22-26 (found only in Mark). On one level it forms an inclusion with the healing of the deaf man in Mark 7:31-37, stressing the need for healing on the part of the disciples (note the failure of Mk 8:14-21, in which the disciples are accused of being both blind and deaf!; see Blindness and Deafness). On another level it metaphorically anticipates the two-stage surmounting of the disciples' misunderstanding via Peter's confession (Mk 8:27-33, only a partial understanding) and the Transfiguration (Mk 9:1-10, at which time they glimpse the true nature of Jesus, cf. esp. Mk 9:9).

3.4.3. Plot. Plot refers to the interconnected sequence of events which follows a cause-effect pattern and centers upon conflict. The student examines how the characters interact and how the lines of causality develop to a climax. For redaction criticism this means especially the individual emphases of the Evangelists. The differences are often striking, as in the resurrection narratives. Mark follows a linear pattern, tracing the failure of the disciples and concluding with the women's inability to witness (Mk 16:8). This is countered by the enigmatic promise of Jesus to meet them in Galilee (Mk 16:7; cf. 14:28), apparently the place of reinstatement (note Mk 14:28 following 14:27). Matthew constructs a double-edged conflict in which the supernatural intervention of God (Mt 28:2-4) and the universal authority of Jesus (Mt 28:18-20) overcome the twofold attempt of the priests (see Priest Priesthood) to thwart the divine plan (Mt 27:62-66; 28:11-15).

3.4.4. Setting and Style. When the Evangelists place a saying or event in different settings, they often produce a new theological thrust For instance, Matthew places the parable of the lost sheep (Mt 18:12-14) in the context of the disciples and the church, with the result that it refers to straying members, while in Luke 15:3-7 Jesus addresses the same parable to the Pharisees* and scribes,* so that it refers to those outside the kingdom.
Style refers to the individual way that a saying or story is phrased and arranged so as to produce the effect that the author wishes. There can be gaps, chiasm, repetition, omissions and highly paraphrased renditions in order to highlight some nuance which Jesus gave his teaching but which is of particular interest to the Evangelist. Here it is important to remember that the Evangelists' concern was not the ipsissima verba (exact words) but the ipsissima vox (the very voice) of Jesus. They were free to give highly paraphrastic renditions to stress one certain aspect. One example is the Matthean and Lukan forms of the Beatitudes, which most scholars take to be derived from the same occasion (Luke's "plain" can also mean a mountain plateau in Greek). In Matthew the central stress is on ethical qualities ("blessed are the poor in spirit" Mt 5:3), while in Luke the emphasis is on economic deprivation ("blessed are you poor," Mt 5:20; cf. "woe to you rich," Mt 5:24). Both were undoubtedly intended by Jesus, while the two Evangelists highlighted different aspects.

4. The Weaknesses of Redaction Criticism.

Many have discounted the value of redaction criticism due to the excesses of some of its practitioners. Primarily, it has been the application of redaction criticism along with historical skepticism that has led some to reject the approach. As a result of the influence of form and tradition criticism in the past and of narrative criticism in the present, the historical reliability of Gospel stories has been called into question (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). Certainly some critics have begun with the premise that redaction entails the creation of Gospel material which is unhistorical, but this is by no means a necessary conclusion.

Techniques like omission, expansion or rearrangement are attributes of style and are not criteria for historicity. Another problem is redaction criticism's dependence on the four-document hypothesis. It is true that the results would look quite different if one were to assume the Griesbach hypothesis (the priority of Matthew). However, one must make a conclusion of some sort regarding the interrelationship of the Gospels before redactional study can begin, and most scholars have judged the four-document hypothesis to be clearly superior to the others (see Synoptic Problem).

As in form criticism, redactional studies tend to fragment the pericopes when they study only the additions to the traditions. Theology is to be found in the combined tradition and redaction—not in the redaction alone. The movement to composition criticism has provided a healthy corrective. The Evangelists' alterations are the major source of evidence, but the theology comes from the whole. Similarly, there has been a problem with overstatement Scholars have often seen significance in every "jot and tittle" and have forgotten that many changes are stylistic rather than theological. Once again, composition criticism helps avoid excesses by looking for patterns rather than seeing theology in every possible instance.

Subjectivism is another major danger. Studies utilizing the same data frequently produce different results, and thus some argue that no assured results can ever come from redaction-critical studies. The only solution is a judicious use of all the hermeneutical tools along with cross-pollination between the studies. Interaction between theories can demonstrate where the weaknesses are in each. Subjectivism is especially seen in speculations regarding Sitz im Leben, which are too often based on the assumption that every theological point is addressed to some problem in the community behind the Gospel. This ignores the fact that many of the emphases are due to christological, liturgical, historical or evangelistic interests. The proper life-situation study is not so much concerned with the detailed reconstruction of the church behind a Gospel as in the delineation of the Evangelists' message to that church.

5. The Place and Value of Redaction Criticism.

A careful use of proper methodology can reduce the problems inherent in redaction criticism, and the values far outweigh the dangers. In fact, any study of the Gospels will be enhanced by redaction-critical techniques. A true understanding of the doctrine of inspiration demands it, for each Evangelist was led by God to utilize sources in the production of a Gospel. Moreover, they were given the freedom by God to omit, expand and highlight these traditions in order to bring out individual nuances peculiar to their own Gospel. Nothing else can explain the differing messages of the same stories as told in the various Gospels. There is no necessity to theorize wholesale creation of stories, nor to assert that these nuances were not in keeping with the original Gospels. Here a judicious harmonizing approach like that espoused by C. Blomberg is valuable. In short, redaction criticism has enabled us to rediscover the Evangelists as inspired authors and to understand their books for the first time as truly Gospels; not just biographical accounts but history with a message. They did not merely chronicle events but interpreted them and produced historical sermons.
Until redaction criticism arose, Christians tended to turn to the epistles for theology. Now we know that the Gospels are not only theological but in some ways communicate a theology even more relevant than the epistles, because these truths are presented not through didactic literature but by means of the living relationships reflected in narrative. The Gospels are "case-study" workbooks for theological truth, yielding not just theology taught but theology lived and modelled. Redactional study enables us to reconstruct with some precision the theology of each of the Evangelists by noting how they utilized their sources and then by discovering patterns in the changes which exemplify themes developed through the Gospels. The whole (tradition, redaction and compositional development) interact together to produce the inspired message of each Evangelist.

In this way the reader understands the twofold purpose of the Gospels: to present the life and teachings of the historical Jesus (the historical component) in such a way as to address the church and the world (the kerygmatic component). History and theology are valid aspects of Gospel analysis, and we dare not neglect either without destroying the God-ordained purpose of the Gospels. While redaction criticism as a discipline centers on the theological aspect, it does not ignore the historical nature of the Gospels.

Finally, redaction criticism is a preaching and not just an academic tool. The Gospels were originally contextualizations of the life and teaching of Jesus for the reading and listening audiences of the Evangelists' time. They were biographical sermons (one aspea of the meaning of the term "Gospel") applying Jesus' impact on his disciples, the crowds (see People, Crowd) and the Jewish leaders to first-century readers and listeners. This is perhaps the best use of life-situation approaches, for they show how Matthew or Luke addressed problems in their communities and demonstrate how they can address similar problems in our churches.

REPENTANCE

Repentance in the Gospels refers to the radical "turning away" from anything which hinders one's wholehearted trust in God.* As such, the notion of "turning to" God in love* and obedience is most often included.
1. Jewish Conceptual Background

The English words repentance and repent are used mainly to translate the Greek words metanoia and metanoeō in the NT. Etymology suggests the meaning "a change of mind or thinking," a sense which is encountered frequently in the LXX. In the Gospels, however, the force of the concept goes far beyond the etymological suggestion.

1.1. OT Background. The concept finds its roots in the OT, expressed especially by the verb sûb. Though sûb is frequently used in more literal senses, it often implies a metaphorical "turning," describing the actions of both God and people. For example, in Exodus 32:12 Moses beseeches God to "turn from" his anger against his people (cf. Josh 7:26; 2 Kings 23:26) and consequently from the disciplinary actions which would have ensued. More relevant to the Gospel usage are those instances when it is used to describe the "turning" of people away from sin. Thus, Solomon prays to God that he will respond in forgiveness* and graciousness when the people "turn" from their sin and pray (1 Kings 8:35). Conversely, Jeremiah pronounces God's Judgment on Judah because they did not "turn from" their sinful ways (Jer 15:7; cf. 18:8; Is 59:20; Ezek 3:19; 13:22; 1 Kings 13:33). Implicit within this prophetic call to "turn from" sin is a corresponding "turning to" God. Accordingly, Hosea exhorts the people to "return" to the Lord after acknowledging their guilt (Hos 6:1; cf. 7:10; Is 10:21; Jer 3:7; Amos 4:6; 1 Kings 8:33, 48). Such a "turning to" assumes a vital trust in God (cf. Jer 3:22-23; Hos 14:4-5; Is 30:15 sûbā), as well as renewed obedience to him (Jer 26:3-5).

1.2. Septuagint. While sûb is translated in the LXX mainly by the Greek epistrephō and apostrephō, metanoēō is employed by the translators almost exclusively to express the niphal Hebrew verb niham. The noun metanoia does not occur except in Proverbs 14:15, which is neither a translation of the extant Hebrew text nor relevant to Gospel usage. Among other meanings, niham often merely expresses the notion of "relenting" from one's actions, whether that be action not yet taken or already in process. Thus, in Jonah 3:9 the king of Nineveh calls for a fast in the hope that God would "relent" from the fierce judgment which he had threatened to bring upon the city (cf. also Jon 4:2; Jer 4:28; 18:8, 10; Joel 2:14; Amos 7:3, 5; Zech 8:14). More important are those few instances where niham approaches a meaning synonymous with sûḇ in expressing the "turning away" of people from their sin. Thus, the Lord indicts the people of Judah for not "naming away" from their wickedness (Jer 8:6). In Jeremiah 38:19 (MT 31:19) God describes the coming restoration of his people who then will have "repented" in shame after being chastised by God. Once again, the idea is a renouncing of the sinful past and an inevitable renewal of a relationship with God.

1.3. Other Jewish Literature. Throughout Jewish literature the predominant sense of "repentance" is this narrower, ethical and spiritual sense of "turning". In Sirach 17:24 God is said to give "a return" to those who repent which is filled out in 17:25-26 as a "turning from" sin and a "returning to" God (cf. also Sir 48:15; Wis 11:23; 12:10, 19; Pr Man 13-15; T. Zeb. 9:7). The results of repentance are forgiveness and salvation* (e.g., Sib. Or. 1:128; Pr Man 7; T. Gad 5:7; 7:5; 1 Enoch 40:9; b. Sank 97b), and a renewed obedience to God and love for one's neighbor (e.g., T. Sim. 2:13; T. Gad 5:7; 6:3; T. Asher 1:6; 2 Apoc. Bar. 84:1-10; cf. also 1QS 5:8; 10:20; 1QH 2:9). God is often understood to be the giver of repentance (Wis 12:19; b. Sank 107b; Sib. Or. 4:168), or at least providing the opportunity for it (Wis 11:23; 12:10; Sir 48:14-15; Ep. Arist. 188). It is also occasionally perceived to be the achievement of hu-mans (Midr. Ps. 32), often taking the form of ritualistic fasting and lamentation (e.g., T. Reub. 1:9; 7 Jud. 15:4; b. Sank 37a). Though many sins are atoned for by means of repentance alone (cf. b. Qidd 40b; b. Sank 7a; b. Sabb. 32a), some require an accompanying sacrifice (e.g., m. Yoma 8:8-9; b. Hor. 2a; b. Sebu. 12b). Throughout the universality of its demand is acknowledged (cf. b. Sabb 153a; Sir 44:16; Wis 11:23; Sib. Or. 1:128).

2. Repentance in John the Baptist and Jesus.

This same, narrower conception of repentance is carried into the Gospels, where it is used by John the Baptist (see John the Baptist), Jesus and the Gospel writers to express the "turning away" of people from their sinful ways, along with the corresponding "turning to" God.

2.1. The Message of John the Baptist. John's call to repentance derives from his conviction that the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) had drawn near (Mt 3:2). Therefore, the time of fulfillment had arrived (Mt 3:3 par. Lk 3:4-6), bringing with it the certain expectation of divine judgment* (Mt 3:7, 10 par. Lk 3:7, 9). This perspective is not surprising, given the wealth of similar expectations in antecedent and contemporary Jewish literature (e.g., 2 Apoc. Bar. 30:1-5; 54:21; 72:1-6; 4 Ezra 7:113-15; 1 Enoch 53:1-54:6; 60:5-6; 62:1-12; 91:7-9; 100:4; Apoc. Abr. 31:1-8). Accordingly, John fulfilled his prophetic (see Elijah and Elisha) and preparatory role by calling Israel* out to the wilderness (see Mountain and Wilderness) to repent, reminiscent of the beginning of the nation's relationship with God. For only by radical repentance, sealed and symbolized graphically by baptism,* would Israel be prepared to meet its judge (see Meyer 115-22). Thus, John summoned Israel to what Goppelt terms "eschatological repentance." Only those who respond in this way obtain forgiveness of sins (Mk 1:4 par. Lk 3:3) and can anticipate being "harvested" by the "one coming after him" (Mt 3:12 par. Lk 3:17). Those who reject his message are left only with the gloomy expectation of imminent divine reprisal (Mt 3:7,10-12 par. Lk 3:7,9,16-17).

Significantly, John's summons is universal, ignoring both societal and religious status. Accordingly, the religious elite (Mt 3:7-10 par. Lk 3:7-9), "the crowds" (Lk 3:10-11; set People, Crowd) and even such blatant "sinners"* as the tax collectors (Lk 3:13; see Taxes) are addressed with the same, sweeping demand. For each, repentance involves the acknowledgment of one's sinfulness (Mk 1:5 par. Mt 3:6) as well as a new and holy pattern of daily behavior in relation to others (Mt 3:8 par. Lk 3:8; Lk 3:10-14). Thus it is clear that repentance for John does not simply consist in a "change of mind," but in a transformation of the entire person (Mt 3:10 par. Lk 3:9). It is in this sense that one can speak of repentance with the language of conversion.

2.2. The Message of Jesus.

2.2.1. Terminology and Importance. The full meaning of Jesus' use of the concept cannot be exhausted by means of a word study. Actually, the words are found on the lips of Jesus in a limited number of Gospel texts (cf. Mk 1:15 par. Mt 4:17; Mt 11:21 par. Lk 10:13; Mt 12:41 par. Lk 11:32; Lk 5:32; 13:3, 5; 15:7, 10; 16:30;17:3-4; 24:47), some of which are clearly redactional (e.g., Lk 5:32; cf. Mk 2:17 par. Mt 9:13; cf. also Mt 11:20; Mk 6:12). The words are completely absent from the Fourth Gospel, although the concept is present.

It is this apparent paucity of evidence that has led E. P. Sanders to argue that Jesus' preaching did not call for a national repentance in view of the coming kingdom. Sanders supports this by questioning the authenticity of virtually all of the passages in the Gospels in which the actual words metanoia/metanoeō are used in reference to Jesus' preaching. Rather, the presence of such elements are the result of redaction, motivated by a perceived lack of emphasis on "repentance" in Jesus' message. Though Sanders admits that Jesus did "believe in" repentance and turning to God, this was only on an individual basis, and even this is largely muted in Sanders's construal. In addition he maintains that the primary offense of Jesus' actions stemmed from his variant conception of repentance which did not provide for sacrifice and restitution. Indeed, it was this very thing which precipitated the condemnation of Jesus as the "friend of sinners"; in his opponents' evaluation, several of Jesus' friends remained "sinners" even after Jesus accepted them in the name of the kingdom. If Sanders is correct not only is the relative importance of repentance in Jesus' proclamation greatly reduced, but the meaning of repentance for Jesus becomes innovative rather than rooted in his Jewish heritage.

Several points must be raised in opposition to Sanders. In the first place Chilton observes that such a parable* as the "lost sheep" (Mt 18:12-14 par. Lk 15:4-7) presents a corporate image of Israel in the form of the "flock" and God as its "shepherd" (see Shepherd, Sheep). Given the collective image, to distinguish here between "national" and "individual" repentance is illegitimate. Moreover, other passages directly imply a universal and national summons (e.g., Mt 11:20-24 par. Lk 10:12-15; Lk 13:1-5; Mt 12:39-42 par. Lk 11:29-32), although Sanders questions their authenticity. Furthermore, though the words themselves may not often appear in the text, radical renunciation (e.g., Mt 13:44-46) and transformation (e.g., Mk 10:15 par. Mt 18:3 and Lk 18:17) are repeatedly called for by Jesus in those who will enter the kingdom. Jesus' words are most often occasional in that they were addressed to particular hearers rather than to the nation as a whole. But the fact that Jesus expected individuals from several societal groups to respond in repentance strongly implies that his call was intended to be universal. Such is also evidenced indirectly by the centrality of repentance in the message of the commissioned disciples* (Mk 6:12).

To reject this and other editorial summary statements (e.g., Mk 1:15; Mt 4:17) demands the assumption that everything interpretive in the Gospels is hopelessly biased according to the Gospel writers rather than indicative of Jesus' influence on them (see Chilton). Finally, Jesus' emphasis on repentance, without the corresponding emphasis on the cultic expression, finds precedence in the great preachers of the OT (e.g., Mt 9:13; 12:7; cf. Hos 6:6; Mic 6:6-8). To imply that Jesus' conception of repentance was in some way innovative does not take this motif seriously.

Thus, in spite of the relative paucity of explicit repentance-language in Jesus' teachings, it is accurately understood by the Evangelists as a collective term summarizing what Jesus wanted people to do (Mk 1:15 par. Mt 4:17). Accordingly, such concepts as "being poor" (Mt 5:3; see Rich and Poor), "becoming as a little child" (e.g., Mk 10:14-15 par. Lk 18:16-17 and Mt 19:4; 18:3; see Children), "following in discipleship*" (e.g., Mk 8:34 par. Mt 16:24 and Lk 9:23) and simply "believing" (Mk 1:15; Mt 21:32; see Faith) are closely aligned with it.

2.2.2. Repentance As Demand. Consistent with John, Jesus perceived repentance to be a complete "turning away" from one's sinful way of life. In addition to blatant sins (e.g., Lk 7:47; 19:8-10), this includes anything or any attitude which prevents an appropriate posture before God. The urgency and totality of this demand is demonstrated most clearly in the drastic images he uses (e.g., Mk 9:43-48 par. Mt 5:29-30; 18:8-9; cf. Mt 7:13-4). Thus, anything that offends or hinders one's relationship with the Father is to be parted with.

Jesus' demand for repentance is frequently directed toward one's love of wealth and possessions (cf. Lk 14:33; Mt 6:24 par. Lk 16:13). In Luke 6:24 Jesus pronounces judgment on those who have received "their comfort"; those whose sole desire is to enjoy the comforts that wealth brings. Such is also the point of the condemnation against the rich man who languished in hades (Lk 16:25); again, he had received his "good things," thinking that by them he could live. Even the "righteous" wealthy are indicted (Mk 10:17-22 par. Mt 19:16-22 and Lk 18:18-23), who, in spite of their relatively righteous lives, treasure their wealth above God. For the rich and anyone who seeks to establish life's security apart from trust in God this is ultimately a call to repentance, for it involves a "turning away" and a "letting go" of former supports to existence. Rather than presumption on God, the rich are to allow themselves to become "poor" and to be granted entrance into the kingdom (Lk 12:32; cf. Mk 10:27; see Goppelt).

As did the Baptist before him, Jesus did not spare the apparently "righteous." Having established their righteousness in relation to the Law,* they were impugned by means of the Law. With great vigor they applied themselves to the observance of legal minutiae, but in the process they had both neglected and transgressed the very Law they revered (e.g., Mt 23:23 par. Lk 11:42; Mt 23:16-22; Mk 7:1-13 par. Mt 15:1-9). Moreover, their conscientious observance is revealed ultimately to be in their own self-interest (Mk 12:38-40 par. Mt 23:5-7, 14 and Lk 20:4647; cf. Mt 6:1-6, 16-18; Lk 15:28-30). Thus, Jesus' condemnation is a call to repent and to return to the Lord of the Law.

In the OT repentance always implied a renewal of one's relationship to God. Now, because God's kingdom is present in Jesus, discipleship naturally becomes the positive counterpart to repentance. Therefore, in favor of a wholehearted devotion to himself, Jesus calls for a renunciation of the primary importance of all other relationships (Mt 10:34-39 par. Lk 12:51-53 and 14:25-27; cf. Mk 3:31-5 par. Mt 12:46-50 and Lk 8:19-21). This extends ultimately to the love of one's own life (Mk 8:34-37 par. Mt 16:24-26 and Lk 9:23-25; cf. Jn 12:25). Anyone who would deny Jesus before the world is therefore not worthy of him (Mt 10:32-33 par. Lk 12:8-9).

2.2.3. Repentance As Response to the Kingdom. Again, like John the Baptist Jesus indissolubly unites his call for repentance with the nearness of the kingdom of God (Mk 1:15 par. Mt 4:17; cf. Mt 3:2). They differ, however, in the emphases they give to the kingdom's coming. While John highlights judgment, Jesus heralds the salvific opportunity, perceiving it to be the "day of salvation." Though judgment is retained in Jesus' proclamation (e.g., Lk 13:1-5; cf. Mt 11:22-24 par. Lk 10:14-15; Mt 12:36, 41-42 par. Lk 11:31-32; Mt 24:40-41 par. Lk 17:34-35), it is no longer foremost as it is in John's. This not only gives rise to a major difference in their conduct (Mt 11:18-19 par. Lk 7:33-34), it also alters the primary motivation that each gives for the repentance that is sought; for John, it is the fear of impending judgment, while for Jesus it is the gracious goodness of God.

Crucial to this discussion is the understanding that with Jesus, the kingdom had not only "drawn near" (engiken), it had in some sense arrived (ephthasen; cf. Mt 12:28 par. Lk 11:20), albeit in an "inaugurated manner" (cf. Mk 4:26-29; Mk 4:30-32 par. Mt 13:31-32 and Lk 13:18-19; Mt 13:24-30; Mt 13:33 par. Lk 13:20-21). Therefore, the entire public ministry of Jesus reveals the kingdom, giving rise to his emphasis on its salvific character. Until the time of the judgment the power (see Authority and Power) of the kingdom is present and efficacious to liberate people (Mk 3:27 par. Mt 12:29 and Lk 11:21-22). Thus, though the demand for repentance is unchanged, the divine initiative is understood to be antecedent to its realization. Those who remain unrepentant place themselves under the judgment of God (Mt 12:39-42; Mt 11:20-24 par. Lk 10:12-15; Lk 13:1-5). Conversely, forgiveness and salvation* come (e.g., Lk 7:36-50; 19:9) to those who repent and thereby enter the kingdom (e.g., Mk 9:45).

The focus on the divine initiative is evident most of all in Jesus' ministry among "the sinners," a group comprised of at least the tax collectors (Mk 2:14-17 par. Mt 9:9-11 and Lk 5:27-30; Mt 5:46 par. Lk 6:32; Lk 18:13; 19:7; Mt 11:19 par. Lk 7:34), the harlots (Lk 7:37, 39; see Prostitute) and possibly the Gentiles* (Lk 6:32-34 [cf. Mt 5:47]; Mk 14:41 par. Mt 26:45). Considering the manifest contempt for such individuals in that society, it is striking to find Jesus frequently in their company (Lk 19:1-10; Mt 2:13-17 par. Mt 9:9-13 and Lk 5:27-32; Lk 7:37-50) so often that he is despised as a "friend of sinners" (Mt 11:19 par. Lk 7:34; cf. Lk 15:1-2). Clearly, this activity greatly disturbed the religious leaders, though scholars are presently in much disagreement over the exact nature of the offense (e.g., Mk 2:16 par. Mt 9:11 and Lk 5:30; Lk 19:7; see Sanders, Jeremias, Goppelt, Chilton). What is understood, and most relevant to the topic at hand, is that by means of this shocking and yet parabolic action (Mt 8:11 par. Lk 13:29; Mt 22:1-14 par. Lk 14:15-24; Mt 18:12-14 par. Lk 15:1-7; Lk 15:8-10,11-32; 19:9) Jesus declared what he was about; he had come to seek out the lost (Lk 19:10; 15:4-32) and to heal the sick (Mk 2:17 par. Mt 9:12 and Lk 5:31; see Healing).

There was nothing inherent in this group that caused them to be singled out by Jesus except for their obvious need. By reaching out to them in this way, Jesus dramatized the free grace of God which confronts humanity precisely in its bankrupt predicament. In this way he confronts every person with this reality, not just the notorious "sinner," and thereby moves them toward repentance. Those who recoil in contempt demonstrate by their actions that they do not see how needy they are (Lk 7:39-47; 15:25-30; cf. Mt 21:31), thereby disqualifying themselves from the kingdom (Mt 8:12). Those who respond in repentance are "found" (Lk 15:5-7, 9-10, 32). It is for this reason that repentance in Jesus' ministry can be understood as a response to God's goodness. The paradigm of the one who enters the kingdom is the dependent child who freely receives (Mt 18:34; Mk 10:14-15 par. Mt 19:14 and Lk 18:16-17; cf.Jn 3:3, 5). Understood in this way, the event of repentance is often characterized by rejoicing and celebration (e.g., Mt 13:44; 22:1-10; Mk 2:14-15 par. Mt 9:9-10 and Lk 5:27-29; 19:6, 8; cf. also God's joy* expressed in Lk 15:6-7, 10, 22-24, 32), though connotations of mourning and regret are appropriately still found (cf. Lk 7:37-50; 15:17-20; 18:13-14; see Meyer, Jeremias).

3. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers.

3.1. Mark. Mark explicitly mentions repentance only three times, but he does so in passages which serve to centralize the concept in the messages of the primary figures in the Gospel. In Mark 1:4 repentance is linked with John's baptism for the forgiveness of sins. Jesus picks up this theme of repentance in Mark 1:15, uniting it with faith as the appropriate responses to the nearness of the kingdom. Finally, in Mark 6:12 repentance is mentioned as the content of the disciples' message. Thus, repentance can describe the entire conversion process, but Mark 1:15 reminds us that its positive counterpart is faith.

3.2. Matthew. Matthew, too, centralizes the concept, redacting the tradition at Matthew 4:17 to make the summary of Jesus' preaching identical to that of the Baptist, whose ministry reflects the prophetic tradition (see Prophets, Prophecy) that summoned Israel to repentance (cf. Mt 3:2). This is further buttressed by the comparison Jesus makes between himself and Jonah, the great preacher of repentance (Mt 12:38-41; see Sign of Jonah). As does Luke, Matthew identifies repentance as the goal of Jesus' ministry (Mt 11:20-24). He is the only Evangelist who employs the verb metamelomai as a synonym for metanoeo to describe the response of the tax collectors and harlots to the preaching of John the Baptist (Mt 21:29, 32). However, the use of the same word in Matthew -27:3, in reference to Judas' regret following his betrayal of Jesus, does not carry the same spiritual/ethical force.

3.3. Luke. Luke places greater stress on repentance (metanoeo 9 x; metanoia 5 x) than the other Evangelists, though the meaning remains the same throughout. He alone provides the ethical teachings that flesh out John's summons to repentance (Lk 3:10-14; see Ethics of Jesus). In Luke 5:32, he makes the call to the sinners explicitly one unto repentance (cf. Mk 2:17; Mt 9:13), making it possible that the explanatory notes concluding the parables of the lost sheep (Lk 15:7) and the lost coin (Lk 15:10) are also Lukan explanatory redaction. He alone preserves the record of events which Jesus employs as an occasion to call for national repentance (Lk 13:3, 5), as well as other explicit references to the need for repentance (Lk 16:30; 17:3-4). Finally, he highlights the place of repentance in the message of the commissioned disciples (Lk 24:47; this is continued on in Acts; e.g., 2:37-39; 3:19; 5:31; 11:18; 17:30; 20:21; 26:20).
Fitzmyer maintains that Luke conceives of repentance, metanoeō, as the negative counterpart to the positive epistrephō, the latter expressing the "turning to God" aspect of conversion (cf. esp. Acts 9:35; 11:21; 14:15; 15:19; 26:18; 28:27). But in the Gospel alone epistrephō is used only three or four times with this spiritual sense (i.e., Lk 1:16-17; 22:32; and possibly 17:4), and it appears with metanoeō only at Luke 17:4 where it relates to human relations. Conversely, Luke frequently employs metanoia/metanoeō to summarize the conversion event, which implies the establishment of a relationship to God (cf. Lk 5:32; 10:13; 11:32; 13:3, 5; 15:7, 10; 16:30; 24:47). Thus, epistrephō can function as a synonym for metanoeō (Lk 1:16-17), or it can emphasize the notion of "turning to God" (e.g., Acts 26:18-20). But, similar to the Hebrew sûb, which often carries the sense of "return," metanoeō can and does express the latter notion by itself.

RESURRECTION

Jesus assumed and taught an eschatological (see Eschatology) doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, an event whereby the ungodly would be delivered to judgment* and the godly receive eternal life.* Moreover, Jesus performed miracles* of resuscitation and, as he predicted, was himself raised from the dead. Both categories of events are regarded by the Gospel writers as eschatologically significant. But whereas the individuals Jesus raised from the dead were, technically speaking, resuscitated and would once again face death, the resurrection of Jesus from the dead was an event of cosmic consequence. Each of the Gospel writers portrays this event in a distinctive way, each developing their own themes and yet together affirming the reality of the empty tomb and risen Christ, and the eschatological significance of this unique event in the mission of Jesus.

1. Pre-Christian Antecedents
2. Resurrection and Afterlife in the Sayings of Jesus
3. Miracles of Raising the Dead
4. Jesus' Resurrection in the Four Gospels

1. Pre-Christian Antecedents.

1.1. Resurrection in the OT. Evidence from the Hebrew Scriptures indicates that Israel* did not dwell on the question of the afterlife until late in the OT period. Rather, they stressed the involvement of Yahweh in this life. The blessing of the righteous and punishment of the wicked were seen as taking place in the present age. Life and death were also related primarily to this life.

This does not mean that Israelites believed in annihilation after death. The OT maintains that in one sense death is the cessation of life—at death a person returns to the "dust" (Gen 3:19; Ps 90:3). In another sense it is not the absolute end of life, for existence continues—at death the person descends to Sheol (še'ôl), a term at times synonymous with "death" (Gen 42:38; Ps 89:48), the "grave" (Gen 37:35; Is 14:11) or the "netherworld" (Ezek 32:21; perhaps Ps 86:13). In some cases the dead are said to dwell in Sheol as repâîm, or "shades" (Job 26:5; Ps 88:10; Prov 9:18; Is 26:14)—possibly either a shadowy, wraith-like existence or a synonym for "the dead" (Ugaritic parallels favor the former). These references to repâîm and Sheol suggest a burgeoning view of the afterlife.

But while the OT does not give explicit witness to an early belief in existence after death, neither does it deny it. Moreover, two figures were "taken up" to be with God and do not experience death—Enoch (Gen 5:24) and Elijah (2 Kings 2:9-11; see Elijah and Elisha). While these narratives do not theologically reflect on the implications of these events (we read that Enoch "was no more, for God took him"), later Judaism* (cf. Heb 11:5) interpreted this as an "assumption" to eternal life. The incident in 1 Samuel 28:1-25, where Saul attempts to consult Samuel through the medium of Endor, provides further evidence for popular belief that death was not the end of existence.

Several OT statements affirm resurrection in the sense of a corporate preservation rather than individual afterlife. For instance, Hosea 6:1-3 states, "After two days he will revive us; on the third day he will restore us, that we may live in his presence." Similarly, Hosea 13:14 promises, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death" (cf. RSV). In both cases the redemption of Israel from exile is envisaged in terms of deliverance from death (exile) to life (national restoration). In the same way Ezekiel's famous vision of the dry bones coming to life (37:1-14) depicts the national reconstitution of Israel. Other passages are often used as evidence of a resurrection hope but seem to refer to rescue from life-threatening situations (Deut 32:39; 1 Sam 2:6).

The basic question is stated in Job 14:14, "If mortals die, will they live again?" A tentative answer is given in Job's response to Bildad in 19:25-27, "I know that my Redeemer (gôêl) lives, and that in the end he will stand upon the earth. And after my skin has been destroyed, yet in my flesh I will see God." It is likely that the "redeemer" is God and that the time of deliverance is after death, thereby constituting a confession of belief in life after death.

The Psalms contain many similar statements. In Psalm 49:15 clearly and in Psalms 16:10 and 73:24 implicitly, a belief in resurrection is apparent, though without any speculation regarding the form the afterlife will take. As G. E. Ladd put it, the hope is based on confidence in God's power over death, not on a view of something immortal in man. The Psalmists do not reflect on what part of man survives death—his soul or spirit; nor is there any reflection on the nature of life after death. There is merely the confidence that even death cannot destroy the reality of fellowship with the living God. (Ladd, 47)

The prophets provide additional testimony to a resurrection faith. In the so-called Isaiah Apocalypse (24:1—27:13) there are two statements, 25:8 and 26:19. The former says that Yahweh will "swallow up death forever" and is used by Paul of the resurrection (1 Cor 15:54). This leads to the affirmation of 26:19, "But your dead will live, their bodies will rise. You who dwell in the dust, wake up and shout for joy." However, this resurrection is restricted to God's people. The next two verses (26:20-21) speak of God's wrath upon "the people of the earth" but mention no resurrection to judgment. Less certain is Isaiah 53:10, which asserts that the Servant of Yahweh (see Servant of Yahweh), after being "assigned a grave with the wicked" (53:9), will "see his offspring and prolong his days." Most agree that "prolong his days" refers to eternal life, but there is disagreement as to whether the song refers to an individual or corporate figure, the nation or the remnant.

The resurrection faith attested in the prophets climaxes in Daniel 12:1-3, 13. Here the first complete statement of a resurrection of the just and the unjust appears: "Multitudes who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake; some to everlasting life, others to shame and everlasting contempt" (12:2). There is some question whether "many" is restricted to Israel or the righteous remnant ("many among those who sleep") or refers to a general resurrection ("many, namely those who sleep"). Verse 13 adds the promise that "at the end of your days you will rise to receive your allotted inheritance."

In conclusion, the OT stresses the presence of God in the daily affairs of this life and tends thereby to ignore the larger issue of life after death. Nevertheless, it is not entirely silent, and several passages demonstrate that at a later period in Israel's history a belief in resurrection became more explicit. Two emphases emerge: (1) a close connection between the corporate and individual aspect of resurrection (i.e., national restoration and individual resurrection) and (2) a link between ethics and eschatology (i.e., resurrection is associated with reward and punishment).

1.2. Intertestamental Developments. While intertestamental Jewish literature witnesses to a great deal more speculation regarding the afterlife, there is clearly no uniformity in the views expressed. Ladd explains that this was due in part to the emphasis in Judaism upon Torah and orthopraxy (correct practice) rather than orthodoxy (correct doctrine) (Ladd, 52).

Indeed, like the Sadducees of Jesus' day (see Josephus Ant. 18.1.4 §16 as well as Acts 4:1-2; 23:8), some Jews did not believe in a resurrection. Jesus ben Sirach wrote in his first book that at death the person abides in Sheol, a place of unending sleep (Sir 30:17; 46:19) and silence (Sir 17:27-28); and immortality is restricted to the nation and the person's good name (Sir 37:26; 39:9; 44:8-15).

Other texts show the influence of Hellenism,* speaking of the afterlife in terms of immortality without linking it to a physical resurrection. 4 Maccabees, in describing the same seven martyrs mentioned in 2 Maccabees, seemingly substitutes an immortality of the soul where 2 Maccabees spoke of a physical resurrection (cf. 4 Macc 10:15 with 2 Macc 7:14; cf. also 4 Macc 9:22; 16:13; 18:23). Likewise, Wisdom of Solomon speaks of the righteous finding peace* (3:1-4) and an incorruptible existence (2:23-24; cf. 5:5; 6:19; and Philo Op. Mund. 135; Gig. 14). In the last book of Enoch (1 Enoch 91—104; notice that the five books contain quite variant views on this topic) there is language that at first glance seems to suggest a physical resurrection (e.g., 1 Enoch 92:3-5; 104:2, 4), but in 103:4 we learn that it is their "spirits" that will "live and rejoice" and will "not perish."

Of those texts which do speak of a resurrection, some restrict it to Israel or "the saints" (1 Enoch 22:13; 46:6; 51:1-2; Pss. Sol. 3:11-16; 13:9-11; 14:4-10; 15:12-15), while several from the first century and later attest to belief in the resurrection of the righteous and the wicked (4 Ezra 4:41-43; 7:32-38 cf. T. Benj. 10:6-9; 2 Apoc. Bar. 49:2—51:12; 85:13). While the possibility of some Christian influence and interpolation cannot be discounted, the resurrection of the righteous and the wicked is itself essentially Jewish, reflecting the eschatology of Daniel 12:2-3. Finally, an extremely literalistic concept of bodily resurrection can be found in 2 Maccabees, which speaks not only of the raising of the body but even the restoration of missing limbs or other body parts (7:10-11; 14:46). Similarly, the Sibylline Oracles states that the resurrection body will be fashioned exactly after the earthly body (4:176-82).

Clearly, intertestamental Judaism showed a much greater interest than does the Hebrew Bible in the question of the afterlife, with interest centering on the theme of God vindicating his people. In addition, a variety of viewpoints emerged. This variety is reflected in the beliefs of the various parties or sects within the Judaism of Jesus' time. The Sadducees rejected any idea of an afterlife (Acts 23:8; 26:8; Josephus Ant. 18.14; b. Sanh. 90b). The Pharisees* taught a resurrection and eternal reward for Israel in the age to come, excluding only apostates (Acts 23:6-8; b. Sanh. 90b; b. Ketub. 111b). The Essene view on the matter was not clear, as exemplified in the Qumran scrolls (see Dead Sea Scrolls). Josephus* asserts that they held to the immortality of the soul (Josephus J.W. 8.1.2 §11), but many scholars maintain that statements referring to the habitation of the faithful with the angels* (1QS 2:25; 1QH 3:19-23; 11:10-14) should be understood as the sectarians' experience in this life rather than an eschatological hope.
2. Resurrection and Afterlife in the Sayings of Jesus.

Jesus followed in the tradition extending from Daniel to the Pharisees, teaching that there would be a twofold resurrection: the righteous to reward and the wicked to judgment. While a full tradition-critical study (see Tradition Criticism) is beyond the scope of this article, it is helpful to view the relevant teaching of Jesus from a source-critical perspective (see Synoptic Problem).

2.1. Sayings of the Triple Tradition. The clearest discussion of resurrection in Jesus' teaching can be found in the triple-tradition story of his controversy with the Sadducees (Mk 12:18-27 par. Mt 22:23-33 and Lk 20:27-38). Even those who maintain that the final form is a later catechetical elaboration accept the first pronouncement ("become like angels") as authentic. Luke in particular stresses the contrast between the "people of this age" and those "worthy of taking part in that age and in the resurrection from the dead" (Lk 20:34-35), a distinct reference to eschatological views of an afterlife. Yet the major question is the significance of the phrase "like the angels in heaven." Some conclude from this that Jesus believed in a spiritual rather than physical resurrection or that he had a view, like some within Judaism, that in heaven there would be no consciousness of prior existence. However, this reads more into the passage than is intended, since the phrase is contrasting marriage on earth with marriage in heaven rather than teaching the state of the resurrection body.

Sayings on reward and judgment also appear in the triple tradition. The query of the wealthy young man in Mark 10:17 (par. Mt 19:16 and Lk 18:18), "What must I do to inherit eternal life?" is often understood as a desire to "enter the kingdom" in its realized presence (see Kingdom of God). While this is certainly part of the meaning, it does not exhaust its thrust. Jesus' final statement in Mark 10:30 (par. Mt 19:29 and Lk 18:30), "and in the age to come eternal life," forms an inclusio with the young man's question and clearly refers to the afterlife. There is both a present and future connotation in "eternal life" in 10:17, 30 and parallels. The other side, resurrection to judgment is found in the Gehenna warning of Mark 9:43, 45, 47 (par. Mt 18:8-9; omitted in Luke). Using successive metaphors of the hand, foot and eye, Jesus exhorts the disciples* to disciplined resistance against temptation, lest one (Mark and Matthew both stress the singular "you") be cast into "hell, where the fire never goes out" (9:43; cf. Matthew's "eternal fire," 18:8).

2.2. The Passion Predictions. The best-known tradition is the threefold passion prediction of Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34 and parallels (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). Many interpreters have understood these as vaticinimum ex eventu (prophecies written after the event), but the absence of the type of theological elaboration found in the creeds (e.g., "for our sins," "according to the scriptures" and the exaltation theme) makes it more likely that these are indeed historical reminiscences. The one constant in all three accounts is Jesus' prediction that "three days after" his death he would be vindicated by resurrection. The third-day theme (cf. 1 Cor 15:4) may reflect Hosea 6:2 ("on the third day he will raise us"), a more general allusion to the OT theme of the third day as a day of deliverance (cf. Gen 22:4; 42:17-18; Is 2:16; Jon 2:1), or more simply a reference on Jesus' part to a brief period of time.

Added to these direct predictions are the numerous parallel passages where Jesus presumes his future resurrection, such as: Mark 9:9 (tell no one of the Transfiguration* "until the Son of Man has risen from the dead"); Mark 12:10-11 ("the stone the builders rejected has become the capstone"); Mark 13:26 ("the Son of man coming in clouds with great power and glory"); Mark 14:25 ("when I drink it [the eschatological cup] anew in the kingdom of God"); Mark 14:28 ("after I have arisen I will go before you into Galilee") and Mark 14:62 ("you will see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One and coming on the clouds of heaven" [see Son of Man]).

One of the most remarkable prophecies of Jesus is not found in Luke but is recorded indirectly in Mark (14:58; 15:29) and a Matthean parallel (26:61; 27:40) and directly in John 2:19: "Destroy this temple, and I will raise it again in three days." John 2:21-22 explains that this direct prophecy of physical resurrection was not understood by the disciples until after the resurrection itself (ironically, the chief priests and Pharisees, according to Mt 27:63, correctly interpreted this saying before the disciples did). In summation, according to the Gospels Jesus clearly expected to be vindicated by resurrection.

2.3. The Q Tradition. The Q* tradition contains similar teaching. The "sign of Jonah"* (Mt 12:39-42 par. Lk 11:29-32) is problematic because only Matthew spells out the sign as a cryptic reference to the resurrection ("the Son of man will be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth," 12:40). But it is just as likely that Luke has omitted the Q statement on resurrection (due to the difficulty of "three days and three nights" for his readers) as Matthew has added it.

There are also several Q passages on final reward and punishment, such as those found at the end of Matthew's Olivet Discourse (see Apocalyptic Teaching). At the end of the exhortation to watchfulness (Mt 24:40-44 par. Lk 17:34-37) we have three successive short parables* (men in the field, women grinding, two in a bed) demonstrating that "one will be taken, the other left." These form a severe warning regarding the sudden, unexpected separation at the Parousia (cf. Mt 24:44; cf. Lk 12:40) between those receiving salvation* and those doomed for judgment. This contrast is further emphasized in the parable of the good and wicked servants (Mt 24:45-51 par. Lk 12:41-46), in which the faithful servant is given a share in Jesus' future authority while the wicked servant will be "dismembered" (Lk 12:46) and placed with the unfaithful. Finally, Matthew 10:28 and Luke 12:5 add a further saying on Gehenna, that the disciple should fear not those who can kill the body but the one who "can destroy both soul and body in hell." These passages show that Jesus followed Daniel 12:2 regarding the resurrection of good and evil alike, one to vindication and the other to judgment.

2.4. The M and L Traditions. The source material peculiar to Matthew (M*) and Luke (L*) adds further data. In the M tradition judgment will be universal; both good and evil people will be accountable "on the day of judgment for every careless word they have spoken" (Mt 12:35-37). While evil or "careless" speech is stressed, the "acquittal" or "condemnation" (Mt 12:37) of all speech is in mind. Two further parables address the radical separation of believer from unbeliever at the last judgment. The parable of the weeds in Matthew 13:24-30, 36-43 teaches that only at "the end of the age" (Mt 13:43) will the wicked finally be separated from the good, the former headed for "the fiery furnace" and the latter for glory* (Mt 13:42-43). The parable of the sheep and the goats (also called "the judgment of the nations") has a similar theme but adds that the judgment will be determined also by the way the nations have treated God's people (the "least of these" of Mt 13:40, 45). The reward for the merciful will be "your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world" (Mt 13:34); the punishment for the merciless will be "the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Mt 13:41; see Demon, Devil, Satan).

Several L passages demonstrate the Lukan theme of the reversal of roles at the final resurrection. At the conclusion of the sayings on proper conduct at banquets (Lk 14:7-14), Jesus says that those who invite the poor (see Rich and Poor) and the crippled "will be repaid at the resurrection of the righteous" (Lk 14:14). While there may be no thanks in this life, God will vindicate good deeds at the eschaton. The key is a life of servanthood which seeks the lesser rather than the greater place (Lk 14:8-11) and is oriented to the dispossessed rather than the wealthy (Lk 14:12-14).

This theme is taken further in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus* in Luke 16:19-31. The rich man, who undoubtedly had a lavish earthly funeral, is described in terse clauses: "died and was buried and in Hades." The poor man, who seemingly is not buried at all, has exactly the opposite afterlife: "angels carried him to Abraham's side." There are two concurrent emphases in this parable: the reversal of roles at the final resurrection and the radical faith* demands of the kingdom message. Similar warnings of final judgment are addressed to the rich and to all disciples in Luke 3:7-14; 6:24-26 (cf. 1:51-53); 12:16-21, 32-34, 42-48; 16:8-9. The implications of this parable for a doctrine of the afterlife cannot be pressed too far. The picture of a compartmentalized "Hades" does not describe "the way it is" but is a feature of the parable probably derived from a popular Jewish conception of Sheol (see Heaven and Hell).

2.5. The Johannine Tradition. The Johannine tradition contains a few sayings which relate to the resurrection theology of Jesus and the early church. While the Fourth Gospel primarily sets forth a realized eschatology, a growing consensus of scholarship has detected a future eschatology within this characteristic Johannine matrix (see John, Gospel of). In John 5:28-29 Jesus speaks of the "coming time" when the dead will hear his voice and "come out—those who have done good will rise to live, and those who have done evil will rise to be condemned." The context centers on Jesus as the eschatological Judge in the present (Jn 5:19-24) and the future (Jn 5:25-30). Then in John 6:40, 44, 54—within a context emphasizing the united sovereignty of the Father and Son in the salvation process (cf. "will never die" in 11:25-26)—Jesus thrice repeats that he will "raise" the faithful "at the last day."

The other side is found in John 12:48, in which the unbeliever is warned that Jesus' words will "condemn him at the last day." Finally, Jesus promises in John 14:2-3 that he is "preparing a place" for his disciples and "will come back" to bring them to his side. Some have interpreted this of the Paraclete/Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) "coming back" as Jesus' representative, but the consensus is that this is a reference to the Parousia. Bultmann and others have long argued that these futuristic passages were added by a later redactor (see Redaction Criticism), and that realized passages like John 12:31 and 16:11 (the judgment "now" of the "prince of this world") are original. Yet there is no reason why the two cannot stand side-by-side, with present salvation and future promise interrelated.

Jesus' teaching fits into the ongoing tradition from Daniel through the Pharisees, attesting to the physical resurrection of God's people to reward and of the resurrection of the ungodly to final judgment.

3. Miracles of Raising the Dead.

Jesus affirmed his belief in resurrection not only by his words but also by his deeds. In one sense these are not true resurrections but miracles of resuscitation, for the recipients would still face death at a later date. However, in the Gospels they are treated as harbingers of Jesus' coming resurrection, proof of God's (and Jesus') control over the power of death.

3.1. Jairus's Daughter. The most fully attested miracle of resuscitation is the raising of Jairus' daughter. Found in the triple tradition (Mk 5:21-24, 35-43 par. Mt 9:18-19, 23-26 and Lk 8:40-42, 49-56), it is intertwined in all three accounts with the healing* of the woman with a hemorrhage. The movement from healing to resuscitation shows Jesus as lord over both chronic illness and death. The overriding concern is christological, seeking to demonstrate Jesus' lordship. That Jairus—a ruler or president of a synagogue and a man with great social and religious prestige—would prostrate himself before Jesus would be astonishing to a first-century reader and point to Jesus as a God-ordained prophet.

On the basis of Jesus' statement "She is not dead, but asleep," many interpreters have argued that this is a healing miracle. However, the details regarding the mourning of the relatives and professional mourners all point to the reality of the girl's death. Instead, Jesus' comment is a theological pointer to the miracle as an "awakening" from the dead. In all three Gospels this story is part of a complex of miracles (the stilling of the storm, the Gerasene demoniac) demonstrating the messianic authority* of Jesus over all earthly and heavenly powers. Even the ultimate power of death is conquered by him.

3.2. The Widow's Son. A second account is the Lukan tradition of Jesus raising the son of a widow of Nain (Lk 7:11-17). Recalling the similar raising of the widow's son by Elijah (1 Kings 17:8-24), this is also part of a section dealing with Jesus' prophetic ministry (note the healing of the centurion's son that precedes and the dialog regarding the Baptist that follows). The miracle concludes with expressions of awe and wonder which are anchored in the "rising" of a "great prophet" (see Prophet, Prophecy) and especially in the statement that "God has visited his people" (Lk 7:16), the latter echoing the language of Zechariah's Song (Lk 1:68, 78; see Zechariah's Song) and the Lukan theme of salvific deliverance. Jesus' power over life and death is vividly portrayed.

3.3. Lazarus. The raising of Lazarus* (Jn 11:1-44) is the concluding and most astounding sign-miracle of John's so-called Book of Signs (1:19—12:50). It also functions as a transition to the Book of Glory (13:1 — 20:31), with the plot of the Jewish leaders being clearly tied to this event (cf. 11:53; 12:17-19).

Of the so-called resurrection miracles the raising of Lazarus is most clearly connected with the question of the afterlife. This becomes evident in the dialog with Martha (11:20-26) and its connection to the Johannine theme of eternal life as resurrection (cf. 5:19-30). In John 11:21, 25, 28-29 Jesus demonstrates the presence of resurrection both now (the spiritual dead hear his voice and live, Jn 11:25) and in the future (those in the grave come forth, Jn 11:28-29). This is actualized in Lazarus—Jesus raises him as a clear foretaste of the final resurrection—and emphasized in the juxtaposition of Martha's confession ("I know he will rise again in the resurrection at the last day," Jn 11:24) and Jesus' bold claim ("I am the resurrection and the life," Jn 11:25). In fact, John 11:25 is the theological culmination of 5:21, "For just as the Father raises the dead and gives them life, even so the Son gives life to whom he is pleased to give it," Jesus is equated with the Father as the one who gives "resurrection and life," so uniting the Johannine themes of realized (raising the spiritually dead to life) and final (the resurrection at the last day) eschatology.

3.4. The Saints. Finally, the enigmatic raising of the saints in Matthew 27:51-53 provides a theological bridge from the cross to the empty tomb. In what is likely an allusion to Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones (37:1-14, esp. 13-14, "When I open your graves and bring you up from them . . . and you will live"), the brief story summarizes the effects of Jesus' death (judgment and the defeat of the powers of death; see Death of Jesus) and resurrection (the raising of the dead saints and their appearance in the holy city). Thus Jesus' passion and resurrection are inextricably linked as a single event in salvation-history, and the effect upon the raising and uniting of the true "saints" of God, both past and future, is guaranteed by this supernatural deed.

The question of the historicity of these miracles is beyond the purview of this study (for arguments pro see Harris 1990; con see Perkins; see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). But the claim that Jesus raised the dead on the basis of his prophetic and messianic (see Christ) office and as a harbinger of his own resurrection can at least tentatively be affirmed (see Miracles, Miracle Stories). Miracles of raising the dead permeate all the traditions behind the Gospels (Mark, M, L, John, possibly Q), and their historicity can be argued on the basis of the criterion of multiple attestation (see Form Criticism).

4.1. The Resurrection in Mark. With the growing consensus among Gospel scholars that Mark's Gospel concludes at 16:8 with the words ephobounta gar ("for they were afraid"), Mark 16:1-8 has come to be regarded as a literary masterpiece (see Mark, Gospel of). Moreover, Mark 16:1-8 may be seen as a brilliant conclusion to the Gospel as a whole, bringing Mark's two major themes to culmination: the hidden epiphany of Jesus as Messiah and Son of God (see Son of God); and discipleship,* particularly the problem of discipleship failure.

The first unit (Mk 16:1-4) combines tradition and Markan redaction. Pre-Markan tradition can be found in the names of the women* and the trip to the tomb at dawn. Yet the whole narrative is tied together in Markan fashion and presents some basic Markan themes, particularly in the misunderstanding of the women. The chronological notes provide an important transition from the passion to the resurrection. The action proceeds from the terrible events on "the day before the Sabbath" (Mk 15:42) to the decision to bring spices "when the Sabbath was over" and then depicts the trip itself.

Continuity is also provided by the names. There are three in Mark's passion narrative (15:40, 47; 16:1), with Mary Magdalene, Mary and Salome in 15:40 and 16:1 and the two Marys in 15:47. Luke adds Joanna (24:10), while Matthew only has the two Marys (28:1; though 27:56 par. Mk 15:40 adds "the mother of the sons of Zebedee"). It is likely that tradition and redaction are again combined. The key to Mark's purpose is found in his use of theorein with each name list, thereby making the women official witnesses of the crucifixion events (15:40), the burial (15:47; see Burial of Jesus) and the empty tomb (15:47).

The purchase of the spices for anointing Jesus' corpse parallels both Joseph's purchase in Mark 15:46 and the anointing (pointing to his death) of Mark 14:3-9. It is ironic in this context for the messianic connotations of the earlier anointings, signifying Jesus' death as the assumption of his office as royal Messiah, make this anointing unnecessary. Jesus has not only become Messiah but has already risen, so there will be no further anointing. Irony and misunderstanding continue not only in the women's desire to anoint Jesus' body but in their perplexity as to how they can find help to "roll away the stone" (16:3) which was "very large" (16:4). A narrative gap occurs in the passive "had been rolled away" of 16:4, anticipating the supernatural intervention of the angel (Mt 28:2 explicitely names the angel as the agent) in 16:5. In short, Mark 16:1-4 centers on the misunderstanding of the women (who play a role in Mark's discipleship theme) and directs the reader forward to the divine intervention which alone can solve the dilemma.

The angelic message (16:5-7) also contains both tradition (the angelophany, the exhortation not to fear, the implied rebuke, the basic proclamation of the resurrection and empty tomb) and redaction (their "amazement," Nazarenos, the command to go to Galilee). The "messianic secret," partially lifted in the centurion's cry of 15:39 ("Surely this man was the Son of God"), is now completely disclosed. The women's astonishment and the angel's command not to fear belong to the genre of epiphany, and the message is a kerygmatic formula which completely removes any doubt as to who this "Nazarene" is, confirming the significance of the threefold passion predictions centering on the "Son of man" (see above). There is again a tension introduced into the contrast between the women's pious but ignorant purpose ("seeking" to anoint one who "is not here") and the stupendous significance of the reality of resurrection as announced.

The promise of Mark 16:7—that the disciples will see Jesus in Galilee*—is the key to Mark's narrative and is intimately connected to the promise of 14:28 (cf. also 9:9) that the disciples' misunderstanding and failure would be reversed in a Galilee experience. Some (e.g., W. Marxsen) have argued that this refers to a Parousia expectation rather than a resurrection appearance, but the absence of a glory motif and the fact that both Galilee and the promise "you will see him" (opsesthe) are connected in Mark with the resurrection rather than Parousia make such an assumption unlikely. "Galilee" occurs thirteen times in Mark, usually in the context of Jesus' mission and its success (cf. 1:14, 28, 39; 3:7; 15:40). Therefore, it implicitly promises the overcoming of their failure and the passing of the baton, thus launching the church's mission. This is exemplified further in the pre-Markan tradition (cf. Lk 24:34, 1 Cor 15:5) "tell the disciples and Peter" which may well indicate the reinstatement of the disciples.
This makes the Markan ending all the more startling. The reader would expect the fear to have ceased in 16:6, yet here the fear overpowers the women and forces them to disobey the angel's mandate. However, the stress is not on an act of disobedience but on the numbing effect of the overwhelming awe. In every sense 16:8 concludes Mark's theme of discipleship failure, for the women parallel the many scenes of similar awe, silence and misunderstanding on the part of the disciples (e.g., 6:52; 8:14-21; 9:6, 32; 10:32). If 16:8 were to be considered alone, it would make an incredibly negative conclusion; we would be left only with the warning that believers today not repeat the failure of the disciples and the women. However, Mark's actual message is to be found in the interaction between 16:7 and 8. The resurrection appearances are not related in the narrative because Mark's emphasis is on the presence of the Risen One in our Galilee. Awe and failure are very real experiences for every disciple, but Jesus is at all times waiting to remove that fear and to guarantee success in mission.

4.2. The Resurrection in Matthew. Matthew follows Mark's basic outline but adds a great deal of his own material, primarily the narrative of the guards at the tomb (Mt 27:62-66; 28:4, 11-15) and the story of Jesus' appearance in Galilee (Mt 28:16-20). In so doing he has fashioned an episode employing two sets of contrasting scenes, thereby demonstrating the intervention of God* against all attempts to obstruct his salvific plan. This plan follows the similar structure of both the infancy and passion narratives, which for Matthew center apologetically on the power of God to overcome all obstacles. Matthew's resurrection narrative also emphasizes the twin themes of authority and mission/commission, utilizing the theme of recognition or coming-to-understanding. All of this summarizes major themes which have occurred throughout Matthew's Gospel (set Matthew, Gospel of). Whereas Mark focuses on the failure of the disciples, Matthew in every episode (e.g., Mt 14:27-32; cf. Mk 6:52; Mt 16:12; cf. Mk 8:21) shows how the presence of Jesus allows the disciples to overcome their failure and attain understanding. The resurrection scene culminates this development in discipleship (see Discipleship).

The first set of contrasting scenes (Mt 27:62—28:10) contrasts the priests' complex plot to post the guards and seal the tomb with the sovereign act of God in raising Jesus from the dead. There are certainly strong redactional overtones in the guard narrative of 27:62-66 as well as in the related episodes of 28:4,11-15. Yet this does not mean that there was no tradition behind the story. This is suggested by the non-Matthean vocabulary such as epaurion, paraskeuē, pianos and asphalizō. Moreover, historical problems such as the likelihood of the priests going to Pilate on the Sabbath* are not as problematic as they first appear. Research into Sabbath exceptions at the time of Jesus shows that such an incident would have been allowed, so long as the individuals did not travel more than a Sabbath day's journey or enter the palace (cf. Jn 18:28). It seems likely that Matthew has developed tradition regarding the priests' request for a setting of the guard in order to answer contemporary Jewish charges that the body had been stolen and to emphasize the sovereign power of God in the resurrection despite all such plots. Matthew has also removed Mark's stress on the women's misguided purpose to anoint the body of Jesus, emphasizing instead the theme of witness* (cf. 27:56, 61). In the Matthean setting the women's simple act of reverence is set in contrast with the priestly intrigue.

The supernatural intervention of God in the two scenes of Matthew 28:2-4 and 5-10 is remarkable. Matthew favors such eschatological scenes (see the earthquake [seismos] scenes of Mt 8:24 and 27:51 as well as angel scenes in Mt 1:20, 24; 2:13, 19) to emphasize the inbreaking of the messianic age by direct acts of God. The earthquake establishes continuity with the crucifixion (Mt 27:51); as in Acts 16:26 and Revelation 6:12; 8:5; 16:18 it is not so much a symbol of judgment as a positive sign of divine deliverance. The angel's act in rolling back the stone and sitting upon it also has apocalyptic* overtones (cf. also his description in Mt 28:3, paralleling Dan 7:9; 10:6; 1 Enoch 71:1; Rev 1:14-15; 10:1), depicting the dawn of a new age. The tomb has been opened, allowing all to witness the triumph of God.

Matthew has clearly departed from the simple portrait of Mark; yet his restraint can be seen by comparing Matthew 28:24 with the elaborate narration in the Gospel of Peter (9:35-45; see Gospels [Apocryphal]), in which two angels help the risen Lord* from the tomb, "and the heads of the two reaching to heaven, but that of him who was led of them by the hand surpassing the heavens." Matthew has deliberately avoided describing the resurrection itself. The reaction of the guards, who faint and "become like dead men," provides a negative "witness" (that of opponents to God's plan) to the theophanic overtones of the scene. This is not the fear of reverence (like that of the women in 28:9) but the terror that God's enemies alone will feel.

The angel's message (Mt 28:5-7) is more closely aligned with Mark. Yet there are significant redaction-al alterations. Matthew replaces Mark's "do not be alarmed" with "do not be afraid," probably to strengthen the contrast with the guards' terror. He also connects the announcement of Jesus' resurrection directly with the passion predictions by adding "as he said." Mark uses this phrase after the reference to Jesus preceding them to Galilee, but Matthew at this point has the angel conclude his pronouncement with "Now I have told you," stressing the authority of the divinely commissioned messenger. The meeting in Galilee thus becomes more directly the result of the angel's proclamation than of Jesus' previous promise (as in Mark). Mark's startling ending is radically altered by Matthew, who in 28:8-10 has the women go forth "afraid yet filled with joy" and "run to tell his disciples." The appearance of Jesus to the women is attested independently in John 20:11-18 and stems from tradition. But Matthean elements may be observed in the stress on "joy" (cf. 2:10; 13:20,44; 25:21,23), "worship" (2:2,11; 4:9-10; 8:1; 9:18; 14:33; 15:25) and "my brothers," which indicates in a single word the forgiveness* and reinstatement of the fallen disciples (cf. Jn 15:11-17; 20:17 for a similar emphasis). The repetition of the command to go to Galilee prepares for the climactic scene in Matthew 28:16-20.

The second set of contrasts is between the evil plot to spread lies in Matthew 28:11-15 and the great commission of divine truth* in 28:16-20. The irony of the priestly deception in 28:11-15 is obvious; the very thing they had sought to prevent in 27:62-66 (i.e., the possibility that Jesus' body might be stolen) they are now forced to proclaim. Matthew's apologetic against this Jewish polemic (note "to this very day," 28:15) is now made explicit.

The aptly named "great commission" of Matthew 28:16-20 belongs to the genre of commissioning narratives seen often in the OT and Jewish literature. It consists of two parts, a narrative introduction (16-18a) and a threefold saying composed of a statement of authority (18b), a commission (19-20a) and reassurance of the Risen One's continued presence (20b). It is very likely that the episode is based on tradition, since it parallels similar commissionings in Luke 24:47-49 and John 20:21-23, and contains elements pointing to a source in the tradition: "the mountain* where Jesus had told them to go" (no such command occurs in Matthew); "but some doubted" (a major resurrection tradition but apparently out of place here); and "in heaven and on earth" (not found elsewhere in Matthew). However, the language and themes are so Matthean that it is impossible to separate redaction from tradition (nor would we wish to limit historical trustworthiness to one but not the other).

Matthew has carefully crafted the whole to summarize many of the major themes in his Gospel. Some interesting points occur in the introduction, such as the meeting on a mountain, so important in Matthew as a place of revelation (cf.
4:8; 5:1; 8:1; 14:23; 15:29; 17:1; 21:1); and the presence of doubt in the midst of the disciples' worship. This latter element probably continues the Matthean theme of the "little-faithed ones." Distazō occurs in the NT only here and in Matthew 14:31, where Jesus chides his disciples, "O you of little faith, why did you doubt?" But they respond (14:32), "Truly you are the Son of God." It is likely that the doubt means uncertainty rather than unbelief and that this is part of the message throughout the First Gospel: Spiritual hesitation in the midst of worship is the constant struggle of every disciple. The answer can only be found when one applies the promise inherent in Matthew 28:18-20.

The key term in the commission itself is "all"—"all authority," "all nations," "all things," "always." In many ways this short homily could be labelled the "Allness of Yahweh" passed on to the mission of the disciples through the presence of the Risen One among them. The "authority in heaven and on earth given" to Jesus is a reflection of Daniel 7:14, and therefore the Risen Jesus is depicted as the exalted Son of man who now has universal authority over all of God's kingdom. The authority of Jesus in Matthew's Gospel is now extended to all of God's kingdom, heavenly as well as earthly. The mission to disciple "all the nations" (possibly also connected to Dan 7:14) echoes the church's participation in the God-given mission of Jesus, which was limited to Israel* (10:5-6; 15:24) but is now extended to all people. There is considerable debate as to whether ethne ("nations," "peoples") refers only to the Gentile* mission (due to the common restriction of the term to Gentiles) or whether the addition of pas ("all") extends the reference to include Israel as well as the nations. Several recent studies on the scope of the universal mission in Matthew find the latter interpretation more likely. Moreover, in Matthew 24:9, 14 and 25:32 (the other three places where the full expression "all nations" occurs) it refers to "all people," including jew and Gentile (set Matthew, Gospel of).

There are two concomitant aspects to the discipling process, baptism and instruction. Jesus' resurrection command becomes the basis of Christian baptism,* which is here seen as an entrance "into" (eis, as Matthew normally observes the distinction between eis and en) the lordship and fellowship of the triune godhead. There is Matthean background in the trinitarian formula, summarizing the Father-Son (Mt 3:17; 11:27) and Son-Spirit (Mt 3:11, 16; 12:32) relationships. The second aspect, teaching, also concludes a major theme. Matthew's Gospel is organized around the five great discourse units of chapters 5—7, 10, 13, 18 and 23—25, and discipleship itself is defined as an ethical response to Jesus' demands. As in 5:17-20 and 24:35, Jesus' teaching is presented as the authoritative words of Yahweh and as the fulfillment of the Torah (see Law). The Torah of the Messiah has come, and in this new age the disciple will obey "all the commands" of Jesus.

The disciple's obedient response to Jesus' teaching is paralleled by the promise of Jesus' continued presence, building upon earlier promises of Jesus as the Immanuel, or "God with us" (1:23) and as the one present whenever "two or three are gathered" (18:20). Here we see the solution to the "little faith" of Matthew 28:17; namely, the powerful presence of the Risen One would sustain them in their weakness. Moreover, that presence is constant "to the very end of the age." Many have called this a "proleptic parousia," due to the apocalyptic overtones (again building upon Dan 7:14) in which Jesus' future or final coming is mediated to the church now.

4.3. The Resurrection in Luke. In Luke and John the basic approach to the resurrection changes, with the appearances centered in Jerusalem rather than Galilee. For Luke this lends the account a geographical focus in which Jerusalem becomes both an ending (for the life and ministry of Jesus) and a beginning (for the ongoing mission of the church). Luke's presentation prepares for the book of Acts, so the resurrection provides a transition from the ministry of Jesus to that of the early church. As many have noted, there is a salvation-historical perspective throughout. Moreover, there is a strong creedal emphasis, with constant commentary elucidating the significance of the events from the perspective of prophetic fulfillment (Lk 24:5-7,25-27,44-47). Finally, there is a strong polemic focusing on doubt and the reality of the resurrection. An emphasis on witness, including proofs for the resurrection, is evident, but this is constantly met by perplexity and unbelief. Luke presents these themes in linear fashion, with all the events occurring on the same day in four stages: the empty tomb (24:1-12), the road to Emmaus (24:13-35), the appearance to and commissioning of the disciples at the meal (24:36-49) and the ascension* into heaven (24:50-52).

Luke's empty-tomb narrative (24:1-12) follows Mark's general order but introduces some interesting redactional twists. It is debated whether Luke utilizes Mark and adds L material (the women entering the tomb, the two angels, the appearance to Peter in 24:12, 34) or has followed a non-Markan source and inserted some Markan details. Whichever is the case, Lukan redaction is evident. He has an extensive discussion of the women's preparation and rest on the Sabbath (23:54-56), with four time notes (23:54a, 54b, 56; 24:1) which unite the burial and tomb event into a salvation-historical whole. The emphasis is not so much on the women's misunderstanding (as in Mark) as on God's work behind the scenes. The action leads to the direct pronouncement in 24:3 that the women "did not find the body" in the tomb. The role of the women as witnesses is expanded; they "saw" not only the tomb but "how his body was laid" (23:55) and then were witnesses to the empty tomb. The significance is seen in the added note that it was "the body of the Lord Jesus" (though this is a "western non-interpolation," missing in the normally adventuresome Western family of manuscripts, most scholars agree that the phrase "of the Lord Jesus" is original to the text; see Textual Criticism). This introduces Luke's characteristic theology of glory at the very outset of the resurrection narrative.

The women's perplexity in Luke 24:3 turns into fearful awe (24:4) as there are now two angels in dazzling apparel (pre-Lukan tradition, cf. Jn. 20:12). The message itself (24:5-7) departs from the Markan form. There is no alleviation of their fear but rather a direct challenge and proclamation of the critical reality of the resurrection. "Galilee" in this pronouncement is not the place where Jesus will meet them but the place where Jesus had formerly predicted his passion and resurrection. In Luke Galilee is the place of authoritative witness; the women themselves are from Galilee (8:1-3), and Galilean disciples attest to the Jerusalem appearances in Acts 1:11 and 13:31. In other words, the focus changes from the future to the past, and the repetition of the passion prediction in Luke 24:7, being derived from 9:22, 44; 18:31-33, adds a promise-fulfillment thrust. In 24:8 the women "remember," a Lukan emphasis pointing to an awakening faith (contra Dillon) in the salvific plan of God (especially in its connection with the divine "must" [dei] of 24:7; cf. Lk 1:54, 72; Acts 11:16). Their understanding leads them to report "all these things" (including not only the angel's message but their own witness to the empty tomb). Unlike Matthew and Mark, this is not in response to an angelic commission (omitted by Luke) but is the direct result of their burgeoning faith (seen in the and ... and [kai... kai] pattern of 24:8-9). Luke reserves the list of names (even adding "the other women with them") for this point (24:10) in order to give greater stress to the women's function as witnesses to the reality of the resurrection. Yet the result is startling; the "apostles"* (Luke uses this title six times in his Gospel [as opposed to once in Matthew and twice in Mark] to stress the point of continuity between the disciples and the apostolic band of Acts) not only doubt but "disbelieve," considering the women's testimony to be "nonsense."

This unbelief is a major emphasis in Luke's empty-tomb narrative, preparing for the overcoming of doubt via the direct presence of the Risen One in the next episode. To give added stress to this motif Luke incorporates (another Western non-interpolation which most today accept as authentic) a further episode from the tradition (the language shows similarities with Jn 20:3-10) regarding Peter's trip to the tomb (24:12). Peter's "perplexed" departure from the tomb mutes somewhat the disbelief of the disciples, but conclusively, he provides continuity from the confusion of the women in 24:4 to the "amazement" of the travellers in 24:22. Full-fledged faith comes only after the sovereign intervention of the Risen One himself (24:16, 31).

This struggle of faith continues in the Emmaus Road journey of 24:13-35. The interplay of tradition and redaction is difficult to detect since this story only occurs in Luke. However, while there is a great deal of Lukan redaction, there are few scholars who would identify this as a free composition. It is likely that a pre-Lukan form of this story formed the basis for a portion of the later Markan appendix (Mk 16:12-13), and the names "Emmaus" and "Cleopas" would have been unlikely in a story freely created. Most critical scholars accept the pre-Lukan origin of at least 24:13, 16, 28-31, and many would accept a historical nucleus behind the whole.

Viewed within its larger context, several themes emerge. As so often in Luke, geography dominates the structure. In this case the journey "from" Jerusalem is characterized by defeat, the return "to" Jerusalem by witness and victory. The turn-about through Jesus' instruction takes place "on the way." The reality of the resurrection is the goal of the story, with 24:28-32 climaxing not only this episode but the empty-tomb narrative as well. This reality is particularly stressed in the proof-from-prophecy (24:25-27) as Jesus shows that he is more than a powerful prophet (the travelers' belief in 24:19) but is indeed the fulfillment of the prophetic vision of a suffering and glorified Messiah.

The movement toward understanding is accomplished utilizing a non-recognition/recognition motif. During the first half of the story the travellers are "kept from recognizing" Jesus, a feature recalling the disciples' need for divine disclosure in order to understand the passion predictions (9:45; 18:34). This is undoubtedly intended to lead the reader to the opening of blind eyes (see Blindness and Deafness) via the proclamation of the Word (24:25-27, 32) and the breaking of the bread (24:30-31, 35). The spoken word controls the narrative of 24:17-27 and includes a summary of the tomb events, thereby elaborating on the confession that Jesus was "the prophet powerful in word and deed" (24:19; cf. 24:20-24), and on the scriptural fulfillment motif (24:25-27).

Many see a parallel here with the Ethiopian eunuch story of Acts 8:26-39, each story following a similar pattern: a stranger opens up the Word for the traveller, leading to conversion. Yet the instruction in Luke 24 is actually "pre-evangelism," for while their hearts did "burn" as Jesus opened the Scriptures (24:32), the breaking of bread is the turning point of the Emmaus episode. It is here that God sovereignly opens their blind eyes (note the divine passive "were opened" in 24:31, the counterpart to "were kept from recognizing him" in 24:16).

It is debated whether this implies a eucharistic celebration. "Breaking of bread" is seen by some as a technical phrase for the eucharist (Acts 2:42; 20:7; 1 Cor 11:20), and the order of events in 24:30 (taking, giving thanks, breaking, distributing) might be reminiscent of the Last Supper (cf. 22:19; see Last Supper). However, the motif could also be more general, alluding to the Lukan meal or table-fellowship scenes (see Table Fellowship) which feature Jesus' instruction (5:29; 7:36; 11:37; 12:37; 13:29; 14:1,8-9; 22:14; cf. esp. 9:10-17 [the feeding of the five thousand] which also has parallels to this passage). On the whole, it is possible that both aspects are found here, especially when one realizes that the eucharist was a meal scene in the Gospels. Yet one cannot be dogmatic, and it may be table fellowship rather than eucharist which is intended. The final emphasis is on witness and culminates this theme, from the incredulity of 24:11 to the faith response of 24:34. Interestingly, the witness of the two disciples does not produce faith; rather, it confirms the faith which resulted from the report of the appearance to Simon. In other words, the reality of the resurrection is confirmed by a double witness, that of Peter and of the two disciples.

In Luke's Gospel Jesus' appearance occurs in Jerusalem rather than Galilee. Scholars have discussed at length the significance of the Galilee versus Jerusalem appearance traditions, especially since they do not occur together in any single Gospel account (John 21 is an appendix added later—see below). Many believe that the Galilee tradition is prior, since it is found in the oldest tradition (Mk 14:28; 16:7). However, this is not a necessary conclusion, for even in Matthew—where the Galilee appearance takes center stage—there is a "Jerusalem" appearance to the women (Mt 28:8-10). The redactional interests of the Evangelists may have been reason enough for them to center on one tradition. C. F. D. Moule (1957-58) presents a quite plausible thesis that as festival pilgrims (set Feasts) the disciples would have remained in Jerusalem for the feast of unleavened bread (thus the appearances of Mt 28:9-10; Lk 24:13-49; Jn 20:11-29), gone back to Galilee for the interim between the feasts (Mt 28:16-20; Jn 21) and finally returned to Jerusalem for Pentecost (the ascension in Lk 24:50-53; Acts 1:6-11).

The appearance recorded in 24:36-43 centers on the physical reality of the resurrection. Structurally, it is closely connected to 24:13-35, for Jesus appears while the eleven are discussing the report of the two travellers. Again, a pre-Lukan tradition lies behind the story. This is evidenced in the appearance itself (witnessed by three other disparate sources—1 Cor 15:5; Mk 16:14-15; Jn 20:19-21); the charges by the Risen One of "Peace be with you" (cf. Jn 20:19,21,26) and "Touch me and see" (cf. Jn 20:27); the doubt motif; and the apologetic proof.

The "peace" greeting (24:36) has theological overtones, paralleling the "peace" given by the seventy-two in their own mission (10:5-6) and possibly including the same type of messianic promise as the "peace is yours" of John 20. This is followed by a strong emphasis on the disciples' doubt, seen in the successive verbs of 24:37-38: startled; frightened; thinking they had seen a ghost; troubled; doubting. This is a surprising development following the faith they evidenced in 24:31-35, but it prepares for Jesus startling proof of his resurrection in 24:39-43. The movement from sight to touch to actually sharing a meal with them gives great stress to the continuity between the crucified and risen Christ (showing his nail-scarred hands and feet) as well as to the corporeality of the resurrection ("a ghost does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have," 24:39; eating the fish in 24:43). Some have interpreted this as Luke's interest in refuting a docetic heresy in his church, but the emphasis is on the nature of the Risen Christ ("I am he," 24:39) rather than on false teaching.

doctrinedsalvation.* This mission is to be done "in his name" (a Lukan phrase denoting power and authority in mission) "to all nations" (the universal mission) "beginning at Jerusalem" (the origin of the mission, looking forward to Acts 1—5). Each phrase prepares for the launching of the church's mission in Acts (note that the concatenation of "Jerusalem," "witnesses" and "power" occurs again in Acts 1:8, the table of contents for that book).

The powerful witness* probably includes not only the eleven, but the 120 (including women, cf. Lk 8:1-3; 24:9-10; Acts 1:14-15). Both Luke and John (Jn 20:21-23) anchor this witness in the bestowal of the Spirit. In John this occurs on the first day of the resurrection, but Luke does not have this in mind; here Jesus points to the coming of the Spirit in Acts 2 ("Stay in the city until you have been clothed with power from on high"). In Luke-Acts the Holy Spirit is the means of continuity from the time of Jesus to that of the church.

The ascension in Luke furnishes a structural transition from Luke's Gospel to Acts. In fact, a good argument can be made that the ascension has been the goal ever since Luke 9:31, in which Jesus, Moses* and Elijah spoke of his "departure" (exodos) which would be "fulfilled at Jerusalem," an event which would come most naturally at the ascension (cf. Lk 9:51). In Luke 24:50-53 the ascension takes on a doxological tone, with Jesus imparting a priestly blessing; in Acts 1:6-11 it has ecclesiastical implications, with the Risen Lord empowering and launching the church's mission. In Luke it provides an ending, and in Acts 1 it becomes a beginning. Thus ends the theme of Jesus' glory in Luke 24. The Risen Lord now becomes the Exalted One and like Elijah is taken up to heaven. A further transition to Acts is seen in the disciples, who "worship" and "with great joy" return to Jerusalem, remaining "continually in the Temple" (24:52-53). Each of these—worship, joy and Temple*—are major themes both in the Gospel and Acts. The disciples and the church continue the ministry of Jesus in these areas.

4.4. The Resurrection in John. The resurrection in the Synoptic Gospels functions as the culmination of Jesus' life; it is both vindication and exaltation, and the Gospel accounts in one sense anticipate it. John, however, takes the opposite tack. His entire Gospel is told from a post-resurrection point of view. The resurrection is not so much the time when Jesus assumes his doxa; rather, his entire life and ministry comprise doxa. The disciples are not depicted as having "hardened hearts" (cf. Mk 6:52; 8:17; see Hardness of Hearts); instead, they "believe" because they perceive his revealed glory (2:11). John replaces the Synoptic passion predictions with three sayings on the "Son of man lifted up" (3:14; 8:28; 12:31-32), which looks at the passion as exaltation. Jesus' life and death are pictured as resurrection events. The resurrection itself then becomes the final moment in this drama of glory, and as such it culminates the major emphases of the Fourth Gospel: christology and soteriology in chapter 20; mission and discipleship in chapter 21.

4.4.1. John 20. Each of the four episodes in chapter twenty exhibits a crisis of faith, as the participants struggle with the reality of the resurrection. In each the level of faith drops to a lower level, from the beloved disciple with his natural faith (20:8-9) to Mary's sorrow (20:11) to the disciples' fear (20:19) to Thomas' cynical demand (20:25). Yet with each crisis Jesus meets the need, and the results become increasingly greater, culminating in Thomas' faith-cry, "My Lord and my God" (20:28), which climaxes the christology of John. As in Luke, the four episodes occur on the same day, two in the morning (20:1-18) and two in the evening (20:19-29).

There are actually three scenes in John 20:1-18, as the race to the tomb (20:3-10) separates Mary's discovery of the empty tomb (20:1-2) from Jesus' appearance to her (20:11-18). Several clues point to a tradition lying behind the passage. Mary's "we" in 20:2 is a relic of a Synoptic-like tradition where several women are present. There are also connections with Luke 24:12, 34 and the Peter-tradition. Most scholars believe that each part—the trips to the tomb by the women and the disciples as well as the appearance to Mary—stem from tradition. In 20:1-10 there is a subtle shift from Matthew's polemical use of the belief that Jesus' body had been stolen. In this case it is not an apologetic but part of the motif of misunderstanding among Jesus' followers; it is Mary, not the chief priests (Mt 27:62-66) who fears this, and she sets the scene for the race to the tomb. This motif is heightened by John's comment that it occurred "while it was still dark" (20:1). Darkness belongs to the Johannine light*-darkness dualism (cf. Jn 3:2; 11:10; 13:30) and here symbolizes a time of misunderstanding (cf. 20:9).

Yet misunderstanding is restricted primarily to 20:1-2. In the trip to the tomb (20:3-10) John goes even further than Luke in giving the empty tomb an apologetic function. He does this in several ways. The so-called rivalry between Peter and the Beloved Disciple make both witnesses (cf. Deut 19:15) of the import of the empty tomb. Scholars have debated the significance of this rivalry: both race to the tomb, but the Beloved Disciple arrives first; the Beloved Disciple delays entering, but Peter goes directly into the tomb. Upon entering, the Beloved Disciple simply "sees and believes" while Peter by implication does not.

Some see the two disciples as symbolic of conflict within the Johannine community, but the consistently positive portrait of Peter throughout the Fourth Gospel makes this doubtful. In the scenes where the two are juxtaposed (13:23-25; 18:15-16; 20:3-10; 21:7-8), there is a certain rivalry, but not at the expense of Peter. Peter typifies the dilemma of all disciples in coming to grips with the significance of Jesus. He is filled with questions (13:23-24), uncomprehending (20:6-7) and lacking vision (21:7-8). Yet Christians of every age have identified with him. The Beloved Disciple is the archetypal disciple, the one whose authentic witness (cf. 19:35; 21:24) and belief (20:8-9) provide a model for successful discipleship.

The extensive description of the graveclothes (20:6-7) first of all proves that the body would not have been stolen. No thief would have taken the time to roll up the grave cloths so neatly. Moreover, the presence of the wrappings is proof that Jesus had indeed risen from the dead (cf. Jn 11:44, with Lazarus "coming forth" still wrapped in the linens). Finally, the Beloved Disciple believes even without benefit of the witness of "the Scriptures" (20:9). Faith response is one of the primary themes in John and is consistently linked with seeing and knowing (note "see" in 20:6, 8, 14,18 and "know" in 20:2, 9, 13-14; 21:4, 12, 15-17). The tension between seeing and knowing typifies the resurrection narratives of both chapters 20 and 21. Commitment to Christ is deepened when vision leads faith to knowledge. Here is the first step: vision leading to faith.

The dramatic scene in which the distraught Mary comes to understanding (20:11-18) takes us more deeply into this encounter with the significance of the resurrection. Here the angels do not play a revelatory role as in the Synoptics. They encounter her grief (note the centrality of "weeping" in 20:11, 13,15) and prepare for the presence of the Risen One. The repetition of question and response in the two scenes with the angels and Jesus (20:13, 15) produce a narrative tension. The reader would expect one of the two (the presence of angels or of the Risen Lord himself) to suffice. But her grief is too deep. This prepares for the marvelous removal of blindness from her eyes in 20:16. The good shepherd (10:1-18) calls her by name (cf. "calls his sheep by name," 10:3), and she recognizes him (cf. "his sheep follow him because they know his voice," 10:4). The results are notably different from 20:10, where the disciples simply return home in an anti-climactic conclusion to their trip to the tomb. Here Jesus commissions Mary as the first herald of the resurrection tidings.

However, the wording is difficult First Jesus says, "Stop clinging to me," which could reflect a situation like Matthew 28:9 where the women "grasp" Jesus' feet Yet John might have a deeper meaning in mind, with Jesus asking her not to "cling" to the old relationships (note she has just called him "my teacher"). The seeming contradiction between "I have not yet returned" and "I am (in the process of) returning" explains the tension. Jesus is no longer to relate to them as their teacher, for in the course of his appearances he is finishing his work and is on the verge of fulfilling the promise of the Farewell Discourse (see Farewell Discourse): To return to the Father so the promised Paraclete can come (13:1, 3; 14:4, 25-26, 28; 15:26; 16:5, 7, 17, 28; 17:13; see Paraclete). All previous relationships have been transformed and so the disciples are now "brothers" (cf. Mt 28:10; cf. Jn 15:15); in this one word the forgiveness and reinstatement of the disciples is assured.

Yet Mary's message (20:18), as in the other Gospels, apparently has little effect In the following scene the disciples are still cowering "for fear of the Jews" (20:19). There are quite a few similarities to Luke 24: "the first day of the week," "stood in the midst" "peace be with you," "showed them his hands and side," the commission to mission, the gift of the Spirit and the stress on forgiveness of sins. This is filled out with Johannine redactional emphases and is a unique, well-balanced story. Jesus, as he did with Mary, meets their fearful lack of faith head on. Mary needed to hear the voice of the good shepherd (set Shepherd, Sheep), but they need more—to recognize that he is indeed the same Jesus raised from the dead. Jesus not only supplies that need but promises them messianic peace; the threefold "peace is yours" (20:19, 21, 26) controls the second unit of the chapter and fulfills the promise of 14:1, 27 and 16:23. It is more than the basic greeting "shalom"; it culminates the significance of the resurrection as bringing the peace of God to the believer. As the disciples see Jesus' hands and side (pointing, as in Luke, to the reality of the physical resurrection) they experience not only peace but joy in fulfillment of Jesus' promise in John 16:20-22.

The commission of John 20:21-23 is especially rich theologically. After the repeated "peace is yours," Jesus in a sense graduates the disciples and gives them the degree of "sent ones" (fulfilling 17:18). One of the pre-eminent concepts in Johannine christology is that of Jesus as "sent" by the Father. Based on the Jewish institution of a šāliah, a messenger or envoy authorized to carry out functions on behalf of another (see Aposde), Jesus as the sent one is presented as the living representative who reveals the Father to the world. In the Farewell Discourse the Spirit/Paraclete is "sent" by the Father (14:16, 26) and the Son (15:26; 16:7). Yet this chain of revelation is not complete, for now in a sense the entire godhead is involved in "sending" the disciples. The place of the Spirit is seen in the "Johannine Pentecost" of 20:22.

In fulfillment of John 7:39; 15:26 and 16:7, Jesus now "breathes" the Spirit into the disciples, enabling them to bear witness to the sin-sick world (cf. 14:16-17; 15:26-27; 16:7-11). In comparison with Acts 2, this is a private in-filling of the disciples while the later event at Pentecost is a public empowering which launches the church's mission (see Benoit). The mission is primary also in 20:23, a statement which, like its counterpart in Matthew 16:19, has occasioned great debate. The power to bind/retain and loose/ forgive sins is a legal authority and depicts the disciples as full-fledged ambassadors of the new age, dispensing judgment or salvation, depending on people's acceptance or rejection of their message (cf. Jesus' authority as judge in 5:22, 27; 8:15-16; 9:39). In Matthew this saying deals with church discipline, while here it centers on mission evangelism.

The final episode (20:24-29) centers on the cynical doubt of Thomas and presents this doubt in even stronger fashion than does Luke 24:10-11. Thomas's declaration that he would not believe unless he could not only see but touch the wounds in Jesus' hands and side is an extension of John 20:20 in which Jesus showed the disciples his wounds in order to allay their fear. In the Fourth Gospel Thomas is a hardheaded realist who exemplifies the disciples' lack of understanding (11:16) and their confusion (14:5). Here he sums up their doubts as well.

As in the other episodes of chapter 20, Jesus acquiesces to his need, and Thomas's response is astonishing, culminating the high christology of John's Gospel with his confession "(You are) my Lord and my God." This goes beyond affirming the reality of the resurrection to interpreting its significance. The resurrection proves the validity of the emphasis throughout—that Jesus is one with the Father and therefore divine (cf. 1:1, 14; 3:18; 8:58; 10:30, 34-38; 12:45; 14:9; 17:11). Jesus' concluding statement in 20:29 is at one and the same time an admonition (against the demand for empirical proof) and a recognition (that Thomas had now come to faith). Yet the focus, as in John 10:16 and 17:20, is on the beatitude regarding future believers who will come to faith without benefit of such signs. It is they who are truly "blessed" (by God).

In John 20:30-31 the centrality of faith will conclude not only the resurrection narrative but the Gospel as a whole. Many have debated (partly on the basis of textual evidence for both a present and aorist verb) whether "believe" here is primarily evangelistic (thus the Gospel would be intended more for non-believers) or didactic (thus intended for believers). But the Fourth Gospel as a whole is clearly meant both to strengthen the faithful and to call non-believers to faith.

4.4.2. John 21. Most scholars assert that this is an appendix written some time after the completion of the Fourth Gospel, perhaps because of a crisis in the church as eyewitnesses were passing from the scene (cf. 21:18-23). The debate is whether it was penned by the Evangelist or by someone else. The latter is suggested by 21:24-25, which seems to be the imprimatur of a church official attesting to the validity of the Beloved Disciple's witness. Yet the chapter's language, style and emphases parallel the rest of the Gospel (see Osborne), and one can tentatively equate the authors of chapters 20 and 21. Much like John 20, the chapter divides into four episodes (21:1-14,15-17,18-19,20-23) followed by a conclusion (21:24-25).

Many scholars find two separate traditions (an appearance and a meal story) in the account of the miraculous catch of fish (21:1-14). Others (e.g., Bultmann) have argued for a unified tradition. In either case the author has once again combined tradition and redaction into a theological whole. The primary thrust is the power of the Risen One which is made available to the church. While there is no overt mention of mission, the symbolism as well as general thrust of the chapter has led most scholars to apply this to the church in mission, both in terms of evangelism (21:1-8) and fellowship (21:9-13). Jesus' appearance by the Sea of Galilee is often linked with the similar miracle at the call of the disciples in Luke 5:1-11, which is thought to be a displaced miracle story. However, as Marshall points out, the differences outweigh the similarities, and it is better to see them as separate episodes. Nevertheless, the themes are similar, with Jesus asking for radical obedience and then granting an astounding catch of fish to demonstrate the new call to "catch" people.

The first theological element of the story (recalling the Emmaus journey of Lk 24) concerns a recognition scene. The disciples, after fishing all night and catching nothing, encounter a man whom they fail to recognize. Interestingly (unlike the calling of the disciples in Lk 5 or the story of the road to Emmaus in Lk 24), they fail to recognize Jesus even as they obey him (21:6). Only after the overwhelming catch does the Beloved Disciple recognize that it is the Risen Lord. As in John 20:8, the Beloved Disciple represents the quintessential disciple whose love gives him greater insight into spiritual truth. The order of events points the reader toward the significance of the Risen Lord for the success of all Christian endeavors.

The next aspect is the promised success of Christian mission under the power of the Risen Lord. This theme is premised on the great size of the catch—153 large fish (21:6, 11). Many ingenious solutions have been propounded for the significance of the 153 fish, but the majority today interpret it as a more general reference to the universally great results of the mission.

The final aspect is the meal scene, which many see as a eucharistic celebration. While there are similarities to the feeding of the 5,000 (cf.Jn 21:13 and 6:11), there is no clear textual hint that this involves eucharistic connotations (while fish are used in second-century eucharistic services, there is no evidence that was used in the first century). The one thing that can be said with probability is that the emphasis is on a new level of fellowship (built upon a table-fellowship theme similar to that of Luke) between Jesus and his followers. This is seen in the strange statement that "none of the disciples dared to ask him, 'Who are you?' They knew it was the Lord" (21:12). On one level the old doubt is experienced (they "dared not ask"), but on a deeper level a new certitude has appeared (they "knew").

The reinstatement (or rehabilitation) of Peter (Jn 21:15-17) is certainly one of the better-known resurrection stories. Many a minister has preached from this text, distinguishing between the two levels of love* (philos and agapē), but this is a misjudgment. In reality four sets of synonyms are used in the passage (two terms for "love" and "know," three terms for "feed" and "sheep"). And it can be demonstrated that in the Fourth Gospel both phtios and agapē are used for the love between Father and Son, both for the love between Father/Son and disciples, and both for the love which characterizes the community. In other words, the terms in all four cases are meant to be understood synonymously, and the purpose is to show the theological richness of the terms and the breadth of love between Jesus and his followers. The basic message of this episode deals with pastoral responsibility: Love for Jesus can only be complete when the leader tends his flock. This may also be the rehabilitation of Peter because the question "Do you love me more than these?" may recall Peter's promise to surrender his very life for Jesus if necessary (Jn 13:37), and the threefold repetition parallels Peter's threefold denial.

The final two sections concern the martyrdom of Peter (21:18-19) and the fate of the Beloved Disciple (21:20-23). The two are linked by the discipleship command "follow me" (21:19, 22), and this may indeed be the primary thrust of 21:18-23: whether one's life is cut short or one is given a long life in which to minister for the Lord, "What is that to you? You must follow me" (21:22).

Most scholars have accepted Bultmann's hypothesis that the prophecy of Peter's martyrdom adapts an alleged proverb regarding old age; like the elderly, Peter at the end of his life would be bound and led where he does not wish to go. This was a prophecy predicting "the kind of death (i.e., martyrdom) by which Peter would glorify God" (21:19). There has been extensive debate over whether "stretch out your hands" is a reference to crucifixion (tradition tells us Peter was crucified upside-down). Those who doubt such a reference argue that the order (stretching the hands followed by being bound and led) does not fit crucifixion. However, if the language is understood to depict the bearing of the crossbeam to the place of crucifixion, the objection disappears. As such, this fulfills not only Peter's promise to follow Jesus to the death (Jn 13:36-38; cf. 12:23-24, 31-33; 17:1 on the connection between death and glorifying God) but the Johannine emphasis on Jesus carrying his own cross (19:17). The command "follow me" thereby has two meanings, referring both to Peter's present pastoral duties (21:15-17) and to his death as an act of discipleship in which he follows even Jesus' martyrdom via crucifixion.

Peter's query regarding the destiny of the Beloved Disciple (21:20-21) would be natural under the circumstances. The note that the Beloved Disciple "was following them" (21:20) ties the two sections together and supports the thesis that the main idea is discipleship. Jesus' reply to Peter's query is surprisingly harsh in tone ("What is that to you?"). In other words, Peter should not worry about someone else's calling and fate; his responsibility is to his own path of obedience. Yet from another perspective Peter's is the greater privilege—that of "following" his Lord in martyrdom. Many scholars interpret 20:23 (in light of 20:24) as indicating that the whole of 20:20-23 was written in light of the fact that the Beloved Disciple had died and the prophecy that he would live until the Parousia was unfulfilled. Yet this goes beyond the passage, which stresses, "if 1 want him to remain" (21:22-23). The message would be just as meaningful if the Beloved Disciple were approaching death and the church was concerned about the prophecy. Either way, the broader point remains the same: the key to the meaning of the resurrection for discipleship is a willingness to follow Jesus no matter what a person's God-ordained destiny might be.

Revolutionary movements were a response of some Jews to the injustice of Israel's oppressors, particularly the Roman Empire (see Rome). The first century was one of the most violent epochs of Jewish history, with the cauldron of unrest reaching its apex in the destruction of Jerusalem (see Destruction of Jerusalem) by the Romans in A.D. 70. This in turn was punctuated by the mass suicide of Jewish rebel forces at Masada in 74. Sixty years later the smoldering embers from this war were fanned into flame by the Jewish leader Simon Bar Kokhba (or Kosiba), who led the second revolt against the Romans in 132-35.

The causes of this unrest were many and varied, but the following factors contributed to a milieu ripe for revolution: foreign military occupation, class conflicts, misconduct of Jewish and Roman officials, Hellenization (see Hellenism), burdensome taxation (see Taxes) and the Samaritan* situation. When the Roman army occupied a land, it was accompanied by thousands of civilians (wives, children, doctors, merchants, etc.). The army lived off the occupied country, pilfering its natural resources, enslaving members of its population, raping women and generally terrorizing the populace. The gentry of Palestine collaborated with the occupying forces and, in exchange for personal safety and affluence, aided Israel’s oppressors. This collusion led to class conflict between the rich and the poor (see Rich and Poor), the faithful and the unfaithful, the rulers and the people (see Horsley and Hanson).

With conditions so difficult for the average Palestinian Jew, a good deal of revolutionary activity arose among them. This took a variety of forms.

1. Social Bandits.

Generally speaking, social banditry arises in agrarian societies where peasants are exploited by the government or ruling class. Social bandits are the "Robin Hoods" of the land and usually increase during times of economic crisis, famine, high taxation and social disruption. The people of the land usually side with the bandits since they are champions of justice for the common people. These brigands usually symbolize the country's fundamental sense of justice and its basic religious loyalties.

In 57 B.C. Gabinius, proconsul in Syria, gave increased power to the nobility, thereby putting extreme pressure on the peasantry. In response the peasantry rebelled and not until a decade later was Palestine able to govern itself effectively again. It is therefore not surprising to find social banditry on the rise during and after this period of civil war and economic hardship. In fact, Josephus* reports that a certain Hezekiah led a band of social bandits who raided the Syrian border (J.W. 1.10.5-7 §§204-11; Ant. 14.9.2-4 §§159-74). Herod (see Herodian Dynasty), when he was governing Galilee,* caught and killed Hezekiah and many of his cohorts. These deaths, however, did not mark the end of social banditry. Years later Herod was still trying to exterminate the brigands (J.W. 1.16.2 §304). In 39-38 B.C. Herod assembled an army to track down these social bandits in order to consolidate his power as Rome's client king. Josephus notes that there was a "large force of brigands" (J.W”. 1.16.1-2 §§303-4). Undoubtedly these social bandits were attacking the gentry who were in league with Herod.

The brigands retreated to the caves near Arbel, but were strong enough to continue to harass the gentry and challenge Herod's complete control of the land. Herod, not to be defied, formulated a strategy which Josephus narrates:

With ropes he lowered [over the cliffs] the toughest of his men in large baskets until they reached the mouths of the caves; they then slaughtered the brigands and their families, and threw firebrands at those who resisted. . . . Not a one of them voluntarily surrendered and of those brought out forcibly many preferred death to captivity (J.W. 1.16.4 §311).

An old man who had been caught inside one of the caves with his wife and seven children . . . stood at the entrance and cut down each of his sons as they came to the mouth of the cave, and then his wife. After throwing their dead bodies down the steep slope, he threw himself down too, thus submitting to death rather than slavery (Ant. 14.15.5 §§429-30).

Since subsequent sources from Herod's reign contain no references to social bandits, this attack may have extinguished them, but it is an argument from silence. Indeed, until the end of the reign of Agrippa I (A.D. 44), there is very little evidence for active resistance through social banditry. In Mark 15:27, however, two "bandits" are mentioned. Josephus also mentions a certain Tholomaus as a bandit leader (Ant. 20.1.1 §5). Tholomaus was likely not the only one because we read that Fadus (A.D. 44-46) set out to purge the "whole of Judea" of brigands (Ant. 20.1.1 §5). It seems that around the middle of the first century, probably as a result of a severe famine, social banditry sharply increased. Eleazar was one of these brigands and he enjoyed a twenty-year career (J.W. 2.13.2 §253). Actions taken by the authorities seem to have only proliferated Palestinian banditry. Cumanus (A.D. 48-52) took aggressive military action against the brigands, but they merely retreated into their strongholds and "from then on the whole of Judea was infested with brigands" (Ant. 20.6.1 §124).

Just before the Jewish revolt the rich and the poor were sharply polarized, taxation was very high, Roman oppression was grievous, justice was perverted and poverty was widespread. Consequently, Jewish banditry swelled to epidemic proportions so that a sizable number of the population were outlaws. This situation obviously took its toll on the gentry and contributed to the spiraling social unrest. Without doubt, social banditry is a major factor to be considered in any study of the First Jewish Revolt.

As the revolt broke out the bandits played an important role in resisting the Roman army's forays into Judea and Galilee, with brigand groups dominating the region of Galilee. The effectiveness of the brigands against Rome was due not only to their impressive military strength, but also to their favorable relationship with the peasants and their ability to build alliances with other rebel forces. The most important contribution made by these social bandits was their highly effective use of guerrilla warfare, which they demonstrated in routing the army of Cestius Callus in A.D. 66. Ultimately, however, the brigands failed in their attempt to free Palestine from Roman rule.

2. Messianic Pretenders.

In Judaism prior to the first century there was no single, messianic expectation held by Jews (see Christ). Furthermore, Messiah, as a title, does not appear frequently in pre-Christian literature. Only after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, when rabbinic theological reflection (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) standardized and popularized the term, does Messiah appear frequently, with essentially the same meaning in each usage. The scarcity of the term, however, does not suggest that there were no expectations of an anointed royal Jewish leader. The OT had begun to shape an expectation with its promises of a "branch" God would raise for David (see Son of David). This notion can be seen in Jeremiah 23:5-6 and Isaiah 11:2-9 where the "shoot from the stump of Jesse" shall "judge the poor with righteousness." Micah also contributed to the expectation by identifying Bethlehem as the home town of Messiah (Mic 5:2). But it is inappropriate to speak of a widespread OT expectation of Messiah.
During the period of Persian and Hellenistic domination, there is also little evidence of a Messianic hope. The promises to David and the prophecies of a future Davidic king were known during these periods (cf. Sir 47:11, 22; 1 Macc 2:57), but the fulfillment was postponed to the distant future. This is also probably the case during the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes, although a few references may be interpreted otherwise (cf. 1 Enoch 90:9, 37-38; 1 Macc. 3:4). During the Hasmonean period, however, the hope of an anointed royal figure who would deliver Israel became more prominent. At Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls) there were apparently two anointed figures: a high priestly Messiah and the Prince of the Congregation, a lay head of the eschatological community. And in other Jewish literature of the period an anointed royal figure begins to emerge (Pss. Sol. 17). But among extant writings, only those coming from the period following the death of Herod (4 B.C.) refer unambiguously to a promised anointed figure.

After the death of Herod in 4 B.C. the Jews pressed Herod's son and heir apparent Archelaus, for a number of reforms. During the Passover, when the demands reached a feverish pitch, Archelaus sent his armies into Jerusalem and massacred thousands of worshipping pilgrims. This action catalyzed revolt in every major area of Herod's kingdom, and some of these revolts took the form of messianic movements. Josephus identifies several leaders of these movements: Judas, the son of Ezekias (Ant. 17.10.5 §§271-72, J.W. 2.4.1 §56); Simon, servant of King Herod (Ant. 17.10.6 §§273-76); and Athronges (Ant. 17.7 §§278-85). Josephus clearly indicates that they aspired to be Israel's king (J.W. 2.4.1 §55; Ant. 17.10.8 §285). All of these messianic figures were of humble origins, and their followers were primarily peasants (see Barnett).

The principal goal of these revolutionaries was to overthrow Herodian and Roman domination of Palestine. In addition to fighting the Romans, these revolutionaries attacked the mansions of the aristocracy and the royal residences. This undoubtedly reveals the frustration of years of social inequality. In response, Varus, legate of Syria, dispatched two legions (6,000 troops each) and four regiments of cavalry (500 each). This was in addition to the troops already in Judea and the auxiliary troops provided by the city states and client kings in the area. In spite of this military might these messianic movements were difficult to subdue.

Because of the lack of sources it is difficult to identify any messianic movements between the above-mentioned revolts and those surrounding the First Jewish Revolt (except, of course, the followers of Jesus). With regard to the First Jewish Revolt, Josephus notes two messianic movements that bear mentioning. The first was led by Menahem, son of Judas, the Galilean, who took his followers and marched off to Masada. There he broke open king Herod's arsenal and armed other brigands, in addition to his own group. With these men as his bodyguards, he returned to Jerusalem as a king, and becoming a leader of the insurrection, he organized the siege of the palace (J.W. 2.17.8 §§433-34; cf. 2.17.5 §§422-42).

The second messianic movement mentioned by Josephus was built around Simon bar Giora (i.e., "Simon son of a proselyte"). In AD. 66, at the outbreak of the war, Simon helped aid the Jews against Cestius by attacking the Roman rearguard. Simon's messianic movement was also motivated by the social oppression exerted by Israel's aristocracy. When Simon had gained control of the Judean and Idumean countryside, the citizens of Jerusalem invited him to lead the defense against Rome. After a power struggle in which he forced the Zealots and John of Gischala aside, Simon took control of Jerusalem. Simon was a strict disciplinarian and did well in his struggle against the Romans, but the Roman army was overwhelmingly powerful. Adorned in a white tunic and a purple cape as the king of the Jews, Simon surrendered and was taken to Rome. There he was ritually executed. The messianic movement led by Simon was the largest of all the movements described by Josephus, lasting nearly two years. It may have been fueled by eschato-logical hopes.

The final messianic movement in recorded Jewish antiquity (A.D. 132-35) was led by Simeon bar Kokhba. Rabbi Akiba proclaimed that Simeon was indeed the Messiah, and a large portion of the Judean peasantry responded to the claim. Simeon had three years of independence and even minted coins (inscribed "Year 1 of the liberation of Israel"). When Rome sent in a massive army, Simeon resorted to guerrilla warfare and forced the Romans into a prolonged war of attrition. Nevertheless, the Romans finally did "annihilate, exterminate and eradicate" them from the land (Dio Cassius 59.13.3).

3. Revolutionary Prophets.

Despite the amount of prophetic activity prior to the first century, there is virtually no evidence for a Jewish expectation of the imminent return of the promised eschatological prophet (see Prophet, Prophecy). Nor were there vivid expectations for the appearance of the prophet-like-Moses* mentioned in Deuteronomy 18:18. There may have been some expectations for the return of Elijah (see Elijah and Elisha), but a claimant to this identity never materialized. Thus the appearance of any popular prophet of reputed eschatological significance was more than just the fulfillment of a popular expectation.

R. A. Horsley has helpfully distinguished between "popular prophetic movements" and "oracular prophets." The latter group was similar in character to classical oracular prophets such as Hosea or Jeremiah; they prophesied either judgment* or deliverance. Oracular prophets proclaiming deliverance appeared just prior to and during the First Jewish Revolt. Typically, those oracular prophets who pronounced judgment were not well received, being perceived by the establishment as a threat and consequently silenced.

3.1. Popular Prophets. Popular prophetic movements, on the other hand, had leaders who led sizable movements of peasants. The political authorities generally viewed this activity as insurrectionist and therefore forced a military confrontation. These prophets and their followers generally arose in anticipation of the appearance of God's eschatological liberation. This liberation was perceived as imminent, and when it arrived the Jews would be freed from their political bondage and would again govern Palestine, the land God had given to them as their own possession. The leaders of these popular prophetic movements are described by Josephus in general terms:

Impostors and demagogues, under the guise of divine inspiration, provoked revolutionary actions and impelled the masses to act like madmen. They led them out into the wilderness so that there God would show them signs of imminent liberation. (J.W. 2.13.4 §259; cf. Ant. 20.8.6 §168)

These popular prophets, preying upon social conditions, apparently taught that God was about to transform their society—characterized by oppression and social injustice—into a society marked by peace,* prosperity and righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness). Responding to the call, large numbers of peasants left their homes, their work and their communities to follow these charismatic leaders into the desert. There in the wilderness (see Mountain and Wilderness) they awaited God to manifest his presence through signs and wonders (see Miracles and Miracle Stories), purify his people (see Clean and Unclean) and unveil the eschatological plan of redemption which he had previously revealed to his prophet. At this juncture God himself would act and defeat Israel's enemies.

3.1.1. The Samaritan. The first of these prophets appeared when Pontius Pilate was procurator. Interestingly, this first movement appeared among the Samaritans. The Samaritans, like the Jews, revered Moses as the prophet and cultivated hopes for a future Mosaic prophet who was discussed in terms of "the restorer" (taheḇ). The Taheḇ would appear and restore Solomon's Temple on Mount Gerizim. Josephus has described one such Samaritan prophetic movement:

Nor was the Samaritan nation free from disturbance. For a man who had no qualms about deceit and freely used it to sway the crowd, commanded them to go up with him as a group to Mount Gerizim, which is for them the most sacred mountain. He promised to show them, when they got there, the holy vessels buried at the spot where Moses had put them. Those who thought his speech convincing came with arms and stationed themselves at a village called Tirathana. There they welcomed late-comers so that they might make the climb up the mountain in a great throng. But Pilate was quick to prevent their ascent with a contingent of cavalry and armed infantry. They attacked those who had assembled beforehand in the village, killed some, routed others, and took many into captivity. From this group Pilate executed the ringleaders as well as the most able among the fugitives. (Ant. 18.4.1 §§85-87)

3.1.2. Theudas

Perhaps ten years later, about A.D. 45, a second major prophetic movement began. A certain Theudas (probably not the Theudas mentioned in Acts 5:36) organized one of these prophetic movements during the reign of Fadus (A.D. 44-46). Josephus also describes this prophet's ministry:

> When Fadus was governor of Judea, a charlatan named Theudas persuaded most of the common people to take their possessions and follow him to the Jordan River. He said he was a prophet and that at his command the river would be divided and allow them an easy crossing. Through such words he deceived many. But Fadus hardly let them consummate such foolishness. He sent out a cavalry unit against them, which killed many in a surprise attack, though they also took many alive. Having captured Theudas himself, they cut off his head and carried it off to Jerusalem. (Ant. 20.5.1 §§97-98)

Obviously Theudas' movement attracted large numbers of Jews, so much so that Josephus hyperbolically states that Theudas deceived "most of the common people." Perhaps Theudas, in some sort of reverse Exodus, saw himself as the new Moses leading the people out of bondage (like Egypt) and across the Jordan (like the Red Sea) into the wilderness to be divinely prepared for the new conquest Fadus, not taking any chances, acted decisively, thus showing his fear of such movements. The movement's swift annihilation almost certainly indicates that unlike the messianic movements, this prophetic band was unarmed. Theudas' posthumous public humiliation by the ceremonial parading of his severed head was intended to send a stern warning to any would-be leaders of similar prophetic movements.

3.1.3. The Egyptian

Another movement about ten years later, involved a Jewish prophet who originated from Egypt (Ant. 20.8.6 §§169-71;). (W. 2.13.5 §§261-63; cf. Acts 21:38). Josephus records that this prophet had a following of 30,000 who were to march from the wilderness to the Mount of Olives and then into Jerusalem. Felix sent Roman troops to slaughter all those involved in the movement The Roman army easily defeated this prophetic band, even though the Egyptian himself escaped.

It seems fairly clear that these prophetic movements saw themselves in some sort of continuity with Israel's past great historical deliverances. They also had an eschatological dimension in their claim that God was about to deliver Israel and grant their autonomy in the promised land.

3.2. Oracular Prophets. The second category of prophets, the oracular prophets, pronounced imminent divine deliverance; these prophets were concentrated around the First Jewish Revolt Josephus (J.W. 6.5.3 §§300-309) recalls with considerable detail a prophet named Jesus, son of Hananiah. This Jesus appeared four years before the First Revolt during a time when Jerusalem "was enjoying great peace and prosperity," and prophesied against Jerusalem for seven years and five months. In the end he was struck by a stone from one of the "missile engines" and killed. As the war began and the number of prophets increased, the Jews were urged to await help from God (J.W. 6.5.2 §§286-87). Even at the end of the war, when the Temple had already been sacked and set on fire, a prophet pronounced to 6,000 refugees that they would receive "tokens of their deliverance" and "help from God." Every one of those 6,000 perished (J.W. 6.5.2 §§283-84).

4. Apocalypticists.

The apocalypticists do not seem to have been a party per se, but many of the Jews in the period 200 B.C.-A.D. 100, including some of the oracular prophets, apparently became persuaded of apocalyptic* eschatology.* For the apocalypticists Israel's situation looked funereal. It was a depressing period of unfulfilled hopes, shattered eschatological dreams, conflict with the ruling class, no authorized prophetic spokesperson and, above all, periods of persecution for the righteous who remained faithful to the Torah. At the same time the Hellenized and severely compromised Jewish aristocracy was prospering. This situation, perceived as a crisis by some within Israel, forced a search for creative solutions. This gave rise to an apocalyptic eschatology which represented a new interpretation of human history and destiny with new emphases and insights. While maintaining continuity with the prophetic eschatology of the past, it developed in a direction that was at once dualistic, cosmic, universalistic, transcendental and individualistic.
Apocalyptic eschatology led to an emphasis on other-worldliness and a disinterest in temporal affairs. With their stress on cosmic dualism, the apocalypticists understood the real battle to be in the heavenlies between the powers. They were called upon therefore to participate with Michael and the heavenly host in the battle against evil (see Angels). The primary weapon of this warfare was prayer, but it also included personal holiness and faithfulness to the Torah, even if that meant severe trial. In this way the apocalypticists could defeat Israel's oppressor and rightly be classified a "revolutionary movement."

5. The Fourth Philosophy and the Martyr Tradition.

Josephus mentions, in addition to the Pharisees,* Sadducees and Essenes, a "Fourth Philosophy ". Although many have linked this Fourth Philosophy with the Zealots and the sicarii, recently Horsley has argued that this identification is not correct. Horsley notes that on the one hand, Judas the Galilean was a teacher with his own party (J.W. 2.3.3 §118), but on the other, Judas, as part of the Fourth Philosophy, "agreed with the views of the Pharisees in everything except their unconquerable passion for freedom since they take God as their only leader and master" (Ant. 18.1.6 §23). At least prima facie this Fourth Philosophy was a branch of Pharisaism in which certain teachers (e.g., Judas, Saddok) advocated a strongly proactive stance against Roman rule. Horsley suggests that the advocacy of resistance against Rome was rooted in four interrelated concepts.

The first concept was related to taxes: to pay tax was equivalent to slavery. Moreover, it was argued that Scripture prohibited it (2 Sam 24). Taxes therefore should not be paid to Rome. Second, Israel was a theocracy and to be ruled solely by God To submit to foreign rule was no less than idolatry and a violation of the first commandment: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me " Third, God would work syn-ergistically through his faithful people if they would stand firm and actively resist their oppressors. Fourth, if Israel would demonstrate their resistance, God would work through them to establish his kingdom on earth. If the worst case occurred, and they ended in ruin, they would "at least have honor and glory for their high ideals" (Ant. 18.1.1 §§5-7).

This resistance, Horsley notes, is never stated by Josephus as aimed rebellion. In fact they seem instead to be willing sufferers: "They shrug off submitting to unusual forms of death and stand firm in the face of torture of relatives and friends, all for refusing to call any person master" (Ant. 18.1.6 §23). Instead of armed resistance, proponents of the Fourth Philosophy felt that if they remained firm and resisted Rome through obedience to the Torah, "God would eagerly join in promoting the success of their plans, especially if they did not shrink from the slaughter that might come upon them" (Ant. 18.1.1 §5). If this understanding of the Fourth Philosophy is correct this group traced its lineage to the martyrs under Antiochus Epiphanes IV.

The martyrological tradition, though it had antecedents, largely developed in the second century B.C. when Israel was experiencing severe persecution. The aristocracy had compromised its faith and was cooperating with the oppressing nation while those faithful to Torah were experiencing severe persecution. The suffering of the righteous, however, was interpreted as "warfare." Part of the world view of these pious Jews was the belief that their innocent suffering would be so heinous that it would almost in a reflex action force God to act. This notion is most obvious in the Testament of Moses:

If we ... die, our blood will be avenged before the Lord and then his kingdom shall appear throughout all his creation. ... he shall . . . avenge them of their enemies.... he will go forth from his holy habitation with indignation and wrath on account of his sons. (T. Mos. 9:7—10:3)

Underlying Taxo's speech to his sons is the belief that God is the kinsman redeemer (gô'ēl) of the righteous. This doctrine of divine vengeance taught that God protects and avenges the innocent and the vulnerable when they are victimized by social injustice (Ps 9:21; Is 5:4-5; 16:1-6; Jer 11:20; 15:15) or the spilling of blood (Gen 4:9; Deut 32:43; 2 Kings 9:7-10; Ps 9:11-12; Ezek 24:7-11; Joel 3:19-20). God is portrayed as not responding to the crime itself but to the prayers of the oppressed and the cry emanating from the slain victim's blood. "You shall not afflict any widow or orphan. If you afflict him at all, and if he does cry out to me, I will surely hear his cry ... and I will kill you with the sword" (Ex 22:22-23). It is clear, therefore, that the martyrdom of the innocent Taxo and his sons was portrayed by the author of the Testament of Moses to provoke God to action because of the cry of innocent blood. God's response would be no less than the complete annihilation of Israel's enemies and the appearance of the eschatological kingdom (see Kingdom of God). This perspective also appears in literature from this period, especially 4 Maccabees.

Fourth Maccabees was written sometime just before the First Jewish Revolt as an encomium to the martyrs under Antiochus IV. The purpose of the book was not only to apotheosize the martyrs, but also to encourage those who were facing similar trials to stand firm and fight against the opposition with the weapons of obedience and suffering. In 4 Maccabees 9 the eldest brother, after enduring a series of appalling acts of cruelty, encourages his compatriots: "Fight the sacred and noble battle for religion. Thereby the just Providence of our ancestors may become merciful to our nation and take vengeance on the accursed tyrant" (4 Macc 9:24 NRSV).

In this verse the brother is exhorting the others not to compromise or to fight with illicit means. Rather, they are to hold fast and endure righteous suffering. In so doing they will defeat the king, because God will take vengeance upon the despot This is equally as clear in the fourth brother's response to his torture and torments:

Even if you remove my organ of speech, God hears also those who are mute. See, here is my tongue; cut it off, for in spite of this you will not make our reason speechless. Gladly, for the sake of God, we let our bodily members be mutilated. God will visit you swiftly, for you are cutting out a tongue that has been melodious with divine hymns. (4 Macc 10:18-21 NRSV; cf. 9:9)

Again, it is the innocent suffering which elicits God's response, and therefore his judgment is precipitated upon Israel's persecutors.

Atrocities against the innocent accumulate, and the cries for vengeance rise to heaven. Thus, as each martyr dies, he knows that the testimony against the tyrant is strengthened, and judgment upon the king has been brought nearer. We also see this clearly in 4 Maccabees 11:3, the fifth brother's speech, "I have come of my own accord, so that by murdering me you will incur punishment from the heavenly justice for even more crimes" (NRSV). This martyr believed that by his righteous suffering the perpetrator of the grave evil, Antiochus, would increase his guilt which would soon reach the level whereupon the divine Judge would necessarily act on behalf of justice. We can see this same theological construct operating in the sixth brother's poignant speech: "I also, equipped with nobility, will die with my brothers, and I myself will bring a great avenger upon you, you inventor of tortures and enemy of those who are truly devout" (4 Macc 11:22-23 NRSV; cf. 9:32).

The strength of this avenger is found in his armor, namely, his virtue. The innocent death of the martyrs promptly precipitates the avenging wrath of God; the righteous victims need not wait indefinitely—judgment is at hand. This fact obviously had motivated the fourth brother as he endured the agony: "Gladly, for the sake of God, we let our bodily members be mutilated. God will visit you swiftly" (4 Macc 10:20-21 NRSV; cf. 12:20). Vengeance has even been personified as one in pursuit of the archvillain. The author intimates that it does not take long for vengeance to stalk its prey and administer justice. "The tyrant Antiochus was both punished on earth and is being chastised after his death" (4 Macc 18:5 NRSV). And again in the same chapter we read, "For these crimes divine justice pursued and will pursue the accursed tyrant" (4 Macc 18:22 NRSV).

The author clearly perceives the martyrs' struggle as nothing less than war. It is a conflict of good against evil, God against Satan. This is again made clear from his comment after recounting the martyrs' eulogy:

Indeed it would be proper to inscribe on their tomb these words as a reminder to the people of our nation: "Here lie buried an aged priest and an aged woman and seven sons, because of the violence of the tyrant who wished to destroy the way of life of the Hebrews. They vindicated their nation, looking to God and enduring torture even to death. Truly the contest in which they were engaged was divine. (4 Macc 17:8-11 NRSV)

The mother of the seven sons has earned the complete respect of the author as an assailant in the battle against Antiochus. He gives her the tide warrior, and remarks in amazement at her spirited combat The writer goes so far as to credit her with the victory in the national struggle against the despot:

O mother, soldier of God in the cause of religion, elder and woman! By steadfastness you have conquered even a tyrant... you stood and watched Eleazar being tortured, and said to your sons in the Hebrew language, "My sons, noble is the contest to which you are called to bear witness for the nation. Fight zealously for our ancestral law. (4 Macc 16:14-16 NRSV)

In the battle against Antiochus the martyrs' role is to endure suffering and die; they are not to compromise or take up arms. The martyrs are merely to acquiesce to the tyrant's torture and sword. In performing this function they provide the key element in the battle which will defeat the enemies' forces and deliver the nation from their oppressors. This is a consistent theme throughout the book. Note these representative texts:

[the martyrs are] the cause of the downfall of tyranny over their nation, they conquered the tyrant (4 Macc 1:11 NRSV)

O mother, who with your seven sons nullified the violence of the tyrant, frustrated his evil designs. (4 Macc 17:2 NRSV; cf. 9:30)

In most of the passages commenting on the effect of the martyrs' deaths, the martyrs themselves are the agents of victory. Thus, the contribution of the martyrs is the cardinal contribution in the war effort. It justifies the amount of time devoted in 4 Maccabees to the martyrs' heroics. Without them victory would have been impossible. In the author's opinion the martyrs single-handedly defeat Antiochus and his evil forces. They accomplish his downfall by clinging to their Law, not compromising and giving clear testimony to their faith. Righteousness is the lethal weapon in their struggle. They fight by persevering in their righteousness and patiently enduring torture and martyrdom; these are the martyrs' only weapons. Their foe is Antiochus, to be sure, but only insofar as he is in league with evil. The martyrs' real enemy is Satan, and their souls are at stake in the war. The heavenly host aids their effort, and by dying the martyrs are assured of victory. The picture is nearly identical to that contained in the martyrological literature written earlier.

This evidence suggests that the martyrs, by their innocent suffering, participated in the war against Antiochus and were the principal agents of victory. Their suffering was the decisive factor in the war effort. If Horsley is indeed correct in his identification of the Fourth Philosophy, these martyrs with their theology of martyrdom are likely to have been its antecedents, and the Fourth Philosophy held many, if not all, of the above-mentioned theological constructs. Although this was principally a theology of suffering, the outcome was victory over Israel's enemies and therefore no less a revolutionary movement than any other.

6. The Sicarii.

The name sicsrii was derived from the weapon that they employed, a curved dagger like the Roman suae (Ant. 20.8.10 §186). Josephus describes them thus:

A different type of bandit known as sicarii, sprang up in Jerusalem. This group murdered people in broad daylight right in the middle of the city. Mixing with the crowds, especially during the festivals, they would conceal small daggers beneath their garments and stealthily stab their opponents. Then, when their victims fell, the murderers simply melted into the outraged crowds, undetected because of the naturalness of their presence. The first to have his throat cut was Jonathan the High Priest and after him many were murdered daily \((J.W. 2.13.3 §§254-56)\).

Some have identified these sicarii with the Zealots, others with social bandits, but as Horsley points out these sicarii are a "different type" of bandit As noted earlier, ordinary banditry is a rural activity in which the bandits pillage the wealthy. Because of their notoriety they normally congregate in hideouts and are always on the move. The sicarii, however, were urban assassins (not rural robbers) who, because of their secrecy, could live apparently normal lives (without fleeing to a hideout).

Obviously these violent tactics are not those of the Fourth Philosophy. Josephus, however, seems to suggest a connection in the leadership: "Menahem, leader of the sicarii at the outbreak of the revolt was Judas of Galilee's grandson or perhaps son" \((J.W 7.8.1 §§253-54)\). If this conclusion is correct it means that there must be some degree of correspondence between the religio-political orientation of these two groups. The assassination strategy is, however, a new development.

The tactics of assassinations first appeared during the reign of Felix in the fifties \((cf. J.W. 2.13.3 §§254-57; 2.13.6 §§264-65; Ant. 20.8.5 §§163-65; 20.8.10 §§187-88)\). Unlike the social bandits who preyed on Roman petty officials and supply trains, the sicarii apparently attacked the Jewish aristocracy. These attacks took one of three forms. First, there were the selective assassinations of the ruling elite. The assassination of the high priest Jonathan is an example. Second, the sicarii slaughtered selected pro-Roman members of the Jewish aristocracy who lived in the countryside. These attacks also included plundering and burning selected aristocratic estates \((J.W. 2.13.6 §§264-66; Ant. 20.8.6 §172)\). Third, the sicarii practiced terrorist hostage-taking.

These attacks of the sicarii helped precipitate a revolutionary situation. They led to distrust among the ruling elite, fear among the aristocracy and catalyzed the fragmentation of the social order. That which normally provided the upper class with security began to erode and vague feelings of anxiety and insecurity came in their place; anyone could be next. The fragmentation of the ruling class was inevitable; individual personal safety became society's most important value. Thus, instead of cooperative efforts to protect their interests, the ecclesiastical aristocracy and ruling class began hiring personal armies to protect their interests (Ant. 20.9.2 §§206-7). By responding with force and violence the ruling class further contributed to the breakdown of the social fiber and helped set the stage for the First Jewish Revolt.

The sicarii's role in the revolt itself seems quite limited. Apparently, at first they were not in the midst of the fray, but before long they entered the action. They helped in the siege of the Upper City and its aristocratic inhabitants (J.W. 2.17.6 §425); they also helped raze the royal palaces and the residence of the high priest Ananias. Shonly thereafter conflict broke out between the sicarii and the rest of the revolutionary forces. Within weeks the main body of the sicarii either had been executed, had retreated to Masada or had fled into hiding. The sicarii who occupied Masada sat out the rest of the war and preyed upon the surrounding countryside for their food supplies. In AD. 73 the Romans attacked Masada, one of the last holdouts, only to discover that all of its occupants had committed suicide (J.W. 7.8.6-9.1 §§320-401).

7. The Zealots.

Although Luke mentions a certain Simon "the zealot" (Lk 6:15; Acts 1:13) this is probably a characterizing name (namely, Simon was zealous), rather than a technical term identifying his affiliation with a revolutionary party (see Disciples). The Zealot party per se was not formed until the winter of A.D. 67-68. The party's origins can be traced back to the clash between the Roman procurator Florus (A.D. 64-66) and the Jerusalem citizenry. During his term Florus had pilfered the Temple* treasure, allowed his army to loot the city and attempted to capture and control the Temple. With such abuses left without redress and the city in a rebellious mood, the lower priests began to agitate for war. The Temple captain, Eleazar, son of Ananias, provided leadership and, together with the lower priests and the revolutionary leaders of the populace, decided to terminate the sacrifices offered twice each day on behalf of Rome and the Roman emperor (J.W. 2.17.2 §§409-10). Previously, the offering of this sacrifice had been negotiated as a satisfactory substitute for emperor worship and therefore was a tangible sign of Jewish loyalty to Rome. Thus the refusal to offer sacrifices was tantamount to a declaration of war; it broke the peace treaty, and Israel was now regarded outside the Roman Empire (J.W. 2.17.3 §415). The Temple was subsequently cleansed and Israel began again to show its absolute fidelity to the Torah. God was about to shower the nation with blessing.

The chief priests and leading Pharisees, however, resisted the changes, and civil war soon broke out. Eleazar was joined by the sicarii (J. W. 2.17.5 §423) and together they defeated their rivals. But a power struggle ensued, with the sicarii battling Eleazar and his faithful; the sicarii were defeated and took refuge in Masada. Eleazar was now in control in Jerusalem. In August of 66, however, Cestius, the governor of Syria, bolstered with Roman forces, attacked Jerusalem. Through an unexpected turn of events Cestius abandoned the siege of Jerusalem and, in the process of retreat lost a good number of troops. Buoyed by their success, most of Jerusalem and Judea rallied around the revolutionary cause. Now basically unified, the nation named Ananus, the high priest as its head. The traditional high priests resumed their positions, and Eleazar joined them as general to Idumea (J. W. 2.20.4 §566).

The Romans then began their reconquest during the summer and fall of A.D. 67 they had subdued Galilee and were marching through Judea. The brigands and revolutionary forces in these areas were retreating. As these fugitives, as well as those from Idumea and Perea, took refuge in the city, their own views seemed to resonate with those lower priests who had started the revolt with the cessation of the sacrifices on behalf of Rome. This new coalition is the group Josephus calls "zealots." The Zealots agitated against the ecclesiastical aristocracy and soon decided to assert themselves. First, they attacked some Hero-dian nobles against whom they still had some "ancient quarrel" and who also were accused of treason (J.W. 4.3.4-5 §§140-146). These "ancient quarrels" almost certainly were focused on those members of the nobility who were wealthy landowners with a large number of peasants indebted to them. The Zealots, regardless of the Roman threat, were also fighting a class war against the Jewish aristocracy.

Obviously, this activity against the Herodian nobility would give rise to anxiety throughout the rest of Israel's upper class. If this discriminate violence were not enough, the Zealots elected by lot their own people to priestly offices—even installing an uneducated lay person in the office of high priest. Without doubt the Zealots were conspiring for political control. Given the inflammatory nature of this Zealot activity, it is no surprise that the Jewish aristocracy immediately turned on the Zealots and viciously attacked them (J.W. 4.3.6-8
Incited by Ananus and Jesus son of Gamala, both high priests, the people of Jerusalem forced the Zealots into the inner court (J.W. 4.3.12 §§197-204). Trapped in the Temple, the Zealots contacted sympathizers outside of Jerusalem to free them (J.W. 4.4.1 §§224-32). The Idumeans responded, freed the Zealots and slaughtered Ananus and Jesus, son of Gamala. While they were at it, a number of other nobles also were assassinated (J.W. 4.4.2-3 §§233-53). There was yet another purge of Jerusalem's nobility, and this one also included many who were formerly in power, as well as the wealthy.

Within the Zealot ranks, however, all was not well. Many of the Zealots were not responsive to the dictatorial ways of John of Gischala. Since John could not gain absolute authority among the Zealots, he broke away to form his own revolutionary faction (J.W. 4.7.1 §§389-96). John's independence, however, was short-lived. The messianic movement by Simon bar Giora was a threat to the Zealot regime in Jerusalem, and a good part of John's army deserted so that John and the Zealots again formed an alliance. This alliance, however, did not prevent Simon bar Giora from attempting to liberate the city from the Zealots and John of Gischala (J.W 4.9.11 §§571-76). Simon was able to force the Zealots back into the Temple (J.W. 4.9.12 §§577-84). The faction-prone Zealots split over the leadership of John. Josephus records that for a time there was even a three-way battle raging. Simon bar Giora, in control of Jerusalem, pressed in upon John of Gischala who was fighting to control the Temple courtyard and was caught between Simon and the rest of the Zealot party who were in the inner court above the Temple (J.W. 5.1.1-3 §§1-12). Shortly thereafter, John was able to reconcile himself to the rest of the Zealot party, although he was only able to accomplish it by way of trickery. John of Gischala was now the Zealot leader again (J.W. 5.2.3-3.2 §§67-106).

By this time the Romans were at Jerusalem's gates; this threat galvanized the rival factions to form a united front. The Jews, however, were no match for the Romans. During the siege the Zealots were the smallest of the rival groups and therefore had the least significant role to play (2,400 Zealots, 6,000 others under John of Gischala, 15,000 under Simon bar Giora). Nevertheless, the Zealots, in spite of their less significant role did fight courageously to the end in cooperation with their Jewish rivals against the overwhelming military strength of the Romans (J. W. 5.6.1-9.3 §§248-374).

The Zealots should be remembered primarily for their thwarting of the nobility's plan to negotiate a settlement with the Romans. Moreover, the Zealots were not the Fourth Philosophy mentioned by Josephus; indeed, they were not a sect or philosophy at all. Furthermore, the Zealots were not in the vanguard among those who were agitating for rebellion, but once the revolt was underway and the only choice was to fight or to flee, they stayed and fought to the death.

8. Conclusion.

The centuries leading up to the First and Second Jewish Revolts were very painful for the Jewish nation. The political subjugation by foreign nations was extremely difficult, as well as the erosion of religious, cultural and socioeconomic structures. Israel's general response to the unrest was revolt, but not always via armed rebellion. The social bandits, Zealots, sicarii and messianic pretenders generally advocated armed rebellion and agitated for a military solution. These groups, however, often fought among themselves, significantly weakening their impact. The other response, generally advocated by the apocalypticists, prophets and martyrs, believed in waiting upon God who, they believed, was about to intervene and personally defeat the enemy. The Fourth Philosophy, generally identifiable as having a genealogical link with the Maccabean martyrs, advocated suffering and martyrdom in order to move God to deliver Israel. None of these responses, however, was adequate to deal with the Roman threat. After the Second Jewish Revolt (A.D. 132-35) Israel lost its political identity for almost two millennia.

RRHETORICAL CRITICISM

Rhetorical criticism is the analysis of portions of the Gospels or an entire Gospel according to Greco-Roman and modern rhetorical and literary conventions and theories. It is the effort to understand the Gospel writer's message, its structure and persuasive techniques, how individual passages as well as the Gospel as a whole were intended to influence an audience, and how various audiences actually would respond.

1. Introduction
2. The Muilenburg Approach
3. The Greco-Roman Approach
4. The Distinctive Role of the Chreia
5. The Literary-Critical Approach

1. Introduction.

Rhetorical criticism is one of several tools for interpreting the Gospels. It is best used in conjunction with the traditional methods of source (see Synoptic Problem), form* and redaction* criticisms. The insights of each informs the others. For example, the findings of source criticism provide the working assumption that Mark and Q* are literary sources for Matthew and Luke. Redaction criticism clarifies how the writer of Matthew and Luke adapted the material of Mark and Q to suit their rhetorical needs. Form criticism partially explains how Gospel tradition received its current shape as a result of the rhetorical needs of worship,* teaching and preaching.

Rhetorical criticism of the Gospels has precursors in studies at the turn of this century. However, these dealt mostly with stylistics, neglecting the important matters of the formation of argumentation (invention) and the placement of these in a persuasive order (arrangement). Rhetorical criticism, which today uses a more comprehensive system encompassing invention, arrangement and style, is still in its infancy. It exhibits many exciting trends that are not yet fully evaluated, developed or integrated. The following approaches are those currently definable within published literature.

2. The Muilenburg Approach.

J. Muilenburg originated a proposal and methodology for the use of rhetorical criticism in biblical studies in general. In his presidential address to the Society of Biblical Literature in 1968, Muilenburg pointed out the deficiency of form criticism in that it emphasizes the conventional elements of literary genre and composition to the neglect of the individual and unique features of a given pericope—its artistry. He proposed supplementing form criticism with an examination of the linguistic patterns of a pericope in order to discover the author's thoughts and the process by which the author put his or her thoughts into written language.

The methodology Muilenburg offered delimits the literary unit and observes major motifs, points of climax and inclusio. This is followed by discovering the structure of the unit (macro-structure) and the configuration of its component parts (micro-structure). Clues to these are found in features such as rhetorical questions, parallelism, repetitions, antitheses, strophes and chiasm. The interrelationship of the structure and its parts gives insight into the meaning of the text as a whole.

Muilenburg's methodology has been utilized in Gospel studies. One significant work is J. Dewey's study of Mark 2:1—3:6. Dewey first identifies literary devices such as insertion, intercalation and concentric structures, then describes how each device functions in the text, and finally sees what rhetorical stress shows us about the theological intentions and emphases of the narrative.
She concludes that concentric literary patterns are a key feature organizing Mark's Gospel.

3. The Greco-Roman Approach.

Rhetorical criticism is also conducted using the principles of persuasion that were current within the era of the Gospels themselves. The primary materials are the rhetorical handbooks of the Greco-Roman age, particularly those of Aristotle, Cicero and Quin-tilian. These handbooks contain discussions of how to speak persuasively, and thereby provide modern-day scholars with tools to evaluate the rhetorical features of the Gospels.

Very early in the development of this approach W. Kurz demonstrated that Luke’s christological proofs that Jesus was the prophesied Christ are the rhetorical enthymeme as understood by Aristotle. Enthymemes are arguments constructed from a premise and conclusion with one premise unstated. In light of other rhetorical conventions evident in Luke-Acts, he argued for the likelihood that Luke was trained in rhetoric as part of his secondary education.

The classicist G. Kennedy has proposed a five-step methodology for rhetorical criticism using Greco-Roman rhetorical handbooks.

(1) Determine the rhetorical unit.

(2) Analyze the rhetorical situation's three components of exigence (the reason the author wrote), the audience and the constraints brought to bear on the exigence by the rhetor.

(3) Determine the species of rhetoric, the question and the stasis. The three species are judicial (the rhetoric of accusation and defense), deliberative (persuasion and dissuasion) and epideictic (praise and blame). The question is any subject on which two or more opinions can be offered. The four stases, or bases for a cause, are fact, definition, quality and legal.

(4) Analyze invention, arrangement and style. Invention is the mustering of evidence to support a position. Arrangement is the positioning of this supporting material into exordium (introduction), narratio (exposition of facts), partitio (listing of the propositions), probatio (support for the propositions), refutatio (refutation of the opposition) and peroratio (summary and emotional appeal).
Style is choosing the language and figures of speech and thought to best convey the position.

(5) Evaluate the rhetorical effectiveness of the material.

Kennedy has provided several cursory rhetorical analyses of select portions of the Gospels. Regarding the Sermon on the Mount* (Mt 5—7), the rhetorical situation as presented by Matthew is an outdoor address on a hill to the disciples and the crowds who are attracted to him as a healer (4:24-25). The healing miracles, fulfillment of OT prophecies, and the disciples and eyewitnesses provide external proof. The exigence is provided by Jesus' understanding of his mission and his anticipation of its effect. The species of rhetoric is deliberative, for it gives advice on a course of action advantageous to the audience regarding the future (5:29-30; 7:24). The focus is what should be done and by whom, so the stasis is one of fact The arrangement is an exordium (The Beatitudes 5:3-16) followed by a propositio (5:17-20) with two propositions: the Law* and prophets are fulfilled (5:17) and the righteousness of the audience must exceed that of the Pharisees* and scribes* (5:20). These propositions are developed in the probatio in 5:21-48 and 6:1-18 and 6:19—7:20 respectively. The first unit is supported mainly by ethos (authority) and pathos (appeal to emotion), and the second by logos or enthymemes. The epilog (7:21-27) contains both summary (7:21-23) and appeal to pathos (7:24-27).

The Sermon on the Plain (Lk 6:17-49) does not have the clear structure of the Sermon on the Mount Kennedy suggests that the exordium is 6:20-26, the propositio 6:27-31, the probatio 6:32-45, and the peroratio 6:46-49. The species seems to be deliberative overall, but contains much epideictic.

Kennedy sees the Sermon on the Mount as Matthew's collection of material representative of Jesus' speeches to the crowds and not a verbatim account of a sermon delivered at one particular time. Luke's Sermon on the Plain may simply be a condensed version of what was typical of Jesus' preaching.

Kennedy also analyzes the Farewell Discourse* of John 13—17. It is classified as epideictic rhetoric, particularly the subspecies of consolation. The entire discourse is a rhetorical unit. The rhetorical situation is the Last Supper* and the exigence is the distress of the disciples as Jesus' death draws near and their deficient understanding of his mission.
The exordium is 13:1 which introduces the topics of the remainder of the discourse. The narratio follows in 13:2-30 and the propositio in 13:31-35, restating the topics of the exordium. The consolation proper is the probatio of 14:1—16:28. The epilog is 16:29-33, with a larger epilog being composed of all of chapter 17.

On the rhetoric of the Gospels in general, Kennedy, like Kurz, states that Luke may have had some formal rhetorical training. All the Gospels, however have rhetorical features, especially those common to encomiastic biography (see Gospel [Genre]). Matthew most widely uses the elements of rhetoric, particularly in his interest to provide the audience with logical proof that Jesus was the Messiah (see Christ). Mark is an example of radical Christian rhetoric, rhetoric characterized by absolute claims of authority* devoid of logical proof. Luke is noted for his prosopopoeia, recreating speech and dialog for characters as they are likely to have occurred on an occasion (e.g., Magnificat; see Mary's Song). Of the Gospel writers Luke is the closest to a classical biographer. John is noted for its elevated style or hypsos created by great thoughts, strong emotion, elevation in the use of figures, choice of diction and arrangement of words.

4. The Distinctive Role of the Chreia.

Central to rhetorical criticism of the Gospels is the ancient chreia (pl. chreiai; see Chreia/Aphorism). A chreia is a concise saying or action that is attributed to a person and useful for daily living. The chreia was common to both oral and written expression in the Greco-Roman world, and was particularly a feature of ancient biography. The chreiai are the literary form of the sayings and actions of Jesus which are recounted in the Gospels, particularly the Synoptics. An example would be: "Now after John was arrested, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of God, and saying, 'The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent and believe in the gospel' " (Mk 1:14-15 RSV). Discussions of the chreiai are found in the school-book exercises of Greece and Rome called Progymnasmata.

An understanding of the chreiai gives us new insights into the formation, oral transmission and literary composition of the Gospel tradition. The sayings and actions of Jesus circulated as chreiai, both orally and as written collections. The Synoptic Gospel writers used them in conventional ways to produce rhetorically effective biographies. Since the chreia was a major part of the curriculum in the ancient grammar school, the Synoptic Gospel writers' knowledge of the chreia and their ability to use it makes it most probable that they had at least a grammar-school education. The discovery of the use of chreiai by the Synoptics has reshaped and reintroduced old issues. The study of ancient chreiai indicates that the practice of manipulating a chreia in a variety of ways (particularly recitation and expansion) introduced minor or major modifications in the wording of the chreia, though the meaning remained essentially the same. These findings illumine the issue of the relation of the words and deeds of Jesus related in the Gospels to those of the historical Jesus. The sayings and actions of Jesus were placed in chreiai form, thus providing some parameters for their faithful transmission in tradition. However, we must account for some elaboration of the wording of the sayings and actions of Jesus in the formation and transmission of the chreiai, as well as in their incorporation into the Gospel framework. Those who passed on the Jesus tradition and the Gospel writers themselves edited the chreiai. It was customary to embellish internal description, expand brief dialogs and align the point of the chreia with the needs of the discourse, although without change in meaning.

5. The Literary-Critical Approach.

Rhetorical criticism is also performed using modern literary criticism. In literary criticism a distinction is often made between the content of the narrative (the story) and the form of the narrative (the rhetoric). The content of the narrative involves narrator, characters, settings, narrative patterns and plot. The form of the narrative includes how rhetorical devices are used to create the desired impact of the narrative on the reader. Thus there is a great deal of overlap between rhetorical and literary criticism. One particularly notable work by R Tannehill studies the rhetorical form of Jesus' sayings in the Synoptics and how their form and content challenge the audience to accept new insight and action.

The Gospels of Mark and John have received careful scrutiny from this perspective. These studies try to determine how the rhetoric of the Gospel narrative establishes authority with and has its impact on the reader. It does so through a study of narrator, style and narrative patterns. In one prominent study Rhoads and Michie conclude that Mark is an omniscient narrator unbound by time or space, speaking from an ideological point of view, who can give the inside view of the characters' minds. Mark's style is terse, lively, direct, with rapid movement of action and characters. Episodes in series of three, two-step progressions, concentric patterns, repetition, questions and framing are characteristic narrative patterns in Mark.

5.1. Socio-Rhetorical Criticism. Another promising approach using literary criticism, first espoused by V. Robbins, is that of Socio-Rhetorical Criticism. Using the literary criticism of K. Burke, Robbins stresses that an author persuades an audience by using forms which cause the audience to identify with the author's interests. From the identification of interests the author establishes rapport with the audience. Robbins analyzes and compares the intermingling of social, cultural, religious and literary traditions and forms of Mark and the ancient Mediterranean world. Mark is found to be a biography depicting the career of a disciple-gathering teacher* who enacted a system of thought and action. Mark portrays Jesus as a composite of the biblical prophets* and the Greco-Roman philosopher-teachers. In so doing he makes Jesus understandable and identifiable to first-century Mediterranean society.

5.2. Reader-Response Criticism. Another subcategory of literary criticism, Reader-Response Criticism, seeks to investigate how the reader responds to a text It seeks to understand how an author controls and directs the reader and how a reader creates meaning from interaction with the text. It attempts to gauge the rhetorical impact of a manuscript on its various types of readers. J. Staley has analyzed the implied reader in the Fourth Gospel, that is, the reader that the author has invited us to become as we read. He discovers that the author of the Gospel used the rhetorical strategy of "reader victimization" in which the implied reader is led to assume he or she understands and is an insider, only to be forced to be a misunderstanding outsider. After each instance of victimization the implied reader is made an insider again through irony and inside information.

Rhetorical criticism is clearly an interdisciplinary approach to the Gospels which has already yielded many new insights into the message of the Gospels. It will continue to be a major tool in Gospel interpretation.

RICH AND POOR

In the first-century Palestinian world the main classes were a relatively small wealthy class and a large poor, peasant and artisan class, in some contexts referred to as "the people of the land." Judaism* dealt with this social disparity by accepting it and encouraging the wealthy to give alms to the poorest of the poor. Jesus, however, saw wealth as a hindrance to entering the kingdom of God (see Kingdom of God) and pronounced a blessing on those poor who were seeking God. He taught his followers a radical ethic (see Ethics of Jesus) of giving based on trust in God* and the coming of the kingdom (i.e., an eschatological perspective) and lived out in the context of the new community of disciples.* The texts indicate that Jesus is to be understood from within this eschatological perspective as a Jewish sage, not as a lawgiver or a teacher* of an unattainable ideal.

1. Rich and Poor in First-Century Judaism
2. Rich and Poor in the Teaching of Jesus
3. Eschatology and the Ethic of Jesus

1. Rich and Poor in First-Century Judaism.

The material in the Gospels on rich and poor is set against a background of the social world of Jesus' day and the response that Judaism was making to that world. It was not without reason that Jesus has more to say on this topic than on almost any other he chose to address.

1.1. The Social World of First-Century Judaism. In the first-century Palestinian world there were essentially two major groups of people, the rich and the poor. The rich included especially the wealthy high-priestly clans (see Priest and Priesthood). Consisting of four extended families, they must be distinguished from the lower clergy (e.g., Zachariah of Luke's birth narrative) who were in general poor and felt oppressed by the high-priestly group. It was the chief priests who not only profited from the sacrifices offered in the Temple* (the lower clergy officiated for only two weeks a year, while the high-priestly clans were always present) but also controlled the considerable commerce associated with that sacrifice and other religious activities (e.g., the activity noted in Mk 11:15-19).

Another wealthy group was the Herodian* family and retinue, whose political power was easily translated into wealth. It has been estimated that Herod and later his family may have owned more than half the land in his dominions. Gifts of land to faithful followers were not unusual.

The third group of wealthy people were the remnants of the older Jewish aristocracy (although much of their land was confiscated by Herod and his sons) and individuals who had become rich through trade, tax* farming or the like. To be considered truly rich one had to own land, so a person would purchase landholdings as he became wealthy, but such a person would not farm his own land. Instead, he rented it to tenant farmers and spent much of his time on civic and religious affairs in the city (principally, Jerusalem). This system led to the abuse of tenants and hired laborers, which mistreatment was seen by the wealthy as perfectly legal, but was viewed by the poor as totally unjust (cf. Jas 5:1-6).

A final group of wealthy people were the prosperous merchants who had not yet joined the landowning aristocracy, although like them they controlled much of the economic life of the country. Both the land-owning and non-land-owning groups were deeply resented by the people of the land. It was no accident that during the Jewish revolt of A.D. 66-70, when the common people got the upper hand in Jerusalem, one of their first acts was the burning of the debt records and the slaughter of many of the aristocrats.
Religiously and socially then, the four groups of wealthy people could be split into two groups: (1) observant Jewish leaders and (2) those wealthy persons associated with the Herodians and Romans, whose power gained them a certain acceptance, but who were considered to be moral outcasts (i.e., "Jews who have made themselves Gentiles"), although obviously one dared not despise them too openly. Both groups at times used their power to oppress the lower classes. The less religious group did it through sheer abuse of power. The observant group justified their oppression through legal interpretation, which in the eyes of Jesus was viewed as more culpable, for it appeared to put God on the side of injustice.

Although there was a small middle class of some of the skilled artisans, land-owning medium-sized farmers and merchants (and socially, although not economically, the lower clergy), the second major social group was the poor, the peasants, the "people of the land" (’am āh-āres, although the Hebrew term was also used with a broader meaning, as will be seen below). This group included several sub-groups.

The best-off were the small landowners, who tended to lead a precarious life which depended on the harvest. A bad year or two could spell the loss of their land to the wealthy neighbor who lent them seed after the first crop failure. It could also mean the starvation of their family.* The tenant farmers were next best-off, although they had to pay their landlord his due before providing for their own families. Worst off were those without land (and without the skills of artisans), the hired laborers and the beggars. They were the truly poor. Their hand-to-mouth existence was considered hardly worth living. Mixed in among these various levels of poorer people were such trades as fishermen and carpenters, whose social level depended on their relative prosperity, even though they were landless. Zebedee, for example, appears to have been relatively prosperous, for he had hired workers on his boats, not simply family. Jesus' family, on the other hand, offered the sacrifice of the poor when he was born (Lk 2:24), but it is possible that when established back in Galilee they may have had a higher (if still modest) standard of living, which skilled work could at times command.

Cultural differences existed among the "people of the land" in that some (perhaps eight per cent of the population) were urban-dwellers and thus closer to the life and values of the urban elite, while the rest (i.e., ninety per cent of the people) were villagers, a step removed from the urban centers. A village carpenter, for example, would probably have been viewed by his urban fellow-carpenter as a "rustic," for his values would have been more those of the small landowner than those of the urban elite.

There were other minor classes in Jewish society. There were some slaves, although in Palestine hired laborers were preferred since slaves had to be cared for in bad years and Jewish ones then released in the Sabbath* year. Furthermore, Gentile slaves might convert to Judaism and receive all the rights of Jewish slaves. Slaves tended to be house-servants in the city. There were also Jews who were forced (or chose) to drop out of respectable society and become outcasts ("Jews who had made themselves Gentiles"): tax collectors, hired shepherds, tanners, prostitutes.* All except the tax collectors were among the poor, but the tax collectors, even if financially well-off, were never counted among the higher classes.

The poor in Judaism, then, included first of all those who owned no land (a definition based on the OT categories of poor, principally the Levite, the foreigner, the widow and the orphan). But because some non-landowners were wealthy, there was in the NT period also a secondary definition of poor in financial terms (reflected in m. Pe'a. 8:7-8, which was recorded by A.D. 250). However defined, the poor lived on the edge of existence even in the best of times, for to be in an agricultural economy without owning sufficient productive land to provide security is to be economically marginal. Yet the first century was not the best of times. Even if they managed to scrape by in normal years, the first century included years of famine, especially in the 40s (Josephus Ant. 20.2.5 records one incidence). This threat could never be far from any of the poorer people. Then there were Roman (or Herodian) taxes to pay and on top of that the Law prescribed a tithe (which could amount to from seventeen to twenty-three per cent of one's gross income). It is no wonder that the "people of the land" in general were looked down on by the religious as lax in their observance of the Law.

This laxness was not universal in that many of the later rabbis and even the great Pharisaic teachers of Jesus' day appear to have been poor, at least during their time of study and in some cases throughout their life (teachers did not charge for their teaching). Yet most of the Pharisees were urban-dwellers, while most peasants in the village lacked the zeal and discipline of the rabbis or their closeness to the high culture. Their legal observance (and knowledge of the Law) was minimal and based on village tradition. On the one hand, the choice for them often appeared to be between the piety proclaimed by city-dwellers and starvation. On the other hand, even if they had a desire to follow the law exactly, their hand-to-mouth existence left little time for study and meditation or for being sure all food was kosher and the tithe (in its Pharisaic sense) meticulously paid.

Thus, virtually all poor peasants were considered among "the masses" or the "people of the land" (ʾam hā-āres), which was for the Pharisees more a religious than a socioeconomic classification. In the OT it indicates either those who are not aristocrats (the earlier OT material) or non-Jews living within the traditional Jewish land (Ezra-Nehemiah). In rabbinic literature (thus beginning in the NT period) it frequently refers to those who are not observant of the Law as opposed to the Pharisees (and later rabbis). Virtually all rural peasants were included within this category, for, as we have noted, the Pharisees were predominantly town-dwellers. As a result, this pejorative term could include not simply the economically poor, but also somewhat better-off individuals (including the tiny middle class) and even the wealthy, unless they made the effort to follow the Pharisaic concept of purity (see Clean and Unclean). In general practice, however, it usually designated the semi-observant masses, the peasant population.

1.2. The Response of Judaism to Social Inequality. Judaism in general did not have any problem with wealth. Possessions were not viewed as evil. Indeed, because of the OT stories of Abraham, Solomon and Job, there was a tendency to connect wealth with the blessing of God (the piety-prosperity equation), but while for the most part this attitude continued in the first century, it was modified in two directions. On the one hand, the empirical observation was made that wealth tended to beget greed and the abuse of power. And in a society in which the supply of wealth was believed to be limited, any gathering of wealth which was not clearly from God was suspected of being done through such abuse (cf. Malina 1981, 75-78). In fact, in the light of the experience of the righteous (see Justice, Righteousness) under the Seleucid rulers and later the Hasmoneans and Herods, it even appeared that most wealth was gained by injustice and that righteousness tended to make one poor. Some inter-testamental writers questioned if there were any wealthy people who were righteous (Sir 31:3-10). On the other hand, the same authors made it clear that a wealthy person could be righteous or honorable (especially if the wealth had been inherited) and the way that he or she could demonstrate this righteousness was through charity. Thus in Jewish tradition Abraham and Job were singled out as being wealthy persons who were righteous because they excelled in generosity (see Jub. or T.Job).
The real problem in first-century Judaism was that of poverty, especially the poverty of the righteous. Some anthropologically oriented scholars argue that the poverty that was a problem was that caused by the loss of one's inherited position, whether that position was economically rich or poor. This resulted in the OT categories of poor as noted above (cf. Malina 1981, 84). However, although this may have been true for the OT period, it does not completely fit that of the NT. A number of rabbinic sayings note the economic misery of the life of the poorer peasant (e.g., Lev Rab. 34:6 on Lev 25:25; b. B. Bat. 116a; b. Sanh. 151b). As it was later expressed, "There is nothing in the world more grievous than poverty—the most terrible of all sufferings. Our Teachers said: all sufferings are on one side and poverty is on the other" (Ex R. 31:12 on Ex 22:24). Furthermore, the Jesus tradition (e.g., Lk 6) contrasts the poor, not with the greedy or the wicked (as in the OT), but with the rich, showing that economic issues had become more important James also exhibits this pattern. Economic lack was a problem, even if inherited social status was not ignored.

The first response of Judaism to the poor was to encourage the voluntary sharing of wealth, for outside of assistance from a person's extended family, charity or almsgiving was the only form of social assistance available. Governments of that day only intervened, if at all, when mass starvation was threatened (and in those cases the motives were to preserve future tax revenues and prevent social unrest). Almsgiving included (1) private charitable actions (e.g., giving to a beggar, forgiving a debt, providing for the proper burial of an impoverished person), which in the case of the wealthy could include significant aid to large areas (Queen Helena of Adiabene, for example, sent major food aid to Jerusalem in the 40s); (2) group charitable actions (i.e., those organized through a village council of elders* or a synagogue*); (3) religious charity (e.g., the charitable fund collected and distributed through the Temple). Later Judaism would develop a highly organized system of collection and distribution of charity. In the first century, however, individual initiative in almsgiving was the primary force.

The giving of alms was therefore viewed by Judaism in general as a very important righteous work in the eyes of God. In fact, in rabbinic Judaism only meditation on Torah could have outranked charity as a righteous deed. Deeds of charity were seen as greater than all the commandments (b. B. Bat. 9a, b) and defended the giver before God whenever Satan tried to accuse him (Ex Rab. 31:1). In other words, almsgiving was so significant that the term "righteousness" became synonymous with the giving of alms. Because of this,
"The poor do more for the wealthy than do the wealthy for the poor," for the poor provide the righteous with a means of gaining merit with God (b. Sabb. 151b). On the negative side, evil comes upon Israel because of the neglect of obedience to the OT laws of giving to the poor (m. 'Abot 5:9). One does not know exactly how much of this attitude can be attributed to the time of Jesus, but charity was certainly highly ranked: "Upon three things the world stands: the Law, worship [i.e., the service of God, including obedience], and deeds of loving-kindness [i.e., almsgiving and other charitable acts]" (m. 'Abot. 1:2); in fact, charity is equivalent to sacrifice and atones for sins (Sir 35:1-2; 3:3-4).

At the same time, at least in rabbinic circles, the giving of alms was not viewed as a means of changing a person's social status, but as a means of rescuing him or her from the misfortune into which they had fallen and restoring them to their former station in life. Differing social status itself was not viewed as a problem. Thus a peasant who needed alms would not be supported at the same level as an impoverished aristocrat For example, there is the (possibly apocryphal) story about Hillel, a contemporary of Jesus, who upon discovering that an impoverished member of a noble family was travelling, arranged that he be provided with a horse. But there was no servant to run in front of the man, so the rabbi himself took the role so the man could travel in the style appropriate to his rank (b. Ketub. 67b). This is certainly charity, but it is a charity which took social rank into account Thus, while almsgiving was not to raise persons above their normal social rank, it might restore a noble person to his or her rank and fortune (e.g., an appropriately generous dowry might be provided so that a woman might marry at her accustomed status level).

Yet at the same time, there was, as noted above, a social status below which life was miserable. Thus, we find that people who fall below a certain level (defined in m. Pe'a 8, some discussions of which are first century) are always subjects of charity, whether it is their inherited status or not In other words, once people were separated from inherited land the traditional social distinctions began to break down and economic ones started to take their place.

Charity was covered by a number of areas of Jewish Law, not simply the encouragements to almsgiving. Observant Jews not only gave the poor tithe in the third year and alms throughout the year, but also allowed the poor to glean in their fields and left their fields fallow one year in seven with the poor being allowed to gather what grew of itself. The repeated OT theme of caring for the poor was not lost in later Judaism, even if it was regulated.
At the same time, there was a recognition that even with plenty of charity the rich and powerful would tend to oppress the righteous. In other words, in this world righteousness tended to make one poor. This led to two final responses. First the community of the righteous was in all likelihood the community of the poor (this identification is made explicitly in the Dead Sea Scrolls* and in the Pharisaic Psalms of Solomon). It is this community that must exercise generosity. Second, wealth will come to the righteous, but not in this age. God will redress all wrongs in the age to come, when the righteous poor of this age will reap the reward of their charitable deeds. This eschatological piety-prosperity equation is also important in considering the teaching of Jesus.

Jesus fits into the social situation of first-century Palestine as we have come to know it. He himself belonged to the people of the land as the son of a carpenter who owned neither inherited land nor land he had acquired himself (Mt 8:20; Lk 9:58). He was not an officially recognized teacher, but a charismatic leader with a ragtag group of followers (which explains the negative response to him in Nazareth, where his class origins were well known, Mk 6:3). He accepted the outcasts of society and was frequently found associating with the poor. This provides the immediate context for his teaching.

That teaching is reported in the Synoptic Gospels (the Fourth Gospel having relatively little to say on this topic). While Mark has some significant narratives and sayings on the issue, the vast majority of the teaching is found in Q* material, blocks of which occur in Matthew 6 and in Luke 6, 12 and 16. Of the two Gospels Luke has both more material than Matthew and a stronger form of the material which both include. For example, Luke includes woes along with his Beatitudes (Lk 6:20-26; see Blessing and Woe), which sharpen the teaching by explicitly stating the obverse. Therefore it can be said fairly that Luke has a special interest in the topic (which is the reason that most of the studies on Jesus' economic teaching focus on Luke), although the same general attitude is shared by Matthew and perhaps also by Mark. The three Evangelists give a consistent picture of Jesus' attitude toward wealth and poverty. Furthermore, the viewpoint they share is consistent with the ancient Mediterranean view that goods are limited and that collection of wealth by some implies the loss of basic subsistence for others. Yet Jesus does not accept inherited wealth to the same degree that his contemporaries did.
2.1. The Danger of Wealth. While Jesus never looks on possessions per se as evil (he was not a dualist), for him wealth was not something safe, but a dangerous substance. In many of his sayings it is personified as Mammon (which in the Aramaic of Jesus' day meant simply "possessions" and could be viewed as evil or neutral, depending on its modifiers) and functions exactly as the idols did in the eyes of ancient Hebrew prophets in that it seductively draws people away from total allegiance to God. For example, in the parable of the sower (Mk 4:18-19) it is "the deceit of wealth and the desires for other things" that come in and choke the word, making it unfruitful, just as if it had been snatched by Satan (see Devil, Demons, Satan) or burned out by persecution. Here wealth is personified and acts with effects similar to that of personal evil (i.e., Satan), although in a slower, less dramatic way. It draws the person away from God.

The issue is not simply a matter of giving both possessions and God their proper place. Both God and possessions (i.e., Mammon) claim a person's service. Mammon's claim is evident: Wealth must be preserved; daily bread must be earned. Yet Jesus categorically rejects that there is a proper service of Mammon: It is impossible to serve both money and God (Mt 6:24).

This impossibility is underlined by his next point for, far from being a mark of divine favor, wealth makes it impossible to enter the kingdom (see Kingdom of God). This constitutes a total denial (at least in the terms of this world) of the piety-prosperity equation. This idea is presented in a number of ways. The Markan story of the rich young man ends in all three Synoptics with the comment "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God" (Mk 10:25). This clearly means that the salvation of the rich is an impossibility. Can such folk never be saved? "All things are possible with God," responds Jesus to the shocked question of his disciples. Luke follows his version of this story with the Zacchaeus narrative (Lk 19:1-10), which shows the impossible taking place. But this does not leave Zacchaeus rich (i.e., his possession of riches is not neutral), for in the process Zacchaeus gives up his wealth. It is only when he announces this intention that Jesus responds, "Salvation has come to this house today."

Jesus also emphasizes the impossibility of serving both God and money in his parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31). Abraham says to the rich man in Hades, "In your lifetime you received your good things ... but now . . . you are in agony." This fits with the woe of Luke 6:24, "Woe to you who are rich, for you have already received your comfort" In the parable the woe receives a literal pictorial presentation, showing that to hold on to one's comfort today is to risk damnation tomorrow.

Finally, the parable of the rich fool (Lk 12:16-21) emphasizes once again that one cannot serve both God and Mammon. The rich man in the story, who simply has the good fortune of a bumper crop, prudently takes the excess of the present and stores it for the future, rejoicing that his future will be free from financial worry. That worldly prudence qualifies him in Jesus' eyes as a fool. The mere possession of this windfall condemns him. He has stored up for himself instead of giving to the poor (and thereby becoming "rich towards God").

2.2. The Only Healthy Use of Wealth Is in the Care of the Poor. In both of the parables cited above there are implied alternatives to the behavior of the rich. The first man could have cared for Lazarus, having both the means (the parable notes that he had plenty) and opportunity (Lazarus lay at his gate and was known to the rich man, cf. Lk 16:23-24). As for the rich fool, Luke defines what is meant by being "rich towards God" when a dozen verses later he concludes the section on the topic of wealth with, "Sell your possessions and give to the poor" (Lk 12:33). This interpretation of what one is to do with surplus is a consistent theme in the teaching of Jesus (and of the rest of the NT). If one has more than enough, the best thing to do with it is to give it to those who have less than enough and so invest in heaven.

Another example of this teaching is found in Luke 16:9 in which Jesus states, "Make friends for yourselves by means of unrighteous Mammon ["worldly wealth" NIV], so that when it is gone, they will welcome you into eternal dwellings." In context this probably means that one should care for the poor with one's wealth ("make friends for yourselves") so that when one dies ("when it is gone," left behind at death) those poor welcome their benefactor into heaven ("eternal dwellings").

This teaching, of course, is in line with the Judaism of the period. Wealthier persons demonstrated their righteousness by caring for the poor, just as Job and Abraham (or, for Christians, perhaps Joseph of Arimathea or Barnabas) had done before them. Within their Mediterranean culture this both demonstrated the virtue of their class and showed that their wealth was not gained by injustice. Jesus differed from the Judaism of his day not in the high value he placed on charity, but in the extent of the charity he required and the basis on which he founded his demand.

2.3. God Has a Special Interest in the Poor. Jesus was no ascetic. There is no glorification of poverty for its own sake nor a masochistic enjoyment of want. Indeed, Jesus consistently pictured the consummation of the kingdom as a time of plenty, and he was known as a person who enjoyed a party (e.g., Mt 11:19, not to mention Luke's well-known banquet theme; see Table Fellowship), so he was certainly not against good food and drink, even if he might be a guest who could make a host uncomfortable.

At the same time Jesus clearly stated that God has a special interest in the poor, a teaching that builds on God's care of the poor in the OT. For example, in both Luke and Matthew one finds him describing his mission in terms of Isaiah 61:1-2 with specific reference to the poor having good news announced to them (Mt 11:5; Lk 4:18-21). These poor are surely the "people of the land" ('am hā 'ăres) to whom he sends his disciples in Matthew 10:6-7. And it is on these poor that he pronounces, "Blessed are you poor, for yours is the kingdom of God" (Lk 6:20). While Matthew 5:3 has a different version of the saying, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," the sense is similar once one realizes that in Luke Jesus is addressing the poor who are following him and in Matthew he is speaking of the poor who display the (OT) spirit of the poor, that is, those who are seeking and depending on God (cf. 1QM 14:7, where the Hebrew equivalent of this phrase occurs).

Some scholars, however, question whether these are the materially poor or the metaphorically poor. Is not the phrase "I am poor and oppressed" used in the Psalms by individuals who are materially well-off? Has not the term "poor" become by the time of Jesus simply a synonym for Israel* as an oppressed and helpless people? Certainly, as noted above, there is a spiritual qualification of the poor being addressed. It is also clear that in such intertestamental works as the Psalms of Solomon and the Dead Sea Scrolls the term "poor" had come to designate the Pharisaic and Dead Sea communities respectively as the pious remnant of Israel. Finally, it is clear that some among Jesus' band of disciples were not poor to the extent of being destitute, even if they were not necessarily well-off (e.g., Peter and Andrew owned a house; James and John came from a reasonably prosperous family; Matthew/Levi, while not necessarily a wealthy tax collector, is reported to have afforded a feast for Jesus).

Yet, taking all of this into account, the term "poor" always carries with it a sense of the experience of oppression and helplessness or, as Malina put it, the inability to maintain inherited status. A person who was comfortable and secure would not be termed "poor." The disciples had left their relative security to identify with the insecurity of Jesus. The sects who referred to Israel as "the poor" were in fact experiencing oppression by the ruling classes. Even in the Psalms the term is used only if the psalmist feels helpless; he may in fact have money, but it is of no use to him in his need. In his helplessness he calls upon God to look on him with the special concern that God in the Law and Prophets proclaims that he has for the poor. Thus the so-called metaphorical use of "poor" is not entirely metaphorical; it always contains an element of real suffering and insecurity, even if the suffering is not necessarily economic, but is instead a physical threat.

In the case of the two Beatitudes, groups experiencing real impoverishment are blessed. While one could be materially poor without receiving this blessing because of not following Christ/having the right spirit there is no intention in either these or any similar passages that one can hold onto wealth or other security and yet claim such blessings because one's spirit is "poor." It is significant that the blessings are never pronounced on the rich, either in this passage or elsewhere. And in Luke this distinction is underlined by a curse on the rich three verses later (because "you have already received your comfort;" i.e., because they have maintained their wealth, not because of any other injustice). Again, it is "the poor, the maimed, the blind and the lame" whom God is inviting to his messianic banquet, while the wealthier people (who can afford to purchase fields and oxen) are excluded (Lk 14:21).

If people have their own security, they have no need for the "good news" Jesus preaches to the poor. Jesus not only quotes from Isaiah 61:1-2, with its theme of good news to the poor, release for prisoners, sight for the blind and release for the oppressed, he enacts it in his ministry. He gives sight to the blind and releases those who are bound and oppressed (which in Luke refers to his casting out demons [mp Devil, Demon, Satan], although the freedom of his new community of disciples was surely experienced as another form of release). And while there are wealthy people who receive the kingdom, the only ones mentioned in the Gospels are those like Zacchaeus, who are engaged in acts of generosity (and thus identify with the suffering). Those who refuse to so humble themselves are turned away.

Is Jesus then proclaiming a time of Jubilee* (Lev 25:8-56) when he proclaims
"the year of the Lord's acceptance"? Does this mean a time of economic redistribution of wealth? While this possibility is attractive and while Luke certainly sees the ideals of Sabbath* and Jubilee years realized in the early church (Acts 4:34; cf. Deut 15:4), this is unlikely. Such an interpretation hangs on too narrow a linguistic base and focuses Jesus' concerns too exclusively on economic and class issues. There is a realization of the Jubilee ideal, but in terms much broader than those envisioned in the OT literature and without its specific regulations.

The language of Jesus is not class language, which would include all materially poor Israelites within it and exclude all materially rich Israelites. If that were the case, he would surely have had to define how poor one had to be to qualify. But at the same time it is not spiritual language which speaks only of an inner condition without reference to outer circumstances. Rather, it refers to those actually experiencing oppression and helplessness in one form or another, or those identifying with this group by giving up their own security and generously sharing what they have.

2.4. Caring for the Poor Earns Eternal Reward. If God has a special concern for the poor (which is clear even in the OT where God proclaims himself the special protector of the classic Israelite poor—the widow, the orphan and the alien), one would expect that his followers would also display this concern. Jesus argues for such a conclusion by noting that it is treasure in heaven that is lasting (Mt 6:20; Lk 12:32-34; Luke makes it clear that people put treasure in heaven by "sell[ing] your possession and giv[ing] to the poor," while Matthew is content to simply use the phrase which was well known to his Jewish audience). The reason given for such radical action is that the heart naturally follows the treasure, so treasure in heaven means a heart fixed on heaven, while treasure on earth equally means a heart fixed on earth. Jesus' own practice must have followed his advice, for John 13:29 indicates that almsgiving ordered by Jesus was what the disciples suspected Judas was about when he left them. It was apparently a customary action, for it is presented as a natural assumption on the part of the disciples.

Charity, however, is not simply a matter of making sure that one's heart is in the right place or getting rid of a dangerous substance. It earns a reward. Just as the rich man is condemned for not practicing charity toward Lazarus and the rich fool for not putting treasure in heaven, so in the context of a banquet the promise is held out to those who invite the poor to their feasts: "You will be repaid at the resurrection of the just" (Lk 14:14). It is likely that Jesus is here applying Proverbs 19:17, "He who is kind to the poor lends to the Lord, and he will reward him for what he has done."

2.5. Radical Trust in God Is the Basis for the Ability to Give Up Wealth. The call of Jesus is radical with its point-counterpoint of "do not invest on earth—do invest in heaven," but it is based in an equally radical promise, "Seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these [material] things shall be yours as well" (Mt 6:33). Likewise, the promise "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom" precedes "Sell your possessions" in Luke 12:32-33. Those who are convinced that their heavenly Father will indeed care for them are also those who are able to give freely. Conversely, the lack of trust in the Father (including doubting the goodness of his will) leads to the need to provide for one's own security, to serve Mammon.

Jesus suggests that even on the level of natural theology people ought to realize that they can trust God, for if God cares for the birds without their providing for their own security and if he clothes the lilies with beauty, surely he is more concerned about his human children (Lk 12:22-31). Furthermore, human anxiety and attempts at providing for security are useless anyway (Mt 6:27). Instead, what counts is the assurance that "your heavenly Father knows that you need them all" (Mt 6:32; Lk 12:30). Renunciation flows out of security, not out of demand. But security is rooted in the knowledge of the Father, not in what is physically present.

It is at this level that the Fourth Gospel supports the teaching on rich and poor found in the Synoptics. While the language of wealth and poverty is almost entirely absent (occurring only in two passages in Jn 12—13), the language of radical trust in God is not. For example, John's Jesus argues that after the resurrection "my Father will give you whatever you ask in my name." This asking and receiving is so that "your joy will be complete" (Jn 16:23-24). Such joyful dependence on the Father, underlined multiple times in the surrounding chapters along with the insistence that the Father loves them, is the foundation on which the carefree generosity of the Synoptics is based.

2.6. The Primary Context of Renunciation in the New Community. Jesus' whole life and teaching took place within the context of the social world of first-century Judaism in which a person was embedded in a social matrix, a community. Within the modern Western individualism, much of what he taught on wealth and poverty appears to be nonsense. But given that his followers assumed that Jesus was correct in his teaching that the kingdom of God had come, it made good sense. As the Pharisees, the Dead Sea community and even the Zealots invited people to join a supportive community which pointed to the new order that was coming, so Jesus invited those who accepted his message into a new social world. They were to become his followers, part of the renewed community. The disciples left what they had, but they did so to follow Jesus, to be part of his band. The rich young ruler is not called simply to sell what he has and give to the poor, but to do that and then "follow me." In other words, the call of Jesus to radical generosity is at one level an individual decision, but its context is that of a call to community in line with the function of voluntary communities within his society.

Much of the teaching of Jesus can only be understood within this context. For example, the parable of the sheep and goats (Mt 25:31-46) is entirely related to community. People are certainly judged according to their charitable acts (all of the acts mentioned would have been viewed in Judaism as varieties of almsgiving), but the focus is on their acts of charity toward "one of the least of these brothers of mine" and not toward the poor in general. While it is clear that the charitable actions of Jesus and his followers (especially their healings and other miracles) extended beyond their own group, most of the concrete actions named have to do with actions toward his followers. This is true even for the offering of the proverbial "cup of cold water."

Likewise, the promises of Jesus are primarily addressed to his followers. The "you poor" of Luke 6 is put into the context of his "looking at his disciples." The Beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount* are spoken when "his disciples came to him." There is no blessing spoken to poor who are not disciples, although there is some type of blessing for anyone, rich or poor, who, though they are not his disciple, comes to the aid of a disciple (Mk 9:41; Mt 10:40-42).

Finally, the blessings pronounced by Jesus are primarily received within the context of the eschatological community (i.e., the band of disciples). When Peter notes that unlike the rich man, "we have left everything to follow you," Jesus responds that he and the other disciples will receive "a hundred times as much in this present age" and "in the age to come, eternal life" (Mk 10:28-30). The reception of "one hundred times as much" (with persecutions added) refers not to an individual's personal reward, but to their sharing in the wealth of the community. In anthropological terms, they receive a new network of dyadic relationships. It is as the disciples form a new extended family* that each receives a larger family than they left behind. It is as the discipled community shares among itself that each member has access to much more than they gave up. Conceivably, this could also be said about heavenly reward. Certainly, at least on the level of temporal reward, without this community emphasis the teaching of Jesus easily degenerates into an ethic of personal fulfillment.

3. Eschatology and the Ethic of Jesus.

It is well known that Jesus' teaching was set within a context of expectation of the kingdom. Jesus came announcing that the time of fulfillment had come and that the kingdom of God was at hand. Each of the promises about the provision of the Father as well as the blessings of the Beatitudes, contains the command to seek the kingdom or the promise of the kingdom. God had broken into history in a decisive way; now was the time for radical change.

Given this context it is possible to read the ethic of Jesus in four different ways. First following A. Schweitzer and others, we might view it as an interim ethic established in the face of the soon-to-appear kingdom. This perspective views Jesus' teaching about rich and poor as totally conditioned by his end-time expectation, an expectation that was not fulfilled. Thus the ethic was irrelevant to later generations in the church. Yet it does not appear that this was the position taken by the first interpreters of Jesus, for the Gospels were certainly written a generation into the Christian movement and such works as the Epistle of James demonstrate a relatively literal application of the teaching of Jesus.

Second, we can view it as an ideal ethic designed either to force Jesus' contemporaries to confront their own inability and their need for grace (so in part, R Guelich) or to take effect when the kingdom would be consummated. The test of this position is to observe whether or not Jesus' disciples practiced his teaching literally or whether Jesus himself accepted it as an unattainable ideal for them. Furthermore, one can ask whether the early church so understood Jesus (recognizing that the Gospels were their books and that they were responsible for shaping the tradition).

Third, is to see Jesus as giving a literal guideline to a particular group of followers. For communal Anabaptists this was a literal rule binding on all Christians who wish to walk in the way of full discipleship* For monastic orders this "gospel perfection" was only incumbent on the religious who wished to forsake the world and live the fullness of Christian life. In either case there is the implication that those who do not divest themselves of wealth and give to the poor are at best second-class followers of Jesus.

Fourth, we might understand his teaching as an ethic to be lived in the light of eschatology. The premises for this reading are: (1) the kingdom is in fact the wave of the future in the sense that, although it is unseen (except in the various signs of its coming) it is actual and the present observable features of this age are going to pass; (2) the Father in fact does love and care for his own; and (3) the Holy Spirit* (promised in the Gospels) frees the follower of Jesus to respond to his demand. In light of these factors the application of Jesus' teaching on rich and poor to life in Christian community makes sense.

Related to the consideration of any of these positions is the fact that it is unlikely that Jesus is giving a new Law. In fact, only the third of these positions would suggest something like that In the Gospels one discovers that Peter still owned a house (Mk 1:29) and that women of means continued supporting Jesus, apparently not ridding themselves of wealth in one act (Lk 8:3). They evidently understood Jesus to be speaking in the black-white hyperbole of a Jewish sage (as in Proverbs) or storyteller, rather than in the stark literalism of a lawgiver.

In fact, these and other examples show two things. First, while the disciples "left all" and followed Jesus, they did not necessarily renounce their possessions totally, although their decision did involve considerable economic loss and risk as well as trust in Jesus. Second, their joyful and generous giving was precisely that. It was not a rule enforced on them. For example, the narrative of the anointing at Bethany (Mk 14:1-9; it is found in all Gospels except Luke, who at best has it in quite a different form) shows quite a different type of generosity. The anointing of Jesus "for burial" was certainly a radical act of giving (even an act of charity, if the burial idea was in any way conscious in the woman's mind, which is unlikely), but it was enacted toward Jesus, not toward the poor (which offended the disciples, and in John's Gospel especially offended Judas). There is certainly no suggestion that it would have been good for the woman to have kept the ointment for her own security. The issue for the Evangelists is the proper direction of the extravagant act. Jesus suggests that he took precedence over the poor; the eschatological moment took priority over all other demands. This is hardly the word of a lawgiver in any conventional sense.
The test of these positions, then, is threefold. First, we must look within the Gospels and ask how Jesus' contemporaries could have interpreted his message, a task which has been attempted in part above. Second, we must look at the Gospels (and perhaps along with them Acts as being of one perspective with Luke) and, realizing that they were foundation documents for Christian communities, ask if there is anything in them or in the NT epistolary literature that might direct us toward understanding this teaching as anything other than a command of the Founder to be practiced. Third, we must look at the early interpretations of the Christian tradition (e.g., Paul in 2 Cor 8—9; 1 Tim 6; James) and see if they agree with the perspective of Jesus or in some way mitigate the sharp edges of his teaching.

None of these considerations will remove the aspect of eschatology from Jesus' teaching on rich and poor. But they will show how eschatology (and, in Paul and others, the gift of the Spirit as the down payment on the eschatological future) was related to ethics in the early Christian tradition. We will then be better able to interpret that tradition for today.

Rome

In NT times Rome was the chief city in Italy and the capital of the Roman Empire. Because of its prestige and importance its name is used both for the city itself and for Roman civilization as a whole. This article deals with Rome in its broadest sense and its impact on the Gospels.*

1. Historical and Cultural Background
2. The Romans in Palestine
3. Rome and the Gospels

1. Historical and Cultural Background.

   1.1. The Roman Republic. Rome began as a small settlement on the east bank of the Tiber. Traditionally founded by Romulus by about 753 B.C. and ruled by kings, Rome became a republic in 509 B.C., governed by a Senate under two consuls. It rapidly expanded, conquering its neighbors and establishing the dominance of its language, Latin. In the third to second centuries B.C. Rome became a naval power, defeating its rival Carthage in two Punic Wars. The Romans also gained ascendancy in the East with the defeat of Antiochus III of Syria and the conquest of Macedon and Greece (Corinth was sacked in 146 B.C.). By this time Rome had a highly efficient and well-disciplined professional army.

After class struggles, political rivalries and civil wars, the Republic came to an end in a contest for power, initially between Pompey, Crassus and Julius Caesar (assassinated 44 B.C.), and then between Mark Antony and Octavian, who emerged victor at Actium (31 B.C.). In 27 B.C. Octavian "restored the Republic," taking the surname "Augustus," or "venerable" (cf. Lk 2:1). This was the beginning of an empire which was to last for many centuries.

1.2. The Early Empire. Our concern here is with only the first phase of the Roman Empire, notably the Julio-Claudian and Flavian dynasties. For our knowledge of this period we are indebted especially to Tacitus, Annals and Histories; Suetonius, Lives of the Caesars; Cassius Dio, Histories; Josephus, Jewish War and Antiquities; and to inscriptions, papyri and data derived from coins and other material remains (see Balsdon; Jones and Milns; Avi-Yonah).

Augustus (27 B.C.-A.D. 14) is rightly famous for establishing and maintaining peace; for his efficient administration, including legal and financial reforms; his upholding of traditional Roman values and morality; and his patronage of the arts. Modest in his lifestyle, he preferred to be known as princeps, "first citizen," rather than imperator, "emperor." The principate of his stepson Tiberius (A.D. 14-37) proved more tyrannical and ended in a reign of terror. The evils of autocratic power became still more evident under Gaius ("Caligula," AD. 37-41), who may have been insane. He offended the Jews by ordering his statue to be placed in the Temple* at Jerusalem (the Syrian legate Petronius only averted a confrontation by delaying tactics). After Gaius' assassination, Claudius' reign (A.D. 41-54) provided stability with the development of the civil service, the strengthening of empire and the generous extension of Roman citizenship. He continued Augustus' policy of allowing the Jews freedom of worship* and was a friend of Herod Agrippa I (see Herodian Dynasty), whom he set up as king (see 2.2. below). In the later part of his reign he expelled the Jews from Rome, an event which suetonius (Claudius 25.4) claims was precipitated by disturbances caused by "Chrestus" (perhaps a distortion of "Christ"; see stern, 113-17). Nero's eccentric and extravagant reign (A.D. 54-68) was marked by a great fire at Rome, probably accidental but attributed to Christians. It led to the first persecutions.

On Nero's death different military factions fought over the succession (A.D. 68-69, "the Year of the Four Emperors"), until Vespasian, a plebeian and commander of the army in the East, emerged victorious (reigned A.D. 69-79). This period saw the Jewish revolt of A.D. 66-70 with the brutal sack of Jerusalem by Vespasian's son Titus (who commemorated the event by his Arch in Rome). After this Judea became an imperial Roman province. Titus himself reigned only two years (A.D. 79-81) and was followed by his brother Domitian (A.D. 81-96), an efficient administrator who carried out a public building program. But his rule, like that of Tiberius, ended in a reign of terror. He claimed the title "lord and god" (Suetonius Domitian 13) and was responsible for a major persecution of Christians. In contrast, the reigns of Nerva (A.D. 96-98) and Trajan (A.D. 98-117) brought peace* and stability.

It is against this political background that the Gospels were written, probably in the 60s to 90s (though some place the Gospel of John as late as the reign of Trajan).

1.3. The Roman Religion and Character. Roman religion was originally animistic, involving the spirits of the woods, springs, mountains, etc. The Romans also worshipped anthropomorphic gods such as Jupiter, Juno, Mars and Minerva, whom they identified with their Greek counterparts (Zeus, Hera, etc.). Tolerant of other religions, they came successively under the influence of the Etruscans, the Greeks and various oriental peoples, and imported foreign cults, including those of Cybele, Isis and Mithras. Emperor worship seems to have originated in the East, where Hellenistic monarchs had long been recognized as divine "saviors." In the Empire it became a focus and test of loyalty (cf. Pliny, Epp. 10.96-97), but at Rome it was restricted either to the deceased emperor (cf. the earlier worship of ancestors) or his "genius" (guardian spirit). In the provinces (later at Rome also) the emperor often shared his cult with the goddess Roma, personification of the power and spirit of Rome.

The Romans are famous for their military and administrative genius, their law and their skills in architecture, engineering and road building. Deeply indebted to Greece (see Hellenism) in the world of literature, philosophy and the creative arts, they nevertheless had their own gift of the lucid expression of ideas in precise and elegant language (see further Howatson; Bandinelli). Traditionally, the Romans valued family life and the virtues of gravitas ("dignity") and pietas ("devotion" or "dutifulness"). But like all peoples they had their darker side, and many instances are recorded of corruption, sexual immorality, brutality and murder. One should be wary of either idealizing or denigrating them as a people.
1.4. Roman Provincial Administration. The first provinces, in the West, were acquired already in the third century B.C. After Rome's expansion into the East, Asia (i.e., western Turkey), Cilicia and Bithynia were added, followed by Syria and Egypt Augustus annexed several more provinces, and Claudius added Britain (A.D. 43).

Under the Empire provinces were of two kinds: (1) "public" or "consular," governed by proconsuls under the authority of the Senate (these were generally the richer and more settled provinces); or (2) "imperial," governed by legates, appointed by the Emperor (mostly frontier provinces, such as Syria, where legions were stationed). Both these types of governor were of senatorial rank. There was a third class of governors, known as prefects or procurators, of lower "equestrian" rank, who were in charge of smaller provinces (e.g., Judea). These were often experts in financial administration. All governors had judicial and military powers. The number of troops available might be quite small (e.g., one cohort, consisting of 300-600 men), but in frontier provinces could rise to three or four legions (a legion consisting of some 3,000-6,000 infantry and 100-200 cavalry). Governors could not be prosecuted for mismanagement until after their term of office.

Roman provincial government has been described as "supervisory rather than executive" (Sherwin-White, ISBE 3.1027), which meant that few Roman officials were involved, detailed administration being in the hands of municipal authorities or, in the case of Judea, councils of elders grouped into "toparchies." Revenue was raised by a system of tax farming (see Taxes). Local laws and religious customs were respected as long as they did not interfere with smooth government Roman citizens came under Roman law. Citizenship could be granted both to whole communities and to individuals (e.g., to men with long service in auxiliary units of the army), and was passed down from father to son. In the Eastern provinces it was often acquired by members of the wealthy upper classes through influence.

2. The Romans in Palestine.

2.1. Down to Herod the Great. The history of the Roman government of Palestine is complex. In 66-63 B.C. Pompey conducted his celebrated Eastern campaign, during which he was called into Palestine by the two sons of Salome Alexandra in their dispute over the succession. He captured Jerusalem and entered the Temple. But he ordered its cleansing and reinstated Hyrcanus as High Priest. After this Syria became a Roman imperial province, with the Decapolis and Samaria (now freed from Jewish rule) under its wing. Judea, Galilee, Idumea and Perea were retained by the Jews as client kingdoms, dependent on Rome. Julius Caesar appointed Antipater procurator of Judea. His son Herod, who had been governor of Galilee,* won from Rome the title "King of the Jews," a title which he had to make a reality by force of arms. Herod reigned from 37 to 4 B.C., extending his territories and restoring the Jerusalem Temple on a lavish scale (including Greco-Roman architectural features). Herod was both a lover of Hellenism and an admirer of Roman culture. He encouraged Hellenistic education and social mores; he built theaters, amphitheaters and other civic amenities such as aqueducts. Under his rule Judea was materially prosperous. But he was also violent and cruel. The massacre of the innocents at Bethlehem (Mt 2), though not confirmed by external sources, is consistent with his character.

2.2. After Herod the Great. On Herod's death his kingdom was split into three with Herod Antipas as "tetrarch" of Galilee and Perea (4 B.C.-A.D. 39); Philip, "tetrarch" of Trachonitis and Iturea (4 B.C.-A.D. 34); and Archelaus "ethnarch" in Judea, Idumea and Samaria (4 B.C.-A.D. 6; cf. Mt 2:22; Lk 3:1; see Heli-onian Dynasty). Archelaus' rule ended in riots, and he was banished. Judea now came under the control of Roman governors.

Pontius Pilate* was governor of Judea from A.D. 26/27-36. Tacitus (Ann. 15.44) refers to him as "procurator" and mentions that "Christus" was put to death by him when Tiberius was emperor. However, an inscription from Caesarea (the Roman capital of Judea) shows that his title was more correctly "prefect" He was of equestrian rank, presumably a former military tribune, and had five cohorts of infantry and a cavalry regiment under his command. He had absolute authority in his own province but was responsible to the legate in Syria. We know from Josephus* and Philo that his governorship was marred by bloodshed, including a massacre of some Galileans (possibly alluded to in Lk 13:1) and the slaughter of many Samaritans* in an ugly incident which resulted in protests to the legate Vitellius in Syria and Pilate's recall to Rome. According to Eusebius he later committed suicide.

In A.D. 41 Herod Agrippa I, who had previously governed northern Palestine and Galilee, was made "King of the Jews" (cf. Acts 12), but in A.D. 44 Palestine reverted to Roman governors. In A.D. 66-70 occurred the tragic Jewish War, with the siege and fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70); the Jewish patriots held out at Masada until A.D. 73 and committed suicide rather than submit to Rome. In AD. 132-35 the Bar Kokhba revolt finally sealed the fate of Judea, and Jerusalem became a Roman colony (Aelia Capitolina) inhabited by non-Jews.

The Jewish leaders and people varied immensely in their attitudes to the Romans. The Herodian rulers and their party were naturally pro-Roman. The High Priests also generally favored cooperation, as did the Sadducees. The Essenes (see Dead Sea Scrolls) withdrew to the desert, while the Zealots worked for armed rebellion (see Revolutionary Movements). The Pharisees* saw as their first loyalty absolute adherence to the Mosaic Law* and traditions (see Rabbinic Writings and Traditions). They refused to take an oath of loyalty to Herod (Josephus Ant. 17.42); some actively resisted Roman rule, but others were more acquiescent. The common people must have simply scraped a living in a society where there was great inequality between rich and poor and much scope for oppression (see Rich and Poor).

3.1. The General Situation. The city of Rome is not mentioned by name in the Gospels. The Roman people are mentioned just once, when the chief priests and Pharisees warn the Sanhedrin* of the danger that the Romans will come and destroy the Temple and the Jewish nation (Jn 11:47-48). The Latin language is also mentioned only once (Jn 19:20), where the titulus on the cross is said to have been written in Hebrew, Latin (Rōmaiisti) and Greek. Latin was not much used in Palestine except for military purposes, the chief language of the administrators being Greek. The ordinary people spoke Aramaic (though Greek was also in use among the better educated; see Languages of Palestine). The Gospels contain Latin loanwords for such things as coins, notably the dēnanon, or "penny," the assarion and kodrantes (• Latin quadrans), the kensos (in the sense of tribute money), and other technical or military terms, including kenturiōn, koustōdia, legion, praitōrion, spekou-latōr (in the sense "executioner") and the verb phragelloō for scourging (cf. Latin flagellare). There are also a number of Latin linguistic constructions, especially in Mark, and a possible reference to Roman marriage law whereby a woman may divorce* her husband (Mk 10:12). Taking these points together some have seen confirmation of an early church tradition that Mark's Gospel was written in Rome, either in association with Peter or shortly after his death (cf. 1 Pet 5:13). But Latin loanwords occur in all four Gospels and were surely part of the general currency of Roman imperial administration. Some have seen in texts like Mark 10:30 and 13:9-11 allusions to Nero's persecution of Christians (cf. 1.2. above), but the evidence is insufficient to prove this.

3.2. Rome and the Birth Narratives. Luke (2:1-2) dates Jesus' birth by a Roman census, ordered by "Caesar Augustus," which took place "when Quirinius was governor of Syria." There are problems over both the date and nature of this census: we know from external sources that Quirinius was governor A.D. 6-9, but Herod the Great in whose reign Jesus was born (Mt 2:1; cf. Lk 1:5), died in 4 B.C. (see Birth of Jesus). The important point is that Luke saw the very birth of Jesus at Bethlehem as occasioned by a Roman census, which required Joseph to register at his native city.

3.3. The Romans and Jesus’ Public Ministry. Luke (3:1) dates John the Baptist's preaching, and hence the beginning of Jesus' public ministry, from Roman sources, saying that this took place in the fifteenth year of the Emperor Tiberius' reign (probably A.D. 27/28 or 28/29), when Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea, and when Herod (Antipas) was tetrarch of Galilee (cf. "that fox" in Lk 13:32). The Greek word ἡγεμόν "governor" (cf. Lk 20:20; Mt 27:2; etc.) is used loosely for Pilate's official title of Prefect (cf. 2.2. above).

Although the Romans are rarely mentioned by name, their presence pervades the Gospels. Cities and localities are called after them (e.g., Caesarea Philippi; Lake Tiberias, i.e., Galilee). We have references to Roman time-reckoning, Roman coinage and the hated tax collectors (see Taxes), who may have been wealthy men like Zacchaeus (described in Lk 19:2 as an architelōnēs, or "chief tax collector"), but were probably mostly minor officials such as local customs officers (cf. Levi/Matthew in Mk 2:14; Lk 5:27; Mt 9:9). All three Synoptics record the trap question over the Roman kensos, or tribute (Mk 12:13-17; Mt 22:15-22; Lk 20:20-26). This tax was especially hated because it had to be paid in Roman currency. It is probable that the coin shown to Jesus was a denarius of the reigning emperor Tiberius (see Hart 241-48, and on Jesus' reply, Bruce, 249-63, both in Bammel and Moule). Matthew (17:24-27) records a second trap question about the didrachma, or Temple Tax. This was a Jewish religious due of one half-shekel (half-stater), later taken over by the Romans and applied to the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus (Josephus J.W. 6.218; Suetonius Domitian 12; Cassius Dio 46.7). Many scholars have assumed that Matthew here refers to a post-A.D. 70 Roman tax (cf. the term kensos in Jesus' reply), but W. Horbury has convincingly argued that the pericope dates to Jesus’ own lifetime and concerns a controversy over the interpretation of Jewish Law (see Bammel and Moule, 265-86).

The Sermon on the Mount* alludes to the forced carrying of the Roman soldiers' baggage (Mt 5:41; note the Latin loanword milion, "mile" and the technical term angareuō, "press into service"). Jesus praises the faith of a centurion, whose servant he heals (Mt 8:5-13). Luke mentions the love of this centurion for the Jewish people and the fact that he had built a synagogue* for them (7:5). The centurion who supervised the crucifixion is also sympathetically portrayed (cf. 3.4. below). Jesus predicts the destruction of the Temple and the fall of Jerusalem (Mk 13 par.; see Destruction of Jerusalem). Some have seen in the phrase "abomination of desolation" (Mk 13:14; Mt 24:15) an allusion to Caligula's attempt to set up his statue in the Temple (A.D. 40), but others see the Danielic allusion as purely eschatological (see Apocalyptic Teaching). It has further been suggested, with greater probability, that some details of Luke's version (e.g., the allusion to the "army camps" in 21:20) are post-eventum prophecy, being colored by Jewish experience of the Roman siege and destruction (see Fitzmyer).

It should be noted that Jesus nowhere denounces the Romans or explicitly says anything politically subversive (cf. his masterly—and ambiguous—reply to the question over the tribute). He never calls for military or political action, and he flees to the hills when the crowd, excited by a feeding miracle* seeks to take him by force to make him king (Jn 6:15). In the Sermon on the Mount he preaches non-violence and love* of one's enemies. At his arrest he rebukes the disciple* who takes up his sword (Mt 26:52; cf. Jn 18:11). The conjecture sometimes put forward that Jesus was a zealot or military revolutionary cannot be maintained without doing violence to all this evidence.

3.4. The Trial and Death of Jesus. The Romans were directly concerned with the trial (see Trial of Jesus) and execution of Jesus (see Death of Jesus). John's Gospel suggests that Roman soldiers were involved in Jesus' arrest (cf. the technical terms speira, "cohort" and chiliarchos, "tribune," in 18:3, 12); but the Synoptic accounts imply otherwise. After his Jewish trial Jesus was brought before Pontius Pilate as governor. The Gospels differ in their details, but it seems probable that Jesus was charged with the political offense of sedition or treason (i.e., maiestas minuta) rather than the religious offense of blasphemy. Luke (23:2) has a general charge of stirring up the people and specific charges of forbidding to give tribute to Caesar and claiming to be "Christ a king." The other Gospels also suggest a political charge by Pilate's opening question, "Are you the King of the Jews?" and John's account (19:20) of the wording of the titulus on the cross argues the same.

John gives a dramatic dialog between Pilate, Jesus, the Jewish leaders and the crowd (see People, Crowd); but there is no explicit charge nor condemnation. The crowd, as in the Synoptics, choose to have the insurrectionist Barabbas released rather than Jesus. Then Pilate has Jesus scourged (this severe beating was required by Roman law during the crucifixion process). Some have seen Pilate's presentation of the bleeding Jesus to the crowd ("Behold the man," Jn 19:5) as an attempt to win sympathy for him; others as a further mockery. All four Gospels represent Pilate as eager to release Jesus (cf. esp. Jn 19:6). Many scholars have suggested that there has been some whitewashing of his character, possibly in order to heighten the responsibility of the Jewish leaders. External sources (e.g., Philo Leg. Gai. 302) portray Pilate as a harsh and inflexible governor who had difficulty in coping with his intractable province (cf. 3.3. above; see further Sherwin-White 1978, chap. 2; Bammel and Moule, 403-51).

The Gospels narrate that the Roman soldiers mocked Jesus before taking him to be crucified (Mk 15:16-20; Mt 27:27-31; cf. Jn 19:2-3). Luke is unique in mentioning a "trial" before Herod Antipas and a mocking by his soldiers (23:6-12). Jesus is crucified between two lēstai, or insurrectionists (Mk 15:27 par.), under the eye of a centurion who exclaims as Jesus dies, "Truly, this man was the Son of God" (Mk 15:39; cf. Lk 23:47, "Indeed, this man was innocent"). From the Gospel accounts one would assume that Jesus' execution, like that of the two lēstai, was carried out by Roman soldiers, but E. Bammel has recently marshalled evidence for the view that Jesus was executed by Jews (Bammel and Moule, 440-43). All four Evangelists mention Joseph of Arimathea's request to Pilate for the body of Jesus for burial (see Burial of Jesus). Matthew (27:65) alone records a request for Roman guards to watch the tomb (it is not clear whether he envisages those who were placed as Roman or Jewish). Thus there remain many problems concerning the precise roles of the Romans and the Jews during the trial and execution of Jesus. It is likely that apologetic, theological and other factors have helped shape the narratives.

The restrained way in which the Romans are described throughout the Gospels is quite remarkable in view of the Jewish suffering during their rule, the Roman part in Jesus' death and the later persecutions of Christians at their hands.

SABBATH

The English Sabbath, like the Greek sabbaton, is a transliteration of the Hebrew šabbāt. The term designates the seventh day of the Jewish week, a day marked by the cessation of work and by religious and ceremonial observances. All four Gospels depict Jesus in conflict with his contemporaries on matters of Sabbath observance. The traditions, rooted in Jesus' ministry, are used to accentuate themes central to each Evangelist.

1. Sabbath law

2. The Sabbath in the Gospels

3. Conclusion

1. Sabbath Law.

A prohibition of work on the Sabbath is found in the Decalog (Ex 20:8-11; Deut 5:12-15) and several other OT texts (e.g., Ex 31:12-17; 35:2), and its transgression is treated in the Law codes as a capital offense (Ex 31:14-15; 35:2; cf. Num 15:32-36). Different motivations for the interruption of normal activities on the seventh day are given. The Israelite community was to be allowed to rest (the emphasis of Deut 5:12-15; cf. Ex 23:12); but the day was also to be considered holy (Ex 20:8; Deut 5:12), a portion of the Israelites' time which was consecrated to Yahweh (Ex 20:10; 35:2) just as the tithe of their produce was to be reserved for him. Israel’s observance of the Sabbath was to be a sign of its special covenantal relationship with Yahweh (Ex 31:12-17; Ezek 20:12, 20), an imitation of God's* own rest after the completion of his creative work (Gen 2:2-3; Ex 20:11) and a reminder of the relief God granted his people in delivering them from slavery in Egypt (Deut 5:15). Those whose vision failed to extend beyond their pursuit of business naturally found the interruption an irritation to be evaded (Amos 8:5; cf. Jer 17:19-27; Neh 13:15-22). For Yah-weh's faithful, however, the day's observance was a delight (Is 58:13-14).

In the Second Temple period (515 B.C.-A.D. 70) the words of Scripture became the object of interpretation by legal experts (see Scribes). Their goal was to spell out the duties of God's people by defining the terms and limits of God's revealed commands. The Sabbath provided a significant challenge since, from this point of view, the faithful needed to know precisely what constituted the "work" which was to be avoided if the command was not to be transgressed. Lists were drawn up (Jub. 2:29-30; 50:6-13; CD 10:14-11:18). Scripture itself provided some guidelines. Fires were not to be lit (Ex 35:3). Burdens were not to be carried (Jer 17:21-22), though from this point of view the term "burden" now needed legal definition. Similarly, a general prohibition of travel could be derived from Isaiah 58:13 (and see Ex 16:29). When such a prohibition took on the force of a legal statute, it became necessary to define the limits of a legitimate journey (cf. a "sabbath day's journey," Acts 1:12). That sowing and reaping are forbidden could be based on Exodus 34:21 (cf. 16:25-30).

Further problems arose when the prohibition of work on the Sabbath was perceived to conflict with other commands or with considerations of practicality or prudence. The principle that the prohibition may be disregarded when human life is in danger became well established (see 1 Macc 2:29-41). The service of the Temple* was conceded to take precedence over the Sabbath (cf. Num 28:9-10; 1 Chron 23:31), as was circumcision. The extent to which considerations of practicality were allowed to influence Sabbath regulations varied considerably with different interpreters.

Jewish observance of the Sabbath was well known and distinctive in the ancient world. It called forth both admiration (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.39 §282; Philo Vit. Mos. 2.21) and scorn (Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.2 §§20-21) from outsiders and led, for example, to the excusal of Jews from service in foreign military forces (Jews would neither march forbidden lengths nor carry arms on the Sabbath; see Josephus Ant. 14.10.12 §§226-227). With laws whose scriptural background seemed clear, and with customs long and widely established, many Jews could be expected to comply. It can also be seen, however, that questions of proper observance were often a matter of interpretation. The various religious parties of Jesus' day not infrequently differed in their practice. And though each group doubtless pressed on others the claims of its interpretation to represent the will of heaven, such claims in our period were terrestrially unenforceable.
Positively, Jews met in synagogues* on the Sabbath Day for prayer, Scripture readings and edifying discourses. The welter of prohibitions may strike the outsider, and surely struck the half-hearted, as a burden grievous to be borne; still, it should not be doubted that faithful Jews continued to find in their Sabbath observance an occasion for joy.

2. The Sabbath in the Gospels.

2.1. Mark. Jesus is said to have participated in synagogue services on the Sabbath in Mark 1:21; 3:1 and 6:2. Instances of Sabbath observance may be noted in 1:32 (the people wait until Sabbath is over to carry the sick to Jesus) and 16:1 (the women* wait until Sabbath has passed before attending to the body of Jesus; see Burial of Jesus). Interestingly, Mark connects no queries with the Sabbath healings* reported in 1:21-28 and 29-31. In the latter case, Jesus is depicted among friends; in the former, he is in the synagogue. That not every record of a Sabbath healing is linked with a dispute suggests that Jesus' activities were not in flagrant transgression of existing formulations of Sabbath law and that, perhaps in the initial stages of his career, public enthusiasm may have silenced whatever private compunctions may have been felt. That objections are recorded on other occasions suggests that healing was liable to be construed as work, and that in the absence of a life-threatening situation the scrupulous might well find cause for offense.

The issue in Mark 2:23-28 appears more clear-cut. Though gleaning in the fields of another was expressly permitted by pentateuchal Law* (Lev 19:9-10; 23:22), such activity on the Sabbath breached the prohibition on Sabbath reaping. Since the prohibition has a scriptural base (Ex 34:21; cf. 16:25-29), it is hazardous to apply the claim here that Jesus merely challenges scribal additions while conforming to scriptural commands. Nor does the defense of the disciples’* activity in 2:25-28 follow that tack (David's transgression, cited as a precedent was clearly of pentateuchal Law). Rather a precedent is cited from Scripture (1 Sam 21:1-6) for activity which, on the strict application of scriptural commands, was "not lawful" (see Abiathar).

The force of the illustration has been differently construed. (1) Some see the point of the comparison in the hunger felt by both Jesus' followers and those of David. The point would then be that though the Sabbath prohibitions insisted on by Jesus' opponents are valid in principle, they must yield to the higher claims of human need. But Mark makes no mention of the disciples' hunger, as he would surely have done if hunger had been the crux of the defense. Nothing suggests that their need was so extreme as to legitimate the transgression of the Law. And indeed the unlawfulness of what David did is explicitly mentioned (2:26) in the defense of the disciples' activity. The point can hardly be that when the extenuating circumstances are taken into account nothing unlawful has been done.

(2) Others note that the illustration records the behavior of David, and suggest that Jesus is tacitly claiming a similar right as David's son (see Son of David), the Messiah (see Christ), to somehow transcend the Law. But the necessary implication of this view is that David was entitled by his calling or office to transgress divine commands applicable to other people, a point which neither scriptural Law nor its later interpreters would concede.

(3) Most likely is the view that the example illustrates how Scripture itself countenances the breaking of the Law strictly construed, and thus calls in question the facile identification of God's will with a rigid interpretation of the terms of the Law. Verse 27 (perhaps an independent logion introduced here because it was felt appropriate; so at least the new introduction and the absence of the logion from the parallels in Matthew and Luke may suggest) can be construed as advancing the previous argument on either the first or third reading given above. The divine origin of the Sabbath is granted on either reading. Following interpretation (1) above, the logion represents a fresh insistence that humanitarian concerns must take priority over Sabbath commands. In the case of the third interpretation proposed above, the point would now be that God's design in giving the Sabbath for his people's good is overthrown when human behavior is subjected to rules developed in the casuistic interpretation of the Law.

Finally, 2:28 clearly and remarkably insists on Jesus' superiority as Son of Man* over the Sabbath law. It is not evident whether the verse is intended to represent a claim on Jesus' own lips or one added by the Christian community as a commentary on the preceding episode.

According to Mark 3:1-6 a healing performed by Jesus on the Sabbath was found objectionable and occasioned the plotting of Pharisees* and Herodians (see Herodian Dynasty) against his life. For his pan Jesus is said to be grieved by the attitude of those more concerned with the niceties of the Law than with the well-being of a person (3:5). The defense of Jesus' activity given in 3:4 is striking. No attempt is made to show that the healing does not overstep the command prohibiting "work." The interpretation of the terms of the command (see Commandment), by which the legal experts of contemporary Judaism* defined the divine will, is not here an issue. Rather, the Markan Jesus insists that God can hardly be offended or his will transgressed by the doing of good and the restoring of health on the Sabbath (regardless, apparently, of whether or not the deed may be construed as "work"). God's will is rather disobeyed when evil is done or life "killed." It is debated whether the "evil" intended is that of leaving unperformed the miracle* of healing or the active plotting against Jesus' life in which, according to the pericope, his opponents were involved on the Sabbath.

It seems unlikely that Sabbath observance was a significant issue for the Second Evangelist or the community for which he wrote. The two relevant episodes do not appear to focus on the community's need of either guidance or a defense for its Sabbath behavior. Rather, the first incident celebrates the authority* of the community's Lord over the institutions of Israel's Law; the second is clearly meant to account for the hostility which Jesus' ministry aroused.

2.2. Matthew. For Matthew and his community, on the other hand, proper Sabbath observance may well have remained an issue. Admittedly, the prayer* in Matthew 24:20 (that the community's flight might not occur on the Sabbath) does not point unambiguously in that direction. Even a Christian congregation not observing the Sabbath would be exposed to hardship and danger if its people attempted to flee on that day in a Jewish environment Nor does Matthew's Gospel preserve instances of Sabbath conflict or discussions of proper Sabbath behavior not found in Mark. But the parallels to Mark 2:23-28 and 3:1-6 in Matthew 12:1-14 show differences designed apparently to show that the Sabbath command, when properly interpreted, had not been transgressed. Its continuing relevance may therefore be implied.

Perhaps the explicit reference to the hunger of Jesus' disciples (12:1) is intended to provide a humanitarian legitimation for their behavior. Matthew 12:5 adds an illustration from the Torah (cf. Num 28:9-10) by which priests violate the Sabbath law without incurring guilt. Verse 6 then at least claims that the coming of the kingdom ("something greater than the Temple") in the person of Jesus causes the Sabbath laws to pale in significance. But perhaps the legal argument is implied that the activity of those in the service of the kingdom, like that of priests* in the Temple, takes precedence over Sabbath laws. In verse 7 a favorite Matthean OT citation (Hos 6:6) is repeated, indicating that Sabbath laws are to be interpreted in such a way that divine mercy* is emphasized rather than strict conformity with ritual prescriptions.

In the second pericope (12:9-14) verse 12 preserves but a fragment of the argument of Mark 3:4. The main emphasis in the Matthean account falls rather on a logion shared with Luke (14:5) which Matthew introduces here. Though the stricter construction of the Law forbade the drawing up on the Sabbath of an animal from a pit (CD 11:13-14; t. Šabb. 14.3), the logion assumes that in ordinary practice compassion prevailed and assistance was given. This being the case, no objection should be raised when a human being (who is, after all, worth far more than a sheep) is healed on the holy day. Proper Sabbath observance does seem here to be a concern, but priority is given to claims of compassion over strict adherence to Sabbath rules.

2.3. Luke. In the two conflict pericopes common to the three Synoptic Gospels, Luke (6:1-5, 6-11) follows Mark quite closely without the Matthean additions. But two new instances of controversy arising from Sabbath healings are recorded. In Luke 13:10-17 the ruler of the synagogue objects to the healing of a woman with a chronic deformity. Work is allowed, he says, on six days of the week, and healings are then in order. There is therefore no need to desecrate the Sabbath with such activity. The Lukan Jesus finds the objection hypocritical, noting that domestic animals are commonly "unbound" and led to water on the Sabbath. Far more justified, surely, is the "unbinding" of a daughter of Abraham* from a satanic affliction (see Demon, Devil, Satan). Jesus' opponents are said to have been shamed by the response and the crowd delighted by the whole episode. In Luke 14:1-6 a variant of the argument presented in Matthew 12:11-12 is presented and leaves potential objectors speechless. The Sabbath discussions in Luke seem designed to show compassion on the part of Jesus, the ready acceptance it meets from the crowds (see People, Crowd) and the speechless shame to which opponents are reduced.

2.4. John. Johannine irony is undoubtedly to be seen in 19:31 (cf. 18:28), where punctilious Sabbath observance is grimly juxtaposed with the crucifixion (see Death of Jesus) of God's Son (see Son of God). Sabbath healings lead to disputes in chapters 5 and 9; the former is recalled in 7:22-23. In no case does the Evangelist evince a concern for guiding the Sabbath behavior of his readers. In John 5 offense is first raised when, at Jesus' command, a pallet is carried on the Sabbath (5:10) and exacerbated when it is learned that Jesus has healed on that day (5:15-16). Remarkably, the Johannine Jesus concedes that he "works" on the Sabbath (5:17)—precisely what the Law prohibits— but claims that he is merely acting as God his father does. The charge that Jesus breaks the Sabbath is thus conceded (5:18), but the interest of the Evangelist is rather on the christological claim to which it leads. In John 7:22-23 the unreasonableness of Jesus' opponents seems the point: they permit Sabbath circumcision but object to the restoration of a man's health. Similarly, in John 9 the Sabbath healing gives the Evangelist the opportunity to show Jesus' opponents as blind to the manifest workings of God in their midst (9:30-33), a blindness* induced by their insistence that a divine representative must conform to the niceties of the old code (9:16). The memory of Sabbath disputes aroused by Jesus is preserved in John, but it becomes the starting-point for the pursuit of favorite Johannine themes: the divine sonship of Jesus and the necessity of faith* in him.

3. Conclusion.

As we have seen, Sabbath controversies are found in Mark (2:23-28; 3:1-6), in material common to Matthew and Luke (Mt 12:11-12a par. Lk 14:5), in material unique to Matthew (12:5-7) and Luke (13:10-17; the incident of 14:1-6), and in John (5; 7:22-23; 9). Furthermore, the authenticity of crucial logia (Mk 2:27; 3:4; etc.) is widely conceded. At the roots of the Gospel tradition, then, are memories of opposition to Jesus' Sabbath behavior aroused among his contemporaries.

Opponents saw the divine will as requiring conformity with the terms of Torah's statutes as interpreted by legal authorities. Hence activities which could be construed as the "work" which Torah forbade were to be avoided unless extenuating circumstances (as defined by the legal experts) could be found to legitimate the activity. Jesus' behavior (and, according to one story, that of his disciples) was found to violate this stricture. The basic line of Jesus' defense as portrayed in the Gospels shows a different approach to the understanding of the divine will. No more than Jesus allows the terminology of Deuteronomy 24:1-4 to define the propriety of divorce* (Mk 10:1-12) or the terminology of scriptural Law to define norms for oaths* (Mt 5:33-36), does he allow that the divine will for the Sabbath rests in the proper interpretation of the word "work." When opposed he does not reply by arguing that, counter to his opponents' claims, "work" has not been done nor the command transgressed. He insists that doing "good" can never be wrong on the Sabbath (Mk 3:4—a criterion quite different from the question whether or not "work" has been done), that compassion is a better guide to proper behavior than rules defined by legal experts (Mt 12:10-11 a), that God's intentions with the Sabbath are distorted when humans are subjected to a rigid code (Mk 2:27). Implicit in each case, and explicit at various points in the Gospel narrative, is the claim that Jesus has authority to interpret the divine will.

Only for Matthew is it likely that proper Sabbath observance remained an issue. Only in this Gospel is it likely that the relevant pericopes were intended to provide guidance in the matter. In the other Gospels the traditional material serves other ends. Sabbath discussions provide the opportunity to highlight Jesus' authority, his compassion and the nature of his opposition.

SALVATION

The term salvation (with its associated word group) has become widely used in Christian theology to express the provision of God* for our human situation of need and sin. The word group has a less prominent theological role in the Gospels but nevertheless is important in expressing the effects of the ministry of Jesus. The present article is largely confined to the use of the word group and does not develop the broader concept of salvation at length.

1. Overview of Linguistic Usage

2. Background to the Usage in the Gospels

3. Salvation in the Individual Gospels

4. The Understanding of Salvation in the Gospels

1. Overview of Linguistic Usage.

1.1. The Verb sōzō. According to Louw and Nida the verb to save (sōzō) has three meanings in the NT: (1) "To rescue from danger and to restore to a former state of safety and well being"; (2) "to cause someone to become well again after having been sick"; (3) "to cause someone to experience divine salvation—'to save.'"

The verb is found frequently in the Gospels (Mt 15 x; Mk 14 x + Mk 16:16; Lk 17 x; Jn 6 x; the sayings in Mt 18:11 and Lk 9:56 are not found in the oldest MSS; Mk 16:16 is part of a later addition to the Gospel). It has various senses.

1.1.1. The Synoptics. (1) The verb means "to deliver" from danger. So in Matthew 8:25 and 14:30 it is used of rescue from the danger of drowning. In Matthew 27:40 (par. Mk 15:30); 27:42b (par. Mk 15:31b and Lk 23:35b); 27:49; Luke 23:37, 39 it is used of Jesus being delivered from dying on the cross (presumably by miraculous means or by Elijah* coming to help him). It is probably in this same general sense that reference is made to Jesus "saving" others (Mt 27:42a par. Mk 15:31 and Lk 23:35a).
In the passive the verb can mean "to come" or to be brought safely through a period of danger to life (Mt 10:22 and 24:13 par. Mk 13:13; cf. Mt 24:22 par. Mk 13:20).

A more metaphorical use is found in Luke 19:10, where Jesus is like a shepherd who seeks out and saves the lost [sheep] from danger of death (see Shepherd, Sheep).

(2) The verb often has the meaning "to heal" (namely, from disease; see Healing). It is so used in Matthew 9:21 (par. Mk 5:28); 9:22a (par. Mk 5:34 and Lk 8:48); 9:22b; Mark 5:23; 6:56 (par. Mt 14:36, Gk diasōzō); 10:52 (par. Lk 18:42); Luke 7:50; 8:36, 50; 17:19 (note also Lk 7:3, Gk diasōzō). In some of these cases the reference is to deliverance from the power of evil spirits by exorcism (see Demon, Devil, Satan) or to the raising of the dead (see Resurrection). In Mark 3:4 (par. Lk 6:9) "to save a life" (Gk psyche may have the sense "person" here) is contrasted with killing. The phrase is used in the context of healing in a broad sense of doing whatever is needed to promote life and health, and the thought is probably of physical life.

(3) In the story of the conversation between Jesus, the rich young man and the disciples* the phrases "to inherit eternal life" (see Life), "to enter the kingdom of God" (see Kingdom of God) and "to be saved" appear to be used synonymously (Mk 10:17, 23-25, 26; cf. Mt 19:16,23-24,25; Lk 18:18,24-25,26). What might be regarded as a technical usage of spiritual salvation is found in Luke 13:23 ("are 'the saved' few?") and in Luke 8:12 ("so that they may not believe and be saved"). Jesus is so named according to the angel of the Lord in Matthew 1:21 because "he will save his people from their sins."

In a paradoxical saying Jesus talks about people who want to save their lives and lose them (Mt 16:25 par. Mk 8:35a and Lk 9:24a) in contrast to those who lose their lives and (thus) save them (Mk 8:35b par. Lk 9:24b).

(4) In some passages the language is ambiguous, and it is not clear whether the reference is purely to physical and mental health and well-being or also to spiritual salvation (e.g., Lk 7:50, "Your faith has saved you"; note that this phrase is used elsewhere of physical healing: Mk 5:34 par. Lk 8:48; Mk 10:52 par. Lk 18:42; cf.Lk8:50; 17:19).

1.1.2. John. The usage in John is similar to that of the Synoptics.
(1) In John 12:27 Jesus prays about the possibility of being delivered from having to undergo the cross. In John 10:9 he refers to people being like sheep who enter the sheepfold and live in safety.

(2) In John 11:12 Lazarus is thought to be asleep (i.e., in a coma) and therefore capable of being healed.

(3) Jesus is said to have come to save the world* (Jn 3:17), and he refers to this as his purpose in 12:47. He speaks of his hearers being saved in 5:34.

1.2. The Verb Rhyomai. Meaning "to rescue, deliver," rhyomai is used much less frequently, generally with reference to deliverance from extreme danger, such as death or falling into the hands of enemies. In Matthew 27:43 it is found in the satirical quotation of Psalm 22:8 by the Jewish leaders to Jesus on the cross. In Luke 1:74 deliverance from enemies is part of the salvation awaited by Zechariah. In Matthew 6:13 the disciples are encouraged to pray (see Prayer) for deliverance from the evil one (or from evil).

1.3. The Noun Sōter. Sōter, meaning "savior," is used by Mary with reference to God in Luke 1:47, and Jesus is so designated at his birth by the angel* of the Lord to the shepherds (Lk 2:11). In John 4:42 the Samaritan* people who have responded to Jesus declare that he is "the Savior of the world" (Jn 4:42).

1.4. The Noun Sōtēria. Sōtēria, a noun meaning "salvation," can refer to the process of saving or to the result. It is found in Luke 1:69 where Zechariah declares that God has raised up "a horn of salvation," and then defines God's gift more closely as "salvation [deliverance] from our enemies." Later, in the same hymn the task of his son John (see john the Baptist) is defined as giving to his people "the knowledge of salvation through the forgiveness of their sins." Jesus comments that his visit to Zacchaeus has brought "salvation" to his household (Lk 19:9). And Jesus tells the woman of Samaria that "salvation is from the Jews" (Jn 4:22).

1.5. The Noun Sōterion. Another word meaning "salvation," sōterion, is found in Luke 2:30 where Simeon says that his eyes have seen God's salvation, and in Luke 3:6 where the Evangelist himself quotes Isaiah 40:5, "And all humanity will see God's salvation." According to Louw and Nida this word signifies rather "the means by which people experience divine salvation."

1.6. Salvation in a Spiritual Sense. This survey demonstrates that the spiritual sense is clearly present in Matthew (1:21) and Mark (10:26), but that it is most prominent in Luke, who alone of the Synoptic Evangelists develops the use of the nouns alongside the verb. One interesting fact which emerges is that the "literal" meaning of the word can be either broadly to "rescue" or to "heal," and both of these meanings can underlie the "spiritual" usage of the terminology. Louw and Nida (1.241 n. 4) comment that on the whole Bible translators have used words reflecting the former meaning, but that there has been a shift to using words reflecting the latter meaning or to using words that signify more "to restore, recreate." Thus, the accent has shifted from the action of God or the newness of what he creates to the restoration of what has been lost or marred.

2. Background to the Usage in the Gospels.

The Gospels were written at a time when the church had already developed a special vocabulary to refer to Christian experience. We may envisage a two-way process whereby the vocabulary of the Christians will have been influenced by that of Jesus and conversely the diction of the Gospels may have been influenced by that of the church. The modes of expression of Jesus and his followers will also have been influenced by their heritage in the OT and Judaism,* and to some extent also by the need to speak in terms that would be readily understood in the wider world.

The extensive and readable survey by E. M. B. Green considers the background to the NT use of the concept. There is a considerable amount of material in the OT where the corresponding Hebrew words are often used of deliverance in times of conflict, especially war. But the idea of deliverance is much wider and refers to being set free from all kinds of perils and dangers to life and even more generally to the state of well-being which God desires for his people. The Israelites naturally looked to God as their supreme and ultimate deliverer from all kinds of trouble and distress. He is the Savior par excellence (cf. Ps 27:1 and frequently).

The term savior was well known in the Greco-Roman world as an epithet for gods in their roles as helpers of humanity and particular communities; the god Asclepius was particularly important as the healer of the sick at various shrines. It was also used of statesmen, and when a religious cult of rulers developed, savior was one of the honorific tides used in this connection.

3.1. Matthew.

3.1.1. Salvation from Sin. Right at the outset Matthew's Gospel announces that "Jesus" is to be so-called because he will save his people from their sins (see Forgiveness of Sins). In this context the "people" is a designation for Israel which is regarded as a sinful nation. Deliverance from sin is associated with the response of the people to John the Baptist (Mt 3:6) and with the sovereign declarations of Jesus as the Son of man (Mt 9:2, 5, 6; see Son of Man). At the Last Supper (see Last Supper) Jesus declares that his blood is to be poured out for the forgiveness of sins (Mt 26:28). He also states that he has come with a mission to sinful people (Mt 9:10-13; cf. 11:19). The significance of "saving" is not spelled out in detail, but the three references to forgiveness indicate clearly enough what is probably in mind. One would naturally think of delivering people from the effects of their sins, but at the same time enabling them not to sin is in mind. In the ironic summary on the lips of the Jewish leaders at the crucifixion: "He saved others" (Mt 27:42a), the verb is used in a broad sense and is not to be limited to the sense of saving a person from death (Mt 27:42b). However, it is unlikely that we are to find a spiritual significance on the level of the original speakers.

3.1.2. Salvation As Physical and Spiritual. The references to deliverance from impending death at sea and to the cure of physical ailments need not necessarily imply anything further than this. However, a number of factors may suggest a different understanding.

First, there is the fact that stories in the Gospels about physical "salvation" may well have been used in the church with a symbolic significance; thus the story of the disciples in the boat during a storm has been taken to symbolize the church in the world suffering tribulation. In this case it is the followers of Jesus who cry out to the Lord to "save" them in the difficulties of life, and the answer to their prayers may lie in the removing or mitigating of their trials, or their being brought safely through them, or their being brought to final salvation despite even death itself. The collocation of healing a paralyzed man and forgiving his sins may equally have led to seeing healing as symbolic of spiritual forgiveness and salvation.

Second, there is the fact that the formula translated elsewhere in the Gospels as "your faith* has healed you" is used once in Luke (7:50) of a sinful woman who had experienced forgiveness. Here the formula is naturally translated as "your faith has saved you" (so NIV), which is essentially the same as Ephesians 2:8 (cf. Acts 15:11 [if translated with F. F. Bruce, "we believe (so as to be saved"]; 16:31; Rom 10:9; Jas 2:14; in the longer addition to Mark [16:16] the same church terminology is to be found). In view of the ambiguity of the formula when taken out of a healing context, it is quite probable that early Christians were led to see healing as symbolic of salvation and to draw the parallel between healing by faith and salvation by faith.

Third, no hard and fast line was drawn between the physical and the spiritual in the ancient world. In fact, the same is often true today. If Christians pray for God to "bless" somebody, it is often hard to say whether they are thinking of successfully carrying through some piece of business or aspect of daily life or enjoying some kind of sense of divine favor or doing some aspect of Christian ministry and service successfully. It would, therefore, be hard to distinguish between a physical healing and the healing of the "inner person" (cf. Lk 17:19, where it is not clear whether the statement refers purely to the cure of the leprosy).

It is therefore likely that the healing stories in the Gospels were understood as accounts of a process that involved the whole person and not merely a physical or mental healing.

3.1.3. Salvation Despite Persecution. Matthew 10:22 and parallels could refer to being brought through persecution in physical safety; however, the reference to possible death in verse 21 suggests that the verse is about standing firm in loyalty to Jesus despite persecution and that standing firm leads to "final salvation." However, in Matthew 24:22 (par. Mk 13:20) the force could be that if persecution went on too long, nobody would survive alive, and therefore there would be nobody left alive to welcome the Son of man at his coming. The saying cannot mean that nobody would stand firm to the point of martyrdom. Here, then, we have two different uses of the word quite close to each other.

3.1.4. Final Salvation. Similarly, Matthew 19:25 and parallels must refer to "final salvation." It is about a future state of being saved as opposed to being lost, and in the imagery of the Gospels signifies entry to the heavenly banquet instead of exclusion, a welcome by the Son of man and entry to the heavenly kingdom instead of rejection and consignment to eternal fire (see Judgment).
This raises the question whether "being saved" refers exclusively to a future state in the next world, or whether it can also refer to those who are already sure of entry to the kingdom.

3.1.5. Saving and Losing One's Life. In Matthew 16:25 and parallels there is an important set of sayings about saving and losing one's life. The difficulty here is partly caused by the ambiguity and uncertainty of the word life (Gk psyche) which can refer to the "soul" as distinct from the body (and hence signify an individual person), or to "life" or to one's "real life." Jesus appears to be saying that those who try to "save" (i.e., preserve) their lives, either in the sense of avoiding martyrdom or by holding fast to the things that give them pleasure and satisfaction in this world, will in the end "lose" their lives, either by finding that death cannot be kept at bay or that attachment to earthly things leads to loss at the final judgment and hence in the next world. On the other hand, those who are prepared to say "no" to their self, possibly even by dying, for the sake of Jesus (Mark adds "and the gospel"), find that they will "save" their lives in the sense that they will attain to the kingdom of God and enjoy the blessings that are really worth having (cf. the parallel in somewhat different wording in Mt 10:39 par. Lk 17:33).

3.2. Mark. The picture in Mark's Gospel is simpler than in Matthew. The one significant reference not paralleled in Matthew is Mark 3:4, where Jesus comments on the lawfulness of doing good and "saving life" on the Sabbath* in the broad sense of healing a sick man. The phrase stands in contrast to "killing" and is pointedly directed against what Jesus implies to be the secret intentions of his critics who attacked him for healing on the Sabbath. Otherwise, Mark lacks the programmatic text found in Matthew 1:21, and only in Mark 10:26 is there an explicit theological use of the term.

3.3. Luke. The case is different with Luke. He has the same broad pattern of usage as the other two Gospels, but there is a special emphasis on salvation which is not found in them.

3.3.1. The Overture to the Story of Salvation. This is clear above all from the birth stories (see Birth of Jesus), which function like an overture, setting out the main themes of the following drama, but doing so with their own distinctive music. One of the most characteristic tones here is that of salvation, with six significant references.
The note is first struck in Luke 1:47 where Mary, as the mother-to-be of the Messiah aligns herself with the people of God and rejoices in God her savior (see Mary’s Song). The development of her song makes it clear that he is savior both of her and of the people. God's action is depicted in terms of powerful action against the mighty and the proud and on behalf of the poor and humble. These sets of terms connote respectively those who are opposed to God and those who trust him to provide for their needs. Further, God's action is seen as forming part of a long history of merciful concern for the people of his choice.

In the second song, that of Zechariah (see Zechari-ah's Song), the nature of salvation is brought out more clearly. Again, the note of powerful intervention is struck—"a horn of salvation" (1:69)—and it is associated with the coming of the Messiah (see Christ). Again we hear of God's action against the powerful wicked people making it possible for his people to serve him righteously without fear of attack (1:71). But above all Zechariah speaks of an experience (Gk gnōsis, "knowledge") of salvation which is closely associated with the forgiveness of sins (1:77). What Matthew 1:21 said with the utmost brevity Luke expresses on a broader canvas. It is not surprising after all this that when Jesus is born, the lofty language used to describe him refers not only to his Davidic links, to his messiahship and his position as Lord,* but also to his being a savior (2:11). And the whole drama is summed up in the comment of Simeon (see Simeon's Song) that he has seen the salvation which the Lord has prepared—a salvation which is for all peoples (NIV "for all people" [singular] is not sufficiently literal), including the Gentiles* (Lk 2:30-32).

3.3.2. Salvation As the Mission of the Son of Man. The notes of this overture are intended to stay in our ears as we continue to listen to Luke's Gospel, and other uses of the "salvation" terminology should resonate with what we have already heard. Luke repeats a good deal of what we have already found in Matthew and Mark. We may note that in recounting material parallel to that in Mark he has added a reference in 8:12 to the way in which the devil snatches away the word from some hearers "so they may not believe and be saved" (Lk 8:12). Here the language of the early church is echoed, and Luke is clearly referring to the experience of spiritual salvation which comes through hearing the word of God. The same is true in Luke 13:23 where Jesus is asked whether "the saved" are few. This question should be interpreted in the light of Matthew 7:13-14, which speaks of the many people who tread the road to destruction and the few who find the way to life, and of the equating of terms which we saw in Mark 10. This is confirmed by the context which refers to the coming feast in the Luke's theology of salvation is summed up in Luke 19:10 where the Son of man's mission is to seek and to save the lost. The language is that of shepherding and refers to the rescue of sheep from death in various possible ways. The metaphorical usage of such language to refer to God's care of his people was well established and is echoed here. In consequence of the coming of Jesus to him, it can be said that salvation has come to Zacchaeus's house there and then (Lk 19:9). It is thus a present experience involving the table fellowship (see Table Fellowship) between Jesus and Zacchaeus and the commencement of a new way of life in which the latter abandons the sinful habits of the past. Jesus emphasizes that even though Zacchaeus is a sinner,* yet he is one of the lost sheep of the house of Israel and therefore a rightful object of his mission.

3.4. John. In the Gospel of John salvation is associated with the mission of the Son of God (see Son of God) and is placed in direct contrast with the possibility of condemnation and perishing. To be saved is thus the opposite of being judged and destroyed. It is the same as to gain eternal life (Jn 3:16-17; cf. 12:47). Salvation is not confined to the Jewish people. It is for the world, and this includes the Samaritans,* whom Jewish orthodoxy regarded as excluded from God's favor; it is they who confess that Jesus is the "savior of the world" (Jn 4:42), even if it is true that salvation comes to the world "from the Jews." It follows that testimony to Jesus is what can lead people to experience salvation (Jn 5:34). The shepherding metaphor (see Shepherd, Sheep) is also used to express the role of Jesus in this Gospel, but here Jesus functions as the door through which the sheep enter into the safety of the fold and so are free from the dangers outside. (The metaphor is not to be pressed; the sheep can go freely in and out in safety; the implication is that those who "belong" to the sheepfold are assured of the protection of the shepherd wherever they are.)

4. The Understanding of Salvation in the Gospels.

Sufficient has been said to show that salvation is not a dominant word group in the Gospels in the same way as, say, the kingdom of God is. This is particularly obvious in Mark. Matthew associates the coming of Jesus with his role as a savior, but does not develop the terminology signficandy. Luke makes much of the theme in the birth narratives, and never altogether loses sight of it thereafter, but the terminology can scarcely be said to be prominent In John the word group occupies a minor but significant role, alongside other word groups that receive much greater attention.

It is obvious that the Evangelists are here reflecting the historical realities of the situation, that this was not a word group used greatly by Jesus, especially in its full theological sense. Nevertheless, it is arguable that the Evangelists have correctly represented the situation in that they recognized that the mission of Jesus was ultimately concerned with salvation. Jesus announced the kingdom of God with its attendant blessings; the language of salvation spells out what this means in terms of the benefits for humankind.

Several themes emerge from the Gospels:

(1) Salvation is closely related to Jesus and his mission. It is a comprehensive term for the benefits brought by the sovereign action of God through the Messiah.

(2) It is thought of as a future experience, identical with entry into the kingdom of God and gaining eternal life, but it is also a present experience resulting from personal encounter with Jesus.

(3) God brings salvation through Jesus for his people Israel. The implication is that although they are God's people, they are not enjoying the fullness of life which he wishes for them. This is due both to the effects of evil in the world at large (e.g., the action of enemies) and the workings of illness and death.

(4) Individuals are not by their sinfulness cut off from the possibility of gaining the salvation intended for God's people. On the contrary, this fact establishes their need. Nor in fact is salvation in principle limited to the Jews. There are hints that it is for all peoples, although within the ministry of Jesus there are only occasional contacts with Samaritans and other non-Jews.

(5) The linking of healing with faith and the wider use of the "your faith has saved you" formula indicate that the reception of salvation was associated with faith, understood in a broad sense as recognition of Jesus as God's sovereign and powerful agent and a commitment to him.

(6) Turning aside from evil is part of the process of salvation. Zacchaeus in fact not only abandons his former dishonest practices but pledges himself to a new way of life which involves giving to the poor.
(7) In presenting Jesus as the savior the Evangelists are assigning to him a role which Judaism reserved for Yahweh. Although the term could be applied to earthly leaders (the judges), it was used predominandy of Yahweh, and the echoes of OT passages about Yahweh's saving activity indicate that his role is now assigned to Jesus. The term savior was not previously applied to the Messiah in Judaism. At the same time, it is implied that Jesus stands over against other human figures (such as the Roman emperor) who were regarded as saviors.

Samaritans

In NT times the Samaritans were a substantial religious group inhabiting parts of the central hill country of Samaria between Galilee* to the north and Judea to the south, but with Diaspora communities in addition (see Archeology and Geography). Physically, they focused on Mount Gerizim, close to the ancient town of Shechem, while religiously the focus of their faith was on a form of the Law* of Moses,* the Pentateuch, which differed only slighdy, but in one or two respects crucially, from the form of the Pentateuch familiar to us from its Masoretic recension.
1. Sources and Their Difficulties

Despite the explosion in recent years in the publication of Samaritan texts and secondary discussions based upon them, considerable problems still confront us regarding most questions relating to the Samaritans in the first half of the first century A.D.

1.1. Samaritan Sources. Apart from the Samaritan Pentateuch itself, all Samaritan sources date from periods considerably later than the NT. Moreover, many of these sources, whether historical, doctrinal or liturgical, are known only from manuscripts of far more recent date still. In addition, it must be remembered that the Samaritan community has survived in unbroken continuity to this very day, and that during its history it has both developed internally and, being usually a minority group, has inevitably been influenced by external pressures in its quest for survival. Scholars thus disagree, often quite widely, over the extent to which these sources can help in reconstructing early Samaritan history and belief.

Among the more important texts which incorporate valuable earlier traditions are: (1) the Memar Marqah, a fourth-century composition but also including later material; it is an expansive retelling of the biblical account of Moses, incorporating many midrashic supplements (see Midrash); (2) the Kitāb al-Ta'īrīkh ("annals") of Abu 'l-Fath, composed in A.D. 1355, and now generally recognized as the most valuable of the various Samaritan "Chronicles"; and (3) the Samaritan Targum (see Targums). Of course, even though the greatest caution has to be exercised before historical conclusions can be drawn from these and other such Samaritan sources, they have considerable significance on their own account in terms of heightening our appreciation of the Samaritans' sense of self-awareness.

1.2. Jewish Sources. Pride of place here belongs to Josephus,* who both recounts a version of the origin of the Samaritans and includes frequent references to them in his Antiquities and Jewish War. This material has to be evaluated in the light of Josephus' evident anti-Samaritan stance and his historical confusion (which can be independently verified) surrounding especially the last part of the Persian period and the start of the Hellenistic period, precisely the time in which he locates the most important step in the development of the Samaritan community.

There are also references of varied significance in the inter-testamental literature and in the later Mishnah and Talmud (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Though generally negative, scholars have frequently remarked on the fact that several of these are a good deal more ambivalent than might at first have been supposed, reflecting, no doubt, the fact that the status of the Samaritans was extremely problematic from a Jewish point of view.

1.3. Other Sources. The NT itself contains important material from an historical point of view. In the context of our present discussion, we need therefore to be particularly aware of the dangers of circular argumentation. Some of the early church fathers also include potentially relevant material. Finally, archeology is a particularly important source of information in an area where the textual data are so uncertain. Shechem has been extensively excavated, and work is currently in progress unearthing the remains of a substantial Hellenistic town on Mount Gerizim itself, so that we may hope for further advances in our understanding in the coming years.

A full survey of all these sources is now available in The Samaritans, a magisterial compendium by a number of leading experts, edited by A. D. Crown (1989).

2. Origins and Early History.

Several views of Samaritan origins are attested in antiquity. Though each contains problems from a modern perspective, they retain their importance as evidence for how the situation was perceived in the first century. The following survey represents a heavy simplification for the sake of clarity.

2.1. Samaritan Hews. The Samaritans have always believed that they are the direct descendants of a faithful nucleus of ancient Israel. From their perspective, Israel's apostasy began as early as the time of Eli (eleventh century B.C.), when the nation's cultic center was removed from Gerizim to Shiloh (and thence eventually to Jerusalem); they would thus not have regarded themselves as the remnant of the old northern kingdom of Israel, but as a separate group alongside them. This helps explain their acceptance of the Pentateuch alone as authoritative. For them, therefore, the question of origins should be directed more toward Judaism* than to themselves.

2.2. Jewish Traditions. The origins of the Samaritans are linked with the account in 2 Kings 17:24-41 about how, following their conquest of the northern kingdom, the Assyrians colonized the area by setting it with people from a number of Mesopotamian towns, including Cuthah. These colonists adopted the Israelite faith alongside their own religion (v. 41), and their descendants, often called "Cuthaeans" in Jewish polemical sources, are the Samaritans of later times. The hostilities between Judah and her northern neighbor recorded in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah demonstrate the antiquity of the division between the two groups.

2.3. Josephus. While sharing the previous opinion, Josephus adds a further significant ingredient, namely that at the end of the Persian period the priest Manasseh was expelled from Jerusalem, and that a sanctuary was built for him shortly after at the start of the Hellenistic period by Sanballat, his father-in-law, on Mount Gerizim. Over the course of time other priests from Jerusalem joined him there. Josephus thus recognizes a certain degree of Samaritan priestly legitimacy (at least in terms of descent), and his account helps him explain the Jewish character of much Samaritan practice.

2.4. Critical Reconstruction. After decades of discussion (which cannot be surveyed here), as new pieces of evidence have come to light, scholars are now agreed that none of these positions can be maintained as an accurate reflection of the situation. While disagreement inevitably remains, there is a widespread measure of agreement on some of the salient issues, the upshot of which for our present purposes is that the situation as reflected in the NT developed far more recendy than had previously been thought and that the division was by no means as clear-cut as the earlier views might be thought to imply. The following points deserve notice.

2.4.1. The account in 2 Kings 17 should be discounted in discussions of Samaritan origins. (1) The word haššōmrōnîm in verse 29, often translated "the Samaritans," seems merely to mean "inhabitants of (the city or province of) Samaria," and this fits the context best. (2) There is no evidence to link the later Samaritans with Samaria. The earliest certain references to them all point clearly to their residence at Shechem, as we should expect on the basis of their theology (Sir 50:26; 2 Macc 5:22-23; 6:2), and one of Josephus' sources refers to them as "Shechemites" (Ant. 11.340-47; 12.10). Shechem was rebuilt only in the early Hellenistic period, following an interruption in settlement of some 150 years. (3) Despite earlier mistaken suggestions, it is now clear that nothing of later Samaritan religion and practice owes anything to the proposed pagan influence of 2 Kings 17 or Ezra 4.

2.4.2. It is not known for certain precisely who resettled Shechem (and Mount Gerizim itself?) at the start of the Hellenistic period. Most probably, an important element comprised a group of religious purists who were descendants of the original Israelite population in the north who had not been exiled by the Assyrians (that there were some is recognized by the OT itself; cf., for instance, 2 Chron 30; 34:6; Jer 40:5). Following the severe suppression of a revolt in Samaria in the time of Alexander the Great and the complete hellenization of this city, the ancient site of Shechem would have been an obvious place to settle. "It often happened that when a Greek colony was established, native villages under its control formed a union around an ancestral sanctuary" (E. Bickerman, 43-44). The discovery of over 200 skeletons in a cave in the Wdi ed-Dâliyeh is generally thought to reflect part of this same upheaval.

Less certain, but in the present writer's view very attractive, is the suggestion that they were joined, or even preceded, by a group of priests from Jerusalem who had been forced to leave the Temple* service there because of the rigorous policies of those who succeeded Ezra and Nehemiah. Josephus' account may include some memory of this; there is strong circumstantial evidence in the OT for a major reorganization of the Jerusalem priesthood at about this time; it would help account for Samaritan claims to a legitimate priesthood, their close association with a number of inner-Jewish developments (e.g., in hala-chah), and the apparently continuing inner-Samaritan tensions between the priesthood and the laity (see below). The later establishment of the Qumran community (see Dead Sea Scrolls), this time by a more strict group of priests and their followers, forms an interesting parallel development.

2.4.3. The formation of this community and the building of a temple soon after would not of themselves have caused a decisive breach or schism. Purvis (1986), however, notes four possible reasons for a steadily deteriorating situation during the third and second centuries B.C.: (1) political tensions because of different alliances with the Ptolemies and the Seleucids; (2) Jewish resentment because of Samaritan acceptance of a greater degree of hellenization and their consequent failure to join in the resistance to Antiochus Epiphanes; (3) tensions between their respective Diaspora communities; and (4) Hasmonaean expansion.

This last element was probably decisive, for in 128 B.C. John Hyrcanus captured Shechem and destroyed the sanctuary on Mount Gerizim. Apart from natural resentment, this drove the Samaritans to a closer religious rationale of their situation (compare the effect of the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple in A.D. 70; see Destruction of Jerusalem). As Purvis (1968) has shown, it was at this period that the Samaritan Pentateuch began its own separate history in terms of script, orthography and, crucially, textual tradition and recension. From this point on, therefore, though one should certainly continue to regard Samaritanism as a form of Judaism ("sea" would be an anachronistic term to use), it became crystallized as by far the most distinct by virtue of its wholesale rejection of the Jerusalem-centered salvation history, something which cannot be said of any other variety of Judaism in antiquity.

2.4.4. Not surprisingly, relations continued thereafter at a low ebb, and isolated events that are recorded from the first century A.D. may be regarded as symptomatic, though told from a Jewish standpoint. For instance, between A.D. 6 and 7, some Samaritans scattered bones in the Jerusalem Temple during Passover (Ant. 18. 29-30), while in A.D. 52 Samaritans massacred a group of Galilean pilgrims at En-gannîm (Ant. 20.118).

3. Varieties of Samaritanism and Principal Beliefs.

Just as it is clearly mistaken to speak of normative Judaism in the first century in view of the number of groups which often differed quite sharply from one another, so recent research has suggested that the same was probably true of the Samaritans (cf. Kippenberg and Isser).

3.1. The Dositheans. Because of the fragmentary nature and late date of all our relevant sources, it is not possible to go beyond informed conjecture, but Isser has made out a strong case for the view that "Dositheus was an early first century A.D. eschatological figure among the Samaritans, who applied the 'Prophet like Moses' passage of Dt. 18 to himself" (163). He further argues that he became prominent within a Samaritan sect which had already been formed during the previous century and which, as a synagogue*-based lay movement, was somewhat akin to the Pharsaic movement within Judaism, in contradistinction to the more Sadducee-like orthodox Samaritans, who were no doubt predominantly priestly and centered on Gerizim.

Such distinctions need to be borne in mind when evaluating references to contacts between the Samaritans and Jesus or the first Christians as well as between Jews and Samaritans, for the degrees of affinity between different groups across the divide may have varied far more than our severely fragmented knowledge allows us to recognize.

3.2. Principal Beliefs. The previous remarks also mean that it is difficult to speak in general terms about Samaritan beliefs. However, from the Samaritan Pentateuch, whose primary recension should be dated, as we have seen, earlier than the first century, a few comments may be made. From the text-type of the Pentateuch which they elected to adopt for themselves, it is probable that already the passage in Deuteronomy 18:18-22 about a future "prophet like Moses" had been joined to the Exodus version of the Sinai account (following Ex 20:21).
They will themselves, however, have added to the Decalogue the commandment, based on Deuteronomy 27, to build an altar on Gerizim.

Thus we can be reasonably certain that the following elements of their later creed were already established in early times: belief in one God, in Moses the prophet, in the Law and in Mount Gerizim as the place appointed by God for sacrifice. The other two elements of the creed are less certain: the day of judgment and recompense, and the return of Moses as Taheb (the "restorer" or "returning one"). The latter is of particular interest in view of what we have seen about Dositheus, while in addition we may note the unrelated report of Josephus (Ant. 18. 85-87) that in A.D. 36 a Samaritan fanatic assembled a crowd on Gerizim, promising to reveal the sacred vessels thought to have been hidden there by Moses. These indications, coupled with the Samaritan Pentateuch, suggest that from early times an important element of Samaritan belief, especially amongst the laity, was the coming of the "prophet like Moses," but that only later did this develop into the more crystallized concept of the Taheb
(cf. Dexinger in Crown); beyond that it would be hazardous to speculate.

Although we have sought not to go beyond the available evidence in our treatment of Samaritan history and belief, we probably now have enough data to do justice to the references to the Samaritans in the Gospels.

4.1. The Synoptic Gospels. In the first three Gospels there are references to the Samaritans at Matthew 10:5; Luke 9:52; 10:33 and 17:16. These can all be understood against the background described above, once it is additionally borne in mind that they are told from a predominantly Jewish standpoint. Thus, in order to make a point similar to that in Luke 7:1-10, the foreignness of the grateful Samaritan is emphasized in Luke 17:11-19, even though he is instructed according to Jewish Law along with the other nine lepers in v. 14. Similarly, Jesus' instruction to his disciples* to go only to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:6) is contrasted not only with the negative command concerning the Gentiles but also, as in a separate and distinctive category, "any city of the Samaritans" (v. 5). The incident in Luke 9:51-56 reflects typical Jewish-Samaritan personal antipathies of the time, though it is of interest to note both here and elsewhere that Jesus did not always bypass Samaritan territory (by taking a circuitous route through Transjordan) as many Galilean pilgrims to Jerusalem did. At the same popular level, the selection of a Samaritan for the positive role in the parable told in answer to the question "Who is my neighbor?" (Lk 10:25-37) is telling, and in a veiled manner anticipates the Jewish acknowledgement (recorded much later) that the Samaritans were often more punctilious in their observance of the Law than the Jews (b. Qidd. 76a).

4.2. John. It is John 4 which gives the most extended account of an encounter of Jesus with the Samaritans (the only other reference in this Gospel being Jn 8:48). Despite its popularity, the title "woman of Samaria" is misleading. The incident takes place at Sychar (v. 5), clearly identified as being close to Shechem and Mount Gerizim (cf. w. 5-6 and 20; Gen 48:22 LXX). The parenthetical comment in verse 9 about Jewish-Samaritan relations following the woman's expression of surprise that Jesus should ask her for a drink is probably not a general statement, but reflects a halakhic ruling (mid-first century?) that "the daughters of the Samaritans are menstruants from their cradle" (b. Nid. 31b) and hence that the vessels which they handle are unclean. If so, the comment may reflect more the time of the Evangelist than of Jesus himself, and the woman's surprise may not have been so specifically motivated. The woman's question about the right place to worship* (v. 20) is, as we have seen, entirely appropriate as reflecting the issue that stood at the heart of Samaritan identity and is just the kind of easily grasped popular polemic which someone of her status might have been expected to raise. Her response to Jesus' reply (v. 25), however, is more problematic; talk of a "Messiah" would probably have been foreign to a Samaritan (though our earlier caveat about diversity in this particular area of eschatology must be borne in mind). If historical tradition lies behind the saying, its present expression must be regarded as a Johannine paraphrase for his more Jewish-orientated readership. A reference to the prophet like Moses* in the context of a discussion of the right place and mode of worship would have fitted well here, as is clear from our earlier discussion. See also Judaism.

Sanhedrin

The supreme Jewish religious, political and legal council in Jerusalem in NT times. The term was also used of the smaller courts governing the affairs of the Jewish communities throughout Palestine and the Diaspora.

1. Terminology
1. Terminology.

1.1. Synedrion. In the LXX synedrion (syn, "together" and hedra, "a seat") had no fixed meaning and translated a variety of Hebrew words (ma Ps 25:4 [Mt 26:4]; sôd-, Prov 11:13; dîn, Prov 22:10; qāhāl, 26:26). By the end of the Maccabean period synedrion is widespread in the Greek literature for the supreme Jerusalem council. The Hebrew word sanhedrin, a transliteration of synedrion, is also used in the Mishnah for the Jerusalem court (m. Sota 9:11).

In the Gospels synedrion refers to the Jerusalem council (Mt 26:59; Mk 15:1; Jn 11:47; cf. Acts 5:27). In Matthew 5:22 and 10:17 (par. Mk 13:9) any judicial body may be in mind, such as the Sanhedrin, a local Jewish council or a group in the Christian community. In Luke 22:66 synedrion probably refers to the assembly room.

Josephus also uses the term for the Jerusalem council (Ant. 14.167-80; Life 62) and for the five districts and councils created in Palestine by Gabinius (Ant. 14.89-91). In other Greek literature of the period a "sanhedrin" was often a council of representatives from various constituencies (e.g., Diodorus 16.41).

1.2. Gerousia. Generally translated as "senate" or "council," gerousia was a word used mainly for the Greek and Roman non-democratic senates (Aristode Pol. 2.6.15) and was an older term than synedrion for the Jerusalem council from the end of the Persian period and the beginning of the Hellenistic period (Josephus Ant. 12.138 and especially the apocrypha, Jdt 4:8; 2 Macc 11:27). Only in a puzzling verse in Acts 5:21 is the term used in the NT where the high priest (see Priest and Priesthood) "called together the council (synedrion) and all the senate (gerousia) of the sons of Israel." Luke may have thought there were two supreme bodies in Jerusalem, though it is more likely that, for the sake of his Greek readers, he means to say "the Sanhedrin, that is, all the senate."

1.3. Presbyterian. In Luke 22:66 presbyterion ("council of elders"; also Acts 22:5 and 1 Tim 4:14) may refer to the group of elders,* one of the constituents of the Sanhedrin, but probably refers to the supreme Jerusalem council.

1.4. Boulē. Josephus often uses boule ("council") for the Senate in Rome (J.W. 1.284; 13.164), local Roman city councils (Ant. 14.230), local Jewish city councils (Life 64), the Jerusalem Sanhedrin (J.W. 5.532) and its meeting place (bouleutērion, J.W. 5.144). However, the NT does not use the word in this way (cf. Lk 7:30; 23:51).

2. Theories.

According to the Greek literature (apocrypha, NT and Josephus) there was a single body in Jerusalem. However, the Mishnah says that there were two major courts in Jerusalem: "The greater Sanhedrin was made up of one and seventy [judges] and the lesser [Sanhedrin] of three and twenty" (m. Sanh. 1:6). The conflicting sources and multitude of terms has resulted in a number of theories about the Sanhedrin. A Büchler proposed that before A.D. 70 there was a political body (boulē), a college of mostly priests (synedrion) and the Great Sanhedrin which oversaw Jewish religious life. M. Wolff argued that the high priest presided over a little Sanhedrin, and there was also a Great Sanhedrin (gerousia) of scribes* which condemned Jesus. S. B. Hoenig's theory was that there were three Sanhedrins: a political as well as a priestly and also a scribal one which was the Great Sanhedrin. However, it is difficult to determine how far the Mishnah has preserved reliable traditions on the Sanhedrin, for it is now generally agreed that it is reflecting the entirely different situation at Jamnia, not that in Jerusalem before A.D. 70. On the other hand the Greek sources are more contemporaneous to the time of Jesus and are therefore to be favored in reconstructing the history of the Sanhedrin before A.D. 70.

3. Origin and History.

The rabbis at Jamnia legitimized their governing body by tracing it back to Moses* and his seventy elders (Deut 27:1; m. Sanh. 1:6). However, apart from a supreme law court in Jerusalem (Deut 17:8-13; 19:15-21) and the occasional mention of "elders" (Ex 3:16; Deut 5:23), there is no hint of the existence of such an institution as the Sanhedrin in this period.

The actual seeds of the Jerusalem Sanhedrin in the time of Jesus were planted in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. Joshua the high priest and the Davidic governor of Jerusalem, Zerubbabel, ruled the community together (Hag 1:1; Zech 4:14). The community was headed by a priestly nobility which formed an aristocratic council (Neh 2:16; 5:7) representing the people in negotiations with the Persian provincial governor Tattenai in the reconstruction of the Temple (Ezra 5:5, 9; 6:7-8, 14). With the death of Zerubbabel the house of David came to an end and the high priest emerged as the head of the gerousia and Jewish state (1 Macc 12:6).

From Hecataeus of Abdera, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, we learn that the council was dominated by the priests: "He (Moses) picked out the men of most refinement and with the greatest ability to head the entire nation, and appointed them priests. . . . These same men he appointed to be judges in all major disputes, and entrusted to them the guardianship of the laws and customs. For this reason the Jews have never had a king, and authority over the people is regularly vested in whichever priest is regarded as superior to his colleagues in wisdom and virtue. They call this man the high priest" (Diodorus 40.3.4-5).

Under the relative freedom provided by the Hellenistic kings, the influence of the Jerusalem court increased. The Seleucid king, Antiochus III (223-187 B.C.), said that it was his will that the Jewish nation "shall have a form of government in accordance with the laws of their country, and the senate (gerousia), the priests, the scribes of the temple and the temple-singers shall be relieved from poll-tax" (Josephus Ant. 12.142).

From the beginning of the Maccabean Revolt (167 B.C.) the power of the high priest increased (1 Macc 12:6) and with Simon being established as high priest, military chief and ethnarch (140 B.C.), the power of the Sanhedrin was reduced (1 Macc 14:24-49). With the reign of Queen Alexandra (76-67 B.C.) the Sanhedrin's power increased and the domination of the priests and nobility was exchanged for that of the Pharisees.* Alexandra permitted "the Pharisees to do as they liked in all matters, and also commanded the people to obey them; and whatever regulations, introduced by the Pharisees in accordance with the traditions of their fathers, had been abolished by her father-in-law Hyrcanus, these she again restored" (Josephus Ant. 13.408).
Gabinius (57-55 B.C.), the Roman governor in Syria, divided the nation into five districts with councils (synedria) in Jerusalem, Gadara, Amathus, Jericho and Sepphoris (Josephus Ant. 14.91). In 47 B.C. Caesar overthrew this arrangement so that the high priest and the Jerusalem council were responsible for the affairs of the whole nation even though these local councils survived (Josephus Ant. 14.192-95). The Sanhedrin became sufficiently confident in its authority that the high priest and ethnarch Hyrcanus II (63-40 B.C.) summoned Herod to stand trial on capital sentences he had passed without the Sanhedrin's authority (Josephus/. W. 1.204-15). When Herod took Jerusalem in 37 B.C. he retaliated by killing the enure membership of the Sanhedrin (Josephus Ant. 14.174, though Ant. 15.6 says only forty-five leading men were killed). Herod abolished the privilege of serving as high priest for life and appointed high priests with ceremonial duties and no political power.

Under the Roman procurators (A.D. 6-41) the Sanhedrin's power increased again (Josephus Ant. 20.200, 251). So, in the NT the Sanhedrin is represented as the supreme court of justice (Mk 14:55).

After the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple in A.D. 70 (see Destruction of Jerusalem), the Sanhedrin was recreated at Jamnia (Yavneh in the OT; 2 Chron 26:6) in the Northwest of Judea (m. Sofa 9:11; m. Sank 11:4) before moving to Galilee in AD. 118.

4. Membership.

The Mishnah is probably correct in saying that prior to A.D. 70 the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem had seventy-one members (cf. Num 11:16; Josephus J.W. 2.482; Ep. Arist. 46-50; to. Sanh. 1:6).

After the exile the Jerusalem council was composed of Levites, priests and heads of families (2 Chron 19:5-11). In the Maccabean period the Sanhedrin consisted of lay aristocracy and priests of Sadducean sympathy (1 Macc 7:33; 11:23; 14:28). In the time of Queen Alexandra Pharisaic scribes belonged to the assembly.

Both the NT and Josephus agree that in the first century the chief priests (archiereis) were the key figures in the Sanhedrin (Mt 27:41; Mk 14:53; Josephus J.W. 2.301, 316-42). These were probably the former high priests and members of the priestly aristocracy from which the high priests were chosen and belonged to the party of the Sadducees (Acts 4:1; 5:17; Josephus Ant. 20.199). The scribes (grammateis) were the second major component of the Sanhedrin and dominated the body (Acts 5:34; 23:6; Josephus Ant. 18.17; J.W. 2.411). In the Persian period all the members of the Sanhedrin (gerousia) were called "elders" (presbyteroi, 1 Macc 14:20; 2 Macc 4:44). By NT times the term "elders" was used for a third group consisting of priests and lay members of the nobility (Mt 26:3; 27:1; 28:11-12) within the Sanhedrin. From observing the synonyms for these elders we learn that they are leading men of the people (Lk 19:47; Josephus Life 194), the leading men of Jerusalem, the powerful and the dignitaries (Josephus j. W. 2.316,410; Life 9).

Josephus says that, along with Ishmael the high priest and Helcias the treasurer, ten leading men were sent on a delegation to Nero (Ant. 20.194). Also, as Greek cities had a committee of ten leading men, there may have been a group of the ten foremost members within the Sanhedrin.

The high priest was always the president of the Sanhedrin (1 Macc 14:44; Mt 26:57; Acts 5:17; 24:1; Josephus Ag. Ap. 2.194; Ant. 20.200, 251). From the time of Herod the Great the high priest was often appointed arbitrarily and out of political considerations. Otherwise, the office was hereditary (Num 3:32; 25:11-13; 35:25, 28; Neh 12:10-11) and the Palestinian Talmud says that the high priest would not be elected high priest if he had not first been captain of the Temple (y. Yoma 3:8; 41a. 5; cf. Josephus J.W. 2.409).

Second in rank to the high priest was the captain of the Temple (Hebrew, sāgān or segen, Aramaic s'gan, Greek, stratēgos; Josephus Ant. 20.131; Lk 22:4,52; Arts 4:1, 24, 26; m. Yoma 3:1). Josephus also mentions a secretary of the Sanhedrin (J.W. 5.532).

We know little of how people were appointed to the Sanhedrin, though they may have been co-opted (to. Sanh. 4:4) from among those of legitimate Israelite descent (m. Qidd. 4:5). Actual admission was through the laying on of hands (m. Sanh. 4:4; cf. Num 27:18-23; Deut 34:9).

5. Powers and Functions.

At least theoretically, the Jerusalem Sanhedrin's sphere of authority extended over the spiritual, political and legal affairs of all Jews (m. Ta'an. 3:6). Thus, the Mishnah says that where members of a local court disagreed on a point of law the matter was referred to the Jerusalem court which sat at the gate of the Temple Mount. If the dispute could not be resolved, it went to the court which sat at the gate of the Temple Court. If a resolution was still not found, the Sanhedrin heard the dispute. Thereafter, on pain of death local judges were to follow the decision (m. Sanh 11:2; cf. Josephus Ant. 4.214-18; J.W. 2.570-71). However, the sphere of authority and geographical area over which the Jerusalem Sanhedrin exercised jurisdiction varied greatly over time according to the relative freedom of the Jews in relation to the succession of foreign oppressors.

In the time of the Hasmonean rulers the whole of Palestine was a single political unit over which the Sanhedrin exercised oversight. When Cabinius (57-55 B.C.) divided Jewish territory into five areas, the authority of the Jerusalem Sanhedrin may have covered only one-third of Judea (Josephus Ant. 14.91; J.W. 1.170). From the death of Herod the Great, Galilee and Perea were separate administrative regions so that the civil jurisdiction of the Jerusalem Sanhedrin did not extend beyond Judea. Thus while Jesus remained in Galilee, the Sanhedrin had no judicial authority over him. Even so, Luke says that the Sanhedrin authorized Paul to arrest Christians in Damascus (Acts 9:1-2; 22:5). Then Josephus says that in a peaceful period after the first stages of the Jewish War in A.D. 60, magistrates and members of the Sanhedrin dispersed from Jerusalem and collected the Roman taxes from the whole of Judea (J.W. 2.405).

In A.D. 6 Augustus appointed a procurator for Judea "with full powers, including the afflication of capital punishment" (Josephus J.W. 2.117). That the Sanhedrin could no longer order and execute a capital sentence is reflected in John 18:31 and in the rabbinic literature (y. Sanh. 18a; 24b; b. Sanh. 41a; b. 'Abod. Zar. 8b). On the other hand, Josephus says (J.W. 5.193-94) that the second court of the Temple was surrounded by a stone balustrade on which at regular intervals stood slabs giving warning in Greek and Latin: "No foreigner is to enter within the forecourt and the balustrade around the sanctuary. Whoever is caught will have himself to blame for his subsequent death" (CII, 1400 n. 85) This could be a special case granted to the Jews. In any case it is more likely to be a warning against being lynched (cf. Acts 6:8—8:2; Jn 10:31).

Also, Josephus says that the Sanhedrin condemned James, the brother of Jesus, to be stoned. In this case the procurator, Porcius Festus, had died, and Ananus took the opportunity of convening the Sanhedrin before Albinus, the new procurator, had arrived (Ant. 20.197-203). Further, the Mishnah relates the burning of a priest's daughter convicted of adultery (m. Sanh. 7:2). Those who argue that the Sanhedrin did not have the power of death under the Roman procurators suggest that this took place during the brief reign of Agrippa I (A.D. 41-44) when the Jews had their own independent state. Whether or not the Sanhedrin was able to execute capital punishment, the Romans maintained the right to intervene when a political crime was suspected (Acts 22:30; 23:15, 20, 28).

The Sanhedrin probably met on the western boundary of the Temple Mount (JosephusJ.W. 5.144; 6.354) in the "Hall of Hewn Stone" (lishkaf ha-gazit), indicating that it was next to the gymnasium, or Xystus (gaut = xystos, 1 Chron 22:2; Amos 5:11).

The night meeting in Mark 14:53 (par. Mt 26:57; Lk 22:54) was probably to be considered a preliminary meeting in the high priest's palace because trials could only be held in the hours of daylight (cf. Mk 15:1; m. Sanh. 4:1).

No record remains of the proceedings of the Jerusalem Sanhedrin. However, the Mishnah gives details of the judicial procedure of the lesser Sanhedrin of Twenty-Three which may reflect procedure of the Jerusalem Sanhedrin before A.D. 70. Members sat in a half-circle so they could see each other. Before them stood two scribes, one writing down what was said in favor and the other what was said against the accused. Before them sat three rows of students who could participate in non-capital trials (m. Sanh. 4:1-4).

Non-capital trials began with either case, but capital trials were to begin with the case for acquittal. A majority of one was sufficient in non-capital trials to acquit the accused of a capital charge. A majority of two was required for a guilty verdict on a capital charge. Verdicts could be reversed but not from an acquittal to a conviction in a capital trial. Those participating in the case could speak for and against the accused in non-capital trials. In capital trials a speaker in favor of conviction could only change and argue in favor of the accused, not the reverse. In noncapital cases the daytime trial could be followed by reaching a verdict that same night. In capital cases the verdict for an acquittal could be reached that night but a verdict of conviction had to wait until the following day (m. Sanh. 4:1). In that way members of the Sanhedrin could go off in pairs to eat a tittle (no wine was permitted) and discuss the matter all night before meeting in court early next morning (m. Sanh. 5:5). Therefore, trials were not to be held on the days before a Sabbath* or festival (m. Sanh. 4:1). In capital cases voting began with the most junior members standing, each giving their verdict (m. Sanh. 5:5).

SCRIBES

In the NT era the scribes (grammaleis) were a class of professional exponents and teachers of the Law*

1. Background
2. Scribes and Pharisees
3. Work of the Scribes
4. Scribes in the Gospels
5. Jesus and the Scribes

1. Background.

In ancient Near Eastern civilizations the highly prized skill of writing made the scribes significant members of the community, especially as political advisors, diplomats and experts in the ancient sciences and mysteries, including astrology.

Scribes began as recorders and copyists of official data (2 Kings 12:10) and formed themselves into guilds (1 Chron 2:55). They came to hold high political office (1 Kings 4:3; 2 Kings 18:18; 25:19; 1 Chron 27:32; 2 Chron 26:11; Is 22:15) and became the heirs of the priests (see Priest and Priesthood) and Levites as interpreters of the Law (2 Chron 34:13; Ezra 7:12) because of their familiarity with and understanding of the Scriptures (1 Chron 27:32).

In exilic times the scribes emerged as wise men of understanding (see Proverbs) as the Jews in a foreign land depended on them for interpreting the Torah in a new situation. Baruch was a scribe taking down Jeremiah's dictation (Jer 36:4,18), collecting the prophet's sayings (36:32) and acting as his representative (36:6-15).

From the fourth century B.C. Ezra, the priest and scribe, embodied all that was expected of a scribe in that period (Ezra 7:6-26; Neh 8:1 -9). By about 180 B.C., when Jesus ben Sirach the scribe who probably had a school in Jerusalem (Sir 51:23) assembled his book, the scribes were a well-developed and distinct class of high social status alongside the priesthood (Sir 38:24-39:11;Jub. 4:17-25). In the crisis perpetuated by Antiochus Epiphanes the reputation of lay scribes rose as they were zealous for the Law to the point of martyrdom (2 Macc 6:18-31), while the priestly scribes succumbed to Hellenism.*

After the fall of Jerusalem the most respected scribes settled at Jamnia as well as Lydda (m. Ros. Has. 1:6; 4:1-2). In Judaism* the learned were also known as elders,* experts, sages and scholars. The Mishnah says that they were to be "deliberate in judgment; raise up many disciples; and make a fence around the Torah" (m. 'Abot 1:1).

1.1. Leading Scribes. Little of historical value is known about individual scribes before AD. 70, the most famous pair being Hillel and Shammai (m. 'Abot 1:1-18). Hillel came to Palestine from Babylon and, because of his poverty, hired himself out as a day laborer. His kindness and gentleness characterized his school and the leniency of his decisions (b. Sabb. 30b-31a; b. Sota 48b). He drew up seven hermeneutical principles in order to establish the harmony between Scripture and tradition (t. Sanh. 7:11; see Old Testament in the Gospels).

Shammai, a native of Judea, is said to have been more stringent than Hillel in his interpretation of the Law. Even though both agreed on the need to fulfill the letter of the Law, the two schools met to discuss their differences (m. Šabb. 1:4-11).

As the regulations of the scribes were intended to be applicable throughout the Jewish community, the most respected authorities lived and worked in one place to reach common conclusions.

After the fall of Jerusalem (see Destruction of Jerusalem) Rabban Yohanan ben Zakkai, who lived mainly in Jamnia, was the most distinguished scribe. Another celebrated scribe, well known in the NT, was Gamaliel I who, according to Acts 5:34-39 and 22:3, taught Paul.

1.2. Lifestyle. Some scribes came from the priestly aristocracy (m. 'Abot 3:2; m. Šeqal. 8:5). Others were ordinary priests (m. 'Abot 2:8) or members of the lower orders of clergy (b. 'Arak. lib). The vast majority of scribes came from every other section of society, some supporting themselves by carrying on a trade. The literature gives evidence of a commander of the Temple fortress, a wine merchant, a carpenter, a leather worker, a flax comber and a day laborer being scribes. For economic reasons even the most respected rabbis undertook writing and copying of Scripture (b. Gt. 67a).

With the need to spend time studying the Law and with no set fee for giving instruction, even the most respected of these scribes could be poor and depended on gifts from their students, funds from the distribution to the poor and the Temple treasury (b. Yoma 35b; b. Ned. 49b-50a). Also, it was meritorious to show hospitality to a scribe, to give him a share of one's property or to run his business for him (b. Ber. 34b). Scribes were also exempt from taxes (m. 'Abot 3:5). On the other hand, some scribes were over-zealous in receiving this kindness (Josephus J.W. 1.571). Others, with many pupils, were very wealthy (b. Ketub. 67b).
2. Scribes and Pharisees.

Along with the chief priests these two groups are often associated in the Gospels. Some have denied that there is any relationship between them. Others have understood the scribes to be the Pharisees learned in the Law or an elite amongst them. The phrase "scribes of the Pharisees" (Mk 2:16; Acts 23:9) indicates the probability that scribes were associated with various sects and associations within first-century Judaism.

3. Work of the Scribes.

In relation to their knowledge of the Scriptures the scribes occupied themselves with a number of tasks (Sir 38:24-39:11).

3.1. Interpretation and Preservation of the Law. On the basis of existing regulations and by recourse to ancient customs which had become binding as common law (Mk 7:5-8), the scribes applied the general instructions of the Torah to daily living and even extended the Law to theoretical situations to build a safety fence against inadvertent breaches (m. Hor. 1:5). In turn, the findings of the scribes, related mainly to festivals, prayers,* cleanliness* and uncleanness and the Temple, became common law (m. Šabb. 1:1-24:5; m. hag. 1:8; m. Ned. 4:3). In some places writing down the tradition of the scribes is forbidden (b. Šabb. 115b; b. Git 60b), so continuous study was required to maintain a working knowledge of the traditions.

3.2. Teaching the Law. Instruction usually began at an early age (Josephus Life 9; b. Git. 58a). A student was expected to give allegiance to his teacher* above that of his parents and, certainly after the NT period, teachers were generally addressed as "my lord" or "master" (rabbi). A student was expected to reproduce every word and expression of his teacher. In NT times teaching took place "in the Temple," probably in rooms associated with the main building (cf. Mk 14:49). In other centers instruction took place in "houses of instruction" (Sir 51:23; m. Ber. 4:2; m. Ter. 11:10) which sometimes may have been the home of the scribe (m. 'Abot 1:4). The scribe sat on a raised area and the pupils on rows of benches or on the floor (Acts 22:3). The scribe posed questions for the students to answer. The teacher repeated his material over and over so it could be memorized. When the student had mastered the material and was competent to make his own decisions, he was a non-ordained student When he came of age (b.) Sota 22b says forty years of age) he could be received into the company of scribes as an ordained scholar.

3.3. Scribes As Lawyers. Any Jew could be asked to judge a case by a community (b. Sanh. 3a). But where there was a scribe he would invariably be chosen for a judicial office (Sir 38:33) and some were members of the Sanhedrin.* Aside from these major functions the scribes also attended to the following tasks.

3.4. Scribes As Theologians. Some scribes gave more attention to studying and elaborating the doctrine in the text of Scripture rather than its legal elements. While preaching was not restricted to specific people, these scribes were well qualified to speak in the synagogues.*

3.5. Scribes As Guardians of Tradition. The significance of the scribes in Jewish society was also associated with their being guardians of an esoteric tradition (Lk 11:52). They considered secrecy necessary because Scripture was silent on the reasons for many laws (b. Sanh. 21b); because of the offense of some stories (m. Meg. 4:10); because the teaching might be misused (e.g., amelioration of purity laws, b. Ber. 22a) and because genealogical traditions might discredit public figures (b. Qidd. 70b). According to the Mishnah this secret knowledge also included the story of creation and the vision of the chariot (m. Hag. 2:1). From the description of such things in the apocalyptic writings (1 Enoch 69:16-25; 2 Esdr 6:38-56) as well as direct evidence (2 Esdr 14:45-48; As. Mos. 1:17-18), it seems that these writings contain the theological constructions and teachings of the scribes.

3.6. Scribes As Curators of the Text. Copying Scripture was considered divine work (b. Sota 20a), and Temple funds may have been used to pay for corrections in scrolls (b. Ketub. 106a). Even though the sacred text was known by heart, a written edition had to be before the copyist (b. Meg. 18b) who would read aloud the text as he worked (m. Meg. 2:2). The Qumran scriptorium may have been modelled on something similar in the Jerusalem Temple (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

4. Scribes in the Gospels.

Scribe occurs fifty-seven times in the Synoptic Gospels (and Jn 8:3 in some MSS). Twenty-one times they are mentioned with the chief priests and eighteen times with the Pharisees. The scribes are depicted as scholars and teachers of Scripture, the custodians of Jewish traditions, the major opponents of Jesus and heavily involved in his trial.

4.1. Mark. The scribes, mentioned twenty-one times, are the chief opponents of Jesus in this earliest Gospel and appear throughout the Gospel. In the first report of Jesus' teaching, his teaching with authority* is contrasted with that of the scribes (2:22). Unlike the scribes, Jesus did not appeal to tradition but acted as having an authority direct from God.

Mark depicts the scribes as opposing Jesus in a number of ways. When the Pharisees are mentioned with the scribes they are questioning Jesus' understanding of the Law. They ask why he contaminates himself by eating with sinners* and tax collectors (2:16; see Taxes) and why he eats with defiled hands (7:5). The scribes also question the identity and credentials of Jesus (2:6; 3:22; 11:27) and so provide a foil over against which Mark highlights the identity, teaching and powerful authority of Jesus. On learning of Jesus cleansing the Temple they seek to destroy him (11:18; 14:1, 43) and are involved in his condemnation (15:1). While on the cross the scribes mock Jesus (15:31). Indeed, in predicting his death, Jesus twice mentions the scribes as some who will be involved (8:31; 10:33). One scribe, however, who questions and approves Jesus' answer is said not to be far from the kingdom of God (12:28-34).

Part of Jesus' teaching is his criticism of the scribes (12:35-40) and his highlighting the new understanding of Scripture in the light of his coming (9:11-13). He says they do not understand who he is (12:35-37). The scribe is the antithesis of a disciple* (3:15; 6:7; 8:29; 9:35; 10:31, 43-44) in that scribes like to go about in splendid clothes (stolai, cf. 16:5) and, even though they do not have authority (1:22), they desire recognition and positions of honor in the synagogue and at feasts* (12:38-39). They also exploit the poor (see Rich and Poor) to support their religion (12:40; see 11:17-18). In showing the scribes also in conflict with the disciples (9:14), Mark may be conveying to his readers the message that they will continue to face opposition in the same areas as Jesus.

4.2. Matthew. The scribes play a more important role in Matthew than in the other Gospels. The Pharisees, chief priests, elders of the people and the scribes are brought together to represent Jewish opposition to Jesus and, in leading the people astray, they carry responsibility for the fate of Jesus (2:4; 23:1-39; 26:57; 27:19-26, 41).
One aspect of Matthew's complex presentation of the scribes is the desire to rehabilitate them, apparent in his omission of material where his sources have portrayed them negatively (e.g., Mt 12:24 par. Mk 3:22). Also, when the scribes are depicted negatively they are always associated with another group, especially with the Pharisees (e.g., Mt 5:20; 23:2-29), but also with the chief priests (e.g., Mt 16:21; 27:41) and elders (Mt 16:21). However, Matthew's antagonism is probably only toward the scribes of the Pharisees. For he makes a distinction between the scribes of the Pharisees and other scribes (Mt 7:29 par. Mk 1:22). And, in chapter 23, where Matthew is most vicious in his attack on the scribes and Pharisees, he reverts to calling them Pharisees in verse 26 (see also Mt. 12:24 par. Mk 9:34; Mt 22:34-36 par. Mk 12:28; Mt 22:40 par. Mk 12:32-34; Mt 9:11 par. Mk 2:16).

Matthew also treats scribes positively (23:2) and the terms scribe and disciple of Jesus are interchangeable (cf. 8:19 and 21), though disciples are not to use the title "rabbi" (23:8; see Teacher). Like the students of the traditional scribe, a disciple of Jesus is to leave his family (8:19-20) and have a righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness)—set out in the Sermon on the Mount* (cf. 7:29)—that exceeds the Pharisaic scribe (5:20). Such a Christian scribe will gain new understanding of the secrets of the kingdom of heaven (see Kingdom of God) as well as treasuring "old things" through the teaching of Jesus (13:11, 52) which he is to do and teach (5:19). In 23:34 Matthew seems to be warning the Christian scribe of the impending dangers of being a disciple of Jesus (cf. 5:10-12).

In 11:37-54, the first of two series of criticisms, Luke softens the criticism by omitting (cf. Mt 23:23-36) references to the scribes until 11:45. The second series of criticisms of the scribes, following an attack on their theology (20:41-44), is in the form of a warning to the disciples to beware of the cruelly selfish lifestyle of the scribes (20:45-47). Also, following his tradition, Luke shows the scribes antagonistic to Jesus' ministry (Lk 5:21 par. Mk 2:6; Lk 5:30 par. Mk 2:16; Lk 14:1-6; Lk 20:1 par. Mk 11:27). Furthermore, Luke shows the scribes among those attempting to destroy Jesus (Lk 19:47 par. Mk 11:18; Lk 22:2 par. Mk 14:1; Lk 22:66 par. Mk 15:1) and into the hands of whom Jesus expected to be delivered (Lk 9:22 par. Mk 8:31).
There are a number of passages where Luke removes criticism of the scribes (e.g., Lk 20:47 par. Mt 23:15; Lk 4:32 par. Mk 1:22) or softens an attack by using the term ruler (Lk 23:35 par. Mk 15:31), "someone" (Lk 9:57 par. Mt 8:19) or by including the Pharisees in criticism (Lk 5:21 par. Mk 2:6; Lk 5:30 par. Mk 2:16). In fact Luke only once mentions the scribes alone in a criticism of their lifestyle (20:46). This probably means that Luke does not single out the scribes as being especially antagonistic to Jesus, nor any more worthy of Jesus' censure than any of the other Jewish rulers. On the other hand, Luke has Jesus compliment a lawyer on his knowledge of the Law (10:25).

5. Jesus and the Scribes.

Embedded in the traditions about Jesus generally held to be reliable is a contrast between the teaching and lifestyle of Jesus and the scribes. In his teaching Jesus is not only critical of the Jewish traditions (Mk 7:1-23), but also in his teaching he places himself above, not under, the Torah (Mk 2:23-28; 10:9; cf. Deut 24:1-4). So while Jesus was addressed as a rabbi or teacher, his teaching was recognized to be authoritative in that it was charismatic rather than dependent on tradition or the Scriptures (cf. Mk 1:22). In contrast to pupils of scribes choosing their own teachers, Jesus selected his own students (Mk 1:17; cf. Jn 15:16). As with a student of a scribe, Jesus' disciples were expected to place their relationship with Jesus above all other relationships. As with some scribes Jesus is depicted as being poor and dependent on others for his support (Mt 8:20 par. Lk 9:58; Lk 8:1-3).

Numbered among the opponents of Jesus are the scribes. One reason for the scribes' disapproval of Jesus was his claim to speak and act for God (Mk 2:7). This not only provoked jealousy among the scribes but, among those including Sadducean scribes in the Sanhedrin, concern for the delicate peace with Rome being disturbed by the popular excitement Jesus caused (Mk 11:15-19). Jesus further discredited himself in the eyes of the Pharisaic scribes because of his frequent association with less desirable elements of society (Mk 2:15-17).

In turn Jesus criticizes the Pharisaic scribes in particular for their hypocrisy (see Hypocrite) in knowing the Scriptures and how to enter the kingdom of God yet, by placing insurmountable legal burdens on people, preventing them from entering it. They also live a lifestyle which the disciples are warned not to follow (cf. Mt 23:1-36 par. Lk 20:45-47). At least those scribes who were members of the Sanhedrin shared the guilt of handing Jesus over to be crucified. Yet there is evidence that Jesus found some of the teaching of the scribes acceptable (Mk 9:11-13), and it is reported that on one occasion Jesus complimented a scribe for his understanding of Scripture (Mk 12:34).

SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN

No other short section of the Bible has been more prominent in theological discussion and in the general life of the church. Even in our modern secular societies the Sermon's influence continues. Though they may have given the matter little careful thought many men and women who have little or no contact with the church believe that the Sermon contains clear ethical teaching for all people of good will.

The Sermon is well known to Christians today, but few appreciate the richness of these sayings of Jesus: their radical promises and demands have often been blunted either through familiarity or as a result of a precipitate quest for immediate relevance. Interpretation of this influential and apparently simple passage is far from easy, but the scholar, preacher or lay person who perseveres will be amply rewarded, for the Sermon sets out powerfully both the gift and demand of the Gospel.

There are two versions of the Sermon: the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:3—7:27) which contains 106 verses, and the Sermon on the Plain (Lk 6:20b-49) which contains 29 verses. The term "the Sermon on the Mount" goes back to the tide Augustine gave to his important commentary on Matthew 5—7, De Sermone Domini in Monte, which was probably written between 392 and 3%. In spite of Augustine's enormous influence on many later Christian writers, Matthew 5—7 was not generally referred to as "the Sermon on the Mount" until the sixteenth century. The term "Sermon on the Plain" is modern; it is used primarily to distinguish Luke's much shorter Sermon from Matthew's.

The two Sermons may be interpreted either as integral parts of Matthew's and Luke's Gospels, or as collections of sayings of the historical Jesus. In the former case scholars who accept Markan priority and some form of the Q* hypothesis conclude that Matthew has composed chapters 5—7 as the first of his five carefully constructed discourses. Matthew's Sermon is a considerably expanded version of the Q "sermon" on which Luke drew, with few changes, in the Sermon on the Plain (see 2.1. below). By his arrangement and, in some cases, adaptation of earlier traditions, Matthew has sought to meet the needs of Christians in his own day. Matthew's first discourse contains many of his own distinctive emphases. Luke's Sermon is also related to his overall purposes, though less clearly.

If the sayings of Jesus in Matthew 5—7 or Luke 6:20-49 are used to reconstruct the teaching of the historical Jesus, it is important to recognize that they have been modified by the Evangelists (see Redaction Criticism) and probably also at earlier stages in the transmission of the Gospel traditions (see Tradition Criticism). They can be appreciated fully only when they are interpreted alongside related sayings from other parts of the Gospels. Although Matthew's Sermon on the Mount is often assumed to be a summary of the ethical teaching of Jesus, this is mistaken: there are important ethical sayings of Jesus which are not included in Matthew's Sermon, and not all the traditions in these chapters are ethical (see Ethics of Jesus).

1. The Sermon on the Plain in Luke

2. The Sermon on the Mount in Matthew

The term "Sermon on the Plain" comes from Luke's introduction to his version of the Sermon. Luke notes that Jesus went out into the hills to pray and continued in prayer* to God* all night; when day came he called his disciples* and came down with them and stood on a level place (Lk 6:12, 17). In the presence of a large crowd, Jesus addressed his disciples with the words of the Sermon (Lk 6:20b-49). Although Luke's Sermon is much closer to the earlier version in Q than to Matthew's, it has attracted less attention down through the centuries than the Sermon on the Mount.

1.1. The Sermon in Q. Almost the whole of Luke's Sermon is also found in Matthew 5—7. Where the two Gospels overlap in content, there is often close agreement in the wording of the traditions. However, a number of verses which are similar in content differ considerably in wording. It is probable that Matthew and Luke drew on different versions of the Q Sermon.

The chart below, which is based on Luke's order, shows that in spite of their great disparity in size, the two versions agree strikingly in the order of the traditions.
Matthew differs from Luke's order at only one significant point: The Golden Rule does not appear, as we might have expected, as part of the "love your enemy" traditions (Mt 5:38-47; see Love), but as the climax of Matthew's Sermon in 7:12. With only three exceptions, the whole of the Sermon on the Plain is found in Matthew 5—7: Matthew does not have woes to counterbalance the Beatitudes, as Luke does (see Blessing and Woe); the saying about the blind guide appears at Matthew 15:14, and the saying on the disciple-teacher* relationship is found in Matthew 10:24.

This close agreement in order and in content has led most scholars to conclude that Q contained an earlier form of the Sermon. Luke has retained the order of the traditions in Q. Although Luke has modified some Q traditions, and has perhaps omitted a few verses from Q and added a few others which were not part of Q his version of the Sermon is usually considered to be very close to the original version in Q.

An alternative explanation has been defended by a small number of scholars. They argue that for his own purposes Luke drastically abbreviated Matthew's Sermon and included many of the omitted traditions at other points in his Gospel. Luke is thus seen as the first interpreter of Matthew’s Sermon. Opponents of this view claim, surely correctly, that if Luke did use Matthew, he acted in a quite arbitrary way. He has included only just over a quarter of Matthew 5—7; he has failed to include numerous sayings at any point in his Gospel (Mt 5:17,19-20,21-24,27-28,33-39a, 43; 6:1-8, 16-18; 7:6, 15); he has placed the remainder in six different places with little regard for Matthew’s order. Although attempts have been made to explain why Luke might have revised Matthew’s Sermon so radically, they have not been persuasive. At least in this case, the Q hypothesis offers a much simpler and more plausible explanation of the evidence.

In most reconstructions of Q the traditions behind Luke 6:20b-49 form the initial collection of the sayings of Jesus: these verses were already an "inaugural sermon" in Q preceded only by John’s preaching of the Coming One (Lk 3:7-9,16-17; sa John the Baptist) and the Temptation traditions (Lk 4:1-13; set Temptation of Jesus). The opening Beatitudes in Q pronounce God's blessing on those in dire need: the poor, those who hunger, sorrow and suffer persecution (Lk 6:20b-23). These sayings declare that the coming of God's kingdom (see Kingdom of God) brings about radical transformation: They proclaim good news (see Gospel [Good News]).

Matthew has followed Q's lead and used the Beatitudes as the opening section of his Sermon. Luke places the Sermon on the Plain at a later point in his Gospel, but he may nonetheless have been strongly influenced by the position of the Beatitudes as the opening of an "inaugural sermon" in Q. If, as is likely, the Q Beatitudes are to be understood as the fulfillment of Isaiah 61:1-3, it is significant that this very passage is quoted in Luke's dramatic and programmatic account of the opening of the ministry of Jesus in the synagogue* at Nazareth (Lk 4:16-30). Quite independently, both Matthew and Luke may have been influenced by Q's insistence that the significance of Jesus is to be seen in terms of Isaiah 61:1-3, a claim which goes back to Jesus himself.

1.2. Luke’s Emphases. Luke has not reshaped the Q Sermon in the way that Matthew has, but two emphases are clear and important. In four places Luke has added "now" to the traditions: to the beatitude and corresponding woe on hunger (Lk 6:21a and 25a) and to the beatitude and woe on mourning and laughing (Lk 6:21c and 25c). These additions reveal the Evangelist's concern for Christian life here and now. A similar emphasis is found in numerous passages in Luke. For example, Luke 9:23 stresses that taking up one's cross and following Jesus is to be carried out daily (cf. Mk 8:34).

In Luke, but not in Matthew, there are four woes which correspond precisely to his four beatitudes (cf. Lk 6:20-21 and 24-26). Most scholars accept that Luke has added the woes to the Q Sermon, either from independent tradition or on his own initiative. In this way Luke underlines the contrast between, on the one hand, people who are in desperate circumstances (the poor, the hungry, those who mourn and those who are persecuted) and, on the other hand, people who are self-satisfied and complacent. In numerous passages in his Gospel Luke attacks complacency and stresses the particular concern of Jesus for the poor, for those in need and for those on the margins of society (see Mary's Song; Rich and Poor).

2. The Sermon on the Mount in Matthew.

A brief survey of the history of interpretation of the Sermon confirms just how influential these chapters have been and how many major theological issues they raise.

2.1. History of Interpretation. The first commentary on the Sermon was probably written by Origen in the middle of the third century, but only a short fragment of it has survived. The two most important expositions of the Sermon in the early church were written by Chrysostom and Augustine at the end of the fourth century, both of whom insisted that the Sermon was the perfect pattern for the life of all Christians. In his homilies on the Sermon Chrysostom attacked the heretical views of Gnostics and Manicheans. He rejected their view that the body is evil and only the mind and spirit are good; he insisted that Matthew 5:29 teaches that it is the "evil mind" which is accursed, not bodily organs such as the eye and hand. Chrysostom also refuted "those heretics who say that the old covenant is of the devil"; the sayings of Jesus do not repeal the old Law, they "draw out and fill up its commands."

Augustine also grappled with the relationship of the Sermon to the Law of Moses. The Manichean Faustus had claimed that Matthew 5:17 was a saying neither of Jesus nor of Matthew: someone else had written it under Matthew's name! In his Reply to Faustus Augustine stressed the continuity of the "old Law" and the "new" more strongly than was usually the case in the early church. In his own exposition of the Sermon, however, the more common line of interpretation is prominent. Augustine drew attention to the sharp discontinuity between the "old Law" and the "new" by distinguishing between the "lesser precepts given by God through his holy prophets and servants to a people who still needed to be bound by fear" (i.e., to Israel before the coming of Christ) and "the greater precepts given through his Son to a people now ready to be freed by love."

Augustine is not the only interpreter who interpreted Matthew 5:17-48 in different ways either in different contexts or at different points in his life. Augustine may have been inconsistent, but the issue is still with us today. To what extent and in what ways is the ethical teaching of the OT still important today? How "new" is the teaching of Jesus, and does it have priority over Scripture? Do we retain the parts of Scripture to which Jesus refers, and ignore or reject the rest?

In the thirteenth century Thomas Aquinas also stressed the discontinuity between the old Law ("the Law of bondage") and the new law ("the Law of liberty") but without conceding that the latter contradicted or abrogated the former. In his interpretation of the Sermon he used the analogy of the tree (the new Law) which is in a sense contained in the seed. Aquinas also introduced a distinction which was to become very influential in Catholic thought. In addition to the commandments of the new Law, which are necessary in order to gain salvation, there are also optional counsels which "render the gaining of eternal bliss more assured and expeditious." The latter are intended for those who strive for perfection; they are based on poverty, chastity and obedience and are therefore primarily for those who join the religious life. This distinction is hardly hinted at in interpretation of the Sermon in the early church, though it may be implied by the harsh saying of Jesus concerning the renunciation of marriage: "Let those accept it who can" (Mt 19:11-12). Luther, Zwingli and Calvin wrote extensively on the Sermon. They all insisted that Matthew 5—7 represents the true interpretation of the Law of Moses,* which had been obscured in Judaism. On the whole they emphasized the continuity between the "Law of Christ" and the "Law of Moses" more than their Catholic opponents. They rejected the use made of the Sermon by radical Anabaptist groups who claimed that the ethical teaching of Christ was a clear development beyond the Law of Moses, parts of which have been abrogated. Anabaptists claimed that the Sermon should be interpreted literally and that Christians should therefore never use violence (Mt 5:39; see Peace), never swear oaths (Mt 5:34; see Oaths and Swearing) and never hold office as a judge or ruler (Mt 7:1). Their literal interpretation of the Sermon led them to opt out of secular government completely.
In a series of sermons on Matthew 5—7 (and in other writings) Luther developed his well-known doctrine of the two realms—the secular and the spiritual. The Christian lives in both spheres. In the spiritual sphere (i.e., within the life of the church) the Christian must obey all the commands of the Sermon; in the secular sphere, natural law or "common sense" must prevail. In his remarks on Matthew 5:38-42 (the use of violence and compulsion), for example, Luther claimed that most interpreters failed to distinguish properly between the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of the world. In these verses Christ is not tampering with the responsibility and authority of the government, but he is teaching individual Christians how to live personally, apart from their official position and authority ... A Christian should not (use violence to) resist evil; but within the limits of his office, a secular person should oppose firmly every evil.

For Luther a "secular person" included Christians participating in the secular realm.

Luther also discussed the Sermon in terms of "Law" and "gospel." In some of his writings he emphasized that the Sermon is the "law of Christ" that makes people aware of the gospel of God's grace through Christ: "we are not able properly to fulfil one tittle out of our own strength ... but must always crawl to Christ." But in other passages Luther stated that the Sermon is not just the accusing Law that points to sin: it is also "gospel." This is especially true of the Beatitudes (Mt 5:3-12). Christ "does not press, but in a friendly way entices and speaks: 'Blessed are the poor.' "

By referring in different passages in his writings to the Sermon both as Law and as gospel, Luther confused some of his later followers. Many Lutheran theologians have stressed that the Sermon is the Law that awakens knowledge of sin. But some (notably J.Jeremias 1961) have claimed that the demands of Jesus in the Sermon are preceded by gospel, that is, by his proclamation of the kingdom and by his encouragement to his disciples to share his own sense of sonship.

In his comments on Matthew 5:21 Calvin noted that "we must not imagine Christ to be a new legislator, who adds anything to the eternal righteousness of his Father. We must listen to him as a faithful expounder. . . ." Calvin partially anticipated eighteenth- and nineteenth-century discussion of the sources of the Sermon in his recognition that Matthew 5—7 is "a brief summary of the doctrine of Christ. . . collected out of his many and various discourses."

All the various approaches just sketched can be found in modern discussion of the Sermon. Twentieth-century scholarship, however, has added two new issues: the extent to which the Sermon reflects the views of Jesus (or of Matthew) concerning the end-times (eschatology) and the extent to which Matthew the Evangelist has shaped the traditions he has incorporated into chapters 5—7.

In 1892 J. Weiss published a short but influential discussion of Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God. He claimed that Jesus expected that the kingdom would shortly be ushered in through a cataclysmic divine intervention. In 1901 A. Schweitzer developed this approach even more vigorously. Both writers believed that the ethical teaching of Jesus was intended as a preparation for the short period before the end ("interim ethics"). The sayings of Jesus were not intended to be used by later generations, as most readers of the Sermon down through the centuries had simply assumed. Thus most of the issues with which earlier interpreters of the Sermon had grappled were declared to be irrelevant. Weiss and Schweitzer raised in an acute form the relationship between the ethical teaching of Jesus and his proclamation of the coming kingdom. Discussion of this issue has to range far beyond Matthew 5—7 and consider all the relevant sayings of Jesus.

B. W. Bacon (1902) was one of the first writers in English to attempt to reconstruct the earliest attainable form of the Sermon. He concluded that in its original form Jesus spoke as a prophetic (see Prophets, Prophecy) interpreter of a new Law; Jesus did not lay down rules, but opened up principles. These conclusions were hardly novel, but in his isolation of the "intrusive additions" of Matthew, Bacon paved the way for later redaction-critical studies. Bacon claimed that Matthew has supplied "neo-legalistic touches" in verses such as 5:16 ("good works"); 5:18-19; 5:32 (the exception to "no divorce"); 7:12b. The original Sermon of Jesus is not legislative (as Matthew seems to have regarded it) but prophetic.

Since 1945 interpretation of the Sermon and of Matthew's Gospel as a whole has been dominated by redaction criticism. This approach explores the ways in which the Evangelist has reshaped the traditions at his disposal in the light of the needs of his first readers. Redaction criticism has confirmed that Matthew is more than a compiler. Matthew's five discourses have been composed in the same way: in all five the Evangelist has rearranged and reinterpreted the sayings on which he drew. He often elucidates earlier traditions with extra phrases or even (on occasion) with whole verses which he himself has composed. The following may be noted as possible examples: 5:10, 13a, 14a, 16, 20; 6:10b and c, 13b; 7:12c, 19, 20, 21. In many places in the Sermon Matthew's own distinctive vocabulary and emphases are evident For example, the five important references to "righteousness" (Mt 5:6, 10, 20; 6:1, 33; see Justice, Righteousness) are all redactional additions made by the Evangelist himself.

In recent decades numerous studies of the Sermon and several detailed commentaries have been published. In nearly every case the Sermon has been isolated from the rest of Matthew's Gospel and treated as a separate entity simply for convenience. There has been no suggestion that Matthew 5—7 have a quite distinctive origin or purpose which sets them apart from the rest of Matthew's Gospel, and also from Mark and Luke.

There are, however, two notable exceptions. In his influential study of the Sermon (1964) W. D. Davies suggests that "one fruitful way of dealing with the Sermon on the Mount is to regard it as the Christian answer to Jamnia. Using terms very loosely, the Sermon is a kind of Christian, mishnaic counter-part to the formulation taking place there" (315). Davies sets out at length a cumulative case which rests on a large number of observations. He himself recognizes that some of his points are stronger than others. Davies appeals both to the Sermon and to other parts of Matthew's Gospel. Some of the latter passages are undoubtedly significant For example, Davies is able to show that the Evangelist's community was at odds with contemporary Judaism*

But the evidence from the Sermon itself is not compelling. None of the direct links proposed between the Sermon and the reconstruction taking place within Judaism during the jamnian period is entirely satisfactory. It is the whole of Matthew's Gospel, not the Sermon in isolation, which can plausibly be related (though only indirectly) to the jamnian period. Although Davies suggests that "there was an outside stimulus for the Evangelist to shape the Sermon" (315), he does not claim that Matthew 5—7 contains theological emphases which are quite distinct from the rest of the Gospel. Davies seems to accept that the Sermon and the rest of Matthew come from the same social setting, though he does not discuss this point.

H. D. Betz's hypothesis, however, is not compelling. The links with the
The latter point is one of the pillars of redaction-critical study of the Sermon. From a quite different angle narrative critics (led by J. D. Kingsbury) have recently underlined the ways in which the Sermon is part and parcel of the Evangelist’s overall presentation of the story of Jesus.

2.2. Questions for Current Interpretation. The above survey of the history of interpretation confirms that careful study of these chapters involves a large number of issues, some of which are theological, some ethical, some historical and some exegetical. For convenience they may be divided into five sets of overlapping questions, some of which are discussed further in later sections of this article.

(1) Does Jesus simply interpret or clarify the Law* of Moses*? Or does he present radically new teaching? Is Jesus portrayed as the "new Moses" who "goes up on the mountain*" (Mt 5:1) in order to present on a "new Mt Sinai" a "new Law" for a "new people"?

(2) What is the relationship between Matthew 5—7 and Paul’s gospel of grace? Is the Sermon (as Law) intended to make the readers or listeners aware of their need of grace? Or does the Sermon presuppose God’s forgiveness and acceptance of the sinner* and therefore set out demands for true discipleship*?

(3) To whom is the Sermon addressed? To men and women in general, or to those committed to the way of Jesus? The text itself is ambiguous at this point. The introduction and conclusion (Mt 5:1 and 7:28) imply that the Sermon was addressed to the crowds, but 5:2 notes that "when the disciples had gathered around him Jesus began to address them." While many parts of the Sermon seem to set out an "ethic of Christian discipleship," the final verses of the whole Gospel imply that the teaching of Jesus is to be part of the message taken to "all nations" (Mt 28:18-20).

(4) Are all parts of the Sermon to be interpreted literally, as some have claimed? Or do some sayings (such as Mt 5:22, 39, 43) contain hyperbole? Does the Sermon set out a code of ethics, or principles or attitudes appropriate for "members of the kingdom"? These questions arise whether the intention of Matthew or of Jesus is in view.

(5) To what extent are individual sayings dominated by the expectation (either of Jesus or of Matthew) of the approach of the end-times (i.e., eschatology)? For example, does Jesus commend a casual attitude to food and clothing in Matthew 6:25-34 because of the approach of the end-times, or simply because this is the right attitude regardless of when the end-times come? Is every petition of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:9-13) to be interpreted eschatologically? If so, when we pray "Give us this day our daily bread" we are not asking for the basic necessities of everyday life, but requesting a partial anticipation now of the "feast of heaven"—the "bread* of heaven." Does the petition "lead us not into temptation" concern the time of testing expected in the end-times or everyday temptations?

The modern interpreter will quickly find that interpretation of individual sayings or groups of sayings will be determined by the answers given to all five sets of questions. These questions have been discussed for nearly two thousand years, though some have been more prominent than others in different periods of church history.

2.3. The Structure of the Sermon and Key Sections.

2.3.1. Structure. In recent years several proposals concerning the structure of the Sermon have been made. The overall structure of the Sermon is clear. The Beatitudes (5:3-12) are an introduction to the Sermon as a whole; the similarly structured "salt" and "light"* sayings in 5:13-16 form the second part of the introduction. The central section of the Sermon extends from 5:17 to 7:12; it opens and closes with references to the Law and the Prophets: 5:17-20 and 7:12. The Sermon is rounded off by an epilog, 7:13-27, in which, as we shall see, there is considerable coherence.

It is not difficult to set out the structure of the first half of the Sermon, from Matthew 5:3 to 6:18. Following the general introduction in 5:1-16, the important sayings on the continuing significance of the Law and the Prophets in 5:17-20 are clarified and expounded, as it were, by the six antitheses in 5:21-47. Matthew 5:48 is probably intended to round off all the antitheses. Matthew 6:1 introduces three paragraphs on almsgiving, prayer and fasting* (6:2-18), all of which have exactly the same structure; the Lord's Prayer and two related sayings (6:9-15) partly breaks the very impressive symmetry in this part of the Sermon.

But what about the structure of the second half of the Sermon? Matthew 6:19 to 7:11 has long puzzled interpreters. This part of the Sermon seems to be a ragbag of sayings, only some of which are loosely related to others. G. Bornkamm has offered a novel solution: the second half of the Sermon is a commentary on the Lord's Prayer. Matthew 6:19-24 expounds the first three petitions, 6:9-10; 6:25-34, then works out the implications of the bread petition, 6:11; 7:1-5 is an exposition of the forgiveness* petition and, finally, 7:6 takes up the theme of 6:13. Bomkamm's ingenious explanation has not convinced other scholars, but he has shown just how strongly the whole section from Matthew 6:5 to 7:11 is dominated by the theme of prayer.

U. Luz claims that the Sermon has been built symmetrically around its centerpiece, the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:7-15). The first section, 5:3-16, corresponds to the last section, 7:13-27; the second section, 5:17-20, corresponds to 7:12; 5:21-48 corresponds to 6:19—7:11 (these two passages are identical in length); and 6:1-6 corresponds to 6:16-18. Although the theory is not completely convincing (the correspondence between 5:21-48 and 6:19—7:11 is forced), there is little doubt that Matthew does intend 5:17-20 to introduce the central section of the Sermon, and 7:12 to conclude it.

2.3.2. The Prologue: The Beatitudes (Mt 5:3-12). In Matthew there are nine Beatitudes, only four of which are found in Luke. The word makanos at the beginning of all the Beatitudes has long teased translators. Makanos echoes LXX usage, where it expresses the happiness which is the result of God-given salvation. The English phrase "Happy are those who ..." hardly catches this rich meaning. "Blessed" is perhaps preferable, but in some colloquial English usage "blessed" can mean "cursed." "God's gift of salvation is given to those who . . ." is accurate but clumsy, especially if repeated nine times.

Matthew and Luke have taken over the four Beatitudes found in Q which referred to the poor, the hungry, those who weep and those who are persecuted. Matthew has added (in part from earlier oral traditions) five further Beatitudes which are found in his Gospel alone: the blessings on the meek (Mt 5:5), the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers and a second saying concerning persecution (Mt 5:7-10). These additional Beatitudes and the changes made by Matthew to the Q sayings confirm that he is particularly concerned with ethical conduct. In Luke those in desperate need—those who are literally poor, hungry, weeping and persecuted (Lk 6:20-23)—are promised that their position will be reversed by God. In Matthew the dominant theme is very different. Those addressed, that is, the disciples and also the followers of Jesus in the Evangelist's own day, are promised that their positive qualities—their meekness, mercy, purity of heart, and abilities as peacemakers—will be rewarded by God.

This general observation may be illustrated by the two references to righteousness which Matthew adds to Q Beatitudes. The saying at Luke 6:21 which corresponds to Matthew's fourth Beatitude (Mt 5:6) refers to those who are literally hungry: In their rather desperate state they will be blessed by God and their hunger satisfied. In Luke (but not in Matthew) there is a corresponding "woe" on the rich (Lk 6:24). In Matthew, however, God's blessing is promised to a rather different group: to those who "hunger and thirst after righteousness" (Mt 5:6), that is, to disciples who are "hungry" to do God's will.

In Matthew 5:10 those who are "persecuted for righteousness' sake" are promised that the kingdom of heaven is theirs. This saying (like Mt 5:20) contains so many of Matthew's favorite words that the Evangelist may have created it himself. As in several other similar cases, Matthew develops themes already present in the sources he is using. The second half of Matthew 5:10, "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," echoes 5:3 (Q); the first half of Matthew 5:10 underlines the importance of the Q Beatitude which follows in 5:11, where disciples are encouraged in the face of persecution. Whereas Luke explains that the fierce opposition being experienced is "on account of the Son of man" (Lk 6:22), in 5:10 Matthew gives a different explanation: Followers of Jesus are being pilloried on account of their righteous conduct. A few verses later a more positive note is struck: "Let your light so shine before others, that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father in heaven" (Mt 5:16). Here "good works" seems to be synonymous with the "righteousness" or "righteous conduct" stressed so strongly in Matthew's Beatitudes.

2.3.3. The Law and the Prophets (Mt 5:17-20). Matthew 5:17 is often taken as the preface to the central section of the Sermon which runs from Matthew 5:17 to 7:12. But what is meant by, "Think not that I have come to abolish the Law and the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them" (Mt 5:17)? In the Evangelist's day some Jewish opponents may well have claimed that followers of Jesus had abandoned the Law completely; in Matthew 5:17 words of Jesus may have been shaped as a response: Jesus did not, as some were claiming, come to destroy the Law and the Prophets. But what is meant by "fulfilling" them? From Matthew's perspective does Jesus set forth the real intention of the Law? Or does he confirm or establish the Law? The latter suggestion is often supported by linguistic arguments based on the force of the Aramaic word which Jesus may have used and by an appeal to Matthew 5:18 and 19. These two verses seem to underline the continuing importance of the Law: "not a letter, not a dot will disappear from the law" (5:18b RF.B).

However, this strong emphasis on the Law may be modified in the last phrase of Matthew 5:18, "until all things come to pass." "The law remains valid only until all things come to pass in Jesus' coming and ministry" (Guelich, 148). If this is the correct interpretation of Matthew 5:18, the warning in 5:19 not to relax "one of the least of these commandments" may refer to the sayings of Jesus rather than (as in the more usual interpretation) the Law. If, however, Matthew 5:19 does refer to strict and complete retention of the Law (without a hint of modification), then this verse must be seen as a very conservative saying which is somewhat out of character with Matthew 5:17, 18 and 20, and with Matthew's emphases elsewhere. In Matthew 5:20 disciples of Jesus are urged to carry out the will of God in their ethical conduct to an even greater degree than the scribes* and Pharisees*

2.3.4. The Antitheses (Mt 5:21-48). In Matthew 5:21-48 six paragraphs of sayings of Jesus all have the same structure: "You have heard that it was said (by God) to those of ancient times (i.e., in Scripture) ... but I say to you____" The full formula just quoted introduces the first and fourth paragraphs and thus divides the six into two groups of three; in the other paragraphs the formula is abbreviated. Although three of the six paragraphs have partial parallels in Luke and belonged originally to Q (Mt 5:21-22, 27-28, 33-37), Matthew himself has added the other three groups of sayings which he has drawn from oral tradition.

The phrase "but I say to you" occurs in all six passages and seems to set sayings of Jesus in opposition to Scripture; hence Matthew 5:21-48 is usually referred to as the "antitheses." Matthew is responsible for the striking antithetical structure of all six passages. But, as is frequently the case elsewhere, the Evangelist develops considerably an earlier tradition: the antithetical structure is already found in embryonic form in Luke 6:27a (Q), "but I say to you who hear. . .."

The term antitheses is something of a misnomer, for it can hardly be claimed that in all six paragraphs the teaching of Jesus is intended to be in direct contrast to, or opposition to (i.e., is "antithetical" to), the Law of Moses. Matthew has ruled out that possibility in 5:17 by stressing that Jesus has not come to destroy the Law and the Prophets. In addition the six uses of the passive verb "it was said" almost certainly imply "it was said by God in Scripture"; Jesus could hardly be understood to be contradicting what God had said. Although it has sometimes been claimed that in at least some of these passages Jesus is contrasting his own teaching with Jewish interpretations of the Law current in his own day, rather than the Law itself, this explanation is unconvincing. Matthew 5:17-20, which is clearly intended to be an introduction to the antitheses, prepares the reader for discussion of the relationship of the teaching of Jesus to the Law, and not merely for learned scribal discussion about the interpretation of the Law.

So what is the primary thrust of the antitheses? Is there a consistent theme, or do they point in two (or more) directions? Many scholars have claimed that in some cases Jesus seems to strengthen the teaching of the Law (Mt 5:22, 28, 34); in others he seems to overturn the teaching of Moses (Mt 5:39, 44 and perhaps 32). Given that Matthew 5:21-48 is no mere anthology of sayings of Jesus but has been very carefully constructed by the Evangelist himself, we should expect a consistent pattern unless the text forces us to conclude otherwise.

On the one hand, the antithetical pattern implies that Jesus is not simply confirming the teaching of the Law which is quoted. On the other hand, as we have seen, Matthew does not set out sayings of Jesus as a contradiction of God-given Scripture. So how are the antitheses to be understood? Davies and Allison (1.509-10) correctly suggest that their primary function is twofold:

- to show through six concrete examples, (i) what sort of attitude and behavior Jesus requires and (ii) how his demands surpass those of the Torah without contradicting the Torah. ... The letter of the law does not give life. All things lawful may not be helpful. One may refrain from murder and still hate, refrain from committing adultery and still lust in the heart, and it is possible to follow the OTs provisions with regard to divorce and oaths and yet be found in sin. ... Purely legal norms, such as those cited in Mt 5.21, 27, 31, 33, 38, and 43, can never convey how life is to be lived by those who are genuinely poor in spirit, pure in heart, and full of mercy (5.3, 7, 8).

Matthew 5:20 and 48, which act as a frame for the six antitheses in 5:21-47, confirm that this is the Evangelist's intention. (Mt 5:48, like 7:12, opens with oun, "so," "therefore"; both verses are intended to act as a summary and conclusion to the preceding block.) Matthew 5:20 insists that the righteousness which followers of Jesus are to carry out must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees; that righteousness is not to be construed as obedience to legislation, but as perfect conformity to God's will (Mt 5:48).

The same fundamental point is illustrated further with three carefully constructed examples in Matthew 6:1-18. In each case the same pattern recurs: "when you give alms (pray, fast), do not do it as the hypocrites do, but when you give alms (fast, pray), do it in secret, and your Father who sees in secret will reward you." The "greater righteousness" of Matthew 5:20 is once again purity of motive rather than mere outward observance.

2.3.5. The Golden Rule (Mt 7:12). "Whatever you wish that others would do to you, do so to them" has been known as the Golden Rule since the eighteenth century. There are numerous parallels to this saying in Greco-Roman, oriental and Jewish writings. There is a particularly close rabbinic tradition in b. Sabb. 31a: "What is hateful to you, do not do to your fellow creatures." Although a negative formulation along these lines is much more common than the positive formulation of Matthew 7:12, the latter is found in some Jewish writings (Ep. Arist. 207; T. Naph. 1; 2 Enoch 61:1); hence it is a mistake to claim that the positive form of the Golden Rule is distinctively Christian.

Matthew 7:12 opens with oun, "so," "therefore." This word has often been ignored by translators (e.g., NIV; REB). If oun is translated, the saying is often placed (as in the RSV) as the conclusion of the preceding block of sayings on "asking, seeking, finding" (Mt 7:8-11). This is equally mistaken, for Matthew 7:12 does not round off these sayings. Matthew intends oun to indicate to the reader that 7:12 is a summary and conclusion to all the material in the central section of the Sermon which starts at Matthew 5:17. The Evangelist has removed the Golden Rule from the conclusion of the "Love your enemies" sayings in Luke (and Q) 6:27-30 and given it an even more important role. This is confirmed by the dramatic words "for this is the Law and the Prophets" which Matthew adds to the Golden Rule. This additional phrase recalls Matthew 5:17 in which the coming of Jesus is the fulfillment of the law and the Prophets.

Matthew makes the same point in the explanatory addition he makes to Mark 12:28-34, the teaching of Jesus on the two greatest commandments: "love God, and love your neighbor as yourself." In Matthew 22:40 the Evangelist adds, "On these two commandments depend all the Law and the Prophets." Hence for Matthew the Golden Rule and the love commandments express the very essence of Scripture. These sayings of Jesus (and his whole coming) are a lens through which his followers now read the Law and the Prophets.

2.3.6. The Epilog: Two Ways (Mt 1:13-21). The epilog of the Sermon contains a series of contrasts. It opens with the contrast between the gate and the way which lead to destruction and the gate and the way which lead to life* (Mt 7:13-14). A similar contrast between "two ways" is found in Deuteronomy 11:26; 30:15; Jeremiah 21:8, and in numerous Jewish and early Christian writings.

Matthew continues the general theme in the warnings about false prophets. "Good fruit" and "evil fruit" are contrasted (Mt 7:15-20), as are those who do the will of the Father and those who do not (Mt 7:21-23). In both cases there is a clear warning about a "way that leads to destruction."

Both Matthew and Luke conclude their Sermons, as did Q, with the parable* of the two houses. The general point of the parable is the same in both versions: A sharp contrast is drawn between those who hear and obey the words of Jesus and those who do not. U. Luz notes that the books of Leviticus (chap. 26) and Deuteronomy (30:15-20), and also several later Jewish writings, end similarly: two alternatives are placed squarely before the reader. Whereas similar Jewish traditions focus on study and practice of the Law, hearing and obeying the words of Jesus are central here. Matthew uses eschatological parables as the climax of two of his other discourses, Matthew 18:23-35 and 25:31-46; in both "two ways" are once again contrasted.

The wording of the parables in Matthew and in Luke differs considerably. The Evangelists have probably drawn on different versions of the Q parable. Luke's version emphasizes the care taken to dig deeply in order to place the foundations of the house on rock; a river which bursts its banks is unable to dislodge it.

Matthew's version is much more carefully structured and rhythmical. The threefold description of the storm is memorable: the rain came down, the floods rose, and the winds beat upon that house . . . (Mt 7:25 and 27). Matthew adds (or perhaps retains from Q) two references to the last judgment* (Mt 7:24 and 26) which are not present in Luke. The words of Jesus are referred to in a rather general way in Luke (6:47), but by adding "these" to "my words" twice over (Mt
5:24 and 26), Matthew refers specifically to the words of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount (cf. Mt 28:20).

2.4. Matthew's Purposes. For Matthew the Sermon is but one part of his attempt to set out the significance of the story and teaching of Jesus for the life of his own community. The Sermon is the largest and most impressive of his five discourses, but it must not be separated from the rest of the Gospel.

Some of the themes Matthew emphasizes in the first of his five discourses are also prominent elsewhere in the Gospel. For example, in Matthew 5:20, one of the key verses which Matthew himself has almost certainly composed, disciples are told that their ethical conduct must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees. In Matthew 5:48, a related verse, they are told to be perfect or wholehearted. In Matthew 6:1-18 their conduct is contrasted starkly with that of the "hypocrites"* (Mt 6:2, 5, 16), whom the reader naturally assumes to be none other than the scribes and Pharisees of Matthew 5:20.

These same points are developed in Matthew 23. The crowds (see People, Crowd) and disciples are urged not to follow the example of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23:2-3) who are then referred to explicitly as "hypocrites" six times. There is even some verbal correspondence between Matthew 6:1,5 and 16 on the one hand, and Matthew 23:5 and 28 on the other. Both in chapters 5 and 6 of the Sermon, and in chapter 23, the Evangelist uses the scribes and Pharisees as a foil: disciples of Jesus are called to superior ethical conduct.

In the verses immediately preceding the Sermon, Matthew provides the interpreter with an important theological clue. Jesus announces the "good news of the kingdom" (Mt 4:17, 23) and calls Peter, Andrew, James and John into radical discipleship which involves renunciation of their occupation and of their family* ties (Mt 4:18-22). As in the Sermon which follows, and as in Matthew's Gospel as a whole, grace and demand are linked inextricably. The Jesus of Matthew's Sermon is the Son of God (Mt 3:17, the baptism* of Jesus; and Mt 4:1-11, the temptations; see Son of God) through whom God is acting for humankind: It is his demanding teaching which is to be central in the life of the community and in its dis-cipling of the nations (Mt 28:20; see Gentiles).

In the past the Sermon has often been removed from its present setting in Matthew and treated as a convenient summary of the teaching of Jesus. By reading the Sermon as part of Matthew's Gospel we are able to see how the Evangelist intended his first readers to approach these chapters. But this important principle of interpretation does not resolve all the difficulties. Many verses in the Sermon still puzzle us. Can any man claim to have avoided committing adultery "in his heart" by not looking on a woman* with a lustful eye (Mt 5:28)? What are the pearls which are not to be thrown to the pigs (Mt 7:6)? Difficult parts of the Bible often provoke us to think about issues we might otherwise have avoided.

It is a mistake to suppose that we cannot understand the Sermon without the assistance of an expert. We do not need to be musicians to be profoundly moved by a piece of music; nor do we need to be art historians in order to appreciate a work of art. At the very heart of the Sermon we find one of the most radical and demanding of the sayings of Jesus, a saying which sums up the ethos of the Sermon as a whole and is as relevant today as it was in the first century. "You have learned (from Scripture), 'Love your neighbor, hate your enemy.' But what I tell you is this: Love your enemies and pray for your persecutors" (Mt 5:43-44).

S ervant of Yahweh

Four passages in Isaiah 40—55 are conventionally designated as the "Servant Songs" on the understanding that they together present a distinctive vision of a particular "Servant of Yahweh" or "Suffering Servant" to whom is entrusted a special mission on behalf of his people. This figure was one of those used by NT writers to illuminate the mission of Jesus (see Typology).

1. The Servant of Yahweh in the Book of Isaiah

2. Jesus As the Servant in the Gospels

1. The Servant of Yahweh in the Book of Isaiah.

B. Duhm in 1892 isolated Isaiah 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9 and 52:13—53:12 as the "Servant Songs." Others have wished to extend their limits or even add part of Isaiah 61 as a fifth Song. Many earlier scholars assumed that these passages had an origin independent of their present context in the book of Isaiah, but more recent scholarship has generally agreed that they belong integrally to the text of Isaiah 40—55 and must not be interpreted independently of that context. The idea of Israel* as God's* Servant is not confined to these passages, but in them, and especially in Isaiah 53, there is a new and striking concept of a Servant whose role of vicarious suffering brings healing* and deliverance to the people.

It is explicity Israel who is here described as God's Servant (Is 49:3), as in much of the surrounding context (Is 41:8-9; 43:10; 44:1-2; etc). But in some parts of the Songs, notably in Isaiah 53:4-6, 10-12, the Servant is portrayed as an individual over against Israel and as suffering on their behalf.

This ambiguity as to the identity of the Servant and whether he is intended to be understood as a corporate or an individual figure (or indeed whether there is a unified "Servant figure" in Isaiah at all), has led to intense debate among interpreters ancient and modern.

Any statement about Jewish interpretation around the first century A.D. must be tentative, as the documentary evidence for Jewish thought at that period is minimal, and need not be typical of common belief. But while Jewish writers could apply phrases from these passages to various historical figures as well as to Israel corporately, there is also evidence that by NT times they were understood by some to refer to a future individual who would act as God's agent for his people's restoration—in other words, a messianic figure. (Jeremias, TDNT V.682-700, presents sufficient evidence for this, though his survey has rightly been criticized as one-sided.)

This is particularly clear in the Targum on Isaiah 53, which explicitly identifies the Servant as "the Messiah" even though its author is so hostile to the idea of messianic suffering that each reference to suffering is carefully reinterpreted or transferred to the people or to some other subject; the messianic identification is apparently too firmly entrenched to allow the targumist the easy option of an alternative identification as Israel or as some historical figure. NT references especially to Isaiah 53 presuppose such a messianic interpretation.

2. Jesus As the Servant in the Gospels.

Christian devotion has always found in Isaiah 53 an unrivalled portrayal of the vicarious and redemptive suffering of Jesus, which offers perhaps a clearer presentation of the classic Christian doctrine of the atonement than any single passage in the NT.

A number of scholars have questioned, however, whether the figure of the Servant of Yahweh did in fact play any significant role in the development of Christian understanding of the mission of Jesus in the NT period. This has been argued by C. K. Barrett and C. F. D. Moule, and most fully by M. D. Hooker. Hooker has shown that some alleged references to the Servant passages are at least questionable and has rightly emphasized that even where such reference is undeniable, the focus is not so one-sidedly on the Servant's role of vicarious redemption as later Christian usage might expect. But she has not convinced most scholars that the Servant figure was not an important factor in the earliest christology. In particular no equally plausible source has yet been suggested for Jesus' conviction that it was his mission to suffer and die because this was "written" (see Death of Jesus).

The direct use of the title "Servant" (pais) [of God] for Jesus does not occur in the NT outside the early chapters of Acts (Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27, 30). But the Servant passages of Isaiah are quoted several times, and their language and ideas underlie some of the most central statements about Jesus' mission.

2.1. The Synoptic Tradition in General. Each of the Synoptic Gospels identifies Jesus at his baptism* by means of a direct pronouncement by God, subsequently repeated at the Transfiguration,* "You are [this is] my beloved Son, with whom I am pleased" (Mk 1:11; 9:7). While the term servant is not used, almost all commentators agree that the words are a deliberate echo of the introduction to the first Servant Song (Is 42:1). Jesus' mission is thus marked out at the outset and in the most authoritative way possible, as that of the Servant

More specific allusions to Isaiah 53 occur in two key sayings about the redemptive significance of Jesus' coming death (see Death of Jesus). Mark 10:43-44 defines greatness for Jesus' disciples in terms of accepting the role of a servant and Mark 10:45 goes on to reinforce this demand by Jesus' own example: "The Son of man came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (see Ransom Saying). Here it is not only the language of service which recalls the Isaiah passages but more specifically the idea of vicarious death, of ransom and the phrase "for many" which echoes the language of Isaiah 53:11-12. And at the Last Supper (see Last Supper) Jesus' words over the cup use similar terminology about his blood being poured out "for many" (Mk 14:24). (For a detailed analysis of the verbal and conceptual links between these passages and the Servant Songs see France 116-23.)

Other verbal allusions have been claimed with much less plausibility, but more important than any verbal echo is the frequently repeated concept of the mission of the Son of man (see Son of Man) as one which fulfills the will of God by means of his rejection, suffering and death because these things are "written" about him (Mk 8:31; 9:12, 31; 10:32-34; 14:21, etc.). While some have argued that Daniel 7 supplies an adequate background for this concept (in the oppression of the saints which precedes their vindication, symbolized in the figure of "one like a son of man"), Jewish understanding of the human figure of Daniel 7:13-14 was in fact consistently of a majestic, victorious figure. That this "Son of man" should suffer and be killed was a striking paradox, and no more probable source for this innovative theology can be suggested than the suffering of the Isaianic Servant A suffering Messiah might have been derived from some of the psalms of the righteous sufferer or from the pierced and rejected shepherd of Zechariah 11—13, but no passage in the OT offers so clear a prediction of messianic suffering as Isaiah 53, and we have seen above that this passage is clearly echoed in some key pronouncements of Jesus on his mission.
It is on such grounds that many believe that Isaiah's Servant figure was a major factor in Jesus' understanding of his own mission and the crucial basis on which his followers found it possible to make sense of his death as the fulfillment of Scripture. The main Markan texts for this belief have already been cited, but each of the other Evangelists in his own way develops the theme of Jesus as the Servant of Yahweh.

2.2. Matthew. Two of Matthew's eleven formula quotations are drawn from Isaiah's Servant Songs. In Matthew 8:17 Jesus' healing ministry is seen as fulfilling Isaiah 53:4, "He took our weaknesses and carried our diseases," while in Matthew 12:15-21 Jesus' withdrawal from public attention is understood in the light of the first Servant Song, Isaiah 42:1-4, which is quoted in full. There is no doubt then that it is important for Matthew that Jesus fulfills the role of the Isaianic Servant of Yahweh. Yet it is remarkable that neither of these passages refers to the distinctive role of redemptive suffering, either in the specific words cited or in the aspect of Jesus' ministry to which they are applied Jesus' earthly ministry of healing and deliverance, and his non-confrontational demeanor, are no less a fulfillment of the Servant's mission than his vicarious death.

Another possible allusion to Isaiah 53 has been seen in Matthew 3:15, where the divine designation of Jesus in terms drawn from Isaiah 42:1 is preceded by the justification of his baptism as "fulfilling all righteousness." This notoriously obscure pronouncement may be understood not only as referring to the Servant's representative role, thus leading Jesus to identify himself with repentant (see Repentance) sinners,* but also as a rather cryptic allusion to Isaiah 53:11, "The righteous one shall make many to be accounted righteous." The same idea of identification may also lie behind Matthew's mention that Joseph of Arimathea was a "rich" man (27:57), thus recalling Isaiah 53:9, "They made his grave ... with a rich man in his death" (see Burial of Jesus).

2.3. Luke. In the canticles of Luke 1 the designation "Servant of God" is applied not to Jesus but to Israel (Lk 1:54) and to David (Lk 1:69). And while Matthew has almost exact parallels to Mark 10:45 and 14:24, the Lukan equivalents do not share the same clear allusions to the language of Isaiah 53 (though the language of "service" is still emphasized in Lk 22:26-27). This might suggest that Luke is less interested than Mark and Matthew in the Isaianic Servant as a model for Jesus' ministry. But we should not forget that it is the same Luke who subseuqndly records the actual tide "Servant of God" used for Jesus (Acts 3:13, 26; note, however, that David is also described as God's pais in 4:25). (Cf. the verbal parallels between Acts 3 and Is 52:13-53:12 [LXX]: Acts 3:13/Is 52:13; 3:13/53:6, 12; 3:14/53:11.) And it is Luke also who presents the only formal citation from Isaiah 53 in the Synoptic Gospels: the clause "And he was numbered among the lawless" (from Is 53:12) is introduced by the formula, "This which is written must be fulfilled in me," and followed by the further affirmation, "For what is [written] about me has its fulfillment" (Lk 22:37). There is no doubt then, that for Luke the mission of the Servant in Isaiah 53 is a blueprint for that of Jesus; the Servant is Jesus.

The OT passage which in Luke's Gospel most prominently defines Jesus' ministry is Isaiah 61:1-2, the text of Jesus' Nazareth sermon in Luke 4:16-27 (see Jubilee). This Scripture, Jesus declares, is now being fulfilled in his ministry (Lk 4:21). Isaiah 61 is not of course, one of Duhm's Servant Songs. But it shares with Isaiah 42:1-4 several important themes concerning the ministry of the one anointed by God for the work of delivering his people, and many commentators have understood the passages as related in their essential content, even if not in a formal literary sense. It is not unlikely that Luke, in recording Jesus' sermon on Isaiah 61, was thinking of his mission as the Servant of Yahweh.

2.4. John. John also has a formal citation from Isaiah 53. In John 12:38 the unbelief of the Jews is explained by the text, "Who has believed our report? And to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?" (Is 53:1). Inasmuch as this unbelief in Isaiah is a mark of the paradoxical nature of the Servant's appearance and experience, and Jesus' ministry was similarly open to misunderstanding and rejection, a parallel is here drawn between Jesus and the Servant which in the light of other Christian references to the Servant seems entirely appropriate. But it must be admitted that the focus at this point in John is not on the redemptive mission of the Servant or of Jesus, but rather on the mere fact of Jewish unbelief.

Another possible allusion to Isaiah 53 may be found in John the Baptist's description of Jesus as "the lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (1:29, 36; see Lamb of God). The Servant is compared in Isaiah 53:7 to a lamb led to the slaughter, and the whole tenor of the chapter is on the taking away of the sins of the people through his suffering and death. The phrase "the lamb of God" can be related to several different lambs in OT and later Jewish thought, but most of these (e.g., the Passover lamb, the lamb of the daily offering or the messianic lamb of later apoc alyptic*) do not directly support the idea of taking away sin, so that it is reasonable to see the Servant figure as making a major contribution to this image.
2.5. Conclusion. The above evidence suggests that while the figure of the Servant of Yahweh was not necessarily the most prominent in the christological thinking of all the Evangelists, they all accepted it as an appropriate and illuminating model for Jesus' mission of vicarious suffering and death for the sins of his people, and also (at least for Matthew) in his wider ministry of healing and deliverance. It was Jesus' own consciousness that he had come to fulfil the role of the Servant which gave scriptural backing to his revolutionary new conception of the Messiah's role as one of rejection, suffering and death rather than of earthly victory and glory.* And it was this model which eventually enabled his disciples to come to terms with his death as not defeat but achievement, the basis of the salvation of the people of God.

SERVICE

For Jesus and the Evangelists service can characterize the essence of Jesus' ministry and the nature of discipleship* Jesus' ultimate service is seen in his obedience to God* and death for others. His disciples* are likewise to serve God with undivided loyalty and, on the social level, serve one another—especially the helpless—rather than themselves.

2. Cultural and Religious Background

3. Service in the Synoptic Gospels

4. The Footwashing (Jn 13:1-17)

5. Conclusion

1. Vocabulary.

The primary Greek word used in the Gospels meaning "to serve" is diakoned and its noun counterparts diakonos ("servant") and diakonia ("service"). Closely related to this, however, is the word group doulos/ douleuō, meaning "slave/to serve as a slave." Technically, diakonia deals more with table service done in the employment of a master, while doulos means "slave" and reflects a condition of bonded servitude. However, the distinction is not rigidly maintained in the Gospels. Indeed, the diakonia/diakoneō group is not used at all in the Greek OT. Instead, the Hebrew word 'eḇbeḏ, which we would translate "service/servant," is translated by doulos. In the NT the close link between the two word groups is seen in Matthew 20:25-27/Mark 10:42-44 where the two words are used parallel to one another.

Greek had specialized words indicating service to God or to community, latreuō/latreia and leitourgeō/ leitourgia. The latter is found only in Luke 1:23, and the former is found in the context of the temptation of Christ (Mt 4:10 par. Lk 4:8, "you shall serve God alone"), and in other contexts reflecting people serving God (Lk 1:74; 2:37). In John 16:2 latreia is used ironically: People will seek to kill Christians, thinking that to do so is service to God. However, the use of these words is fairly rare in the Gospels. Instead, it is the symbol of the humble household servant or slave which Jesus uses to describe the nature of discipleship.
2. Cultural and Religious Background.

In general neither Greeks nor Jews thought very much of their servants. The Greeks looked down on the common table servant. The Jewish attitude was somewhat better, providing some protection for slaves/servants in the Law* (see Lev 25:42-55; Deut 5:15; 15:15 et al.), but the overall attitude was still negative. The harsh words of Sirach 33:26-28 (RSV) suggest the skeptical attitude of the public, "Yoke and thong will bow the neck, and for a wicked servant there are racks and tortures. Put him to work, that he may not be idle, for idleness teaches much evil. Set him to work, as is fitting for him, and if he does not obey, make his fetters heavy." The call to service and servanthood which we find in the Gospels is all the more remarkable against this background. When Jesus tells the disciples "You know that those who are supposed to rule over the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great men exercise authority over them" (Mk 10:42 RSV) he is saying the obvious: The mark of greatness in both the Gentile* and the Jewish world was authority* Those who served did so out of need.

This does not mean that the Jewish world was without ideas of charity and caring. Giving of alms to the poor was a critical act of piety (see Prov 19:17; Tob 1:17). Rabbinic writings detail an elaborate system of caring for the poor and raising alms (Moore, 11.169). There is no reason to doubt that similar systems existed in Jesus' day, and we may see some evidence of this in the way the disciples were themselves fed (Mk 2:23-28; 6:7-11). However, this in no way indicates a positive view of the poor or of service. Numerous episodes in Jesus' ministry confirm this (e.g., the rich young ruler, Mk 10:17-22; and Jesus' criticism of the scribes,* Mk 12:38-44). The desire to be served instead of serving was as common in the Judea of Jesus' day as in any other day or place.

3. Service in the Synoptic Tradition.

The Synoptics understand "service" in the customary sense of "table service" as the parables of Jesus (Mt 13:27-30; 18:23-34; 21:34-41; 22:3-13 and par.) and the stories of Mary and Martha (Lk 10:40 and par.; Jn 12:2) make clear. The words of the centurion in Matthew 8:9 and parallel passages confirm the normal view of service and servants in the Greco-Roman and Judean world: "I say to my servant 'Do this' and he does it" In short, "service" meant menial service to meet the needs of a master.
3.1. The Two Masters Saying. It is all the more significant that Jesus chooses the image of the servant to describe his idea of discipleship. The servant is an appropriate image for the relationship of the believer with God because of the exclusive nature of the demand the master makes on the servant. We see this in the Q* saying of Matthew 6:24/Luke 16:13, "No one is able to serve two masters...You cannot serve God and mammon." The concept is familiar in proverbial statements outside the NT (Manson, 133), but there is no reason to think that we are not dealing with an authentic saying of Jesus here (contra R. Bultmann, 1972, 85). The point is not that one cannot serve two masters; indeed, servants are not usually free to choose their masters. But the servant who tries to divide loyalty between two masters inevitably favors one or the other. "Mammon" represents all forms of wealth and power which tempt the disciple (as indeed they figure prominently in the temptations of Jesus, Mt 4:7-10 par. Lk 4:5-8; see Temptation of Jesus) to compromise his or her commitment. The God of the NT is no less jealous than the God of Sinai. Anything less than total commitment of the person to God leads ultimately to the rejection of God. The choice is between seeking salvation through what we control or salvation* through God.

3.2. Greatness in Service. Alongside this Jesus builds a picture of service which is in radical distinction from the cultural norm. The Synoptic Gospels picture the disciples in disputes over rank and pre-eminence (Mk 9:35 par. Lk 9:48; Mk 10:41-45 par. Mt 20:25-28; Lk 22:25-27; Mt 23:11). Jesus rejects this all-too-human wrangling for status: "You know that those who are supposed to rule over the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great men exercise authority over them. But it shall not be so among you; but whoever would be great among you must be your servant and whoever would be first among you must be slave of all" (Mk 10:42-44). Exhortations to humility and warnings against pride were well known in Judaism* (Manson, 233), but these sayings go beyond pious humility. Jesus is suggesting a transformation of society into a culture without rank or privilege (Horsley, 243-45). Obviously, Jesus is talking in the first sense only to those who accept his claims on their lives and is not offering this as a general social program. But the distinctive mark of those who belong to the dawning kingdom of God (see Ethics of Jesus) will be the rejection of power in favor of service to one another.

version of the Last Supper (see Last Supper), so that the concept of service here flows as an interpretation of the self-giving of Jesus symbolized in the Last Supper (Roloff, 54-58). These verses suggest that even in its pre-Lukian form the Last Supper was presented as a Farewell Discourse of Jesus (see Farewell Discourse). Farewell discourses typically include warnings and exhortations to the followers of the leader (Adam and Eve 30:1; 2 Apoc. Bar. 44:2-15; 77:6; 1 Enoch 82; 93-101; 2 Enoch 44—46; 4 Ezra 14:34-36), and frequently contain the appointment of a successor (Adam and Eve 50:1; 2 Apoc. Bar. 45:2; 1 Enoch 82:1-2; 104:11-13; 2 Enoch 54:1; 4 Ezra 14:26). What is significant here is that Jesus appoints no successor in the normal sense of that word. Instead, Jesus’ last words and instructions interpret his own life and death as an act of sacrificial service, and this is held up as his heritage for the disciples.

3.3. The Eschatological Parables. This concept of service implies both risk and commitment for the disciple who follows in Jesus’ path. The parable* of the faithful and the unfaithful servants (Mt 24:45-51 par. Lk 12:42-46) extols the virtue of the servant who is doing the Master’s will even when the Master is away, and warns against the servant who exploits others in the Master’s absence. We need not assume here that the emphasis on the delay of the Master is injected into the parable by the church in order to deal with the problem of Jesus’ delayed return (Jeremias, 55-59; for a contrary view see Marshall, 533-34). Jesus undoubtedly anticipated some interim period before his return when the disciples would have to operate on their own. The emphasis on faithful service in this interim and resisting the temptation to turn to selfish goals is consistent with the earlier teaching on service.

The parable of the pounds/talents supplements this picture. The Matthean version of the parable occurs in the context of the eschatological discourses (Mt 24—25; see Apocalyptic Teaching), a setting implying an emphasis on faithful witness* in the context of distress and uncertainty. The Lukan version of the parable, the parable of the pounds, occurs in a different context (prior to the entrance into Jerusalem, Lk 19:11-27) from that of Matthew’s. But the addition of the details about the master—now a nobleman who goes to receive a kingdom, followed by a hostile delegation of citizens who oppose him—adds political tension to the story and thus matches the eschatological (see Eschatology) context of Matthew. In both cases faithful service is carried out in the context of opposition and uncertainty. Service to Jesus is not without risk, and is itself an act of faith.*
At the same time it is significant that Matthew closes the eschatological section with a parable of the Last Judgment (sheep and the goats) that emphasizes the treatment of the poor and dispossessed as the true measure of faith and commitment (Mt 25:31-46). J. R Donahue argues that the scene assumes the fulfillment of the Great Commission of Matthew 28:16-20 (see Gentiles), so that it depicts the judgment* at the end of the age after the gospel* has been taken to every nation. In this sense the "oppressed" and the "least of these" represent the disciples who have taken the gospel to others. The parable in this sense could be of comfort to the disciples: you will be mistreated, but the nations will be judged by the way they treat you (cf. Mt 10:42). However, the disciples themselves are not excluded from the message of the parable. Within the Matthean context these last parables focus on the faithfulness and readiness of the disciples. Discipleship inevitably issues in concrete actions (5:16), especially acts of service and mercy.* Those who are drawn to this and identify with the ministry of Jesus and the disciples are those who are welcomed into the kingdom and named "blessed." Those who respond in indifference are those who are cast out (Donahue, 109-25). True service is best measured by acts toward those who are utterly helpless and unable to repay.

The footwashing scene of John 13 has enjoyed a long and lively discussion among scholars. In general, the critical arguments have centered around the two interpretations given the footwashing within the chapter: (1) a soteriological/christological interpretation in 13:6-10 and (2) a moral interpretation in 13:12-17. A persistent question has been whether the former (so Brown, 559-72) or latter (Boismard) interpretation was the earlier and more original of the two, or whether the Evangelist found both interpretations in his sources and wove the two together (Onuki; Bultmann, 1971).

The evidence suggesting a two-stage history of the passage is found in 13:7, "What I am doing you do not know now, but afterward you will understand." A similar statement in John suggests a type of knowledge and insight into the meaning of Jesus' ministry that only comes after the resurrection (cf. 2:21-22). The second interpretation (13:12-17), however, seems to explain clearly what Jesus means by the footwashing and so is at odds with 13:7. On the other hand, Onuki points out that the inclusio structure of the chapter is a hallmark of the Evangelist (cf. 13:11, 18, 21-24 with 14:15, 21, 23-24; Onuki, 162-63). It is also open to question whether 13:7 precludes any further explanation of the footwashing. The theme of "understanding afterwards" is carried out throughout the first part of the Farewell Discourse (13:36; 14:20, 25-26, 29) in the midst of ongoing discussions of the meaning of Jesus' departure (14:1-6, 21-24, 30-31). The tension between 13:7 and 13:12-17 may be more apparent than real.

It is not clear that a simple distinction between two interpretations—one christological and the other moral—is justified. On the one hand, the sayings of Jesus in John 13:12-20 can themselves be understood on two levels: (1) the obvious example of practical service focused on the menial needs of others and (2) the deeper type of service and personal sacrifice that Jesus models when the footwashing is viewed in light of the cross and Easter. The servant sayings of Jesus in John 13:12-17 have christological implications that we should not miss: the Lord* of the disciples is also the obedient son and servant of the Father (cf. Jn 14:10-12; 17:1-5).

Neither is there a total absence of the horizontal dimension in the first so-called christological interpretation. Jesus words, "If I do not wash you, you will have no pan in me" (13:8), point not only to the meaning of Jesus' obedient death on the cross, but also to a humble acceptance by faith of the gift of Christ's sacrifice. The footwashing is a drama of Jesus' act of sacrifice on the cross, and Peter's response represents the reaction of believers. The disciples are made "clean" (13:10) by their acceptance of Jesus and his death for them. Where we find the vertical dimension of the gracious act of service of Christ in his death for us, we also tend to find an emphasis on loving and caring for the community (e.g., Mk 10:41-45; Phil 2:1-11; 1 Pet 2:21-25). Indeed, Jesus' rebuke of Peter's attempt to resist the gift offered in the footwashing (13:8), and then his overreaction to it (13:9), is difficult to understand unless we see that Jesus is rejecting Peter's attempt to draw distinctions between himself and the community. The humility that Jesus is pressing on Peter is both to accept the gracious gift of service from the Master and to accept a common human need for the same gift.

In this sense the link made between the betrayer and the footwashing is not accidental (13:11,18-19,21-24). The stories of Peter and Judas (see Judas Iscariot) are deliberately interwoven (note the similar technique in Jn 18:12-27 and Peter's role in the trial of Jesus). As Peter represents the community of faith, Judas represents those who reject Jesus' sacrificial gift and its concomitant demand for service to others. Not to accept Jesus' death for us is to betray him, to leave the community of faith and embrace the darkness (13:30).

The example Jesus gives the disciples in washing their feet (13:12-20) is the pattern of sacrificial and consy service. The key word for this service is agape, given in the command that disciples should "love one another" (13:34-35) and thereby witness to the world. The Johannine writings are not concerned with specific ethical actions and make no reference to the care of the poor and the outcast. This is in part because John writes to a community which is itself being cast out of the synagogue and is already dispossessed (cf. 9:22; 12:42-43; 16:1-2). But it is also because John is content to paint the big picture and only imply the details. Christ served his disciples and others in utter humility—even at the cost of the cross—so his disciples' lesser deeds of love and sacrifice for those in need are fitting witnesses to the Master (13:35).

5. Conclusion.

Service in the Gospels and in the ministry of Jesus takes its starting point from the example of Jesus on the cross (see Death of Jesus). Considering the price he paid, his followers should be willing to serve humbly and care for one another. Properly understood, this is a revolutionary concept. The call to service in love overshadows normal human desires for rank and preference and calls individuals to lay all these aside for the sake of Christ and the needs of others. There can be no doubt that Jesus intended the community of faith to be radically distinct from the world in this regard. Indeed, selfless service and concern for the weak and powerless would prove to be the distinguishing mark of the Christian community and the most tangible and attractive witness to its character and faith.

SHEPHERD, SHEEP

The pastoral setting of a large portion of Ancient Near Eastern culture made motifs of sheep and shepherding apt descriptions of human and divine roles and relationships. The primary background for the Gospel references to shepherd and sheep lies in the OT where Israel* is the lost sheep and the king or promised future ruler is the shepherd. The Gospels also develop the notion of the apostles as shepherds, again reflecting the OT context wherein Israel's leaders were sometimes referred to as shepherds. The motif of sheep and goats is also used in the Gospels to illustrate eschatological judgment*

1. The Lost Sheep

2. Jesus the Shepherd

3. The Apostles As Shepherds

4. The Sheep and the Goats

5. Miscellaneous Occurrences

1. The Lost Sheep.

The lost sheep of Israel represent people who have been abandoned by their leaders and/or have wandered away from God* (for a similar use of the motif of Israel as sheep see I Enoch 89—90). A number of OT passages form the background for this imagery, especially Ezekiel 34.

Matthew and Mark describe the multitude for whom Jesus felt compassion as sheep without a shepherd. Mark tells us that as a result of his compassion Jesus began to teach them many things (Mk 6:34). Matthew says Jesus' compassion motivated him to challenge his disciples to pray (see Prayer) for more workers to go into the harvest (Mt 9:36). The OT language behind the saying about sheep without a shepherd is clear (Num 27:17; 1 Kings 22:17 par. 2 Chron 18:16; Ezek 34:5). Mark follows the saying with the story of the feeding of five thousand in the wilderness (see Mountain and Wilderness), thereby possibly alluding to Psalm 23, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want."

Jesus also gives instructions to the Twelve not to go to Gentiles* or Samaritans* but only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt 10:6). This may be an allusion to Ezekiel 34:6 which describes Israel as God's sheep scattered over the face of the earth with no one to look for them. As the disciples* carry out their mission they will fulfill Jeremiah 23:4, "I will appoint shepherds over them and they will shepherd them and they will no longer fear nor be terrified nor missing' says the Lord." Thus their mission "heralds the messianic age of salvation" (Gundry, 185).

In response to the petition of a Canaanite woman to exorcise a demon* from her daughter, Jesus remains silent (Mt 15:21-28). When his disciples urge him to send her away, he responds, "I have been sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 15:24). The combination of the woman's address of Jesus as "Son of David"* and Jesus' response again recalls Ezekiel 34 (w. 23-24). If Ezekiel 34 is rightly considered as background for this imagery, the lostness of Israel referred to in these passages is a result of both God's judgment and the unwillingness of her leaders to fulfill their role as the shepherds of Israel.

A lost sheep also plays a part in a parable* found in both Matthew 18:12-14 and Luke 15:3-7. Although the basic plot of both accounts is the same, the discrepancy in wording has led interpreters to debate whether they were derived from a common source. It is possible that Jesus could have told such a short parable more than once using different words or that the single parable could have been translated from an Aramaic tradition in different ways. In Matthew the parable is addressed to believers (cf. Mt 18:6) and points out the Father's pastoral concern as motivation for not causing sheep to stumble. The parable in Luke is addressed to Pharisees* and scribes* (Lk 15:1-3) and points to their lack of compassion for "sinners."* The faithful shepherd stands in contrast to the wicked shepherds of Ezekiel 34:7-8 who refused to go into the wilderness to look for the lost sheep of Israel. Luke also includes the detail that the shepherd, when he found the lost sheep, placed it on his shoulders to take it home (Lk 15:5). This emphasizes the price paid by the shepherd to restore lost sheep to the fold (Bailey, 144-56). The future tense in Luke 15:7 gives the parable eschatological force (Jeremias, 135-36).

2. Jesus the Shepherd.

Since the people of God were like sheep without a shepherd, God provided a shepherd in the person of his Son. There are a number of OT passages in which a Davidic ruler is referred to as a shepherd. One which plays a significant role in the Gospel tradition is Micah 5:2-4 [MT 5:1-3]: "... from you [Bethlehem] will come a ruler in Israel. . . who will shepherd in the strength of Yahweh." In the First Gospel the Jewish leadeven refer to this passage when asked about the birthplace of the king of the Jews (Mt 2:1-6; set Birth of Jesus).

In the OT shepherding the people was a common metaphor for leadership (2 Sam 7:7), but in 2 Samuel 5:2 the shepherding metaphor was used specifically in an oracle concerning David (cf. 1 Chron 11:2). This oracle also stands behind the prophecy of Micah 5:2-4. In fact, since Matthew 2:6 is not a verbatim citation, it may have resulted from a procedure common in early Judaism whereby 2 Samuel 5:2b would have been attached to the Micah oracle in order to interpret it Micah 5:2 predicts a leader who is later called a shepherd (v. 4; see Old Testament in the Gospels). By adding 2 Samuel 5:2b "you (David) will shepherd my people Israel," the Jews in Matthew are represented as having interpreted Micah's prophecy as referring specifically to the Davidic Messiah (see Christ; Son of David). Similarly, the targum explicidy identifies the promised ruler as the Messiah, though it drops this metaphorical use of "shepherding" in favor of a reference to "ruling in strength" (Tg. Neb. Mic 5:1-3). Jeremiah (23:1-6) and Ezekiel (34:23-24; 37:22-24) both promised a Davidic ruler who would shepherd God's people (cf. also Pss. SoL 17:40; CD 19:5-9).

The motif of the Messiah as shepherd also stands behind the citation of Zechariah 13:7 in both Matthew 26:31 and Mark 14:27 (cf. Jn 16:32): "Strike the shepherd and the sheep will be scattered." The citation is a variation of the MT and may be from a different textual tradition found in certain manuscripts of the LXX (although these mss may have been copied by Christian scribes to bring them in line with the Gospels). It is also possible that the variation is an interpretation by Jesus or the tradition, which has taken over the first person singular later in the verse and changed the imperative accordingly. Thus Matthew and Mark read, "I will strike the shepherd and the sheep ('of the flock' in Mt) will be scattered."

The tradition history (see Tradition Criticism) behind this citation continues to be debated, but it should be noted that it is of a piece with the widely attested identification of Jesus as a shepherd in the Gospels, and with the otherwise frequent use of Zechariah 9—14 in the passion material (see France, 107-110; set Passion Narrative). In Zechariah 13:7 the shepherd is God's agent, a royal figure, whose death provides a decisive turning point in redemptive history. In the Markan and Matthean contexts similar overtones are transparent. "Striking the shepherd" clearly finds its fulfillment in Jesus' arrest (and the fleeing of the disciples; cf. Mk 14:50; Mt 26:56) and execution. Although Zechariah 13:8-9 is not explicidy quoted in either Gospel context, it should not be overlooked that the covenant promise to the remnant of God's people contained therein has its obvious parallel in Jesus' subsequent prediction: "After I have arisen I will go before you to Galilee."

The idea of Messiah as shepherd is most fully developed in John 10:1-18. This passage follows a section dealing with the spiritual blindness (see Blindness and Deafness) of the Jewish leaders (Jn 9:35-41). Immediately Jesus tells a "parable" comparing a good shepherd to a thief, robber or stranger (Jn 10:1-6). The thief does not enter the sheepfold through the gate (Jn 10:1). The good shepherd enters through the gate, and when he calls each of his sheep by name they follow him because they recognize his voice (Jn 10:2-4). But when the stranger calls, the sheep flee because they do not recognize his voice (Jn 10:5). In its present context the sheepfold is the nation of Israel (Ps 95:7; 100:3). The thief represents the Jewish leadership of Jesus' day. The explanation of this parable is found in John 10:7-18. Tragan divides this exposition into three parts: verses 7-10; verses 11-13 and verses 14-18. His outline seems correct although his hypothesis that each part represents a different redactional layer is not a necessary conclusion. In John 10:7-10 Jesus presents himself as the door to the sheepfold. (Tragan follows in v. 7 and thinks thura, "door" should actually read poimn "shepherd." The papyri disagree with one another here, but the internal evidence for poimen, "shepherd," as set forth by Tragan, is not as decisive as he thinks. Cf. most of the major commentaries.) He is the door in many respects. The Law* came through Moses, grace and truth* came through Jesus Christ (Jn 1:17). Thus Jesus is the fulfillment of the Law and the replacement of Moses* who wrote of him (Jn 1:45; 5:46). He replaces the Temple* as the place of worship* (Jn 2:19-22). He is the light* of the world (Jn 8:12). He is the way to the Father, and no one can enter God's presence except through him (Jn 14:6).

In the second exposition of the parable (Jn 10:11-13), Jesus presents himself as the good shepherd. The main thrust of this exposition is soteriological and ecclesiastical, highlighting the sacrifice of Jesus for his sheep. Again there is a contrast between the good shepherd and the one who watches the sheep only in exchange for wages. The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep, but when danger comes the hireling runs away. There is a lesson in this exposition, not only about the sacrifice of the Savior but also the true nature of ministry. Adversity tests the true motivation of the shepherds of the church* (cf. 1 Tim 6:5; 1 Pet 5:2).

The third exposition (Jn 10:14-18) adds a christological theme to what has already been said. The antithesis between true and false shepherds disappears. The sacrifice of the good shepherd is repeated (Jn 10:15). And an ecclesiastical concern about sheep from another fold belonging to the good shepherd is noted. This is probably a reference to the Gentile mission of the early church. The christological theme comes out in John 10:17-18. The sacrifice of the shepherd is his sovereign choice based on his relationship with the Father.

The good shepherd is mentioned later in the chapter (Jn 10:26-30) with specific reference to the sheep recognizing his voice. The image painted is that of a shepherd entering a fold containing more than his own sheep. He calls to his sheep and those who recognize his voice follow him. Thus Jesus came to the Jewish nation and those who recognized him followed him and received eternal life,* and no one could snatch them from him. They became his little flock to whom the Father would give the kingdom (cf. Lk 12:32; see Kingdom of God).

Derrett is probably correct in seeing the metaphor of the good shepherd and its explications as a mid-rash on the OT, but the particular OT background he cites (Ex 21:1; Num 27; Is 56-57; Mic 2:12-13) should include Ezekiel 34. Ezekiel castigates the shepherds of Israel because they do not care for the flock of God. He threatens to remove them from their role as shepherds. Then he promises to raise up one shepherd to shepherd them, "namely, my servant David" (Ezek 34:23). This shepherd will be the means by which God blesses his people (Jn 10:10) and protects them from the wild beasts (Jn 10:12).

3. The Apostles As Shepherds.

The notion of Jesus as the shepherd over the people of God shifts to his disciples as shepherds. This idea is already present in the commissioning of the disciples in Matthew 10:6: "Go to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." But the theme comes out most clearly in the epilog to the Fourth Gospel (Jn 21:15-17). Peter is three times asked by Jesus, "Peter do you love me?" Each time Peter responds positively. After each of Peter's responses Jesus gives a command related to apostolic duty: "Feed my lambs"; "Shepherd my sheep"; "Feed my sheep" (Jn 21:15, 16, 17). The role of the good shepherd in the church is carried out through his appointed under-shepherds (see Apostle).

The question of the nature of this ministry entrusted to Peter in John 21 has divided the church for centuries. Is this ministry a ruling one, limited to Peter, and making him the first in a line of prime ministers of the church? Or is this pericope more general and a type-scene for the designation of shepherds (pastors) of God's flock wherever they might be? G. R. Beasley-Murray points out that those who hold to the primacy of Peter are surprisingly neglectful of the relevance of other NT pastoral passages for interpreting this passage (e.g., Acts 20:28; 1 Pet 5:3; Beasley-Murray, 406-407). These pastoral passages are addressed to the elders of individual churches and seem to bear no thought of one person presiding over the whole church.

Matthew 7:15 also uses shepherd/sheep terminology to discuss leadership. "Beware of false prophets who come to you in sheep's clothing but inside are ravenous wolves." The identity of these false prophets has engendered much discussion regarding Matthew's audience—without yielding any firm conclusions. Some have thought that Matthew created the statement with reference to false prophets* in the church and anachronistically put it on the lips of Jesus. But this seems to assume that Jesus gave no thought to a community of followers that would perpetuate his teachings and face deceivers (cf. Mk 13:22; see Church). The notion of false prophets was a common theme in Jesus' Bible (Jer 6:13-15; 8:8-12; Ezek 13; 22:27; 34; Mic 3; Zech 11:16). There is no reason to doubt that he appropriated this theme and borrowed the imagery with the intent of warning his present and future followers about wolves in sheep's clothing who would claim to follow Jesus but in the end devour the people of...
4. The Sheep and the Goats.

In Matthew 25:31-46 the shepherd/sheep imagery is used in describing eschatological judgment. The Son of man \(\text{(see Son of Man)}\) sits on his throne before the gathering of the nations and separates them from one another as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats (cf. Ezek 34:17). The sheep on his right hand represent those who serve him in this life. The goats on his left are those who refuse to serve him. But their destinies are not directly determined by their works. Rather, their works are determined by their nature as sheep or goats. The key to the interpretation of the passage lies in the interpretation of Jesus' brothers as his disciples (Mt 25:40; see Gray). The judgment is thus based on one's reception and identification with Christian missionaries and their message (Carson, 520). Acceptance brings inclusion in the flock of the good shepherd. Rejection brings banishment to the eternal fire (Mt 25:41; see Heaven and Hell).

5. Miscellaneous Occurrences.

Luke highlights thior (Lk 2:8-20). It was to them that the angel* of the Lord* announced the good news of the birth of the Messiah. The literary significance of the shepherds may lie in their humble estate. Although rejected by the world, the Savior (see Salvation) is revealed to the lowly. This theme continues throughout the Third Gospel.

Jesus, in justifying his own healing of a man on the Sabbath,* used the example of saving a sheep from a pit on the Sabbath. The value of a man is greater than that of a sheep (Mt 12:11-12; cf. CD 11.13-14). And in Luke 17:7 he describes the work of a servant as possibly encompassing that of a shepherd.

In Matthew 10:16 Jesus sends his disciples out as sheep in the midst of wolves. Here the imagery pictures the dangers of the world into which Jesus sends his followers (Lk 10:3 renders Jesus' saying as "lambs in the midst of wolves"—thus heightening the danger). Wolves here are not false prophets within the church but members of the world. The saying in Matthew may have been a common figure of speech and thus would have had very general referents.

SIGN OF JONAH

When asked to offer a sign in support of his provocative deeds and claims, Jesus on more than one occasion is said to have responded that the only sign to be offered to that generation would be the "sign of Jonah." Was he referring to his ministry, his proclamation, his death* and resurrection,* or his future advent? Did Jesus really make such a statement? Matthew and Luke both report that Jesus spoke of the "sign of Jonah," but they disagree in their interpretations of it.

1. The Data

2. The Meaning of "Sign"

3. Interpretations by the Evangelists

4. In the Ministry of Jesus

1. The Data.

Jesus' critics came seeking "a sign" (Mt 12:38) or "a sign from heaven" (Mk 8:11; Mt 16:1; Lk 11:16). The t all for a sign occurs also in other contexts (Lk
Mark's Gospel offers one form of Jesus' response: "Certainly no sign will be given to this generation" (Mk 8:12). However, the parallel passage in Matthew has the added phrase "except the sign of Jonah" (Mt 16:4). Matthew has once previously referred to "the sign of Jonah," also in response to a request for Jesus to perform a sign, in a passage shared by Matthew and Luke but not found in Mark (i.e., Q*; Mt 12:39; Lk 11:29). Perhaps Mark omitted reference to Jonah, regarding the miracles* as sufficient demonstration (Perrin) or in criticism of the notion that proofs of any sort might smooth the way of faith in the crucified.

Matthew reproduced the Q form of Jesus' response (12:39) at 16:4 where, apparently coming to Mark 8:11 in his sources, he read it as a second request for a sign. It should further be noted that Matthew is alone among the Synoptic Evangelists in designating Jonah as "the prophet" (12:39).

Matthew and Luke further agree, again apparently on the basis of Q as their common source, in following the saying about "the sign of Jonah" (Mt 12:39; Lk 11:29) with Jesus' sayings about "something greater than Solomon" and "something greater than Jonah" (Mt 12:41-42; Lk 11:31-32).

In sum, Mark speaks only of a request for a sign, with a flat denial from Jesus that any will be offered, while Matthew has two "sign of Jonah" sayings (including one designating Jonah as "the prophet"), and Luke has one. Both Matthew and Luke immediately follow the (first) "sign of Jonah" saying with sayings about Solomon and Jonah.

2. The Meaning of "Sign."

The saying about the sign of Jonah is Jesus' response to the request that he offer "a sign" (sēmeion) or "a sign from heaven." That the sign is described as "from heaven" indicates that the questioners seek proof that Jesus in his mission really does enjoy the backing of God which Jesus implicidy or explicidy claims.

The public work of Jesus provoked antagonism as well as faith (cf. "a sign to be spoken against" in Lk 2:34). Even (or especially) the miracles of Jesus were susceptible of divergent interpretations. Does he do them by the power (see Authority and Power) of God as a prophet* of God, or is he in league with Satan (see Demon, Devil, Satan)? Therefore, when some people asked for a sign (always in the singular), they were seeking not an additional miracle or miracles but some other irrefutable confirmation that he acted with God's approval.

Furthermore, the word sign in the Synoptic Gospels (unlike John) is not the usual word for a "miracle." The Synoptics have other language for miracles (e.g., dynameis, "mighty deeds"), although the word signs does appear in combination with "wonders" (terata), which has the meaning "miracles" (Mk 13:22; Mt 24:24). In Acts sign or signs is used both alone (4:16, 22; 8:6) and in combination with "mighty deeds" (8:13) and with "wonders" (2:43 and eight more times) to mean miracles.

In the Synoptic Gospels "sign" by itself usually means a unique signal: the manger as crib (Lk 2:12), Judas's kiss (Mt 26:48), or awesome portents in the skies, like those signalling the nearness of the last days (e.g., Mk 13:4; Mt 24:3; Lk 21:7; cf. Lk 21:11, 25). Matthew speaks of the climactic "sign of the Son of man*" (Mt 24:30), where the other Synoptists speak of "the Son of man" without calling his appearing a sign (Mk 13:26; Lk 21:27).

3. Interpretations by the Evangelists.
Matthew and Luke have different sentences linking the "sign of Jonah" saying with the sayings about Solomon and Jonah. These intermediate sentences offer each Evangelist's interpretation of the sign of Jonah.

Matthew understands the resurrection of Jesus as the fulfillment of the "sign of Jonah" (12:40): "Just as Jonah was in the belly of the sea monster for three days and three nights, so will the Son of Man be in the heart of the earth for three days and three nights [only this limited time]." Matthew's use of the phrase "after three days" in 27:63 (cf. "on the third day" in 16:21; 17:23; 20:19 par.) is an echo of the Jonah tradition and confirmation that Matthew understands Jesus' resurrection as the sign of Jonah.

Luke 11:30 (unlike Mt 12:40) does not point to the resurrection of Jesus. But what exactly Luke understood as constituting "the sign of Jonah" is disputed by interpreters.

(1) Some stress the future tense of the verb "will be given" (dothēsetai, Lk 11:29), and say that the sign of Jonah is the future coming of Jesus as Judge: Just as Jonah came from a distant country as a preacher of judgment* to the Ninevites, so the Son of Man will come as the judge from heaven to this generation (Bultmann; Perrin).

(2) Others interpret the analogy as follows: As Jonah preached repentance to Nineveh before its judgment, so Jesus preaches repentance to this generation before its judgment. Therefore, the sign of Jonah is either Jesus himself as preacher of judgment (Kümmel, Rengstorf) or the actual preaching of Jesus (Tödt, Lindars). The Ninevites made the appropriate response to the preaching of Jonah, but now, says Jesus, "something greater," namely his own wisdom* and proclamation, is here.

(3) Perhaps Luke, in speaking of "this generation," reflects not only on the response of Jesus' contemporaries but on the response of his own contemporaries (as late as the eighties of the first century). Luke focuses on his present and declares that Jesus was and is the great preacher of repentance* (Kloppenborg). His work continues in the preaching of the community. Like Jonah, Jesus has been vindicated by being lifted up to new life, and he and the word about him will continue to be vindicated (Edwards).

(4) Reference to the resurrection of Jesus is not obvious in Luke as it is in Matthew, but it may not be entirely absent. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus in Luke 16:19-31 concludes with conversation between the rich man and Abraham* concerning the possible effects of the resurrection of Lazarus on the rich man's brothers. That conclusion sounds like a Lukan echo of an understanding of the resurrection as a sign. And the book of Acts concludes with the recital of the great storm and the shipwreck of Paul. That report (Acts 27—28) not only echoes the book of Jonah but appears in that section of Acts often described as the narrative of "Paul's passion and resurrection." The parable of the rich man seems to deny that the resurrection would serve as any kind of effective sign, while the narrative of the sea voyage seems to affirm that it may yet be.

4. In the Ministry of Jesus.

It is widely asserted that the saying at first (during the ministry of Jesus) had no connection with the resurrection of Jesus. This assertion is argued on several grounds: (1) Jesus could not have known that he would be raised after three days in the grave (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection); (2) even if Jesus had declared that he would rise, his audience would have found such a declaration meaningless; (3) the Q document, which is the reputed source of the saying for Matthew and Luke, never speaks of the resurrection of Jesus.

All of these critical assertions are themselves denied by many scholars. No consensus exists concerning the path from the texts to the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus). But in spite of all difficulties, some continue to think that Jesus (and not just Matthew) meant that his death and subsequent resurrection would be the sign of Jonah.

Jeremias concludes that the sign of Jonah, both in the ministry of Jesus and in the Gospel of Luke, refers to the miraculous deliverance of Jonah from the belly of the fish rather than to the preaching of Jonah. Jeremias understands Luke to be saying that Jesus declared that he would be displayed to his generation as Jonah had been manifested long ago—as one raised from the dead. Jonah and Jesus were divine messengers authorized or certified as genuine by their deliverance from death.

Ancient Jewish tradition can be cited in support of the notion that Jesus and his contemporaries might understand a dramatic rescue from death as the sign of Jonah. In 3 Maccabees 6:7 the pious priest Eleazar called on God for a rescue just like that which God had accomplished for Daniel and Jonah. Daniel was thrown as food to the lions dwelling underground, but God brought him up again to the light unscathed. Jonah was lifted up from the belly of the monster of the deep and was restored uninjured to all his family. Another tradition identifies Jonah as that son of the widow of Zarephath whom Elijah raised from the dead (The Lives of the Prophets 10:1-6; see Jeremias for further references). Josephus retells the story of Jonah (Ant. 9.208-14), stressing not the preaching of repentance but the casting of the prophet into the sea, his being swallowed by a great fish and his subsequent deliverance onto the shore.

Pen-in speaks for many who think that Jesus pointed by means of the Jonah saying not to his resurrection but to his proclamation. Jesus meant that his mission and message would be vindicated and bear fruit in the future in ways beyond the wildest imaginings of his own generation.

SIMEON'S SONG

Also known as the Nunc Dimittis, Simeon's Song (Lk 2:29-32) is a particularly beautiful and moving poetic feature of Luke's overture to the Gospel and Acts.

It has been argued that Luke himself, following the known practice of the Greek historians who were to some degree his models, composed this and the other hymns of Luke 1—2 to enrich his narrative. It has also been suggested that the hymn comes to us from the worship* of a particular community, either Jewish, adherents of john the Baptist* or early Jewish Christian. The last option appears to be the most frequently advanced at present Some scholars argue that the hymn was originally composed in Greek; others advance linguistic arguments which tend to show that the psalm was translated from a Semitic, probably Hebrew, original (see Languages of Palestine). Still others continue to maintain that the hymn was indeed composed by the aged Simeon himself.

Simeon's Song bears many of the essential characteristics of Hebrew praise. It rejoices, albeit in a somewhat unusual form, in the goodness of God, states the reason for that rejoicing and expands poetically on that statement. It displays the parallelism characteristic of Hebrew poetry (v. 32). The hymn is a mosaic of OT allusions, chiefly to so-called Deutero-Isaiah (Is 40-55).

The Song's meaning cannot be considered apart from consideration of its place in Luke's narrative. The narrative features a parallelism between stories about John the Baptist and stories about the infant ChrisL In this parallelism Simeon's Song plays a key role. Just as an ancient Israelite of great holiness, Zechariah, offers praise to God over the young John, so an ancient and holy Israelite, Simeon, offers praise over the infant Jesus. One may also compare Zechariah's prophecy concerning John (Lk 1:76-79) with the prophecy concerning Jesus, also spoken by Simeon (Lk 2:34-35).

The narrative as a whole contains the promise that Simeon would see the Lord's Messiah; fulfillment when Simeon sees the infant Jesus; followed by the praise of the hymn itself. The order of promise-fulfillment—praise is also found in connection with the other hymns of Luke's infancy narratives. The theological theme of promise and fulfillment, also manifest within the Song (v. 29), reappears frequently in Luke-Acts.

So great is Simeon's rejoicing over the presence of God's "salvation," a play on the Hebrew root of Jesus' name, that he is ready now to depart into death (cf. the words of the aged Jacob-Israel, Gen 45:30, Jub. 45:3-4). This salvation is both glory to the people Israel and the means by which God will reach out to enlighten the Gentiles. As such the hymn is a foretaste of Luke-Acts as a whole.

SINNER

In the Gospels the term sinner is used in two ways— to describe the individual who is opposed to God and his will, and by Jesus' opponents to describe those outside of their group to whom Jesus offers the gospel* of salvation.*

1. Terminology and Meaning

2. Usage in the Gospels

3. Jesus and Sinners

4. Conclusion

1. Terminology and Meaning.

SINNER is the English word most frequently used to translate the Greek term hamartōlos, an adjective related to the verb hamartanō, "to sin," and the nouns for sin, hamartoma and hamartia.

Within the LXX the Greek term hamartōlos occurs approximately ninety-four times, corresponding to five roots in the MT: ḫṭ(15x: e.g., Num 32:14), ḥnp (lx: Prov 11:9), ḥrš (1x: Ps 128:3), rʾ (lx: Prov 12:13) and ršʾ (74x: e.g., 2 Chron 19:2). In the Aramaic Targums* there is evidence that a broader term, ḫwbʾ, meaning "debtor" or "sinner," is the natural counterpart of hamartōlos in the LXX. In the Tg. Isa "debtors, sinners" are punished by Messiah (11:4) and destroyed by the Lord (14:4-5), but are also capable of repentance (28:24-25). hamartōlos corresponds most frequently in the LXX with the Hebrew rāšāʼ, "wicked one." Especially in the Psalms, rasaʼ is used in parallel with almost every Hebrew word for sin, evil and iniquity, and functions also as an adjective to designate the actions and conduct of a type of person (cf. Ps 10:4, 7; 36:1; 49:6,13; 50:16-17). The rāšāʼ, "wicked one," is usually placed in antithetic parallelism to the saddiq, "righteous one" (cf. Ps 1:6). This is the common meaning of the term in the early writings within Judaism* as well (e.g., Sir, I Enoch [G²] 22:10-14).

The word sinner also occurs in what we may call factional contexts to designate those who are outside the boundary of the group who use the term. In these cases wickedness, by definition, is conduct outside the boundary, conduct which is unacceptable to those inside. Sinner could thereby be used more or less as a synonym for Gentile (Ps 9:17; Tob 13:8; Jub. 23:23-24). But as Judaism developed, those boundaries could also be drawn within the people of Israel* as well, with "sinner" used to designate those for whom a particular faction showed disapproval. Thus "sinners" could be apostate Jews (1 Macc 1:34; 2:44, 48), Jews who wrongly reckoned the months and the feasts* and the years (I Enoch 82:4-7), Jews who did not hold to the sectarian interpretation of the Qumran community (CD 4:8; 1QS 5:7-11; 1QH 7:12; Dead Sea Scrolls), Jewish opponents of the "devout" (Pss. Sol. 1:8; 2:3; 7:2; 8:12-13; 17:5-8; 23) or Jews with different interpretations of ritual purity requirements (As. Mos. 7:3,9-10; see see Clean and Unclean).

2. Usage in the Gospels.

Hamartōlos occurs forty-seven times in the NT; thirty-three times in the Gospels; never in Acts; fourteen times in the episodes; and never in Revelation. Although the term occurs thirty-three times in the Gospels, those occurrences are clustered in thirteen pericopes, ten of which have the substantive form and three of which have the adjectival form. For the most part the term appears to be enmeshed in traditional materials which the Evangelists have adopted. Of the thirteen Gospel accounts in which the term occurs, one appears in all three Synoptic Gospels (set Synoptic Problem), a so-called triple tradition (the table-fellowship* dispute: Mt 9:10; 11, 13 par. Mk 2:15, 16 [twice] and Lk 5:30, 32), one is shared between Mark and Matthew (the arrest in the Garden: Mt 26:45 par. Mk 14:41) and one is a passage shared between Matthew and Luke, being thereby designated as Q* material (the contrast between John the Baptist and Jesus: Mtl 1:19 par. Lk 7:34).

Matthew refers to "sinners" on only three occasions: the triple tradition (Mt 9:10,11,13 par. Mk 2:15, 16 [twice] and Lk 5:30, 32), the passage shared with Mark (Mt 26:45 par. Mk 14:41) and the passage shared with Luke/Q (Mt 11:19 par. Lk 7:34). Similarly, Mark refers to sinners on only three occasions: the triple tradition (Mk 2:15, 16 [twice] par. Mt 9:10; 11, 13 and Lk 5:30, 32), the passage shared with Matthew (Mk 14:41 par. Mt 26:45) and one triple-tradition incident in which only Mark uses the adjectival form of term ("this sinful generation": Mk 8:38 par. Mt 16:26-27 and Lk 9:26). John does not share with the Synoptics any references to sinners, and he refers to sinners in only one pericope (the healed blind man interacts with the Pharisees*: Jn 9:16,24, 25, 31).

Luke has the most extensive references to "sinners." He refers to them on ten occasions: the triple tradition (Lk 5:30, 32 par. Mk 2:15, 16 [twice] and Mt 9:10, 11, 13), the passage shared with Matthew/Q (Lk 7:34 par. Mt 11:19) and eight incidents found only in Luke. Of those eight, one incident is triple-tradition material in which only Luke has included the term (the angels' testimony, Lk 24:7), and two incidents have material similar to Matthew (not Q material), but only Luke uses the term (love of one's enemies, Lk 6:32, 33, 34 [2x]; parables* about the lost ones, Lk 15:7,10). In five of the eight incidents the term occurs in material unique to Luke's Gospel (Peter's confession, Lk 5:8; Simon the Pharisee and the woman* called a "sinner," Lk 7:37, 39; Galilean martyrs, Lk 13:2; parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector, Lk 18:13; Zacchaeus' calling, Lk 19:7; see Taxes).

3. Jesus and Sinners.

One of the most distinctive features of Jesus' message and ministry is the promise of salvation to sinners. Not only is there much material which includes that message, but it is found in diverse forms—ranging from sayings and parables to reports of Jesus' activity and accusations against him. Jesus is said to have associated with sinners (Mk 2:15,16 par.) and to have sought out the sinner as one who was lost (e.g., Lk 15:7, 10). Jesus flady declares that one aspect of his ministry was "not to call the righteous, but sinners" (Mk 2:17 par.). One encounters no difficulty understanding the general use of "sinner" in the Gospels to designate the person who commits acts of sin defined by Law,* as is likely the case of the sinful woman in Lk 7:36-50. But in the Gospel accounts the term "sinner" also designates a narrow segment of the people. A well known combination, "tax collectors and sinners," appears to specify an identifiable segment of the people called "sinners" as being linked with "tax collectors" (Mt 9:10,11, 13 par.; Mt 11:19 par.; Lk 15:7). On several occasions the Pharisees are placed in contrast with "sinners," apparently an identifiable segment of the people held up for special criticism by the Pharisees (cf. Mt 9:10, 11, 13 par.; Lk 7:37,39; 15:1,2; 18:13; Jn 9:16,24,25). Recent scholarly investigation has attempted to identify the segment of people called "sinners."

3.1. Sinners Are Those Who Do Not Observe Sectarian Rituals. J. Jeremias is representative of a widely held interpretation which identifies the sinners as the common people, the 'ammê hā'āreṣ, who are disapproved by the Pharisees (see Rich and Poor). This interpretation suggests that the people known as "sinners" are viewed from a double perspective in the Gospels. From the perspective of Jesus' opponents the term sinner was coined to express contempt for Jesus' following. Jesus' opponents were primarily Pharisees, whom Jeremias makes virtually co-extensive with the ḥaḇerîm, the brotherhood which insisted on ritual purity for table fellowship. They considered Jesus' following to consist primarily of the disreputable, the 'ammê hā'āreṣ, the uneducated, whose religious ignorance and moral behavior stood in the way of their access to salvation. Other derogatory names used by these opponents to refer to Jesus' followers included: "the little ones" (e.g., Mk 9:42); "the simple ones"; "babes" (e.g., Mt 11:25).

Hence, sinners are those who have offended the exclusivism of the Pharisees' purity laws (especially table fellowship) and/or their rigorous observance of the Law. Although from the perspective of Jesus' opponents the followers of Jesus are called sinners, from Jesus' perspective they are called "the poor" or "those who labor and are heavy laden" (e.g., Mt 11:5, 28)—those disenfranchised from the religious, social and political life of Israel.

3.2. Sinners Are Those Wicked Ones Who Are Outside the Law. E. P. Sanders is representative of a challenge to Jeremias' view. Sanders argues that the OT equivalent for hamartdloi is r'sa'im (or the Aramaic equivalent), and that it is virtually a technical term. He suggests that it is best translated "the wicked," and it refers to those who sinned willfully and heinously and did not repent. When placed with "tax collectors," the two names stand for "traitors": the tax collectors are those who collaborated with Rome, and the sinners are the wicked who betrayed the God who redeemed Israel and gave them his Law.
Sanders further argues that the Pharisees were not primarily a table-fellowship group who were offended by Jesus' offering salvation to those outside their fellowship. Rather, they were a party devoted to the Torah in its oral explication. The sinners were not simply impure common people (‘ammê hā'āres) but the wicked who were offered inclusion in Jesus' company without being required to undergo the normal repentance required by the Law. Jesus allowed them to become his followers and remain "wicked ones." This put Jesus into conflict with all of the leaders of Israel, who focused on the Law as the center of religious and social life.

The strength of Sanders's argument is that it replaces a simplistic caricature of Judaism. Jeremias' view paints the Pharisees as hopelessly formalistic, to the degree that they were so incensed at Jesus' offer of salvation to the common people that they were willing to put him to death (see Trial of Jesus). But Sanders's alternative, that Jesus offered sinners salvation without any thought of them changing their behavior, is not true to the Gospel portrait of Jesus.

3.3. Sinners Are Those Opposed to God's Will. A number of passages in the Gospels indicate a broad use of the term sinner to indicate a person opposed to the will of God. An important perspective is found in Mark 14:41 par. Matthew 26:45, where Jesus, announcing his impending arrest, says "the Son of Man* is betrayed into the hands of sinners." This is ultimately directed at the chief priests* and scribes* and elders* who had arranged the arrest (Mk 14:43 par. Mt 26:47). What makes the leaders of Israel sinners is that they are opposing the will of God as worked out in Jesus' ministry. Luke's story of the angels* at the tomb echoes these words with the adjectival use of hamartōlos (Lk 24:7).

In Mark 8:38 Jesus' words about "this adulterous and sinful generation" are not addressed to any particular segment of the people, but to the people of Israel as a whole who have rejected him. In Luke 5:8 Simon Peter's reaction to Jesus' miraculous catch of fish is to confess that he is a sinful man. His confession comes in the presence of one whom he calls "Lord,"* indicating, at least, that Peter recognizes his own humility in the presence of the activity of God in Jesus.

Luke 13:1-2 tells the story of Galilean pilgrims put to death by Pilate while in Jerusalem to make sacrifices in the Temple. Jesus, using the term sinner, counters the common Jewish belief that calamity in life was the result of past sin. This is a general sense of the term sinner, since the expectation is that the judgment would ultimately have been from God and, hence, punishment for a sin against God. This is especially borne out in verse 4, where the parallel term is opheiletai, used in the sense of a debtor or sinner against God.

These Synoptic passages demonstrate a use of the term in non-factional contexts, and point to a broad use of the term to designate a person opposed to the will of God. This understanding of "sinner" is corroborated in the Fourth Gospel. In the story of the controversy with the Pharisees, the man who has been healed of blindness says, "We know that God does not listen to sinners, but if any one is a worshiper of God and does his will, God listens to him" (Jn 9:31). Here the implication is that the sinner is one who does not worship* God and does not do God's will. Although in the preceding context the Pharisees have emphasized Sabbath observance (Jn 9:16, 24, 25), the healed man implies a broader use of the term, not just specifying the unobservant person.

4. Conclusion.

The use of sinner in the LXX and early Jewish literature is helpful for understanding the divergent usage of the term in the Gospels. The common use of the term was to indicate a "wicked one," often placed in antithetic parallelism with the "righteous one." But the term was also used in factional contexts, both to speak of Gentiles outside the boundaries of Israel, and within the context of factional rivalry within Judaism. These two emphases accord with the use of sinner in the Gospels. There are a significant number of passages which have a broad use of sinner to designate "one opposed to the will of God." There are a number of other passages which are factionally oriented.

Jeremias focuses primarily on the group of passages which pit the Pharisees against the sinners. Despite Sanders's objections, the strength of Jeremias' argument is that it gives proper attention to the factional use of the term in Judaism. In a recent analysis, J. D. G. Dunn suggests that the Pharisees were a sect with dear ideas of the character of life and conduct required to maintain the covenant righteousness* of the people of God. As such they were highly likely to regard as sinners those who disagreed with them and who lived in open disregard of this righteousness—as had the groups behind the apocalyptic Enoch traditions, the Psalms of Solomon and the Dead Sea Scrolls. The Pharisees firmly believed in the authority of their developing oral traditions, and those who were opposed to their practices were considered to be opposed to God.
Sanders tends to rely most heavily on those passages which align the tax collectors with the sinners. He has criticized Jeremias for downplaying the strength of the term and for making it simply an equivalent term for non-Pharisees. The Pharisees were not as rigid on matters of purity as were the Essenes. They did not necessarily regard all non-Pharisees as sinners—perhaps only those who made light of Pharisaic concerns. Nevertheless, the more members of the Jewish community moved away from Pharisaic standards, the more likely the Pharisees would dub them sinners.

While Sanders goes too far in pressing the term always to mean blatant lawbreakers, when the Pharisees used the term sinners they meant one who was opposed to the will of God as reflected in their understanding of halakah, the rabbinic laws governing life. Behind the objections and charges leveled against Jesus was the central fact that he was ignoring and abolishing boundaries which more sectarian attitudes had erected within Israel. Hence, from the standpoint of Jesus' opponents a person was a sinner as long as he or she did not conform to the expectations of the sect. From the standpoint of Jesus, a person was a sinner as long as he or she remained opposed to the will of God. Once a person accepted the offer of forgiveness and made a commitment of faith* to follow Jesus, he or she became a disciple of Jesus. Jesus' offer of salvation to sinners apart from factional observance was a threat to the very foundation and way of life of sectarian Jews, yet it was at the heart of the gospel he came announcing.

SOCIOLGGICAL APPROACHES TO THE GOSPELS

Since 1970 the use of the social sciences has played an increasingly prominent role in Gospel studies. Early efforts concentrated on applying specific sociological theories to biblical studies, but more recent research has drawn from a wider range of social-scientific disciplines and sub-disciplines, including anthropology, peasant studies, political science, economics and Mediterranean sociology. Assessing this movement requires tracing its evolution and identifying its relationship to the disciplines of the historical-critical method before analyzing two pioneering works illustrating its use on a Gospel text and evaluating its contributions.

1. The History and Evolution of an Interdisciplinary Approach.

The origins of the current interest in applying the social sciences to biblical texts cannot be defined precisely, but it is possible to place the movement in some historical perspective. During the 1920s and 1930s the Chicago School, especially in the works of S.J. Case and S. Mathews, devoted its attention to the social setting of early Christianity and the "social mind" that formed theology. But the work of Case and Mathews was informed by a philosophical idealism that largely ignored the material conditions of life reflected in the texts. Being indebted to disciplines like the sociology of religion and the history of religions, it emphasized the functional aspect of religion and religious texts. Understanding the Gospels, therefore, mainly involved learning what needs they were intended to meet.

In spite of its achievements, the Chicago School did not set the agenda for future Gospel studies largely because the middle decades of the twentieth century were consumed by the debate between R Bultmann's existential reading of the NT and his neo-orthodox adversaries, typified by a figure like O. Cullmann, who argued for the salvation-history character of the documents. This meant that issues central to the social sciences, from the political and economic to the social, were relegated to the periphery on both sides of the discussion, while questions of human existence and salvation history occupied the center. The extent of the neglect can be gauged by scanning the twentieth-century quests for the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus). As little as they otherwise had in common, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, recounted by A. Schweitzer (1906, ET 1910), Bultmann's Jesus and the Word (ET 1926, ET 1934), and the new quest of the historical Jesus, conducted by such post-Bultmannians as E. Fuchs, G. Bornkamm, H. Conzelmann and J. M. Robinson, shared one conviction, namely that Jesus and the Gospels were unrelated to social, political or economic questions. A reading of Cullmann's Christ and Time (1946, ET 1950) or Salvation in History (1965, ET 1967) would yield a similar result for the other side of the debate.

Occasionally minority reports were registered in the form of specific issues or projects. During the 1960s, for instance, S. G. F. Brandon published Jesus and the Zealots (1967) and so initiated a debate about Jesus' relationship to the Zealots (and revolutionary movements in general; see Revolutionary Movements). O. Cullmann responded three years later with Jesus and the Revolutionaries (1970), and the debate widened as it continued. J. H. Yoder's The Politics of Jesus (1972), essentially a recap of A. Trocmé's Jesus and the Nonviolent Revolution (1961, ET 1973), argued that one could discern in the Lukan portrayal of Jesus' ministry both a coherent political strategy and "a messianic ethic."

During the late 1960s the Philadelphia Seminar on Christian Origins devoted its attention to a study of imperial Rome as the background for Christianity and published its results in a collection of essays edited by S. Benko and J. J. O'Rourke, The Catacombs and the Colosseum: The Roman Empire As the Setting of Primitive Christuinity (1971). Such projects continued a strand of scholarship that could claim antecedents like F. C. Grant, The Economic

By 1970 the debates spawned by form criticism* redaction criticism,* salvation history, existentialism and the quests were challenged from an unexpected quarter. The rise of Latin-American liberation theology (see Liberation Hermeneutics) placed social analysis at the heart of the theological task, a synthesis clearly found in G. Gutierrez, A Theology of Liberation (1972) and developed in subsequent works by J. So-brino, Christology at the Crossroads (1978), L Boff, Jesus Christ Liberator (1978) and J. L Segundo, The Historical Jesus of the Synoptics (1985). The efforts of these liberation theologians to integrate discussions of Jesus and the Gospels into their work, however, exposed a deficiency. Although they had developed an adequate methodological basis for their theological reflection and its relationship to the social sciences, they were handicapped when discussing Jesus or the Gospels because they were forced to use forms of biblical scholarship essentially unrelated to their project. This created a dilemma. Either they could use biblical materials in a pre-critical way (speaking of the "Galilean crisis" in Jesus' ministry, for example) or they could try to integrate historical-critical scholarship, usually in a Bultmannian vein, into their endeavors. In either case, the results were unsatisfactory. Eventually Segundo turned his attention to the problem of Jesus and the Gospels in an attempt to rectify the shortcoming. But the emergence of Latin American theology had revealed the basic failure of biblical scholarship to incorporate social analysis into its horizon of possibilities.

In 1973 a study group sponsored jointly by the American Academy of Religion (AAR) and the Society of Biblical Literature (SBL) was convened to explore "The Social World of Early Christianity." J. Z. Smith outlined the four tasks facing the group: (1) "a description of social facts given in early Christian materials"; (2) "the achievement of a genuine social history of early Christianity"; (3) determining "the social organization of early Christianity," especially the social forces that gave rise to its institutions; and (4) defining the social world created by the early Christians, their symbolic universe and plausibility structure (Smith). Of these four tasks the first three are essentially descriptive or reconstructive while the fourth is analytical and requires the use of models.

As its first project, the group attempted a description of the social world of early Christianity in Antioch-on-the-Orontes from its beginnings to the fourth century and published the results of its work in 1978 (W. A. Meeks and R L Wilken, Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries of the Common Era). As both its research agenda and initial project indicated, the pursuits of this group were essentially descriptive and data gathering in nature. Although the group did not produce another Chicago School, it did encourage a continuing discussion of issues related to the social world of the early church. Characteristic examples of the work produced by scholars following the methods of social description are: H. C. Kee, Miracle in the Early Christian World: A Study in Socio-Historical Method (1983) and J. Stambaugh and D. Balch, The New Testament in Its Social Environment (1986).

In 1980 members of the Catholic Biblical Association (CBA) formed a working group to investigate the social sciences and biblical interpretation. This group concentrated its attention on the use of crosscultural models derived from anthropology. The consistent procedure of the CBA group, and the similar SBL section that was formed in 1983, was to select anthropological models and apply them either to NT texts or to social and cultural realities found in them. Each year the group identified a specific focus (the notion of limited good, honor and shame, or the Mediterranean personality, for instance) and used selected readings from anthropology as a lens through which to read NT texts. Characteristic of the work produced by this group are: B. Malina, The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology (1981) and Christian Origins and Cultural Anthropology (1986); and J. H. Elliott, ed., Semeia 35: Social-Scientific Criticism of the New Testament and Its Social World (1986).

2. Relationship to the Historical-Critical Method.

It could be argued that the body of scholarship concerned with the social sciences emerged to address a task identified but neglected by early proponents of the historical-critical method. Form critics had proposed the need to place each Gospel pericope (unit of tradition) in its life setting. Although that job would appear to require the use of the social sciences, form critics did not employ them. Rather, following a history of religions approach, they tended to locate texts in the life and cult of the church (its preaching and worship) or define their use in terms of the needs of the nascent church for apologia and self-definition. Attempts to contextualize sayings or narratives in this way did not ask how the texts reflected the social and cultural or political and economic systems of the Mediterranean world.

Nor did the situation change substantially when, in the mid-1950s, form criticism yielded to redaction criticism which tried to deduce the theology of the Evangelists by observing the way in which they either worked with traditional materials or created their own. Interest in the Gospels was confined to understanding how their theology was relevant for the issues facing the Gospel writer and his community. In this procedure the search for the life setting of the oral forms behind the Gospel text was replaced by a search for the life setting of the Evangelist, and efforts to determine the nature of the communities to which the Evangelists were writing were generally conducted without reference to the social sciences or the kinds of information they could provide. Community conflict tended to be seen as a function of ideological differences. Yet, like their form-critical predecessors, redaction critics were raising issues their methods were not equipped to answer. Whether seeking a life setting behind the text or of the text required forms of knowledge beyond the horizon of historical-critical inquiry.

Form criticism dominated NT studies roughly from 1920 to 1955, and redaction criticism from about 1955 to 1975. It was during the ferment of the 1970s that social-scientific criticism of the Gospels emerged to address some of the issues overlooked by both form criticism and redaction criticism as well as to open up new areas of scholarly inquiry.

3. An Analysis of Two Pioneering Works.

By any account J. Gager's Kingdom and Community (1975) and G. Theissen's Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (ET 1978, but based on essays written as early as 1974) were two of the more important early attempts to employ sociology. Equally important for this review is the fact that they combine all four of the programmatic elements described in J. Z. Smith's working paper but in different ways and with varying emphases.

Gager's work was inspired by his discovery that the scholarly methods used to study other religions had not been applied to the study of early Christianity. Accordingly, in an effort to understand the rise of earliest Christianity, Gager drew on two works devoted to the study of millenarian cults, P. Worsley's The Trumpet Shall Sound (1968) and K. Burridge's New Heaven, New Earth (1969).
Burridge traces the evolution of millenarian movements through three stages: alienation (old rules); crystallization (no rules); and reintegration (new rules). Social alienation provides the environment in which "premillenial murmurings" begin, usually among the disinherit and politically marginalized. But prepolitical unrest would never crystallize into a movement without the figure of the millenarian prophet who gives voice to the voiceless and interprets their situation in a way they find compelling. This charismatic figure shapes the free-floating disgruntement into a movement promising social and moral transformation of the world order. During this phase, which Burridge calls "no rules," the movement may develop ideal communal mores, such as abolishing the distinction between the sexes and kinship obligations. In The Ritual Process (1969), V. Turner described this phase as the time of liminal-ity when all members of the group experience social unity (communitas). However, since such movements are inherently unstable and short lived, they eventually settle down into reformist movements after forging an uncertain truce with the corrupt world that gave them birth.

Using this theoretical framework, Gager interprets the early church as a millenarian cult that arose out of the widespread social and political alienation of the Roman world. Jesus functioned as the prophet of the movement around whose promises the early church formed its vision of a new heaven and new earth. The failure of the Parousia led to the inevitable adjustment and reintegration of the millennial cult into the social structure of the Roman Empire.

But prior to its reintegration the cult passed through a severe internal crisis when the expected Parousia did not occur. To interpret this critical period in the life of the early church, Gager turns to the work of L. Festinger, especially his study of a modern group that predicted the end of the world, When Prophecy Fails (1956). Festinger found that the group he studied was not at all disheartened by the failure of its prediction. It did, however, respond to the "cognitive dissonance" created by falsification of its prediction by renewing its efforts at proselytizing. Its renewed missionary activity, he conjectured, attempted to minimize the group's cognitive dissonance by recruiting new members. Their influx would reinforce the group's identity and sense of being right even though its prediction had failed to materialize.

Once again, Gager applies the theoretical framework to interpret the relationship between the delay of the Parousia and the beginning of the church's missionary activity. The cognitive dissonance created by Jesus' death was intensified by the delay of the expected Parousia. In response to the felt crisis, the early church initiated its missionary movement into the Roman world.

The aim and scope of Theissen's work was quite different. He focussed on delineating the sociology of the early Jesus movement in Palestine whose ethos was embodied by wandering charismatics. Like their Cynic counterparts, these figures travelled as mendicants, without home or family ties or claims to protection. They were supported by a network of local sympathizers who provided them with food and shelter in exchange for protection from the coming judgment. When correlated with the Son of man (see Son of Man) statements, the sayings of the wandering charismatics reveal congruence, thereby placing the itinerant figures in the same situation as the "bearer of revelation," the risen Son of man.

The issues so prominent in the sayings of Jesus preserved by the wandering preachers (homelessness, lack of family* ties, lack of possessions and lack of protection, in essence the so-called hard sayings of Jesus) indicate sources of social and political alienation in Palestine. These conditions influenced the form and ideology of the Jesus movement which was "to renew this society from within ... [by] experimenting with a vision of love and reconciliation." In turn the Jesus movement effected its society by compensating for aggression (e.g., the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount forgiving another seventy times seven; see Sermon on the Mount), transferring aggression (visualized judgment exorcisms), and internalizing or introjecting aggression (call for repentance).

The function of the Jesus movement was to relieve the pressure caused by the oppressive social and exploitative economic situation. It was a renewal movement whose volatile origins were transmuted into a socially useful purpose.

In apparent contrast to Gager, Theissen seemingly began with a social description of Palestine, sketching its economic, ecological, political and cultural conditions, before reconstructing the role of the Jesus movement and its itinerant charismatics in that environment. How did they constitute a response to the social forces at work in Palestine? What organizations were required to sustain their lifestyle? What effect did they have on the institutional structures of their world? However, when Theissen comes to evaluate the role of the Jesus movement in the violent and oppressive world of Palestine, he interprets it very much like Gager interpreted the role of a millenarian movement. The reason is rather clear. Both figures worked out of a larger shared sociological framework which emphasized the structural-functional role of renewal movements as contributors to a stable public order. Their value was assessed in terms of how they were able to reduce social tensions and thereby preserve the pre-existing social order. So, in spite of their divergent methods and scope, they reached similar conclusions.

Like all pioneering efforts, their work reveals hidden contradictions and unexamined assumptions that others would disclose and discuss, but it also proved to be fruitful for generating subsequent discussion. In this sense the works of Gager and Theissen served a useful purpose.

4. Social-Scientific Criticism in Use.

Perhaps the most effective way to evaluate approaches to the Gospels using the social sciences is to compare their results with those gained through other methods. The test case chosen for this article is the interpretation of the Markan version of the so-called cleansing of the Temple (Mk 11:15-19; see Temple Cleansing).

Form-critical interpretation has tried to establish the original episode/oral pericope before it was redacted by Mark or pre-Markan redactors, and in this case some consensus exists that Mark 11:15b, 17 form such a core. Of course, detaching the pericope from Mark's narrative also detaches the event from the Markan chronology and raises questions about when it occurred in the context of Jesus' ministry. Although Mark has framed the incident by placing it late in Jesus' ministry, V. Taylor (The Gospel according to St. Mark, 2d ed., 1966) believed that it occurred much earlier and reflected Jesus' "reforming zeal." To Taylor, Jesus was expressing his opposition to conducting trade in the Temple* precincts. His action was "a spirited protest" against the fleecing of pilgrims by unscrupulous businessmen.

Other scholars searching for a pre-Markan meaning add Mark 11:16 to the core because they read it as an act of hope and judgment* Jesus was trying to restore the Temple to its proper role, "the house of God" it was supposed to be in the last days. If this were his intent, then Jesus resembled the sectarians at Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls) in his attitude toward the Temple; he did not repudiate the Temple but judged it defiled and in need of purification. In this case Mark 11:16 expresses Jesus' desire that no unconsecrated vessels be brought to the Temple for cultic use or even carried through the outer court of the Temple by thoughtless Jerusalemites taking a short cut through its precincts. In a variation of this position R H. Lightfoot (The Gospel Message of St. Mark, 1950) argued that the cleansing was an attempt to reclaim the outer courtyard for pious Gentiles* so they could pray in peace undisturbed by the clamor of commercial transactions. Jesus saw the buying and selling as infringing on the "rights and privileges" of the Gentiles. This is why the cleansing was limited to the so-called Court of the Gentiles. By avoiding the inner courts of the Temple, Jesus signalled his approval of the sacrificial system.

Redaction critics focus on the setting of the passage in Mark as well as on the additions to the original core of the pericope. Using this approach, E. Schweizer (The Good News according to Mark, 1970) thinks that Mark 11:16 came from the hand of a pre-Markan redactor concerned to make the incident appear like an attempt at reform. But as the Markan framing of the episode makes clear (cf. Mk 11:12-14, 20-26), the withered fig tree is a symbolic counterpart of the Temple. In Mark's Gospel Jesus was performing a symbolic destruction of the Temple. But why? Because, argues Schweizer, it was an institution restricted exclusively to Jews, and Jesus' mission was to all peoples. So the Temple episode reflects an intimation of the Gentile mission.

Kelber (The Kingdom in Mark: A New Place and A New Time, 1973) also finds the same message. Jesus' initial scrutiny of the Temple (Mk 11:11, the verb periblep-samenos) communicates disapproval, and Mark 11:16 indicates that Jesus interfered with the transport of cultic vessels. So his protest is aimed at the whole Temple system, commercial and cultic. The withered fig tree "strikes at the eschatological prestige" of the Temple. The eschatological crisis (see Eschatology) brought by Jesus takes precedence over the Temple and relativizes its value. These readings then arrive at a conclusion strikingly different from the inferences derived from form-critical readings of the text.

Yet after the differences have been noted, one notable similarity exists. Both form critics and redaction critics view the conflict as essentially religious or symbolizing the conflict between religion and commerce. This consensus is not shared by critics using the social sciences, who specify the conflict more in political and economic terms. C. Myers interprets the entry episodes (into Jerusalem and into the Temple) as launching "the second direct action campaign" of Jesus' ministry, whose purpose is to force a showdown with the Jerusalem elites. The entry into Jerusalem and the Temple can be seen as "political street theatre." The Temple cleansing refers back to the strong man parable* (3:27) as the use of skeuos (translated "goods" in 3:37 and "vessels" in 11:16) in each passage suggests. But for Myers the Temple is primarily an economic institution, the center of ruling-class interests in Jerusalem. The money changers are simply the street-level representatives of the Temple's banking interests, and the dove sellers dispense the basic commodity used by the poor (see Rich and Poor) to participate in the Temple system of sacrifices and purity (see Clean and Unclean) requirements, both of which Jesus has repudiated. By singling out these two groups, Jesus has assaulted the visible representatives of oppression "within a political economy that doubly exploited the poor." In agreement with Myers, Belo noted the use of the verb ekballein (to drive out) to describe Jesus' actions. Prior to this episode it had been used to describe the expulsion of demons (see Demon, Devil, Satan). Its use in this context, Belo argues, equates the monetary system of the Temple and its functionaries with the demonic.

H. Waetjen, who basically shares Myers' view, argues that Jesus intends to shut down the Temple, which is nothing less than the center of power regulating the economic, political and social life of the people. Through its demand for tithes, the Temple participated in a tributary mode of production that oppressed peasants while maintaining its own power and prestige. At the same time, the Temple propagated and legitimized the dehumanizing purity/pollution system which rendered the people of the land (the 'am ha ares) unclean and degraded.

The differences between the social-scientific interpreters and their historical-critical counterparts are obvious, and they reflect the consequences of methodological choices as well as ideological investments. The nature of the Temple is clearly an important issue. So is the intent, character and scope of Jesus' actions. Is he a reformer, a prophetic critic or a destroyer? Why is he perceived to be fulfilling the role assigned to him by various interpreters?

5. Evaluation.

The use of methods and models derived from the social sciences and their application to Jesus and the Gospels have not been without their critics. Generally speaking, this approach remains subject to the withering criticisms levelled against a "bankrupt" historical-critical method by W. Wink (The Bible in Human Transformation, 1973). Taking stock of the assets and liabilities of "the biblical critical paradigm," Wink listed five deficits: (1) the method was incommensurate with the intention of the texts; (2) it reflected the "ideology of objectivism" and (3) it "fell prey" to a technologism that limited the kinds of questions asked of a text to those which its method could answer; (4) it removed itself from the community of faith for whom its results were intended and, finally, (5) it failed to change with a changing historical context so that its polemical origins became increasingly anachronistic. Wink's bill of particulars could equally well be applied to forms of social-scientific criticism. In fact the specific concerns noted below repeat them in varied ways.

Other criticisms and questions relate more specifically to the distinctive approaches used by the social sciences. The first concerns the models used. How can models created by moderns interpret an ancient culture? The danger of anachronism is always present. A related issue is transferability. How transferable—not just from the present to the past but from culture to culture—are models developed by anthropologists or sociologists? A second concerns the incommensurability of the methods and the texts. The biblical texts were not written to yield the kind of information sought by the social sciences. How can social-scientific models extract knowledge not within the purview of the biblical writer?

A third criticism concerns reductionism. Some think that the social sciences tend to reduce all theology to sociology or anthropology in disguise. Social forces either determine or cause specific theologies to arise. The accusation of reductionism was filed against N. Gottwald (The Tribes of Yahweh: A Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel, 1979); once he had explored the sociology of Israel's religion, he had defined a sufficient cause for its emergence. Such an approach may ignore or minimize the truth claims of theological statements or religious expressions.

Finally, while objectivity may be desirable, it also distances the interpreter from the text and renders it a subject for investigation but not a Scripture that scrutinizes and searches the interpreter.

While acknowledging the validity of many of these criticisms, other considerations must also be kept in mind. While models run the risk of introducing anachronism, they also supply controls to a study. The more self-conscious scholars are about research models and methods, the more completely they can define the limits of an investigation and avoid making extravagant claims for its results or implications. The alternative is to use implicit methods and models (for all interpreters operate with some methods and models) drawn from one's current culture and unconsciously impose them on the ancient texts. This procedure effectively muzzles the ancient texts although it gives the appearance of showing their relevance because they speak to the contemporary situation. The strangeness of the Gospels as first-century documents is lost. The concern that modern methods and models may not apply to ancient texts is, therefore, somewhat misleading since every modern interpreter uses contemporary models to understand the ancient texts. The question is how self-conscious the interpreter is about the models and methods being employed.

The related question of incommensurability between texts and models does suggest the need for prudence. But candor requires the acknowledgment that all theological, ecclesial and scholarly inquiries confront the same issue. If the use of the social sciences highlights the importance of this issue for all academic study of the Gospels, it will have served an invaluable purpose.

Reductionism is indeed a danger of any form of biblical criticism, and no less so for those forms using the social sciences. But the social sciences can also be seen as restoring perspective to the development of the early church and the formation of Scripture. As G. Casalis noted, "correct ideas don't fall from the skies," and the capacity to understand the human and social dimensions of these developments can reduce the mystification that all too often reinforces unwarranted claims and authoritarian appeals. Put in another but related perspective, the use of the social sciences can contribute to our understanding of the inspiration of Scripture. Any view of the inspiration of Scripture must respect the way God chose to give Scripture to the church, and for whatever reasons, God chose to provide Scriptures that are simultaneously ancient documents (e.g., first-century Gospels) and contemporary "Word of God." Therefore, any path of interpreting the Scripture must pass through the ancient world to speak to the modern world. The social sciences provide many useful tools (though not the only ones) for conducting that difficult task precisely because they can elucidate that first-century Mediterranean world.

Gaining perspective on the ancient world is not the same thing as being objective, and the social sciences can deliver objectivity no more than any other method, particularly for those who study the Gospels as documents of faith. But any method that makes one aware of the relativity of one's own culture and, therefore, of the need to use crosscultural models as part of the study of the Gospels has made a significant contribution.

SON OF DAVID

When used as a christological tide, Son of David points to Jesus as the royal Messiah (see Christ) in the line of David. As such he fulfills the promises God* made to David regarding the eternal reign of David's "offspring" (e.g., 2 Sam 7:12-16), and he acts as the unique agent in bringing the rule of God (see Kingdom of God) to the earth, a rule that is characterized by salvation* and blessing.* In contrast to major streams of popular messianic expectation, Jesus refused to establish his kingly rule through political ascendancy or military conquest (see Revolutionary Movements). Rather, this Davidic king wielded his royal power by attending to the needs of the poor and oppressed, and by suffering and dying in order to bring salvation to his people.

In comparison with christological tides such as Son of God* and Son of Man,* Son of David plays a relatively minor role in the NT. It seems to be used always with reference to Jesus' earthly existence, never of his heavenly or exalted state. Moreover, it appears in just eleven passages, all of them within the Synoptic Gospels. Nevertheless, the idea of Davidic sonship is often present even when the phrase itself does not occur, as when Jesus is described as "King." The concept of Son of David contributed to the early development of the church's christology, and within the Synoptic tradition it provided specific content for the more general christological categories of Christ and Son of God.

1. The OT and Judaic Background.

The expectation of a Davidic Messiah had its beginnings during the Exile, for central to the notion of such a Messiah is the re-establishment of the throne of David and the deliverance of Israel from its (foreign) oppressors. This expectation resulted from a combination of disappointment and confidence: Disappointment at the destruction of Jerusalem and the suspension of the Davidic dynasty, and confidence in the faithfulness of God who had made an everlasting covenant with David to establish David's kingdom forever through his offspring (2 Sam 7:10-16; cf. Ps 89:1-4, 19-37; 132:11-12). Prophets such as Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Haggai and Zechariah spoke of the Davidic "righteous Branch" who would soon appear to reconcile the people to their God, re-establish Israel in the land, cleanse the land of foreign oppressors as well as unrighteous Israelites, and cause peoples from all over the earth to flock to Jerusalem where they would behold the glory of Yahweh (Jer 23:5-8; 30:21-22; Ezek 37:21-23; Zech 3:8-10; 6:12-15; Hag 2:21-22). These prophets thought of an entirely earthly figure, a mortal man, who would inaugurate a dynasty which would continue forever through his descendants (Ps 89:3-4; Jer 17:25; 33:15-18).

Although there was much diversity in messianic speculation among individual Jewish groups, a general consensus emerged within later Judaism* that the Messiah would be Davidic along the lines set out by the exilic prophets. A representative statement of Jewish messianic expectations is Psalms of Solomon 17—18 (a Pharisaic composition written around 50 B.C.). According to this description the "Son of David" (the title appears here for the first time) will (1) violently cast out the foreign nations occupying Jerusalem (17:15, 24-25, 33); (2) judge all the nations of the earth (17:4, 31, 38-39, 47) and cause these nations to "serve him under his yoke" (17:32); (3) reign over Israel in wisdom* (17:23, 31, 42) and righteousness* (17:23, 28, 31, 35, 41; 18:8), which involves removing all foreigners from the land (17:31) and purging the land of unrighteous Israelites (17:29, 33,41) in order to eliminate all oppression (17:46) and gather to himself a holy people (17:28, 36; 18:9).

Although the Davidic Messiah is still pictured as an earthly figure, his rule obviously takes on eschatological and universal dimensions not found in the prophets. Essentially the same description of the Davidic Messiah appears at Qumran (1QM 11:1-18; 4QFlor 1:11-14; 4QPBless 1-7; 4QTestim 9-13; see Dead Sea Scrolls) and in the Pseudepigrapha (4 Ezra 12:31-32; T.Jud. 24:1-5).

2. The Son of David and the Historical Jesus.

The Gospels reveal that Davidic expectations along the lines of Psalms of Solomon were very much alive in Jesus' milieu. Jesus was executed on the charge that he claimed to be the king of the Jews (or of Israel; see Death of Jesus), thus inciting political and military rebellion against Rome (Mk 15:2,26; cf. 10:46-11:10). The request from James and John for seats on the right and left of Jesus suggest that the disciples viewed Jesus' kingdom in terms of political authority* and social supremacy (Mk 10:35-45). Moreover, the question posed by the disciples* in Acts 1:6 indicates a nationalistic understanding of the kingdom. Jesus himself was aware of the popular expectations surrounding the Davidic Messiah and seems to have struggled with them (Mk 8:32-33; Mt 4:1-11; 27:32-44; Jn 6:15).

On only one occasion did Jesus specifically raise the issue of Davidic sonship: Mark 12:35-37 and its parallels. There is general scholarly consensus that Jesus did not wish, in this passage, to deny the Davidic sonship of the Messiah. Certainly the Evangelists who included this pericope in their Gospels did not understand it in that sense. Rather, Jesus engaged here in the rabbinic form of argument known as haggadah, according to which an apparent contradiction between two passages is presented and discussed in such a way that the truth of each is affirmed. Here Jesus (implicidy) sets all those passages which teach the Davidic sonship of the Messiah over against Psalm 110:1, which on the surface seems to contradict this teaching. In this way Jesus indicated that (1) the Messiah is the Son of David and (2) the Messiah is a transcendent being, whose glory* and authority far surpass that of David. "Son of David," therefore, is an accurate but not fully adequate description of the Messiah.

Although Jesus accepted the Davidic sonship of the Messiah, he rejected the nationalistic and militaristic conceptions of the Son of David which were so much a part of Jewish expectations. As far as Jesus was concerned, the kingdom does not come by violence (Mt 11:12), nor is it characterized by oppressive, authoritarian rule (Mk 10:42-44). On the contrary, Jesus as Son of David is presented as he who acted mercifully to blind Bartimaeus (Mk 10:46-52). He seems to have viewed himself as one who dies on behalf of his people (Mk 8:31; 9:30-31; 10:32-34; 15:1-32; see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection), and indeed on behalf of all peoples ("the many," Mk 10:45; see Ransom Saying). Those who participate in his kingdom follow him in the way of submission and sacrificial service* (Mk 8:34-38).

This new understanding of the Son of David explains the reticence of Jesus concerning his Messianic and Davidic status. At no time did he claim to be the Son of David. As Cullmann points out, even Jesus' answer to the question Pontius Pilate* put to him regarding his kingship was, in the Aramaic original, equivocal and ambiguous (Mk 15:2; see Trial of Jesus). The most natural interpretation of Jesus' reserve on this point is that he wished to avoid any tendency on the part of the people to view him as a nationalistic and military leader (Lk 22:47-53; Jn 6:15; 18:33-38).

3. The Son of David in the chistology of the Gospels.

Matthew gives greater prominence to "Son of David" than do the other Gospel writers. The tide appears four times each in Mark and Luke, but ten times in Matthew. The phrase does not occur at all in the Fourth Gospel (but cf. Jn 7:42).

3.1. Mark. The reader is introduced to Jesus as Son of David in the story of Bartimaeus (10:46-52). Twice this blind beggar cries out, "Son of David, have mercy upon me" (w. 47-48); and in response to his pleas Jesus heals him (v. 52). The fact that Jesus fulfills Bartimaeus' request to the letter suggests that the Markan Jesus accepts this tide. This story indicates that (1) Jesus is in the lineage of David; (2) he fulfills Jewish expectations that the Son of David would bring wholeness to the oppressed; and (3) he wields his royal power by humbly submitting to those in need rather than by "exercising authority," like the rulers of the Gentiles* (10:35-45).

Mark employs the healing of Bartimaeus as an introduction to the triumphal entry (11:1-11; cf. 10:52). As such, Jesus enters Jerusalem as the Son of David. By presenting Jesus as one who enters upon his kingship riding a colt (Zech 9:9; cf. 2 Kings 9:13; see Triumphal Entry), Mark indicates that Jesus is the type of Davidic king described by Zechariah: a humble savior who brings peace* and blessing to the nations. Although the people properly hail Jesus as the Davidic prince who brings God's kingdom of salvation to them (11:9-10), subsequent events indicate that the people have an entirely different understanding of this kingdom and of the Son of David who introduces this kingdom than does Jesus. In the passion narrative (see Passion Narrative) the crowds reject Jesus' conception of a suffering and dying king who saves others by refusing to save himself (15:6-15, 25-39).

This section of Mark comes to a climax in the question regarding "David's son" (Mk 12:35-37). Mark has indicated that Jesus is the Son of David. Now he suggests that Jesus is much more than Son of David. Given Mark's accent on Jesus as Son of God (1:1,11; 9:7; 15:39), he is probably contending here that Jesus should be viewed primarily as Son of God, and in only an ancillary way as Son of David. Mark employs "Son of David" in such a way that it might contribute its own specific content to the broader conception of Jesus' divine sonship, a christological category which (in Mark) emphasizes the suffering and death of Jesus.

3.2. Matthew. Matthew has appropriated the four references to Son of David which he found in his Markan source, and he has introduced an additional six, presumably from his own hand. An examination of Matthew's use of this tide indicates that he employs it with deliberation and consistency.

For Matthew, Jesus can function as Son of David because he is of the lineage of David (1:1-17; see Genealogy). But Matthew immediately encounters a problem with this assertion; for he attempts to trace Jesus' Davidic ancestry through Joseph, while maintaining that Jesus was not, in fact, the biological son of Joseph. Jesus has been conceived, not by Joseph, but by the Holy Spirit* (1:16, 18-25; see Birth of Jesus). The reader is thus confronted with a question: How can Jesus be the Son of David through Joseph if he is not the natural son of Joseph? The answer: Joseph, son of David, adopts Jesus by giving him his name (1:20-25). The fact that Jesus is adopted by Joseph in no way makes Jesus' Davidic lineage questionable. In Jewish circles a child became a man's son not so much by physical procreation itself as by acknowledgment on the part of the man. Nevertheless, Jesus is Son of David by adoption, but Son of God by conception (2:15; 3:17).

But Jesus is not simply a son of David; he is the Son of David. As Son of David, Jesus is the Messiah-king in the line of David who has been sent by God specifically to the people of Israel,* not in order to exercise oppressive rule over them (20:20—21:17) but to bring them salvation and deliverance by healing* them of their diseases. Three times persons in need of healing cry out to him, "Have mercy upon me [us], Son of David" (9:27; 15:22; 20:31). In all instances Jesus grants the healing they seek. Moreover, on two other occasions Jesus' healings induce persons to speak about him in terms of "Son of David" (12:23; 21:15).

These passages have a double function. On the one hand, they make a positive statement about Jesus, demonstrating that Jesus fulfills the messianic expectation that the Son of David would bring wholeness to the oppressed, and that those who have faith to confess that Jesus is the Jewish Messiah will experience the blessings of the eschatological age. On the other hand, they make a negative statement about Israel. As J. D. Kingsbury has observed, only the "no-accounts" of Jewish society, and on one occasion a Gentile, appeal to Jesus as Son of David and are thereby healed. The crowds, however, generally respond to these healings with doubt (12:23), and the religious authorities respond with anger (21:15) and blasphemy (12:22-32). Matthew thus uses "Son of David" to point to Israel's rejection of its Messiah and to highlight the blindness* and guilt (see Hardness of Heart) that attended this rejection on the part of Israel as a whole.

The fact that Matthew gives more attention to "Son of David" than do the other Evangelists has led some scholars, such as Bornkamm and Burger, to argue that Son of David is the chief christological category in Matthew. Yet in the question regarding David's son Matthew suggests that Jesus' Davidic sonship is secondary to another type of sonship (22:41-46; cf. Mk 12:35-37). No doubt Matthew has in mind that Jesus' divine sonship takes precedence over his Davidic sonship. In Matthew's Gospel Jesus is presented primarily as Son of God, the eschatological figure in whom God has drawn near to dwell with his people (1:18-25; 3:17; 16:16; 27:54), and in only a secondary and supportive way as Son of David.

3.3. Luke. Luke records the birth of Jesus in Bethlehem, "the city of David" (2:4, 11), to a woman betrothed to Joseph, "of the house and lineage of David" (2:4). Yet Luke gives relatively little attention to the title "Son of David." It appears only in passages which he takes over from Mark. In one of these passages (the question regarding David's son, 20:41-47) Luke suggests that although Jesus is the Son of David, his Davidic sonship is subordinate to another christological category, probably that of Son of God (1:26-35; 3:23-38).
Nevertheless, the concept of Davidic sonship does appear in Luke's Gospel. As Son of David, Jesus is the royal heir to the throne of David (1:32-33). In him the promises which God made regarding the establishment of David's kingdom and the consequent salvation of Israel find fulfillment (1:54, 68-75; 4:16-30; 19:2840).

Jesus' Son of David is the one whom God has designated to usher in his kingdom, and the one through whom God exercises his will over his people Israel (including those Gentiles who by faith become part of the true Israel of God, 1:30-32; cf. Acts). Luke emphasizes, even more than Mark and Matthew, that this Davidic king and the kingdom he inaugurates are not characterized by military revolt or political aspirations, but involve rather the salvation of God's people from demonic oppression (4:16-19; 11:14-23; 18:3543; see Demon, Devil, Satan) and the establishment of a community which fulfills the will of God (23:1-15, 32-49).

SON OF GOD

This is arguably the most significant christological tide in the NT. "Son of God" or its equivalents ("the Son," "my Son," etc.) occur more than 124 times in the NT, and may be the foremost christological category in each of the Gospels. The NT characteristically describes Jesus' relationship to God in terms of divine sonship. The concept itself carries a variety of meanings, including commissioning to special work, obedience, intimate fellowship, knowledge, likeness and the receiving of blessings and gifts.

1. Divine Sonship in the OT, Judaism and Hellenism

2. Divine Sonship in the Life and Ministry of the Historical Jesus

3. Divine Sonship in the Christology of the Gospels

1. Divine Sonship in the OT, Judaism and Hellenism.

The notion of divine sonship appears in the OT with regard to three persons or groups of persons: angels* (Gen 6:2; Job 1:6; Dan 3:25), Israel* (Ex 4:22-23; Hos 11:1; Mal 2:10) and the king (2 Sam 7:14; Ps 2:7; 89:26-27). When used of Israel and the king sonship emphasizes belonging in a special way to God,* election to perform the service of God (i.e., to obey God) and the experience of God's love,* mercy,* protection and gifts.

Although there are relatively few OT references to the king as son of God, this usage stands closer to the meaning of the tide in the NT than do references to angels or even to the people as a whole. There are two emphases in the divine sonship of the king which set it apart from the sonship of the people. First, the king in his capacity as son of God exercises authority over both the people of Israel and the nations (see esp. Ps 2). Second, the divine sonship of the king has its basis in the covenant God made with David in 2 Samuel 7:4-17 (cf. Ps 89:19-45), thereby (1) restricting royal divine sonship to descendants of David, (2) laying the foundation for relating the concepts of Son of David and Son of God, and (3) infusing the notion of royal Son of God with the ideas of immutable divine promise, decree and covenant.

It is clear that the OT does not speak explicidy of the Messiah or of a specifically messianic figure as Son of God. This seems generally to be the case in post-biblical Palestinian Judaism* as well. The expression refers to angels (I Enoch 69:4-5; 71:1; Jub 1:24-25) and miracle workers (esp. Honi the circle-drawer [b. Ta'an. 24b; b. Ber. 17b; b. hul. 86a] and Hanina ben Dosa [m. Ta'an. 3:8]; see Vermes), but many passages that once were cited as evidence for the messianic use of Son of God have been discounted as later interpolations or mistranslations of the word for "servant."
There are three passages in the literature from Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls), however, which may connect the idea of Son of God to the Messiah: 4QFlor 1:10-14 applies 2 Samuel 7:11-14 to the Messiah; 1QSa 2:11-12 could be read in terms of God begetting the Messiah; and 4QpsDan A" (4Q246) is reported to read "he shall be hailed as the Son of God, and they shall call him Son of the most High" (Fitzmyer). In spite of the sparsity of references which relate the Messiah to divine sonship, the observations that (1) messianic hope in the period was almost always linked to an ideal Davidic king (who in the OT is described as Son of God) and (2) some NT statements seem to assume a connection between Messiah and Son of God (e.g., Mk 14:61; Mt 16:16) suggest that the Messiah as Son of God was not totally foreign to Palestinian Judaism. Yet the Messiah was not understood primarily in terms of Son of God.

The consideration that Son of God was not a typical messianic designation in Palestinian Judaism and that Hellenism was acquainted with descriptions of heroes, philosophers, rulers and miracle workers who were designated sons of god has led many historians to argue for the Hellenistic origin of the tide as applied to Jesus. These historians claim that Hellenistic Christians were responsible for the confession of Jesus' divine sonship, and that they understood Jesus to be Son of God along the lines of the "divine man" (theios anēr; see Divine Man/Theios anēr), a heroic miracle-worker. This understanding of the origin of the tide in christology is today generally rejected, since

(1) the Hellenistic concept stands in tension with the NT emphasis on the uniqueness of Jesus' divine sonship as well as with the NT insistence that the divine sonship of Jesus involves primarily suffering and death (see Death of Jesus) rather than the performance of miracles (see Miracles, Miracle Stories);

(2) the notion of "divine man" was not as pervasive or uniform as once thought; and (3) there is no explicit connection in Hellenistic sources between "divine man" and persons held to be "sons of the gods." It is thus preferable to look to the OT and Palestinian Judaism for the religious background to the divine sonship of Jesus.

2. Divine Sonship in the Life and Ministry of the Historical Jesus.

The issue of divine sonship in the thinking and ministry of the historical Jesus revolves around two questions: Did Jesus consider himself to be the Son of God; and if so, how did he understand this role?

2.1. Did Jesus Consider Himself to Be the Son of God? According to the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus understood himself and his mission according to divine sonship and clearly implied that he was the Son of God. Yet there are two sets of data that may challenge the historicity of the Gospel accounts at this point.

The first challenge comes from the almost total absence in literature from Palestinian Judaism of a connection between messianic expectations and the title Son of God. This observation has led to the conclusion that neither Jesus nor his contemporaries would have thought of the Messiah in terms of Son of God, and that the christological confession of divine sonship must have arisen with the Hellenistic church, which was responsible for introducing its confession into the traditions of Jesus' earthly ministry. But we noted above that although specific references are few, there is reason to believe that the Messiah was in fact sometimes understood in terms of divine sonship.

The second challenge involves statements in the NT which may be understood as linking the divine sonship of Jesus to his resurrection*/exaltation, thereby suggesting that Jesus became Son of God at that point (esp. Acts 13:33; Rom 1:3-4). Many scholars have argued that this was the original understanding of the divine sonship of Jesus and that the early church gradually pushed the inauguration of Jesus' status as Son of God back to the Transfiguration,* then to the baptism* and finally to either virginal conception (see Birth of Jesus) or pre-existence (set Logos).

Virtually everyone agrees that Romans 1:3-4 reflects an early creed that Paul has included in order to establish a point of theological contact between himself and his Roman readers. It is often claimed, furthermore, that the pre-Pauline formula lacked the phrase "in power," and thus signified that Jesus became Son of God at the resurrection. By adding this phrase Paul has transformed the meaning of the statement so as to imply that Jesus had been Son of God all along, and that at the resurrection he became Son in a new sense. But some scholars (e.g., Dunn) have argued that "in power" may have been part of the pre-Pauline formula. Moreover, even if the original formula lacked this phrase, it is possible to construe onsthentos of verse 4 as "designated" (so RSV) rather than "appointed," thus indicating that in the resurrection God declared Jesus to be what he had been during his earthly ministry. But ultimately the interpretation of this verse turns on prior decisions regarding the connection of Messiah with the Son tide in earliest Christianity. Those who deny such a connection see a dichotomy between the earthly Jesus as Son of David and his post-resurrection status as Son of God, while those who affirm the connection between Son and Messiah argue that Davidic sonship implies divine sonship.

Acts 13:33 represents a similarly ambiguous case. On the surface this quotation from Psalm 2:7 seems to intimate that Jesus was "begotten" as Son of God at the resurrection. But it is possible to maintain with Marshall that both the flow of thought in Paul's sermon and the analogy with Wisdom 2:13-18 indicate that Psalm 2:7 was employed not to establish Jesus' divine sonship on the basis of his resurrection, but rather to prove that in the resurrection God confirmed the righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness) of his obedient Son. Thus, the passage links sonship to the obedience of the earthly Jesus and not to the event of the resurrection. We conclude, then, that there is no firm evidence in the NT for the view that Jesus entered into his role as Son of God at the resurrection.

Virtually all critics agree that Jesus addressed God* as Abba, "Father," and typically referred to God by this designation when teaching his disciples. These phenomena are firmly embedded in the earliest strata of Gospel tradition, and throughout the Synoptic Gospels it is almost exclusively the way Jesus speaks of God and his relationship to God. This does not necessarily imply, however, that every reference to "Father" in our Gospels was spoken by the historical Jesus; the wide disparity in the number of occurrences in the four Gospels suggests that at points the Evangelists may have inserted the designation into traditions they inherited.

Scholarly debate has focused on those passages in which Jesus refers to himself as the Son. A strong claim for authenticity can be made especially for Mark 13:32; 12:6; and Matthew ll:27/Luke 10:22. In the case of Mark 13:32 it is unlikely that the early church would have created a saying which asserted the ignorance of Jesus. The objections raised to the authenticity of the parable* of the tenants (Mk 12:1-12) are not convincing. The fact that the parable contains some allegorical elements does not necessarily exclude it as coming from Jesus; and the argument that it contradicts Jesus' reticence to speak publicly about his sonship fails to take seriously the oblique nature of this reference to the "son." The reference to the "sending" of the son in this passage does not suggest pre-existence (as in Paul), but points rather to the calling, mission and eschatological significance of Jesus. A more difficult passage is Matthew 11:27/Luke 10:22 (see Wisdom). In the face of claims that this statement reflects a relatively late—even Johannine—christology, Jeremias has successively argued that its language, style and structure reflect Semitic usage and that the relationship between Father and Son found here accords with Jesus' statements regarding the Father encountered throughout the Synoptic Gospels.

A focus on these three statements does not imply that other passages in which Jesus speaks of himself as the Son have no historical validity. Bauckham has argued for the historical value of many of the Son sayings in the Fourth Gospel, following Cullmann's hypothesis that behind much of the sayings material in this Gospel stands independent tradition passed on by the "beloved disciple" and preserved by the Johannine circle. Nevertheless, the task of assessing the historical character of Johannine material is extremely complicated, and it is therefore preferable to concentrate on the earliest strands of the Synoptic tradition.

2.2. How Did Jesus Understand His Divine Sonship? An examination of the authentic sayings of Jesus regarding the "Father" and the "Son" reveals the following emphases.

2.2.1. Personal Intimacy with the Father. It points to intimate personal fellowship between Jesus and God. Jesus experienced this intimate fellowship especially through prayer, and consequently addressed God in prayer* almost exclusively as "Father" (Aramaic 'Abba; Mk 14:36; cf. Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6). Jeremias has argued that Jesus was apparently the first Jew to address God in prayer as 'Abba (Jewish prayers typically used the obsolete and formalized Hebrew term 'Abi), and that 'Abba was a term of familiarity and intimacy, having originally developed from the speech of children ("daddy"). Subsequent scholarship has been unable to contradict the claim that this prayer language of 'Abba was original with Jesus. Although Jeremias' employment of etymological considerations is questionable (Barr), his distinction between formal prayer speech, which suggests distance, and the more colloquial expression used to address earthly fathers bears the weight of critical scrutiny.

Jesus' use of 'Abba prompts the question as to how and when Jesus came to understand himself and his messianic role in terms of this intimate filial relationship with God. The attempt to reconstruct Jesus' messianic self-consciousness is notoriously difficult. Nevertheless, the tradition itself suggests that Jesus may have become conscious of his divine sonship at the point of his baptism. In the earliest form of the baptism account the divine voice addresses
Jesus directly in the second person: "You are my beloved Son" (Mk 1:11). If this experience did not initiate Jesus' Son-conscious-ness, it confirmed and informed it

2.2.2. Obedience to the Will of God. This reference to the baptism leads to a second emphasis: Absolute obedience to the will of God understood in terms of the Suffering Servant (see Servant of Yahweh). The divine speech at the baptism accentuates obedience: "With you I am well pleased." Moreover, the heavenly voice alludes to Psalm 2:7 and Isaiah 42:1, thereby bringing together the concepts of divine sonship and the Servant of Yahweh. Thus, divine sonship is defined in terms of obedience, and obedience is described in terms of the image of the Servant. Although intertestamental Judaism sometimes connected the Messiah with the Servant of Yahweh, it failed to link vicarious suffering of the Servant to the Messiah. But there is no doubt that Jesus made this connection, and he seems to have based the connection on his understanding of his role as Son of God Jesus' construal of his divine sonship in terms of obedient submission to suffering and death emerges also in his prayer in Gethsemane* (Mk 14:32-42).

2.2.3. The Unique Son of God. The foregoing implies a further emphasis in Jesus' speech involving his divine sonship: it is exclusive. Jesus is Son of God in a unique sense. In his capacity as Son of God Jesus has the power to bring his followers into an experience of divine sonship, but Jesus consistently distinguishes between the sonship of disciples and his own sonship. He speaks of "my Father" and "your Father," but never "our Father" (the "our" of the Lord's Prayer [Mt 6:9] is what the disciples are to say).

It is clear that in the authentic statements from the Synoptic Gospels Jesus did not speak of his divine sonship in terms of pre-existence or focus on ontolog-ical realities (such as his divine "nature"). Rather, Jesus emphasized the elements of personal relationship and active function.

3. Divine Sonship in the Christology of the Gospels.

Although there is wide disparity in the number of occurrences of "Son (of God)" and "Father" in the four Gospels, each of the Gospels gives significant attention to Jesus' divine sonship, and may in fact present "Son of God" as the pre-eminent christolog-ical title.
3.1. Mark. "Son (of God)" appears in Mark's Gospel only eight times and "Father" (referring to God) only four. Yet these titles surface at crucial points in Mark and play a role in the christology of the Gospel that surpasses their few occurrences (see Mark, Gospel of).

Scholars have generally recognized the importance of this title for Mark's christology, but they have assessed its function differently. Many authorities have linked the tide to the concept of divine man, described above, arguing that in this Gospel Jesus became Son of God at his baptism when the Spirit descended upon him, thus providing him with divine power according to which he performed miracles and exorcisms. There is, however, a division among scholars who hold this divine man theory: some maintain that the Evangelist himself espoused such a christology, while others contend that Mark presented this portrait of Jesus as divine man only to correct it by presenting Jesus above all as the suffering Son of man. Indeed, scholars such as Perrin have argued that because the tide Son of God could be linked to the divine man concept which Mark himself rejects, Mark has subordinated this tide to that of Son of man (see Son of Man), which unambiguously points to Jesus' suffering and death.

The difficulties of employing the concept of divine man in NT christology were discussed above. In addition to these problems it should be observed that Mark gives unqualified approval to the tide Son of God, and understands this tide primarily in terms of Jesus' obedient suffering and death. There is no evidence that Mark holds Son of God and Son of man in tension, nor that he gives prominence to the latter over the former.

Mark indicates the importance of this tide for his christology by placing it within the general heading to the Gospel (Mk 1:1). The specific meaning of Jesus' divine sonship begins to come to expression in the account of the baptism (Mk 1:9-11), where the heavenly voice declares, "You are my beloved Son, with you I am well pleased." This pericope indicates that God views Jesus primarily in terms of divine sonship and that Jesus' role as Son of God involves especially obedience to his Father. As mentioned above, the heavenly declaration alludes to Isaiah 42:1 and thus links the divine sonship of Jesus to his role as the Suffering Servant of Yahweh.

God makes this announcement to Jesus alone; at this point in the narrative only God and Jesus are aware that Jesus is Son of God. In Mark 3:11 and 5:7 the demons address Jesus as "Son of (the Most High) God" (cf. Mk 1:24, 34), which seems to indicate they were privy to the divine communication at the baptism. Nevertheless, Jesus does not wish his divine sonship to be publicly announced and consequently commands the demons to be silent. The observation that Jesus also commands silence from those who were healed (Mk 1:43-44; 5:43; cf. 7:24) suggests the reason for this messianic secret. The Markan Jesus does not wish to be proclaimed as Son of God until it is clear his divine sonship involves not spectacular miracles but suffering and death. Hence, the secret of Jesus' divine sonship is revealed only gradually.

In Mark 9:7 the divine communication originally voiced at the baptism is repeated in the presence of the inner circle of the disciples,* but they will not understand what it means until after the resurrection (Mk 9:9-13). In Mark 12:6, in the course of the parable of the tenants, Jesus speaks of the sending of a "son"; the religious authorities apparently understood Jesus to be referring to himself, since at the trial before the Sanhedrin* they accuse him with the question "Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?" (Mk 15:39; cf. 12:12). Yet they remain ignorant of Jesus' identity as Son of God, for they reject the very idea as a blasphemous claim (see Trial of Jesus).

It is only in Mark 15:39 that the secret of Jesus' status as Son of God is fully revealed to humans. As the centurion faces the cross he declares, "Truly this man was the Son of God." By bringing his Gospel to a climax with this christological confession at the cross, Mark indicates that Jesus is first and foremost Son of God, and that Jesus is Son of God as one who suffers and dies in obedience to God (cf. Mk 14:36). Yet this title relates not only to Jesus' earthly mission, but also to his resurrection (Mk 12:10-11; cf. 9:9) and Second Coming (Mk 8:38; 13:32); for Mark emphasizes that it is precisely Jesus crucified as Son of God who is raised (Mk 16:6) and will return in glory* (Mk 14:61-62).

3.2. Matthew. Although various scholars have seen Matthew's focus in different tides, many today would argue that Son of God is the pre-eminent christological tide in Matthew (see Matthew, Gospel of). The First Evangelist retains virtually all of Mark's statements regarding the sonship of Jesus and the fatherhood of God, while adding ten references to Jesus as Son (of God) and forty references to God as Father. According to Matthew's Gospel, Son of God is the only adequate christological confession, and one can come to this understanding of Jesus solely through divine revelation (Mt 16:13-17; cf. 27:51-54).
Although Matthew begins by connecting Jesus' divine sonship to his virginal conception (Mt 1:18-25), he does not develop the notion of the divine nature of Jesus, but focuses instead on more functional aspects of Jesus' sonship. In this Gospel Jesus is Son of God primarily in the sense that he perfectly obeys the will of his Father, especially the will of God that the Messiah must suffer and die.

The emphasis on obedience to the will of the Father appears already in the baptism narrative (Mt 3:13-17). As in Mark, the heavenly voice expresses divine approval. But Matthew goes beyond Mark in stressing the obedience of Jesus: Jesus submits to baptism "to fulfill all righteousness" (Mt 3:15; injustice, Righteousness); and immediately after the baptism Jesus is tempted in his capacity as Son of God, and as Son of God he refuses to yield to Satan's temptations (Mt 4:1-11; see Temptation of Jesus). Here Jesus is tempted to manifest his divine sonship through the performance of spectacular signs, but chooses instead to demonstrate his sonship through submission to the Father's will.

This reference to temptation indicates that the Matthean Jesus struggles with the will of God regarding the nature of his messianic role. In Matthew 16:22-23 Peter assumes the role of Satan in that he, like Satan in the wilderness temptations, would turn Jesus aside from obedience to the Father's will for the Messiah and would encourage Jesus to construe his sonship in ways other than obedient suffering and death. In Gethsemane Jesus voices his desire to avoid the "cup" of suffering, but as Son of God he yields to the will of his Father (Mt 26:39, 42; see Gethsemane). Indeed, Matthew presents the event of the crucifixion as the ultimate temptation for Jesus as well as the climactic expression of his sonship. Jesus is condemned to death on the charge that he claimed to be the Son of God (Mt 26:63). Twice the passers-by tempt Jesus to demonstrate his divine sonship by the sign of coming down from the cross (Mt 27:40, 43). But, as in his earlier temptations, Jesus refuses to yield to such appeals and dies as the righteous one who places his trust in God (Mt 27:43). In response to the obedience of Jesus his Son, God himself provides the signs (Mt 27:51-53), which prompt the centurion to declare, "Truly this was the Son of God" (Mt 27:54).

In addition to this focus on obedience to the will of God, there are three related dimensions to Jesus' divine sonship in Matthew: (1) As Son of God, Jesus knows the Father and his will and has unique authority* to interpret that will (Mt 5:17-48; 7:28-29; 11:25-27). (2) Because Jesus is Son of God his disciples also become sons of God who address God as "Father." Their sonship, like his, is characterized above all by obedience to God's will (Mt 12:50). (3) Because Jesus remained the obedient Son until the end, his Father has given him "all authority in heaven and on earth" (Mt 28:18); he now reigns as Son (Mt 28:19; 24:36) and will return in that capacity (Mt 10:32; 16:27; 25:31-46).

3.3. Luke. The divine sonship of Jesus receives relatively less attention in Luke than in the other Gospels. Luke's allusions to Jesus as Son of God are for the most part taken over from tradition, and in fact Luke omits some references to Jesus' divine sonship found in Mark (Mk 13:32; 15:39). Still, the concept plays a significant role in Luke's Gospel. In fact, some scholars argue that it is the foremost christological tide in this Gospel (e.g., Kingsbury).

Luke establishes the basic contours of Jesus' divine sonship in three passages at the beginning of the Gospel. The annunciation to Mary highlights several dimensions of Jesus' divine sonship (Lk 1:32-35). First, Jesus is Son of God as one who has been conceived by the Holy Spirit. Although Luke is moving toward understanding divine sonship in ontological terms (i.e., the divine nature of Jesus), he does little to develop his christology along these lines. Rather, Luke suggests that the conception of Jesus by the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) forms the basis of Jesus' intimate personal relationship with God, a theme that stands at the center of the presentation of divine sonship throughout the Gospel (Lk 2:49; 10:21-22). Indeed, by having Jesus address God as "Father" on the cross, Luke indicates that even at that point in Jesus' life his intimate fellowship with God continues unabated (Lk 23:34, 46). Second, as Son of God Jesus inherits the kingdom (see Kingdom of God) which God promised to the Son of David, thus pointing to transcendent rule and authority (cf. Lk 22:28-30). Third, as Son of God Jesus is holy, set apart for the special service of bringing salvation* to the people of God (Lk 1:68-69; 2:11; 19:9-10).

The second key passage for understanding Jesus' divine sonship is the genealogy* (3:23-38). The genealogy begins by describing Jesus as the "supposed" son of Joseph, suggesting that he was not actually the son of Joseph, but Son of God through divine conception (Lk 1:32-35). But this statement also points to the mystery of Jesus' divine sonship: God (Lk 3:22; 9:35), the devil (Lk 4:3, 9) and demons (Lk 4:41; 8:28; see Demon, Devil, Satan) address Jesus as Son of God, but humans do not. They suppose him to be son of Joseph (Lk 4:22), that is, he is explicable in purely human terms. Consequently, they tend to remain blind to his transcendent power and authority. Moreover, Luke traces the genealogy of Jesus through Adam to God (Lk 3:38), thus indicating that as God's Son Jesus has power to bring all humanity to its destiny as sons of God.

The temptation narrative (Lk 4:1-13) demonstrates that Jesus' divine sonship involves perfect obedience to the will of the Father (Lk 2:49; 23:47) and the exercise of authority over Satan and the forces of evil (Lk 10:17-19; 11:17-23; 13:11-17).

3.4. John. The Fourth Gospel places the divine sonship of Jesus at the center of its christology (see John, Gospel of). The Gospel speaks of "Son (of God)" twenty-nine times and refers to God as "Father" over a hundred times. Moreover, John expressly states that the purpose of his Gospel is to confirm his readers in the belief that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (Jn 20:31). Although John incorporates most of the main elements in the Synoptic presentation of Son of God, his portrait of Jesus' divine sonship is distinct from that found in the Synoptic Gospels.

One of the points of distinction between the Synoptic portrayal of Jesus as Son of God and that of the Fourth Gospel involves the pre-existence of the Son. While the Synoptics nowhere describe Jesus' sonship in terms of pre-existence, John begins his Gospel by linking the "Word" (logos), operative at creation, to the Son (Jn 1:1-18); and at subsequent points in the Gospel Jesus Son of God speaks of his pre-incarnate existence (Jn 8:56-58; 17:5, 24). Yet John relates Jesus' divine sonship primarily to his earthly functioning. This Gospel emphasizes that God sent his Son into the world (Jn 3:17; 10:36; 17:18), and that he has come from the Father (Jn 3:31; 6:3342) and is about to return to the Father (Jn 13:1-3; 14:28; 16:28; 20:17). He thus reflects God's person and glory (Jn 1:14; 14:6-11).

Jesus' role as Son of God is characterized by the following elements. First, Jesus Son of God perfectly obeys the will of his Father (Jn 4:34; 5:30; 6:38; 7:28; 8:29); even his coming into the world reflects his obedience to the Father's will (Jn 8:42). Second, as Son of God Jesus shares the work of the Father (Jn 5:19; 9:4; 10:37), including those tasks belonging uniquely to God: giving life to the dead (Jn 5:21, 24; 6:40) and performing judgment (Jn 5:22, 27-29; 8:16). Indeed, Jesus says nothing except what he has heard from the Father (Jn 3:32-34; 12:49-50; 15:15) and does nothing except what he has seen the Father do (Jn 5:20; 8:38). The works he does are actually the Father's works performed through him (Jn 5:17; 9:4; 10:32). Third, as Son of God Jesus enjoys intimate fellowship with the Father. John describes this intimacy in spatial terms: "in the bosom of the Father" (Jn 1:18). Specifically, this relationship involves (1) "knowing" the Father and his will (Jn 4:22-23; 6:45-47; 8:55; 15:15); (2) sharing in all that the Father has (Jn 16:15); and (3) enjoying special access and influence with the Father (Jn 14:13-16). Fourth, the relationship between the Father and the Son is characterized by love: The Father loves the Son (Jn 3:35; 5:20; 10:17; 17:23) and the Son loves the Father (Jn 14:31). The Father expresses his love for the Son by giving to the Son all things (Jn 3:35; 13:3), especially those who come to the Son (Jn 6:37,44, 65; 10:29; 17:2).

All of this implies that the divine sonship of Jesus is unique; he is Son of God in a sense not true of anyone else, even believers. John calls attention to this uniqueness by designating Jesus the "only" (monogenēs) Son (Jn 1:14, 18; 3:16) and by constandy employing the absolute forms "the Father" and "the Son." In John's Gospel the disciples are never called "sons," nor do they address God as "Father." Only once is God described as the "Father" of disciples (Jn 20:17), and there the distinction between "my Father" and "your Father" is emphasized.

The proclamation that Jesus is Son of God forces the decision of faith. Persons are called to believe that Jesus is the Son whom God has sent into the world, and the decision they make regarding this call to belief will determine the quality of their present existence as well as their eternal destiny (Jn 3:17-21, 36; 5:24; 11:26). Believing in the Son is the "work" which God requires. This belief involves, specifically, obeying the Son (Jn 3:36), coming to the Son (Jn 14:6) and honoring the Son (Jn 5:23). Such belief will result in salvation (Jn 5:34) and life* (Jn 6:40, 47; 20:31).

SON OF MAN

The person whose name was Jesus (perhaps more closely defined as "Jesus of Nazareth" or as "Jesus the son of Joseph" [Jn 1:46; 6:42] to make clear which holder of the name was meant) is known by various forms of words in the Gospels and the NT generally. To some extent these forms of words are interchangeable, but clearly some of them are used with specific functions and in specific contexts.

The phrase "the Son of man" (ho huios tou anthro-pou) is such a form of words. It is the phrase used more frequently than any other (except "Jesus" itself) to refer to Jesus in the Gospels. It occurs in all four Gospels and only once outside them (Acts 7:56; Heb 2:6 [quoting Ps 8:5] and Rev 1:13; 14:14 [alluding to Dan 7:13] have "a son of man"). Within the Gospels it is found only in sayings ascribed to Jesus; the only clear exception is John 12:34a,b where the people quote Jesus' phrase back at him and ask to whom he is referring.

This evidence shows that "the Son of man" functions as a self-designation of some kind; it never became a way for other people to refer to Jesus, and it thus played no part in the confessional and doctrinal statements of the early church, unlike "Christ,"* "Lord"* and "Son of God."*

1. Usage in the Gospels

2. Jesus and the Son of Man

3. Conclusion
1. Usage in the Gospels.

In what kind of situation is the phrase used? Why does Jesus sometimes say "I" and sometimes "the Son of man"? There is manifestly some flexibility in usage, as is seen by comparing:

Luke 6:22 with Matthew 5:11

Matthew 16:13 with Mark 8:27

Luke 12:8 with Matthew 10:32

1.1. The Gospel of Mark. Broadly speaking, we can trace a pattern in the Gospel of Mark, where the phrase occurs fourteen times (Mk 2:10, 28; 8:31, 38; 9:9,12, 31; 10:33,45; 13:26; 14:21a, b, 41, 62).

1.1.1. The Present Authority of Jesus. Jesus speaks of his authority to forgive sins (Mk 2:10) and of his lordship of the Sabbath* (Mk 2:28). In both cases the context makes it clear that it is the authority* of Jesus which is at issue; he exercises it there and then; and it is an authority which would normally belong to God or to somebody authorized by him. It is possible that the phrase might signify "human" in a generic sense (i.e., any particular member of the species; see further below), but it is doubtful whether a Greek reader would take this sense from the phrase.

1.1.2. The Suffering and Resurrection of Jesus. Jesus speaks of the impending suffering, death and resurrection of the Son of man in a series of predictions which emphasize that this must happen in accordance with the Scriptures; he speaks of the mission of the Son of man as being to serve others and to give his life as a ransom for many, and he speaks of himself as the Son of man in references to his impending betrayal and arrest (Mk 8:31; 9:9, 12, 31; 10:33, 45; 14:21a, b, 41; see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). The threefold repetition of the prediction in Mark is particularly impressive. The sufferings of Jesus are clearly linked to his role as the Son of man; they are not mentioned explicity without some reference to him as the Son of man.

1.1.3. The Future Coming of Jesus. There are three references to a future coming of the Son of man "in clouds with great power and glory" to gather his chosen people and reject (literally "be ashamed of") those who were ashamed of Jesus (see Apocalyptic Teaching); this coming is associated with his being seated... on the right hand of God (Mk 8:38; 13:26; 14:62). Mark 13:26 and 14:62 are clearly reminiscent of Daniel 7:13-14 where a figure "like a son of man" comes with the clouds of heaven,* appears before God and is given everlasting sovereign power and dominion (see Kingdom of God).

Allusions are also made to Psalm 11:1 and possibly to Zechariah 12:10. What is said in other passages in the OT about a future coming of God* himself in judgment* (Zech 14:5) is here attributed to the Son of man as his agent

1.1.4. The Suffering, Vindicated and Authoritative Son of Man. With this background now coming into focus, it is possible to argue that for Mark the teaching which he attributes to Jesus identifies him as the figure prophesied by Daniel who will come as God's agent to gather his people and act as judge. But already as a human figure Jesus acts with the authority which is inherent in this role. If we ask how the suffering and rejection of the Son of man fit into this picture, two (not necessarily exclusive) answers may be given. The first is that in Daniel 7 the Son of man is seen as the representative of "the saints of the Most High" who suffer defeat and oppression at the hands of their enemies (Dan 7:21, 25). The second is that the language used in Mark 9:12 and 10:45 and in the crucifixion narrative suggests that the Son of man undergoes the experiences of the "righteous sufferer" and the "rejected stone" in the Psalms (Ps 22; 69; 118:22) and the Servant of Yahweh (Is 52:13-53:12; see Servant of Yahweh) who suffers but is vindicated by God (see Death of Jesus). Thus, not surprisingly, motifs from several OT passages which were regarded as providing the pattern for the destiny of Jesus are coalesced to give a picture of him as the suffering, vindicated and authoritative Son of man.

It also emerges that in Mark, Jesus prefers this way of describing himself to other possibilities. It is notable that when Jesus is identified as the "Christ" (Mk 8:29-30; 14:61-62; and implicidy in 13:21-22; 9:41 is an exception), he responds by speaking of what "the Son of man" will do. This curious fact suggests that Jesus almost wishes to replace the concept of Messiah (or Christ) by that of the Son of man. The reasons for this are not clear (see Mark, Gospel of).

1.2. The Gospel of Matthew. The picture in the other two Synoptic Gospels is not markedly dissimilar. The phrase is used thirty times by Matthew.

Matthew takes over thirteen of the usages in Mark (Mt 9:6; 12:8; 16:27; 17:9, 12, 22; 20:18, 28, 24:30b; 26:24a, b, 45, 64) and adds it editorially four times
He shares it with Luke eight times (Mt 8:20 par. Lk 9:58; Mt 11:19 par. Lk 7:34; Mt 12:32 par. Lk 12:10; Mt 12:40 par. Lk 11:30; Mt 24:27, 37, 39, 44 par. Lk 17:24, 26, 30; 12:40), and it is found in passages peculiar to Matthew five times (Mt 10:23; 13:37,41; 19:28; 25:31).

Matthew's new uses of the phrase fall into the same general pattern as in Mark. In a series of sayings which he shares with Luke the Son of man is an object of derision for associating with sinners (Mt 11:19) and invites his followers to share his homeless situation (Mt 8:20). There is more detailed teaching on the future coming of the Son of man which will be unexpected and catastrophic for those who are not ready for him (Mt 24:27,37, 39, 44). The saying, which compares the way in which people treat Jesus now with the way in which they will be treated at the judgment (Mk 8:38 par. Mt 16:27), appears a second time in an expanded form in Luke 12:8-9; but in the corresponding saying in Matthew (10:32-33) the verbal contrast between Jesus and the Son of man is dropped and Jesus speaks of himself in the first person throughout. (Similarly, Mt 5:11 speaks of persecution for the sake of "me," whereas Lk 6:22 has "the Son of man.") Another interesting fact is that a saying which in Mark 3:28 speaks of forgiveness* being extended to the sons of men for their sins and blasphemies except against the Holy Spirit appears in Luke 12:10 in the form that if a person speaks against the Son of man he will be forgiven but not if he speaks against the Spirit (see Holy Spirit). Matthew 12:31-32 combines these two sayings (by substituting "men" for "the sons of men" in the Markan saying). The way in which the Evangelists understood this saying is debated, but it seems probable that they saw a contrast between speaking against Jesus on earth, when people might be forgiven for not recognizing who he really was, and opposition to the Holy Spirit by people (possibly disciples) when there should be no doubt that to do so was to take sides against God.

In the teaching peculiar to Matthew the Son of man is especially understood as the coming savior (see Salvation) and judge (Mt 13:41; 19:28). In Matthew 10:23 Jesus tells his disciples* that they will not finish the cities of Israel* until the Son of man comes. Matthew may have seen this as a reference to the fall of Jerusalem (see Destruction of Jerusalem) understood as the coming of the Son of man in judgment

The general tendency in Matthew is thus to emphasize the identity of Jesus as the coming Son of man and as a figure who is rejected on earth.
1.3. The Gospel of Luke. Luke uses the phrase twenty-five times. He has equivalents to nine of the texts in Mark (Lk 5:24; 6:5; 9:22,26,44; 18:31; 21:27; 22:22,69). He has the ten texts from Q* which he shares with Matthew (the eight texts listed above with Lk 6:22 and 12:8). This leaves six occurrences peculiar to Luke (Lk 17:22; 18:8; 19:10; 21:36; 22:48; 24:7). In these fresh sayings we hear of the Son of man's mission to save the lost (Lk 19:10), his betrayal by Judas* (Lk 22:48; cf. Mk 14:21b) and his sufferings and resurrection* (Lk 24:7—a report of what Jesus had said earlier by the two angels* at the tomb), and of his future coming (Lk 17:22; 18:8; 21:36). It is evident that the picture in Luke is very similar to that in the other Gospels. A notable omission by Luke is the ransom saying in Mark 10:45 (see Ransom Saying). There is a similar saying about "service" in Luke 22:27, but it does not use "the Son of man" nor the idea of ransom. Again there is no essential difference from the general picture given in Mark.

1.4. The Gospel of John. When we turn to the Gospel of John we get a picture with similarities and differences. The phrase is used thirteen times. We can readily find references that correspond to those of the passion and resurrection of Jesus in the other Gospels. But in John the reference is to the "lifting up" of the Son of man (hypsooō). The verb is ambiguous and can refer to "being lifted up" on a cross or to "being exalted" (Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:34a, b). Jesus can thus refer to the final events in his life as the glorification (see Glory) of the Son of man (Jn 12:23; 13:31). Jesus also speaks of the authority to judge which has been committed to him as the Son of man (Jn 5:27), and of the power (see Authority and Power) of the Son of man to grant life (Jn 6:27). These functions are summed up in his appeal to the blind man who had been healed (see Healing) to believe in the Son of man (Jn 9:35). And the life-giving function also appears in the reference to eating the flesh of the Son of man (Jn 6:53), a phrase which doubtless reflects the language of the Last Supper (see Last Supper) but stresses the need for a spiritual partaking. Finally, there is the concept of the Son of man coming down from heaven (Jn 3:13) and ascending to where he formerly was (Jn 8:28); linked to this is the difficult saying about the angels ascending and descending on the Son of man (Jn 1:51).

2. Jesus and the Son of Man.

It is clear that the expression is used in much the same way in each of the Synoptic Gospels but that in John it is used in a wider manner. The crucial question is to what extent this usage corresponds with that of Jesus himself. We have already seen that the Evangelists can add the expression to their sources or subtract it from them. But much more far-reaching questions have been raised by modern scholarship concerning the origin of the phrase.

2.1. Son of Man and Messiah? Some scholars dispute whether Jesus expressed verbally any consciousness of being the Messiah or a messianic type of figure. It would follow that he could not have used "the Son of man" as a messianic self-designation. Or, it is claimed, Messiah and Son of man represent two different types of figure and, if Jesus identified himself as the former, he could not have identified himself also with the latter (see Christ).

Both of these claims are very doubtful. The evidence that Jesus acted in messianic ways is convincing: why otherwise did his followers recognize him as the Messiah? This makes the view that he could not have referred to himself in a messianic fashion most improbable. Further, while it is true that the traditional Jewish Messiah is an earthly figure, whereas the Son of man has transcendent features, the role assigned to the latter is messianic in that he is given dominion and authority as the representative of God's people. This indicates, incidentally, that the claim that the Son of man is not associated with the kingdom of God in Judaism* is without foundation.

2.2. Present and/or Future Son of Man? It has been observed that in those sayings where Jesus talks about the future activity of the Son of man, he is not necessarily talking about himself, and that in one or two sayings (Mk 8:38 par. Lk 12:8-9; Mk 14:62) there appears to be a distinction drawn between Jesus, presently active on earth, and the Son of man, active in the future at the last judgment. On the assumption that the early church would not have created such a distinction, it is argued that such sayings have strong claims to authenticity. It is then further argued that originally Jesus envisaged the Son of man as a figure distinct from himself. It then follows that sayings which identify Jesus as the Son of man must either be compositions by the early church or have had the phrase added to them at a later stage. If this argument is valid, it fits in with the view that Jesus did not refer to himself in messianic terms.

Despite the wide popularity of this view among scholars influenced by R. Bultmann, it cannot be upheld. Essentially, the claim is being made that the future Son of man sayings have been reinterpreted by the early church to refer to Jesus. But there are various arguments against this view.
The crucial sayings (Mk 8:38 par. Lk 12:8-9; Mk 14:62) can be interpreted much more naturally as sayings in which Jesus draws a contrast between himself as a figure whose authority is not recognized and the Son of man as a figure whose authority cannot be gainsaid. The apparently odd switch from the first person to the third person is to be explained by the incorporation of an allusion to Daniel 7:13-14.

The theory requires that the authenticity of a very large number of occurrences of the expression as self-designations of Jesus be surrendered for no better reason than that they stand in conflict with a couple of texts whose interpretation in terms of another coming figure is highly uncertain. The fact that in so many other texts "Son of man" cannot be other than a self-designation must seriously damage the claim that the "future" texts originally spoke of a figure other than Jesus.

2.3. Son of Man As a Self-Designation of Jesus. Two lines of argument raise the question whether Jesus could have used "the Son of man" as a tide to refer to himself.

2.3.1. The Interpretation of Daniel 7. In the vision of Daniel there appear four great beasts like various animals and a figure "like a son of man." This last phrase should undoubtedly be translated "like a man" (so NEB). The Aramaic phrase is used to designate a particular member of a species, and (as in Hebrew) "man" and "son of man" can be used interchangeably to refer to an individual. The force of like is that the figure is not a man but is like a man, just as the beasts are "like" different animals. In the interpretation of Daniel's vision the beasts represent four kingdoms and (implicitly) the manlike figure stands for "the saints of the Most High," the (faithful) people of Israel. It can therefore be argued that the manlike figure is a symbol for a collective entity. On the other hand, it is equally plausible that the manlike figure stands for the ruler of God's people, just as the beasts appear to represent both kingdoms and their rulers. There is no doubt that in subsequent interpretation the manlike figure was regarded as a messianic individual. This is true of 1 Enoch 37—71 and also of 4 Ezra 13 (where the actual phrase is not used, but the dependence on Dan 7 is clear). Nevertheless, it can be argued that in no sense is "a (son of) man" a tide in Daniel 7.

2.3.2. Son of Man As an Aramaic Idiom of Self-Reference. There is a further idiom involving the use of the phrase "son of man." It occurs in a number of Aramaic texts with the sense of "an individual man" but with some kind of reference to the speaker (see Languages of Jesus). The precise way in which this happens is debated.

(1) It has been argued that the phrase is used to make statements that are true of people in general and therefore of the speaker in particular (M. Casey). It is thus a kind of self-designation, but what is said is not true exclusively of the speaker. (For example, in the Palestinian Targum* Cain says: "Behold thou hast cast me forth this day on the face of the ground, and from before you, Lord, it is not possible for the son of man [bar nai] to hide.")

(2) It has also been claimed that a speaker could use this expression to make statements that were true of himself in particular (G. Vermes). Against this interpretation it is argued that in every case cited a general or generic reference is possible. The idiom in fact seems to have arisen out of the use of the phrase to mean "a man" and hence "any man" to refer to the speaker, inasmuch as he is a man.

(3) However, there are cases where the reference is manifestly not to "everybody" but to people in a particular class, and therefore it is more accurate to say that it refers to such people, a group to which the speaker belongs (B. Lindars). (Thus: "When E. Hiyya ben Adda died ... R. Levi received his valuables. This was because his teacher used to say: 'The disciple of bar nāšā is as dear to him as his son.' " Here the expression plainly refers to the group of teachers.) It is suggested that the idiom was used as a form of self-reference in cases where the speaker wished to show modesty or to speak of matters (such as his own death) which were distasteful—in any case in sayings where he wished to avoid speaking directly in the first person.

2.4. Evaluating the Options. The current opinion seems to favor view (3) as the appropriate explanation of the idiom. Those who hold this view then argue that there are a number of sayings in the Gospels which can be understood as examples of this usage. Jesus says something which is true of himself inasmuch as it is true of a group of people to whom he belongs.

2.4.1. Analyzing the statements as idiomatic self-references, Casey, Lindars and Vermes (the three major scholars who have done work in this area) have each determined which Son of man sayings are authentic. Their results may be compared in the following table.

Vermes has the largest number of authentic sayings because he includes sayings that are true only of the speaker (Jesus). His selection, as with that of Casey and Lindars, is reached by rejecting the sayings which reflect the influence of Daniel 7. Casey and Lindars agree substantially in their more limited selection.

There are instances where the Casey/Lindars approach to the sayings is plausible. Mark 2:10 could mean that there is a class of people with authority to forgive, including Jesus. (But the people comment with surprise that no human can forgive sins; only God can do so.) In Mark 2:28 the Sabbath is made for humanity, and therefore people in general, including Jesus, have authority over it. In Matthew 11:18 Casey finds a group of people, including Jesus, who eat and drink with tax collectors (see Taxes) and sinners* and who are attacked by the Pharisees.* (But the text seems to be comparing two individuals.) In Matthew 8:20 Jesus says that there is a group of people, including his disciples and himself, who have no homes, and therefore a prospective disciple must expect the same situation. This is the most cogent example, but it must be observed that Jesus could be saying that, if he himself as a messianic figure is rejected, so too will his disciples be (cf. the identical argument in Mt 10:25b; Jn 15:18, 20b). The other examples lack all cogency.

2.4.2. The effect of the approach in question is to deny that Jesus thought of himself in terms of the Son of man of Daniel 7. According to Lindars, "it carried no christological meaning as such" (Lindars, 170). Jesus remains a figure possessed of some authority, totally committed to his vocation, a prophet who believes that to speak against him is to speak against God, and by their response to him people will stand or fall at the last judgment.

However, the fact that the Lindars/Casey theory simply fails to work, in that it can credibly explain such a tiny handful of sayings, must raise serious doubts about it. There is more to be said for Vermes's understanding of the sayings, according to which Jesus used the idiom to speak of himself with modesty or to avoid a direct reference to his own death.

2.5. According to C. Colpe some of the sayings are generic. That is, Mark 2:10 comments on the fact that Jesus, as a human, can forgive; in Matthew 11:18-19 John is contrasted with "a human," namely Jesus. And in Matthew 8:20 Jesus says that even animals have dens but a human such as he, Jesus, has nowhere to lay his head (Colpe, 430-33). What appears to be essentially the same view is upheld by R. Bauckham who thinks that the phrase is used indefinitely rather than genetically to mean "somebody, a person," and that it could then be used as an oblique self-reference.

We are left with a problem in that the Aramaic usage remains unclear. But it is arguable that the sayings in the Gospels are evidence that the underlying Aramaic phrase could have been used on occasion to refer to the speaker only.
This leaves us with a number of sayings where the allusion to Daniel 7 is clear. J. Dunn has suggested that Jesus began by using the Aramaic idiom to refer to himself and then recognized in the use of the same phrase in Daniel 7 an allusion to the vindication which he expected from God. This led to the use of Daniel 7 on a broader scale in his sayings, and to the development of the term as a means of referring to himself as the authoritative messianic figure. Thus, in some sayings Jesus will simply have used a self-designation, but in others he was making a conscious allusion to Daniel 7. No doubt early Christians would have understood most if not all of his sayings as references to himself as the figure of Daniel 7. The point is that not all uses of the term would necessarily have conveyed the same sense on the lips of Jesus.

To adopt this position is not necessarily to claim that all occurrences of the phrase or all the texts in which it occurs are authentic sayings of Jesus as they stand. We have to reckon with the activity of the Evangelists in adding the phrase (and also in replacing it by a personal pronoun or other equivalent; see the examples cited above). It is also possible that similar activity took place even before the writing of the Gospels.

One particular problem is raised by Mark 3:28-29 and its parallels (Mt 12:31-33; Lk 12:10). It seems certain that we have two variant forms of the same basic saying. The hypothetical original said that there was forgiveness available for sins and blasphemies for/against "the son of man." Mark's tradition took this to mean forgiveness for humankind (collective use), but the Q tradition took it to refer to blasphemies against the man (Jesus). On this view, the Markan tradition understood the Aramaic phrase in a way that was probably not the meaning as originally intended, but although the reference to blasphemy against Jesus dropped out, it was implicidy included in that the saying promised forgiveness of all blasphemies except those against the Spirit. In its Aramaic form, the saying probably did not refer to Jesus as "the [Daniel-ic] Son of man," and therefore the problem detected by modern readers as to what is the difference between speaking against the Son of man and against the Holy Spirit disappears. It is one thing to speak against Jesus under the humble appearance of a man, but it is another thing to speak against the manifest work of the Spirit (in Jesus or in anybody else).

3. Conclusion.
It emerges that two things happen in the Son of man texts.

3.1. Son of Man As Divine and Human. On the one hand, there is the phrase itself and the associations it would have for hearers and readers. In the Gospels as we have them, it points the reader to the figure in Daniel 7 who is a person with sovereign authority, a messianic figure, identified in 1 Enoch and 4 Ezra with the Messiah, God's Son and Elect One. Such a figure would be seen as in some sense divine in that he comes from heaven, and the description of him in Daniel 7 could be taken as an apotheosis, or "deification." He would be associated with the people of God, and in that sense the Son of man can be regarded as a corporate figure. (But the view that "Son of man" is a symbol for a corporate group which then becomes individualized in Jesus is to be rejected.) His associates are bound up with his destiny. But it must be emphasized that it is doubtful whether all of these associations would be present for the original hearers of Jesus and would have been intended by him every time he used the phrase. It is because of this dual origin of the phrase that it can be used to refer both to the humanity of Jesus and also to his divine origin. Jesus can use the term to refer to himself as a human over against God (Mk 2:10,28), but also to indicate his divine origin. In the latter case "Son of man" is a veiled way of expressing his relationship to God (Kim).

3.2. The Son of Man's Mission. On the other hand, this self-designation becomes the vehicle for teaching about the activity and fate of Jesus. He appears in the Synoptic Gospels as a figure of authority on earth who is not accepted by many people. He has a divinely ordained destiny, expressed in the Scriptures, which involves betrayal, rejection, suffering, death and resurrection. He has a future role in which he "comes" and brings salvation and judgment. In the Gospel of John there is greater stress laid on the fact that he comes from God and returns to be with him.

3.3. Son of Man As Jesus' Self-Designation. When Jesus refers to his own role, he adopts this term rather than "Messiah" or "Son of God." After the resurrection it never entered into Christian usage as a way of referring to Jesus or as a confessional term (not even in Jn 9:35-36 is it actually used by a believer; Acts 7:56 is a unique usage, probably a deliberate echo of Jesus' own words). It was recognized as a self-designation, and it was replaced by other terms which expressed its significance with greater clarity. It was in any case a term which would not have been meaningful for non-Jews. Since modern readers on the whole do not pick up the original nuances of the term (whether as a self-designation or as an allusion to Dan 7), the example of the early church in not using it remains valid for today. There is indeed a grave danger of using "Son of man" as a means of referring to the humanity of Jesus, as opposed to his divinity (expressed by "Son of God"), whereas in fact the Danielic background suggests a figure closely associated with the Ancient of Days.

We may conclude that in Aramaic "Son of man" was not a title but a self-designation used in certain specific contexts. Jesus used it in this way. However, in Daniel 7 the phrase was used nontechnically to refer to somebody "like a man," and hence the phrase came to be a means of reference to the person so described. Jesus took over this sense of the phrase, and thus identified his role with that of the figure in Daniel 7. Consequendy, the phrase came to be used as a title of dignity for Jesus, although the memory of the fact that the idiom was used as a self-designation prevented it from being taken over by his followers.

SYNAGOGUE

The regular Jewish assembly for prayer* and worship.* Jesus is depicted as teaching and performing miracles* in synagogues in Galilee* (Mt 4:23; Lk 4:15), especially in Nazareth (Mt 13:54; Mk 6:2; Lk 4:16) and in Capernaum (Mk 1:21; Lk 7:5; Jn 6:59). The synagogue in the latter city was probably built by the centurion (Lk 7:5), whose servant Jesus healed (see Healing).

1. Names and Origin.

"Synagogue" is a word derived from the Greek synagogē, which meant originally an assembly such as of the Jews meeting for worship. In the Septuagint it is used, for example, in Exodus 12:3 of the whole congregation of Israel. It came to mean local gatherings of Jews and then the building where Jewish congregations met. Especially after the destruction of the Temple* in Jerusalem in A.D. 70, synagogues became the centers of both religious and communal activity wherever there was a minyan, or quorum, of ten Jewish men. The Talmud claimed that there were 480 synagogues in Jerusalem before A.D. 70. The Pilgrim of Bordeaux (fourth cent A.D.) reported but seven left in his
The Greek word proseucchini, literally "prayer," was also used as a synonym for synagogues in inscriptions, papyri, Philo and Josephus.* Whether the occurrence of this word in Acts 16:13 designates a synagogue or a prayer meeting at Philippi is a matter of dispute. Another Greek word used in one papyrus for a Jewish place of prayer is the term eucheion. In one passage Josephus (Ant. 16.6.2 §164) quotes the term sabbateum to mean "synagogue." In later Hebrew tradition the synagogue was called variously bet pillâ, "house of prayer"; bet midrâš, "house of study"; and bet k'nesset, "house of assembly."

Though a few scholars (e.g., J. Weingreen) have stressed the pre-exilic roots of the synagogue, most would ascribe its rise to the postexilic period. Many would place this development in the Jewish exilic community in Mesopotamia.

The earliest possible inscriptive evidences are references to proseuche in inscriptions and papyri from Ptolemaic Egypt (E. Schiirer), the earliest of which dates to the reign of Ptolemy III Euergetes (246-221 B.C.). This text refers to the foundation of a proseuche at Schedia some twenty miles from Alexandria. Another text from the same reign refers to a proseuche at Arsinoe-Crocodilopolis in the Fayum. The existence of a synagogue at this town is also confirmed by a land survey (P. Tebt. 86). An inscription from Ptolemy VII (145-17 B.C.) refers to the dedication of "the pylon," the monumental gate, of a synagogue (Griffiths, 10).

Some scholars who dispute the interpretation of references to these proseuchai in Egypt as synagogues, maintain that the synagogues as an institution developed in Palestine in the second century B.C. with the rise of the Pharisees* (J. Guttmann).

2. Offices.

Jairus, whose daughter Jesus healed (Mk 5:22, 35, 36, 38; Lk 8:49), was the head of the synagogue (Gk archisynagogos). Luke 8:41 has Jairus listed as one of the archim tes synagoges, "leaders of the synagogue"; Matthew 9:23 refers to him simply as an archon. From Luke 13:10-17 and from passages in Acts (18:1-17), we can infer that such an officer was responsible for keeping the congregation faithful to the Torah.
The relative esteem in which the "head of the synagogue" was held in Jewish society is revealed in a passage from the Talmud (b. Pesah 49b): "Our rabbis taught: Let a man always sell all he has and marry the daughter of a scholar. If he does not find the daughter of a scholar, let him marry the daughter of [one of] the great men of the generation. If he does not find the daughter of [one of] the great men of the generation, let him marry the daughter of a head of a synagogue. If he does not find the daughter of a head of a synagogue, let him marry the daughter of a charity treasurer. If he does not find the daughter of a charity treasurer, let him marry the daughter of an 'am hd'aref ("people of the land") because they are detestable and of their daughters it is said, 'Cursed be the one who lies with any manner of beast' (Deut 27:21)."

The word archisynagogos appears in thirty Greek and Latin inscriptions. In three cases from Smyrna and Myndos in western Turkey and from Gortyn on Crete the term is used of women. B. Brooten has argued that these and other titles (presbytera, "elder," hiereia, "priestess") were not just honorific but referred to women leaders. One inscription to an infant as an archisynagogos was certainly honorific.

A group of elders* would direct the activities of the synagogue. The archisynagogos was probably chosen from among them. An almoner would collect and distribute alms. The hazzan, or "attendant," was the one who took care of the Scripture scrolls. Jesus gave back the Isaiah scroll to such an attendant (Gk hypbete, Lk 4:20). The hazzan also announced the beginning and the end of the Sabbath by blowing the sopar, or ram's horn. In later practice the hazzan was paid and lodged at the synagogue as a caretaker.

3. Services and Other Activities.

We know that the later synagogue services included such features as the recitation of the Še' ma ("Hear O hear," Deut 6:4-9; 11:13-21; Num 15:37-41), prayer facing Jerusalem, the "Amen" response from the congregation, the reading of excerpts from the scrolls of the Torah (Acts 15:21) and of the Prophets, translation of the Scriptures into Aramaic paraphrases, a sermon and a benediction (cf. Neh 8).

It became customary to recite while standing the Še'moneh 'E'srēh, or "Eighteen Benedictions," as a prayer. Toward the end of the first century A.D. a nineteenth was added, which was actually a curse against the mînîm, or heretics, namely the Christians.

Any male could be called upon to pray or to read the portions from the Torah or the Prophets (haptarot). On one occasion Jesus read from the scroll of the prophet Isaiah (61:1-2) in the synagogue at Nazareth. Any competent individual could also be called upon to give the sermon (cf. Acts 13:15, 42; 14:1; 17:2).

Jesus refers to the custom of the teachers of the Law* and the Pharisees* sitting in Moses’* seat (Mt 23:2). Such a seat of honor has been found at Chorazin. Stone benches along the walls were reserved for dignitaries. The general congregation may have sat on mats or carpets.

Though synagogues in the Middle Ages had segregated galleries for women,* there is no evidence for such segregation in ancient synagogues. In the NT the presence of women in the congregation is attested inasmuch as Jesus healed a crippled woman as he was teaching in a synagogue (Lk 13:10-17).

As the major community building, the synagogues were not only used for services on the Sabbath,* Mondays, Thursdays and festival days, but also for various community functions. Children would be taught there by the hazzan. Funds could be kept in a communal treasury at the synagogue.

Offenders could be judged before the elders in the synagogues and flogged forty stripes save one by the hazzn (Mk 13:9; 2 Cor 11:24). Apostates could be excommunicated (Jn 9:22; 12:42; 16:2).

4. Remains of Building.

It is estimated that we have archeological remains for over one hundred synagogue sites from Palestine and for about twenty from the Diaspora. There are relatively few archeological evidences for synagogues in Palestine from either the first or the second century A.D. An inscription of Theodotus from Jerusalem, which has usually been dated prior to AD. 70, refers to the establishment of a hostel for pilgrims and may possibly be related to the synagogue of the Freedmen (i.e., former slaves, Acts 6:9). It reads as follows: "Theodotus, son of Vettenos, the priest and archisynagōgos, son of a archisynagōgos and grandson of a archisynagogos, who built the synagogue for purposes of reciting the law and studying the commandments, and the hostel, chambers and water installations to provide for the needs of itinerants from abroad, and whose father, with the elders, and Simonides, founded the synagogue."

A building (12 x 15 m.) at the Herodian fortress of Masada has been identified as a first-century synagogue by Y. Yadin. It is equipped with benches and two rows of columns. The building's entrance was oriented toward Jerusalem. Yadin found an ostracon with the inscription "priestly tithe" at the site. He argues that Herod had originally constructed the building as a synagogue for his Jewish followers. The Herodian building was later reused by the Zealots until the fall of Masada in 73 AD. to the Romans. Pits in this building served as a genîzâ, or storage, for discarded Scriptural scrolls (Deuteronomy and Eze-kiel). Nearby were miqwâšot, or stepped pools, for ritual purification.

A triclinium (dining room) at Herodium was transformed into a synagogue by the Zealots. The building measures 10.5 x 15 m. with benches along the walls. A miqwâš is near the entrance. This building is similar in appearance to that at Masada. S. Guttman believes that a building at Gamla in the Golan heights, which he uncovered in 1976, is also a first century A.D. synagogue.

But the alleged synagogue uncovered at Magdala in 1975 by V. Corbo and S. Loffreda has turned out to be part of a villa. No remains are visible from a first-century building excavated at Chorazin and identified by some scholars as a synagogue. The basalt synagogue which is visible at Chorazin is from a much later period. (In the Diaspora a building on the Aegean island of Delos has been identified as a synagogue dating from pre-Christian times.)

The most splendid synagogue remains in Palestine are those of the white limestone structure at Capernaum. On the basis of coins the Franciscan excavators have dated this building to the fourth or fifth century A.D.; Israeli scholars still prefer to date it to the second or third century. In 1981 V. Corbo uncovered dark basalt walls underneath this synagogue, which he has identified as the remains of an earlier synagogue. He dug a trench within the nave and exposed a basalt wall for a length of 24 m. (78 ft). The walls are nearly four feet thick. The floor was a cobbled pavement made up of black basalt. Pottery associated with the floor establishes its date as the first century AD. Corbo has identified this structure as the synagogue, built by the centurion, which Jesus attended (Lk 7:1-5). (See J. F. Strange and H. Shanks.)
No certain synagogue remains from the second century have been identified except for those at Nabratein, though Catholic excavators have claimed to have discovered a synagogue of "Jewish Christians" (third-fourth cent) at the site of the Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth. They also identify several architectural fragments from the Franciscan monastery in Nazareth as derived from a synagogue (second-third cent).

Most synagogue remains are from the Late Roman and Byzantine eras (AD. 300-600), including about fifteen from Galilee and a similar number from the Golan Heights. The synagogues are of three architectural types: (1) Broad House, with the bema, or platform, on the southern long wall such as at Khirbet Shema; (2) the Basilica type, as at Capernaum and Chorazin; (3) the Basilica with an apse at Beth Alpha.

5. Interior.

These later synagogues were elaborately decorated with symbols such as the lampstand (men), palm frond and citron. They were provided with a bema, or platform, for the reading of the Scriptures, and a niche for the display of the ark or chest (rôn) for the biblical scrolls. In 1980 E. and C. Meyers discovered the fragment of such an ark niche from Nabratein. This pediment is decorated with reliefs of rampant lions, and a scallop shell with a hole for the chain of a perpetual lamp.

Many of the Byzantine synagogues were lavishly decorated with mosaics, including four mosaics of the zodiac at Hammath Tiberias, Beth Alpha, Na'aran and Husifa. The mosaic at Hammath Tiberias has a central panel with Helios (sun) on his chariot and figures reflecting the four seasons at the corners.

We also have three examples of lists of the twenty-four priesdy courses (mtsmarot), which hung in synagogues. Most synagogue inscriptions are of donors. The third-century A.D. synagogue at Dura Europos on the Euphrates River even had paintings on its walls depicting biblical narratives.

Because of the scant remains of synagogues from first-century A.D. Palestine, some scholars have argued that Luke-Acts is anachronistic when it refers to synagogue buildings. But this is to underestimate the fragmentary nature of the archeological evidence and to disregard not only the testimony of the New Testament but also of Josephus (Life 277, 280), who speaks of a proseuche

SYNOPTIC PROBLEM

In reading the four Gospels it is apparent that three of them resemble one another and one does not A brief time spent in any synopsis of the Gospels will indicate that Matthew, Mark and Luke share a number of striking similarities. The "Synoptic Problem" is the name that has been given to the problem of why the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke look so much alike. Why are they so similar in content, in wording and in the order of events found within them?

1. The Similarity of the Synoptic Gospels

2. The Existence of a Literary Relationship

3. Various Literary Explanations

4. The Griesbach Hypothesis

5. The Two-Document Hypothesis

6. Problems with the Two-Document Hypothesis

7. The Value of the Solution of the Synoptic Problem

1. The Similarity of the Synoptic Gospels.

1.1 Similarity in Wording.

The similarity of wording can easily be seen by comparing various parallel accounts found in these Gospels. This is best done by the use of a synopsis. Some helpful passages to compare are:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Matthew</th>
<th>Mark</th>
<th>Luke</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>24:4-8</td>
<td>13:5-8</td>
<td>21:8-11</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1.2. Similarity in Order. Another area of similarity can be found when one compares the order of the various accounts (pericopes). Note:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Matthew</th>
<th>Mark</th>
<th>Luke</th>
</tr>
</thead>

1.3. Similarity in Parenthetical Material. There also exists common parenthetical material. Note for example: "let the reader understand" in Matthew 24:15 and Mark 13:14; "he then said to the paralytic" in Matthew 9:6/Mark 2:10/Luke 5:24; "For he had said ... in Mark 5:8/Luke 8:29.
1.4. Similarity in Biblical Quotations. At times we find the exact same form of an OT quotation (see Old Testament in the Gospels). This would not be unusual if that form was identical either with the Hebrew OT or the Greek translation of the OT known as the Septuagint, but when we find an identical quotation of the OT which is different from both the Hebrew OT and the Greek OT, this similarity requires some sort of explanation (cf. Mk 1:2 par. Mt 3:3 and Lk 3:4; Mk 7:7 par. Mt 15:9).

2. The Existence of a Literary Relationship.

There have been various ways in which people have sought to explain the similarities mentioned above. One attempt has been to explain their similarity as due to the inspiration of the Gospels. The similarity is due to the Holy Spirit* (see Holy Spirit) having guided Matthew, Mark and Luke. Such an explanation, however, does not really solve the problem, for those who posit this explanation usually maintain that the Gospel of John was also inspired Yet John does not look like the Synoptics. If all four Gospels were written under the superintendence of the Holy Spirit this superintendence cannot at the same time explain why some Gospels look alike and why another does not.

A second attempt to explain this similarity involves the argument from history. Matthew, Mark and Luke look alike because they are accurate historical records of what Jesus said and did Without denying that the Synoptic Gospels do provide an accurate account of what Jesus said and did, it must be pointed out that at times we find a different ordering of the events and a different wording. In these instances are we to assume that the sayings and incidents are not historical? An incident in Jesus' ministry could be recounted correctly in different ways and in association with various events. Furthermore, a saying of Jesus in his native tongue, which was Aramaic, could be translated into Greek in several different ways (see Languages of Palestine).

These two explanations do not explain adequately the kind of similarities we find in the Synoptic Gospels. Some other explanation must be sought As early as 1796 J. G. von Herder sought to explain the Synoptic Problem by positing a common oral tradition used by Matthew, Mark and Luke. This explanation was developed more fully by J. K. L Gieseler in 1818. According to this explanation the disciples* created this oral tradition which soon became fixed in form. Some time after it was translated into Greek, this common tradition was used by the Synoptic writers. Thus Matthew, Mark and Luke look alike because they all follow the exact same oral tradition.

There is little doubt that there was a period when the Gospel traditions circulated orally. Whether there ever was a period in which these traditions circulated only orally, how long that period lasted, the extent to which Matthew, Mark and Luke were influenced by the oral tradition, etc., have not been and may never be resolved. But can this explanation elucidate adequately the degree of similarity found in the Synoptic Gospels? This does not appear to be the case. At times the degree of similarity seems to require more than just a common oral tradition. More importantly, a common oral tradition is not able to explain the similar editorial comments which we find. Why do we find in the exact same location a word from the writer to his audience— "let the reader understand" (Mt 24:15/Mk 13:14)? Even more difficult for this explanation is the extensive agreement in the order of the material. Thus, although one does not want to minimize the influence of a common oral tradition upon the writers of the Gospels, it would appear that the similarities we encounter require the existence of some sort of a literary relationship.

If a literary relationship exists between the Synoptic Gospels, then the next question that must be investigated is the nature of that literary relationship. One explanation, originating with F. Schleiermacher (1817), suggested that the disciples had taken notes (memorabilia) of Jesus' words and deeds. These eventually were collected and arranged topically. From these collected memorabilia the Synoptic Gospels arose. This "fragmentary hypothesis" never received much support for like the oral hypothesis it was not able to explain the extensive agreements in order.

Another theory is that of a so-called Ur-Gospel ("primitive" or "original" Gospel). According to G. E. Lessing (1776) and J. G. Eichhorn (1796), there existed an early written Gospel in Aramaic. This was translated into Greek and went through several revisions. The similarities we find in the Synoptic Gospels are due to the common use of a Greek translation of this "Ur-Gospel." The differences are explained by their use of different Greek recensions. The main problem with this argument is that as one sought to reconstruct what this Ur-Gospel looked like, it began to look more and more like an Ur-Markus, that is, an earlier non-canonical form of the Gospel of Mark. This in turn began to look more and more like the canonical Gospel of Mark.

A more likely literary explanation is to see some sort of interdependence between the Synoptic Gospels themselves. The three most common explanations involving interdependence are:

Matthew wrote first, Mark used Matthew, Luke used Mark (Augustine).

Mark wrote first, Matthew used Mark, Luke used Mark. Matthew and Luke also used another common source—"Q" (H. J. Holtzmann, 1863; B. H. Streeter, 1924).

Of these three theories the most viable are the latter two: the Griesbach hypothesis and the two-document hypothesis.

4. The Griesbach Hypothesis.

This hypothesis, which argues that Matthew was the first Gospel written, that Luke used Matthew and that Mark used both Matthew and Luke, was first proposed by H. Owen in 1764. It received its name due to its advocacy by J. J. Griesbach. It has been revived and received considerable impetus recently as the two-Gospel hypothesis through the work of W. R. Farmer, J. B. Orchard and H.-H. Stoldt. Its early popularity and demise were associated with the rise and fall of the Tubingen Hypothesis (i.e., Matthew, Thesis; Luke, Antithesis; Mark, Synthesis). The strength of the Griesbach Hypothesis is that it appears to explain several aspects of the Synoptic Problem.

4.1. The Strengths of the Griesbach Hypothesis.

4.1.1. It Agrees with the Church Tradition. The early church tradition is quite unanimous in claiming that Matthew was the first Gospel written (Irenaeus, Eusebius, Augustine). Clement of Alexandria stated that the Gospels with genealogies* were written first Augustine furthermore called Mark an abridgment of Matthew. Whereas the priority of Mark was unknown in the early church, the priority of Matthew was assumed. It is clear that the Griesbach hypothesis fits this early tradition concerning the Synoptic Gospels better than the two-document hypothesis. It also fits the order of the Gospels in the NT canon* better.

4.1.2. It Can Explain All the Gospel Agreements. In comparing the various agreements between the triple tradition (parallel passages in Matthew, Mark and Luke) we find that frequently we have Matthew-Mark agreements against Luke, Mark-Luke agreements against Matthew and even Matthew-Luke agreements against Mark. The Griesbach hypothesis can explain these quite simply: the Matthew-Mark agreements against Luke result when Luke deviates from his Matthean source but Mark does not; the Mark-Luke agreements against Matthew result when Luke deviates from his Matthean source and Mark follows Luke rather than Matthew; the Matthew-Luke agreements against Mark result when Luke follows Matthew and Mark deviates from both his sources. With regard to the latter the Griesbach hypothesis is strong where the two-document hypothesis is weak. It can easily explain the Matthew-Luke agreements against Mark, whereas the two-document hypothesis struggles with how Matthew and Luke can agree independently against their Markan source when they did not know each other, that is, when one did not use the other.

4.1.3. It Explains the Markan Redundancies. Within Mark we find at least 213 cases of redundancy such as: 1:32 ("When evening came, as the sun was setting"); 1:42 ("And immediately the leprosy left him and he was cleansed"); 4:21 ("Is a lamp brought in order to be placed under a bushel basket or under a bed?"); etc. The Griesbach hypothesis suggests that this can best be explained by understanding that Mark tended to act with respect to his sources in the same way as the early scribes and copyists of the NT. When they found two different readings in their sources, they tended to harmonize them by including both. Mark's redundancies are therefore due to his having conflated his two sources when he came across different readings. Thus Matthew 8:16, "When evening came," and Luke 4:40, "While the sun was setting," become in Mark 1:32, "When evening came, as the sun was setting"; Matthew 5:14, "They do not set under a bushel basket" and Luke 8:16, "Nor set it under a bed," become in Mark 4:21, "Is a lamp brought in order to be placed under a bushel basket or under a bed?"

Other evidence for the Griesbach hypothesis, such as there being no need for the postulation of an additional hypothetical source such as "Q,*" could also be mentioned.
4.2. Problems for the Griesbach Hypothesis. A number of problems encountered by the Griesbach hypothesis have led many scholars to consider the two-document hypothesis a more viable option for explaining the Synoptic Problem. Two of these, the arguments in favor of the priority of Mark and the difficulty of claiming that Luke used Matthew, will be discussed at length below (see 5.1. and 5.2.1.). There are several additional weaknesses.

4.2.1. The Griesbach Hypothesis Also Conflicts with the Church Tradition. Whereas the church tradition is unanimous in stating that Matthew was written before Mark and Luke, that tradition in the same breath also argues that Matthew was written in Aramaic (or Hebrew). Yet it is clear that our present Matthew is not a simple translation from Aramaic (or Hebrew) into Greek. Thus the Matthew of church tradition does not fit the Greek Matthew of the Synoptic Problem. If therefore the tradition at this point is either incorrect or speaking of a predecessor (or source) of our Greek Matthew, this greatly weakens the value of the church tradition for solving the Synoptic Problem (see Matthew, Gospel of).

Other aspects of the church tradition also cause difficulty for the Griesbach hypothesis. These include Papias' statement that Mark had as his main source the "memoirs" of Peter and wrote his Gospel independently of Matthew, and the views of Origen, the Anti-Marcionite Prologues and Augustine that Luke was written last.

4.2.2. Certain Gospel Agreements Are Best Explained by the Priority of Mark Whereas the Griesbach hypothesis can explain all the Gospel agreements, in numerous instances the particular explanation of why two Gospels agree against the other is not persuasive. This is particularly true with regard to Matthew-Mark agreements against Luke, and Mark-Luke agreements against Matthew. In the abstract the Griesbach hypothesis can explain such agreements easily, but when one seeks to explain why Mark and Luke agree against Matthew and why Mark and Matthew agree against Luke, the explanations are often quite unconvincing (see 5.1.6. below). In general the attempts on the basis of the Griesbach hypothesis to explain Luke's use of Matthew and Mark's use of Matthew and/or Luke are less convincing than the explanations of how Matthew and Luke used Mark according to the two-document hypothesis. Clearly the vast majority of redaction-critical investigation in the Synoptic Gospels has been based on the view that Matthew and Luke used Mark. Attempts to do redaction-critical work on the basis of a Matthean priority are meager and less convincing.
4.2.3. The Marian Redundancies Can Be Explained by the Two-Document Hypothesis. At first glance the argument that the 213 examples of Markan redundancy are due to his conflation of Matthew and Luke appears convincing, but on closer examination it is clear that out of these 213 examples only 17 are clear cases of redundancy in which Matthew has only one half of the redundancy and Luke has the other. (In 39 instances Matthew and Luke have the same parallel redundancy and lack the other in 37 instances they possess neither redundant parallel; in 60 instances Matthew has one or both parallels and Luke has neither, in 26 instances Luke has one or both parallels and Matthew has neither, in 11 instances Luke has both parallels and Matthew has one; in 17 instances Matthew has both parallels and Luke has one; and in 6 instances Matthew and Luke have both parallels.) Thus we are essentially speaking of only 17 possible examples of conflation and not 213.

The attempt of the Griesbach hypothesis to see the Gospel of Mark as being typified by conflation is furthermore compromised when it at the same time speaks of Mark as an abridgment of Matthew and Luke. These supposed tendencies are essentially contradictory. The harmony of Tatian called the Diatesseron (c. 150) is an early example of conflation at work But when one compares the portions of the Diatesseron derived from the Synoptic Gospels, they are considerably longer than any of the Synoptic Gospels. Mark, on the other hand, is considerably shorter than either Matthew or Luke. It is therefore quite unlike this early example of conflation. The Markan redundancies are therefore not a convincing argument in favor of the Griesbach hypothesis. It may even be that they can be better explained by the two-document hypothesis (See 5.1.2. below).

5. The Two-Document Hypothesis.

The explanation which has come to dominate Synoptic studies during the last century and a half has been the two-document hypothesis. This theory argues that Mark was the first Gospel written and that it was used independently by Matthew and Luke. It also argues that along with Mark, Matthew and Luke used another common source which has been called "Q." Evidence for the priority of Mark and the existence of "Q" follow.

5.1. The Priority of Mark.
5.1.1. Mark Is the Shortest Gospel Of the three Synoptic Gospels, Mark is the shortest in length: It contains 661 verses; Matthew contains 1,068; Luke contains 1,149. When their content is compared, 97.2 per cent of Mark is paralleled in Matthew and 88.4 per cent is paralleled in Luke. It is easier to understand Matthew and Luke using Mark, and choosing to add additional materials to it than to think of Mark using Matthew, Luke or both, and deciding to omit so much material. Why would he have omitted the birth accounts (see Birth of Jesus), the Sermon on the Mount (see Sermon on the Mount), the Lord’s Prayer (see Prayer), various resurrection* appearances, etc. It is easier to understand Matthew and Luke choosing to add this material to their Markan source than Mark choosing to omit so much material. The suggestion that Mark may have desired to produce a shorter, more abridged account stumbles over the fact that the common accounts in the Synoptic Gospels are generally longer in Mark. If Mark wanted to write an abbreviated account of Matthew and/or Luke, why would he choose to make the stories in his abridged account longer? These are contrary tendencies. When one seeks to abridge a work, one generally does so not only by eliminating certain materials but by abridging what one decides to keep.

5.1.2. Mark Has the Poorest Greek. There is a consensus that the Greek of Mark is poorer than that of either Matthew or Luke. It is easier to understand Matthew and Luke using Mark and improving on his Greek than to think of Mark copying the better Greek of Matthew and/or Luke and making it worse. There are numerous examples of peculiar Markan expressions.

(1) Mark contains various colloquialisms (Mk 10:20, "I have observed," aorist middle; 2:4, "bed" as kra-batton) and grammatical problems (Mk 4:41, "hears" as a singular verb; 16:6, "see" as a singular verb; 5:9-10, "he begged" for the plural "we").

(2) Mark has Aramaic expressions (Mk 3:17; 5:41; 7:11, 34; 14:36; 15:22, 34) which are not found in Matthew or Luke. It is much easier to see Matthew and Luke omitting these Aramaic expressions and giving their Greek counterparts than to see Mark choosing to abridge Matthew and/or Luke but adding Aramaic expressions which his Greek readers did not understand.

(3) Mark is frequently redundant On numerous occasions (there are 213 examples), Mark has a redundant expression such as "When evening came, as the sun was setting" (1:32) (cf. also Mk 1:42; 2:25-26; 4:21; 15:24). It is easier to understand why Matthew and/or Luke would seek to eliminate such redundancies than to understand why, in abridging Matthew and/or Luke, Mark would have added them.

5.1.3. Mark Has Harder Readings. At times we find in Mark a saying which creates a theological difficulty but do not find this difficulty in Matthew and/or Luke. In Mark, for example, we find apparent limitations of Jesus' power (cf. Mk 1:32-34; 3:9-10; 6:5-6 with par.). At other times we find theological difficulties in Mark but not in Matthew or Luke (cf. Mk 10:17-18; 3:4-5; 2:25-26). In Mark 10:17-18 we have Jesus saying, "Why do you call me good? No one is good but God alone." It is easy to see why Matthew would want to change this to "Why do you ask me about what is good? One there is who is good." The changing (or explaining) of Mark's harder readings by Matthew and/or Luke is much easier to understand than Mark choosing to make the easier reading in Matthew and/or Luke more difficult.

5.1.4. The Lack of Matthew-Luke Verbal Agreements against Mark. If one observes the various kinds of agreements in the Synoptic Gospels, it is clear that, whereas we have numerous Matthew-Mark agreements against Luke and Mark-Luke agreements against Matthew, there is a paucity of Matthew-Luke agreements against Mark. Assuming the simplest kind of interdependence in which one Gospel writer used one other Gospel writer, we have the following possibilities.

All other possible combinations of interdependence require that either Matthew "knew" (in the sense of "used") Luke or that Luke "knew" Matthew. As we shall see, this is most unlikely (see 5.2.1. below).
Given the fact that accounts of the triple tradition seldom show Matthew and Luke agreeing against Mark in their wording, explanations (1) and (3) cannot explain this. Furthermore (1), (c) and (e) cannot account for the Mark-Luke agreements and (3), (b) and (d) cannot explain the Matthew-Mark agreements. Only explanations (2), (a) and (f) can explain the abundance of Matthew-Mark and Mark-Luke agreements and the lack of Matthew-Luke agreements. However, the arguments given earlier argue against (a) and (f).

5.1.5. The Lack of Matthew-Luke Agreements in Order against Mark. Similar to the preceding argument but involving the order of the materials is the observation that when Matthew differs from the order of the accounts found in Mark, Luke never agrees with Matthew. Likewise, when Luke differs from the order which we find in Mark, Matthew never agrees with Luke against Mark. This observation by K. Lachmann (1835) has sometimes been thought to be an absolute proof for the priority of Mark. This, however, is not a proof of Markan priority, for with the Griesbach hypothesis in which Matthew was written first, Luke used Matthew, and Mark used both Matthew and Luke, we can explain such agreements in order. Lachmann, however, added to this observation the fact that, whereas Matthew's deviation from Mark and Luke's deviation from Mark are understandable, a Markan deviation from the order of Matthew and Luke is much less so. In light of this observation, there is no reason to refer to this as the "Lachmann Fallacy."

5.1.6. Certain Literary Agreements Are Best Explained by a Markan Priority. There exist in the Synoptic Gospels certain literary agreements which are best explained on the basis of Matthew and Luke having used Mark. For instance, in Matthew 9:1-2/Mark 2:1-5/Luke 5:17-20 Matthew has, as he does frequently elsewhere (cf. Mt 8:5-13; 9:18-26), abbreviated the Markan account and omitted the reason why Jesus saw the faith* of the paralytic and his friends. In Matthew 27:15-22/Mark 15:6-13/Luke 23:18-21, Luke has abbreviated the account and omitted the explanation of the Barabbas episode by not referring to the custom of releasing a prisoner at the time of the Passover. In Matthew 3:13-16/Mark 1:9-10/Luke 3:21-22 Matthew has sought to change the wording of Mark and has, by changing the verb baptized to the participle "having been baptized," mistakenly placed the word immediately with the verb "went up" (see Baptism). The result, although understandable, has Jesus immediately coming up out of the water rather than immediately seeing the heavens* opened. In Matthew 19:16-17/Mark 10:17-18/Luke 18:18-19 Matthew has sought to eliminate the difficulty created by Mark's "Why do you call me good? No one is good but God alone." Instead he has "Why do you ask me about what is good?" However, his next verse indicates that his source spoke about God being good—not "good" in an abstract sense, for he adds, "One there is who is good."

These and other literary agreements are more understandable on the basis of Matthew and Luke having used Mark than on the basis of any other theory of interdependence.

5.1.7. The Argument from Redaction. Probably the most significant argument today in favor of the priority of Mark involves redactional studies. It is undeniable that the great majority of redactional investigations of the Synoptic Gospels proceed on the basis of the priority of Mark. It is easier, for example, to understand why Matthew added his emphasis on Jesus as the "Son of David" to the Markan account than to understand why Luke and Mark would have chosen to omit this reference (cf. Mt 12:23; 15:22; 21:9, 15). Similarly, it is easier to understand Matthew having added his famous "this was to fulfill . . ." in 1:22; 2:15, 17; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:14, 35; 21:4; 27:9 to his Markan source than to understand why Mark and Luke would have chosen to omit them. Five of the last six references reveal this clearly, for the parallels in Mark and Luke lack this reference. To assume that Mark and Luke used Matthew and chose to omit these references is most difficult to comprehend. On the other hand Matthew's having added them to his Markan source is easily understandable.

We also discover that certain Markan stylistic features, when found in Matthew, appear almost exclusively in the material which Matthew has in common with Mark The famous Markan use of "immediately" occurs forty-one times within his Gospel. In Matthew it occurs eighteen times. Of these eighteen times, fourteen occur in the material he shares with Mark. The other four occur in his M* (Matthew's special material) and Q material. However, of the 18,293 words which are in Matthew, 10,901 have parallels in Mark. A total of 7,392 do not have a parallel. This means that there is one "immediately" for every 778 words in the material Matthew has in common with Mark, but there is only one "immediately" for every 1,848 words in the non-Markan material (M* and Q*). The more frequent appearance of the word immediately in the material Matthew has in common with Mark is more easily explained by his use of Mark, where this word is found in abundance, than by any other explanation.

Another Markan stylistic feature is his use of an editorial "for (gar)" clause to explain something to his reader (see Mk 1:16,22; 5:28; 6:17-18 etc.). Within Mark we find thirty-four such clauses; within Matthew we find ten, but all ten appear in the material he shares with Mark. Not one is found in the remaining material. If Matthew used Mark, the presence of these editorial "for" clauses is understandable. But why would they be only in one area of the Matthean material, the material he shares with Mark, if Matthew did not use Mark?

5.1.8. Mark’s Theology Is Less Developed. When one compares the common material in Matthew, Mark and Luke, it is obvious time and time again that the materials in Matthew and Luke are theologically more developed. Mark, for example, uses the term "Lord" (kyrios) for Jesus six times, but in Matthew we find it used not only in the same six instances, but in an additional twenty-four. Fifteen of these instances are found in material where Mark lacks this term. The same can be said of Luke, who uses this tide even more frequently. It is easier to understand how Matthew and Luke would have added this title to their Markan source than to understand why Mark would have chosen to eliminate it if he were using Matthew and/or Luke. The same can be said for the tide "Christ."

5.1.9. Conclusion. The reason why most scholars maintain the priority of Mark is not based on any one argument listed above. Rather, the priority of Mark is based on the entire collection of arguments. The weight of any one argument may not be convincing, but together they are quite convincing, and the best available hypothesis for explaining the Synoptic Problem is that Matthew and Luke used Mark in the composition of their Gospels. Being a "hypothesis," absolute proof is by definition lacking, and the Synoptic Problem must always remain open to a better hypothesis if one should become available.

5.2. The Existence of "Q." Once the priority of Mark has been accepted, we are faced with another problem. This involves the common material found in Matthew and Luke which we do not find in Mark, the so-called Q material. Some examples of this are: Matthew 6:24/Luke 16:13; Matthew 7:7-11/Luke 11:9-13; Matthew 11:25-27/Luke 10:21-22; Matthew 23:37-39/Luke 13:34-35. How is this common material to be explained? We shall discuss below the suggestion that Matthew and Luke obtained this material from various oral traditions, but the simplest explanation is that either Matthew used Luke or that Luke used Matthew to obtain this material. There are a number of reasons, however, why it is unlikely that Luke used Matthew. (The theory that Matthew used Luke is held by few, and most of the arguments given below also demonstrate that Matthew did not use Luke.)
5.2.1. Matthew and Luke Did Not Know Each Other.

This is evident from several lines of evidence.

(1) Luke lacks the Matthean additions to the triple tradition. When we find an account in the triple tradition and Matthew has something in the account not found in Mark, we never find that Matthean addition in Luke (cf. Mt 8:17; 12:5-7; 13:14-15 etc.). If Luke used Matthew, why do we never find any of these additions in Luke? The easiest explanation is that Luke did not use Matthew. (The same can be said about Lukan additions to the triple tradition. They are never found in Matthew.)

(2) The "Q" material is found in a different context in Luke. The Q material is arranged in Matthew into five blocks of teachings surrounded by six blocks of narrative. As a result we find: Narrative (1—4); Teaching (5-7); N (8-9); T (10); N (11-12); T (13); N (14-17); T (18); N (19-22); T (23—25); N (26-28). It should also be noted that each of these five teaching sections end similarly with "and when Jesus finished these sayings" (7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). Luke, however, has lumped the Q material into two sections: 6:20-8:3; 9:51-18:14. It is difficult to understand why, if Luke used Matthew, he would have wanted to destroy the framework of the Q material in Matthew for his arrangement.

(3) At times the Q material is less developed in Luke. If Luke had used Matthew, one would expect that the form of the material in Luke would generally be more theologically developed than the corresponding material in Matthew. We do not find this, however. At times the Q material in Luke is clearly less developed. (Cf. Lk 6:20, "poor"; 21, "hunger now"; 31, no reference to "Law and the prophets"; 11:2, "Father"; 14:26, "hate.")

(4) The lack of Matthew-Luke agreements in order and wording against Mark. If Luke used Matthew, it is difficult to understand why his order never agrees with Matthew against Mark and why there are so few verbal agreements in Matthew-Luke against Mark.

(5) The lack of M material in Luke. By definition the M material consists of the material in Matthew not found in either Mark or Luke. If Luke used Matthew it is difficult to explain why he did not include some of this material. Such an argument from silence is always questionable. Nevertheless, knowing some of the theological interests of Luke, it is difficult to understand why, if he used
Matthew, he did not include such material as the coming of the wise men (Mt 2:1-12). To have Gentiles present at the birth of Jesus would have fit his universal emphasis quite well. Likewise, the exclusion of such stories as the flight to Egypt and the return to Nazareth (Mt 2:13-23); the story of the guards at the tomb (Mt 27:62-66) and their report (Mt 28:11-15); and the unique Matthean material concerning the resurrection (Mt 28:9-10, 16-20) is inexplicable.

On the basis of the above arguments it seems reasonable to conclude that Luke did not know Matthew (and Matthew did not know Luke). As a result some other common source has been posited. The origin of "Q" as a symbol for this common material found only in Matthew and Luke is debated, but most probably it comes from the first letter of the German word Quelle, which means source.

5.2.2. Was Q a Written Source? If we assume that Matthew and Luke used a common source alongside Mark, was this source written or oral? The main arguments in favor of a written Q involve the exactness in wording of some of the Q parallels. The exactness in wording is at times quite impressive (cf. Mt 6:24 par. Lk 16:13 where twenty-seven of twenty-eight words are exactly the same; Mt 7:7-8 par. Lk 11:9-10 where all twenty-four words are exactly the same). Is this exactness better explained on the basis of a common written source? On the other hand, at times some of the Q material is not very exact.

Another argument frequently put forward for a written Q involves an agreement in order. At times one can observe a certain degree of order between the Q material in Matthew and Luke, but these agreements in order are not sufficient to require a common written source. Some have also sought to find a common order between the Q material in Luke and the Q material in each of the five Q sections in Matthew, that is, the order of Q in Luke is compared to Matthew 5—7, then to Matthew 10, to Matthew 13 etc. The argument from order has been convincing to some scholars but not to most.

A third argument for Q being a written source is the presence of doublets (double accounts of the same incident) in Matthew and Luke. This supposedly demonstrates that they used two separate written sources—Mark and Q. At best, however, if such doublets exist they prove the use of a second common source, but this could have been oral or fragmentary written sources. A further attempt to prove that Q was a written source has been the effort to demonstrate that there is a common vocabulary and style in the Q material which reveals that it comes from a common written source. This attempt however, has not been convincing.

5.2.3. Summary. The Q hypothesis is not without its problems, but it possesses fewer difficulties than alternative hypotheses. As to its form, it is difficult to determine if the Q material came to Matthew and Luke as a single written source, as several written sources or from a common oral tradition. That Matthew and Luke did not know each other seems fairly certain. This, along with the argument for Markan priority, favors some sort of a two-document hypothesis in which Matthew and Luke used Mark and probably a written Q. A related version of this is the four-document hypothesis which assumes that the unique material found in Matthew (the M material) and Luke (the L material) came from two additional written sources.

The Two- (or Four-) Document Hypothesis

The major alternative to the two- (or four-) document hypothesis is the Griesbach hypothesis (see 4. above). This hypothesis explains well the major problem facing the two-document hypothesis—the existence of Matthew-Luke agreements against Mark. Along with various agreements in omission created by their abbreviation of Mark, and the agreements which came about by their improvement of Mark's grammar, there are several significant Matthew-Luke agreements against Mark (cf. Mk 1:7-8; 2:12; 3:24,26-29; 5:27; 6:33; 8:35; 9:24, 18-19; 10:29; 14:65, 72 and the Matthew-Luke parallels).

Although the Griesbach hypothesis can explain these agreements better than the two-document hypothesis, we must not forget that the reverse is true concerning all the arguments for Markan priority and against Matthew and Luke knowing each other. These arguments are far more numerous and weighty. As to the Matthew-Luke agreements against Mark, several explanations can be offered.

6.1. Overlapping Traditions. The Q material and Mark must have overlapped in certain places. At times Matthew and Luke may have preferred the Q readings over Mark and thus created a Matthew-Luke agreement.

6.2. Textual Corruption. We know that the early scribes had a tendency to make parallel accounts in the Gospels conform to one another, and since Matthew was the best-known and most frequently used Synoptic Gospel, it may be that some early scribe copying Luke may have changed his Lukan text to conform to the reading in Matthew. In such instances, the result would be a Matthew-Luke agreement.

6.3. Overlapping Oral Tradition. It may also be possible that at times Matthew and Luke knew a form of the oral tradition which was more familiar to them than the wording in their Markan source and so chose, quite independently of each other, to word their accounts according to the oral tradition. Again, a Matthew-Luke agreement would have resulted.

Among the several other possible reasons for a Matthew-Luke agreement are: coincidental modifications of Mark's grammar; coincidental omissions of Markan material; the common use of a different Mark and coincidental modifications of difficult passages in Mark.

7. The Value of the Solution of the Synoptic Problem.

The solution of the Synoptic Problem proves to be of value in several ways.

7.1. Historical Criticism. In seeking the solution to this problem great impetus was provided by the desire to find the oldest and, it was assumed, best historical source for investigating the life of Jesus. It was hoped that once the basic source of the Synoptic Gospels was discovered, scholars would possess an historical source uncluttered with the theology of the early church which would then be the basis for the quest for the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus). Mark, it was thought, provided this source. Today we realize that Mark, like the other Gospels, is not an objective biography of the life of Jesus (see Gospel [Genre]). What biography would omit the first thirty years of a person's life? And what Gospel writer is "objective"? It is evident therefore, that this quest for a completely objective biography of the life of Jesus was doomed from the start.

The solution of the Synoptic Problem, however, has provided certain tools which are useful for historical investigation. The criterion of multiple attestation is based on the premise that several witnesses are better than one, and if a teaching of Jesus is witnessed to in Mark, Q, M, L, and John, then we have five different sources which witness to its historicity (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). Another useful tool is the criterion of divergent patterns from the redaction. Because of the application of the two-document hypothesis, Synoptic scholarship today is better acquainted with the literary style and theological emphases of the different Evangelists. It is quite apparent that if an Evangelist included something in his Gospel which seemed to conflict with his own emphasis, he witnessed to that tradition being very old and well-known.

7.2. Redactional Investigation of the Gospels. By observing how Matthew and Luke used Mark and Q, we are better able to understand their theological emphases. Thus we are better able to comprehend the meaning of their works. One only needs to compare the following examples with their parallels to see how they help reveal the theological emphases of the Gospel writer: Luke 5:17; 6:27-28; 11:13; Matthew 8:15; 13:35; 15:22.

7.3. Hermeneutical Insights. It is frequently helpful to observe how one Evangelist interpreted his source, for the Evangelists were closer in time, situation, language and thought-world to their contemporaries than we. As a result we can at times find help in interpreting a difficult text by observing how they interpreted this text. For example, it is evident from Matthew 10:37-38 that Luke's command to "hate one's parents" (14:26) means that his disciples must love Jesus more. One can also gain insight on how particular teachings of Jesus can be applied by observing how the Evangelists seek to apply them to their situation. A good example of this is the parable* of the lost sheep (Lk 15:3-7 par. Mt 18:10-14).

SYNOPTICS AND JOHN

The differences between the Gospel of John and the Synoptic Gospels have been remarked on through the centuries, certainly since the second century of our era. One solution to account for the differences was to assume that (1) John was the last Gospel (see Gospel [Genre]) to be written and (2) it was written to complement the others. Clement of Alexandria came near to this in his famous assertion: "Last of all John, perceiving that the bodily facts had been made plain in the Gospel, being urged by his friends and inspired by the Spirit, composed a spiritual Gospel" (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.14.7). The Muratorian Canon, following that tradition, observed, "Although various points are taught in the several books of the Gospels, yet it makes no difference to the faith of the believers, since all things in all of them are declared by one supreme Spirit" That sounds as though John's Gospel may have been questioned in light of its differences from the Synoptics, and assurance was given that the Holy Spirit* was behind all four Gospels (see Canon).

In reality there is no hint in the Fourth Gospel that the Evangelist was either complementing or correcting the other three. What is indisputable is that the Synoptic Gospels are clearly linked with each other and can be set alongside each other for easy comparison, but the Fourth Gospel does not readily permit such treatment. It is our task to consider the nature of the differences and the possible relations between the first three Gospels and the Gospel of John.

1. Relations As to Content

2. The Teaching of Jesus

3. Literary Relations

1. Relations As to Content

1.1. Topography. The first three Gospels recount the ministry of Jesus in Galilee. His only ministry in Jerusalem was in the week leading to the Passover (see Feasts), at which time he was opposed by the Jewish rulers, arrested, tried and put to death by the Romans. In the Fourth Gospel the scene of Jesus' ministry is almost entirely set in Jerusalem and Judea; the only description of ministry in Galilee* is of three signs in John 2:1-11; 4:43-54; and chapter 6. Apart from chapter 4, which tells of the encounter of Jesus with Samaritans,* the rest of the Gospel is devoted to his work in Judea (see Archeology and Geography).

This feature is emphasized by the prominence given to the presence of Jesus at the Jewish festivals in the Temple.* We read of Jesus attending the festivals of Pentecost (Jn 5), Tabernacles (Jn 7—8), Dedication (Jn 10) and Passover (2:13; 12-19). These festivals in varied ways set forth the dealings of God with his people in the past their faith* in God in the present and their hope of the kingdom of God* for the future. Jesus is presented in these episodes as the fulfillment of all that these festivals represented of God's revelation and promised salvation.*

The frequent presence of Jesus in Jerusalem and the increasingly intense opposition to him from the Pharisees* and Jewish authorities described by John, shed light on the Synoptic references to the early hostility to Jesus of the scribes* and Pharisees, as well as his frequent mention of the destiny that awaited him in Jerusalem (see e.g., Mk 8:31 par.; Lk 13:33). The same applies to the weeping of Jesus over Jerusalem because the people did not know the season of its visitation (Lk 19:41-42), and his desire time after time to gather Jerusalem under his care ("How often did I wish to gather your children ... but you were unwilling," Mt 23:37-38).

There are hints that a primary source of John's Gospel is of a person living in Judea during the ministry of Jesus and of the story being written from the viewpoint of one dwelling in Jerusalem. Note the reference to the disciple who was a friend of the High Priest (see Priest) and who was able to use his influence to bring Peter into the High Priest's court at the trial of Jesus (18:15-16; see Trial of Jesus). The account of the Triumphal Entry (see Triumphal Entry) of Jesus into Jerusalem is told from the viewpoint of one in the city (12:9-18) in contrast to the Synoptics, which describe the event from the viewpoint of the Galileans entering the city (Mk 11:1-11 par.). This probably explains the fuller information in John about the trial of Jesus than that of the Synoptics, particularly of the trial before Pilate (see Pontius Pilate).

1.2. Chronology.

1.2.1. Beginning of Jesus' Ministry. Whereas in the Synoptic Gospels the ministry of Jesus and the call of the first disciples is set after the imprisonment of John the Baptist* (Mk 1:14-20), in John's Gospel Jesus commences his ministry in Judea during the period of John's work, and his earliest disciples appear to be disciples of the Baptist (Jn 1:35-51). From John 2—3 it is evident that Jesus not only labored in Judea at the same time as John, but he is reported to have baptized more disciples than John himself. It is in this context that the most specific witness of John the Baptist to Jesus in the Gospels is given (1:29, 35; 3:27-30).

1.2.2. Length of Ministry of Jesus. The length of the ministry of Jesus according to the Synoptic Gospels is difficult to determine, but the mention of one solitary visit of Jesus to Jerusalem for the celebration of the Passover gives the impression that it could have been limited to a year. In the Gospel of John, by contrast three Passovers are mentioned by the Evangelist (2:13; 6:4; 12:1), implying that the ministry of Jesus could have extended over two to three years (see Chronology).

1.2.3. Time of Cleansing of the Temple. The so-called cleansing of the Temple (see Temple Cleansing) in the Synoptic Gospels occurs in the only place where it could happen in their representation of the ministry of Jesus, namely on his visit to Jerusalem at the Passover season (Mk 11:15-18). In John, however, it is set at the beginning of the public ministry of Jesus, immediately following the record of the turning of the water* into wine* at Cana (2:13-22). This has led many to assume that Jesus cleansed the Temple twice. Others have championed the Synoptics over against John, or John over against the Synoptics.

It is now commonly believed that the Synoptic dating is correct and that the Fourth Evangelist has placed the event at the beginning of his account to emphasize its significance for understanding the ministry of Jesus. Chapter 2 is a kind of program chapter for the Gospel: Whoever understands the turning of the water into wine (cf. Is 25:6-9) and the cleansing of the Temple has the key to grasping the meaning of our Lord's words and work, above all his redeeming action for the kingdom of God and the new worship* thereby opened for humankind.

1.2.4. The Date of the Last Supper. The Synoptic Gospels indicate that the last meal of Jesus with his disciples was a Passover celebration (cf. Mk 14:12; Lk 22:15; see Last Supper). John states that the meal took place on the eve of the Passover (Jn 13:1; 18:28), and that Jesus died immediately prior to the Passover (19:31). How to deal with this clash of evidence has taxed the minds of scholars for generations. Many hold that the Synoptics are right, and that John changed the date to emphasize that Jesus died as God's Passover Lamb (cf. 1:29; 19:31-37). Such a suggestion is to be repudiated.

A Jewish tradition (baraita) preserved in the Talmud states that Jesus was stoned and hanged on the eve of the Passover because he practiced magic and enticed and led Israel astray (Sanh. 43a). It has been suggested that the Passover was observed on two different dates, one on the basis of a solar calendar, followed by the Essenes, the other a lunar calendar, observed by the Jewish authorities. If Jesus followed the former, he celebrated the Passover with his disciples on the Tuesday evening, whereas the official calendar, known to John in Jerusalem, set the observance on the Friday evening, and the days between Tuesday and Friday would have been taken up with the trial proceedings (Jaubert). The suggestion is disputed. Other solutions include the belief that the Synoptics record an anticipated Passover, a meal replete with Passover associations. Further investigation of this problem is required. The chief point made by all four Gospels is the fulfillment of the Passover in the death of Jesus (see Passion Narrative).
2. The Teaching of Jesus.

2.1. Johnamite Style. The mode of the teaching of Jesus is recognizable in each of the Synoptic Gospels, despite the individual style of the Evangelists, notably his aphorisms (see Chreia; Form Criticism) and parables.* These are represented in John's Gospel, but much less frequently, and that for a simple reason: the Fourth Evangelist mediates the teaching of Jesus in his own language. The contrast of the collections of sayings in the Synoptics with the longer discourses in John is a matter of degree; the five Matthean discourses are all compilations of sayings according to subject, and so are those in John. (An examination of the Discourses of chapters 13—17 will show that the same applies even to them.)

2.2. Thematic Contrast and Similarity. The supreme theme of the teaching of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels is summarized in Mark 1:15: It was God's good news that the time of waiting for the fulfillment of his promise was over; his kingdom was upon people and all must repent to receive it. John's Gospel contains one saying about the kingdom, 3:3, expanded for clarification in 3:5, together with an oblique reference in the trial before Pilate (18:36-37). Yet every line in this Gospel is informed by it John's reproduction of the teaching of Jesus in his own language, however, has entailed a translation: his key term is one found in the Synoptics, namely "life"* or "eternal life," which is life in the kingdom of God (see Mk 10:17, 23). The purpose of John's Gospel, declared by the Evangelist, was precisely that its readers might receive and be established in the life of the kingdom of God (20:31).

3. Literary Relations.

3.1. Dependence of John. The early Christian belief that John knew the Synoptic Gospels and supplemented them gave place in modern times to a conviction that John used those Gospels in composing his own—certainly Mark, probably Luke, less certainly Matthew. It was urged that as the use of Mark by Matthew and Luke was grasped through their reproducing Mark's material in Mark's order and language, so the like is observable in John's treatment of the Synoptics (for a recent statement of this argument see Barrett 1978,42-46). It is often admitted that John used the Synoptics differently from their use of each other. None of them became the basis of John's Gospel. They supplied but a fraction of his material, and he probably used them from memory (see Kümmel, 145). Some recent writers, however, advance beyond this position and claim that John frequently composed passages through adaptation of Synoptic material (see, e.g., Neirynck, 95-106, who attempts to demonstrate that Jn 20:1-18 was constructed on the basis of Lk 24:1-12 and Mt 28:9-10).

3.2. Independence of John. The thesis that the Fourth Evangelist used the Synoptic Gospels in writing his Gospel was challenged by P. Gardner-Smith on two grounds: (1) the critics have overlooked the influence of the continued existence of oral tradition at the time when John was written; (2) they have concentrated too much on the similarities between John and the Synoptics and underestimated the differences between them. Features like John's lengthy description of John the Baptist's ministry, Peter's confession, the trial of Jesus by Annas and not by Caiaphas, the trial by Pilate, the insufflation of the Spirit in the resurrection narrative etc., show the use of independent tradition(s), not adaptation of Synoptic traditions.

The effect of this work was to change the majority opinion on this subject. The contacts between John and the Synoptics came to be explained in terms of contacts between the sources of the Synoptic writers and those available to the Fourth Evangelist rather than between the Gospels themselves. This was the thesis of C. H. Dodd in his monumental work Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel, and it has been adopted by many recent commentators and writers on John, including R. Bultmann, R. E. Brown, B. Lindars, L. Morris, J. N. Sanders and B. N. Mastin, and R. Schnackenburg.

3.3. Mediating Views. In face of a revival among some scholars of the belief that the Fourth Evangelist was dependent on the Synoptists, a mediating view is being advanced by some writers. This was anticipated by Sanders and Mastin (1968). On examining evidence advanced for the use of Mark by John they remained unconvinced that Mark was a source for John but felt that John must have known Mark. They added, "But knowing Mark and using it as a source are two different things" (10). This conviction was shared by D. M. Smith in a review of current thought on this issue. He recognized the possibility that in due time, after the traditions of the Gospel had become familiar in John's church through preaching and controversy, the Synoptic Gospels became known, without being fully absorbed. John's concerns were different from those of the Synoptics, so he did not employ them in the manner that Matthew and Luke used Mark.

Nevertheless, even though the Fourth Evangelist did not use the Synoptics as his sources, neither did his Gospel take shape in isolation from them. Accordingly, we should not ignore the Synoptics in interpreting John. "This means . . . that the question of the mode of the relationship should remain open in principle" (Smith, 443-44). Therein lies an indication that our minds also should remain open in this matter.

TABLE FELLOWSHIP

One distinctive feature of Jesus' ministry was his practice of a radically inclusive and non-hierarchical table fellowship as a central strategy in his announcement and redefinition of the inbreaking rule of God. In so doing, Jesus challenged the inherent exclusivism and status consciousness of accepted social and religious custom and presented a living parable of a renewed Israel.

1. The Significance of Shared Meals.

It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of table fellowship for the cultures of the Mediterranean basin in the first century of our era. Mealtimes were far more than occasions for individuals to consume nourishment. Being welcomed at a table for the purpose of eating food with another person had become a ceremony richly symbolic of friendship, intimacy and unity. Thus betrayal or unfaithfulness toward anyone with whom one had shared the table was viewed as particularly reprehensible. On the other hand, when persons were estranged, a meal invitation opened the way to reconciliation. Even everyday mealtimes were highly complex events in which social values, boundaries, statuses and hierarchies were reinforced. Anyone who challenged these rankings and boundaries would be judged to have acted dishonorably, a serious charge in cultures based on the values of honor and shame. Transgressing these customs consistently would make a person an enemy of social stability.

The extended family was the usual context in which meals were consumed. Coming together to eat became the occasion for sensing again that one was an integral, accepted part of a group. Beyond the household, people generally preferred to eat with persons from their own social class. Such meals of like with like reinforced the systems of social stratification, with the seating arrangements further signaling the relative status of each guest. People invited their social, religious and economic equals, that is, those who were in a position to return the favor in a relationship of balanced reciprocity.

In Israel a very salient social division had been created by the existence of a priestly class (see Priest, Priesthood) obliged by Torah (Lev 17—26) to live in a special state of ritual purity (see Clean and Unclean) for at least six weeks a year while preparing to serve and then serving in the Temple.* Keeping this obligation led to a certain physical and social distance between priestly families and all other Israelites, whom the priests regarded as more or less unclean.

During the heavy-handed Hellenization (see Hellenism) that led to the Maccabean revolt (167-164 B.C.), many Jews, including an alarming number of leading priests, compromised both their purity and their identity by sacrificing to pagan gods and adopting Greek customs. In reaction, those who came to be known as Pharisees,* remembering the call to separation from pagan ways that characterized the restoration of Israel* after the Exile (cf. Ezra 10:11; see Judaism), exhorted all Jews to intensify their holiness and sense of unique identity by voluntarily living according to the priestly laws of ritual purity every day of the year. Although they did not reject the priesthood or the Temple cult, in light of the priests' and the Temple's vulnerability to impurity, the Pharisees sought to renew Israel by shifting the locus of holiness to their homes. This resulted in a special focus on the purity of one's everyday food and of one's companions at every meal.

The Pharisees regarded their tables at home as surrogates for the Lord's altar in the Temple in Jerusalem and therefore strove to maintain in their households and among their eating companions the state of ritual purity required of priests in Temple service (Neusner). The food had to be properly tithed, prepared and served but in itself did not symbolize any event (Passover was an exception).
Pharisees prescribed no special prayers or unusual foods for their meals. But they did insist on eating only with companions who had "undefiled hands" (Mk 7:2-4), that is, with persons in a state of ritual purity (cf. Ex 30:19-21). The Pharisees longed for the time when all of Israel would live in such a state of holiness. They believed that Israel's identity and blessed future depended on it.

This is the context in which Jesus' practice of a radically open table fellowship is remembered in the NT. The exclusive and hierarchical meal practices of other Jewish groups, such as the Essenes, play no explicit role in any early Christian document. The Synoptic Gospels are consistent in specifically presenting Jesus in sharp contrast to Pharisaic practice as a teacher* and healer (see Healing) who in God's* name welcomed at table an astonishing variety of both reputable and disreputable persons. This strongly suggests that Jesus' open table fellowship was a strategy used to challenge social and religious exclusivism wherever it was accepted as normal or officially sanctioned (Koenig, 20).

2. The Historical Jesus and Table Fellowship.

There is a high level of scholarly agreement that Jesus practiced a radically inclusive table fellowship as a central strategy in his announcement and redefinition of the in-breaking rule of God (see Kingdom of God). Although a few writers have challenged the historicity of Jesus actually eating with "toll collectors (see Taxes) and sinners*" (Smith 1989), the evidence for such an intentionally and symbolically open table is quite strong, being found in multiple sources and in various traditional forms. The sources include Mark, the Synoptic sayings source (Q*), Luke's unique material and probably the Gospel of Thomas (see Gospels [Apocryphal]). The forms include controversy stories (Mk 2:15-17 par. Mt 9:9-13 and Lk 5:29-32), kingdom parables* (Lk 14:15-24 par. Mt 22:1-13; Cos. Thom. 64), pronouncement stories (Lk 7:36-50; 19:1-10), brief sayings (Mt 8:11-12 par. Lk 13:28-29; 14:12-14), opponents' criticisms (Mt 11:18-19 par. Lk 7:33-34) and a summary (Lk 15:1-2).

Scholars have called particular attention to the odd saying of Jesus found in the Synoptic Sayings Source (Q), Matthew 11:16-19 and its parallel Luke 7:31-35. The presentations of this saying reveal little if any post-resurrection idealization of Jesus; thus they seem to offer an authentic glimpse into Jesus' own milieu by noting the people's criticism of John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) as one who "has a demon" and of Jesus as "a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of toll collectors and sinners." The charge against John is unique in the NT and seems strange in light of the early Christians' memory of the claim that Jesus was possessed by a demon* (Mk 3:22 and par.). The charge against Jesus is also unique and must have been an embarrassment for the early church, especially since the insult is not rebutted in this passage.

In no other Christian tradition is Jesus' open table fellowship denounced so sharply, and here the memory may be of Jesus' own caricature of the responses to John and him from their Galilean contemporaries. By expressing the spirit of their responses in pointed self-insults, Jesus may have intended to take the wind out of his critics' sails (Koenig, 23). In any case, the circumstances of the historical Jesus, rather than those of the post-resurrection Christian communities, provide the most plausible context for this sort of serious word-play. Supporting this judgment is the unique use of friend (philos) in this saying. The term appears nowhere else on Jesus' lips as a self-designation, nor is it used in any other charge against him. To be reproached as a "friend of toll collectors" places Jesus plausibly in a Galilean context where Herod's toll collectors were shunned by most people not so much because of their ritual impurity as because of their reputation for dishonest gouging of both rich and poor (see Rich and Poor).

It is thus highly probable that Jesus did associate frequently with such immoral people, at table and elsewhere. And as one who claimed to speak for God, his indiscriminate behavior greatly offended a wide spectrum of people who had been injured by the likes of Levi (Mk 2:13-17). In his message and table praxis, eating with anyone who would eat with him, Jesus challenged the central role played by table fellowship in reinforcing boundaries and statuses widely believed to be sanctioned by God. His use of table fellowship as a divine tool for undermining boundaries and hierarchies made him an enemy of social stability in the eyes of leading contemporaries.

Furthermore, a strong case may be made for the historicity of Jesus' criticism of hierarchical human relationships, found in Mark, Luke's unique material and Matthew's unique material, and remembered in the form of pronouncement stories (Mk 9:33-37 par. Lk 9:46-48; Mk 10:42-45 par. Mt 20:25-28 and Lk 22:24-30), parables (Lk 14:7-11; 18:9-14), brief sayings (Mt 23:11-12) and symbolic narrative and comment (Jn 13:3-16). Such status differences were reinforced at social meals, so that the meal settings for Jesus' challenge of this social practice, which are emphasized by Luke 14:7-11; 22:24-30 and by John 13:3-16, would have rung true for their readers in the ancient world.
Of the Evangelists, Mark and Luke seem particularly concerned about the role of meals in the congregations of their readers. They express this concern by presenting the traditions regarding Jesus' criticism of traditional rankings at meals and his offensively inclusive table fellowship with unique and striking emphases.

3. Jesus' Table Praxis in Mark.

Mark presents Jesus' table praxis as a metaphor for Christian discipleship* in general; the disciples' growing inability to comprehend the significance of Jesus' meal strategy is symbolic of their failure to understand the nature of Jesus' entire mission (Klosinski). For Mark the Last Supper is the climactic last meal at which discipleship collapses completely. Mark emphasizes the rule of God and Christian discipleship together as the basis for an alternative community that practiced a social ethic undermining boundaries and subverting traditional categories of status and hierarchy. For this community the primary social virtue was serving (slave's work), symbolized by serving each other at an inclusive table, with Jesus himself as the prime example (Mk 10:43-45; see Jn 13).

Mark dramatizes Jesus' strategy in his story about the celebration following Levi's positive response to Jesus' call to discipleship (Mk 2:15-17; see Mt 9:10-13 and Lk 5:29-32). At this banquet (Mark's Greek implies that they were reclining at a formal meal) Jesus and his "many followers" crossed significant social boundaries by eating with "many toll collectors and sinners," provoking sharp criticism from the scribes of the Pharisees (were they also invited?). This sets up Jesus' general observation that "those who are well do not need a physician but those who are sick do. I didn't come to call the righteous, but sinners."

In Mark 7:1-23 Pharisees accuse some of Jesus' disciples of eating with "defiled hands" and presumably of not caring if the hands of their table companions were unwashed, that is, of practicing open table fellowship and ignoring the boundaries set by the traditions of the elders.* Jesus defends their praxis by arguing that the ritual purity of one's body or one's food is irrelevant to God. The important matter is how one treats others. Yet the disciples are presented as resistant and missing the point, requiring special instruction (Mk 7:17-19).
Thematically related to these passages is the feeding of the five thousand (Mk 6:30-44; Mt 14:13-21; Lk 9:11-17; Jn 6:5-13), which is the only miracle tradition attributed to Jesus present in all four Gospels (see also the feeding of the four thousand in Mk 8:1-9 par. Mt 15:32-39). Common to all four writers was a meal tradition made extraordinary by the very large number who shared in an unexpected abundance for which Jesus was the host The food was shared with all who were present, without any boundaries or tests of purity. Unique to Mark is his apparent intention to link the feedings of the five thousand and the four thousand to Jesus' final meal with his disciples, suggested by Jesus' "blessing, breaking and giving" of bread in all three passages.

In Mark's presentation of the Last Supper (Mk 14:18-25) the disciples' increasing inability to understand Jesus and his mission climaxes in betrayal. At this last occasion of table fellowship before his crucifixion, Jesus continued to practice the forgiveness (see Forgiveness of Sins) which had characterized his earlier table praxis. Mark stresses that Jesus and his betrayer dipped their bread in the common bowl together; Judas (see Judas Iscariot), not Jesus, withdrew his hand from the table (Bartchy, 56). At the only meal in the narrative which Jesus and the Twelve celebrate together by themselves, all followed Judas in turning the bread of forgiveness into the bread of abandonment. Only the women, including the unnamed disciple who anointed Jesus for his burial while he reclined at table in the home of Simon the Leper (see Leprosy), remained faithful (Mk 14:3-11; 15:40-41). For Mark and his community faithful discipleship is based on understanding what Jesus was about when he shared bread at his table and then living according to his serving praxis.

Luke gives more attention to table etiquette, table fellowship and the households in which these meals were eaten than any other NT writer (see Luke, Gospel of). He highlights offering hospitality and sharing food as occasions which display the sharp contrast between the radical inclusiveness of Jesus' mission and the various degrees of exclusiveness demanded by his competitors for renewing Israel, the Pharisees and scribes,* who repeatedly charged Jesus with "receiving sinners and eating with them" (Lk 15:1-2).

Among scholars of meals in the ancient world, a consensus has begun to develop that Luke's unique presentation of Jesus as a teacher in the context of meals was influenced by his awareness of the symposium tradition that was popular in Greco-Roman literature (Smith 1987). According to that tradition, with the Symposia of Plato and Xenophon as archetypes, the symposium was the drinking and talking party that followed a formal banquet. It provided not only for eating with one's peers but also for exchanges of wit and discussion of serious subjects of mutual interest. Many of Luke's readers would have experienced symposia as the central social activity of such groups as the popular funeral clubs, trade associations and philosophical schools. At these formal meals the diners reclined around a central table on couches most commonly arranged in a U-shape called a "triclinium." Since one's position at the table displayed one's rank relative to the other guests, the host used special care in assigning positions of honor, beginning at the right of the entrance.

Luke 14:7-11 presents Jesus reclining (Luke's Greek implies a formal banquet setting) and teaching at the table of a Pharisee whose many guests had sought out the positions of honor. In this parable unique to Luke, Jesus urges the guests not to seek honor but to defer to others, "for everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and he who humbles himself will be exalted" (Lk 14:11), a saying which both Matthew 23:12 and Luke 18:4 present in settings without meals. The structure of Luke 14 suggests further influence of the symposium genre, not only in the ambiance of a dialog (Lk 14:7, 12, 15), but also in the specific mention of the host, the guest of honor and main speaker (Jesus), the invited guests and the uninvited guests (Lk 14:13, 23, 25; 15:1).

Perhaps the most striking evidence for Luke's interest in the symposium format is the meal setting provided in Luke 22:24-27 for the anti-hierarchical tradition found in Mark 10:35-45. While reclining at the Last Supper with his disciples, Jesus speaks strong words to them about who among them was to be regarded as the greatest, then asks: "For which is greater, one who reclines at table, or one who serves? Is it not the one reclining? But I am among you as one who serves!" With such words Luke must have hoped to motivate his readers to modify their own traditional meal praxis (see Service).

Luke 7:36-50 and 11:37-52 provide further evidence for this Hellenistic emphasis on meals as the context for Jesus' teaching, describing two more occasions at which Jesus reclined at table and taught in a Pharisee's house. Luke uses these settings to dramatize the sharp contrast between Jesus' radically inclusive message, reinforced by his table praxis, and the exclusive boundaries of purity set by the Pharisees and scribes that circumscribed their own meals.
Unique to the tension-filled meal setting of the special tradition in Luke 7:36-50 (but see also Mk 14:3-9) is the presentation of a woman described as a "sinner" who intruded into the meal hosted by Simon the Pharisee. Jesus and Simon are shown disagreeing strongly about the appropriateness of her presence. She clearly felt at home in the company of Jesus, who had forgiven her many sins; and she lavished attention on him in ways that highlighted Simon's failure to show the customary marks of hospitality. In view of the immediately following and unique listing of Mary called Magdalene, Joanna, Susanna and "many" other women, both as supporters of Jesus' itinerant ministry in Galilee* and as traveling companions (Lk 8:1-s), it is likely that Luke intended here to emphasize that Jesus welcomed all kinds of women at his table (see Women; Prostitute). Note also Luke's unique presenting of Jesus' welcoming Mary as his student in the context of a meal about to be served (Lk 10:38-42).

The order of the symposium pattern seems to be reversed in Jesus' post-resurrection meal with two disciples in Emmaus (Lk 24:13-35). For although the meal is described formally as one at which they reclined, the discourse came first, while they were on the road. And although the two had invited Jesus, he quickly became the host Luke drew on both Mark and the Synoptic sayings source (Q) for traditions about Jesus' eating with "toll collectors and sinners" and developed this theme by characterizing Jesus' entire ministry as a special mission to the poor, the captives, the blind, the oppressed and society's outcasts.

Luke especially uses meal imagery as a major means of conveying Jesus' good news. Central elements of this theme are recalled in Luke's unique story of Jesus' eating with Zacchaeus, described as both a chief "toll collector" and a "sinner" (Lk 19:1-9) in a scenario probably intended to remind the reader of Jesus' remarkably inclusive meal at Levi's house (Lk 5:27-32). And in Luke's presentation of the great banquet (Lk 14:15-24), a parable from the sayings source, Jesus' table companions under the rule of God include "the poor and maimed and blind and lame" (Matthew's version in Mt 22:10 mentions "both bad and good" guests). Luke's emphasis was probably "hard bread" for the elite Christians among his readers. For participation in such a socially inclusive community might well have cut them off from their prior social networks on which their status depended. From the perspective of Luke and Acts together, God intends this new community to offer reconciliation and solidarity among Jews and Gentiles,* men and women, rich and poor.
5. Conclusion.

Apparently, one goal of Jesus' strategy of inclusive table fellowship was presenting himself and his followers as a living parable of how a renewed Israel could indeed live together from God's abundance (Koenig 28). He presented the rule of God, using images of food, drink (see Wine) and home as a roving banquet hall by which God sought Israelites to be guests and then hosts. At this table they were offered reconciliation with God, a true home, and a spiritual and material abundance, as the basis for offering all these good things to each other, to others yet to come and even to enemies. A saying of Jesus, probably preserved in the Synoptic sayings source, linked the practice of inclusive table fellowship with the final consummation: "Many will come from east and west and recline at table with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of Heaven" (Mt 8:11 par. Lk 13:29; see Is 25:6-8).

TARGUMS
Interpretive renderings of the Hebrew Bible in Aramaic for use in synagogue* worship* are called by the Aramaic term targûm (pl. targûmîm), meaning simply "translation." But the type and purpose of the rendering involved in Judaism* was distinctive. The general phenomenon of targum needs to be appreciated, and the specific documents involved need to be described before the question of targumic influence on Jesus and the Gospels may be taken up.

1. Language and Character of Targums

2. Classifications of Targums

3. The Relevance of the Targums for Jesus and Gospels Studies

4. Summary

1. Language and Character of Targums.

1.1. The Aramaic Language. Aramaic survived the demise of the Persian Empire as a lingua franca in the Near East It was embraced enthusiastically by Jews (as by other peoples, such as Nabateans and Palmyrenes), and the Aramaic portions of the Hebrew Bible (in Ezra and Daniel) testify to a significant change in the linguistic constitution of Judaism* Conceivably, one reason for Jewish enthusiasm in embracing Aramaic was a distant memory of its affiliation with Hebrew, but it should be borne in mind that Hebrew is a different language from Aramaic (see Languages of Palestine). By the time of Jesus, Aramaic appears to have been the common language of Judea, Samaria and Galilee* (although distinctive dialects were spoken); Hebrew was understood by an educated stratum of the population, and some familiarity with Greek was a commercial and bureaucratic necessity.

1.2. The Character of the Targums. The linguistic situation in Judea and Galilee demanded translation of the Hebrew Bible for the purpose of popular study and worship. Although the fragments of Leviticus and Job in Aramaic which have been discovered at Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls) are technically targums, they do not represent the literary genre targum. They are reasonably literal renderings; that is, there is some attempt at formal correspondence between the Hebrew rendered and the Aramaic which is presented. The targums which are extant as documents deliberately guarded within rabbinic Judaism, are of an altogether different character.
The aim of producing targums was to give the sense of the Hebrew Scriptures. Hence, paraphrase is characteristic of the targums. Theoretically, in the synagogue a passage of Scripture was to be rendered orally by an interpreter (meturgeman), after the reading in Hebrew. The meturgeman was not to be confused with the reader, lest the congregation mistake the interpretation for the original text (cf. m. Meg. 4:4-10 and b. Meg. 23b-25b). (Regulations which specify the number of verses which may be read prior to the delivery of a targum probably date from well after the period of the NT.) Although the renderings so delivered were oral in principle, over the course of time traditions in important centers of learning became fixed, and coalescence became possible. Moreover, the emergence of the rabbis as the dominant leaders within Judaism after A.D. 70 provided a centralizing tendency without which literary targums could never have been produced (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings).

The targums preserved by the rabbis are notoriously difficult to describe. They are paraphrases, but the theological programs conveyed are not always consistent, even within a given targum. Although the rabbis attempted to control targumic activity, the extant targums themselves sometimes contradict rabbinic proscriptions. For example, Mishnah Megillah 4:9 insists that Leviticus 18:21 ("You must not give of your seed, to deliver it to Moloch") should not be interpreted with respect to sexual intercourse with Gentiles* On the other hand, the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan—a late work produced long after rabbinic authority had been established—takes just that line. The targums evince such oddities because they are the products of a dialectical interaction between folk practice and rabbinic supervision, a dynamic tension which continued over centuries. Each of the extant targums crystallizes that relationship for a given moment, and toward the end of the process—as Arabic replaced Aramaic as the vernacular—the targums came to be the preserve of a learned few.

2. Classifications of Targums.

The targums may conveniently be classified as those of the Torah (the Pentateuch); those of the Prophets (both "Former Prophets," or the so-called historical works; and the "Latter Prophets," or the Prophets as commonly designated in English); and those of the Writings (or Hagiographa), following the conventional designations of the Hebrew Bible in Judaism. We should stress at the outset, however, that although the Hebrew Bible is almost entirely rendered by the targums in aggregate, there was no single moment, and no particular movement, which produced a comprehensive Bible in Aramaic. The targums are essentially complex in their purposes, places of origin and dialects of Aramaic.

2.1. The Pentateuch. Among the targums to the Pentateuch, Targum Onqelos is a suitable point of departure. Among all the targums, Onqelos appears to correspond best to rabbinic ideals of translation. Although paraphrase is evident, especially in order to describe God and his revelation in suitably reverent terms, the high degree of correspondence with the Hebrew of the Masoretic Text (and, presumably, with the Hebrew text current in antiquity) is striking. The dialect of Onqelos is "Middle Aramaic," which would place the targum between the first century B.C. and the third century A.D. The targum should probably be dated toward the end of that period, in the wake of similar efforts to produce a literal Greek rendering during the second century, and well after any strict construal of the principle that targums were to be oral. By contrast with the rabbinic ethos which permitted the creation and preservation of Onqelos, one might recall the story of Rabbi Gamaliel, who is said during the first century to have immured a targum of Job in a wall of the Temple (b. Šabb. 115a). The Targum Neophyti I was discovered in 1949 by Alejandro Diez Macho in the Library of the Neophytes in Rome. The paraphrases of Neophyti are substantially different from those of Onqelos. Entire paragraphs are added (as when Cain and Abel argue in the field prior to the first case of murder, Gen 4:8), the rendering is looser, and it is impossible to predict when remarkable freedom is to be indulged. The dialect of Neophyti is known as Palestinian Aramaic, to distinguish it from the Babylonian Aramaic of Onqelos. But the chronology of the two targums is about the same; the differences between them are a function more of program than dating. The rabbis of Babylonia, who called Onqelos "our targum," exerted greater influence there than did their colleagues in the west. In order to avoid confusion, it is probably wiser to designate non-Babylonian targums as Tiberean, rather than Palestinian.

The latest representative of the type of expansive rendering found in Neophyti is Targum Pseudo-Jonathan. Its reference to the names of Mohammed's wife and daughter in Genesis 21:21 put its final composition sometime after the seventh century A.D. (This oddly designated targum is so called in that the name "Jonathan" was attributed to it during the Middle Ages because its name was abbreviated with the Hebrew letter yod. But the letter probably stood for "Jerusalem," although that designation is not established critically. "Pseudo-Jonathan" is therefore an admission of uncertainty.) Neophyti and Pseudo-Jonathan are together known as Palestinian targums, to distinguish their dialects and their style of interpretation from those of Onqelos, but the designation Tiberean is (once again) to be preferred.

Neophyti and Pseudo-Jonathan are to be associated with two other targums, or to be more precise, groups of targums. The first group, in chronological order, consists of the fragments of the Cairo Geniza. They were originally part of more complete works, dating between the seventh and the eleventh centuries, which were deposited in the Geniza of the Old Synagogue in Cairo. In the type and substance of interpretation, these fragments are comparable to the other targums of the Tiberean type. The same may be said of the Fragments Targum which was collected as a miscellany of targumic readings during the Middle Ages. An interesting feature of the targums of the Tiberean type is that their relationship might be described as synoptic, in some ways comparable to the relationship among the Gospels. All four of the Palestinian targums, for example, convey a debate between Cain and Abel, and they do so with those variations of order and wording which are well known to students of the Synoptic Gospels (see Synoptic Problem).

2.2. The Prophets. Both the Former and the Latter Prophets are extant in Aramaic in a single collection, although the date and character of each targum within the collection needs to be studied individually. The entire corpus, however, is ascribed by rabbinic tradition (b. Meg. 3a) to Jonathan ben Uzziel (hence the designation as Targum Jonathan), a disciple of Hillel, the famous contemporary of Jesus. On the other hand, there are passages of the Targum of the Prophets which accord precisely with renderings given in the name of Joseph bar Hiyya, a rabbi of the fourth century (cf. Tg.Isa 5:17b and b. Pesah. 68a). As it happens, the Targum of Isaiah (which has been subjected to more study than any of the Targums of the Prophets) shows signs of a nationalistic eschatology* which was current just after the destruction of the Temple in AD. 70 (see Destruction of Jerusalem), and of the more settled perspective of the rabbis in Babylon some three hundred years later. It appears that Targum Jonathan as a whole is the result of two major periods of collecting and editing interpretations by the rabbis, the first period being Tannaitic (from Hillel to the completion of the Mishnah, c. AD. 20-200), and the second Amoraic (from the completion of the Mishnah until the completion of the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds, c. AD. 200-400/500). After Targum Jonathan was composed, probably near the time the Fragments Targum was assembled, targumic addenda were appended in certain of its manuscripts. They are represented in the Codex Reuchlinianus (which is dated AD. 1105).

2.3. The Writings. Of the three categories of targums, that of the Writings is without question the most diverse. Although the Targum to Psalms is formally a translation, substantially it is better described as a midrash, while the Targum of Proverbs appears to be a fairly straightforward rendition of the Peshitta, and the Targum of Esther seems designed for use within a celebration of the liturgy of Purim. The Targums of the Writings are the most problematic within modern study. In view of their late date (in most cases medieval), of the three general categories of targums they are also of the least interest for students of the New Testament.

3. The Relevance of the Targums for Jesus and Gospels Studies.

The significance of the targums for appreciating Jesus and the Gospels follows naturally from assessing their purpose and provenience. Fundamentally, the targums constitute evidence of the first class for the way in which the Hebrew Scriptures were understood, not simply among rabbis, but more commonly by the congregations for whom the targums were intended.

3.1. Obstacles in Utilizing the Targums. Insofar as what is reflected in a targum is representative of the reception of Scripture in the First century, that targumic material is of crucial importance for any student of the New Testament. But care must also be taken lest the perspective of later materials be accepted uncritically as representative of an earlier period, thus resulting in anachronistic exegeses. There are clearly readings in the targums which presuppose events long after the death of Jesus. One example of such a reading is Targum of Isaiah 53, which clearly anticipates that the reader takes the destruction of the Temple as given. The "Suffering Servant" as presented in the Targum simply cannot be assumed to be a model of the Messiah in the time of Jesus, and in any case the targumic Messiah is triumphant rather than a man of sorrows (see Servant of Yahweh).

A particular problem is posed for modern study by the persistent notion that there is somewhere extant today a single "Palestinian Targum," which substantially represents the understanding of the Hebrew Bible in the time of Jesus. There was a time when that was a comprehensible position, because it was taken that "Palestinian Aramaic" was more ancient than "Babylonian Aramaic."
Today, however, the discoveries at Qumran have cast a dazzling new light upon Targum Onqelos and Targum Jonathan for the Prophets, which makes them appear more ancient than was supposed some fifty years ago, and more similar to Aramaic as spoken in Palestine (see Languages of Palestine). Targum Pseudo-Jonathan appears to represent a more recent tendency, not only in language, but also in its historical allusions and its form. Moreover, the present understanding of early Judaism is that it was too variegated to allow for the formation of a single, authoritative tradition of rendering, such as the designation "Palestinian Targum" would suggest.

The difficulty of assessing the precise form of targumic tradition(s) within the first century should also make us wary of any claim that we know the dialect(s) of Aramaic which were current in that period. The literary remains of the language are sporadic, dialectical variation was great and there sometimes appears to have been a significant difference between the language as spoken and the language as written. For all these reasons, attempts to retranslate the Greek Gospels into Jesus' own language are extremely speculative. When the Tiberean targums are appealed to by way of antecedent, speculation is piled upon speculation.

3.2. The Proper Use of the Targums for Gospels Studies. The composite nature of the targums is, nonetheless, such that on occasion one may discern in them the survival of materials which did circulate in the time of Jesus and which therefore influenced his teaching and/or the memory of that teaching among those disciples who were familiar with such traditions. An example of such a survival might be Leviticus 22:28 in Pseudo-Jonathan, "My people, children of Israel, since our father is merciful in heaven, so should you be merciful upon the earth." The expansion in the targum is unquestionably innovative, as compared to what may be read in the Masoretic Text, so that the possible echo in Luke 6:36, within the address known conventionally as "the sermon on the plain" (see Sermon on the Mount), is with the Targum or with nothing at all.

It is, of course, theoretically possible that the saying originated with Jesus, and was then anonymously taken up within the Targum. Without doubt, the statement is rhetorically more at home within Luke than in Pseudo-Jonathan, where it appears unmotivated. But it seems inherently unlikely that Pseudo-Jonathan, which of all the Pentateuchal targums is perhaps the most influenced by a concern to guard and articulate Judaic integrity, would inadvertently convey a saying of Jesus. More probably, both Pseudo-Jonathan and Luke's Jesus are here independently passing on the wisdom of a proverbial statement. The targumic echo is therefore most certainly not the source of Jesus' statement, but it may help us to describe the nature of Jesus' statement.

Examples such as Leviticus 22:28 demonstrate that the targums might have a heuristic value in illustrating the sort of Judaism which Jesus and his followers took for granted. Recent study has greatly increased the catalog of such instances. But there are also cases in which Jesus appears to have cited a form of the book of Isaiah which is closer to the Targum Jonathan than to any other extant source. In such cases, an awareness of the fact helps us better to understand his preaching.

Targum Isaiah 6:9-10 is an especially famous example, and it helps to explain Mark 4:12. The statement in Mark could be taken to mean that Jesus told parables with the purpose that (Gk hina) people might see and not perceive, hear and not understand, lest they turn and be forgiven. But the Targum also (unlike the Masoretic Text and the Septuagint) refers to people not being forgiven (rather than not being healed), and that suggests that the Targum may give the key to the meaning supposed in Mark. The relevant clause in the targum refers to people who behave in such a way so that (d in Aramaic) they see and do not perceive, hear and do not understand, lest they repent and be forgiven. It appears that Jesus was characterizing people in the targumic manner, as he characterizes himself similarly in Mark with a clause employing hina (cf. 9:12), not acting in order to be misunderstood (see Hardness of Heart). In much the same way, Jesus in Mark 9:48 links a phrase from Isaiah (66:24) to the idea of punishment in Gehenna, a linkage also attested in the Targum.

Time and again the targums present a synoptic relationship amongst their materials, be it in the instance of the dispute between Cain and Abel (as already mentioned), the Aqedah (the "binding" of Isaac: Gen 22 in the Tiberean Targums and Is 33:7 in the margin of Reuchlinianus), or the Poem of the Four Nights (Ex 12:42 in the Tiberean Targums). Because the synoptic phenomenon of the targums involves four documents, not three (as in the case of the relationship among the Gospels), it is even more complicated to trace a purely documentary, rigidly literary relationship among the texts. The study of the synoptic aspect of the targums remains in its infancy, but it appears possible that once it is better understood we will also conceive of the literary relationship among the Gospels in a different way.
4. Summary.

The targums are a rich source of that form of early Judaism and rabbinic Judaism where the folk and the expert aspects of the religion met. For that reason, serious students of the New Testament might well read them, as helping them to comprehend the context within which Jesus taught and his movement first developed, before the transition to a Hellenistic* compass and to the Greek language. In particular cases the targums uniquely present material which helps to illuminate Jesus' teaching. In other instances they may support what we know from other sources. It might be that a targum just happens to preserve proverbial material which Jesus cites, or alludes to. But there are also cases in which Jesus seems to have been influenced by a specifically targumic understanding of the Bible. Finally, quite apart from what they may tell us of particular passages in the Gospels, the targums give us an example of how composite documents evolved within Judaism, and to that extent they may provide an analogy for understanding the Gospels themselves.

TAXES

Jews in the time of Jesus were subject to a complex system of religious and secular taxation, the extent and burden of which is difficult to determine. The Gospels reveal the scorn directed toward those who participated especially in the Roman customs system because they were presumed to be dishonest.

1. Roman Taxation

2. Tax Collector

3. Temple Tax

1. Roman Taxation.

When Rome* annexed Judea in 63 B.C., the High Priest Hyrcanus (see Priest and Priesthood) was given responsibility to pay tribute to Rome. Julius reduced the tribute in 47 B.C. from an uncertain amount (perhaps 33 per cent of the harvest as under the Seleucids) to 12.5 per cent of the harvest and he remitted taxes in the sabbatical year (Ant. 14.202). Herod was required initially to pay tribute for Idumea and Samaria, but this was remitted in 30 B.C., leaving him to raise his own revenues after the Roman fashion and presumably on a Roman scale (although he did occasionally reduce taxes during crises: Ant. 15.365; 16.64). After Herod's death Rome allowed Antipas to raise tribute for Rome in Galilee* and Perea, while Judea (after the deposition of Archelaus in AD. 6) came under direct Roman control in the form of procurators, who probably made the Sanhedrin* responsible for the collection of Roman dues (J.W. 2.405).

According to the larger of Josephus' two estimates, the total revenue of Herod's territories distributed after his death was 800 talents (J.W. 2.92-97; in Ant. 17.318-20 it is 600 talents), which is the equivalent of 4.8 million drachmae, or day-wages, per annum. Population estimates vary, but if we estimate 250,000 working males, we can calculate that the average man worked about three weeks per year for the state. For those who lived close to the edge of poverty—and the majority of scholars think that there were many who did—this amount would be felt as a heavy burden.

1.1. Kinds of Taxes. There were three principal kinds of duties: the land tax, or tributum soli; the head tax, or tributum capitis; and the customs system. These must be distinguished in terms of liability and quantity.

1.1.1. Land Tax. The bulk of the tribute due to Rome was collected in the form of a tax on the produce of the land. This exempted those who did not own land, although tenant farmers certainly paid indirectly in the form of rent Owners of small plots may also have been exempt Itinerant laborers and others such as fishermen were by definition exempt but there may have been other taxes which served to distribute liability to the nonagricultural sector. Residents of Jerusalem, for example, were subject to a house tax and a city sales tax (Ant. 18.90; 19.299). The amount (usually payable in grain) required for the land tax was probably fixed by landlords or other authorities based on estimates of a percentage of the likely yield: probably about one-tenth. Since these amounts were determined in advance, the obligation for revenues lost due to bad crops or individual bankruptcy had to be absorbed by distribution within the tax district.

So little information is available concerning crop yield, population, rents and taxes, that it may never be possible to calculate the burden on the average farmer. General statements in the ancient sources are not conclusive. Josephus complains about Herod's high revenues, but he specifies the charge by reference to direct appropriation of the property of nobles (Ant. 17.307). In another place Josephus describes prewar Galilee as thriving (J.W. 3.42-50). He makes no reference to economic causes for the war, unless this is to be deduced from his accounts of the increase in banditry (presumably due to bankruptcy) in the decade before the war. Tacitus records a request (probably granted) for reduction of taxes in A.D. 17 (Ann. 2.42), but he describes the region as peaceful during the reign of Tiberius (Hist. 5.9). Neither the amount nor the impact of the land tax, therefore, can be determined with precision from the extant sources. It is likely, however, that most of those in the agricultural sector lived close enough to minimal subsistence to feel almost any amount of tribute as a threatened or real burden.

1.1.2. Head Tax. Another significant portion of tribute due to Rome was collected by means of the head tax. This tax involved a periodic census (Lk 2:1-5; Acts 5:37). The amount was probably one denarius, or one day’s wage, per annum (Mt 22:19-21). Liability is more difficult to assess. That males aged fourteen to sixty-five paid seems consistent with Gospel accounts, but this does not preclude the possibility that men were assessed for their wives. It is also possible that, as in other parts of the empire, those who paid the land tax were exempted from the head tax.

1.1.3. Customs System. The Romans appropriated a long-standing system of tolls and duties collected at ports and at tax offices near city gates (Mk 2:11). Rates varied from two to five per cent of value, but goods were subject to multiple taxation on long journeys. Rates and commissions were regulated by law, and from the time of Nero these were posted for inspection. But the complexity of the system and the assessor's power to determine value allowed for injustice. Still, given the prevalence of a village-based subsistence economy, liability was limited to those few who engaged in commercial travel through towns and cities. In these locations of large-scale exchange, tax collectors gathered—and were esteemed—like flies.

1.2. Tax Collection. The direct taxes (the land tax and the head tax) were collected by councils of Jewish leaders and their representatives on an annual basis. The indirect taxes of the customs system were "farmed": the highest bidder paid in advance to collect taxes from a district. These were Jews, not "publicans" (a technical term for members of tax collection organizations abolished by Julius Caesar in 30 B.C.). In this tax-farming system Rome received its money in advance, and the tax fanner made his living from commissions on tolls and customs. These were the "tax collectors" (telōnai) of the Gospels. A "chief tax collector," such as Zacchaeus (Lk 19:1-10), was a tax farmer who supervised other collectors.

2. Tax Collector.

It is evident in the Gospels that the tide itself is a term of abuse (Mt 5:46; 18:17) or a foil to the hypocrites* (Lk 3:12; 7:29; 8:10-14). Elsewhere it is joined in vituperative apposition to "prostitutes"* (Mt 21:31-32), and most commonly,
"sinners"* (e.g., Mk 2:15; Lk 15:1). This attitude was universal: the rabbis* joined tax collectors with "robbers" (m. B. Qam. 10:2), and Roman writers joined them with brothel-keepers (Dio Chrysostom, Disc. 14.14). The reasons for this scorn vary according to time, place and tax type.

2.1. Tax Farmers and Dishonesty. Some distinction was made between those who collected direct taxes and the tax farmers. The latter were constantly visible and clearly made a living from commissions. To stop people on the road and demand a portion of their goods certainly appeared to be institutionalized robbery, and the only apparent beneficiary was the tax farmer himself. Although the commission system was regulated, the power of the assessor to determine the value of some goods encouraged dishonesty. The instructions of John the Baptist* to tax collectors (Lk 3:12-13) and the restitution pledge of Zacchaeus (Lk 19:8) are consistent with this tendency toward fraud.

Indeed, the practice of selling the office built into the system disregard for the taxpayer: the highest bid translated into the most inflated assessments and the highest commissions. The fact that the tax farmer advanced the money meant that he had excessive wealth to begin with, and in an agrarian subsistence economy, usury was the most common source of such portable wealth. On this assumption, the rabbis regarded as unclean (set Clean and Unclean) any house entered by a tax farmer (m. ohar. 7:6). A corollary to all of this is the practical observation that an occupation which depends for success on suspicion, intrusion, harassment and force tends not to attract the most pleasant personalities. These factors combine to suggest that one did not need to be victimized to share the general view of the tax farmer as an embodiment of dishonesty.

2.2. Tax Collectors and Rome. While tax farmers were scorned primarily for their dishonesty, collectors of direct taxes were despised for their collusion with Rome. This hatred was particularly intense in Judea, which was under direct Roman control. A visiting Galilean with a reputation for association with tax collectors (Lk 7:34; 19:1-10) might well have been suspected of disloyalty, in some minds even for paying the head tax (Mk 12:13-17). It is significant that the question posed to Jesus pertains to the lawfulness, not the amount of the tax. Its evil was not in its quantity but in its quality: to a fiercely independent people who did not understand or acknowledge the military and economic security afforded by the Roman presence, taxation was a painful symbol of conquest Jewish labor enriched a distant idolater and his local military representatives.
Jesus' answer is not intended to give sanction to Roman taxation but to expose the hypocrisy of the Pharisees,* who ask the question only to force him to choose between popularity with the people and liability to secular law.

3. Temple Tax.

The half-shekel Temple* tax was derived from the one-third shekel Temple tax of Nehemiah 10:32-33 and was raised to a half-shekel possibly under the influence of the half-shekel atonement price of Exodus 30:11-16 (cf. 2 Chron 24:6). The fund was used for Temple maintenance and sacrifices.

3.1. Liability for the Temple Tax. Jewish males over the age of twenty (excepting priests: m. Šeqal. 1:3-4), including the Diaspora (J. W. 7.281), were subject to the Temple tax. The half-shekel was the approximate equivalent of one day's wage, and it was assessed annually. None of the ancient sources, however, state that all Jews paid, and even the inference (e.g., from Ant. 14.110 or m. Šeqal. 1:4) may represent ideology rather than history. The Essenes, for example, interpreted Exodus 30:11-16 to require only one half-shekel per lifetime (4Q159 2:6-7). It is likely that as in the case of tithes, the Temple tax was voluntary and was paid almost exclusively by Pharisees.

After the war, Vespasian used the Temple tax as a pretense for what amounted to a war indemnity, the didrachmon. Liability for this tax was expanded to women,* children* and slaves. The tax was now compulsory, and the proceeds went to the Temple of Jupiter in Rome (J.W. 7.218). The fact that the Jews had used their own Temple fund for the war (J.W. 6.335) contributed to this connection and perhaps to a limitation (at least initially) of the tax to Pharisees throughout the Empire (possibly implied in Dio Cassius Epit. 65.7.2). Such a situation would have exacerbated tensions between the Pharisees and other Jewish groups, including Christians.

3.2. Jesus and the Temple Tax. Matthew 17:24-27 uses the term didrachma. This may be an anachronistic reference to the Temple tax, an attempt to speak to an issue in Matthew's community, or both. The passage does not imply that all Jews paid the tax, only that Jesus chose to do so. Indeed, the statement of jesus that "the sons (of the king) are free" stresses voluntarism. If the passage is intended to speak to Matthew's community, it is understandable that questions of solidarity with the Jews would arise before the war, and more poignantly after the war if Pharisees were the focus of the didrachmon. It is less likely but also possible that by "sons of the king" Jesus is referring only to himself (and therefore only to exemption from the Temple tax). But to the extent that the passage has implications for practice, it represents a conciliatory position motivated by love for the Jews.

7. Jesus As Teacher and the Tradition of the Gospels
1. Teacher" As a Form of Address for Jesus.

1.1. The Forms of Address Used. In all four Gospels Jesus is addressed as didaskalos. The parallelism in Matthew 23:8 shows that the vocative didaskale normally translates the Hebrew/ Aramaic rabbî ("my great one"). John 1:38 makes this equation explicit, and it is further supported by some epigraphic evidence from Jerusalem in NT times (CII II.1266, 1268-69). In the first century rabbî was not yet a fixed tide for academically schooled, ordained scribes* as was later the case; it was, however, the form of address most of all for teachers. The Gospels reflect the usage of the word at this earlier stage in its development Rabbûnî is a more exalted-sounding Aramaic variant of rabbi. The tide ribbon is reserved for God* except in the targums.*

1.2. Luke. The Evangelist who wrote for non-Jews omitted the term rabbi, which would have been meaningless to his readers. Didaskale also never appears as the form of address used by the disciples for Jesus. Here Luke prefers his own word, epistatēs, a more general term for a supervisory or official person. Luke uses it once instead of rabbi (Lk 9:33) and twice in place of didaskale (Lk 8:24; 9:49), which occur in the parallel incidents found in the other two Synoptics. This word is also used as a term of address (epistata) twice by disciples* (Lk 5:5; 8:45) and once by those seeking help (Lk 17:13). It has been assumed that with this special expression Luke sought to heighten Jesus' authority* Since epistatēs, however, occurs not only in material unique to Luke (Lk 5:5; 17:13) but also in pericopes showing strong influence of non-Markan textual variants (Lk 8:24, 45; 9:33, 49), it could just as well be due to the usage in Luke's sources. Luke has also preserved the use of didaskale as a term of address for Jesus by outsiders (Lk 7:40; [8:49]; 9:38; 10:25; 11:45; 12:13; 18:18; 19:39;20:21, 28, 39; 21:7). The Third Evangelist thus makes it clear that while Jesus appeared to be a teacher, this function did not exhaust the significance he held for his disciples.

1.3. Matthew. In Matthew, as in Luke, didaskale is never used by the disciples to address Jesus. Twice Matthew, in contrast to Mark, has replaced the term with the more exalted kyrie (Mt 8:25; 17:15; see Lord). Where Mark uses the rabbi tide twice, Matthew omits it in one instance (Mt 21:20) and replaces it with kyrie in another (Mt 17:4). Perhaps one cannot fully exclude the possibility that Matthew found mārî once in a Semitic source where other exemplars read rabbi It is more likely, however, that intentional replacement is going on. According to Matthew Jesus is more than simply a teacher for his followers; he is the Lord.
This is confirmed by the apparent exception in the choice of tides of address: It is a disciple of Jesus, but also the betrayer Judas, who greets Jesus with the normal designation for a teacher, "rabbi" (Mt 26:25, 49). In Matthew it is also outsiders who use didaskale (Mt 19:16; 22:16, 24, 36), occasionally more so than in the Lukan parallels (see also Mt 8:19; 12:38).

1.4. Mark. In Mark rabbi is used only by disciples (Mk 9:5; 11:21; 14:45); in lieu of this a blind beggar calls Jesus rabbouni (Mk 10:51). Both Jesus' disciples (Mk 4:38; 9:38; 10:35; 13:1) and outsiders (Mk 9:17; 10:17,20; 12:14,19, 32) say didaskale

1.5. John. The Fourth Evangelist like Mark, presents an unredacted picture of the terms of address for "teacher." Didaskale is used by followers (Jn 1:38; 20:16). Disciples say rabbi (Jn 1:38, 49; 4:31; 9:2; 11:8), as do outsiders (Jn 3:2; 6:25). One female follower uses rabbouni (Jn 20:16).

2. "Teacher" As Jesus' Self-Designation.

In the pericope of the preparation for the Last Supper, which Luke knew both in a Markan and in an additional, strongly semiticized tradition, Jesus speaks of himself in the third person as ho didaskalos (Mt 26:18; Mk 14:14; Lk 22:13). The proverb*-like logion of Matthew 10:24-25 and Luke 6:40 implies a teacher-pupil relationship of Jesus to his followers. In contrast to the assumption that Matthew 23:10 is a Hellenized variant of Matthew 23:8-9, formal analysis suggests the division of Matthew 23:8 into a three-part logion and Matthew 23:9-10 into a four-pan logion. Probably in conjunction with the pre-Easter sending out of the disciples (cf. Mk 6:30), Jesus forbade his disciples to let themselves be called rabbi, because he is their only authoritative teacher (didaskalos, Mt 23:8). Matthew 23:9-10 forbids the disciples to submit themselves to other teaching authorities ("fathers") or to assume such a position themselves. Perhaps the Semitic equivalent to kathegetēs in Matthew 23:10 is the term môreh found in the Qumran writings (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

3. Teacher"—a Christological Tide of Exaltation?

The total absence of "teacher" as a tide for Jesus outside the Gospels speaks against seeing in it an early Christian title of exaltation. Prior to Justin only Ignatius of Antioch (Eph. 15.1; Magn. 9.1) uses the designation didaskalos. Both the frequency of the titles for teacher and their apparent christological suppression in Matthew and Luke show that we are dealing with an authentic feature of the life of Jesus. Josephus, too, called Jesus a didaskalos (Ant. 18.3.3 §63). The Hebrew/Aramaic rabbî points most overtly to ancient tradition; outside of Palestine there are hardly any epigraphic instances of it. Furthermore, aside from the canonical Gospels, in the entire corpus of early Christian literature the concept is attested only in one apocryphon (P Berol. 11710). The designation of Jesus as teacher in the Gospels serves not to express his exalted status, but to describe the outward form of his ministry.

4. The Teaching Authority of Jesus.

If the respectful title rabbi placed Jesus on a level with other scribes, his own claim went much farther. This was sensed by his own contemporaries (Mk 1:21-22 par.). Jesus laid claim not merely to prophetic (see Prophets and Prophecy) but to messianic (see Christ) authority, first in a hidden fashion and then quite openly within the inner circle of his disciples (Mk 8:27-30). Various Jewish groups expected that the Messiah would teach in the fullness of God's wisdom.* This is borne out both in the targums (Tg. Gen. 49:10-11; Tg. Isa. 53:5,11) and in apocalyptic* (1 Enoch 46:3; 49:3-4; 51:3), Essene (CD 6:11, 7:18; 4QFlor 1:11; 4QMess ar; 4QAhA; 11QMelch 18-20, cf. T. Jud. [A] 21:1-4; T. Levi 18:2-6), Samaritan* (Memar Marqa 4:12, cf. Jn 4:25) and rabbinic (e.g., Midr. Ps 21:90a) writings (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Such a claim becomes clear also in various words of Jesus (Mt 11:16-19, 25-26; 12:42; 23:37-39 par.; Mt 11:28-30). Thus he did not view his words on the same level as those of other Jewish teachers but rather ascribed to them eschatological validity (Mt 7:26-29; 24:35; Mk 8:38 par.). This was an inducement for Jesus' followers, already at the pre-Easter stage, to take the most important of his statements deeply into their minds.

5. Settings for Teaching.

5.1. Teaching in the Synagogues. The establishment of synagogues* facilitated the instruction of broader masses of the people in the Law. It also furnished a setting for them to be involved in Sabbath* worship (GBL III.1507-12). In Jesus' day every adult Jewish male could take part in the worship service by leading in prayer* and Scripture reading as well as by giving an interpretation of the Scripture. Training for this was provided by an elementary school system, unique for its time (GBL III.1410-14), in which youth were taught reading and writing from the holy Scriptures, usually by the person who oversaw synagogue activities (m. Sabb. 1:3-4; cf. Lk 4:20). In the synagogues adult males had access to at least the most important scrolls of Scripture (Pentateuch, Isaiah, Psalms) for making preparations for the worship service. It was natural for Jesus to teach in the framework of the synagogue, both through the interpretation of Sabbath readings from the Law* and Prophets (Lk 4:16-21) and in conjunction with preparation for the worship service.

5.2. Scribal Debates. Although he had received no formal academic training, Jesus was accepted as a discussion partner by other scribes, who at the time were by no means all members of the sect of the Pharisees* (e.g., Mk 12:13-34 par.). While the everyday language in Galilee and probably also in Jerusalem was Aramaic, it is possible that scribal debates were conducted in the so-called holy language of Hebrew. There were also pious Jews living in Jerusalem who spoke Greek (Acts 9:29, hellēnistai). It is accordingly possible that Jesus himself debated and taught in Greek. In any case, translating his teaching presented no particular problem in a Palestine that was strongly bilingual, if not indeed trilingual (see Languages of Palestine).

5.3. Proclamation to the Masses. While the leading rabbis taught in fixed locations and as a rule devoted themselves only to a chosen circle of pupils, Jesus resembled John the Baptist (see John the Baptist) and other prophetic preachers in directing his proclamation to the general populace (e.g., Mk 3:7-8 par.). In order to address people Jesus also taught in the open air in heavily traveled locations such as the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee.* Nevertheless, that does not exclude temporary stays in Capernaum and making a building belonging to Peter's family estate into a sort of educational center (Mt 4:13; 9:1; Mk 1:29; 2:1-2). Jesus distinguished himself fundamentally from the Zealot preachers of revolution (see Revolutionary Movements) by directing his call for repentance and discipleship* not to the masses but to individuals from among the masses (Mk 1:16-20; Lk 9:57-62 par.). Chief among the themes of Jesus' public proclamation was the message of God's love* and the imminent manifestation of his sovereign reign (see Kingdom of God).

5.4. The Instruction of the Disciples. From among a larger number of followers Jesus called a circle of men who accompanied him constantly and learned from him by both word and example (Mk 3:13-19 par.). For this reason these followers were designated "disciples" (Heb. talmiḏīm, Gk. mathētai). In contrast to early forms of rabbinic schools, the initiative for membership lay entirely with Jesus himself. The bond to him was so absolute that connection with another teacher was out of the question (Mt 23:9-10). Jesus instilled in his disciples rules for their common life and for dealing with those outside their circle (see Discipleship). He also sent them out on their own preaching mission, preparing them for this with special instruction (Mt 10; Mk 6:6-11; Lk 9:1-5; cf. Lk 10:1-12). Those who listened to Jesus' messengers (Heb. šlûhim, Gk. apostoloi; Mk 3:14 [X, B], Lk 6:13; cf. Mt 10:16; Lk 10:3) expected them to be capable of passing on the basic features of their master's teaching in his own words. After rejection of his call to repentance in Galilee, Jesus (reminiscent of Is 8:16-17) withdrew into the inner circle of the Twelve (Jn 6:66-69.). He disclosed to them his messiahship and the way of substitutionary suffering for sin (Mk 8:27-32 par.; 10:35-45 par.; see Ransom Saying). In this manner the Twelve came to be especially qualified transmitters of Jesus' teaching in the aftermath of the first Easter (cf. Acts 1:21-26; 2:42; 6:4). If one asks which ancient didactic school Jesus' band of disciples most closely resembles, the best answer is probably those circles of followers attached to the OT prophets. There are also similarities with the early rabbinic schools. On the other hand, only remote comparisons are possible with the circles that formed around the peripatetic Cynic philosophers. On the whole, however, Jesus' band of followers in its entirely distinctive orientation must be traced back to Jesus' messianic authority.

6. Forms of Teaching.

6.1. Interpretation of Scripture. Apart from the abbreviated account of a synagogue sermon in Luke 4:21-27, the Synoptics preserve no extended examples of Jesus' interpretations of Scripture. Entire sermons were not well suited for polished oral reproduction, and the Synoptic writers declined to create any on their own. Nevertheless, quite apart from direct citations, Jesus' words are pervaded by allusions to Scripture (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology). Through school and synagogue he must have learned large sections of the OT by heart. This was a virtual necessity in part because the vowelless Hebrew texts could be recited error-free and with the right emphasis only through memorization. Occasionally one encounters interpretive methods (like the inference from the lesser to the greater, e.g., Mt 10:29-31) found in rabbinic exegesis as well.
6.2. Summaries of Teaching. In order to impress the basic tenets of his teaching on both outsiders and his disciples, Jesus made use of another technique already developed by the OT prophets. He summarized pithy sayings in short, poetically constructed utterances (Heb. māšāl, Gk. parabolē). In so doing he made use of parallelism (parallelismus membrorum) or chiasm. But translating his sayings back into Aramaic indicates that he also took advantage of such mnemonic helps as rhythm and rhyme. Jesus often called attention to the importance of such summaries through the introductory "amen"* formula typical of him or through admonitions to "listen." Jesus' words were also easily remembered because of their vividness and his frequent use of rhetorical devices such as paradox, hyperbole, riddles, contrast, irony or emphasis.

6.3. Parables. While Jesus formulated many utterances as summaries of a sermon or debate, he set others before his hearers for their contemplation (cf. Mt 13:24, 31). Most worthy of mention here are those pericopes commonly known as parables.* Even these were not blurted out ad hoc but show every indication, like other forms above, of being very deliberate and condensed formations. The boundless allegorization of Jesus' parables by previous generations of interpreters was without doubt a mistake. Comparison with Jewish parables shows, however, that graphic depictions of spiritual matters enjoyed wide circulation. It presented no difficulties in a religious context (e.g.) to relate the mention of servants to prophets (Mk 12:1-11 par.). Jesus' parables are such densely formulated oral texts that it is legitimate to interpret them by paying close attention to each individual detail. Sayings of Jesus that we call parables are normally longer than the summaries of teaching mentioned in the previous section (6.2.). This helps explain why there is rather more divergence in wording in the transmission of these parables.

6.4. Parabolic Acts. Following prophetic precedent, Jesus also often taught in this memorable manner. An example would be the Temple cleansing (Mk 11:13-17 par.) or the cursing of the fig tree (Mk 11:12-14). A number of miracles need to be seen not only as merciful acts of assistance but also as acted out parables. When they were sent out the disciples are sure to have told of such deeds, as well as incidents illustrative of Jesus' exemplary deportment. It is therefore highly likely that prior to the first Easter not only words of Jesus but also the beginnings of a historical tradition were already being passed on. Instruction through exemplary stories was an established custom both in Hellenistic schools in the form of chreiaē* and later with the rabbis (ma2šîm).
6.5. Final Form of Oral and Written Tradition. The summaries of teaching and parables were forms deliberately shaped to preserve memoirs; they were easily remembered oral texts. About eighty per cent of Jesus' sayings take the form of \textit{parallelismus membrorum}. As an itinerant preacher, Jesus repeated them many times. They would have quite naturally embedded themselves in the hearers' minds. In addition, as the example of the Lord's Prayer shows (Lk 11:1-4), one may even assume that Jesus' disciples learned some material from him by heart in rather direct fashion. Learning through memorization was a basic pedagogical method in first-century Judaism* (Philo Som. 1.105; Josephus Ant. 4.8.12 §210; Ag. Ap. 2.19 §178) as well as in antiquity as a whole, whether at the elementary or advanced academic level. Most of Jesus' devotees maintained their residence where they heard him, not traveling with him. For them the need was all the more pressing for a body of teaching that could be easily remembered in the absence of the master. In the circle of resident sympathizers it is possible that words of Jesus were already fixed in written form prior to Easter (Ellis, 242-47).

Classic form criticism (M. Dibelius, R. Bultmann) assessed the Synoptic tradition using the analogy of uncontrolled folk traditions (see Tradition Criticism). At the beginning of the Gospel tradition, however, stood Jesus as the teacher of his disciples. In other respects as well there is every indication that the Jesus tradition will not admit of being treated as a fluctuating tradition of folklore. It was passed on within the early church in the form of a school tradition, a body of information taught and learned (1 Cor 11:23-26; 15:1-8). In both the popular and scientific mind today there is a widespread romantic notion that regards Jesus and his disciples as uneducated country folk. This appraisal overlooks the role that teaching and learning played among pious Jews already at that time. Acts 4:13 expresses the haughty point of view of the Jerusalem ruling class. It says nothing about the competence of Jesus' disciples—some of whom had already been pupils of John the Baptist (Jn 1:35-39; cf. Acts 1:21-22)—to pass on tradition. From the contemporary standpoint early Christianity, like Judaism, functioned rather more like a philosophy than a religion. For this reason teachers played an important role in the early church (Acts 13:1; 1 Cor 12:28-29; Eph 4:11; Jas 3:1). This holds especially true for the passing along of traditions. Perhaps Matthew had such teachers in mind when he recorded words of Jesus like those found in Matthew 13:52; 23:8-10, 34-36.
Attempts have been made to minimize the significance of teaching and learning by referring to the prophetic-eschatological consciousness that reigned among Jesus' disciples and the early church (see Prophets and Prophecy). But the example of Qumran shows how little an end-times orientation excludes methodical handling of Scripture and regimented transmission of texts (Betz). Oral tradition can accomplish a great deal when it is passed along (1) by a group of limited size using (2) mnemonically effective techniques. Both of these qualifications were fulfilled by the Gospel tradition through the form of Jesus' words and the existence of the circle of disciples.

TEMPLE

The Jerusalem Temple was a significant element in the religious, social and political setting of Jesus' life and ministry. It comes to the forefront most prominently in Jesus' cleansing of the Temple (see Temple Cleansing) and his words about its coming destruction (see Destruction of Jerusalem), but its presence and significance is assumed in many other Gospel contexts. In order to comprehend the meaning of the Temple for Jesus and the Gospels, one must understand the history of the Temple and particularly the attitudes represented in Judaism of approximately the first century A.D.

1. The Temple Structures

2. Attitudes Toward the Temple

3. The Temple in the Gospels

1. The Temple Structures.

Before Solomon built the Temple at Jerusalem, the tribes of Israel had worshipped in a number of sanctuaries, most prominently Shiloh. Shiloh was destroyed around 1050 B.C., evidently by the Philistines as a result of the battle recorded in 1 Samuel 4, when they also took from Israel the Ark of the Covenant. Eventually, however, the Ark returned to rest in Jerusalem, and Solomon (or perhaps better, David, his father—note the difference in emphasis between 1 Kings 5:17-19; 8:15-21 and 1 Chron 22:8-10; 28:3) determined to build a Temple in which it might be housed. A description of the Solomonic Temple appears in 1 Kings 6—7 and again, with a few variations, in the summarizing 2 Chronicles 3—4.

The description in Kings is very difficult to interpret for a number of reasons. First the account utilizes a large number of technical terms not known elsewhere in Hebrew, some of which were distorted during scribal transmission. Second, the editor of Kings either did not have or chose to omit many details which, from an architectural perspective, are absolutely essential for any reconstruction—for example, the layout of various structures and the thickness of walls. And archeology is no help with this matter, as virtually nothing has survived from the First Temple. Thus scholars attempting to visualize Solomon's work make do with the texts as best they can, and have recourse where applicable to comparisons with other Semitic sanctuaries, especially those of Syro-Phoenicia. Not surprisingly, reconstructions differ markedly from one another, and the following discussion attempts merely to highlight those points on which there is a measure of agreement.

The Solomonic Temple was a long, narrow structure oriented toward the east. It was divided into three parts: an outer vestibule (ûlām), a large interior for worship (hēkāl) and a rear compartment known in Hebrew as dbir or qōdeš qəḏašîm, "the holy of holies." Excluding the walls, whose thickness is not given, the whole was 70 cubits long and 20 cubits wide. The interior paneling consisted of cedar imported from Lebanon. In front of the vestibule stood two bronze pillars, approximately 27 feet high; their function is uncertain, but apparently they did not support the lintel of the vestibule. Some scholars liken them to the traditional steles (maṣṣēbōt) which are well known from Canaanite and Phoenician sanctuaries. The Temple stood within a courtyard or inner court; later, by the mid-seventh century at the latest, there were two courts (2 Kings 21:5; Jer 36:10).

The furnishings of the Temple included at first the Ark, which however was lost very early in the history of the First Temple. This stood in the ḏēbir, surmounted by the cherubim. Outside the rear compartment in the hēkāl, stood the golden altar of incense, the table of shewbread and ten candlesticks. Outside the Temple building was the altar of bronze upon which the sacrifices took place. To the southeast of the Temple stood the "Sea" of bronze, which contained water used by the priests for their ablutions. On either side of the Temple entrance were located ten bronze basins, five to each side. Here the priests would cleanse the sacrificial victims. All of these basic cultic elements, with certain modifications, were later to be found in the Herodian Temple.

It was essentially the Temple of Solomon that Nebuchadnezzar destroyed in 587 B.C. when Jerusalem fell to the Babylonians. With the return from Exile beginning in 538 B.C., the Temple was rebuilt; apparently it was structurally very similar to the earlier version, though lacking that Temple's rich adornment. Completed in 515 B.C., it is known as the Temple of Zerubbabel, the governor of the period. Over the centuries that followed this Temple was damaged or, perhaps, even destroyed on various occasions; of the details little is known. In the period 200 B.C.—150 B.C. we know that it suffered substantial damage at least twice. Still, it was rebuilt, and when Herod (see Herodian Dynasty) came to build the structure whose beauty was proverbial throughout the Roman world, practically speaking it was the Temple of Zerubbabel that he tore down and replaced.

For the reconstruction of Herod's Temple, we are somewhat better informed than is the case with the earlier Temples. Detailed descriptions have come down in tractate Middot of the Mishnah and in the two major works of Josephus,* the Jewish War and the Antiquities. Tradition assigns the mishnaic tractate to Rabbi Eliezer ben Jacob, who was a young boy at the time of the First Revolt. Although his description (if it really is his) is perhaps idealizing at points, it is still useful for the task of reconstruction. Josephus's descriptions (Ant. 15.11.1-3 §§380-402; J.W. 5.5.1-6 §§184-227) do not always agree with each other or with that of the Mishnah, but by and large these disagreements do not affect major elements of the Temple structures.

Herod's work began in 20/19 B.C., and except for matters of detail and added adornment was completed within a decade. Those additional matters, however, occupied the Jews for almost all of the years between c. 10 B.C. and the outbreak of the revolt in AD. 66, in part by design: Such labor provided jobs for many who would otherwise have been unemployed.

Herod was a man of grand ambitions, and his reconstruction of the Temple of the Jews reflected that aggrandizing character. He essentially doubled the foundation, or Temple Mount that had existed from Solomon's day. To do so he lengthened the eastern wall at both ends and added new walls on the other three sides. In the process, he found it necessary to reshape the topography of Jerusalem. The middle or Tyropoean Valley, bordering the Temple on the west he filled in. He did the same to a small valley lying to the north of the old mount and to the upper slope of the Kidron Valley to the south. According to the Ritmyers' recent study of the archeological remains, the Temple Mount retaining wall measured 1,590 feet on the west 1,035 feet on the north, 1,536 feet on the east and 912 feet on the south; it thus approximated a rhomboid equivalent in area to thirty-five football fields.
If a Jewish man and woman at the time of Jesus were to enter the Temple complex from the south, they would emerge from a large plaza to ascend a broad stairway. Off to their right they would see a ritual bathhouse (it was forbidden to enter the precincts without such immersion) and the council house where the Sanhedrin* sat in session. Straight ahead would be the Double Gate and further to the right the Triple Gate. Entering through the Double Gate, they would pass directly beneath the royal stoa that surmounted the wall of the outer court. In the outer court, or Court of the Gentiles, they would now be standing in the place where the blind and lame came to Jesus (Mt 21:14), where the children greeted him (Mt 21:15) and where he drove out the merchants (Mt 21:12; cf. Mk 11:15; Lk 19:45; Jn 2:14). Surrounding this court were the pillared halls where Jesus and later the disciples* taught (Mk 14:49 etc.).

Their eyes would now light upon the Temple structure, rising high above them and separated by yet another stairway, a barricade and the walls of the inner courts. Entering from the outside, the first inner court would be the Court of the Women (‘ezrat hannašîn), where all Jews including women could advance, but which was off-limits to Gentiles* on pain of death. Here Anna prayed (Lk 2:37), Jesus watched the widow offer the last of her money (Mk 12:44 and par.) and, probably, the encounter with the adulterous woman has its setting (Jn 8:2-3).

The man alone could continue to advance toward the sanctuary itself, entering the Court of the Israelites. This court was open to all ritually pure (see Clean and Unclean) Jewish men, but none others. The sacrificial altar stood here. This inner court is the narrative setting for the Pharisee* praying (Lk 18:11), for the disciples praying (Lk 24:53) and, of course, for Jesus standing before the altar (Mk 11:11). No one but priests could continue on to enter the Temple building itself.

If the man were to look beyond the Temple to the northwest corner of the complex, he could see the fortress called Antonia. This fortress connected to the Temple’s outer court by means of a stairway, so that Roman soldiers could very quickly cross if needed. They did just that for example, at the time of the riot associated with the apostle Paul’s last visit to Jerusalem (Acts 21:31-32).

Josephus relates that the entire façade of the Temple was covered with gold plates. When the sun rose the reflection was nearly blinding. On a clear day the brilliance of the Temple was visible from a considerable distance outside Jerusalem. And this brilliance was not due to gold alone; the upper parts of the Temple were pure white, probably marble. Once a year the priests applied whitewash to this upper section. At the very top gold spikes lined the roof. Approaching the Temple, twelve steps led up to the entrance of the vestibule (ʻūlām). The inner walls of this vestibule, like the façade, were gilded. Carved oak beams comprised the lintel of the portal. The vestibule rose to the full height of the inner portions of the Temple, but exceeded these in width by twenty-six feet on each side. This space formed two rooms wherein were housed sacrificial implements.

At the entrance to the sanctuary (ḥēkāl) hung a veil woven in Babylon, embroidered in four colors: scarlet, light brown, blue and purple. According to Josephus the veil symbolized "a panorama of the heavens, excluding the signs of the zodiac" (J. W. 5.5.4 §§212-14). In front of the veil was a golden lamp given by Queen Helena of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism.* Two tables also stood at the entrance before the veil, one of marble and the other of gold. At the weekly changing of the priestly courses, the marble table received the new shewbread introduced into the Temple, while the golden one held the old bread. Standing outside the Temple and looking into the entrance, one could see into the vestibule as far as the veil and the tables holding the shewbread, but it was impossible to see further into the sanctuary.

The sanctuary and the Holy of Holies comprised one long room, 103 feet long, 35 feet wide and 69 feet high and demarcated by curtains. These curtains were beautifully embroidered with lions and eagles. Entirely overlaid with gold panels, the interior of the sanctuary housed the lampstand, the shewbread table (distinct from the two tables already described that stood outside the entrance), and the altar of incense. All were made of gold. The seven branches of the lampstand symbolized the seven planets, while the twelve loaves of the shewbread, which had originally stood for the twelve tribes of Israel, had been reinterpreted so that they now represented the signs of the zodiac as well.

Only the high priest could enter the Holy of Holies, and that only on the Day of Atonement In the Second Temple period the interior was devoid of all furnishings save for a small rock upon which the high priest made his annual offerings of incense. The artisans who maintained the Temple did "enter" the inner sanctum, but only in a way that was interpreted as not entering. Lowered from the roof in cages closed on the sides, they were unable to see their surroundings. Thus they worked blind and, technically, did not enter the room since they did not come through the entrance and saw and touched nothing.
A great deal of the intellectual and spiritual life of the city took place in the courtyards of the Temple, the outermost of which, as indicated, was extremely capacious. There scholars wrote, read and instructed their students, and there political debate occurred. Surrounded by the splendors of the Temple, it was only natural to feel a sort of numinous awe. That however, was not the only or, perhaps, the most important emotion to which the Temple built by Herod gave rise.

2. Attitudes Toward the Temple.

Attitudes toward the Temple at Jerusalem varied considerably from time to time and from group to group within intertestamental Judaism. In many respects the theology of the Temple within this period continued along the lines already developed in the First Temple period. Thus, the Temple was considered to be the very dwelling place of God,* in a way shared by no other place on earth. Even the prophets who had grave reservations about the cultic practices going on in their own time believed that the Temple was nevertheless God's dwelling among humankind. Ezekiel, for example, who says that he saw the glory of God depart the Temple because of defiling practices (Ezek 8—10), also says that God will return to live forever in a new Temple (Ezek 43:1-12).

The Temple was considered a sign of Israel's election from among the peoples of the earth. It stood on a site chosen by theophany (2 Sam 24:16) long before its construction; Zion was the mountain of God (Ps 68:17) and was even identified with the original location of the Garden of Eden (cf. Ezek 34). Even the destruction of 587 B.C. did not disprove Israel's election; rather, God would return and once more make Jerusalem his choice (Zech 1:17). The peoples of the earth would one day stream to Jerusalem to worship,* and Israel would stand at the head of the nations (cf. Is 2:1-4).

These ideas and other positive assessments of the Temple continued to be believed and elaborated in the intertestamental period. But another strain of thought also having its roots in the OT, is noticeably more prominent now: the tradition of hostility toward the Temple. This tradition particularly characterizes apocalyptic* thought and—as is becoming more and more recognized—apocalypticism was the popular religion of Second Temple Judaism. This tradition of hostility toward the Temple is worthy of extended consideration, since it sheds light on the Gospel tradition.
The apocalyptic tradition of aversion toward the Temple at Jerusalem takes a great deal of its inspiration from the book of Ezekiel. Ezekiel 40—48 constitutes the prophet's famous vision of a new Temple, a new Jerusalem and a new theocratic state. He is given a vision of a Temple in heaven, whence it will be manifest in the end of days. Then the heavenly Temple will descend on Zion, and God will once more take up permanent residence there. Different streams of Judaism understood this vision in different ways. As noted above, Zechariah, for example, believed that the promise was fulfilled in the Temple rebuilt in his own day. But for some groups the Temple of Zerubbabel was not the one promised.

This rejection of the Second Temple probably had its basis in several related perceptions. First was the fact that the Temple rebuilt under Haggai and Zechariah was singularly unimpressive compared with the Solomonic version it attempted to re-create. Surely the God of all the earth would not be content to reside in such a pathetic edifice, which dimmed in comparison not only with Solomon's structure, but much the more so when compared with visions of the heavenly Temple (cf. 1 Enoch 90:28-29). Even a foremost proponent of this Temple, Haggai, had to recognize this problem. He did his best to blunt the criticisms of those unimpressed with the Temple of Zerubbabel (Hag 2:9; cf. Zech 14:8-11), but he was unable to silence all the critics.

A second significant reason for the rejection of the Second Temple by certain elements of the Jewish people centered on cultic practices. Already in the latter portions of Isaiah and in Ezekiel one can recognize hints of such disputes. These disagreements concerned the proper structures and procedures for the sacrificial cultus, and even the proper times for festivals and assemblies (see Feasts). Note, for example, the words of Isaiah 66:3, "Whoever kills an ox is like one who slays a man; whoever sacrifices a lamb is like one who breaks a dog's neck; whoever offers a grain offering is like one who offers swine's blood.... They have chosen their own ways, and their soul delights in their abominations" (NASB, modified). This passage is hyperbolic, of course; no one was really offering dogs or pigs. But in the author's view the priests of the Temple in Jerusalem were not practicing the proper methods, and the result was the same: an illegitimate cultus. The disagreements could hardly have been more fundamental.

It would appear that during the fourth and third centuries B.C.—a period for which we have virtually no written evidence—these disagreements were to some extent resolved. Some sort of modus vivendi did emerge. But the problems did not simply go away. Those whose ideas were defeated naturally felt disenfranchised, and it is probably among such groups that apocalyptic ideas found their most fertile soil. In the view of these disenfranchised elements the groups regnant in the Temple practiced the wrong halakah (see Law); consequently, both the priesthood and the Temple were defiled.

Again and again in the apocalyptic literature these notions recur. Thus in 1 Enoch 83—90 (c. 150 B.C.) the writer portrays the Temple of Zerubbabel as ritually impure; he says the priests tried to offer bread on the altar "but all the bread on it was polluted and impure" (1 Enoch 89:72-73). The Apocalypse of Weeks (now found in portions of 1 Enoch 91 and 93; c. 200 B.C. or earlier) claims that every generation since the exile has been apostate because no one was able to discern the true cultus or "things of heaven" (1 Enoch 93:9). The Testament of Levi (first century B.C./first century A.D.) calls the priests of the former Temple impure. In the last days, however, when a new priest would arise, "The heavens shall be opened, and from the glorious Temple sanctification shall come upon him" (T. Levi 17:10). Along with many others, the author of Jubilees (c. 170 B.C.) despairs that the only remedy is the replacement of the sullied present structure by the eschatological version (23:21).

But perhaps the strongest reason for the rejection of the present Temple stemmed from a belief that it was not built to the specifications that God had provided. This belief in turn derived from a straightforward reading of the biblical accounts. The Temple of Solomon, after all, was built to specifications given to him by his father David. Where had David gotten those plans? The account in Kings does not specify. This was a bothersome problem for some Second Temple Jews. The Chronicler had already offered his solution in 1 Chronicles 28:19, saying that David gave Solomon, "Everything (the whole plan detailed in 1 Chron 28:11-18) in a book from the hand of God..." Thus the Chronicler believed that David must have received his Temple plans from God himself, and could not have relied on human artifice for so important a structure. But many Jews did not agree with the Chronicler's solution. It must be recalled that the portion of Hebrew Scripture called the Writings, among which Chronicles is numbered, were not everywhere accorded the authority given the Torah and the Prophets.

Instead, apocalyptic visionaries found another scriptural portion where God had revealed the divine plan for an earthly Temple. This portion was the description of the building of the Tabernacle contained in the latter chapters of the book of Exodus. Prima facie, it was inconceivable that God would have instructed Moses* about every matter of the Law while neglecting to describe the perfect Temple. Warrant for the view that Moses had indeed seen the plan for the Temple—or even the heavenly Temple itself—was found in verses such as Exodus 25:9, "According to all that I am showing you, the plan of the dwelling place and the plan of all its implements, thus shall you do." For such intertestamental exegetes, the equation of "dwelling place" (miškān; conventionally translated "tabernacle") with the Temple was self-evident. Indeed, Exodus 25:8 explicitly connected the plans which Moses was seeing with the "Temple" (miqdāš). Accordingly, any proper Temple would have to be constructed not along the lines of the Davidic/Solomonic model, but according to the plans which God had delivered once for all to his pre-eminent prophet Moses. It further followed that the Davidic/Solomonic Temple, the Temple of Zerubbabel and the Herodian Temple were all illegitimate. For the proponents of such views (which continued even after the destruction of A.D. 70—cf. 2 Apoc. Bar 4:2-6), the proper Temple had yet to be built. The present improper one was unacceptable to God and, accordingly, to all true worshippers.

Of course, those who held that the Temple should be built according to the plans God had shown Moses faced a certain difficulty: what had happened to those plans? They were not recorded in the OT. The answer that Second Temple authors devised to handle that problem was twofold: First they said, the plans had been kept hidden until the end and were to be known only to the elect; and second, some details would require additional revelation. In accordance with such an approach several writings from the intertestamental period make claims for new Temple visions.

The Qumranic text (see Dead Sea Scrolls) known as the New Jerusalem (5Q15) is one such writing. An angel appears to the anonymous seer (perhaps Ezekiel?) and takes him on a tour of the city and Temple of the last days. The New Jerusalem takes up where Ezekiel 40—48 leaves off, providing exact dimensions for buildings associated with the sacrificial cultus. It also describes the city of that new Temple, making interesting modifications on the ideas found in Ezekiel. Evidently the prophet's vision was not felt to be the last word.

The Temple Scroll (11QT), another text from Qumran, goes somewhat further. This text implicitly claims to be a new revelation to a Mosaic figure who, like that prophet speaks with God face to face. Many details of the Temple buildings appear in this text often in the language of the tabernacle description from Exodus. That was only to be expected, since the allusions to Moses' vision of the heavenly Temple occur in those portions of Exodus dealing with the tabernacle. Neither the New Jerusalem nor the Temple Scroll describe a Temple precisely like that of Solomon; some of the details are decidedly different. Presumably the authors of these and similar texts must have regarded the actual Temple in Jerusalem as a sort of imposter.

Still, despite all their rhetoric and even with these fundamental reasons for rejecting the Second Temple structures, one must be cautious about concluding that any groups among the Jews boycotted the Temple altogether. Claims that the so-called Qumran community, for example, had deserted the Temple and that its members considered themselves a new, spiritual Temple, are problematic. These claims mainly depend on certain passages in the Manual of Discipline (the view that 4QFIor, with its reference to a miqdaš 'ādām, means a spiritual rather than physical Temple must be rejected).

The difficulties with this particular conclusion properly require a separate exposition, but perhaps several points should be made. First we really do not know how the authors of the Manual of Discipline regarded that work; some of the imagery which it uses, such as the mustering of "Israel" by hundreds and by thousands, suggests that the text describes an idealized future. If so, then the passages which many understand as rejecting the sacrificial cultus (esp. col. 9) should not automatically be taken as evidence that the group avoided the Temple in the present age. Second, the Manual of Discipline stands in some sort of relation with the Damascus Covenant (CD), although scholars do not agree on precisely how to define that relationship. The Damascus Covenant certainly envisions a circumscribed participation in the Temple cultus (col. 6). This fact has to be borne in mind before reaching any conclusions about the Manual of Discipline, especially since the latter work does not explicitly declare the Temple obsolete. Third, at least one unpublished copy of the Manual (from cave 4) contains a passage describing the comings and goings of the priestly courses. Such a description may imply that the authors recognized the Temple's fundamental importance and could not simply reject it. Fourth, a point related to this last—the Manual apparently existed in various recensions. If so, it is arbitrary to decide that the cave 1 manuscript (the only one fully published) was necessarily the one being followed at any one time—if indeed any of the versions were "followed" or were intended as anything more than idealizing literature.

Even though the present cultus be flawed, sacrifices and festivals were divinely ordained after all. Might one really entirely cease to observe them? A more prudent approach is to suggest that such groups limited their involvement with the Temple to the bare necessities, while working to change the situation and to force the acceptance of their own viewpoints.

3. The Temple in the Gospels.

In addition to the various Gospel portions which take the Temple structures for their narrative setting (some of which have been noted in the Temple description above), the Temple plays a critical role in three particular pericopes. These are (1) the cleansing of the Temple (Mk 11:15-17; Mt 21:12-13; Lk 19:45-46; Jn 2:14-17; see Temple Cleansing); (2) the saying attributed to Jesus concerning the destruction and rebuilding of the Temple (Mk 14:57-58; 15:29-30; Mt 26:61; 27:40; Jn 2:18-22; cf. Acts 6:14; see Destruction of Jerusalem); and (3) the prophecy of the Temple's destruction contained in the Little Apocalypse and related texts (Mk 13:2-3; Mt 24:1; Lk 21:5-6; cf. Mk 13:14; Mt 24:15; Lk 21:20; see Apocalyptic Teaching). All of these passages have in common a negative attitude toward the Temple. In order to gain a balanced perspective, before examining them it is important to take notice of positive attitudes toward the Temple implicit within the Gospels.

These positive attitudes continue one line of Temple theology alluded to above. Prominently, the Gospels view the Temple as the special place of God's presence (Mt 12:4; Lk 6:4). This dogma underlies the saying about swearing by the Temple (Mt 23:31; cf. Mt 23:16, with a similar rationale). Jesus is depicted as saying that the Temple should be a house of prayer* not of thieves—a strong affirmation of the sanctity connected with God's presence. Matthew also portrays Jesus as paying the Temple tax (see Taxes), if only out of tolerance rather than conviction (Mt 17:24-27).

The three negative pericopes are all problematic, and their interpretation is often a function of a particular scholar's model for understanding the historical Jesus. Furthermore, all three are currently at the vortex of Gospel scholarship. The following discussion is therefore intended as representative and suggestive rather than exhaustive.

Jesus' cleansing of the Temple was an extremely dramatic, if not apocalyptic, act. At its heart is the attitude that the present cultus is corrupt—on that all agree.
But is this merely the response of a prophet (see Prophets, Prophecy) who acts from the righteous anger of an Isaiah or a Jeremiah in the face of improper worship, or is it more—a messianic claim? Although the cleansing plays no part in the narratives of the trial of Jesus, some (most recently and notably E. P. Sanders) have claimed that the act was that of a revolutionary, and was perceived as such by the Temple authorities and the Romans (see Rome). Sanders can find no other reason for Jesus' arrest, trial (see Trial of Jesus) and crucifixion (see Death of Jesus). In the context of what we know about apocalyptic thinking it is undeniable that contemporaries might well have believed that Jesus was seeking to inaugurate the eschaton by his actions. In apocalyptic writings renewal of the Temple is often a messianic act, or is at least connected with the rise of the messiah (see Christ). And even if it were not so intended, one suspects that Jesus' act was sufficiently militant to arouse zealot feelings and thus discomfit the Romans (see Revolutionary Movements). The saying about the destruction and rebuilding of the Temple is, if anything, even more problematic. It is convenient to consider the so-called Little Apocalypse prediction of the Temple's destruction at the same time, as the two appear to be interrelated in the Gospel traditions. According to the latter (Mk 13:1-4 and par.) Jesus predicted the destruction of AD. 70 many years before it happened. This prediction is strikingly reminiscent of the charge made against Jesus in the trial before the Sanhedrin. There witnesses declare that they have heard Jesus say that he will destroy the Temple "made with hands" and in three days raise up another "made without hands." As usually understood, Mark seems to say that this charge was false and did not stand because the witnesses contradicted each other. They were, in other words, false witnesses. But it should be noted that Mark does not necessarily mean that the charge was substantively false—he says only that the witnesses disagreed in their accounts of Jesus' declaration in some unspecified manner (houtōs). Then in Mark 15:29 bystanders taunt Jesus with the same charge as he hangs on the cross. Were these people aware of the proceedings before the court, wanting only to repeat the false charges? Or did they perhaps believe (whether from the earlier testimony or for other reasons) that Jesus had in fact made some such statement?

The Markan account apparently wants the reader to conclude that Jesus never said that he would destroy the Temple. In and of itself that conclusion would not be problematic. But on comparison with John 2:19-22 a tension arises. John places the saying in the context of the cleansing of the Temple rather than in his account of Jesus' trial. The Jews ask Jesus what warrant he has for his actions, and he replies, "Destroy this Temple, and in three days I will raise it up." The Johannine interpretation then follows, "But he spoke of his body." John seems to admit that Jesus did say something about destroying the Temple, either advocating it or predicting it. John then seeks to deflect or at least avoid the straightforward interpretation of this tradition. If he did not have a tradition according to which Jesus said something about the Temple being destroyed, his allegorical interpretation could not have arisen.

John therefore attributes a crucial saying to Jesus while Mark, as often understood, may deny that Jesus said it. Scholars have wrestled with this (apparent) contradiction without producing a consensus. If one finds some truth in a zealot model for understanding Jesus, it is felicitous to see here a messianic declaration in which Jesus clears the way for the Temple of the eschaton. Such a declaration would be in keeping with the negative attitudes toward the Temple, and would look forward to a new Temple and, presumably, a new Jerusalem. Even if one rejects this alternative, it seems clear that the Gospel narrators, writing many years after Jesus spoke these words, found them somewhat embarrassing and in need of explanation. Perhaps that is understandable in the face of the First Revolt and the desire to distance nascent Christianity from the parent Judaism. In any event, the place of the Temple traditions within the Gospels will continue to merit study.

TEMPLE CLEANSING

The incident in the Temple* is recorded in all four Gospels (Mt 21:10-17; Mk 11:11,15-17; Lk 19:45-46; Jn 2:13-17), although each Gospel writer has interpreted the event in a distinctive way. Precisely because it is attested in all four Gospels, many believe that the incident traces to an event in Jesus' ministry although there is considerable debate about its meaning.

This article will first examine the incident as interpreted by each of the Evangelists before suggesting what the incident might have meant in the context of Jesus' ministry.

1. The Temple Incident in the Four Gospels

2. The Temple Incident in the Ministry of Jesus

1. The Temple Incident in the Four Gospels.

Assuming that Mark is the earliest of the Gospels and that both Matthew and Luke used Mark, we will examine Mark first and then compare it with the Matthean and Lukan versions of the incident (see Synoptic Problem). While John's version of the incident has obvious affinities with the Synoptic accounts and may have grown out of a common tradition, it most likely was not drawn from Mark (see Synoptics and John).

1.1. Mark The Symbolic Destruction of the Temple. The following table will set the Temple incident in its Markan context:

   (1) Entry, 11:11
   (2) Framing A (fig tree), 11:12-14
   (3) Incident in Temple, 11:15-17
   (4) Outcome, 11:18-19
   (5) Framing B (fig tree), 11:20-26
Mark frames the incident in the Temple with the cursing of the fig tree so that the two episodes comment on each other. Seen in light of the fig tree episode, the Temple incident is not so much a cleansing as a symbolic destruction (see Destruction of Jerusalem). Because it has been unfruitful like the fig tree, the Temple itself will be withered away to its very roots.

Peculiar to Mark is the separation of the entry from the Temple incident by a full day. Jesus first enters Jerusalem, and coming to the Temple "scrutinizes (periblepsamenos) everything" before returning to Bethany for the night. The verb is distinctively Markan (six of its seven NT uses occur in Mark) and, when used in reference to Jesus, connotes casting a critical or discerning eye. (3:5, 34; 5:32; 10:23). The first visit prepares the reader for Jesus' return. By depicting two visits to the Temple, Mark creates a place for the first portion of the fig tree episode which otherwise would have interrupted the triumphal entry (11:1-10; see Triumphal Entry).

When, on the following day, Jesus enters the Temple he "throws out" (ekballein) the buyers and the dealers and "throws over" (katestrepsen) the tables of money-changers and the chairs of the dove sellers (11:15). His actions seem directed against all dealers in sacrifices as well as their customers who include, no doubt, pilgrims visiting Jerusalem in fulfillment of their Torah obligation. In particular, Jesus singles out both the money-changers who convert the varied currencies brought by pilgrims into the Tyrian coinage required by Temple authorities for payment of the Temple tax (see Taxes) and the dove dealers who provide sacrifices for the poor.

Many have interpreted these actions as a cleansing of the Temple, although the nature of the cleansing has been disputed. Was Jesus preserving the spiritual nature of the Temple by purging it of commercial transactions? Or was he objecting to the abuse of the merchants who took advantage of the pilgrims through overcharging? Or was Jesus protesting the involvement of the priesthood (see Priest and Priesthood) in the commerce of the outer court?

Read in this framework, 11:16 has been taken to mean either that Jesus forbade people from taking short cuts through the Temple's outer court or that he prevented anyone from bringing an unconsecrated vessel into that courtyard. In either case, Jesus would be expressing a desire to restore the holiness of the Temple because he believed in its sanctity (see Clean and Unclean).
Problems with these readings of 11:15-16 abound. The dealers and money-changers were performing an essential service for pilgrims and other worshippers (see Feasts). Indeed, without their infrastructure of services, it would be difficult to see how the Temple sacrifices could have continued. Moreover, the money-changers charged a modest commission to convert currency into the Tyrian coinage required by the Temple, and the dealers in sacrifices provided unblemished and ritually acceptable victims. It is hard to interpret Jesus' assault on them as cleansing the Temple of crass commercialism. Nowhere does Jesus exhibit the zealous loyalty toward the Temple ascribed to him by those who read the passage in this way. Finally, all such readings conflict with the Markan framing.

What reading then respects the framing and accounts for Jesus' action? The incident makes good sense as a symbolic prophetic action (see Prophets and Prophecy) in which Jesus dramatizes the rejection of both the Temple authorities and the economic systems that supported and enhanced their control over its functions. "Throwing out" and "throwing over" represent a rejection not a cleansing. If skeuos in verse 16 refers to sacred cult vessels (Jesus would not permit anyone to carry a sacred vessel through the courtyard), then Jesus' actions are complementary. He would permit no business as usual, either in the subsystems that support the Temple or in the cultic activities themselves.

Jesus' pronouncement, drawn allusively from Isaiah 56:7 and Jeremiah 7:11, reinforces this reading. It declares God's will in making the Temple a source of access to Yahweh for all peoples and denounces the perversion of that purpose by those who have made it "a cave of social bandits" (spēlaion leston). The use of Isaiah 56:7 probably reflects Mark's concern for the Gentiles,* while the allusion to Jeremiah's Temple sermon constitutes a prophetic oracle of doom. The reason for the destruction of the Temple is made clear.

When the incident is understood as a prophetic act signalling the rejection and destruction of the Temple, then the reaction of the chief priests and scribes is understandable. They seek a way to destroy Jesus.

1.2. Matthew: Cleansing the Temple. The following table indicates how Matthew places the incident in his narrative:

(1) Entry, 21:10-11
(2) Incident 21:12-13

(3) Outcomes:

(i) 21:14-17

(ii) 21:18-22

(iii) 21:23-27

Matthew removes the cursing of the fig tree as a framework for the incident in the Temple. This allows him to elaborate on the entry itself. When Jesus enters Jerusalem, "the whole city was shaken" (eseïsthe, 21:10). The language is seismic and thereby casts his entry in the imagery of a theophany. This is no demonstration limited to Jesus' followers as in Mark. The entire city takes note, though its citizens are puzzled, asking "Who is this?" But what Jerusalem does not know, the crowd does: This is "the prophet Jesus from Nazareth of Galilee." The implicit opposition of the crowd to Jerusalem indicates that this is a positive affirmation not a deficient christology. "The prophet Jesus" may identify Jesus as the fulfillment of the promise made in Deuteronomy 18:15.

Matthew follows Mark in describing the initial actions of Jesus in the Temple. Jesus "threw out" the sellers and buyers and "threw over" the tables of money-changers and dove sellers. However, he omits Mark 11:16 altogether, perhaps because its meaning was unclear. The pronouncement of Jesus is likewise streamlined. The phrase "for all nations" is omitted from the compound quotation, thereby intensifying the accusation against the Temple authorities whose leadership has led the Temple away from its divine purpose (see Gundry, 412-13).

The justification for the indictment is illustrated in the special Matthean material that follows (21:14-16). Having denounced the perversion of the Temple, Jesus restores its purpose by healing the broken and the outcast His miraculous powers are hailed by the children in the Temple in fulfillment of Scripture (Ps 8:2; set Old Testament in the Gospels) but draw a predictably negative response from the Temple leaders.

Taken together, the healings and the controversy they generate reflect a typical Matthean pattern: Jesus acts—his opponents protest—Jesus quotes Scripture. They also depict the fulfillment of the purpose for which the Temple was given, a purpose frustrated by the very chief priests and scribes* who object indignantly to what Jesus says and does. The blind, the lame and the children (see Child, Children) on the Temple Mount parallel the crowds at the entry just as the puzzled city parallels the Temple authorities. Matthew portrays a great reversal: the insiders are either ignorant or indignantly obstinate, while the outsiders respond graciously to God's Messiah (see Christ) as he restores the Temple.

Two other outcomes follow rapidly from the incident and its aftermath. The fig tree episode (21:18-22) confirms the reversal of insider and outsider, especially the judgment on the Temple insiders, while the dispute over authority* must now be read in the light of the entire Temple incident The episode of the question about authority (21:23-27) hearkens back to the healings as well as the disruptions in the Temple's outer court

1.3. Luke: Preparing the Temple. Again, it will be helpful to study the Temple incident in its Lukan narrative context.

(1) Frame: weeping over the city, 19:41-44

(2) Incident 19:45-46

(3) Outcomes:

(i) 19:47-48

(ii) 20:1-8

(iii) 20:9-19

Most strikingly, Luke has muted the entire incident Jesus "began to throw out the dealers." Missing are the references to buyers, money-changers and dove sellers. Moreover, the pronouncement is directed to them alone in such a way that it appears as though Jesus is objecting to their commercial activity, presumably because it detracts from the divine purpose of the Temple as a house of prayer.*

The immediate outcome is that Jesus "was teaching daily in the Temple courtyard" to the enthusiastic people (laos, not ochlos "crowd") who listen to his every word. Luke portrays Jesus clearing away the activity of the buyers, preparing the Temple so that he can restore the Temple courtyard as a place of teaching (see Teacher). The twin themes of that teaching are spelled out in the two pericopes that follow, the question about authority (20:1-8) and the parable of the wicked tenants along with its associated sayings (20:9-19). The former pericope establishes Jesus' authority for teaching on the Temple, while the latter specifies the indictment against the current authorities.

The entire episode is introduced by Jesus' prophetic lament over Jerusalem (19:41-44) which concludes by revealing the reason for the turmoil and devastation that awaits city and Temple alike. "You did not grasp the critical moment (kairon) of your visitation." The contrast between the deadly visitation of siege armies in 19:43, 44a and the gracious visitation of Jesus is stark The failure to understand one leads to the fatal outcome of the other.

For what then does Jesus prepare the Temple? In light of its subsequent destruction, prophetically glimpsed in the lament, was Jesus preparing the Temple for its destruction? No. Understood in the context of Luke-Acts, the incident was preparing the Temple for its role as the starting point of a new movement away from Jerusalem announced in the pattern of witness found in Luke 24:47 and elaborated in Acts 1:8. Jerusalem and the Temple would no longer be the goal of pilgrimage but the launching pad of a new mission.

1.4. John: The Cleansing and Replacement of the Temple. The incident in John occurs at the beginning of Jesus' ministry during his first trip to Jerusalem.

(1) Entry, 2:13

(2) Incident 2:14-17

(3) Challenge, 2:18-22

The entire episode is self-contained, being separated from the miracle at Cana by 2:12 and from subsequent events in Jerusalem by 2:23-25.

Significant differences exist between the Johannine and the Synoptic versions. Jesus' actions are more extreme in John. He makes a whip to drive out the sellers of sheep and oxen, along with the moneychangers whose coins he pours out onto the Temple courtyard. But he treats the dove sellers more leniently, simply ordering them to leave with their wares.

The pronouncement itself contrasts "the house of my Father" with "a house of trade," and the scriptural allusion is to Zechariah 14:21. The allusion to Zechariah certainly helps one to interpret the consequent challenge and call for a sign as well as Jesus' response (2:18-19). The prophecy of Zechariah refers to the eschatological Day of the Lord (see Apocalyptic Teaching; Eschatology) when the Temple would become the center of worship* for all peoples. On that day, "there shall be [no] trader in the house of the Lord of hosts" (14:21). So Jesus' actions appear to be informed by a purifying zeal (cf. Ps 69:9) to convert God's house into its eschatological form. In this context 2:19 is a promise to perform such an act. It carries the sense "even if you were to destroy the Temple, in just three days I would raise a better one in its place."

But John intrudes by reinterpreting the saying of Jesus to refer to his resurrection (2:21-22), and with the narrator's reading of the saying the purification theme becomes a replacement motif. For John's community Jesus' body is the Temple that has replaced the Temple of former times.

2. The Temple Incident in the Ministry of Jesus.

Given the diversity among the Gospel writers, it is not surprising that scholars have argued over both the meaning and the details of the incident in Jesus' ministry. Consensus does seem to place the incident at the end of Jesus' ministry rather than at the beginning, thereby favoring the Synoptics over John, but beyond this point, agreement ends.

Although varied, the interpretations of the incident do fall into four basic categories: (1) it is a religious event intended to cleanse the Temple of impurities, whether commercial or sacerdotal; (2) it is a messianic event intended to include the Gentiles in the scope of the Temple's activities; (3) it is a prophetic event intended to announce the destruction of the Temple and its eschatological restoration; (4) it is a political event intended to disrupt the commercial and sacerdotal activities of the Temple because they had become oppressive and exploitative. Whatever approach or combination of approaches interpreters may take, however, they must resolve some basic questions about the scope, purpose and content of the event. These can best be examined by looking at its two component parts, Jesus' actions and his pronouncement.

2.1 The Actions of Jesus in the Temple. For some scholars the incident recounts Jesus cleansing the Temple and reclaiming it for its spiritual purpose as a house of prayer. For others, the event is an assault on and attempted political take-over of the Temple. Between these extremes, scholars like R. A. Horsley and E. P. Sanders read the event as a symbolic prophetic action, limited in scope, but condemning the Temple.

Sanders concludes that Jesus either prophesied or threatened the destruction of the Temple as a prelude to its eschatological restoration. Horsley sees the action as an attack on the oppressive political and economic system that found its center in the Temple. More than a symbolic action, it involved violence against the exploiters of the people. Both agree that the demonstration was sufficiently limited in scope so that it would not attract the attention of the Temple police or the Roman troops stationed in the Antonia fortress, yet noteworthy enough to elicit concerted action against Jesus.

2.2 Jesus’ Pronouncement in the Temple. The saying is highly debated, most scholars judging it to be Markan or pre-Markan but not traceable to Jesus. G. W. Buchanan, for instance, argues a Markan setting by identifying the lestei of the saying with the "brigands" who seized the Temple during the revolt against Rome*. Others argue that the saying in John 2:19 may reflect Jesus' words more closely than the Markan saying.

If the prophetic-political readings of the passage are correct, however, they suggest a possible reading of the saying recorded in Mark that could place it in the context of Jesus' ministry. If this were the case, then Jesus would be declaring that the true social bandits were not the deviants operating out of caves in the Judean wilderness but the prominent officials of the Temple built over the sacred cave on the Temple Mount. Their exploitative and oppressive domination of the people through taxation and tribute represent the real social banditry of the time, even though it was masked as piety and religious obligation. Understood in this way, the saying fits the action, and both delineate Jesus' prophetic judgment of the Temple that would set the authorities against him and lead to his crucifixion.

TEMPTATION OF JESUS

In biblical thought "to tempt" means to test something or someone in order to determine or demonstrate worth or faithfulness. Temptation also refers to an attempt, often by Satan (set Demon, Devil, Satan), to incite a person to sin. The Gospels depict Jesus experiencing a range of temptations.

1. Terminology and Background

2. The Temptation in the Wilderness

3. Temptation in the Gospels

1. Termination and Background.

The Greek verb for "tempt" is peirazō (Mt 4:1, 3; 16:1; 19:3; 22:18, 35; Mk 1:13; 8:11; 10:2; 12:15; Lk 4:2; 11:16; [Jn 8:6?]). It can be used in a positive sense, as when Jesus tests his disciples* (Jn 6:6), as well as in a negative sense, as when the Pharisees* try to entangle Jesus in his conversation (Mt 22:15-22). In Acts 15:10 and 1 Corinthians 10:9 peirazō is used of challenging God. The word is best known for its use of the devil tempting in order to cause sin (Mt 4:1 par. Mk 1:13 and Lk 4:2; see 2. below) so that the devil can be called "the tempter" (ho peirazōn, only in Mt 4:3 and 1 Thess 3:5). The noun "temptation"
(peirasmos) is used of trials sent by God* or encountered while serving him (Lk 22:28; Acts 20:9). It is also used of trials or tests that do or may lead to sin (Mt 6:13 par. Lk 11:4; Mt 26:41 par. Mk 14:38 and Lk 22:46; cf. Lk 22:40) as well as the temptation of Jesus by the devil (Lk 4:13). The word is also used to describe a trial or test which causes a follower of Jesus to fall away or apostatize (Lk 8:13).

The Greek verb dokimazō ("prove" or "examine") can be used interchangeably with peirazō (2 Cor 13:5; 1 Pet 1:6-7). However, while dokimazō generally implies that the testing will have positive results (1 Thess 2:4; 1 Tim 3:10), peirazō came to signify the testing for good or evil (Mt 16:1; 19:3; 22:18), and even the hope or expectation of failure (Mt 4:1; 1 Cor 7:5; Rev 2:10).

In the LXX peirazō translates the strong active form of the verb nasāh (Gen 22:1; Ex 15:25; Num 14:22) and the Greek peirasmos is used to translate the Hebrew noun massāh (Ex 17:7; Deut 4:34; 9:22; Ps 95 [94]:8). A sword and armor could be tried or tested (1 Sam 17:39), though almost always the testing has a personal object. People can test each other's reputation (1 Kings 10:1 par 2 Chron 9:1), they can "make a test of pleasure" (Eccles 2:1) and test another's beliefs (Dan 1:12, 14), or simply attempt or try to do something difficult (Deut 4:34; 28:56; cf. 7:19; 29:3). Daniel 12:10 uses peirazesthai of the eschatological tribulations which will act as a means of purification before the end (see Eschatology). Most often in the OT it is God who is depicted as testing the faithfulness and obedience of his own people to know whether or not they are true to him (Gen 22:1-19; [Heb 11:17-20]; Ex 15:25; Deut 8:2; 33:8; 1 Kings 22:21-23; 2 Chron 32:31). On the other hand, God is not said to test heathen people. None of the peir-group of words occurs in LXX of Job for "testing" (cf. 4:2; 9:23), but the theme of God permitting the testing of the faithfulness of his servant, here through Satan, is evident (Job 1—2). To pass the test is to remain obedient to God despite profound and incomprehensible suffering. In 2 Samuel 24:1, 10 the Lord is said to incite David to sin. However, the later rewriting of this story introduces Satan as the one enticing to sin (1 Chron 21:1). Similarly, the tendency to say that someone is tempted or is in temptation, avoiding the idea that God tempts directly, is a development in post-exilic thought (Jub 17:15-18).

Also frequent in the OT are references to God's people wrongfully putting him to the test, notably by questioning his care as at Massah (Ex 17:2, 7; Deut 6:16; 9:22; 33:8), by refusing to recognize and remember his obvious power (Num 14:22; Ps 78:40-43; 106:14), by asking him to prove himself (Is 7:12) or by disobeying him (Mai 3:15). To test God was the antithesis of trusting him and thus a very serious violation of God's honor.

In Hellenistic times peirazā was used to reflect God educating his people (Wis 3:5-6) and testing the obedience of his servants, of which Abraham* was a model of faithfulness (1 Macc 2:51-52) as he was in the rabbinic literature (m. 'Abot 5:3). The experience of testing also highlighted God's care in times of trial (Sir 33:1).

In the Dead Sea Scrolls* God's people are depicted as continually facing afflictions which may deflect them from faithfulness (CD 1:15; 1Q14 11:1; 1QH 4:12,16; 1QS 3:24; 5:4-5; 4QpHos 2:5; 6QD 3:3).

In the rabbinic literature the theme is maintained that God tests and disciplines those whom he loves (Ps 11:5; Prov 3:12; 2 Apoc. Bar. 79:2; b. Ber. 5a). Further, the homonymous verbs nāsāh ("test" or "tempt") and nāšā ("exalt") give rise to the often used rabbinic pun: "God tempts the righteousness, implies that the Holy One, blessed be He, never exalts a man without first having tested and tempted him; if that man withstands the temptation, then he exalts him" (Num. Rab. 15:12; cf. Gen. Rab. 32:3; 34:2; 55:2-3; Exod. Rab. 2:2-3; Cant. Rab. 11:16:2).

2. The Temptation in the Wilderness.

Mark's very brief account gives no details of the temptation (Mk 1:12-13), while Matthew's and Luke's stories are in the form of a longer, three-part conversation not unlike the debates of the scribes* which utilize proof-texts from Scripture (Mt 4:1-11 par. Lk 4:1-13; cf. the secondary Cos. Heb. [Origen, Comm. Joh. 11:12:87]).

It has been suggested that Mark's version is an abbreviation of the tradition known to Matthew and Luke. However, in view of the importance of the conflict between Jesus and Satan in Mark, it is unlikely he would undertake such an abbreviation. Also, the paradisal motif inherent in the mention of Jesus being with the wild beasts is to be contrasted with the Exodus theme recurrent in Matthew and Luke. Thus, it is more likely that Mark's tradition is independent of that shared by Matthew and Luke, the latter being derived most probably from Q.* However, it is possible that the narrative is a late addition to Q, for the temptation story is anomalous in what is generally thought to be a collection of sayings and speeches.

In all three Synoptic Gospels the importance of the account of the temptation of Jesus is seen from its position in the Gospels: after his baptism* and immediately prior to and introducing his public ministry.

The Fourth Gospel has no account of the temptation in the wilderness (see Mountain and Wilderness). However, in a scene reminiscent of the Synoptic temptation narrative, the people who saw the miracle of the loaves and fishes (6:1-14) want a sign similar to the gift of the manna in the wilderness so that they can believe in Jesus as the second Moses* (6:30; cf. Rab. Eal. 1:9). Jesus' reply in John 6:32-33 echoes both Deuteronomy 8:3 and his reply in the first temptation in the wilderness (Mt 4:4 par. Lk 4:4).

2.1. The Origin of the Temptations. It is difficult to establish definitely the origin of the temptation narrative as being in the life of Jesus. But the history-of-religion parallels from the stories of Buddha and Zarathustra, for more distant examples, at least indicate that holy men were thought to experience times of testing.

The first three Evangelists agree that the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) led Jesus into the wilderness and that he was tempted by Satan (Mk 1:13) or the devil (Mt 4:1 par. Lk 4:2). The sharp saying "Get behind me Satan" directed at Peter (Mk 8:33), which is hardly likely to have been invented by the early church, also depicts Jesus being tempted by Satan. The Fourth Gospel also reflects the idea of Jesus being tempted (Jn 6:15, 26-34; 7:1-4).

It can be stated with some certainty that the temptations are so distinctive that they are hardly likely to have been created in the light of later Christian experience of temptation, even though Jesus and his followers later may have shared other trials (cf. Lk 22:28). Also, if the temptations revolve around the sonship of Jesus (see 2.3. below), then the early church would have been unlikely to create material showing Jesus' inner struggle with his obedience and trust in God and the responsibilities of his relationship with his Father. Further, the difficulty early Christians had with the idea of the Messiah Christ) being tempted is probably suggested by the affirmations of the writer of the letter to the Hebrews that Jesus suffered being tempted, though without sin (Heb 2:18; 4:15-16; cf. 5:7-9).
That the scenes comprising the temptation narrative in Q resemble a scribal haggadic midrash* does not in itself tell against their historicity, but that a Palestinian origin for them is likely, even though the OT quotations from the LXX show the tradition has passed through the hands of a Greek-speaking community (see Tradition Criticism).

The temptation story is told as a visionary experience. There are two other reported visionary experiences of Jesus in relation to his dealing with Satan, each of them handed down in the first person. In Luke 10:18 Jesus says that he has seen Satan falling from heaven in relation to his disciples' exorcisms. In Luke 22:31-32, reminiscent of the heavenly court scenes in Job 1:6-12 and 2:1-6, Jesus says he has prayed for Simon because he and the other disciples are going to be sifted like wheat. It is possible then that Jesus could have related to his disciples his experiences now reflected in the temptation narratives. Furthermore, it is quite probable that, anticipating the nature of his ministry, Jesus had to face just such issues as conveyed in the temptation narratives. Therefore, there is no need to suppose that Jesus' desert experience was invented. Rather, it is quite probable that the temptation narratives have their origin in the initial stage of the ministry of the historical Jesus, who later reported his visionary experiences to his disciples, perhaps in the context of later teaching about trials and temptations (see 3. below).

2.2. The Order of the Temptations. Given the historicity of both stories, the association of the temptation with the baptism is to be expected for, as Sirach 2:1 says in reflecting human experience, "My son, if you come forward to serve the Lord, prepare yourself for temptation." The same pattern is found in the story of the Israelites who, after passing through the waters of the Red Sea, spend time being tested in the wilderness (Deut 8:2-5; cf. 1 Cor 10:1-22).

Matthew and Luke agree that the devil (Matthew has "tempter") first tempts Jesus to demonstrate that he is the Son of God (see Son of God) by turning stones into loaves of bread.* But while Matthew says Jesus was then taken to the pinnacle of the Temple* and thirdly to a high mountain, Luke has these in reverse order. If Luke's order is original then Matthew has made the last temptation correspond to the climax of his Gospel (Mt 28:18). On the other hand, Luke's interest in Jerusalem and the Temple (Lk 24:49; Acts 1:4; 6:8—7:60; 21:17—22:21) means that he is likely to have wanted the temptations to reach a climax there (Lk 4:9). Alternatively, it has been suggested that Luke may have relied on Psalm 106 to reorder the scenes. For in this psalm there is reference to the manna (v. 14), worship of the golden calf (v. 19-20) and the testing of God in the wilderness (w. 32-33), all in the order they appear in the Lukan temptation story. However, this explanation is probably too subtle, even though the same order of themes is evident in 1 Corinthians 10.

Nevertheless, it is generally agreed that Matthew has maintained the order of the temptations in Q and that Luke has changed the order of the last two. For there is a progression in Matthew's order from desert to Temple pinnacle to a mountain. Also, Matthew has a tidy reverse order of the quotation of Scripture from Deuteronomy (8:3; 6:16, 13), and the two temptations concerning Jesus' sonship come together in Matthew.

2.3. Jesus and the Temptations. The opening words of the temptation story in all three Synoptic Gospels are remarkably similar to Deuteronomy 8:2. Therefore, the importance of Deuteronomy and the Exodus theme in understanding the narrative is suggested from the beginning.

That Jesus should have been especially conscious of the presence and direction of the Holy Spirit in his desert experience of temptation (Mk 1:12 par. Mt 4:1 and Lk 4:1) is not surprising, for the OT speaks of the presence and leading of the Spirit (Neh 9:20; cf. Is 63:7-10) during Israel's desert wandering, as does later Jewish literature (e.g., Rob. Exod. 23:2).

That Satan tempts Jesus here is probably due to an increasing desire in the period to preserve the transcendence and loving goodness of God by not depicting God as directly involved in being tempted (see 1. above). The role of Satan also recalls that in Job where the faithfulness of God's servant is being tested in Satan's attempt to cause failure.

2.3.1. The First Temptation (Mt 4:3-4 par. Lk 4:3-4). In calling on Jesus to satisfy his hunger by turning stones into bread the devil appeals to Jesus' power as Son of God. This could be seen as a temptation to repeat the miracle (see Miracles and Miracle Stories) of the provision of manna in the wilderness (Ex 16:13-21; 2Apoc. Bar. 29:1-30:1; Josephus Ant. 20.8.6 §§167-68; J.W. 7.11.1 §438), or to perform a sign expected of the messianic age in order to win over people (cf. Jn 6:1-40) or perhaps, depending on the conditional "if' for this interpretation, the devil is to be seen attempting to raise doubt about Jesus' miraculous powers and, hence, his divine sonship.
However, the text of Jesus' reply, "Not on bread alone shall a person live ..." is almost exactly that of Deuteronomy 8:3, where allusion is made to the Israelites being disciplined in the wilderness as a man disciplines his son. For this reason Jesus is probably being tempted to assert his independence from God by performing a miracle for his own benefit, rather than trusting God as a son for all his needs (cf. Deut 28:1-14; Ps 33:18-19; 34:10). The Israelites failed their test; they grumbled against their leaders and God, craving different food from what God was providing (Deut 2:7; Neh 9:21; Ps 23:1; 78:18-22). But in the first scene of the temptations the Son of God rejected the devil's temptation and remained obedient to his Father, being satisfied with his Father's nourishment and care.

2.3.2. The Second Temptation (Mt 4:5-7 par. Lk 4:9-12). In this scene the devil is said to take Jesus to the "pinnacle" (pterugion) of the Temple. Pterugion ("winglet") was used figuratively of the edge or extremity of something and first used here of some high and visible part of the Temple (Josephus Ant. 15.11.5 §412; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.23.11). In asking Jesus to throw himself down from the Temple, the devil may be tempting Jesus to display his messiahship, for a rabbinical saying in the Pesiqta Rabbati says that "when the King, the Messiah, reveals himself, he will come and stand on the roof of the temple" (36). However, we cannot be certain that this saying reflects expectations of Jesus' time.

In any case, in light of Jesus' reply that "you shall not tempt the Lord your God" (cf. Deut 6:16), the devil is more likely to be understood as tempting God by challenging God to keep his promise of protection for his children (Ex 19:4-5; Deut 28:1-14; 32:10-11), particularly in the Temple (Ps 36:7-9; 91). This interpretation is further supported by noting that the devil has already quoted Psalm 91:11-12 about God's protection (Mt 4:6 par. Lk 4:10). Furthermore, the Fourth Gospel depicts Jesus' brothers suggesting a dangerous course of action, that he go to Jerusalem in order to display his works and identity. Jesus connects their suggestion with the evil world, Satan's domain, and rejects it on the grounds that his hour has not completely come (7:1-13).

2.3.3. The Third Temptation (Mt 4:8-10 par. Lk 4:5-8). In Matthew's order the temptation narrative climaxes with the devil taking Jesus to a very high mountain to show him all the kingdoms of the world and their glory,* as an ancient land seller might take a prospective buyer to a vantage point to see the land (Cicero Pro Tullio; cf. Gen 13:14-15; Deut 34:1). Perhaps recognizing that no actual mountain could give such a vantage point, and emphasizing the visionary nature of Jesus' experience, Luke does not mention the mountain, but only says that the devil led Jesus up (4:5, anago). This temptation appears to break the pattern of the narrative. Satan docs not mention Jesus' sonship, but says, "All these I will give you if you will fall down and worship me." However, the echo of Psalm 2 maintains the issue of Jesus' sonship in these scenes.

It has been suggested that the temptation is of a political nature. That is, this temptation explains that Jesus rejected zealotism and the role of a miraculous political Messiah as a satanic option. But the meaning of the temptation, again governed by OT background, is probably quite different In the story of the baptism which immediately precedes the temptations there is an echo of Psalm 2:7, "The Lord said to me, 'You are my Son....' " The psalm goes on to say, "Ask me, and I will give you the nations for your inheritance" (2:8). So clearly is this pan of the background to the third temptation that the devil is thereby seen to be offering Jesus what is not his to give in return for the worship of the devil.

That the essence of this temptation is for Jesus to receive his rightful inheritance without obedience to God is confirmed in Jesus' reply, which is a quotation from Moses warning the Israelites against idolatry as they enter the promised land (Deut 6:10-15). In the OT idolatry and demon worship are closely associated (Deut 32:17; Ps 106:37-38; cf. 1 Enoch 99:7). So, in being tempted to idolatry or to acknowledge the devil rather than God being in control of the world, Jesus answers the devil with the command of God "You shall worship the Lord your God, and him only shall you serve" (Deut 6:13; Mt 4:10 par. Lk 4:8). This final temptation is, then, the most devilish of all; the call to Jesus to receive his proper inheritance without obedient worship of God.

Each of the temptation scenes recalls aspects in the Exodus story when the Israelites failed to remain faithful to God. By contrast Jesus remains the obedient Son. As the Exodus through the wilderness confirmed that the Israelites were God's chosen, so in his experience in the desert Jesus is confirmed to be God's Son. The three scenes of Jesus' visionary experience show him triumphing in his battle with Satan to remain obedient to his Father without recourse to cheap displays of power.

2.4. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers. For all the Synoptic Evangelists the background to the temptation of Jesus is God leading the Israelites for forty years in the wilderness to humble them and test what was in their hearts, whether or not they would keep the commandments (Deut 8:2). Thus through the instrument of Satan, God tests the obedience of his Son Jesus.

2.4.1. Matthew. The first Evangelist has maintained the Q association between the baptism and temptation stories of Jesus. The climax of the baptism story is the voice from heaven, "This is my beloved Son, with whom I am well pleased" (3:17), so that the theme of sonship overshadows the story of the temptation in the wilderness. Matthew maintains the theme of Jesus' sonship in the first two temptations (4:3,6) and highlights the idea that the temptations in the wilderness are God testing his Son (cf. Deut 1:31; 8:5; 32:5) through an attempt by Satan to cause Jesus to displease God through being a disobedient Son (cf. Mt 3:17; 4:3,6).

In saying that Jesus was "led up" (anēchthē) into the wilderness, Matthew may be showing a knowledge of the Judean desert plateau above the Jordan.

Matthew has associated the forty days and forty nights in the wilderness with Jesus' fasting so that the story conforms to Moses fasting for the same period. Matthew has already drawn parallels between Jesus and Moses in 2:13, 16, 20-21. In the temptation story the parallels continue. Jesus was led into the wilderness just as Moses went to Mount Sinai in the wilderness (Deut 9:9); Jesus was not only forty days but also forty nights (Mt 4:2; cf. Lk 4:2) in the wilderness, as was Moses in the wilderness forty days and forty nights. During this time Jesus fasted (nēsteuō), just as Moses neither ate nor drank in the story in Exodus 34:28 (cf. Deut 9:9-18, 25). It is most likely that Matthew sees Jesus' fasting as an example, for he is the only Evangelist to give the followers of Jesus directions for fasting* (16:16-18; cf. 9:14-15). Finally, Jesus is shown all the kingdoms of the world from a mountain as Moses saw the promised land from a mountain (Deut 3:27; 34:1-4).

After the first temptation to turn stones into loaves of bread, it is probably Matthew who extends Jesus' reply in light of his interest in enhancing the wisdom* motif to include the words from the LXX, "but by every word that comes from the mouth of God" (4:4; cf. Deut 8:3). In this way Matthew is able not only to affirm the view that Jesus was victorious in being obedient to God (contrast Israel in Ex 16; Num 11) but also to begin to establish the view that Jesus is the new wise teacher* of Israel (cf. Prov 9:1-5).
Matthew is probably responsible for calling Jerusalem the holy city (4:5 par. Lk 4:9), for the only other place it occurs in the Gospels is in Matthew 27:53 where the Evangelist relates a story of events surrounding the crucifixion. If Matthew intended his readers to associate this story with that of the temptation, it is possible that Matthew is saying that while Jesus refused to tempt God by throwing himself down from the highest point of the holy city, when he was "thrown down" on the cross (see Death of Jesus), in the resurrection* he was shown to be the Son of God (cf. 4:6 and 27:54) and to be cared for by God (cf. 27:53).

In retaining the temptation to worship Satan as the climax of the story, Matthew highlights the ensuing battle in his Gospel between the kingdom of Heaven and the kingdom of Satan (cf. 12:24-29). In resisting this temptation Matthew has Jesus say, "Go, Satan!" (hypage satana), just as he has Jesus say later in his ministry to the demons (Mt 8:32; cf. Mk 5:13 par. Lk 8:32) as well as to Peter as he represents Satan (16:23 par. Mk 8:33).

In this temptation Jesus is shown not only to win the battle here, but later Matthew depicts Jesus again on a mountain, having his sonship affirmed in a visionary experience (17:1-13). Finally, Matthew's Gospel affirms Jesus' victory by ending with Jesus on a mountain, as ruler of the world, declaring to his disciples: "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me" (28:18).

For Matthew Jesus' victory over Satan in the temptations is complete. However, Jesus will go on doing battle with Satan in other areas. Thus the devil is said to leave (aphiēsin, historic present) Jesus, so that Matthew may be intending to give the impression that the departure is only temporary (cf. Lk 4:13). Further, God is seen to be faithful, providing Jesus' needs. Following Mark, Matthew says that angels* ministered to him, which would imply the provision of food (cf. 1 Kings 19:5-8).

2.4.2. Mark. As in the Q tradition, Mark has the story of the temptation tied directly to Jesus' baptism and the voice from heaven declaring, "You are my son . . ." (1:11). Thus for Mark the temptation is to be seen as a test of Jesus in relation to his sonship. Also, as Satan is the archdemon in Mark, Jesus is depicted as being involved in a spiritual and cosmic battle of the highest order.

The temptation narrative in Mark consists of four simple statements, each linked by "and" (kai). The brevity of the account, along with Jesus' frequent conflict with Satan through his exorcisms (3:22-27; cf. 1:21-28, 39; 3:11; 5:1-20; 7:24-29; 9:14-29), through encounters with the Pharisees (see 3. below), as well as through his disciples (8:33), gives the impression that Jesus' ministry was an almost-uninterrupted confrontation with Satan.

Perhaps to indicate that the whole of Jesus' life and ministry was directed by the Spirit, Mark says that the Spirit drove or compelled (ἐκβάλλω) Jesus into the wilderness, though not to temptation (1:12). There is an emphasis on the place of temptation being in the wilderness (ἐρήμος), probably not because it is a place of prayer* (cf. LK 5:16), but because Israel had been tested in the wilderness (Ps 78:17-20), because the age of salvation* was expected to begin in the wilderness (Mk 1:3; cf. Is 40:3; Josephus J.W. 2.13.5 §261; 7.11.1 §438) and because the wilderness was the habitat of the demons (IQM 1).

"Forty" is a common round number in the OT, and it is often used in stories of fasting and God's sustenance (Gen 7:4, 12; Ex 34:28; 1 Kings 19:4-8; cf. Adam and Eve 6:1-2), a motif reinforced in Mark's temptation story with his reference to the angels ministering to Jesus (Mk 1:13 par. Mt 4:11). Although Mark does not mention Jesus' fasting, he may intend it to be implied here.

Jesus said to be with the wild beasts (θηρία) and the angels ministering to him does not emphasize the loneliness of the temptation but recalls the OT eschatological expectation of harmony in the animal kingdom and between people and animals (Is 11:6-9; 32:14-20; 65:25; Hos 2:18) as it was in Genesis 1:26-28. As early as Justin a paradisal background to Mark's story of the temptation has been suggested (Dial. Tryph. 103). And there was a Jewish tradition that Adam and Eve were being ministered to by the angels (Adam and Eve 4; b. Sanh. 59b) and associated demons, wild beasts and angels (Ps 91:11-13; T. Iss. 7:7; T. Benj. 5:2; T. Naph. 8:4). This probably means that, for Mark, whereas Adam failed to resist temptation, Jesus overcame Satan and was able to live at peace with the wild beasts and receive the ministration of the angels.

It is generally accepted that Mark gives no hint of the nature nor the outcome of the temptation. However, the association of the temptation with the declaration of Jesus' sonship (1:11) and the reference to ministering angels (1:13) recalls the second temptation in Q (Mt 4:5-7 par. Lk 4:9-12). Thus Mark may have in mind that Jesus was being tempted to doubt his sonship and put God to the test. It is more likely that the nature of the temptation can be gleaned from noting that in Mark Satan's role is to attempt to deflect Jesus from his mission
(3:23, 26; 4:15; 8:33). That in Mark's temptation story Satan attempts to deflect Jesus and that Jesus emerges victorious, can also be seen by the fact that immediately following the temptation, Mark has Jesus embarking on his mission (1:14-15). Jesus' victory is also suggested in the mention of the angels who, in the OT, ensured the safe passage of God's chosen servant through a difficult period (Ex 23:20, 23; 32:34; 33:2; 1 Kings 19:5-7). Further, Jesus being with the wild beasts also suggests a victory to be contrasted with Adam's failure (see above). There is no suggestion in the Markan temptation story that Satan was completely or finally overthrown or bound.

2.4.3. Luke. In view of the temptations immediately following the baptism in Mark and Matthew, it is most probable that Luke has inserted the genealogy* (3:23-38) between the two narratives. The genealogy allows Luke to support the declaration at the conclusion of the baptism—that Jesus is the Son of God—by a genealogy which traces Jesus back through Adam to God. In turn, the temptations maintain a focus on the sonship of Jesus being at stake. As a faithful Son Jesus is bringing to an end the human disobedience typified in Adam and the Israelites during the Exodus.

In Luke, not only is it emphasized that Jesus is being led (ēgeto, imperfect passive) by the Spirit, but he is filled (plērēs) with the Holy Spirit. This, along with his precise echo of Deuteronomy 8:2 (en tē erēmō, "in the wilderness"), shows that Luke understands that it is God who is leading Jesus in the temptations, to test what was in his heart and his faithfulness to God (Deut 8:2). Matthew (4:2) gives the impression that the tempter came to Jesus after he had fasted forty days in the desert. For Luke, Jesus was being tempted by the devil for the whole forty days (4:1-2). The most significant alteration Luke has made to the temptation narrative is the order of the scenes, transposing the last two so that the order is bread, kingdoms of the world and pinnacle of the Temple. It is probably too subtle to expect Luke's order to reflect the reverse order of the first three petitions of the Lord's Prayer. It is more reasonable to suppose that Luke wanted the temptations to reach their climax at the Temple in Jerusalem. Luke's order also maintains the theme of the testing of the Son of God (4:9).

In the first scene of the temptations the devil's challenge "If you are the Son of God ..." recalls the declaration of Jesus' sonship at his baptism. For Luke, Jesus' sonship is not in doubt but the way Jesus will use his power. The singular "bread" and "stone" (cf. Mt 4:3) emphasize that the devil is testing to see if Jesus will use his powers for his selfish ends rather than depend on what God supplies
In the second scene Jesus is not taken to a high mountain, not only perhaps because no mountain could afford such an advantage (see 2.3.3. above), but because for Luke a mountain is primarily a place of prayer and revelation (6:12; 9:28; 22:39). The awkwardness of verse 6 and Luke's interest in "authority" (exousia; see Authority and Power) means that he has probably added it here and it has a political meaning as in 12:11; 20:20; 23:7. That is, Jesus is being tempted to take up political authority and its associated glory. This offer Jesus rejects.

Luke sums up the temptations by saying that the devil finished "every temptation" (4:13). That is, in these three scenes Luke sees portrayed the whole range of temptations Jesus will face in his ministry. In turn this means that while Jesus' victory over temptation may have been an encouraging model for Luke's readers, Jesus' experience was unique to his sonship and mission. In fact every other time Luke uses the word temptation of followers of jesus, it does not have a positive outcome (8:13; 11:4; 22:28,40, 46). From his unique ending of the story—that the devil left him until an opportune time—it is obvious that Luke does not intend to convey the idea that Satan was finally defeated, or that this marks the absolute end of temptation for Jesus. Rather, he anticipates the conflicts between Jesus and Satan (10:18; 11:18; 13:16).

3. Temptation in the Gospels.

Outside the temptation narrative the Synoptic Gospels depict Jesus as continuing to be tempted, principally by the Pharisees.

In Mark 8:11 (par. Mt 16:1) the Pharisees are said to test Jesus by seeking from him a sign from heaven* (cf. Lk 11:16). As this request comes in the context of a series of miracle stories and as the Synoptic Gospels never use "sign" (sēmeion) to refer to a miracle, the Pharisees are being portrayed as seeking more than a miracle or a display of power from Jesus. In the tradition of the OT (Deut 13:1-2; 1 Sam 2:30-33; Is 7:10-14) they sought some obvious, compelling authentication of Jesus' divine ministry beyond the healings (set Healing) which they may have seen in others of their holy men. They may have expected some apocalyptic sign in the heavens of cosmic proportions (cf. Ezra 5:4; 7:39) or, as with the prophets* (Deut 13:2-6; 18:18-22; 2 Kings 20:1-11; Is 7:10-14), they may have expected God to confirm Jesus' status. Such testing recalls the Q temptations testing the sonship of Jesus. Mark says that Jesus refused to offer a sign (8:12), probably because such lack of insight could never be satisfied, for it sets human conditions for faith,* and those with an eye of trust already knew who Jesus was. In light of the temptation story this aligns the Pharisees with Satan.

Jesus is also depicted as being tempted in the sense of the Pharisees trying to trap him (Mk 10:2 par. Mt 19:3; cf. Mt 22:35 par. Lk 10:25, ekpeirazō). In just one instance Jesus speaks of himself being trapped or tempted by the Herodians (set Herodian Dynasty) and Pharisees (Mk 12:15 par. Mt 22:18).

In Luke 22:28 the whole of Jesus' ministry is described as temptations, that is, being confronted continually by Satan in the trials and tribulations of his ministry. In that the disciples are paradigms of discipleship* for Luke, this verse also shows that being a follower of Jesus includes sharing in his temptations or trials. However, in the use of peirasmos in the story of the Garden of Gethsemane (see Gethsemane), Luke and the other Synoptic Evangelists show they see the climax of Jesus' trial and battle with Satan to be in the Easter story. In the Garden the disciples are said to be encouraged not to enter or succumb to temptation, that is, fall away. In view of the absence of the definite article with "temptation" in this story (Mk 14:38 par. Mt 26:41 and Lk 22:46; cf. Lk 22:40), it is unlikely that the eschatological tribulation is in mind. Luke also sees temptation causing those who hear and receive the word with joy,* to fall away (8:13).

In John's Gospel peirazō is used of Jesus "testing" Philip's understanding of and trust in Jesus' ability to meet the needs of those who come to him for food (6:6). In light of 6:32 and the great number of people requiring feeding (6:7), John probably intends to convey the message that on a spiritual level Jesus is able to meet the profound needs of those who come to him.

In the temptation stories Jesus is not portrayed as being tempted to satisfy people's material needs, nor to display his wonder-working power for all to see but to test whether or not he would remain obedient and loyal as the Son of God. The faithfulness of Jesus is highlighted against the background of the disobedience of the children of Israel in their wanderings in the desert. While the temptation narratives are primarily christological in intent, they are also a source of encouragement for the followers of Jesus in their trials and sufferings. There is no suggestion in any of the Synoptic Evangelists that Satan was completely destroyed in the temptations. Throughout the Gospels Jesus is depicted as continuing to face temptation from the evil one who was bound principally through Jesus' ministry of exorcism.

TEXTUAL CRITICISM

Textual criticism is the science that compares all known copies (manuscripts, abbrev. MSS [pl.] MS [sg.]) of a given document in an effort to trace the history of variations in the copying process so as to discover the original form of the text. Although generally established procedures have led to a widespread consensus about the nature of the original text of the Gospels, that it looks very much like that in our best critical edition (United Bible Societies, The Greek New Testament, 3d ed. [abbrev. UBS^{J}], and Nestle-Aland, Novum Testamentum Graece, 26th ed. [abbrev. N^{M}A], there are some unique features about the text of the Gospels that require special consideration.

1. The Need

2. The Method
3. The Problem of Harmonization

4. Hort's "Western Non-Interpolations"

5. Textual Criticism and the Synoptic Problem

1. The Need.

The need for textual criticism of any NT document is the result of three combined factors: (1) The originals, probably written on papyrus, have all perished. (2) For over 1,400 years the NT was copied by hand, and the copyists (scribes) made every conceivable error, as well as at times intentionally altered the text (probably with the idea of correcting it). (3) There are now extant, in whole or in part, about 5,400 Greek MSS for the whole NT (any one of the Gospels has about 2,325), as well as hundreds of copies of ancient translations, plus the evidence from the quotations of the NT in the writings of the early church fathers— and no two MSS anywhere in existence are exactly alike.

The task of textual criticism is to sift through all this material, carefully collating (comparing) each MS with all the others, in order to detect the errors and changes in the text, and thus to decide which variant reading at any given point is more likely to be the original.

2. The Method.

The method which most textual critics use to work through this mass of material and large number of variations is called eclecticism. This means that all the variants in any given unit of variation are evaluated individually on the basis of all the kinds of evidence that are available for such an evaluation.

The evidence is primarily of three kinds, having to do respectively with the MSS and the quotations from the fathers (external evidence), with the errors made by the scribes (transcriptional probability) and with the author's style and vocabulary (intrinsic probability).

2.1. External evidence. At any given unit of variation, the textual critic must first take note of the external evidence supporting each variant, although with few exceptions scholars are agreed that knowledge of this evidence alone does not guarantee one's finding the original text. The following matters must be noted: how old are the witnesses supporting each variant or how old is the text they represent; how good is the general quality of the MSS involved in each case; and how widely distributed geographically are the witnesses, especially the early ones. This latter question is especially important, because early and widespread geographical distribution of a reading points to an original parent much further back before the document in question (in this case one of the Gospels) was widely scattered throughout the early church.

Thus, for example, the fact that no early evidence East or West, either from the MSS or the church fathers, contains the account of the adulterous woman in John 7:53—8:11 (the earliest certain evidence being two fifth-century Latin MSS), argues strongly, along with transcriptional and intrinsic probabilities, against this story as a part of the original text of John's Gospel.

2.2. Transcriptional probability. This has to do with scribal errors and is based on certain inductively derived criteria about scribes and their copying habits. For example, it is usually true that the more difficult reading is probably original, because it is the demonstrated tendency of scribes to have made the text easier to read (by improving grammar, substituting synonyms, adding the subject when unexpressed, etc.). Thus it is far more likely that in 7:8 John wrote "I am not [ouk] going up to the Feast," rather than "I am not yet [oude] going up to the Feast," since in verse 10 Jesus does in fact go up to the Feast. (This is probably a play on the word for "going up": his brothers meant "go up" to the Feast; Jesus answered that not at this Feast would he "go up" in the ultimate sense.)

It is also true that scribes often elaborated or added words to the text for the sake of clarity, so that more often than not the shorter reading represents the original—although this criterion must be used with some caution. With the Gospels in particular, scribes often harmonized the text of one Gospel to another, so that the least harmonized reading most often represents the original (see below). The scribal conformations over many years of Luke's version of the Lord's Prayer to that of Matthew is a good illustration of both of these criteria.

2.3. Intrinsic Probability. This is the most subjective kind of evidence and must be used with great caution. It has to do with an author's vocabulary and style, his ideas as they are expressed elsewhere and the probabilities based on the immediate context. When all other things are equal, this is something of a matter of last resort although it also frequently plays a role in determining transcriptional probability.

2.4. The Overarching Criterion. The single most important criterion, involving both transcriptional and intrinsic probabilities, is sometimes called "Ben-gel's first rule": That reading is to be preferred as the original which best explains the origin of all the others. When this criterion, in conjunction with the others, is applied to the variants in the text of the Gospels, in the vast majority of cases the variant that emerges as the original text is that which also has the best supporting external evidence. Thus NT textual critics have a high degree of confidence that for the most part the best critical text very closely represents the original text of the Gospels.

3. The Problem of Harmonization.

Although harmonization has sometimes occurred elsewhere in the NT (e.g., between Colossians and Ephesians), this is a problem of special import for arriving at the original text of the Gospels. The problem here is especially complex, for we are dealing both with authors who used the text of one (or two) of the others in varying degrees of exactness and with scribes who in a variety of ways made parallel passages conform but who also, by intent or otherwise, could disharmonize passages. Thus, in making textual decisions in the Gospels, textual critics must broaden their perspective to include the following considerations.

First, in the Gospels harmonization can be of four kinds: (1) between or among the Gospels, (2) within a single Gospel, (3) to the LXX or (4) to a well-known phrase or idea quite apart from any immediate parallel. The addition of "for bread, will give him a stone; or if' in Luke 11:11 (from Mt 7:9) illustrates the first; the addition of "where their worm does not die and the fire is not quenched" in Mark 9:44 and 46 (under the influence of v. 48) illustrates the second; the addition of "lamentation and" (from Jer 31:15 LXX) in Matthew 2:18 illustrates the third; and the addition (probably) of "of God" to the phrase "Seek first the kingdom" in Matthew 6:33 illustrates the fourth. This problem is especially complex when two or three of these kinds of harmonization can be active at any variation unit. However, the second and fourth, because they are more immediate to the scribe, are more likely to have occurred in "minor harmonizations" (see below) than the first type.
Second, one must not automatically presuppose what an author or scribe would have done. The problem with authors here is probably greater than with the scribes. For example, Synoptic relationships (set Synoptic Problem) are sometimes extremely close, such as in the standard text of the Matthew/Luke account of John's preaching of repentance (Mt 3:7-10; Lk 3:7-9). Luke has sixty-four words and Matthew sixty-three; they have sixty-two words in common, without a single change of word order, and only one difference between a singular and a plural. Although this level of agreement occurs infrequently and is almost exclusively limited to the double tradition between Matthew and Luke, it is evidence that such high-level agreement can occur. For the most part, however, the writers tend to rewrite with varying degrees of exactness.

Copyists, on the other hand, show extremely strong tendencies to make passages conform to one another. Yet not every possible harmonization must be adjudged to be so. For example, assimilation is far more likely to have occurred in the sayings of Jesus than in the Evangelists' narratives. Similarly, harmonization is far more likely to have occurred in major additions/omissions or with significant words (so-called major harmonizations) than with the addition/omission of pronouns, conjunctions, articles and such items or with word order (so-called minor harmonizations). These latter especially may be due to all kinds of other factors. Modern scholars who work with synopses are almost certainly more aware of alleged harmonizations than was likely to have been the case for scribes, whose memories cannot be assumed to have been so keen as to have recalled all the jots and tittles from parallel passages.

Third, by the very historical fact that the early church used Matthew to a greater extent than it did Mark and Luke (especially the former), the manuscript traditions of the latter two have far more variants that could be attributed to harmonization than does Matthew; and between them Mark has far more than Luke. It is almost inevitable that this factor will weigh heavily in making textual choices in Matthew and Mark.

Fourth, similarly, although no manuscript or manuscript tradition has escaped some degree of harmonizing corruption to its text, this phenomenon is a hallmark of the Western and later Byzantine traditions, whereas the earlier Alexandrians are relatively pure at this point. Again, this factor must be taken into account when making textual decisions.

Fifth, there can be little question that a given scholar's resolution of the Synoptic Problem will sometimes affect textual decisions, a matter that needs further discussion (see below).

4. Hort's "Western Non-Interpolations."

Another area of special concern for the textual criticism of the Synoptic Gospels is a phenomenon related to the so-called Western text (codex D and its Old Latin and Old Syriac allies). This text is especially noteworthy for its large number of harmonizations and interpolations (including the interesting saying in Luke 6:5: "On the same day when Jesus saw a certain man working on the Sabbath,* he said to him, 'Man, if you know what you are doing, blessed are you; but if you do not know, you are cursed and a transgressor of the Law' "). However, there are several passages in the Gospel of Luke which turn up missing in much of this tradition, including such significant texts as Luke 22:19b-20 (the so-called second cup); 24:12 (Peter's run to the tomb) and 24:51c-52 (the ascension*). (See also Mt 27:49; Lk 24:3, 6, 36, 40.)

This series of variants has had a checkered history in the textual criticism of the Gospels from the time of Westcott and Hort, who in their monumental edition of 1881 rejected them all. Their reasoning was simple: In every case they are not found in the very early evidence in the West; but since this evidence most commonly interpolates into the text, it seemed highly unlikely that these variants were original. Otherwise they would have been found in the Western text that tends to be "full." On the other hand, in the introduction to their text, Hort could not bring himself to label them "neutral interpolations," since that was contrary to his view of his "neutral" (= original) text. Since in his view they were not "omissions" in the Western text, but interpolations into the other text, he chose the strange designation of "Western non-interpolation."

Since the time of Westcott-Hort, these readings have gradually been making their way back into the critical editions, having been judged to be Western "omissions." Various reasons, mostly theological, have been offered for the omissions. Thus these are judged as peculiarities of the Western text of a different kind, but quite in keeping with the idiosyncratic nature of that textual tradition.

5. Textual Criticism and the Synoptic Problem.
In the Synoptic Gospels textual criticism both affects and is affected by the Synoptic Problem.* On the one hand, one's solution to the Synoptic Problem will necessarily affect one's textual decisions. In the area of harmonization, for example, if one believes with W. R Farmer and others in the priority of Matthew, then one should also tend to see the alleged harmonizations in Mark as original to Mark himself, since he should be suspected to have used Matthew more closely in such cases. The problem with this solution is that it runs full face into the external evidence, which leads to the opposite conclusion, that the Markan harmonizations to Matthew are chiefly the work of later scribes.

In the same vein one might also compare the solutions offered by B. H. Streeter (pp. 325-28), G. D. Kilpatrick (pp. 29-30) and W. R Farmer (pp. 148-51) to the well-known "minor agreement" between Matthew 26:67-68 and Luke 22:64 (par. Mark 14:65). Following the command "Prophecy," Mark has "and the guards took him and beat him" (NIV), whereas Matthew and Luke have "to us, Christ* (Mt only), who hit you?" The textual problems lie with Mark, where some significant but later MSS have added the words from Matthew. Streeter, holding to Markan priority, takes the radical step of alleging early (before our extant MSS) interpolations into both Mark and Matthew; Farmer, holding to Matthean priority and Luke's use of Matthew, accepts the text of our critical editions as supporting his revival of the Griesbach hypothesis; Kilpatrick, holding both to Markan priority and a more radical form of textual eclecticism, opted for the "harmonization" in the Western and Caesarean texts as original to Mark.

On the other hand, textual criticism also teaches one to ask the right kinds of questions in the resolution of the Synoptic Problem. Although there is an obvious difference between the Evangelists as redactors and copyists, in both cases the crucial criterion is the textual one: That reading (version) is to be preferred as original which best explains the existence of all the others. In the case of our Gospels that must include both the arrangement of the materials (order, form, etc.) and the close study of the parallels between/among the Gospels. It is this criterion above all others that leads the majority of scholars to continue to hold to the solution of Markan priority. Both in the general arrangement and in the details, when this ultimate textual question is posed, over and again Mark's Gospel seems clearly to be the one that best explains the order and wording of the others.

TRADITION CRITICISM

Tradition criticism or tradition history (both translations of the German technical term Traditionsge-schichte) refer to the study of the development of traditions, especially those about Jesus, until they were fixed in their final written form. Because of this interest in historical development, a secondary concern of this discipline has been that of determining the authenticity of a given saying or narrative, the criteria for determining such authenticity and the stages of historical development through which the tradition passed. Yet these issues have been tempered with more recent evidence of an interest, even before the passion* and resurrection,* to transmit carefully the traditions about Jesus.

1. Defining Tradition Criticism

2. Criteria of Authenticity

3. Historical Development of Tradition

4. Issues in Tradition Criticism

1. Defining Tradition Criticism.

The German term Tradittionsgeschichte—and the occasionally used Überlieferungsgeschichte (although technically this should have a different translation)—refer to the historical development of a tradition. They are normally translated "tradition criticism," but "tradition history" (or perhaps the more awkward "traditio-historical criticism") would be a more accurate translation. The first translation has become common currency among English-speaking NT scholars due to its parallelism with form criticism* and redaction criticism.*

As a discipline tradition criticism was developed in OT studies by G. von Rad, M. Noth, S. Mowinckel and I. Engnell, but as an attitude it was already practiced in New Testament studies by W. Wrede, whose argument it was that the community created the tradition, not the tradition the community. The methodology has been focused on Gospel studies, and in particular on the Gospel tradition in the pre-Pauline period (AD. 30-50).

1.1. Assumptions. The basic assumption of tradition criticism is that the stories about and sayings of Jesus circulated as oral tradition for a period of some three decades or longer before they were written down. During this period they were shaped by the historical situation (Sitz im Leben) of the communities within which they circulated. By studying the differences in the various traditions one can determine: (1) which traditions actually go back to the historical Jesus (see Historical Jesus); (2) at which point in the oral period a given tradition actually arose; and (3) what the historical situation of the Christian community actually was.

1.2. Differentiation from Form and Redaction Criticism.
Two other disciplines overlap with tradition criticism. The first is form criticism, which in theory focuses on the form in which various types of traditions circulated, but in practice has included the study of how such forms may have changed over time and at which period of oral transmission a given form may have arisen. When it moves from categorization to historical analysis, form criticism means the same as tradition criticism. It is because of this overlap that one cannot say when the methodology was first used in modern NT studies, for many of the form critics were in fact doing tradition criticism.

The second discipline is redaction criticism, which focuses on how the Gospel writers edited their sources (e.g., Mark). In theory such editorial work is part of the changing of the tradition and thus could be included under the heading of tradition criticism, but in practice tradition criticism has been concerned with the period of oral transmission. Therefore, as soon as scholars speak of written sources, they have moved beyond the scope of tradition criticism and into redaction criticism. But the distinction is not always so clear-cut, for at times the Evangelists may have been working with oral sources ("M" Tradition, "L" Tradition and Q may all have been oral) or their communities (e.g., the Johannine community) may have shaped the materials they were using.

2. Criteria of Authenticity

If in fact the traditions about and from Jesus were shaped over time by the life situations and needs of the communities in which they circulated, then there must be some means of determining which parts of the tradition actually stem from the period of Jesus. Three major criteria have been proposed, no one of which should be used in isolation, but which together build a case for genuineness.

2.1. Criterion of Multiple Attestation. Any tradition that is found in more than one independent strand of the Gospel tradition is likely to be genuine. While in and of itself this does not prove genuineness, for different communities facing similar situations (e.g., persecution) could shape the tradition in a similar way, it is certainly a pointer in that direction. The major issue is whether the tradition is found in truly independent strands rather than in strands which borrowed from each other. And of course this does not rule out independent shaping within each strand.
2.2. Criterion of Coherence. Any tradition that coheres or is similar to traditions about Jesus known to be genuine is likely to be genuine itself. Obviously this requires that some tradition be known to be genuine first before one can know that others cohere with it. A series of sayings in a given strand of tradition might cohere, but that could simply indicate a common theme or interest (Tendenz) of a given period of development. Of course, the coherence does not have to be among sayings, for a saying could cohere with a narrative that pictured Jesus acting in a manner consistent with the saying. Furthermore, the fact that a tradition does not cohere with any other does not indicate that it is not genuine. It may simply be unique. Finally, even if a tradition appears to conflict with others, one must be cautious before arguing for incoherence and therefore inauthenticity. It may be a case of paradox, although there is always a danger that paradox will be invoked when incoherence is the more reasonable explanation.

2.3. Criterion of Dissimilarity. Any tradition that is dissimilar to (1) Jewish tradition (including apocalyptic* and Rabbinic tradition*) and (2) the traditions of the post-Easter church (including their faith, practice and life situation) is likely to be a genuine tradition of or about Jesus. For some scholars this criterion may be used along with others as a way of establishing authentic traditions. But for many scholars (e.g., Fuller or Perrin) this is not simply a way of proving some traditions are genuine, but the criterion of authenticity. All traditions not established by it are rejected.

The criterion of dissimilarity, however, cannot bear the weight of being the sole guarantor of authenticity. First it is certain that Jesus was a Jew, and to excise from his teaching all that agreed with previous Jewish tradition is certainly to remove some genuine material. In other words, while this criterion can discover what was unique about Jesus, it does so by destroying the context in which that uniqueness was set. And without that context does one really have the authentic Jesus?

Second, when used exclusively this criterion assumes that there was no continuity between the post-Easter church and Jesus, and this assumption is highly doubtful. Were there no traditions of Jesus which inspired that church* and which it therefore wanted to preserve? Why were the authentic traditions not totally forgotten rather than passed on if they were not important to the church (for even those which meet this criterion were handed down by the church)?
Third, the assumptions underlying this criterion contain a built-in self-contradiction. On the one hand, it is assumed that communities passed on tradition because it fit the life situation of the community. On the other hand, this criterion is looking for traditions which were passed on but which did not fit the life situation of any Christian community. Therefore, while this criterion can indeed point out genuine Jesus tradition, it can only point to those traditions of such uniqueness that they indicate where Jesus stood apart from Judaism* and yet (in the perception of scholars) was not followed by the early church, which blindly transmitted the tradition. Traditions of such a unique quality are rare indeed.

2.4. Other Criteria. At times other criteria have been proposed from what have been assumed to be the laws of the development of tradition. Following the lead of textual criticism it has been argued that the longer, more developed tradition is less likely to be genuine and that the theologically more difficult tradition is more likely to be genuine. However, the problem with such assumptions is that they are just that—assumptions.

While some traditions may be elaborated over time, others may be truncated because the details had no meaning to the tradent. This can be observed on a written level in the use made of Mark. For example, neither Matthew 14:19 nor Luke 9:15 pick up the detail in Mark 6:39 that the grass was green. Mark in this case has the more detailed tradition, but is probably the source of the other two. Yet one could also find examples in which the reverse is true.

When it comes to the issue of theological difficulty, the problem is the standard by which difficulty is measured. Certainly a later tradent or writer, will tend to hear and repeat a tradition in terms which are consonant with his or her own beliefs. But one must ask whether modern New Testament scholars know enough about the beliefs of even the writers of Scripture, let alone the tradents of the oral period, to be sure that a given saying would have been theologically difficult for them. And given the inconsistency observed in our modern thinking, the perception of difficulty could well be a perception of what a given ancient should have felt, not what he or she did in fan feel.

A further issue needs to be raised at this point. These criteria are often used with the assumption that a tradition is the product of the post-Easter church unless proven otherwise. But given the research cited below in the closing paragraphs of this article, this is an unwarranted assumption. Skeptical assumptions will lead to minimal results, not necessarily results which accurately reflect the historical situation of the early church and its interest in Jesus. On the other hand, one must not therefore leap into a fideism which ignores evidence of the shaping of the tradition by the Evangelists or their predecessors.

3. Historical Development of Tradition.

When describing the historical development of a tradition, it is necessary to bear in mind a general schema of development through which this tradition may have passed.

3.1. A Developmental Scheme. A large number of scholars assume the following developmental scheme:

3.1.1. Palestinian Jewish-Christian Church. The earliest post-Easter church was the Aramaic-speaking church made up of Palestinian Jews. It is assumed that this church had the most primitive christology and traditions enshrining such terms as "servant" (see Servant of Yahweh), "Messiah" (see Christ), "Son of God"* and "Son of man."*

3.1.2. Hellenistic Jewish-Christian Church. The church soon expanded into the Diaspora as Greek-speaking Jews were converted. These believers are assumed to have been interested in making the gospel relevant to their environment as can be seen in such tides as "Christ" and "Lord"* as well as a shift in the meaning of "Son of God."

3.1.3. Hellenistic Gentile Church. Finally, of course, Gentiles became a major influence in the church, carrying the Hellenistic terminology into a fully Gentile realm.

3.2. Problems with Historical Development. The main problem with this developmental scheme is that it is too neat. Even if one were not to accept the data of Acts 6 that Hellenistic Jewish-Christians were part of the Jerusalem church within at most a few years of the resurrection, there is plenty of evidence that Hellenism* was an active force in Jerusalem well before the first century AD. There is no reason to believe that the so-called more Hellenistic tides would not have been meaningful and therefore popular virtually from the beginning, although it is true that some tides (e.g., Son of David*) were so Jewish that they were never popular in the Gentile world. But once the assumptions about historical development (and the use of titles for Jesus or other theological content as markers) are relativized, it becomes most difficult to construct a firm developmental history of tradition.

Furthermore, historical material about the development of the church is so scarce (even Paul moved in a rather limited and largely Gentile sphere) that there is a great danger of falling into a circular argument. After constructing from a Gospel a hypothesis regarding the historical situation of the community within which it arose, tradition critics have too frequently used this hypotheses to determine the authenticity of the various traditions within that Gospel.

We can be sure that the Jesus tradition did undergo development as the more significant items were selected out of the mass of data available to the post-Easter church. In turn this material was shaped by the needs of the community, including the exigencies of translation into new cultures and languages. A study of parallel narratives in the Gospels will demonstrate as much, for not all of the differences can be attributed to the Evangelists. But tradition criticism is now beyond its early decades of self-assurance and must proceed with more caution.

A number of scholars (see Ellis) have demonstrated (1) the keen interest of the post-Easter church in Jesus' teaching, including his deeds (Stanton); (2) the fact that Jesus was viewed as a teacher* and thus his teachings were learned and passed on (Riesner); (3) the probability of not only the deliberate transmission of Jesus' teaching but also of its written form even before Jesus' death (Schumann); and (4) the availability in Judaism of models for the accurate transmission of tradition (Gerhardsson). All of these factors severely limit tradition criticism's basic assumption that there was a long period of oral transmission. On the one hand, Gospel interpreters must objectively reckon with the shaping and adapting of the Jesus tradition that did take place (as can be demonstrated from Gospel narratives of words and events which are unlikely to have been spoken or to have taken place more than once, but which are recorded differently). On the other hand, there is no firm historical basis for assuming that traditions about Jesus were not carefully transmitted even before his death or that there was a clear developmental track along which traditions evolved.

TRANSFIGURATION

The word transfiguration (from the Latin transfiguratio) signifies in biblical studies the remarkable transformation that once took place in the appearance of Jesus. Matthew 17:2 and Mark 9:2, though not Luke, use the equivalent Greek verb metamorphoō (cf. metamorphosis) to describe that change. It affected his face, which shone, and his clothing, which glistened.

The narrative itself occurs in three of the four Gospels, Matthew 17:1-9; Mark 9:2-10; Luke 9:28-36. A further description of the Transfiguration occurs in 2 Peter 1:16-18. The setting of the Transfiguration in the narrative and argument respectively of these passages, as well as its setting historically and geographically, must be determined as closely as possible. The reason for its omission from John cannot be determined with certainty, but some reflection on the possibilities will be in order. The similarities and differences between these passages (contextual, structural and verbal) all require careful attention. Certain motifs or themes occur within these accounts which must be interpreted and evaluated as to their implications. The significance of the Transfiguration in its various biblical settings and finally its significance christologically need to be determined from a study of the previous points.

8. Conclusion

1.1. Setting. Each of the Synoptic Gospels has the following sequence: (1) Peter's confession that Jesus is the Messiah (see Christ); (2) Jesus' charge not to divulge this to others; (3) Jesus' prediction of his coming suffering, death and resurrection (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection); (4) his call to those who want to be his disciples* to follow him in self-sacrifice (see Discipleship); (5) the Transfiguration; (6) Jesus' command not to tell others about this until after his resurrection*; (7) a discussion (except in Luke) on the coming of Elijah*; (8) the healing* of a boy; and (9) a second prediction of Jesus' passion.

Every one of these short sections of narrative and dialog pertains in some way to who Jesus is and why he came. The discussion about Elijah (7) may at first seem out of place, but it was triggered by the appearance of Elijah at Jesus' Transfiguration, and it explains the congruence of the coming of Jesus with predictions about the coming of Elijah and of John the Baptist (see John the Baptist). The healing story serves, among other things, to contrast Jesus' healing power in dependence on God* with the lack of believing prayer* on the part of the disciples. The relevance of the other conversations and events is more easily seen.

The Transfiguration occurs in a particularly significant setting in Luke. The Messianic confession by Peter (Lk 9:20) is part of a sequence that Luke has featured by drawing three events more closely together than they are in the accounts of Matthew and Mark: (1) Jesus calms the sea, which evokes the disciples' words "Who is this? He commands even the winds and the water and they obey him" (Lk 8:25); (2) Herod Antipas hears of Jesus' miracles* and says, "Who, then, is this about whom I hear such things?" (Lk 9:9); (3) Jesus asks the disciples who they say he is, to which Peter replies, "The Christ (Messiah) of God" (Lk 9:20). The question of the identity of Jesus is thus emphasized.

Luke arranges the significant events and dialog introduced by Peter's confession in a chiastic order, that is, by means of a stylistic reversal of sequence:

(A) Jesus' identity is stated by Peter in Luke 9:20.

(B) Jesus' death is stated in verse 22.

(C) His future coming in glory is stated in verse 26.

(C') His glory is visibly demonstrated in the Transfiguration in verse 29.

(B') His departure (= death?—see later discussion) is discussed by Moses and Elijah in verse 31.

(A') His identity is affirmed by the voice from heaven ("This is my Son") in verse 35.

1.2. Historical Situation. As noted, the Transfiguration occurs in the same narrative context in all of the Synoptic Gospels. The assumption is clearly that the event described actually took place at this juncture in the life and ministry of Jesus. In spite of this, some scholars do not consider it historically authentic. For a time the theory promoted by Bultmann that it was a misplaced story of a post-resurrection appearance of Jesus gained prominence.

While the brilliance of Jesus' appearance and his identification as the Son of God (see Son of God) may seem to give plausibility to this suggestion, several aspects of the narrative militate against the theory. Among these are (1) the uniformity, just mentioned, of the contextual placement within the lifetime of Jesus in each of the Synoptic Gospels; (2) the appropriateness of the event in that context; (3) the fact that the narrative is integral with that context; (4) the command from heaven to "hear him," which would be superfluous after the resurrection; and (5) the fact that there is no specific mention of resurrection in the narrative (even if this is assumed in the word departure in Lk 9:31).

Other alternatives to a historical event that have been offered range from a blend of epiphany (appearance) stories such as were recited in ancient times, or a literary adaptation of some OT narrative (such as Ex 24) to a fresh literary construction of one of the Evangelists or some other early Christian writer. If such a supernatural transformation as the Transfiguration is considered unbelievable at the outset (as with Bultmann), some alternative to historicity must be found. But since, as noted, the narrative is embedded in each Synoptic Gospel in a tight, flowing narrative sequence, there is little objective reason to question its authenticity. The story is certainly compatible with the assumption prevailing throughout the Bible of the possibility of immanent supernatural activity and appearance.

As it stands, the Transfiguration takes place at a crucial time in Jesus' ministry. For some time Jesus had been preaching and healing, enjoying popularity among many and yet becoming increasingly detested by others, especially those in the religious power structure. The issue of his identity and mission was escalating. In each of the Synoptic Gospels the confession of Jesus' messiahship (and, in the longer Matthean narrative of the confession, also his deity) comes at a crucial stage and introduces a new phase of Jesus' ministry. From this point on he faces his city of ultimate destiny, Jerusalem, with its climactic events (especially noted in Lk 9:51, just fifteen verses after the conclusion of the Transfiguration narrative).

The location of the Transfiguration has never been established with certainty (see Archeology and Geography). A long-standing tradition places it at Mt Tabor. Since isolation would have been difficult here (there is evidence that a Roman fortress existed at the summit around the time of Christ; Josephus J. W. 2.20.6; 4.1.8), and since it is at a considerable distance from Caesarea Philippi, which is the location of the immediately preceding event in the Gospels, it seems wise to seek another site. Mt Hermon, near Caesarea Philippi, offers a possibility. Problems attend this theory also, however, including the height of 2,813 meters or 9,232 feet (difficult to reach if the group went to or near the top) and the improbability (though not impossibility) that upon his descent from a mountain some 30 miles north of the Sea of Galilee* Jesus would have met a crowd that even included scribes (Mk 9:14). Also, Mark notes immediately after this that they "left that place and passed through Galilee" (Mk 9:30). This could be interpreted to mean that they left a place outside of Galilee (such as Mt Hermon), went to Galilee and then travelled through it but it could also imply that they left a place in or near Galilee and immediately proceeded through it. The latter understanding would suggest a site other than Mt. Hermon.

There is another mountain site that was more isolated than Mt. Tabor and more accessible than Mt. Hermon. That is Mount Meiron, located in Galilee some eight or so miles northwest of the Sea of Galilee. It is, in fact, within Galilee itself and boasts the highest peak within Palestine proper. Meiron later became a center of Jewish mysticism, and some stories developed there about the future coming of the Messiah in company with Elijah. It would have been natural for crowds, including scribes,* to have been near its base, and on leaving the mountain one would already be in Galilee. None of this is conclusive evidence, but at least a possible site exists that can satisfy the geographical requirements for an historically plausible Transfiguration.

2. The Transfiguration in 2 Peter 1:16-18.

The author of this passage refers to the Transfiguration to validate his teaching regarding the "power and coming" of Christ. The description of the Transfiguration lacks much of the detail found in the Synoptic accounts, focussing almost entirely on the voice from the "majestic glory." The reality of the Transfiguration is assumed rather than argued. In using the word eyewitnesses and in saying "we heard his voice" (where the first-person-plural personal pronoun has an emphatic effect), the author communicates that the event was observed and is not mere legend. The certainty of the expectation of the Parousia of Christ receives further support in the fulfillment of the "word of the prophets" (v. 19).

3. The Omission of the Transfiguration Narrative from John.

Since the Gospel of John is intended to prove the messiahship and divine sonship of Jesus, one might expect that he would employ the Transfiguration narrative as part of his demonstration. On the other hand, this Gospel seems to portray the glory* of Jesus throughout the narrative rather than mainly at one point (see John, Gospel of). There is one place, at least where there may be a deliberately veiled allusion to the Transfiguration. That is the testimony "We have seen his glory, the glory of the one and only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth" (Jn 1:14). Also, in John 12:27-33 God's voice comes from heaven saying that he had glorified his name and would do it again. There is a prediction of Jesus' death in this passage. The way of death and the way of glory are connected here as well as in the Caesarea Philippi conversation and in Luke's account of the Transfiguration. John may have considered the event of 12:27-33, along with the fact of 1:14, sufficient without recording the Transfiguration as well.

4. The Immediate Context

All three of the Synoptics precede the Transfiguration account with an enigmatic saying of Jesus that some who were standing with him at the time would not "taste death" until they had seen (and here the Gospels differ) "the Son of man coming in his kingdom" (Mt 16:28), "the kingdom of God come with power" (Mk 9:1) or simply "the kingdom of God" (Lk 9:27; see Kingdom of God).

The meaning of this saying is debated, but one possibility certainly is that Jesus refers to the Transfiguration. There are several reasons that can be offered for this option: (1) The term Son of man (see Son of Man), which occurs in the Matthean version, has just been used in connection with Jesus' glory, and 2 Peter 1:17 says that at the Transfiguration Jesus "received honor and glory" from God. (2) Mark's version has the word power (see Authority and Power) which occurs in 2 Peter 1:16, where the Transfiguration is described as the "power and coming" of Jesus. (3) Likewise, similar terms, come and coming, occur in Mark 9:1 and 2 Peter 1:16 respectively. It can be argued that the Transfiguration was indeed a visible demonstration of the future glorious coming of the Lord* Jesus in his kingdom. (4) Only "some" of the disciples would see the event described before they died. This accords with the Transfiguration narrative in which only three, Peter, James and John, accompanied Jesus up the mountain. (5) Immediately after this saying each of the Synoptics provides a reference to the short span of time—about a week—between that statement and the Transfiguration. If the saying did refer to the Transfiguration, such a time reference is easily understood. At the same time it must be observed that the words "shall not taste death" could be understood to imply a vaguely distant fulfillment Luke's reference to the time period (Lk 9:28) differs from the others in that the word after is followed immediately by "these words," which could well include the whole teaching of Jesus following Peter's confession. This knits together the whole chiasm observed above. But whether the connection is mainly viewed with the "taste of death" saying or with the whole passion prediction, the time reference in each (Mt 17:1; Mk 9:2; Lk 9:28) is undoubtedly important.

5. Structure.

The narrative in each account begins with the choice of Peter, James and John (Luke: Peter, John and James) and the ascent up the mountain (Luke adds "to pray"), and immediately proceeds to describe the change in Jesus' appearance. Next the focus broadens to include Moses and Elijah and quickly (in Matthew and Mark) shifts to Peter and his proposal to construct three booths. Between the introduction of Moses and Elijah, and Peter's suggestion, Luke has a section of several narrative elements (Lk 9:31-33a) that do not occur in the other Gospels. All three Gospels follow Peter's words with a reference to the cloud and then to the voice. Matthew alone mentions the prostration of the disciples before Jesus but is joined by the other two Evangelists in a concluding observation that only Jesus was visible as the incident drew to a close.

An obvious question is why Luke has material not found in Matthew or Mark. This includes: (1) the observation that the appearance of Moses and Elijah was "in glory"; (2) the conversation of Moses and Elijah about Jesus' "departure, which he was about to bring to fulfillment at Jerusalem"; (3) the note that Peter and the other disciples were "very sleepy" and then that they became "fully awake"; (4) the statement that they saw Jesus' glory and the two "men" who stood with him; and (5) the comment that Peter made his proposal "as the men were leaving."

The reason that those who hold to the priority of Mark (and the derivation of much of Matthew's and Luke's material from that Gospel) might offer is that Luke has chosen to insert these elements which were at his disposal (see Synoptic Problem). This would accord with the fact that even where similar phrases occur in the three accounts, the wording in Luke departs frequently from that of Mark and Matthew. Yet the account in Luke coheres together well as it is, and it could be argued that Luke's account could have stood without data from Mark. It could be theorized that Luke began not with Mark but with an earlier source (cf. Lk 1:1-4; see "L" Tradition). In this case Mark may not have been the basic narrative with which Luke worked, but rather: (1) Mark used the early source of Luke, along with whatever other traditions he may have had, such as Peter's reminiscences; (2) Mark kept the essence of this material and modified it to bring out certain features when he produced the canonical account; (3) Luke used that same early source as a basis of his historical reconstruction and wove together some material from Mark's completed work (see Reid).

As an example of such a possibility, Luke's description of the Last Supper (see Last Supper) has elements that are closer to Paul's account in 1 Corinthians 11 than to Mark's. Paul probably wrote his Epistle before the Gospels were committed to writing, and one could conclude that in this case Luke has followed a tradition of the Last Supper even closer to the event itself than Mark. Similarly, it could well be that Luke has an earlier tradition of the Transfiguration. This would strengthen the connection with the actual event and, at least as some would see it, would in consequence strengthen the case for its accuracy. This reconstruction is hypothetical but may be useful as a possible explanation of Luke's individualistic account.

6. Verbal Similarities and Differences Between the Synoptics.

As with any passage in the Synoptic Gospels, the authors had freedom to utilize vocabulary and idioms they considered appropriate to convey the facts and their implications. In some cases such differences are merely stylistic, in others they bring out different significant aspects of the narrative or dialog. For example, Matthew and Mark specify a six-day interlude between Jesus' saying about those who would witness the coming of the kingdom (Mt 17:1; Mk 9:2) and the Transfiguration, whereas Luke has a more general "about eight days" (Lk 9:28). Usually Luke is specific about time references. The two chronologies are certainly compatible (see 7. below).

In each narrative Jesus takes Peter, James and John, but Luke does not specify that the mountain they ascended was "high." Luke does say they went up to pray. This is in accord with Luke's habit of stressing prayer and is an addition to, not a contradiction of, the others.

A significant difference is that whereas Matthew and Mark say that Jesus was "transfigured" (the passive form of metamorphoō which, as noted above, signifies a remarkable transformation), Luke omits this verb and has instead "the appearance of his face changed" (Lk 9:29). The most probable reason for this is that he wished to avoid any specialized terminology that might call to mind the stories in pagan mythologies of divine epiphanies (appearances). Luke's own background was more Hellenistic than that of Matthew and Mark, so such sensitivity can easily be understood. Mark has the shortest description, confining himself to the word transfigured, and Matthew adds to that word, "His face shone like the sun."

The description of the changed appearance of Jesus' clothing also differs among the three Gospels. Matthew compares them with white light Mark says they "became dazzling white, whiter than anyone in the world could bleach them," and Luke writes that they "became as bright as a flash of lightning" (Mt 17:2; Mk 9:3; Lk 9:29). Each author reached for words that would convey something of the extraordinary unearthly brilliance of the Transformation. Together they elicit from the reader a reverent amazement before the glory of Jesus Christ. In their mention of Moses and Elijah, although Matthew and Mark call them by name, Luke twice refers to them only as "two men" not only before but also after naming them (Lk 9:30, 32). It is unusual for Luke to revert to the generic term after having mentioned someone's name. However, in contrast to Matthew he, as well as Mark, describes the angelic (see Angels) presence at the empty tomb of Jesus in human terms: "men" in Luke 24:4 and the singular "young man" in Mark 16:5. It is possible that he is emphasizing the fact that these figures are indeed in human form.

Luke observes that the two men appear with Jesus "in glory," and says in verse 32 that they saw Jesus' glory. Although Matthew has the word glory seven times in the course of his Gospel, and Mark only three times, Luke uses it thirteen times, far out of proportion to the others. Likewise, he has glorify nine times, in comparison with Matthew's four times and Mark's once (together, the figures are Matthew 11 x, Mark 4 x but Luke 22 x). Even if Luke had not directly chosen the terminology for his narration but found it in his source(s), it was his decision to keep it The way he uses these terms shows that he is especially sensitive to God's glory and to what brings him glory.

The word departure translates the Greek form of the word we know in transliteration as exodus (exodos). It certainly brings to mind the escape of the people of Israel from Egypt, and it may signify a redemptive theme in Luke as well as alluding to the experience of Moses, with whose person and experience Jesus stands in superior comparison. The word appears only twice elsewhere in the NT. In Hebrews it refers to the Exodus from Egypt. In 2 Peter 1:15 it stands in parallel to the writer's reference in the preceding verse to the putting off of his "tabernacle" (i.e., his death). Here in Luke there is no such clear indication, but it may well refer either to Jesus' impending death or to the whole culmination of his earthly life. The phrase "which he was about to bring to fulfillment at Jerusalem" echoes Luke's strong theme of Jesus' intentional fulfillment of the divine will (cf. Luke's frequent use of dei, "it is necessary" [Lk 2:49; 4:43; 9:22; 11:42; 12:12; 13:14, 16, 33; 15:32; 17:25; 18:1; 19:5; 21:9; 22:7, 37; 24:7, 26, 44] and of pleroō, "fulfill" [Lk 1:20; 4:21; 21:24; 22:16; 24:44, as well as here]). Whether Jesus' resurrection is intended to be understood as part of his "departure" is not clear. One could also argue for inclusion of the ascension, since Luke is the only Gospel to describe that final departure (Lk 24:50-53; cf. Acts 1:1-11). Also, shortly after the Transfiguration episode Luke has an allusion to the ascension in the expression "received up" (Lk 9:51). The root of the Greek word for that (analēmpsis) is the same as the root for the word used for the ascension* (analambanō) in Acts 1:2.

Whatever meaning may be found in the expression, it is a remarkable subject of conversation between Moses and Elijah. It could be taken as an indication that inhabitants of heaven* were aware of and concerned with the destiny of Jesus at the cross. The two men, while not angels, do bring a heavenly interpretation of an event, as do angels at the resurrection and ascension in Luke. The conversation also provides a strong contrast to the glory he was at that very time experiencing. Further, it suggests that the Transfiguration was in part providing assurance for Jesus in preparation for his suffering. The use of another remarkable word, accomplish, adds to the force of the prediction. Jesus is not described as an involuntary victim but as the one who himself brings about the departure.

The scene of the departure was to be Jerusalem. The importance of that place reference here is seen in the fact that Matthew uses the two Greek terms for Jerusalem thirteen times, Mark ten times, but Luke thirty-one times. It is the city of destiny for Jesus in Luke, as seen especially in Luke 13:33, "I must keep on going ... for surely no prophet can die outside of Jerusalem." One might have expected Matthew, the more Jewish Gospel, to emphasize Jerusalem, and indeed Matthew contains the only reference to that city in the passion predictions that Jesus gave immediately before and after the Transfiguration (Mt 16:21). By the time of Jesus' third passion prediction, however, all three Gospels include one or two specific references to Jerusalem (Mt 20:17-18; Mk 10:32-33; Lk 18:31). Thus each of the Evangelists in one place or another emphasizes the place of Jesus' passion, but Luke includes it in other contexts and, remarkably, here in the Transfiguration narrative. Luke also is the only writer to include a reference to the sleepiness of the disciples on the mountain (Lk 9:32), perhaps a psychological reaction due to their difficulty in coping with the happening, so the vocabulary is unique here as well. Likewise, he is the only one to mention that it was as the men were leaving that Peter made his proposal about the booths (Lk 9:33). In the same verse Luke has the word Master, where Matthew and Mark have Rabbi (see Teacher). All seven occurrences of this word are in Luke, most of them in his editorial comments rather than in material derived from other sources.

One striking difference between the three Gospels is the place where they mention the disciples' fear. Matthew 17:6 says they "fell to the ground terrified" on hearing the voice. Mark 9:6 attributes the proposal of Peter regarding booths to their fright (cf. Mk 4:40 where fear is associated with unbelief). Luke 9:34 mentions their fear as they were entering the cloud. One could postulate reasons why each of the three Gospels thus locates the fear or simply assume that fear gripped the disciples in waves at successive stages of the event. There are other verbal differences, the significance of which is variously assessed, but the most clearly important ones that remain are in the words spoken by the voice from heaven, which topic is reserved for discussion below. In addition the vocabulary in Matthew's section immediately following the voice (Mt 17:6-7) recalls some of the vocabulary in the vision narrative in Daniel 10, especially verses 9-12.

7. Motifs.

There are several distinct motifs and features in the Transfiguration narrative that allude to one or more biblical circumstances. The first motif is the brief lapse of time between Jesus' words about seeing the power of the kingdom and the Transfiguration. All three Synoptic Gospels make a point of mentioning the time, but, as noted above, they vary slightly. Against the possibility that this is no more than a narrative time marker is the striking similarity with the six days of Exodus 24:16 during which Moses, with Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, experienced the glory of God on Mount Sinai. The variation between the six days of Matthew and Mark and "about eight days" in Luke could well be due to the fact that Exodus 24:16 specifies a waiting period of six days but also mentions a seventh day when the Lord calls to Moses plus an unspecified time for approach and descent. A period of six days is a common literary pattern in Semitic literature (McCurley) and "after six days" may mean on the seventh day, just as "on the third day" explains "after two days" in Hosea 6:2. A parallel with Exodus 24:16 seems very likely.

The second feature is the mountain itself (see Mountain and Wilderness). This also is reminiscent of Mount Sinai, although the mountain as a place of revelation is known elsewhere in Scripture (e.g., Ezek 40:2; Rev 21:10). In Isaiah 40:9 those who "bring good tidings to Zion go up on a high mountain." These last two words in the LXX (oros hupsēlon) are identical to "high mountain" in Matthew and Mark. Mountain occurs sixteen times in Matthew, where it seems to have special significance, eleven times in Mark and twelve times in Luke.

The third motif is the cloud. Once more the Exodus event provides a referent. The cloud led them on their journey, showed the glory of the Lord prior to the giving of manna, marked the induction of seventy elders and appeared at the entrance to the tabernacle (Ex 13:21-22; 16:10; 24:16; 40:34-38). Above all, the cloud symbolized the presence of the Lord at Sinai (Ex 19:16-19), notably also when Moses and the three companions were there (Ex 24:15-18). In that account the LXX uses a synonym (kalyptō; cf. use in Ex 40:34) for the Greek word for "overshadow" (eptskiazō) that is used in each account of the Transfiguration. Of perhaps even more significance, this word (eptskiaiō) is used by the LXX to translate the Hebrew word describing the dwelling or glorious shekinah presence of God at the tabernacle (Ex 40:35). On the other hand, Isaiah 4:5 refers to the cloud not with reference to past time but rather in the context of the future. So does the familiar Daniel 7:13 describing the coming of the Son of man with the clouds of heaven. Jesus took up this prophecy (Mk 13:26; 14:62), and it also appears in Revelation 1:7. The cloud motif therefore could refer either to the past (the Exodus) or to the future (the Parousia).

The fourth motif is the appearance of Moses and Elijah. It can be considered a "motif" because it has symbolic meaning, and its significance must be appraised along with that of the other elements in the narrative. Since the time of Origen it has been common to think of the two as representing the Law and the Prophets respectively. This does not however, express their significance in first-century Judaism.* There are other reasons why these, rather than other OT figures, appear. In addition to their prominence and importance as spiritual leaders, they have in common an unusual conclusion to life. Although Moses' death seems to have been normal, he was apparently buried by God unseen (Deut 34:5-6). Elijah was taken to heaven by a whirlwind in the chariot scene (2 Kings 2:11). Later Jewish legend had Moses mysteriously brought to heaven. Moses was connected in Jewish thought with the future as well as with the past, since he was the paradigm for the eschatological prophet* mentioned in Deuteronomy 18:18. Elijah* was arguably an eschatological figure in Jewish reflection (cf. Mal 4:5-6). Both are surpassed by Jesus not only in the significance of their persons and ministries, but also in that Jesus was not merely translated to heaven but died, rose again and ascended.

Elijah seems to be more prominent than Moses in Mark's Gospel than he is in either Matthew or Luke. His name appears first ("Elijah with Moses"); there is no reference to Jesus' face shining, thus omitting a possible point of comparison with Moses; and there is no allusion to an "exodus" as in Luke.

Whether Peter's proposal to build three huts or "tabernacles" is considered a motif, it is a constant element in each account. Mark seems to make the most of it explaining why Peter said it as though it were a horrendous error. One culpable aspect of the proposal is that it puts Jesus on the same level with the two heavenly visitors. Another may be that Peter was building on a concept of the Feast* of Tabernacles as a symbol not only of the past but a future time of rest for Israel, thinking that the day of Jesus' future glorification had come. In this case he would have again missed the place of the cross (cf. Mt 16:22).

The voice from heaven is not only a motif but the climax of the experience. In Exodus 24 and in the chapters that follow, the words from heaven are words of the Law; in the Transfiguration the voice speaks of Christ. The words reflect the essence of several OT passages. One is Psalm 2:7, "You are my Son" (see Son of God). The heavenly voice had spoken these words at Jesus' baptism* (where Matthew has "This is ..." and the others "You are ..."; Mt 3:17; Mk 1:11; Lk 3:22). In the context of Psalm 2 it not only states the relationship of the Son to the Father but does so in a context of future vindication, victory and earthly rule. (A comprehensive interpretation of the Transfiguration must consider its relationship to Jesus' baptism.) The additional designation, "the chosen [One]," appears in Luke's version, a slight verbal modification of the LXX of Isaiah 42:1. This is one of Isaiah's "Servant songs" and describes the Servant as one who ultimately brings justice to the nations (see Servant of Yahweh). The context of the two christological designations is thus related to eschatology,* specifically to the future rule of Christ

It is difficult to know whether there is any one OT passage to which the words "my son, my beloved" allude. Various proposals have been made. It may be that there is no other allusion than to Psalm 2:7. However, there is another possibility, namely Genesis 22:2 where God says to Abraham,* "Take your son, your only son, Isaac, whom you love" (cf. w. 12, 16). The LXX reads ton huion sou ton agapēton, and Matthew and Mark have ho huios mou ho agapētos, the only differences being the case and the substitution of pronouns for the article. It is striking that in the LXX agapētos, "beloved," is used instead of monogenēs, "one and only" or "only begotten," where focus is on mourning for an only child (Jer 6:26; Amos 8:10; Zech 12:10), as is the case in Genesis 22:2, 12, 16. In both OT and NT, narratives about an only child involve mortal danger or death (e.g., Jephthah's daughter, Judg 11:34; the widow's son, Lk 7:12; Jairus's daughter, Lk 9:42; see De Kruijf, 112-16). The voice seems to be comparing Jesus to Isaac, the only and beloved son, who embodied the hope of the covenant (cf. Acts 3:25; Heb 6:13-15). Isaac willingly went to the place of sacrifice and "figuratively speaking" (Heb 11:19) was received back from death. Moreover, an allusion to Isaac brings into focus the father who offered him (for which act of faith he is cited in Heb 11:17-19; cf. Jas 2:21), whose willingness to sacrifice his son forms a background for Romans 8:32 ("He who did not spare his own Son . . ."). God, in speaking of his beloved Son, may also indirectly speak of himself.

8. Conclusion.

Theories about the meaning and significance of the Transfiguration narrative have abounded. Lohmeyer at first thought it was influenced by ancient epiphany stories, then changed his mind. Gerber proposed Jewish parallels. Sabbe found parallels with Daniel 10. Boobyer viewed it as a foreshadowing of the Parousia. Bultmann saw it as a transposed resurrection account Kee gave the final blow to Hellenistic parallels. Riesenfeld proposed an enthronement context, following a trend in OT studies. Baltensweiler (unlike many others) held that it was a historical event, a crisis experience in Jesus' life. H.-P. Miiller saw in it a synthesis of the figures of the Messiah and the Son of man. For Mauser it embodied an Exodus motif. Thrall emphasized the contrast with Moses and Elijah who had gone to heaven without resurrection. Trites called it "the gospel in microcosm." More recent works have tended to interpret the Transfiguration by means of a redactional or literary methodology. In such studies the important benefit of emphasizing the theology of the individual Gospels must be weighed against the possible loss of comprehending the Transfiguration as a historical event with its own integrity and message. Each of the foregoing interpretations needs to be challenged by the insights of the others as well as by a continuing vigorous study of the texts themselves.

The following synthesis may be proposed: Two clusters of events form the conceptual framework for the Transfiguration. The first is the Exodus event the revelation of God's glory at the tabernacle and especially as focused in the experience of God's presence in the mountain scene in Exodus 24. That scene is recalled in the Transfiguration by the reference to six days, and is expanded by the circumstances of the mountain, the three men, the discussion about Jesus' "exodus" and the manifestation of the presence of God through the cloud. The second circumstance or cluster of events is the anticipated exaltation of Christ the glory of the Son of man. This may be at his resurrection (then still future) or at some kind of enthronement but much more likely at his future Parousia when he comes with the clouds of heaven. It may be suggested that Moses represents the first conceptual framework and Elijah the second.

One might propose in conclusion that first of all, the three Gospels uniformly present Jesus as the Son of God. In addition Matthew seems to draw mainly on the Moses analogy, Luke on that of a redemptive "exodus" and on the prediction of the chosen Servant while Mark focusses on Elijah. If there is an allusion in the voice from heaven to Abraham's offering of his "beloved son," a sacrificial motif is present in Matthew and Mark. In each Gospel the Transfiguration affirms (1) the confession of Peter and (2) the statements of Jesus about himself, his mission (the cross must be endured) and his glorious destiny. But further, (3) in the heavenly voice God himself provides the final affirmation concerning his Son and his Son's mission. All three Gospels then conclude with God's command to erring Peter, to all the disciples and to the reader, "Listen to him."

TRIAL OF JESUS

The trial and death* of Jesus, in addition to being a celebrated problem of jurisprudence, is the focal point of the gospel story and thus assumes paramount importance as a historical and theological issue. Opinions are sharply divided over a wide range of historical, literary and legal aspects of the trial. However, the Jewish and Roman background supports a traditional approach to these questions, namely: after a religious trial before the Sanhedrin* which found Jesus guilty of blasphemy,* the Jewish leaders brought a charge of sedition before Pilate who conducted a political trial and had Jesus crucified.

5. Theological Significance

1. Roman and Jewish Sources.

As a fact of history the trial and death of Jesus of Nazareth is a matter beyond dispute. It is better attested and supported with a wider array of evidence than any other comparable event known to us from the ancient world (Harvey, 11). This datum, so prominent in the apostolic preaching and in the written Gospels,* is featured in reports of the historical Jesus in non-Christian sources (see Jesus in Non-Christian Sources); these notices, meager though they are, confirm the historical character of the NT's witness to Christ crucified. They furnish no details of the trial itself which are of independent value but, much in the manner of some NT references, make summary statements of what happened.

An official Roman record of the trial of Jesus was probably made at the time and subsequently lost. Imperial Rome received dispatches from the provinces at regular intervals which included reports of major events. Among the acta entered in these official registers (Cassius Dio Hist. 57.21.5; 67.11.3) were trials and executions ordered by Roman governors. Such archives of Jesus' trial were reported to exist in the middle of the second Christian century: "That these things happened you may learn from the 'Acts' which were recorded under Pontius Pilate" (Justin Martyr Apol. 1.35.9; cf. 1.48.3; and Tettullian Marc. 4.17.19; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.2.14). The later Acts of Pilate (fourth century AD.) is a cycle of pious legends which probably appeared when the archives were no longer available.

On the Jewish side the situation is less certain. The rabbinic law directing two court clerks to write down the speeches pleading for acquittal and conviction (m. Sank. 4:3; set Sanhedrin) may reflect first-century procedures, but there are no allusions to such recordings in the case of Jesus. The Jewish folklore about the last days of Jesus called Toledoth Jeshu is medieval in origin and has no historical value. A number of rabbinic and historical texts, however, lay fair claim to be worthy of credence and have been studied intensively.

1.1. Talmud. A common theme runs through all the Talmudic (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) references to Jesus: He was executed as a dangerous teacher, a seducer, or mēsît, who led Israel astray. A notable text from the Babylonian Talmud (b. Sanh. 43a) preserves a saying handed down from the earliest period (a baraita from the Tannaim, AD. 70-200): "Jesus was hanged on Passover Eve. For forty days before the execution took place, a herald went forth and cried, 'He is going forth to be stoned because he has practiced sorcery and enticed Israel to apostasy. Anyone who can say anything in his favor, let him come forward and plead on his behalf.' But since nothing was brought forward in his favor he was hanged on Passover Eve." The emphatic point is that the trial and execution, carried out under Jewish not Roman procedures, were absolutely fair. Putting aside the questionable details in the account, the attempt to justify Jewish involvement in the death of Jesus is remarkable and stands in contrast to modern Jewish research on the trial. Other Talmudic statements are similar: "Jesus the Nazarene practiced magic and led Israel astray" (b. Sanh. 107b; cf. b. Sota 47a; y. hag. 2.2). Also, a series of disputed passages which refer to an executed heretic, a certain Ben Stada (b. Sanh. 67a; t. Sanh. 10.11; b. Šabb. 104b; y. Sanh. 7.16; y. Yeūam. 16.6; y. Šabb. 12.4; t. Šabb. 11.15), in all likelihood is linked to the false-prophet tradition about Jesus (Catchpole, 64).
1.2. Josephus. The well-known passages about Jesus, the so-called Testimonium Flavianum, are widely regarded to be genuine, with some obvious Christian interpolations (see Josephus). The authentic text (cf. Ant. 20.9.1 §200) underscores the leading role of Pilate and the complicity of the Jewish leaders in the trial of Jesus: "On the accusation of our leading men, Pilate condemned him to the cross, but those who were attracted to him from the first did not cease to love him" (Ant. 18.3.3 §64). The Slavonic version of Josephus has fuelled much speculation, but its embellished accounts of Jesus' life and death are legendary expansions of the Greek originals.

1.3. Tacitus. The information provided by Tacitus, who wrote between A.D. 115 and 117, is very sketchy and may be derived from Josephus: "They got their name from Christ, who was executed by sentence of the procurator Pontius Pilate in the reign of Tiberius" (Ann. 15.44.2). For Roman readers the pertinent information about the Christians, whom Nero had blamed for the fire in Rome (A.D. 64), was the identity and death of their namesake. Another allusion to Roman knowledge of the crucifixion appears in the Christian writer of the early third century, Julius Africanus; he cites (PG 10.89) one Thallus, a freedman of Tiberius who wrote a history (c. AD. 50) now lost, for the opinion that the darkness and earthquake attending the cross were to be explained as an eclipse, inferring that Thallus mentioned the crucifixion in book three of his history.

1.4. Mara bar Serapion. A Syriac letter written from prison by Mara bar Serapion to his son cautions that misfortune overtakes those who persecute wise men, such as Socrates, Pythagoras and Jesus: "What advantage did the Jews gain from executing their wise King? It was just after that that their kingdom was abolished. . . . Nor did the wise King die altogether; he lived on in the teaching he had given." The date of Mara bar Serapion is uncertain; the only extant copy of the letter is seventh century, but historical clues place its origin in the first three centuries, perhaps as early as A.D. 73 (Blinzler, 36). The author was probably a pagan and, if first century, provides independent testimony to Jewish responsibility for the execution of Jesus.

In summary, the literary evidence confirms three facts: (1) Jesus was crucified by Roman authority under the sentence of Pontius Pilate (Josephus, Tacitus); (2) the Jewish leaders made a formal accusation against Jesus and participated decisively in the events leading to his execution (Josephus, Mara) and (3) Jewish involvement in the trial was explained as a proper undertaking against a heretic or seducer who led Israel astray (Talmud).
2. NT Witnesses.

The centrality of the cross in apostolic preaching gave rise to trial summaries which are found outside the passion narratives (see Passion Narrative), primarily in sermons and creedal formulas. They were part of the earliest Gospel tradition proclaimed by the aposdes* and handed down to their converts (Acts 1:3; 1 Cor 15:3); these kerygmatic summaries disclose the contours of a written passion narrative in its earliest stages of formation.

2.1. Letters of Paul. The language of "handing over" (paradidōmi) describes Jesus' voluntary death as a divine necessity (Rom 4:25; 8:32; 1 Cor 11:32; Gal 2:20; Eph 5:2). The proximate agents of the crucifixion can be the "rulers of this age" (1 Cor 2:8; Col 2:15) or, from another point of view, the "Jews, who killed both the Lord Jesus and the prophets" (1 Thess 2:14-15). Paul alludes directly to the trial when he says that Christ Jesus "witnessed the good confession before Pontius Pilate" (1 Tim 6:13). Other epistolary texts emphasize the innocence of Jesus and the plight of those who caused him to suffer (1 Pet 2:22-24; Heb 6:6; 10:26-29; Rev 1:7).

2.2. Acts of the Apostles. Speeches in Acts provide eleven passages which relate to the trial. (1) The events in Jerusalem were part of a divine plan fulfilling the prophetic Scriptures (2:22-23; 3:17-19; 4:10-11, 25-28; 13:27-29). (2) Being ignorant of who Jesus was, the Jews in Jerusalem and their leaders delivered up and disowned him in the presence of Pilate (3:13,17; 13:27). (3) The crucifixion was carried out by the Romans, but the Jews, specifically the leaders of the Sanhedrin, were chiefly responsible: "You killed him, having him crucified by the hand of godless men" (2:23; cf. 2:36; 3:15, 17; 4:10; 5:28, 30; 7:52; 10:39; 13:27-28). (4) In a prayer of the church the circle of conspiracy is widened to "both Herod and Pontius Pilate along with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel" (4:27).

The writings and sermons preserved in the Letters and Acts concur in the assertion that the handing over of Jesus to death was taken at the initiative of the Jews in Jerusalem and their leaders; moreover, the Gentile* authorities bear equal responsibility whenever they are addressed. Whatever else may be said, the human actors played out a divine drama, doing what God's hand and purpose had predetermined to happen (Acts 4:28; cf. 2:23; 3:18; Rom 8:32; 1 Cor 2:7).
2.3. Gospel Predictions. What were hints earlier in the ministry of Jesus (e.g., Mk 2:18-22; Jn 7:6-8) become explicit predictions of impending death on the last journey to Jerusalem (Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34; cf. Mt 16:21; 17:22-23; 20:18-19; Lk 9:22, 44; 18:31-33; see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). The three Synoptic predictions in the triple tradition converge with the apostolic proclamation on the basic points of importance: (1) the trial and death of Jesus is ordained of God*; "the Son of man must suffer many things" (Mk 8:31) is a "must" (dei) of divine necessity (cf. Lk 17:25; 24:6-7) issuing from the will of the Father (Mk 9:11; 12:10; Mt 12:39; Lk 9:31; 24:26, 44); (2) the "handing over" of Jesus is a betrayal to the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem (the chief priests,* scribes* and elders*), which condemns him to death (Mk 8:31; 10:33; cf. 12:1-12; Lk 24:20, chief priests and rulers deliver him up to the sentence of death); and (3) the ultimate suffering, that is, his mockery, being spit upon, scourging and death, comes at the hands of Gentiles, namely, the Roman authorities (Mk 10:34; Lk 18:32).

Lack of explicit details in the Markan predictions (e.g., no mention of Pilate or the cross) counts against the view that these sayings are prophecies (see Prophets and Prophecy) after the fact created by the early church. They are better explained as seminal utterances which were elaborated in apostolic preaching. The impetus to proclaim the scandal of a crucified Messiah lies in the memory of Jesus' own words (Lk 24:44-49; 1 Cor 11:23-26).

Our best sources of information are the accounts of the passion story in the four Gospels (Mt 26—27; Mk 14-15; Lk 22-23; Jn 13; 18-19), where the documents exhibit their highest degree of similarity. How is their striking relationship to be explained? The evidence tips in favor of the answer, vigorously contested in some quarters, that a connected passion narrative of some length circulated before the writing of the Gospels and underlies the work of the Evangelists Passion Narrative). The further inference that Luke and John are independent witnesses to this earlier tradition, seen in their departures from the Markan-Matthean scheme, is less certain but can be strongly supported (Jeremias, Green).

This approach to the formation of the four passion narratives is based on the following observations: (1) the four Gospels narrate a unified story of some twenty pericopes, with minor transpositions, beginning with a plot which converges on the arrest of Jesus; (2) OT motifs of the Servant of the Lord (Isaiah; see Servant of Yahweh), stricken shepherd (Zechariah; see Shepherd and Sheep) and righteous sufferer (Psalms; see Death of Jesus) link Jesus' death to the fulfillment of the Scriptures (cf. Mk 14:49; see Old Testament in the Gospels) in a pattern distinctive of earliest Christian preaching; (3) the "handing over" theme found in kerygmatic summaries and dominical sayings emerges in the betrayal and trial scenes (Mt 26:2, 46; 27:2; Mk 14:10; 15:1, 15; Lk 23:25; Jn 19:16); (4) the shared vocabulary of Luke with Mark decreases from fifty per cent to twenty-seven per cent in the passion narratives; and (5) Luke and John agree together on numerous details which are absent from Mark and Matthew (e.g., Pilate's three verdicts of not guilty, Lk 23:4,14, 22 par. Jn 18:38; 19:4, 6). On these grounds we will proceed to consider key episodes in the passion story, giving full weight to the testimony of each Evangelist.

3.1. Plot to Destroy Jesus. The enemies of Jesus hatched their plot during the earliest controversies in Galilee* and Jerusalem (Mk 3:6; Jn 5:18), but their intention was forestalled until the final week when Jesus' triumphal entry (see Triumphal Entry), the cleansing of the Temple (see Temple Cleansing), and head-on disputes prodded them into action (Mk 11:18; 12:12; 14:1). John records that Jesus lived under a constant death threat (7:1, 19, 25; 8:37; 11:16) and escaped a series of attempted arrests and stonings (7:30, 32, 44; 8:20, 59; 10:31, 39; cf. Lk 4:29-30). The popularity of Jesus with the crowds (Mt 7:28-29; Jn 4:1; see People, Crowd) precluded an open arrest by the religious leaders for fear of a riot but spurred their resolve to delay no longer: "See, this is getting us nowhere. Look how the whole world has gone after him" (Jn 12:19 NIV).

3.1.1. Proscription and Warrant. A crucial decision had been made weeks before, recounted in John 11:47-57. After the stir caused by the raising of Lazarus,* "the chief priests and the Pharisees convened a meeting of the Sanhedrin" (11:47) in order to deal with Jesus. The high priest Caiaphas (see Priest and Priesthood), an unwitting prophet, persuaded them that Jesus must die on behalf of the nation, thus keeping peace in the homeland and restoring the scattered people of God. The council, having formally decided to kill Jesus (11:52), issued a warrant for his arrest and solicited informers to come forward (11:57). This distinctive passage, filled with semitechnical terms, marks the beginning of the legal process and, in effect, makes Jesus a fugitive from Jewish law (Bammel 1971, 33-35). An ongoing prosecution instigated by the Jews and led by Caiaphas helps to explain what appears to be a precipitous rush to judgment in the Synoptic account of Passover (see Feasts) night.

3.1.2. Passover Treachery. The Synoptic time note, "after two days was the feast of Passover" (Mk 14:1 par. Mt 26:2 and Lk 22:1), appears to refer to a subsequent meeting of the council at the palace of Caiaphas. Here the discussion centered on a covert plan, as Luke puts it "the how" (to pōs, 22:2) of getting rid of Jesus without causing an uproar during the feast (cf. Mt 26:4; Mk 14:2). The question was how to implement the resolution already passed (Jn 11:52, 57). An unexpected visitor brought what they hoped for: Judas Iscariot (see Judas Iscariot), one of Jesus' disciples, agreed to collaborate for a sum of money. In turn he would "look for an opportunity to hand Jesus over to them without drawing a crowd" (Lk 22:6; cf. Mt 26:14-16; Mk 14:10-11).

Matthew and Mark tell the story of the anointing in Bethany (Mt 26:6-13; Mk 14:3-9) before the conspiracy visit by Judas with no hint of connection. John may well give the link: the indignation expressed among the disciples at the expensive waste of perfume (Mt 26:8; Mk 14:4) was voiced by Judas himself (Jn 12:4). The act of devotion by the woman contrasts to and leads to the an of treachery by the man. A sinister motive lies underneath the monetary concerns in the priests' contract and the anointing episode; Luke and John concur that Satan (see Demon, Devil, Satan) had entered the heart of Judas (Lk 22:3; Jn 13:2, 27).

3.2. Arrest in Gethsemane. The fateful Thursday evening begins with the intimacy of the Last Supper shattered by the talk of betrayal and the exit of Judas into the "night" (Jn 13:30). The scene is dominated by Jesus' knowledge that what will happen is God's plan: "The Son of man now goes as it has been decreed, but woe to that person by whom he is betrayed" (Lk 22:22; cf. Mt 26:24; Mk 14:21, "as it has been written about him"; see Son of Man). The predictive element heightens when Jesus leaves the table. The Synoptics focus on the scattering of the disciples and the approaching defection of Peter (Mt 26:31-35; Mk 14:27-31; Lk 22:24-38), while John relates the farewell discourses (14:1—17:26; see Farewell Discourse). As he frequently had done (Lk 22:39; Jn 18:1-2), Jesus walked with the disciples across the brook Kidron into a garden, a place on the Mount of Olives named Gethsemane* (Mt 26:36 par. Mk 14:32). The calm of the upper room here gives way to burdened prayer* as the cup of death looms before Jesus, an agony made all the greater by the sleeping disciples. The hour had come; the betrayer was at hand.

3.2.1. Judas's Betrayal The actual arrest happened quickly. After Judas identified Jesus by a prearranged signal, a customary kiss of greeting (Mt 26:48-49; Mk 14:44-45; Lk 22:47-48), the armed crowd from the Temple Mount laid hands on him. Since the authorities knew Jesus by face ("I was daily with you," Mk 14:49 par.), the approach with a kiss was more than simple identification; it was calculated to allay suspicion and to point out Jesus in the surrounding darkness. Theories suggesting that Judas betrayed who Jesus was or something he said have little support in the texts; more likely, he divulged the whereabouts of Jesus at a time and place when a quiet seizure was possible (cf. Mk 14:11; Jn 11:57) and guided the arrest party to the spot (Lk 22:47; Acts 1:16, "guide"). John's language, "Judas having received [labōn] the cohort and the officers of the chief priests and the Pharisees" (18:3), does not imply that Judas took charge but rather that he procured and escorted the band.

3.2.2. Flight of the Disciples. A flurry of resistance was offered by a sword-wielding disciple who cut off the ear ("right ear," Lk 22:50; Jn 18:10) of the high priest's servant—according to John it was Simon Peter who attacked Malchus. Jesus intervened, commanding Peter to stop ("Put your sword back in its place," Mt 26:52 par. Jn 18:11), and healing the servant's ear (Lk 22:51). Matthew alone records the sayings on perishing by the sword and the twelve legions of angels standing ready to help (Mt 26:52-54). The ironical question "Have you come out to arrest me, as you would a robber, with swords and clubs?" (Synoptics), a reply of peaceful surrender, exhausted the courage of the disciples. They deserted Jesus and fled. All four Gospels understand these events in the light of prophecy, as fulfillment of the Scriptures (Mt 26:54, 56; Mk 14:49), the hour of darkness (Lk 22:53) and the word of Jesus (Jn 18:9). The unique tradition in Mark of a young man who fled naked (14:51-52) may be the Evangelist's own modest signature.

3.2.3. Company and Commander. The Synoptics describe the personnel who arrested Jesus as a crowd sent from the Sanhedrin (chief priests, elders and scribes; Mk 14:43; Mt 26:47; "a large crowd"), and Luke puts the chief priests and elders at the scene along with the Temple police (stratēgoi, constables or court officers, Lk 22:52). The impression of a solely Jewish initiative, however, diminishes in John who twice distinguishes "the company" (speira, 18:3, 12) of soldiers and its "commander" (chiliarchos, 18:12) from the Jewish detachment. These are the regular terms for the cohort and tribune of the Roman army (cf. Mt 27:27; Mk 15:16; Acts 10:1; 21:31; 27:1 NASB) and strongly suggest Roman participation in the arrest (pace Blinzler, Bammel, Catchpole). Objections to this view are not convincing: (1) the definite article with speira denotes the garrison regularly stationed at the Antonia fortress during festivals (cf. Josephus J. W. 2.12.1 §224; Ant. 20.5.3 §106; Acts 21:31); (2) the phrase does not demand that the entire cohort of 600 soldiers came to the garden; (3) pursuit of a "robber" (testes, bandit, freedom fighter, revolutionary) by a heavily armed force was a matter for Roman jurisdiction (cf. Mk 15:7, 27; Jn 18:40) and (4) remanding a prisoner in Roman custody to a Jewish court is paralleled in the case of Paul (Acts 22:30). The first action against Jesus, instigated by agents of the Jewish court, was in collaboration with the Roman authorities.

3.3. The Jewish Proceedings. The Gospels report that swiftly following the arrest, probably before midnight, the Jewish leaders began an interrogation and trial of Jesus, arguing the case throughout the night and returning a death verdict at daybreak. The sequence and relationship of these blocks of narrative material are the most complex in the passion story. Alleged discrepancies have prompted some scholars to be dubious of the entire account of the Jewish trial, even to the point of denying that a formal trial before the Sanhedrin ever happened (Lietzmann, Winter). A composite version of the proceedings must bring together four graphic scenes: (1) an initial examination by Annas in John, (2) Peter's denials of Jesus in all four Gospels, (3) a nighttime trial before Caiaphas in Matthew and Mark and (4) a Sanhedrin trial at dawn in Luke.

3.3.1. Preliminary Hearing before Annas. John writes that Jesus was led "first" (implying knowledge of a second hearing, 18:13) to Annas, where he was briefly questioned about "his disciples and his teaching" (18:19) and struck in the face by a displeased captor (18:20-23). The atmosphere is not that of a trial but of a roughshod interrogation by a notable examiner to get incriminating evidence. Based on a straightforward reading of verse 24, "Annas then sent him, still bound, to Caiaphas the high priest," the examiner must have been Annas, a former high priest (A.D. 6-15) and father-in-law to his successor, Joseph Caiaphas (A.D. 18-36). The preceding passage twice then calls Annas the "high priest" (18:19, 22) and locates the denial scene at his residence (18:15). The Synoptics, on the other hand, place Jesus and Peter in the house and courtyard of Caiaphas (Mt 26:57-58 par. Mk 14:53-54 and Lk 22:54-55). A few minuscules and versions (225 1195 syr4 h p Cyril of Alexandria) solve the problem by rearrangement of verse 24 after verse 13 in John's account, thereby making Caiaphas the unnamed high priest in verses 15-23. A similar effect is gained by translating the aorist apesteilen (v. 24) with a pluperfect force, "Now Annas had sent him bound . . ." (KJV, NIV mg). Neither expedient, however, is necessary: (1) Annas, as other high priests, would have kept the dignity and tide of the office for life (Josephus Ant. 18.2.2 §34; m. Hor. 3:4), (2) that Caiaphas should defer to the elderly father-in-law is fully in keeping with the influence and power of Annas (cf. Lk 3:2; Acts 4:6) and (3) as for location, a more feasible conjecture is that Annas and Caiaphas were in wings of the same residence somewhere in the upper city (cf. Josephus J.W. 2.17.6 §426).

3.3.2. Peter's Denials. While Jesus was inside the high priest's residence until about 3 AM. (the time of cockcrow for Jerusalem in April), Peter was outside (Mt 26:69; Jn 18:16) in the courtyard below where Jesus was being held (Mk 14:66). The four Gospels show this coincidence emphatically but in differing ways: Mark and Matthew intercalate the night session led by Caiaphas before the denial scene (Mk 14:55-65 par. Mt 26:59-68); John breaks up the scene itself, placing the Annas interrogation after the first denial (Jn 18:19-24); Luke tells Peter's story without interruption (Lk 22:55-62) but places him within sight of Jesus' withering gaze when the cock crowed. "And the Lord, having turned, looked straight at Peter" (22:61). By intertwining the two scenes the Gospels stress not only simultaneity (the connectives may be rendered "meanwhile," cf. NEB) but the gravity of Peter's act. While Jesus faced his accusers and denied nothing he truly was, Peter cringed before his accusers and denied everything.

3.3.3. Nighttime Trial before Caiaphas. Was then Jesus formally tried during the night? This has been the crucial question in trial research. John, who mentions delivery to Caiaphas (18:24), and Luke, who describes only a mockery and beating at night (22:63-65), are silent on the issue. Luke does however report a morning session of the Sanhedrin, probably in the council chamber (eis to synedrion, Lk 22:66), where Jesus was questioned by the entire body (22:67-71). Matthew and Mark are quite definite that Caiaphas, in the company of "the chief priests and the whole council," held a nocturnal interrogation with all the earmarks of a formal trial (Mt 26:59-68 par. Mk 14:55-65).

First the required evidence ("false testimony," Mt 26:59) was sought in order to prosecute Jesus on a capital charge. From among several false witnesses who failed to agree at all, two eventually contrived the charge that Jesus had threatened to destroy the Temple and rebuild it in three days (Mt 26:61; Mk 14:58; cf. Jn 2:19). Then the high priest himself, driven by Jesus' unwillingness to answer the charge, pressed for an admission of guilt "Are you the Christ the Son of the Blessed?" (Mk 14:61 par. Mt 26:63, "Son of God"). In Mark the explicit reply "I am" (implicitly in Matthew and Luke), followed by the future Son of man saying (Mk 14:62; cf. Mt 26:64; Lk 22:69) linked Jesus' identity to three elevated tides, Messiah (see Christ), Son of God (see Son of God) and Son of man (see Son of Man). This claim constituted blasphemy in the eyes of the court, and "they all condemned him to be worthy of death" (Mk 14:64; Mt 26:66).

Although specific time notices are lacking, it is difficult to dislodge the timing of the trial in Matthew and Mark. They both report a summation of the proceedings in "early morning" (prōi, Mt 27:1; Mk 15:1), thus a time frame is fixed unless one treats the passage as an awkward insertion or a curious doublet. Again, the quaint detail of lighting a charcoal fire in the courtyard indicates a commotion that kept people awake during the night (Sherwin-White, Bruce) and puts Jesus before Caiaphas while Peter warmed himself (Mk 14:54, 66; Lk 22:55, 61; Jn 18:18, 24-25).

3.3.4. Morning Decision of the Sanhedrin. Luke's record of the morning session ("as day was dawning," 22:66) strikingly echoes most of the nighttime dialog found in Matthew and Mark, except the questions are put by the entire body (plural subject throughout) and no witnesses are called, although Luke 22:71, "Why do we still need testimony?" implies their presence. The morning assembly described by Mark and Matthew is not so much another trial as a culmination of the preceding events during the night. The descriptive phrases mean "to take counsel, reach a decision" (symboulion + poiein, Mk 15:1; lambanein, Mt 27:1; cf. 12:14; 22:15; 27:7; 28:12) and refer to the legal formulation of charges against Jesus, not to a second council meeting (Sherwin-White, 44).

Has one or the other of the Synoptics dislocated a single Jewish trial in the narrative sequence, or were there two sessions of the Sanhedrin, one at night and a second in the morning? Among those who defend the historicity of the Sanhedrin trial, the former option of a single trial is widely accepted, but its timing is debated: (1) a single morning session, according to Luke, the night setting being a Markan literary technique (Catchpole, Black, Robinson); or (2) a single nighttime session extending to dawn, following Mark and Matthew, with Luke telescoping the trial summary to the morning (Blinzler, Smalley, Sherwin-White). Luke's narrative does not fill the night with trial activity but does retain a nocturnal mocking and abuse by those guarding Jesus (Lk 22:63-65). A minor agreement here with Matthew, the tag line in blind man's bluff, "Who is the one who hit you?" (Lk 22:64 par. Mt 26:68; omitted in Mk 14:65), hints at Luke's knowledge of the nighttime trial. Since the morning assembly went to Pilate with expanded allegations (Lk 23:2), the entire Sanhedrin may well have rehearsed the previous night's dialog (22:66-71) in order to devise the sedition charge. Luke's arrangement shows that these political accusations were obtained by a legally convened Sanhedrin in a religious prosecution.

The probable order of events surrounding the Jewish trial can be tabulated as follows:

Gospels feature a Roman interrogation, condemnation and mockery of Jesus, but there are fundamental differences at each stage: (1) the questioning centers on the issue of kingship; (2) when Pilate proposes to release Jesus their king, the crowds shout for Barabbas instead, and under increasing pressure Pilate hands Jesus over to be crucified; and (3) Roman soldiers also mock and abuse Jesus, as did the Jewish constables, but in contempt of his kingship. Three independent stories accentuate the officials: Luke prefaces the Barabbas scene with an account of the

The Gospels present events 3 and 6 as occurring simultaneously with 4 and 5; in Matthew and Mark the trial and mockery scenes (5 and 7 conflated) are the erratic blocks of material in the narrative order, whereas Luke (placing 7 at night) and John have the sequence intact.

3.4. The Roman Proceedings. The narratives of the trial before Pilate depict a separate prosecution aimed to secure a death sentence under terms of Roman law. The Sanhedrin, knowing well that blasphemy was not a capital offense in the eyes of Rome, urged the governor that Jesus had committed treason against the state. Like the structure of the Jewish trial, the four examination by Herod Antipas (Lk 23:8-12), while in Matthew's interludes we see Pilate warned by a troubled wife and washing his hands (Mt 27:19,24-25).

The trial in John's account is extended with great dramatic effect Whereas Jesus remains silent in the Synoptics (Mt 27:14; Mk 15:5; Lk 23:9), most of John is a private dialog between Jesus and Pilate on kingship. The scene shifts in seven episodes between frontstage, the outside court where "the Jews" waited, and backstage, the inner Praetorium where Jesus was held. Pilate's shuffling back and forth (cf. Jn 18:29, 33, 38b; 19:1,4,9,13) gives the impression of a vacillating judge who finally condemns an innocent "King of the Jews." A tragic irony emerges in John as well as the Synoptics: the "pretender" who went to the cross actually was the king, the crucified Messiah (cf. Jn 19:15; Mk 15:12-13; 1 Cor 2:8).

3.4.1. Accusation before Pilate. The reason why the Jews came to the Roman authority is made clear by John: "It is not lawful for us to put anyone to death" (Jn 18:31). The Synoptics also assume that only Pilate was able to authorize the execution demanded by the Sanhedrin; moreover, he did not simply ratify the Jewish decision but made a new investigation of the case, asking for the charges against Jesus, "What accusation are you bringing against this man?" (Jn 18:29; cf. Mt 27:12; Mk 15:3; Lk 23:2). Luke gives the precise wording in a threefold form: leading astray the nation, forbidding payment of taxes* to Caesar and claiming to be the Messiah, a king (Lk 23:2; cf. 23:5, stirring up the people; 23:14, inciting the people to rebel). The obvious political overtones of this accusation explain Pilate's first and uppermost question, "Are you the King of the Jews?" (Mt 27:11; Mk 15:2; Lk 23:3; Jn 18:33). The force of Jesus' reply "The words are yours" eases some of the procurator's anxiety about sedition and revolution.

3.4.2. Transfer to Herod Antipas. The crowd protested Pilate's first attempt to dismiss the charge with the complaint that Jesus began his seditious activity in Galilee, the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas (see Herodian Dynasty). Having learned that Jesus was a Galilean under Herod's jurisdiction, Pilate made a hasty arrangement ("Herod and Pilate became friends with one another that very day," Lk 23:12) to put Jesus before his old adversary (Lk 23:6-12; cf. 9:7-9; 13:31-32).
The examination, carried on with a circus-like barrage of questions from Herod and "full-pitched accusations" (Lk 23:10) from the chief priests and scribes, stalled when Jesus would not answer; the sham ended in a staged ridicule of Jesus' kingship, by sending him back to Pilate dressed in a regal, shining robe (Lk 23:11). What Pilate had hoped to gain is not clear, but he interpreted Jesus' return as an acquittal (Lk 23:15).

The whole affair, plausible enough in itself, fully accords with what we know of the situation at the time: (1) the tetrarch's father, Herod the Great, had exercised unusual privileges of extradition (JosephusJ.W. 1.24.2 §474), and Antipas himself had the ear of the emperor Tiberius (Ant. 18.2.3 §36; 18.4.5 §104); (2) procurators often used a consilium, a body of legal advisors or friends, to reach a verdict (Acts 25:12, 26; Justinian Digest 4.8.3; SIG 3 780.25; cf. Bickerman, 110); (3) advice or judgment sought in Jerusalem from a Herodian official would have been advantageous for Pilate whose relations with Antipas and Galilee needed repair (Lk 23:12b, "previously they had been enemies"; cf. 13:1) and (4) although not required to do so, Pilate likely wanted a transfer to Herod's jurisdiction (available in the legal custom of home venue, or forum domicilii) to rid himself of a troublesome case (Sherwin-White, 28-31).

3.4.3. Release of Barabbas. The second stage of Pilate's trial in all four Gospels is an attempt to free Jesus by means of a Passover amnesty, the so-called privilegium paschale (Passover privilege), which failed and led to the release of Barabbas instead (Mt 27:15-26; Mk 15:6-15; Lk 23:13-25; Jn 18:39-40). Matthew and Mark introduce Barabbas at the beginning of the incident, building up the intervention of the crowd on his behalf. With the Jewish leaders stirring the people (Mt 27:20; Mk 15:11) to ask for Barabbas, Pilate's appeal for Jesus, "Do you wish that I release to you the King of the Jews?" (Mk 15:9) was futile. Luke and John stress Pilate's resolve to set Jesus free (Lk 23:20; Jn 19:12) because he had found "no basis for a charge against him" (Jn 18:38; cf. 19:4, 6; Lk 23:14, 22). The governor intended, after Jesus was punished by flogging (Lk 23:16, 22; Jn 19:1), to invoke the amnesty custom for his release; however, the crowd wanted Jesus crucified. The crescendo of shouts, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" depicted by all four Evangelists in two distinct phases (Mt 27:22-23; Mk 15:13-14; Lk 23:21-23; Jn 19:6,15), was decisive for Pilate.

The Gospels contain all we know about Barabbas, a revolutionary (lēstēs, Jn 18:40; "robber" KJV, RSV) who had committed murder in a Jerusalem insurrection (Lk 23:19, 25; Mk 15:7) and likely had followers in the Praetorium crowd (see Revolutionary Movements). His name, the Greek form of an Aramaic surname Bar-'Abbā', means "son of Abba" (or literally, "son of the father"); it occurs in Aramaic texts from the fifth century B.C. down to rabbis of the Amoraic period (e.g., hiyya bar 'Abbā', Lev. Rob. 3.1). The form 'Abbāh is attested as a personal name on a funerary inscription near Jerusalem dated about the time of Jesus (MPAT §68); if the man had a son, he would have been called Barabbas in Greek. The variant Barrabbas (with two r's meaning "son of the teacher") read by Origen and Jerome is improbable. A better case has been made for the Caesarean text of Matthew 27:16-17 (0 700* f syr geo² Origen") which supplies a first name, "Jesus Barabbas" (cf. NEB). Some commentators who adopt this reading suggest that Pilate mistook shouts for Jesus Barabbas as a plea for Jesus of Nazareth and eventually had to ask which one the crowd preferred (Mt 27:21). The variant, however, is weakly supported and probably arose from conjecture about the two names, still an irrepressible desire in some modern critics (e.g., Winter, 142-43).

The Barabbas incident and the paschal amnesty in particular are often dismissed as nonhistorical, "nothing but a figment of the imagination" (Winter, 134). The objections to the episode, based on the lack of evidence for such a custom in antiquity, do not carry sufficient weight In the provincial cities, acclamation of the people (acclamation populi) played a significant role in Roman legal administration (Strobel, 126-27); there are numerous examples of Roman magistrates who heeded a crowd's wishes at the tribunal (e.g., Tacitus Ann. 1.44.4; Justinian Digest 49.1.12; 48.8.16; see Bickerman, 103, 133-34). This custom is well illustrated by an incident in Egypt (A.D. 85) where the Roman governor released the accused, saying, "You deserve to be scourged [mastigōthēnai] . . ., but I will deal more humanely with you and will release you to the crowds" [ochlois] (Papyrus Florentinus 61.59-65; cf. Blinzler, 207). The political situation for Pilate was acutely unstable because of a series of clashes with the Jews (cf. Philo Leg. Gai. 38 §301-302), so he would have been inclined to placate them on this occasion. He did not want a bad report in Rome, and the Jews traded on his insecurity as a "friend of Caesar" (Jn 19:12), a tide weighted with political intrigue during the last stages of Tiberius' reign (cf. Tacitus Ann. 6.8; Philo Flacc. 6 §40; NewDocs 1978, 75). No clear evidence has yet come to light for a regular amnesty at a feast, but a provision stated in the Mishnah may be relevant: "They may slaughter the Passover... for one whom they have promised to bring out of prison" (m. Pesah. 8:6). This much-discussed text may refer to an evening release from a Jewish prison (Jeremias, 73), but it must have occurred with regularity to become a topic of rabbinic legislation, and a Roman detention cannot be ruled out (Blinzler, 218-21; Robinson, 261). These analogies favor the historical plausibility of the Gospel account much more than the explanations which try to derive the story in purely theological terms.

3.4.4. Scourging, Mockery and Death Sentence. The Barabbas scene closes in the Synoptics with Jesus sentenced to death by crucifixion (Mt 27:26; Mk 15:15; Lk 23:24-25). Matthew and Mark add the temporal participle, "having scourged [Jesus]," so that this punishment precedes the final sentence; then both relate the mockery by Roman soldiers in the Praetorium, where Jesus wore a crown of thorns and purple robe (Mt 27:27-31; Mk 15:16-20). Once again John sketches in the details which the Synoptics have summarized. Following the scourging and mockery in the Fourth Gospel, Jesus is brought before the Jews by a frustrated Pilate, who attempts to shift responsibility from himself ("You take him yourselves and crucify him," Jn 19:6). Amidst the insistent cries of "Crucify! Crucify!" a clear theological gravamen against Jesus finally emerges: "We have a law, and by that law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God" (Jn 19:7). Pilate retires in fear and in another exchange warns Jesus that he has power even at this stage in the proceedings to free him or to crucify him, but the governor's good intentions quickly turn to appeasement once the Jews question his loyalty to the Emperor ("after he heard these words," Jn 19:13). Then, at a place called the Lithostrotōn ("stone pavement"), the formal sentence of death is spoken from the judgment seat (bēma) where Pilate sits (the intransitive sense of ekathisen in v. 13, "Pilate sat down," is preferred over the idea that Pilate "set Jesus down" as a jest). Roman law required the magistrate to pronounce a capital sentence from the judgment seat (Mommsen, 447). John, in agreement with the other Evangelists, marks this point in the trial narrative with a judicial use of paredōken, Pilate "handed over" Jesus to the condemnation of the cross (Jn 19:16 par. Mt 27:26; Mk 15:15 and Lk 23:25).

John's order of events—scourging, mockery, sentence—leaves little reason to question its correctness. The placement of the mockery after the sentence in Matthew and Mark has a dual function. It summarizes Pilate's decision and emphasizes the role of the Roman soldiers who carried out the order: "Then the soldiers of the governor took Jesus into the Praetorium . . . and they led him away to crucify him" (Mt 27:27,31 par. Mk 15:16,20; note the ambiguous "they" in Lk 23:25-26 and Jn 19:16, where the NIV supplies "soldiers"). That Pilate attempted to end the trial by having Jesus flogged conforms to Roman practice. Scourging could be inflicted as the first stage of capital punishment (Josephus J.W. 2.14.9 §306; 7.6.4 §200; Livy Hist. 1.26; 33.36) or, as it is in the Gospels (Lk 23:16, 22; Jn 19:10), an independent penalty followed by release or imprisonment (cf. Acts 16:23; 22:24; Josephus J.W. 2.13.7 § 269; Philo Flacc. 10 §75; Justinian Digest 48.2.6). A notable parallel is the case of Jesus bar Ananias, a strange prophet of doom who spoke against Jerusalem and the Temple; after a trial and flogging by the Jewish authorities, he was charged before the procurator Albinus (A.D. 62), who released him as a madman, only when he had him "flayed to the bone with scourges" (J.W. 6.5.3 §304). The details of the Gospel narratives are, on the whole, in remarkable accord and are fully intelligible in light of the legal situation in Roman Palestine.

4. Legal Issues.

The modern history of trial research, both the Jewish and Christian contributions, entails a legal debate which has largely run its course (Catchpole, 221-60). Interest has shifted to literary (see Literary Criticism) and redactional (see Redaction Criticism) questions, sometimes with negative results (e.g., continued dissection of the Gospel narratives will yield no reliable details because of the "conflicting evidence and the unpersuasive accounts," Sanders, 300). The major work of this kind by P. Winter categorizes the trial pericopes in three redactional levels (190-93): primary tradition, secondary tradition and editorial accretion. The upshot of Winter's analysis, indeed his thesis, eliminates the bulk of the Jewish trial, allowing only a brief, morning deliberation of the Sanhedrin as primary tradition, and posits a Roman trial and sentence on political grounds. While elaborated as redactional insights, these literary judgments revert to the historical premises shared by Winter with earlier studies of J. Juster and H. Lietzmann. Their assumptions of pro-Roman bias in the Gospels advance the argument only slightly and, in net effect, still turn on legal issues which can be summarized as follows:

1. Since the Sanhedrin retained the power of capital punishment, Jesus would have been executed by stoning if the Jewish court had in fact found him guilty of blasphemy and pronounced sentence.

2. A nocturnal session of the Sanhedrin, convened in the high priest's residence on a feast day, violates Jewish legal procedure and was contrived by Mark to shift blame away from the Roman government.

3. The crucifixion of Jesus, a penalty never used by the Jews, indicates a political crime, that a Roman court found him guilty of sedition and excludes the possibility that religious charges were also preferred.

Each of these assertions has faced spirited challenge from both the literary and historical points of view (see Strobel, 21-61; cf. Sherwin-White, Kilpatrick, Blinzler, Catchpole, Betz). The crucial points of discussion pertain to the judicial competence of the Sanhedrin, the relevance of the Mishnaic law code and the procedures of the Roman provincial court.

4.1. Judicial Powers of the Sanhedrin. Did the Sanhedrin in the time of Jesus retain the right to sentence and execute criminals? Much hangs on this question which admits no easy solution. The standard view, that the "Roman government retained for itself the right of life and death" (Mommsen, 240), implies a curtailment of the Sanhedrin's powers as John 18:31 precisely states: The Jews might pass a death sentence but the power to execute lay in the hands of the Roman procurator alone (Lohse, 865). Few had disputed this assessment of matters, notably the Jewish scholar J. Salvador (1838) and the Christian J. J. I. von Döllinger (1860), until the influential work of Juster (1914), who carefully assembled the pertinent evidence demonstrating that the Sanhedrin could and did execute capital offenders (2:127-45). Prominent endorsement of Juster's interpretation (Lietzmann, 258-60; Winter, 12-26; 110-30; Burkill, 80-96) initiated a critical debate which has yet to subside ("neither theory can be effectively proved," Schürer, 2:222). However, in the items of evidence cited below, the balance of interpretation leans toward Mommsen and the traditional view.

4.1.1. Roman Sanctions. While still competent to try religious cases, the prerogatives of the Sanhedrin changed with the beginning of direct Roman rule in Judea: (1) Coponius, the first governor (AD. 6), was sent out by Augustus with full powers "extending to capital punishment" (Josephus J.W. 2.8.1 §117; cf. Ant. 18.1.1 §2); (2) Tannaitic tradition confirms that "the right to try capital cases was taken from Israel forty years before the destruction of the Temple" (y. Sanh. 1.1; 7.2; cf. b. Sanh. 41a; b. 'Abod. Zar. 8b); (3) the Jewish death penalty was reinstated a week after the Romans lifted the siege of Jerusalem in September AD. 66: "On the twenty-second of the month [Elul] the execution of malefactors began again" (Meg. Ta'an. 6).

4.1.2. Religious Concessions. Among concessions granted the Jews, violations of religious law were investigated and punished by the Sanhedrin (cf. Acts 4:5-23; 5:21-40; 26:10-11), but it cannot be shown that stipulations involving the death penalty were independent of Roman authority: (1) the warning inscription on Herod's Temple (CII §1400; Josephus J.W. 5.5.2 §194; Ant. 15.11.5 §417; Philo Leg. Gai. 31 §212; m. Kelim 1.8), indicating that a Gentile, even a Roman citizen, caught trespassing in the inner Temple court would be put to death, had Roman approval (Josephus J.W. 6.2.4 §126); (2) the same can be said of the death penalty prescribed for unlawful entry of a Jew, even the high priest into the Holy of Holies (Philo Leg. Gai. 39 §307); (3) the Jewish authorities surely brought Jesus bar Ananias before Albinus (Josephus J.W. 6.5.3 §§300-305) to get an execution, since they had already scourged him; (4) reiterated attempts by the Sanhedrin to extradite Paul point to an illegal murder plot not to legal competence (Acts 23:15, 20-21; 24:6-8; 25:3, 7-11), and even if capital charges were pressed in Jerusalem, it would have been before the Roman procurator Festus (Acts 25:9, 20).

4.1.3. Jewish Executions. During the period AD. 6-66 executions carried out on orders of the Sanhedrin, prima facie testimony for the court's competence, turn out to be disruptions of normal legal process: (1) burning of a priest's daughter convicted of adultery (m. Sanh. 7:2) happened during the reign of Agrippa I (AD. 41-44), as did the execution of James, brother of John (Acts 12:2), when Judea had independent status; (2) during the interval between Festus and his successor, Albinus (AD. 62), the high priest Ananus convened the Sanhedrin and had James, the Lord's brother, stoned to death (Ant. 20.9.1 §200-3), an illegal undertaking for which Ananus was deposed from office; (3) the episode of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7:53—8:11), a scene of mob violence, hardly qualifies as due process and proper sentence; (4) the stoning of Stephen, admittedly the strongest piece of evidence for the Juster-Lietzmann thesis, follows a Jewish trial (Acts 6:11-14) and exhibits required procedures (7:57-58); however, the trial was interrupted and ended without proper sentence—an act of lynch law—suggested by the death lament for Stephen (8:2), a custom forbidden in the case of legally executed offenders (m. Sanh. 6:6; Josephus Ant. 4.8.6 §202).

The theory of two (or three) Sanhedrins, a political one named in Greek sources and a religious one, the esteemed Great Sanhedrin (Beth Din) in rabbinic writings, offers a tidy solution to the legal problem: the political institution of the Gospels (synedrion), a court of priests responsible for Jesus' condemnation, is distinct from the Great Sanhedrin whose interests lay only in religious matters. The sources, however, seem to be unaware of multiple institutions, and the theory creates more difficulties than it resolves (Schürer, 2:207-8; Lohse, 863). It is more probable that a single institution, the Sanhedrin, was allowed a limited criminal jurisdiction, both to police the Temple area and to maintain Jewish Law,* whereby death sentences could be pronounced, but execution was kept strictly in Roman hands (cf. Blinzler, 165; Sherwin-White, 41-42; Catchpole, 254). The legal situation then offers little reason to doubt a Sanhedrin prosecution of Jesus which eventually led to a Roman court.

4.2. Violations of Misknaic Law. Hints of illegality in the Gospel narratives (Mt 26:59; Mk 14:59) have been fully exploited in modern inquiries where no less than twenty-seven breaches of the Jewish legal code have been alleged. How many of the procedural rules in the Mishnah tractate Sanhedrin (see Schürer, 2:225-26) applied before A.D. 70 is difficult to say; some at least are purported to be independently attested in the time of Jesus. Recent discussion has accordingly limited itself to five violations of the Mishnaic code in the trial of Jesus: (1) it was improperly convened in the high priest's house (m. Sanh. 11:2); (2) met during the night (m. Sanh. 4:1); (3) on a Sabbath* eve or feast day (m. Sanh. 4:1); and (4) reached a guilty verdict on the same day (m. Sanh. 4:1; 5:5) (5) based on inadequate grounds for blasphemy (m. Sanh. 7:5). Whether one argues that a Sadducean code was current in the days of Jesus (Blinzler) or that some aspects of the later Mishnaic law were operative (Lohse), it is unwarranted to assume that an illegal trial could not have happened; justice does not always outweigh expedience (cf. Jn 11:50).

4.2.1. Time and Place of the Sessions. Our sources disagree about the precise location of the Sanhedrin's regular assembly, but it is clearly distinct from the courtyard and palace of the high priest (Mt 26:3). The Mishnah locates it the Hall of Hewn Stone, inside the inner forecourt of the Temple (m. Sanh. 11:2; m. Mid. 5.4; cf. b. Yoma 25a), whereas according to Josephus, the boulē ("council chamber") stood outside the upper city on the western slope of the Temple Mount (Josephus J.W. 2.16.3 §344; 5.4.2 §144; 6.6.3 §354). Certainly by the time of Paul's trial, the Sanhedrin met outside the Temple because Roman soldiers, who were forbidden to enter the inner court appear in the council chamber (Acts 22:30; 23:10). The rabbinic tradition is that the chamber was moved "forty years before the destruction of the Temple" (b. Sanh. 41a; b. 'Abod. Zar. 8b). If the Sanhedrin still met within the Temple area during the time of Jesus, access may have been delayed by the fact that the gates of the Temple, only on the night of Passover, were opened at midnight (Josephus Ant. 18.2.2 §29; cf. m. Mid. 1:1, normally locked all night). This would have dictated the initial choice of the high priest's residence and explain the impression of movement and double session in the trial accounts (Jn 18:13, 24; Mk 15:1; Mt 27:1). In any event Luke 22:66 reports the morning session in the council chamber as a new location (cf. 22:54) and corresponds to the framework of the other narratives (pace Winter, 27-30).

The rule that no trials could be held on a Sabbath (Josephus Ant. 16.6.2 §163; Philo Migr. Abr. 16 §91; CD 10.18) probably also applied to festival days in Jesus' time (m. Beṣa 4.4; 5.2); further stipulations that "in capital cases they hold the trial during the daytime . . . but a verdict of conviction not until the following day" (m. Sanh. 4:1) meant also that no trial could begin on the eve of a Sabbath or of a festival day. These latter regulations, however, may date from the Tannaitic period when the Pharisees were keen to prevent miscarriages of justice (Blinzler, Catchpole). Their date notwithstanding, an exception is made for the convicted mēṣît, a seducer to idolatry or false prophet (Deut 13:1-11). In such a case the verdict was passed on the day of the trial (t. Sanh. 10.11), and based on Deuteronomy 17:13, the execution took place in Jerusalem on a feast day: "... bring them to the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem and keep them in custody until the feast and carry out the sentence on the feast" (t. Sanh. 11.7; cf. m. Sanh. 11:4). This procedure may explain the haste with which the Sanhedrin acted to have Jesus crucified on 15 Nisan (a Synoptic chronology; cf. Jeremias, 78-79); be this as it may, a strong caution should at least be entered against the notion of wholesale illegality.

4.2.2. Charge of Blasphemy. However obscure the particulars may be, the Sanhedrin eventually convicted Jesus of a specific crime: blasphemy (Mk 14:64 par. Mt 26:65). The blasphemer, "one who curses God" (Lev 24:15), was liable to death by stoning under OT Law, but again to provide a legal safeguard the rabbis formulated a rather narrow definition: "The blasphemer is only guilty if he pronounces the name of God distinctly" (m. Sanh. 7:5). Nothing uttered by Jesus in the trial records fits this strict requirement, but the term on the lips of Caiaphas had wider significance in the NT period (cf. Philo Vit. Mos. 2.37-38 §§204-6; Josephus Ant. 4.8.6 §202). Blasphemy referred to acts or words which violate God's power and majesty, a claiming of prerogatives which belong to God alone (Kilpatrick, 10-11; Juel, 103-7). The Evangelists clearly use the word with this meaning (Mk 2:7; Jn 10:33-36), and parallels occur in pagan Greek and the rabbis (t. Sanh. 1.2; b. Sanh. 38b; cf. Bickerman, 86-88). Since the blasphemy charge was broad enough to encompass several wrongs, what offense lay behind the conviction of Jesus? No single proposal put forward has won a consensus (see Catchpole, 126-48), but it seems that discrete items are linked together. We suggest that the blasphemy charge had three components: christological claims, threats against the Temple, and false prophecy, any one of which could carry a death warrant.

First, the utterances of Jesus in the trial itself were decisive: (1) an open avowal of messiahship ("I am," Mk 14:62), a claim without precedent in Judaism until Simon bar Kochba (A.D. 132-35) provoked immediate outrage; (2) Jewish messianism had embraced the concept of sonship (4QFlor 1.10-11; Pss. Sol 17:27, 36; 18:6, 8; see Son of God), but when unified in the person of Jesus with the glorious Son of man, enthroned at God's right hand (cf. Dan 7:13; Ps 110:1; Midr. Pss. 1.40 §9 [Ps. 2:7]), the tides Messiah and Son of God gave him an exalted status the Sanhedrin found intolerable. In John 19:7 the overriding complaint even to Pilate was that Jesus claimed divine sonship.

Second, blasphemous overtones were heard in the accusation that Jesus threatened to destroy and rebuild the Temple: (1) Stephen was charged with blasphemy for "speaking against this holy place," having also reportedly said "this Jesus of Nazareth will destroy this place" (Acts 6:11, 13-14), so that a threat to the Temple was tantamount to blasphemy; (2) Jesus' Temple prophecy (Mk 13:2,14; Lk 19:43-44) was probably misconstrued (Mk 14:57-59; 15:29) along the same lines of confusion reported in John 2:19-21; (3) talk of restoring the Temple also invited the messianic question (see Sanders, 77-90; Green, 276-81; Juel, 198) since in Jewish eschatology the Messiah builds a new Temple (4QFlor 1.1-7; 1 Enoch 90:28-29; 4 Ezra 9:38-10:28; Tg. Neb. Is 53:5; Tg. Neb. Zech 6:12-13).

Finally, some elements of the Gospel narratives may be traced to a false-prophet tradition: (1) two marks of a false prophet—he leads others astray (Deut 13:2-6), and he presumes to speak in the Lord's name a message which does not come true (Deut 18:22)—fit the two queries by Annas about Jesus' disciples and teaching (Jn 18:19); (2) the mockery of Jesus after the trial, "Prophesy!" (Mk 14:65), is the horseplay of guards who no longer fear his words (cf. Deut 18:22); (3) the subversion charge put before Pilate, leading the people astray (Lk 23:2, 5, 14), is stated in terms of Roman politics, but on the religious side it echoes Jewish claims that Jesus was a deceiver (Mt 27:63; Jn 7:12, 47) betraying his people with misleading words (cf. Deut 13:5-8,13; m. Sanh. 7:4; 11:1).

4.3. Roman Trial and Penal Law. A further point of dispute stresses the nature of the penalty stemming from the charge in the Roman trial. Death by crucifixion, it is objected, was exclusively a Roman mode of execution reserved for political offenders. Therefore, the sentence carried out against Jesus was not based on religious charges from the Jews. We are asked to conclude that the Gospel portrayal of a religious accusation before Pilate was impossible, indeed that the account of a previous Jewish trial was "contrived to conceal that Jesus had been condemned and executed on a charge of sedition" (Winter, 34; cf. 79, 90; Lietzmann, 258-60; Lohse, 869). The evidence of Roman trial procedures in the first century shows this to be an unwarranted deduction, and the basic premise of the argument regarding crucifixion in the province of Judea has been brought into question.

4.3.1. Trials in the Provinces. We have no formal descriptions of capital trials in the Roman provinces between Cicero's Verrines (70 B.C.) and the Letters of Pliny (c. A.D. 110). The standard exposition depends on scattered excerpts from classical jurists of the second and third centuries of the empire compiled in the Digest of Roman law (Mommsen, 234-45). Under Augustus, in order to expedite the legal process, capital trials were usually conducted by provincial governors who could grade the penalty (cf. Justinian Digest 48.19.16). This procedure, named cognitio extra ordinem or extraordinaria, by and large replaced the jury court (Sherwin-White, 13-23) which had operated within the procedures and penalties stipulated by the fixed order of law (ordo). By contrast, the governor himself heard the formal accusation so that he could investigate the case by personal inquiry (cognitio), and he was free to choose any procedure he thought fit-determine the issue, hear the evidence and prescribe the penalty—without legal restriction (extra ordinem). The earliest evidence for trial by cognitio is the fourth edict of Augustus to the province of Cyrene (7/6 B.C.) which requires that in capital cases "... the one who governs the province has the duty of conducting the investigation and rendering judgments himself . . ." (SEG 9.8; FIRA 1.68 [ET: TDGR 6:27]).

The governor Pliny provides a good example: after the famous orator Dio Chrysostom placed a statue of the Emperor Trajan near his family burial plot, he was accused by an enemy of a treasonable act. The accuser, one Flavius Archippus, petitioned Pliny for a cognitio before the judgment seat (Epp. 10.81.3); Trajan dismissed the case when Pliny, faced with a cognitio of such magnitude, wrote to ask for direction in the matter (10.82). Such trials follow a regular pattern, clearly attested in the case of Paul as well as Jesus: (1) the charges were drawn up and a formal accusation was brought by delatores, "accusers" (Mk 15:1; Lk 23:2; Jn 18:29); (2) the governor heard the case pro tribunali, "before the judgment seat" (Mt 27:19; Jn 19:13); (3) in the absence of a defense (Mt 27:14; Mk 15:5; Jn 19:10) a condono, or "guilty," verdict was certain, and some form of punishment had to be prescribed (Lk 23:15-16, 22; Jn 19:6).

4.3.2. Charge of Sedition. The first question Pilate asked Jesus in the Roman trial, "Are you the King of the Jews?" indicates a shift of charge from the religious to the political. The issue of kingship in Pilate's court would raise the alarm of sedition (Jn 19:12; cf. Josephus Ant.17.10.8 §285, on bandit "kings"), an act deserving crucifixion (Justinian Digest 48.8.3.4; 48.19.38.2). Sedition, or inciting people to rebel, came under the treason crimes headed "offense against majesty" (laesa maiestatis), which were applied to all sorts of "misconduct." During the principate, especially under Tiberius, trials for lese-majesty were exploited as a convenient means to dispose of enemies, and many far-fetched examples are found (Suetonius Tiberius 61.3; Tacitus Ann. 1.72-74; 3.49, 70; Cassius Dio Hist. 59.3.6; Pliny Epp. 10.82; Digest 48.4.5). The nature of the alleged crime and its penalty would have been obvious to Pilate, even while he harbored doubts about the guilt of Jesus. The placard which he inscribed and refused to change, "The King of the Jews" (Jn 19:19-22), shows both the fixed reason for the condemnation (a titulus normally hung on the victim or was carried before him; cf. Suetonius Caligula 32.2; Domitian 10.1; Cassius Dio Hist. 54.3.7; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 5.1.44; Josephus Ant. 14.3.1 §36), and a mocking affirmation of Jesus' claims to the chief priests.

Suggestions that Jesus was involved with a Zealot plot to overthrow the Romans are groundless (see Bammel-Moule). The Sanhedrin would also have known that a sedition charge was "a surer way of securing the death of Christ" (Smalley, 1054), and the morning session was likely occupied with recasting the indictment in acceptable terms for Pilate. The Lukan account of multiple charges, common in trials of the Flavian period (cf. Sherwin-White, 35), amounts to a political version of the blasphemy findings. The connection avowed is that Jesus held the kingly pretensions of the Jewish messiah, "saying that he himself is Christ a king" (Lk 23:2). This phrase is the crucial link between the religious and political charges and explains much of Pilate's dilemma. Even the ambiguous "Son of God" phrase to a Roman ear, when voiced by a crowd demanding that its law be respected (Jn 19:7), has fearful political implications for a governor already embroiled in the violation of Jewish customs. There is every reason to believe that the sedition alternative carried the day only because of the religious fervor behind it.

4.3.3. Penalty of Crucifixion. It is a commonplace in trial research, even to opposing sides of the debate (cf. Blinzler, 247; Winter, 96), that the Jews never practiced crucifixion as a mode of execution. The episode when Alexander Jannaeus "hung up alive" 800 Pharisees, abhorred as that "never done in Israel before" (4QpNah 1.7-8; cf. Josephus J.W. 1.4.6 §97) is taken as the exception which proves the point This consensus ought now to be revised in light of the Qumran Temple Scroll which interprets Deuteronomy 21:22-23 as crucifixion: "You shall hang him on the wood so that he dies" (11QT 64.8, 10-11). The OT ruled that after a capital offender had been executed by stoning, the cursed body was to be publicly exhibited by hanging on a tree (cf. m. Sanh. 6:4; 7:4; 9:3), but in the Scroll text hanging is clearly the cause of death. Those liable to this penalty are described in six phrases: (1) one who informs against his people, (2) betrays his people to a foreign nation, (3) does evil to his people, (4) one who commits a capital offense, (5) flees away to the Gentiles and (6) curses his people Israel (11QT 64.7, 9b-10a). Such accusations are reminiscent of those made against Jesus (Bammel 1984, 442), and although the regulation is sectarian in character, we must reckon with the wider possibility that other Jews in the first century had equated the practice of crucifixion with the law of Deuteronomy 21:23, viz., to bury the body before sunset (cf. Josephus J. W. 4.5.2 §317; t. Sank 9.7; Acts 5:30; 10:39). The Mishnaic criminal code excludes crucifixion (four methods in m. Sank. 7:1: stoning, burning, beheading and strangling), but a thesis based on the assertion that no Jews in Jesus' time would have sought his death on the cross strains the evidence (see Betz, 603-12).

5. Theological Significance.

A lamentable feature of Christian reaction to the trial of Jesus across the centuries has been an odious persecution of the Jews for putting Jesus to death. It has been maintained above that the Evangelists did not invent the fact of Jewish involvement, but the NT never says that the Jews alone, least of all every succeeding generation, were responsible for the cross. The perennial instinct to kindle anti-Semitism* by the findings of historical scholarship is deplorable in all its forms. The theological stance of the Gospels indicts us all, Jew and Gentile alike: "He was numbered with the transgressors" (Lk 22:37), yet "this man has done nothing wrong" (Lk 23:41).
TRIUMPHAL ENTRY

The formal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem at a climactic point in his life is recorded by all four Evangelists (Mt 21:1-11; Mk 11:1-11; Lk 19:28-40; Jn 12:12-19). Accordingly, the essential historicity of the portrayal of Jesus coming into Jerusalem at a time of festal celebration (perhaps on an animal) has not usually been doubted by critical scholars. But questions have been raised concerning how much those who handed on the tradition shaped the story in order to make it a vehicle for expressing the allegedly later belief of the early church that Jesus was the fulfillment of the Jewish hope for a messianic deliverer in the form of a Davidic king (see Christ; Son of David). R. Bultmann, for example, while not denying that the story has a historical core, labelled it "a Messianic legend under the influence of Zech. 9" (262), noting that the prophecy mentions the donkey, the entry and the acclamation.

1. The Form of the Triumphant Entry Accounts

2. The Triumphant Entry in the Four Gospels

3. The Historicity of the Triumphant Entry

1. The Form of the Triumphant Entry Accounts.

D. R. Catchpole has argued that the story fits the pattern of accounts in Jewish literature of "the celebratory entry to a city by a hero figure who has previously achieved his triumph" (319): (1) the achievement of victory and its corresponding status, (2) a formal entry into the city, (3) a welcome with greetings and/or acclamations as well as invocations to God, (4) entry into the Temple (if there is one) and (5) cultic activity which can be positive (sacrifice) or negative (cleansing—although this negative activity is better attested as part of [1]). Finding the basis of this pattern in the Israelite kingship ritual (1 Kings 1:32-40; Zech 9:9), Catchpole cites as evidence of its existence the stories of the victorious entries of Alexander the Great (Josephus Ant. 11.8.4-5 §§325-39;
11.8.6 §§342-45), Apollonius (2 Macc 4:21-22), Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc 4:19-25; 5:45-54; Josephus Ant. 12.7.4 §312; 12.8.5 §§34849), Jonathan (1 Macc
10:86), Simon (1 Macc 13:43-51), Antigonos (Josephus J.W. 1.3.2 §§73-74; Ant.
13.11.1 §§304-6), Marcus Agrippa (Josephus Ant. 16.2.1 §§12-15), Archelaus
(Josephus Ant. 17.8.2-9.5 §§194-239) and an imposter of Herod's son Alexander (Josephus J.W. 2.7.1-2 §§101-10; Ant. 17.12.1 §§324-28). The presence of this pattern in the story of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem, Catchpole concludes, means that the account should not be interpreted as an opening gambit in which Jesus challenges the power structure of the nation, but instead should be understood as an acknowledgment of the status Jesus has already achieved.
Catchpole's form-critical work disputes the proposal of S. G. F. Brandon that Jesus' action was "obviously calculated to cause the authorities, both Jewish and Roman, to view him and his movement as subversive" (324), revealing Jesus' sympathies with the revolutionary cause of the Zealots (see Revolutionary Movements). The historical question, rather, is whether this event indeed celebrated the "triumph" of Jesus' ministry in recognition of the kingship he had previously won, or whether this interpretive framework has been superimposed on the story at a later time after the experience of victory at Easter (see Resurrection).

2. The Triumphant Entry in the Four Gospels.

The historical question can be better addressed after a survey of the presentations of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem in each of the Gospels.

2.1. Mark. As has recently been confirmed by J. D. Kingsbury, it is clear to the reader of Mark's Gospel that Jesus enters Jerusalem as the anointed victor (Messiah) ready to lay claim to the Davidic kingship over Israel.* In Mark's account of "Jesus, Messiah, Son of God" (Mk 1:1; see Christ; Son of God), Jesus receives his divine anointing at his baptism* by John, where the heavens are torn apart and the Spirit descends upon him like a dove (Mk 1:10; cf. Is 61:1; 64:1; see Holy Spirit). With multiform allusions, the voice from heaven, "you are my Son, the Beloved; with you I am well pleased" (Mk 1:11), proclaims Jesus to be God's "anointed [Messiah]," his "king on Zion," about whom God declares, "You are my son; today I have begotten you" (Ps 2:2, 6-7); God's "only son . . . whom [he] loves" (Gen 22:2); and God's "servant ... [his] chosen, in whom [his] soul delights" (Is 42:1).

From this investiture Jesus proceeds to demonstrate the authority* of his messianic status. He does battle with Satan (set Temptation of Jesus) in the wilderness (see Mountain and Wilderness) and emerges victorious (Mk 1:12-13; cf. Is 11:1-9), having bound the "strong man" (Mk 3:27; see Demon, Devil, Satan). Coming to Galilee,* he then launches into a ministry of preaching, calling disciples,* teaching, and performing mighty works of healing* and exorcism, all of which testify to his authority (Mk 1:22, 27; 2:10; 3:15; 6:7; cf. Mk 11:27-33; Is 61:1-3). Although the people who encounter Jesus only gradually become aware of who he is, a process highlighted by the secrecy motif (see Mark, Gospel of), the revelations coming from the heavenly realm (Mk
1:24-25, 34; 3:11-12; 5:7) confirm that Jesus is acting as the anointed Son of God, contending for his position of regency in God's kingdom (see Kingdom of God). Peter's confession "You are the Messiah" (Mk 8:29), in response to Jesus' query about his identity, is therefore an appropriate, if not exhaustive, evaluation of Jesus' significance, reinforced by the subsequent revelation on the mountain of the Transfiguration* (Mk 9:2-8). After Jesus' extended journey "on the way" to his passion in Jerusalem (Mk 8:27—10:52), with its sobering teaching on the cost of discipleship* and the necessity for the Son of man (see Son of Man) to suffer (Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34, 45), Jesus' messianic dignity is reiterated, as blind Bartimaeus cries out, "Son of David, have mercy on me!" (Mk 10:47-48; cf. Pss. Sol. 17:21).

It is as a messianic claimant to the throne of David, then, that Jesus enters Jerusalem, and Mark's account of this event is replete with allusions that evoke images of the celebration of a royal triumph (Mk 11:1-11). From a location near the Mount of Olives (Mk 11:1), the scene of the Lord's eschatological advent (Zech 14:4; cf. Josephus J.W. 2.13.5 §262; Ant. 20.8.6 §169; see Apocalyptic Teaching), Jesus exercises kingly authority by requisitioning an animal for transport with the claim "its master has need" (Mk 11:1-3; cf. 1 Sam 8:10-11,17). The animal is identified as a "colt" (Mk 11:2, 4-5, 7), using the same term found in the LXX to identify the donkey's foal of the entering king of Jerusalem in Zechariah 9:9 (cf. Gen. Rab 75 [48c]; 98 [62a]; b. Sanh. 98a; 99a; b. Ber. 56b; cf. 1 Kings 1:35) and of the coming one who holds the scepter of Judah in Genesis 49:10-11 (where the foal is "bound" to a vine; cf. 4QPBless; Justin Apol. 32.6). This animal is also one "on which no one has ever sat" (Mk 11:2), symbolizing its sacredness for royal use (m. Sanh. 2:5; cf. 1 Sam 6:7; or perhaps a reference to the "new colt" of Zech 9:9 LXX).

As Jesus mounts the animal and begins his entry into the city, many who accompany him pay homage by their actions and by their words. Reminiscent of the respect shown to King Jehu, the people spread their cloaks on the road (Mk 11:8; cf. 2 Kings 9:13; Josephus Ant. 9.6.2 §111; cf. Yal. Exod 2:15 [1.168]; Acts Pil. 2), as well as leafy branches cut from the field (cf. Tg. Esth 8:15; the term is hapax legomenon and may refer to mattresses as padding for the steep descent [POxy 3.520.10] or to the festal lulab of Tabernacles [m. Sukk. 3:8-9, 11-15; 4:1-2, 4] also used during Hanukkah [1 Macc 13:51; 2 Macc 10:6-7]; see Feasts).

As the procession (Mk 11:9a; cf. Josephus J.W. 1.33.9 §673; Ant. 7.1.6 §40) continues, the people shout antiphonally in acclamation: "Hosanna! Blessed is the one who comes in the name of the Lord! Blessed is the coming kingdom of our father David! Hosanna in the highest!” (Mk 11:9b-10). In the first half of this chiastically balanced strophe, Jesus is greeted as a pilgrim entering the city in a familiar chant from the festal Hallel psalms (Ps 118:25-26 [117:25-26 LXX]; cf. Midr. Ps 118 §22; m. Sukk. 3:9; 4:1, 5, 8; b. Sukk. 27b; b. Pesah. 119a; Tg. Ps 118:22-29). This is the welcome, moreover, that would also be given to the eschatological deliverer, as is attested in a saying of Jesus from Q* (Mt 23:39 par. Lk 13:35). In the second half of the strophe, Jesus' messianic status is again brought into focus as he is hailed as the one who will establish the Davidic kingship over Israel, even though the phrase "kingdom of our father David" has no direct Jewish parallels (cf. Acts 4:25; 14th of the Eighteen Benedictions in the Palestinian resension).

Jesus' entry into the city in Mark's account, however, does not fulfill any Jewish nationalistic hopes "to destroy the unrighteous rulers, to purge Jerusalem from Gentiles" (Pss. Sol. 17:21-46). Jesus, rather, brings judgment* upon unfruitful Israel (Mk 11:12-14, 20-21; cf. Hos 9:10-17) which has turned God's "house of prayer for all nations" into a "den of brigands" (Mk 11:15-19; cf. Is 56:7; Jer 7:11; see Temple Cleansing). As Mark concludes his story, Jesus maintains his claim to kingship (Mk 14:61-62; 15:2), but over the universal realm of the "Son of God" (Mk 15:39; cf. Mk 12:6, 35-37).

2.2. Matthew. Matthew's account of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem follows Mark, enhancing the theme of the royal entry of the Davidic king and heightening the impact of the event upon the city. Mark's allusion to Zechariah 9:9 in his reference to the "colt" is made explicit in Matthew through an editorial comment that introduces a quotation of this prophecy (combined with Is 62:11) with a fulfillment formula (Mt 21:4-5), and in the words of the prophecy the reader is advised that "the king" of "Zion" has come to claim his city (cf. Mt 5:35). The people who take part in the event, moreover, have a greater awareness of Jesus' link to the Davidic line than the bystanders in Mark, as they shout "Hosanna to the son of David!" (Mt 21:9; cf. Mk 11:10). And the city is set in an uproar as "a very large crowd" spreads their cloaks and cuts branches from the trees, shouting their acclamation and literally shaking the city like an earthquake (Mt 21:8-10).

The theme of triumph, however, is muted in Matthew's version of the story. In his citation of Zechariah 9:9, Matthew omits the phrase "righteous and delivered [or victorious; LXX: saving] is he," allowing the accent to fall on the phrase "humble and mounted upon a donkey and upon a colt, the foal of a pack animal"
(Mt 21:5). He seems also to have a special interest in demonstrating that the animal is indeed a donkey and not a beast of conquest (cf. Pss. Sol. 17:33), in that at the critical point in the citation he switches from quoting the LXX ("humble and mounted upon a pack animal and a new colt") to quoting the MT ("humble and riding upon a [male] donkey and upon a [male] donkey, the foal of [female] donkeys"). Matthew also, for emphasis, refers to the "donkey" at three points in the narrative (Mt 21:2, 5, 7). In a possible allusion to Jesus' future passion (cf. Mt 23:37-39), Matthew adds that as Jesus enters the city he is acknowledged as "the prophet" (Mt 21:11; see Prophets, Prophecy), as well as the "son of David."

This stress on the humble arrival of the Davidic king is reinforced by the context, in which the "Son of David" performs acts of mercy. The "Son of David," for Matthew, is one who heals (Mt 9:27-34; 12:22-30; 15:21-28; 20:29-34) and who upon entering Jerusalem clears (rather than judges) the Temple so that the outcasts, the blind and the lame (cf. 2 Kgdms 5:8 LXX; m. Hag. 1:1; lQSa 2:3-10; 11QTemp 45:12-14), can be welcomed and cured of their infirmities (Mt 21:12-17; see Temple Cleansing). Matthew's "Son of David" is thus the "servant" (Mt 12:15-21; cf. Is 42:1-4; see Servant of Yahweh) and the "coming one" (Mt 11:2-6; cf. Is 29:18-19; 35:5-6; 61:1) who practices the divine injunction "I desire mercy and not sacrifice" (Hos 6:6; cf. Mt 9:10-13; 12:5-7; cf. 'Abot R Nat. 4). The contrast with the pharisaic "son of David," who exhibits "strength" to "destroy" and "smash," is obvious (Pss. Sol. 17:21-46).

One curious feature of Matthew's narrative has puzzled interpreters—the introduction of two animals, upon which the disciples spread their cloaks and Jesus apparently rides (Mt 21:2-3,5,7). It seems unlikely that Matthew, whose knowledge of Hebrew is evident, has misunderstood the parallelism in Zechariah 9:9 and forced a literal fulfillment upon the story, and the suggestion that this is an instance of Matthew's interest in the validity of two witnesses (Mt 8:28; 9:27; 18:16, 19; 20:30; 21:1; 26:60) seems far-fetched (pace Num 22:28-30). Since Matthew tailors his OT citations to fit his narrative tradition (see Old Testament in the Gospels), rather than vice versa, a better proposal is that he had an independent tradition of two animals—a donkey's foal and its mother (cf. Jn 12:14; Gen 49:11; b. B. Bat. 5:3)—which may also explain his omission of the Markan reference to a colt "on which no one has ever sat" (Mk 11:2). Matthew's statement that Jesus sat "on [or over] them" (Mt 21:7) may refer to the cloaks on the animals (the immediate antecedent), with the implication that Jesus sits on the cloaks of one animal (Origen), or it may be a textual error (some MSS have the singular "on it"), but less likely is the suggestion that it is a reference to an oriental throne supported by the two animals (Clement of Alexandria).

2.3. Luke. As in the case of Matthew, Luke's account of the entry follows Mark, bringing greater prominence to Jesus' royal dignity and the nature of his triumph. After a lengthy journey in which Jesus has "set his face to go to Jerusalem" (Lk 9:51—18:34), which is his destiny as the "coming one" (Lk 13:31-35, the center of the chiastically constructed travel narrative), Jesus approaches the city via Jericho, where, as in Mark, he encounters a blind man who entreats him with the messianic tide "Son of David" (Lk 18:35-43). Before Jesus begins his entry into the city, however, Luke inserts two pericopes to reinforce the theme that Jesus is indeed the Davidic "Savior, who is the Messiah, the Lord" (Lk 2:11): a story of the salvation* of Zacchaeus, a lost son of Abraham* (Lk 19:1-10; cf. Ezek 34:16), and an allegorical parable* of a nobleman who is summoned to a distant country to receive royal power and returns to judge the wicked citizens of his own country who refuse to accept his kingship (Lk 19:11-28; cf. Acts 1:11; 3:20-21; 17:31). With this theme established, Jesus makes his way to the Mount of Olives, a location repeated twice for emphasis (Lk 19:29, 37; cf. Zech 14:4), from which he will make his royal "descent" on the colt into the city and the Temple. As he approaches the place of descent on the colt, the whole multitude of disciples openly acknowledges his triumph, praising God "joyfully with a loud voice for all the deeds of power that they had seen" (Lk 19:37). In Luke's version of the subsequent acclamation, Jesus' kingship is explicitly recognized, as the disciples alter the pilgrim welcome of Psalm 118:26 and shout, "Blessed is the king who comes in the name of the Lord!" (Lk 19:38; cf. Jn 12:13), and the Hebrew cry for help in Mark ("Hosanna!") is replaced by the exclamation "Peace in heaven, and glory in the highest!" (Lk 19:38; contrast Lk 2:14). The jubilation of the occasion cannot be contained, for "if these were silent, the stones would shout out" (Lk 19:40).

According to Luke the purpose of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem is to lay claim on his Temple (cf. Lk 2:49), cleansing it to prepare it as a place for his teaching (Lk 19:45-48; 20:1; 21:37-38; Temple Cleansing). His coming, therefore, is not as an earthly king, but is, in fact, no less than a divine visitation (Lk 19:44; cf. Lk 1:68, 78; 7:16) of the Lord (Lk 19:31, 34, but cf. 19:33; Mai 3:1). And even when the significance of this event goes unrecognized and Jesus suffers the fate of the prophets (Lk 19:41-44), his claim on the Temple remains in force, as the Temple, after his resurrection,* becomes the place for the proclamation of the power of the "name of Jesus" (Acts 3:1—4:22; cf. 1 Kings 8:27-30), a name which ultimately can transcend the limitations of this particular location (cf. Acts 7:39-50; 8:12; 10:48; 16:18). The realm of Jesus' kingship in Luke, accordingly, is beyond the sphere of earthly kingdoms (cf. Acts 1:6-8), and hence is not a political threat to the reigning powers (cf. Lk 23:3-4, 47; cf. Acts 25:8, 25). The peace that Jesus as king establishes is "peace in heaven" (Lk 19:38, 42), which will be poured out through his Holy Spirit upon those who call upon his name (cf. Acts 2:1-42; 10:34-43).

2.4. John. The account of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem in the Fourth Gospel is strikingly similar to the accounts in the Synoptic tradition. A crowd greets Jesus with branches of palm trees (Jn 12:13; cf. Mk 11:8; Mt 21:8) and shouts the festal welcome of Psalm 118:25-26, retaining the Hebrew cry "Hosanna!" but following the LXX for the rest of the refrain, "Blessed is the one who comes in the name of the Lord!" (Jn 12:13; cf. Mk 11:10). Jesus is then acclaimed as "the King of Israel" (Jn 12:13-14; cf. Lk 19:38), and sits on a "young donkey" (Jn 12:14; cf. Mk 11:7; Mt 21:7; Lk 19:35), which is interpreted through an editorial remark as the fulfillment of Zechariah 9:9 (Jn 12:14-15; cf. Mt 21:4-5).

Significant differences in the Johannine account, however, indicate an independent tradition of the same event. Jesus is not escorted by a procession of disciples and well-wishers who erupt into spontaneous celebration along the way (Mk 11:8-10; Mt 21:8-9; Lk 19:36-38), but is greeted by a reception party from Jerusalem that has come prepared for an ovation (Jn 12:12-13). These greeters, moreover, bring the branches of palm trees with them from the city and presumably hold them in their hands (Jn 12:13), instead of strewing them along the pathway as Jesus descends into the city (Mk 11:8; Mt 21:8). In further divergence from the Synoptic tradition, the animal upon which Jesus rides is labelled a "young donkey" (Jn 12:14), rather than a "colt" (Mk 11:2, 4-5, 7; Lk 19:30, 33, 35) or simply a "donkey" (Mt 21:2, 5, 7), and Jesus does not requisition the animal in a provocative act that initiates the celebration (Mk 11:1-7; Mt 21:1-7; Lk 19:28-35) but finds it and sits on it in response to the welcome of the crowd from the city (Jn 12:14). Finally, the text of Zechariah 9:9, as quoted in the Johannine account (Jn 12:15), follows neither the LXX nor the form of the text in Matthew (Mt 21:4-5), and may be conflated with another OT text (e.g., Zeph 3:16).

On the surface of John's narrative the story of the entry is a celebration of the triumph of the messianic "King of Israel" (Jn 12:13; cf. Jn 1:49). Jesus has just performed a sign (Jn 12:18) that is the culmination of his mighty deeds on earth (Jn 11:47)—the raising of Lazarus* of Bethany from the dead (Jn 11:144)—and this has caused a flurry of enthusiasm as well as catalyzed the opposition among the Jews (Jn 11:45-54). As the festival of the Passover approaches, bringing crowds to Jerusalem (Jn 11:55-57), Jesus returns to Bethany, the scene of his great victory, to visit the home of Lazarus (Jn 12:1-8), and the news soon spreads to Jerusalem (Jn 12:9-11). Hearing that Jesus is coming to Jerusalem, a delegation sets out to greet him, carrying branches of palm trees in a manner evocative of the celebration of the Maccabaean triumph over Antiochus IV Epiphanes (Jn 12:12-13; cf. 1 Macc 13:51; 2 Macc 10:7; cf. Suetonius Gaius Caligula 32). To the acclamation that he is the "King of Israel" (Jn 12:13), Jesus responds by finding and sitting on a "young donkey," which the Johannine author interprets as a fulfillment of a prophecy concerning the coming king of Zion (Jn 12:15-16; Zech 9:9). As the crowd continues to exult in the miracle* at Bethany, the opposition grumbles, "Look, the world has gone after him!" (Jn 12:17-19).

The framework of the entry narrative, however, indicates that the Fourth Evangelist intends this event to have a deeper significance than this surface reading would suggest.Hints earlier in the Gospel indicate that Jesus' claim to kingship is not to be interpreted politically (Jn 1:49-51; 6:14-15), and if the phrase "Do not be afraid, daughter of Zion" in the citation of Zechariah 9:9 with which the Johannine Evangelist interprets the entry (Jn 12:15) is an allusion to Zephaniah 3:14-16, the implication is that the "King of Israel" is no earthly leader, but indeed "the Lord ... in your midst" (cf. Jn 8:24,28,58). This is consistent with an editorial remark (an external prolepsis; cf. Jn 2:22; 20:9) appended to the entry, in which the acclamation of Jesus' kingship confirmed by prophecy is linked to his glorification (Jn 12:16; see Glory), a reference to his coming sacrificial death (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection (cf. Jn 7:39; 12:23, 28; 13:31-32; 17:1, 4-5) when he will be lifted up to draw all people to himself (cf. Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34). As the account of the entry concludes with a reference to the crowd "that had been with him when he called Lazarus out of the tomb and raised him from the dead" (Jn 12:17-18; cf. Jn 11:1-53; 12:1-2, 9-11), the theme of Jesus' future conquest over death is further reinforced. In the midst of all of these contextual clues, therefore, Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem, following upon his anointing* for burial (see Burial of Jesus) in the home of Lazarus (Jn 12:1-8), becomes a proleptic celebration of the victory of Easter. And thus the stage is set for the irony of Jesus' trial, when rejected "King of the Jews" (Jn 18:33-39; 19:3-22) establishes a kingdom which is "not of this world" (Jn 18:36).

3. The Historicity of the Triumphant Entry.

The survey of the presentations of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem in each of the Gospels demonstrates that the significance of the event has been amplified through subsequent interpretation by the early church (see Tradition Criticism). The observation of this phenomenon has led some critical scholars to question, in particular, the historicity of the messianic features of the story. Noting that the account falls into two parts, the acquisition of the animal (Mk 11:1-7; cf. Jn 12:14) and the festal entry into the city (Mk 11:8-10; cf. Jn 12:12-13), these critics have proposed that the story has grown from a simple narrative about Jesus' entry into Jerusalem during festival time (probably on foot) to a messianic legend that includes a royal animal (through the influence of Zech 9:9) procured by supernatural means (cf. Mk 14:12-16; 1 Sam 10:2-10; 1 Kings 17:8-16). Since there allegedly is no evidence that the original event attracted the attention of the authorities or that Jesus' followers at this time had recognized him as a Messiah who had achieved a triumph, it is said that the messianic interpretation of the event must reflect the confession of the early church after the victory of Easter.

Such skepticism, however, is unwarranted. The story of the acquisition of the animal, as J. D. M. Derrett has shown, exhibits the common procedure of a ruler (or rabbi) procuring transportation, using the royal right of impressment (angaria, cf. 1 Sam 8:16) and also follows the Jewish law on borrowing (Ex 22:14-15); thus it should not be categorized as a legend. Jesus' decision to ride into the city on an animal, moreover, is a "startling and ostentatious reversal of the normal constraint which would have obliged him to enter on foot" (Harvey 129; cf. m. Hag. 1:1; b. Hag. ba; m. Ber. 9.5), and since the messianic interpretation of Zechariah 9:9 is not attested in Judaism* until the fourth century A.D., it seems likely that the memory of this provocative act has its origin in the historical event. The activities of the bystanders, spreading (or waving) branches along the way and shouting an acclamation from Psalm 118:25-26, also have a historical ring, reflecting the practices of the festivals of Passover (m. Pesah. 5:7; 10:5-7), Tabernacles (m. Sukk. 3-4) and Hanukkah (1 Macc 13:51; 2 Macc 10:6-7; see Feasts). Furthermore, the Hebrew cry "Hosanna!" (which is not transliterated in the LXX of Ps 117:25), although preserved in the eucharistic liturgy of the early church (Did. 10:6), may be a historical reminiscence.

It is also reasonable to suggest that the original event indeed celebrated the arrival of a triumphant king. Although the accounts of the entry do not mention a reaction to this event by the authorities, the charge "King of the Jews" brought against Jesus at his trial (Mk 15:2, 26; see Trial of Jesus) may indicate that this event raised suspicions about his activities (Sanders). This would not be unusual, since R A. Horsley and J. S. Hanson have demonstrated that charismatic leaders among the Jewish peasants of the first century A.D., even without a direct claim to Davidic or royal lineage, received the appellation of "king" from time to time in the hope that they might be the one who would liberate the people from foreign oppression (cf. Josephus Ant. 17.10.5-8 §§271-85). Jesus' activity of proclaiming the kingdom of God, teaching (see Teacher) with authority, performing mighty works and calling disciples would certainly have raised the expectation that he might be such a liberator (cf. Mt 11:2-6 par. Lk 7:18-23). But by entering Jerusalem on a donkey, Jesus met this expectation in a way that was consistent with the tenor of his ministry—his kingship would be one of humility and service* rather than political conquest (Zech 9:9; cf. Mt 20:28 par. Mk 10:45 and Lk 22:27).

Truth vocabulary plays a small role in the Synoptic Gospels, though the language and the concept of truth are certainly present. The Gospel of John most frequently uses the language of truth, and there it undergoes significant theological development. John uses truth vocabulary in its conventional sense of veracity/genuineness/opposite of falsehood; but he also develops his own particular meaning, where truth refers to the reality of God* the Father revealed in Jesus the Son (see Son of God). This truth can only be apprehended by disciples* through faith.* Revelation is at the heart of John's usage—revelation, not as the unveiling of knowledge, but as the unveiling of Christ* who is both the messenger and the message. Consequently, since truth is personal, acquiring truth is personal. It is not learned as much as it is accepted, with all its life-transforming implications, when one comes into a relationship with Jesus.

1. Synoptic Gospels

2. The Gospel of John

Truth vocabulary occurs eighteen times in the Synoptic Gospels: (1) truth (alēthēs; Mt 22:16; Mk 5:33; 12:14, 32; Lk 4:25; 20:21; 22:59); (2) true/truthful (alēthēs; Mt 22:16; Mk 12:14); (3) truly (alēthōs; Mt 14:33; 26:73; 27:54; Mk 14:70; 15:39; Lk 9:27; 12:44; 21:3); (4) true/ genuine (alēthinōs; Lk 16:11). The language is used in a straightforward manner to refer to honesty as opposed to falsehood, such as when the woman with the issue of blood comes forward to speak "the whole truth" (Mk 5:33) or the Pharisees* admit that Jesus "honestly teaches the way of God" (Mt 2:16; Mk 12:14; Lk 20:21). The adverb alēthos (truly) is used as the Greek equivalent of the Semitic amen, asserting the validity or authority of a statement.

Only Luke's Gospel places truth language on the lips of Jesus (as either alethōs or ep'алētheias; 4:25; 9:27; 12:44; 21:3), although in each instance it is merely Luke's rendition of an amen saying (cf. Mk 8:9; Mt 24:47; Mk 12:43; see Amen). This absence of truth vocabulary in Jesus' teaching does not mean that the Synoptic Jesus is disinterested in the value of truthfulness. The concept is present even when the words are absent Jesus' criticism of the Jewish leaders' hypocrisy (Mt 23:2-3, 23-24; Lk 11:46; see Hypocrite), as well as the personal consistency between his own words and actions—eventually culminating in the cross—makes Jesus' concern in the Synoptics for honesty and integrity clear.

John's usage is much more complex. Both his frequent and peculiar use of the language provide ample opportunity for John to construct his own context for meaning. Thus the interpreter must sort through those instances where words are used with their conventional sense, and occurrences where John imports his own sense for truth. The challenge of understanding such multiple meanings of words (polyseme) requires that the reader exercise discipline in reading neither more nor less into the passage than is warranted by the context.

2.1. Alēthōs. The word generally translated "truly" in the NT occurs seven times in John (1:47; 4:42; 6:14; 7:26, 40; 8:31; 17:8). In all but one instance it means "indeed" or "really." It is generally used as a simple adverb, and in this way differs from its common Synoptic usage. One exception is found in John 1:47 where it used as a synonym for alēthinos, identifying Nathanael as a "true" or "genuine" Israelite.

2.2. Alēthinos. This adjective occurs nine times in John (1:9; 4:23, 37; 6:32; 7:28; 8:16; 15:1; 17:3; 19:35) and is used with two different senses. First it refers to something which is "authentic" or "genuine." Thus Jesus is the "true light" (1:9); the Father is looking for "real worshippers" (4:23); and eternal life* is found by knowing the "only true God" (17:3). Two other instances fit this category, but with a distinctly metaphorical significance, when Jesus describes himself as the "true bread*" and the "true vine*" (6:32; 15:1). Second, alēthinos is used as a synonym for the adjective alēthēs ("true"; 4:37; 7:28; 8:16; 19:35). Fundamentally, these are assertions that something or someone is "valid," "reliable" or "is not being false." But at this point we also begin to make contact with the additional significance attached to this vocabulary by John. Because the Father is both "true" and the one who sent Jesus into the world (7:28), and because Jesus comes only to reveal the Father, Jesus' teaching is "true" (8:16). The sense of this language begins to move beyond the borders of mere opposition to falsehood and unfolds as expanded meaning where truth refers to the eternal, heavenly reality of God now brought to the world in the incarnate Jesus.

2.3. Alēthēs. This adjective, usually translated as "true," occurs thirteen times in John's Gospel (3:33; 4:18; 5:31, 32; 6:55; 7:18; 8:13, 14, 17, 26; 10:41; 19:35; 21:24) and is used with three distinct senses. First in the majority of cases John uses this word to refer to something which is "valid" or "reliable" (4:18; 5:31, 32; 8:13, 14, 17; 10:41; 19:35; 21:24). Second, in one instance alēthēs appears as a synonym for alēthinos (6:55). This is another metaphorical usage where Jesus' flesh is called "real" bread (see 2.2. above). Third, in three instances alēthēs contributes to the Johannine theology of divine truth. Briefly, all those who receive Christ's revelation (3:3) acknowledge through their faith that he is the true revealer (7:18) of the true God (8:26). This concept comes into its own with John's use of alētheia discussed below.

2.4. Alētheia. The noun alētheia ("truth") occurs twenty-one times in John (1:14,17; 3:21; 4:23,24; 5:33; 8:32, 30, 44, 45, 46; 14:6, 17; 15:26; 16:7, 13; 17:17,19; 18:37 [twice], 38). Within the Johannine context the word has been so thoroughly infused with John's view of heavenly reality revealed in Christ that even in those few instances where its primary reference is to truth, as opposed to falsehood (5:33; 8:44; 16:7), it nevertheless evokes clear implications of the deeper significance of truth's revelation in Christ.

To understand John's usage one should look to the beginning of the Gospel where Jesus is said to be "full of grace and truth" (1:14). Exodus 34:6 is clearly the relevant OT background, not because of the linguistic arguments linking charitos kai alētheias ("grace and truth") with hesed uf'met ("steadfast love and faithfulness"), but because of the context which compares the incarnation of the Logos* with God's revelation to Moses* on Mt. Sinai (Jn 1:17-18). The vocabulary differences between Exodus 34 and John 1 (the LXX of Ex 34:6 translates hesed uf'met as polueleos kai alēthinos ("compassionate and true"), not chantos kai alēthems; but cf. Dodd) indicate that we should allow John's usage to determine the meaning of each word This explains why attempts to equate alētheia with the OT concept of "faithfulness" ("'met, commonly translated "truth") do not work in John. This conclusion is based on the observation of John's own context and usage and has nothing to do with preconceptions about Hebrew versus Greek concepts of truth. J. Barr and A. Thiselton have shown that the common distinction made between Greek and Hebrew meanings for truth simply does not work linguistically. John's usage is not "Greek," it is "Johannine," and as we shall see it is not incompatible with an OT/Hebrew background.

What, then, is the point of John's connection with Exodus 34? Revelation. The incarnation of God in the Logos is presented as the supreme disclosure of the Lord who revealed himself to Moses in the giving of the Law at Sinai (1:17). Jesus shows us God as he really is. This assertion sets the stage for John's use of "truth." Contrary to Greek background, truth is personal, not merely intellectual; truth is acquired through the revelation of God, not through mental application; truth is not abstract, but has been individually revealed in history. It is also reminiscent of the Jewish view of both Torah and Wisdom.*

2.4.1. God Is Truth. As the revealer of truth, Jesus only teaches what the Father has given to him (3:33; 8:40; 18:37). The Father is the truth. His eternal reality is ultimate reality. There are no external standards to evaluate his reality; according to John, his truth can only be accepted through faith in Jesus as the one who comes down from heaven. Thus "the time has now come" when true worshippers will worship* the Father only as revealed by Christ (4:23-24). However, as ultimate reality, God the Father is the only standard by which all truth or falsehood, light or darkness are measured in this world* (5:33; 8:31-32, 42-47).

2.4.2. Jesus Is Both the Messenger and the Message of Truth. No one but Jesus can reveal truth because only he has been personally sent into the world by God. His authority* is rooted in his commission (3:17; 4:34; 5:24, 30; 6:29; 8:25; 17:18; 20:21). But Jesus is more than a mere courier. By perfectly testifying to the Father, he also testifies to himself (8:18), because he and his Father are one (10:30). To know Jesus is to know the Father (14:9). Consequently, Jesus can say that he, too, is the truth (14:6). Of course, this is commensurate with the prologue's claim that the Logos is God (1:1, 18). John presents Jesus as the final revelation of God, who is himself God; the one against whom all claims to meaning and reality are to be evaluated.

2.4.3. The Spirit of Truth. For the Spirit (set Holy Spirit) to be called the Spirit of truth is basically to assert three things. First, like Jesus, the Spirit is sent from the Father (who is the truth, 15:26)—the "Spirit of truth" is the "Spirit of God." Second, the Spirit continues the mission of Jesus (14:17), revealing to the world both the Father and the Son (who is also the truth). Third, the Spirit will lead disciples into the truth by further instructing them in the knowledge of the Father and the Son (16:13). The Spirit becomes the "advocate" (an alternative for the "counselor") of heavenly reality in this world, advancing God's case, as it were, and exposing, or at least condemning, all counterfeit claims to truth (16:5-11).

2.4.4. Doing the Truth. At times John may seem to imply that certain individuals have an innate affinity for the truth, that those who listen to Jesus do so because they were already "on the side of truth" (18:37). While on the surface this may appear to credit humankind with an inherent sympathy for heavenly reality, it actually reveals John's strong views on divine election and underscores the fact that truth is only apprehended through revelation. God's sheep have been marked from eternity so that they always "hear his voice" and come to him (10:14, 27); yet because of God's election they are considered to be his people long before they ever hear the words of Jesus (10:16; 11:52). In this way the revelation of truth becomes key to the cosmic dualism (above/below, heaven/earth, light/darkness) so characteristic of John's Gospel. By virtue of their election, disciples have received this revelation through faith in Jesus. Consequently, they become "sanctified by the truth" and set apart from the world (17:15-19), children of light who have nothing to do with the present system of darkness ruled by the father of lies (3:21; 8:4247; see Demon, Devil, Satan).

This sovereign, divine transformation is the root of Johannine ethics. As children of God, disciples "live by the truth" (3:21), which is the same as "remaining in Jesus' teaching" (8:32). Genuinely knowing divine reality will inevitably be reflected in the way disciples live; they will obey everything that Jesus has taught them (14:15, 23; 15:10, 14; see Teacher). The disciple's life of obedience is the only true life because it is aligned with God (see Discipleship).

For example, disciples now worship the Father in Spirit and in truth (4:23-24). This does not direct disciples inwardly to examine motivations or sincerity; rather, it orients them outwardly, directing them to offer worship that is commensurate with who God truly is: The divine Spirit approached only through the incarnate Christ.

TYPOLOGY

The NT makes several comparisons between various OT and NT events, individuals and institutions. These comparisons are often expressed, sometimes explicitly, in terms of typology and constitute major components of christology and ecclesiology. But typology offers more than comparisons between specific events and details; it establishes important links between and within the testaments themselves. Typology therefore has played a significant role in the very formation of the biblical canon.* By means of typology, as well as by means of prophetic fulfillment the NT writers present Jesus and the church* as the continuation and completion of the OT.

1. Terminology, Meaning and Context
The biblical concept of typology is based upon the word typos, which literally means "impression," "mark" (Jn 20:25) or "image" (Acts 7:43), and metaphorically usually means "example" or "model" (Phil 3:17; 1 Thess 1:7; 2 Thess 3:9; 1 Tim 4:12; Tit 2:7; cf. hypotypōsis in 1 Tim 1:16; 2 Tim 1:13) or even "warning" (1 Cor 10:6, cf. typikos in 1 Cor 10:11). In hermeneutical contexts this word means something like "pattern" or "figure" (Heb 8:5). Although the hermeneutical usage of this word, and the related word antitypos ("copy" or "counterpart"; Heb 9:24; 1 Pet 3:21), is found only in the Pauline and General Epistles, important typologies are also present in the Gospels.

Typology is not unique to the NT. Within the OT itself typological comparisons are made. The Exodus story becomes a type of salvation* in Isaiah (Is 40:3-5; 43:16-24; 49:8-13), the wilderness rebellion (Ex 17:1-7; Num 20:1-13) is presented in Psalm 95:7-11 as an example of hardness of heart (see Hardness of Heart) that Israel* is to avoid, and Melchizedek, priest of Salem (Gen 14:18), is cited in Psalm 110:4 as a biblical example of the priestly role of the king.

Typology is not to be confused with allegory. Allegorical interpretation assigns, usually rather arbitrarily, so-called deeper meanings to biblical stories and their various details. The actual history of the biblical story is unimportant to this method of interpretation. But in typological interpretation history is essential. It is believed that the original historical event is the "type" and the later corresponding event is the "antitype" that parallels, perhaps fulfills and sometimes even transcends it.

2. Typology and First-Century Exegesis.

Because biblical exegesis in the early Jewish and Christian period was founded on the belief that Scripture contained the ever-relevant will of God, every effort was made to bring its teaching to bear upon the contemporary world and the concerns of the believing community. This effort lies behind all interpretive methods: allegorization, midrash,* pesher and typology. Allegorization discovers morals and theological symbols and truths from various details of Scripture; pesher seeks to unlock the prophetic mysteries hidden in Scripture and midrash seeks to update Torah and clarify obscurities and problems in Scripture. But typology represents the effort to coordinate the past and present (and future) according to the major events, persons and institutions of Scripture.
Despite their differences, there is significant overlap between these methods of interpretation. For example, to some extent all four involve a searching of Scripture (midrash); all four find symbolic meaning that transcends the letter of the text (allegory); all four recognize the presence of mystery and hidden truth within the text (pesher); and all four believe that to some extent the present and future are foreshadowed by biblical history (typology). To paraphrase B. D. Chilton (138), the real difference among these methods is less a matter of method than what Scripture is essentially taken to be.

Emphasis on the unity of Scripture and history is the distinctive of typological interpretation. What God has done in the past (as presented in Scripture), he continues to do in the present (or will do in the future). Recent events or future events that are interpreted as salvific are frequently compared to major OT events of salvation. Such comparison does at least two things: (1) It lends credibility to the belief that the newer events are indeed part of the divine plan; and (2) it enables the interpreter to grasp more fully the theological significance of the newer events. Typological interpretation makes it possible for later communities of faith to discern the continuing activity of God in history. It is likely that these ideas lay behind the typologies that Jesus developed.

Typological interpretation is not limited to the NT; it is also found in rabbinical writings (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Just as Israel prevailed over Amalek, as long as Moses was able to hold his hands high, so Israel has prospered when it has obeyed the Law* of Moses (Mek. Amalek §1 [on Ex 17:11]). The messianic age is often compared with the Exodus, a comparison frequently developed by typological interpretation. For example, when Messiah comes manna will once again be provided in the wilderness (Mek., Vayassa' §4 [on Ex 16:13] and §6 [on Ex 16:33]).

3. Jesus.

Most christological typologies apparently derive from Jesus himself, though the Evangelists themselves sought in various ways to extend the typologies or develop new ones.

3.1. The Prophet. At the Transfiguration* the voice from heaven* enjoins the disciples,* "Hear him" (Mk 9:7 par ), an injunction that echoes Deuteronomy 18:15-18 and the promise that some day God would raise up a prophet* like Moses.* The point of the passage is that Jesus is this anticipated prophet (cf. Mk 8:28 par.; Lk 7:16). Unlike prophetic fulfillment, however, typology looks for broader points of comparison. Consequently, it comes as no surprise that the Transfiguration episode at many points parallels the Sinai theophany ("six days," Mk 9:2; Ex 24:16; presence of Moses, Mk 9:4; Ex 24:1-18; mountain setting, Mk 9:2; Ex 24:12 [see Mountain and Wilderness]; three companions, Mk 9:2; Ex 24:9 [cf. Deut 19:15]; changed face, Mk 9:3 [cf. Mt 17:2; Lk 9:29]; Ex 34:29-30; cloud, Mk 9:7; Ex 24:15-16 [cf. 2 Macc 2:8]; heavenly voice, Mk 9:7; Ex 24:16; fear, Mk 9:6; Ex 34:30). The point of these parallels is that once again a major act of salvation is being revealed.

The prophet typology is also supplemented by parallels with and allusions to the Elijah-Elisha tradition (see Elijah and Elisha). Jesus is the prophet whose requirements for discipleship* are more demanding than those of Elijah (Lk 9:61-62; 1 Kings 19:19-21), but who is also more compassionate and long-suffering (11 4:25-27; 9:52-56; 2 Kings 1:9-12). The Lukan portrait of the ascension* also reflects Elijah typology (Lk 24:51; Acts 1:9; 3:21; 2 Kings 2:1, 11). In reference to prophetic tradition in general, Jesus' anticipation of death in Jerusalem (Mt 23:37 par.) reflects typological thinking.

3.2. Son of David. Throughout the Gospels Jesus is called "Son of David."* Although typology is clearly at work, literal descent from David is claimed (Mt 1:20; Lk 1:27; 2:4; Rom 1:3). Matthew's infancy narrative emphasizes Jesus' Davidic kingship. This is seen especially in the genealogy* (Mt 1:1, 6, 17); the citation of Isaiah 7:14 (Mt 1:23), an oracle originally addressed to King Ahaz; the visit of the Magi (Mt 2:2, "Where is he who was born king of the Jews?"); the citation of Micah 5:2, part of a larger oracle (Mic 5:2-6) that promised a king like David; and King Herod's interest and fear (Ml 2:3-18). The Davidic typology is also seen in Jesus' ministry. The blind man cries out to Jesus as "Son of David" (Mk 10:47-48). Jesus justifies his action and the action of his disciples by appeal to the action of David and his men (Mk 2:25-26; see Abiathar). If David can violate a cultic law (1 Sam 21:1-6), then surely can Jesus, who is greater than David (indeed, is "Lord of the Sabbath," Mk 2:28). Finally, Jesus was hailed as Son of David when he entered Jerusalem (Mt 21:9; see Triumphal Entry).

The most significant comparison with David is that drawn by Jesus himself. Jesus' quotation of Psalm 110:1 and the point that he makes about David's son was meant to draw a comparison between himself and Israel's famous king (Mk 12:35-37 par.) and not simply to pose an exegetical riddle. It is likely that Jesus implied that, although he is like David, in that he is "David's son," he is superior to David, in that he is "David's Lord" (cf. Mt 12:42 par. where Jesus declares that one [i.e., he himself] "greater than Solomon is here"). Jesus is not only David's son; he is his Lord. Behind this claim lies typological thinking. David is the type (of Messiah), Jesus the antitype.

3.3. Son of Man. It is commonly asserted that the "Son of man"* sayings in the Gospels fall into two disparate categories: the Son of man who identifies with and suffers for humanity, and the Son of man who comes in judgment* (with the latter possibly authentic and the former probably not). It is more likely, however, that these sayings form a typological unity founded on Daniel 7 (and not 1 Enoch 37-71 and 4 Ezra 13 as is often assumed) and that they do indeed derive from Jesus. (There is little evidence that these sayings or the tide "Son of man" were of special interest to the early church. Hence the likelihood that they derive from Jesus.) Jesus probably saw himself as the fulfillment of the prophesied Son of man of Daniel 7, who stands with the saints and, after initial opposition and defeat, overcomes and receives the kingdom. Jesus' sayings about rejection, suffering and death (Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:33; 14:21; see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection) reflect the first aspect (an aspect enriched by allusions to the Suffering Servant; see 3.4. below), while the sayings that speak of vindication (Mk 9:9; 13:26; 14:62) reflect the second.

3.4. Servant of the Lord. Four times in Acts, where Isaianic and Davidic themes are combined, Jesus is called the "Servant" (pais; cf. Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27, 30; see Servant of Yahweh). Although in the Gospels Jesus is never so designated, Servant typology nevertheless appears to be present. Four times Second Isaiah's Servant Songs are quoted and applied to Jesus. Jesus' healing ministry fulfills Isaiah 53:4 (Mt 8:14-17). Jesus' injunctions to silence fulfill Isaiah 42:1-4 (Mt 12:15-21; cf. Is 53:7-8 in Acts 8:32-33). His impending arrest fulfills Isaiah 53:12 (Lk 22:37). Finally, the unbelief of the people fulfills Isaiah 53:1 (Jn 12:37-38). It is noteworthy that in every instance these Isaianic passages are cited as "fulfilled." There are also important allusions to the Servant Songs. The righteous sufferer predicts his rejection and death (Mk 9:12; Is 53:3). When accused he remains silent (Mk 14:60-61; Is 53:7; cf. Acts 8:32-33). He is beaten (Mk 14:65; Is 50:6). He intercedes for sinners* (Is 53:11-12; Lk 23:34, 42-43). He dies in the company of criminals (Mk 15:27; Is 53:9). His death is on behalf of many (Mk 10:45; 14:24; Is 53:11-12), and he is buried in a rich man's tomb (Mt 27:57-60; Is 53:9; see Burial of Jesus).

3.5. Second Adam. Luke's arrangement of Jesus' genealogy* (Lk 3:23-38; cf. Mt 1:2-16) and its juxtaposition with the temptation narrative (Lk 4:1-13; see Temptation of Jesus) constitute an Adam-Christ typology. Unlike Paul's similar typology (Rom 5:12-21), with which the Evangelist may or may not have been familiar, the point of comparison is not so much between the first and second Adam, but the First and Second Son of God. According to Luke, Adam and Jesus were "sons of God" by virtue of their being directly created by God's Spirit (Gen 2:7; Lk 1:35; see Holy Spirit). In order to heighten the comparison, Luke has his genealogy conclude (not begin) with "Adam, the Son of God" (Lk 3:38). This conclusion contrasts deliberately with the opening question of the temptation narrative, "If you are the Son of God" (Lk 4:3). Unlike the first Son of God who fell when tempted by Satan (see Demon, Devil, Satan), Jesus, the second Son of God, does not Here again Jesus is presented in typological fashion as the antitype that parallels and in this case clearly transcends the type.

3.6. Righteous Sufferer. The function of the psalms of lament in the Gospels, especially in the passion narratives, reflects a righteous sufferer typology. Jesus is betrayed by his friends (Mk 14:18; Ps 41:9; 55:12-14). He is sorrowful (Mk 14:34; Ps 43:5). He is falsely accused (Mk 14:56 par.; Ps 27:12). Pilate (see Pontius Pilate) washes his hands of Jesus' death (Mt 27:24; Ps 26:6). Jesus' clothes are divided among his enemies (Mk 15:24; Ps 22:18). He is mocked (Mk 15:29-31; Ps 22:7-8; 109:25). He thirsts (Jn 19:28; Ps 69:21). He is given vinegar to drink (Mk 15:36; Ps 69:21). He is abandoned by God (Mk 15:34; Ps 22:1). His friends do not stand by him (Lk 23:49; Ps 38:11), and in death he commits his soul to God (Lk 23:46; Ps 31:5). Allusions to the Servant Songs of Second Isaiah add further details to this typology (see 3.4. above; Death of Jesus).

3.7. Jonah. According to Matthew 12:39-41 (cf. Lk 11:16, 29-32), the only sign that was to be given to Jesus' generation was the "sign of Jonah": "For just as Jonah was in the belly of the great fish three days and three nights, so shall the Son of man be in the heart of the earth three days and three nights" (v 40; cf. Jon 1:17). The sign to which Jesus alludes is his death, burial and resurrection "on the third day" (1 Cor 15:4; cf. Mk 9:32; 10:34). There are two parts to this typological interpretation: (1) Jesus' death, burial and resurrection correspond to the experience of Jonah; and (2) Jesus, like Jonah (Jon 3:4-5), calls for repentance. Again, Jesus understands himself not simply like Jonah but as "something greater than Jonah" (Mt 12:41). Because the people of Nineveh responded to Jonah's preaching, whose only sign was his remarkable deliverance from the great fish, the people of Jesus' generation are without excuse, for Jesus himself is greater than Jonah, and his attesting sign, his resurrection from the dead, is also greater.

3.8. Rejected Stone. Before the time of Jesus the stone idea had already taken on typological meaning. The "stone," laid by God, could be a stone of stumbling (Is 8:14) or a stone of faith (Is 28:16). The rejected stone of Psalm 118:22-23 was understood to be Israel, who, although rejected by the nations, would some day enjoy a favored place. Finally, Daniel 2:45, where the stone has a messianic nuance, describes the destruction of Israel's enemies. At the conclusion of his parable* of the wicked vineyard tenants (Mk 12:1-9) Jesus quotes Psalm 118:22-23 ("The stone which the builders rejected has become the cornerstone") and applies it to himself (Mk 12:10-11). Assuming that the charge later brought against Jesus ("We heard him say, 'I shall destroy this Temple made with hands and in three days I shall build another without hands'" [Mk 14:58]) approximates something Jesus actually said (cf. Jn 2:19), it is quite possible that Jesus thought of himself as the foundation of a new community of faith* and worship* Luke's version of the rejected stone saying is unique ("Everyone who falls upon that stone will be broken; upon whomever it should fall, he will be crushed" [Lk 20:18]), probably reflecting parts of Daniel 2:45 and Isaiah 8:14, and adds an element of judgment This typology is foundational to the early community's self-understanding (see 4. below).

3.9. High Priest. Although by no means certain, the high priest (see Priest and Priesthood) typology of Hebrews (cf. Heb 4—7) may derive in part from certain priestly prerogatives that Jesus had assumed. The most significant of these were his declarations of the forgiveness* of sins (Mk 2:5-10; Lk 7:48). Perhaps his cleansing pronouncements (Mk 1:41; see Clean and Unclean), his action in the Temple (Mk 11:15-17; see Cleansing of the Temple) and his intercessory prayers* (Lk 22:32, "Peter, I have prayed for you"; 23:34, "Father, forgive them"), including the so-called high-priestly prayer (Jn 17:9, 20), also contributed to this later typology of Jesus as the ultimate high priest.

3.10. Sacrifice. The sacrifice typology in Hebrews (cf. Heb 7—10) may have its roots in an early interpretation of the significance of Jesus' death, possibly an interpretation that derives from Jesus' anticipation and understanding of his death. If authentic, the statements found in Mark 10:45 and 14:24 would support this notion (see Ransom Saying). It has also been suggested that John 1:29 ("Behold, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world") may reflect Jewish tradition of the aqēdat yishaq ("the binding of Isaac") and the promise given to Abraham* that God will provide a lamb (see Lamb of God). Such a typology understands Jesus' death as the ultimate sacrifice which need never be repeated (see Church).

The earliest ecclesiology also derives from Jesus and in large measure is expressed with significant typologies (see Church).

4.1. The "Twelve." Jesus' appointment of twelve apostles* (Mk 3:14), clearly an allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, in all probability symbolized reconstituted Israel. The twelve apostles will also function as Israel's rulers in the kingdom (perhaps as new tribal patriarchs), "sitting on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Mt 19:28; cf. Lk 22:28-30; Ps 122:3-5; Dan 7:9). Recognizing the importance of this symbolism, Luke does not neglect to tell us of the replacement of the betrayer (Acts 1:15-26). The Twelve also function as emissaries of their king in carrying out their mission of evangelism (Mt 10:1-42; 28:18-20; Lk 24:45-49; Acts 1:6-8; see Kingdom of God).

4.2. The People of the New Covenant. The new covenant idea in the Gospels reflects Passover traditions and the promise of the "new covenant" of Jeremiah 31:31-34. The new covenant is explicitly alluded to in the words of the Lord's Supper*: "This is my blood of the [new] covenant which is poured out for many" (Mk 14:24 and par.). Jewish haggadic tradition believed that the blood shed at the first Passover was the blood that established the covenant later proclaimed at Sinai (Tg. Zech 9:11; Mek. Pish §5 [on Ex 12:6]). Just as the blood of the lambs at the first Passover delivered Israel from judgment and made the old covenant possible, so too will the shed blood of Jesus deliver the people of God and establish the new covenant.

4.3. The Spiritual Temple. Jesus' prophetic demonstration in the Temple* (Mk 11:15-17 par.), his implicit criticism of and threat against the ruling priests (Mk 12:1-11; cf. Tg. Isa 5:1-7), his explicit pronouncement of the Temple's impending destruction (Mk 13:2: "not one stone will be left upon another"), the accusation brought against Jesus at his trial before the Sanhedrin* (Mk 14:58: "I shall destroy this Temple made with hands and in three days I shall build another without hands") and his personal comparison with the Temple (Mt 12:6: "Something greater than the Temple is here"; cf. Jn 2:19-21) form pan of a spiritual Temple typology. In these various statements one is given the impression that Jesus has replaced Jerusalem's Temple with himself and the community of those who believe in him. This idea, however, may not have been unique to Jesus, for the people of Qumran may have held to a similar idea (4QFIor 1:6: "a sanctuary of men"). 1 Peter 2:4-8 reflects a later and more explicit expression of this typology.

VINE, FRUIT OF THE VINE

The word "vine" (ampelos) is used six times in the Gospels. In the Synoptics it occurs at the Last Supper* in Jesus' reference to wine* as "the fruit of the vine" (to genēnatos tēs ampelou, lit., "the produce of the vine," Mt 26:29; Mk 14:25; Lk 22:18). In John it appears three times in Jesus' description of himself as the true vine (hē ampēlos hē alectronē, 15:1, 4-5). In the accounts of the Last Supper the phrase "the fruit of the vine" is only used once in each Synoptic Gospel. The more usual reference is to "the cup (of blessing)" (Mt 26:27; Mk 14:23; Lk 22:17, 20; cf. 1 Cor 10:16; 11:25). The common word for wine (oinos) is not used at all.

1. Background.

It is sometimes suggested on the basis of texts such as Numbers 6:4; Deuteronomy 22:9; Isaiah 32:12 and Habakkuk 3:17 that the phrase "the fruit of the vine" is an expression used for wine in the Old Testament. In none of these passages, however, does the exact phrase "the fruit of the vine" occur, nor is there explicit reference to wine. The LXX of Numbers 6:4 interprets the unusual Hebrew miggepen hayayin (lit, "from the vine of the wine") as referring explicitly to wine but the use of this same expression in Judges 13:14 shows that it refers to something other than wine. The LXX of Isaiah 32:12 comes the closest (ampelou genēnatos) but should be translated "fruitful vine" (cf MT: geplen pořiyâ).

While our phrase is not in the OT, it was very familiar in Jesus' day, due to its frequent liturgical usage. It occurs in the Mishnah in a section concerning the appropriate blessings for various forms of fruit: "What Benediction do they say over fruits? Over the fruit of trees a man says, '[Blessed art thou . . . ] who createst the fruit of the tree,' except over wine, for over wine a man says'... who createst the fruit of the vine' [p'ri haggepen]" (m. Ber. 6:1, Danby). There was debate over whether this blessing was only for drinking-wine (i.e., wine that had been mixed with water) or all wine (m. Ber. 7:5; t. Ber. 4:3). If this debate goes back to the time of Jesus, it would raise the question of whether he mixed the water before the blessing, but not which blessing he used; the phrase "fruit of the vine" indicates he used the blessing for wine. Later, p'ri haggepen is the way of referring to the blessing over the cup (b. Pesah. 103a). It can even be considered as the Great Qîddûš (consecration), "for all blessings [of Qîddûš] we first say '... who createst the fruit of the vine' " (b. Pesah. 106a). This phrase in the Gospels confirms that the language in these later Jewish sources is itself early.

Thus, when Jesus refers to wine as "the fruit of the vine" he uses language associated with prayer.* Such language is especially fitting for the vow he is taking since wine is a sign of God's blessing (e.g., Gen 27:28, 37; Joel 2:24) and gift of joy (Ps 104:15), and he will now abstain until the coming of the kingdom, God's ultimate blessing and gift of joy (see Kingdom of God).

John's use of ampetlos also occurs in the context of the Last Supper. Indeed, the passage on the vine in John 15 serves as a meditation on "the fruit of the vine" and the associated cup in the Synoptics since they are each concerned with the common eucharistic theme of sharing in Christ (Barrett Brown).

The symbols in John's Gospel, including vine, "are drawn from everyday life, but derive their significance from the rich associations they have acquired in the OT and apocalyptic* literature" (Culpepper). Vine (gepen) is used many times in the OT to represent Israel* (Ps 80:8, 14; Jer 2:21; 6:9; 8:13; Ezek 15:1-8; 17:6-8; 19:10-14; Hos 10:1; 14:7; cf. 2 Esdr 5:23, vinea), as is the associated image of the vineyard (kerem, Is 3:14; 5:1-7; Jer 12:10). The vine/vineyard is the people of God, planted and cultivated by God for his delight and the produce it should yield.

Most of these texts include the theme of God's judgment* against Israel; the vine has not proved fruitful in that Israel has been unfaithful. The same use of these images is continued in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 20:1-16; 21:2846; Mk 12:1-12; Lk 20:9-19; 13:6-9). The image of the vine is thus almost always associated with the contrast between God's ideal for his people and their falling short of it.

With such associations attaching to this image, Jesus' claim to be the "true" vine is very dramatic. This image, as with all of the symbols in John, is used for the "exploration of Jesus' identity and the responses to him" (Culpepper). Jesus is the "real" vine, the vine that is the fullness of that which is only partial or even false in other vines. Jesus, the completely obedient Son, embodies what Israel was meant to be. This image expresses Jesus' own perfect sonship and contrasts it with the faithlessness of the Jews who were rejecting him, a theme clearly present in the context (Jn 15:18—16:4a).

As the image is developed in John 15:1-17 emphasis is placed on the relation between Jesus and his disciples,* some of whom remain and others of whom are cast out Jesus does not call himself the stalk but rather the vine, that is, the whole plant Since the disciples are a part of the plant only as they remain in him, this image contributes to a key theme in John that believers are one with God in Christ (17:20-23, cf. the image of the body in Paul and texts such as Acts 9:5 and Eph 1:23). As the image is developed in 15:1-17, it is clear that as the disciples remain in Jesus, the true vine, they are that faithful, fruitful vine/vineyard that God was looking for in Israel.

The vine image is used in 15:1-17 to develop such important aspects of discipleship* as love,* faith* remaining (see Abiding) and obedience, topics further developed in 1 John. Indeed, the parallels with 1 John are strong enough to convince some scholars that it is "absolutely necessary" to assign 15:1-17 to the same life situation as 1 John (Segovia).

Thus the thought conveyed through this image in John is very rich, adding dimensions to an already well-used Old Testament image. In turn it seems to have influenced not only Christian thought but also other traditions, in particular the Mandaean religion (Behm).

WATER

The arid climate of Palestine and the absence of major rivers for agriculture gave a unique value to water in its culture. When Moses* described this land to the Israelites he had to explain that it did not have a river like Egypt's Nile, but that it "drinks water from heaven" (Deut 11:11). The Jordan River has a constant flow but is inaccessible to the central mountains. And it has only been recently that Israeli engineers have succeeded in pumping water from the Sea of Galilee (see Galilee) into the rest of the country.

In antiquity all life in Israel depended on rainfall which fell sporadically from mid-October through mid-March. Even though the coastal plain could boast 15-20 inches of rain per year—and the mountains around Jerusalem even more (20-25 inches)—drought was a constant threat (Gen 26:1; Acts 11:28). Thus, springs and wells were a commonplace feature of life (Gen 21:30; Jn 4:11-12). Water could even be stored in open pools (Jn 5:2-7) or cisterns (Jer 2:13). But despite these systems, everyone knew the quality of "living water" or running water which brimmed with refreshment.

In the Gospels "water" (hydōr) occurs thirty-nine times. These include references to the Sea of Galilee where Peter walks on the water (Mt 14:28), swine who rush headlong into the lake (Mt 8:32) and the disciples'* boat which fills in the storm before Jesus exerts his authority (11 8:23-25). In the Middle East water is also the primary means of refreshment. Feet were washed as a sign of hospitality (Lk 7:44; Jn 13:5). Jesus even illustrates generosity by describing the offer of a cup of cold water to a stranger (Mt 10:42; Mk 9:41).
This interest and respect for water led to its symbolic and ritual use. Hand washing was observed before and after meals (Mk 7:2-23). Ritual bathing was well known in Judaism* as was baptism,* which washed not just the body, but symbolically cleansed the soul (see Clean and Unclean). This is illustrated well at the Dead Sea Community of Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls) which constructed an elaborate system of ritual baths. These have also been found at Masada and in the south wall excavations of the Jerusalem Temple * Worshippers in Jerusalem would no doubt bathe as they approached the Temple staircase. John the Baptist's (see john the Baptist) call "repent and be baptized" could thus be translated "repent and immerse yourself." Jesus is thus baptized in water (Mt 3:11; Mk 1:8; Lk 3:16; Jn 1:26) to hallmark the righteousness (see Justice, Righteousness) and purity which the kingdom of God will demand (see Kingdom of God).

If water symbolized life,* cleansing, refreshment and renewal, it comes as no surprise to learn that it symbolized the Holy Spirit* (Is 44:3-4; Ezek 36:25-26). This is why the Bible describes the Spirit as "poured out" (Joel 2:28-29; Acts 2:17; 10:45) and believers as being "filled" (Lk 1:15, 41). In the eschatological vision described by Zechariah 14, Jerusalem itself would give birth to a mighty spring of water which would create two rivers, one flowing west to the Mediterranean, the other flowing east to the Dead Sea. In the NT era rabbinic interpreters viewed this effluence as a symbol of the Spirit which would flow in abundance in the messianic age (see Eschatology).

The Fourth Gospel knows this theological symbolism well and uses it fully to express the new gift of life brought by Christ. John employs hydṓr twenty-one times (compared with Matthew seven times, Mark five times and Luke six times). In addition to John's account of Jesus' baptism (1:26-34), seven other passages introduce unique uses of water: Jesus' miracle* of water and wine* at Cana (2:1-11), the challenge to Nicodemus (3:1-15), Jesus' offer of living water to the Samaritan* woman* (4:7-42), the lame man at the pool of Bethesda (5:1-18), Jesus' announcement at Tabernacles (7:37-39; see Feasts), the washing of the disciples' feet (13:1-20), and the blood and water from Jesus' side (19:34).

In john water sometimes represents the old institutions of Judaism which require complete transformation (Samaria, Cana, Bethesda). These cannot be ignored (i.e., Nicodemus must be reborn "in water and Spirit"), but in each instance they must be changed. Ritual water becomes wine, well water becomes living or running water. Above all, for John water is a frequent metaphor for the Spirit (see 7:39). It symbolizes the spiritual renewal promised in the OT prophets and offered in Christ. This living water is flowing within Christ (7:37-38) who becomes a renewing spring from whom we are invited to drink (4:13-14). At his death (see Death of Jesus), his Spirit is released—this water is poured forth (19:34)—and the fulfillment of Jewish eschatological hope begins. No doubt within the theology of the Fourth Gospel, Jesus' Tabernacles discourse is at the heart of this water imagery. Here in a season of threatening drought when the prayer for autumn rain is heard and the eschatological rivers of Zechariah 14 are symbolized, Jesus announces that he is the source of the promise and its fulfillment. He is the fountain from which the Holy Spirit may be obtained.

WINE

The fermented juice of the grape and other fruits. Wine was an important drink in the ancient world, and it figures significantly in the imagery of Jesus' parables* and proclamation in the Gospels.

1. Terminology and Types.

The main words for wine are the Hebrew yayin, the Aramaic hr\textsuperscript{2}mar (6 times: Ezra 6:9; 7:22; Dan 5:1-2, 4, 23), and Greek oinos. Other Hebrew terms include sofe' (Is 1:22; Hos 4:18; Nahum 1:10) and hemer (Deut 32:14; Is 27:2). The main words for new wine are Hebrew t\textsuperscript{î}rōš (Is 65:8; Hos 9:2; Joel 2:24; Mic 6:15; Hab 1:11; Zech 9:17) and Greek oinos (LXX), oinos neos (Mt 9:17; Mk 2:22; Lk 5:37-39) and gleukos (Acts 2:13). A poetic synonym of tîrōš is 'āsîs (Song 8:2; Joel 1:5; 3[4]:18; Amos 9:13). All wine mentioned in the Bible is fermented grape juice with an alcohol content. No non-fermented drink was called wine.

New wine is wine from the most recent harvest while old wine is wine of a previous year's harvest (m. B. Bat. 6.3). Of the two, old wine was preferred because it was sweeter and stronger (Sir 9:10; Lk 5:39). At Qumran new wine (tîrōš) was their normal drink (1QS 6:4-6; 1QSa 2:17-18, 20; 1QH 10:24). New wine was fermented, as references to its ability to cause intoxication indicate (Is 49:26; Hos 4:11; Acts 2:13; cf. Judg 9:13), but it was not fermented as long as other wine (Joel 2:24), or barely more than grape juice (Is 65:8; Mic 6:15). The LXX usually translates tîrōš as oinos, and the latter was definitely fermented.

Strong drink (Heb šēḵār, Gk sikera) was a fermented beverage not made from the grapes but from barley and was more akin to beer (Prov 20:1; Is 24:9). The word is related to šāḵar, "to be or become drunk" (Gen 9:21; Is 29:9; Jer 25:27). Strong drink was definitely intoxicating (Is 28:7-8; 29:9; cf. 1 Sam 1:15). With the exception of Numbers 28:7, where it is used as an older term for wine, strong drink is always coupled with wine. The pair "wine and strong drink" occurs in contexts that warn against forbid or denigrate their use (Lev 10:9; Num 6:3; Deut 29:6; Judg 13:4, 7, 14; 1 Sam 1:15; Prov 20:1; 31:4, 6; Is 5:11, 22; 24:9; 28:7; 29:9; 56:12; Mic 2:11; Lk 1:15; cf. Deut 14:26).

Synonyms for wine are the blood of the grape (Gen 49:11; Deut 32:14; Sir 39:26; 50:15), fruit of the vine* (Mk 14:25 par.; cf. Is 32:12) or the cup (Mk 14:22-23 par.; 1 Cor 11:25). Wine is explicitly attested to be typically red (Prov 23:31). Other indications of color are the red discoloring of the clothing of winetreaders (Is 63:2-3; cf. Rev 14:20), the poetic synonym for wine as "the blood of grapes" (cf. Gen 49:11-12) and the analogy of wine as blood at the Lord's Supper (cf. Mk 14:23-24 par; 1 Cor 11:25).

Wine could also be made from pomegranates (Song 8:2), raisins (b. B. Bat. 97b), apples, dates, honey, herbs and figs. However, wine from grapes predominated. Wine was also often classified by its color or age, or by the region of its origin. The wine of Helbon (Ezek 27:18) and the wine of Lebanon (Hos 14:7[8]) were well known.

Wine could also be mixed with spices (Song 8:2; cf. Ps 75:8 [9]; Prov 9:2, 5; 23:30), balsam, honey and pepper, or oil and garum (b. 'Abod. Zar. 30a). Jesus was offered wine mixed with myrrh while dying on the cross (Mt 27:34 par. Mk 15:23).

2. Production.

To produce wine the grapes were usually stomped in winepresses (Num 18:27; Judg 6:11; 7:25; Job 24:11; Is 16:10; 63:3; Joel 3[4]:13; Zech 14:10). These presses were usually stone (cf. Is 5:2), but could also be constructed of a pit in the ground coated with plaster and covered with pitch (cf. Mt 21:33; Mk 12:1) or of wood or pottery coated with pitch. The stone press usually consisted of two rectangular rock-hewn pits, one higher than the other and connected with a channel. Presses with three or four pits have also been discovered. As the juice was expressed in the upper, wider, shallower pit (Job 24:11; Is 16:10; 63:1-3; Jer 25:30; 48:33; Joel 3[4]:13; Mic 6:15), it flowed through a channel into the lower, smaller, deeper fermenting compartment(s), leaving the lees or dregs of the grapes in the upper pit.
After four to six days the expressed juice was drawn off and placed in stone jars lined with pitch (called amphorae in Greece) (Jer 13:12; 48:11) or in whole tanned goatskins in which the apertures where the legs and tail were cut off had been sealed (1 Sam 1:24; 10:3; 16:20; 25:18; 2 Sam 16:1; Job 32:18-19; Mk 2:22 par.). Once the wine was in the skin the neck was tied off. As the wine fermented and released CO, the skin expanded (cf. Job 32:19). Fermentation begun in the press continued in the containers for two to four months.

Old wineskins could not be reused to store new wine because they had already expanded to their limit, and the expansion required in the fermentation of new wine would burst them. This is the source of the imagery in Jesus' saying about the wineskins (Mt 9:17 par. Mk 2:22 par. Lk 5:37-39).

The lees left in the upper pit were also pressed of whatever juice remained, thus creating a second-quality wine. This could be achieved by piling stones or planks on the husks, anchoring a press beam in the wall on one end, weighting it on the other and pressing out the remaining juice. Wine on the lees (Heb ṣe*mārim, Is 25:6; cf. Ps 75:8[9]; Jer 48:11; cf. Zeph 1:12) was wine that had matured in the container into which it had been poured and was thus resting on the particles of foreign matter that had settled out of the wine and fallen to the bottom of the container. Before drinking, wine was often strained through a linen cloth in order to remove lees, insects and other foreign matter (cf. Is 25:6; m. Šabb. 20.1-2). This practice lay behind Jesus' rebuke of the Pharisees* that they strained out a gnat but let a camel remain in the wine (Mt 23:24).

3. Use of Wine.

Wine was consumed at daily meals (Gen 14:18; Judg 19:19; 1 Sam 16:20; 2 Chron 11:11; Is 55:1; Dan 1:5; Lk 7:33-34). It was customary in Greek, Roman, Jewish and early Christian cultures to mix wine (2 Macc 15:39; m. Ber. 7:5; 8:2; m. 'Abod. Zar. 5:5; b. Šabb. 77a), usually with water (Is 1:22; cf. Ps 75:8[9]; Prov 9:2, 5; Is 65:11). The ratio of water to wine varied anywhere from twenty to one, averaging three to one as noted in ancient references (see Stein). Wine mixed with water acted as a purifier and made the water safe to drink (2 Macc 15:39; cf. 1 Tim 5:23).

Wine used at the Last Supper was probably mixed three parts water to one part wine. Wine began to be used in the Passover celebration in Hellenistic times was mixed three to one (b. Pesah 108b) and, as indicated in the Synoptic Gospels, the Last Supper* was a Passover meal. According to the church fathers, wine then used in the Lord's Supper was mixed (Justin Martyr Apol. 1.67; Hippolytus Apos. Trad. 23.1; Clement of Alexandria Paed. 2.2), and was so even in the original (Cyprian Ep. 62.2.11.13).

Jesus appropriated wine as an element of the Lord's Supper (Mt 26:27-29 par. Mk 14:23-25 par. Lk 22:20). As the "blood of the grape" wine symbolized his blood poured out as the blood of the Pascal lamb slaughtered for the redemption of humankind. Wine was the table drink used in fellowship meals to affirm Jesus' continued presence, anticipating the messianic banquet (Lk 22:17-18; see Table Fellowship).

Wine could also be used for medicinal purposes. Wine mixed with myrrh or gall was a drug. By offering this to Jesus the soldiers were trying to ease his pain (Mt 27:34; Mk 15:23; cf. Prov 31:6; b. Sanh. 43a). Wine and oil were used by the Good Samaritan to dress the wounds of the beaten man (Lk 10:34). Paul advises Timothy to take a little wine to help his digestion (1 Tim 5:23). The Talmud states that wine is the greatest of all medicines (b. B. Bat. 58b).

The ancients thought that wine was especially appreciated by the gods (Deut 32:37-38; Judg 9:13) and so wine was often a part of offerings to the gods (Deut 32:37-38; Is57:6; 65:11; Jer 7:18; 19:13). In the Israelite cult wine was poured out as a libation in the sacrifices of petition, thanksgiving and expiation (Ex 29:38-42; Num 15:2-19; 28:14; Lev 23:13; Hos 9:4; cf. Gen 35:14; Num 28:7). In ancient Israel priests were not to drink wine when ministering in the Temple* (Lev 10:9; Ezek 44:21).

Wine is usually associated with feasting and celebration (Esther 1:7-9; Is 25:6; Dan 5:1; Sir 31:31; cf. Is 22:13). It was used at coronations (1 Chron 12:39-40) and at weddings (Jn 2:1-11). In Hebrew the word for feasting or banquet (mišteh) derives from the word for drinking (šāṭāh) (Gen 21:8; Judg 14:10; 1 Sam 25:36; 2 Sam 3:20).

A great feast celebrated in the presence of God is common to the prophetic and apocalyptic imagery of later Judaism (Is 25:6; 1 Enoch 62:14; 2 Enoch 42:5) and anticipates the messianic heavenly banquet mentioned in Jesus' teaching (Mk 8:11; Mt 26:29 par. Mk 14:25; Lk 13:29-30). This feast is anticipated in the parables of the marriage feast (Mt 22:1-14; Lk 14:16-24) and the great banquet Wine was a natural element in such feasts (Is 25:6).

Wine is used metaphorically in both testaments, particularly in the prophetic. Commonplace are the metaphors of God as the vinedresser and Israel as the vine* (Ps 80[79]:8-13; Is 5:1-7; Jer 2:21; Hos 10:1) or Jesus as the vine (Jn 15:1-11). God, or an agent of God, treading the winepress is a metaphor for divine judgment (Is 63:2-3; Lam 1:15; Joel 3[4]:13; Rev 14:19-20; 19:15). God's cup of judgment is also a metaphor of judgment (Ps 75:8[9]; Is 51:17, 22; Jer 25:15-16, 27-28; 49:12; Lam 4:21; Ezek 23:31-35; Hab 2:16; Rev 14:10; 16:19). In Rev 14:8 wine is a metaphor for worldly passion.

4. The Biblical Attitude toward Wine.

Both OT and NT view wine drinking favorably. Abundant wine was considered a sign of blessing and prosperity from God (Gen 27:28, 37; 49:11-12; Deut 7:13; Ps 104:15; Prov 31:6; Eccles 9:7; Joel 2:24; 3:18; Amos 9:13-14; Is 55:1; Zech 10:7) as was a season of good wine production (Jer 13:12; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13-14). Wine was also considered a source of joy* (Judg 9:13; 2 Sam 13:28; Esther 1:10; Ps 104:15; Eccles 2:3; 9:7; 10:19; Is 24:11; Zech 10:7; Sir 31:27-28), one of the good things created for people (Sir 39:25-26). Conversely the lack of wine was a symbol of judgment* and calamity (Deut 28:30; Is 16:10; 24:11; 65:21; Jer 48:33; Joel 1:5; Amos 5:11; Mic 6:15; Zeph 1:13). In the Judeo-Christian tradition, complete abstinence from drinking was not the norm but the exception for reasons of strict religious purity. Daniel and his friends abstained from the king's wine, probably because it was somehow involved in the pagan cult and/or drinking it would be in violation of Jewish dietary laws (Dan 1:8-16). The Rechabites (Jer 35:1-19) also abstained from wine as part of their rejection of the urban culture for the more ancient desert nomad lifestyle that originally characterized Israel. Abstinence from wine, strong drink or any produce of the vine was the norm for the Nazirites as part of their vows (Num 6:1-4; Judg 13:4-5, 7, 14; cf. Amos 2:11-12). John the Baptist* abstained from drinking wine and may have been a Nazirite (Mt 11:18 par. Lk 7:33). This is strongly implied by the angel's announcement to his father, Zechariah, "he shall drink no wine nor strong drink" (Lk 1:15).

Jesus upheld the popular attitude toward wine. He drank wine (Mt 11:18-19 par. Lk 7:33-34; Mt 26:29; Lk 22:18) and permitted its use in festivities like the wedding of Cana (Jn 2:1-11). Jesus even used the imagery of wine to describe his teaching as "new wine" (Mt 9:17 par. Mk 2:22 par. Lk 5:37-39). The case for abstinence cannot be built from what the NT says of wine. Abstinence was not an issue in the early church, and there is no direct prohibition of the use of wine in the NT. However, as in the OT, drunkenness and excessive use of wine is forbidden. Moderation is the watchword (cf. Sir 31:25-30). The use of wine is dependent upon the conscience and the sensitivities of others. It is not to be indulged in if it will lead others to drink against their conscience (Rom 14:19-21; cf. Rom 15:1-3; 1 Cor 8:1-12; 10:23-11:1; Phil 2:4).

5. Drunkenness.

Drunkenness (Heb šikārôn [Jer 13:13; Ezek 23:33]; Gk ἁμή [Lk 21:34; Rom 13:13; Gal 5:21], oinophlygia [1 Pet 4:3]) was a widespread vice in the Ancient Near East. Drunkenness is portrayed negatively in the OT and Jewish tradition, particularly in the prophets. Such characteristics as staggering, reeling, vomiting, loss of mental control, and the resulting addiction and poverty are commonly mentioned characteristics of drunkenness (Job 12:25; Ps 107:27; Prov 20:1; 21:17; 23:20-21, 29-35; 31:4-7; Is 5:11-12, 22; 19:14; 24:20; 28:7-8; 29:9; Jer 25:27; 48:26; 51:39, 57; Hos 4:11; Sir 19:1; 31:29-30; 1 Esdr 3:17b-24). Often a connection is drawn between drunkenness and sexual perversion, prostitution or immorality (Gen 9:20-27 [Noah]; Gen 19:30-38 [Lot]; Amos 2:8; Hab 2:15).

In the Law of Moses drunkenness is one of the characteristics of a hopelessly rebellious son who is subject to death (Deut 21:20-21). Drunkenness was clearly not to characterize those in a leadership position. The OT admonishes kings to stay away from strong drink (Prov 31:4-5), and leaden are chastised for being drunk (Is 56:11-12; Hos 7:5). Priests and prophets are judged for drunkenness, which prevents them from performing their duties (Is 28:7). In the NT no bishop, deacon or older woman who teaches younger women Christian ways (Titus 2:3-5) can be a drunkard (1 Tim 3:2-3, 8; Tit 1:7; 2:2-5). The understanding that no leader was to be a drunkard underlies the charge of the Pharisees that Jesus was a drunkard, the implication being that he should not be leading the people (Mt 11:18-19 par. Lk 7:33-34).

Jesus explicitly addresses drunkenness only once: "But take heed to yourselves lest your hearts be weighed down with dissipation and drunkenness and cares of this life, and that day come upon you suddenly like a snare . . ." (Lk 7:33-34 RSV). Here drunkenness is a part of the carnal life that poses a threat to salvation * In addition to this explicit reference, the parables of Jesus contain the image of the drunken servant excluded from heaven* (Mt 24:45-51 par. Lk 12:42-48).

6. The Wedding at Cana.

In the Gospel of John, Jesus' first miracle is the changing of water into wine at the wedding of Cana. The account presents a host of challenges to interpretation, one of which is the role of wine. Jesus ordered that six stone jars be filled with water, each jar holding two or three measures. A measure is approximately eight gallons, so each jar held between sixteen and twenty-four gallons for a total capacity of 96 to 144 gallons. It is often asked why Jesus made wine at all and particularly such a large quantity.

It must be noted that both wine and its quantity are important symbols. In the Old Testament and Judaism abundant wine (and oil or milk) is a sign of the age of salvation (Jer 31:12; Joel 3[4]:18; Amos 9:13-14; 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:5; Sib. Or. 2.317-18; 3.620-23,744-49). The image of abundant wine is associated with the blessing to accompany the arrival of the Messiah of Judah (Gen 49:11-12). The image of a banquet describes the coming time of messianic blessing (Is 25:6-8; 65:13; I Enoch 62:14; 2 Enoch 42:5; 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:8). In Jesus' parables the kingdom of God* is portrayed as a wedding feast (Mt 9:14-15 par. Mk 2:18-20 and Lk 5:33-35; Mt 22:1-14 par. Lk 14:15-24; Mt 25:1-13; cf. Lk 12:36; Jn 3:29-30; Rev 19:7-9) or simply a feast (Mt 8:11-12). Jesus himself portrays the disciples in his presence as guests at a wedding (Mt 9:15; Mk 2:19; Lk 5:34).

John's account of Jesus' conversion of such a large quantity of water into wine at a wedding feast is one way of announcing that the kingdom of God, the eschatological time of salvation, had arrived in the presence of the long-awaited Messiah. Jesus shows himself to be the Son of God come down from heaven bringing the blessing of the eschatological age symbolized by abundant wine. The miracle of Cana allowed Jesus to manifest his glory* to his disciples and evoke their belief (Jn 2:11; cf. 1:14). It is also very likely that Jesus was fulfilling his obligations as a wedding guest. As invited guests Jesus and his disciples were expected to provide wedding gifts. Their presence at the festivities may have contributed to the wine shortage. Jesus' provision of wine saved the bridegroom the embarrassment of a shortage. Not only that, he relieved the bridegroom of the obligation to compensate for his lack of provision. should any of his guests invite him to their weddings. Moreover, since the gift of wine was non-reciprocal, the bridegroom would not be obligated to reciprocate at the weddings of the disciples (see Derrett).

WISDOM

In biblical thought wisdom has a wide range of meaning. Wisdom can mean simply the practical skills and qualities which humans can acquire in order to live successfully, or wisdom can refer to God's knowledge and creative power which transcend human scrutiny. Given this range of meaning, it is extremely difficult to give a comprehensive definition of wisdom.

There are certain lines of development about wisdom, however, which can be traced from the OT through later Judaism* and, finally, to the Gospels. Two traditions are of particular importance: the relationship of wisdom and Law* (the rabbinic tradition*), and speculation about the end of history and the transcendent world (apocalypticism*). The Gospels utilize these traditions with varying emphases in their presentations of Jesus.

1. The Double Tradition (Q)
1. The Double Tradition (Q).

Most of Jesus' wisdom sayings and the wisdom motifs which are applied to him in the Synoptic Gospels occur in the material shared by Matthew and Luke (the so-called double tradition, or Q*; see Synoptic Problem). It is now generally agreed that the shift from the presentation of Jesus as a wisdom teacher* to the presentation of Jesus as the final and most important messenger for the Wisdom of God had already been made in the double tradition. According to this view, a further development in the Synoptic tradition to an explicit wisdom christology occurs in Matthew, where Jesus is identified in some sense with divine Wisdom itself (Suggs, Robinson, Dunn, Burnett). Although Luke and Mark present wisdom sayings of Jesus, they show no interest in a wisdom christology, that is, in presenting the significance of Jesus and his status as the Christ* in terms of divine Sophia ("Wisdom").

1.1. Wisdom Material in the Double Tradition. The double tradition contains many aphoristic wisdom sayings of Jesus which do not necessarily distinguish him from any other Jewish wisdom teacher (e.g., Mt 12:33b par. Lk 6:44). Furthermore, it is not crucial in Judaism that such aphorisms be attached to any particular context person or message. For Gospel studies, therefore, the contexts of such aphorisms in the double tradition become the crucial concern since they alone indicate how early Christians related Jesus to wisdom emphases. There are at least five crucial wisdom passages in the double tradition.

1.1.1. The Wisdom of Solomon (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31). In this saying there is a direct reference to "the wisdom of Solomon," and an ambiguous assertion that "behold, here is something greater than Solomon." The emphasis in both Matthew and Luke is on the judgment of "this generation" in connection with the preaching (kērygma) of Jonah (Mt 12:41 par. Lk 11:32; see Sign of Jonah) and the wisdom of Solomon. The "something greater" than the preaching of Jonah and the wisdom of Solomon, then, seems to be Jesus' message. In this context Jesus is a messenger who proclaims God's wisdom with eschatological urgency to "this generation."

1.1.2. Wisdom Vindicated (Mt 11:16-19; Lk 7:31-35). This passage is also concerned with "this generation," but it emphasizes that John the Baptist* and Jesus (= the Son of man*) have come to it as messengers of Wisdom (sophia). The ending of the pericope in Luke is usually considered earlier than Matthew's ending: "And wisdom (sophia) is vindicated by all her children." Sophia is personified as having children who come proclaiming her message.

Wisdom was personified already in the Hebrew Bible. She calls out and pleads with humans to heed her message (Prov 8:1—9:2). Wisdom also sends out messengers to issue her call (Prov 9:3-6). As this tradition developed in Judaism, it could finally be claimed that "in every generation she [Wisdom] passes into holy souls and makes them friends of God and prophets" (Wis 7:27 RSV).

If the word "all," which is only in Luke 7:35 (Mt 11:19), was present in the double tradition which Luke adopted, then the implication would be that all who respond to Wisdom's call are her children. "All," however, seems to be a Lukan addition (cf. Lk 7:29). The focus of the double tradition, then, is on John and Jesus as the culmination of all of Wisdom's messengers (cf. Mt 11:12-15; Lk 16:16).

1.1.3. Wisdom's Envoys (Mt 23:34-36; Lk 11:49-51). Luke 11:49 is regarded as the earlier form of this saying ("Therefore also the Wisdom of God said, 'I will send them prophets and apostles, some of whom they will kill and persecute ...' " RSV; see 2.2 below). The saying seems to be a quotation attributed to personified Wisdom. The emphasis on Wisdom sending messengers ("prophets and apostles") is present again, but the motif of their rejection is strongly emphasized. The implication of this double-tradition passage is clear: God's judgment for the rejection of the entire line of Sophia's envoys culminates with Jesus' message to "this generation."

1.1.4. Wisdom's Spokesperson (Mt 23:37-39; Lk 13:34-35). In this case Matthew has Jesus' lament over Jerusalem linked with the emphasis on the fate of all the messengers sent to Israel* (Mt 23:34-36 par. Lk 11:49-51), while Luke has the lament linked explicitly to Jesus' death as another of the rejected prophets* (13:33). It is difficult to know, then, whether Matthew or Luke has preserved the order of the double tradition. Has Matthew combined the sayings (Mt 23:34-36 par. 23:37-39) or has Luke separated them (par. Lk 11:49-51 and 13:34-35)? An understanding of the context would help us determine the identity of the speaker, whether it be Wisdom, Jesus on behalf of Wisdom or Jesus as Wisdom itself.

In this double-tradition passage the emphasis seems to be on the rejection of Wisdom's messengers (Mt 23:37 par. Lk 13:34a) and on Jesus as the final messenger of Wisdom ("you will surely not see me until... the one who comes in the name of the Lord," Mt 23:39 par. Lk 13:35). Since no explicit identification is made between Jesus' person and the figure of Sophia, it seems reasonable to conclude that the same emphasis already seen in other double-tradition passages is found also in this one: Jesus is the final spokesperson who has attempted to reveal Wisdom's message to humanity.

1.1.5. Wisdom's Revealer (Mt 11:25-27; Lk 10:21-22). This passage from the double tradition seems to emphasize wisdom motifs different from the passages examined so far. First, Jesus as God's Son seems to be the only recipient and mediator of God's wisdom (e.g., "All things have been delivered to me by my Father . . ." RSV). Second, it is implied that either God has hidden his Wisdom from Israel because of their unbelief or that Wisdom is unattainable by Israel without the Son's mediation (e.g., "Thou hast hidden these things from the wise and understanding . . ." RSV).

Although this is a difficult passage to interpret, it is clear that stress is placed on the filial relationship between God and Jesus, and the passage implies that the wisdom which only God knows fully is revealed as a gift (cf. Job 28:12-28; Bar 3:15-4:1; Sir 1:10; Wis 8:21). At the very least, this passage seems to focus on (1) the recipients of God's wisdom (i.e., Jesus and those to whom he reveals it) rather than on those who have rejected wisdom, and on (2) Jesus' function as the revealer of God's wisdom. These emphases are not incompatible with the other double-tradition passages, though admittedly they are enhanced only here (see 2.3. below).

1.1.6. Summary of the Double Tradition. The wisdom passages of the double tradition place emphasis on Jesus' message rather than on the relation of Jesus' person to divine Wisdom. Jesus is presented as the culmination of a long line of messengers to Israel whose message of God's wisdom has been rejected. The christological aspects of the double tradition emphasize both Jesus as the final but rejected spokesperson for Wisdom and his filial relationship to God (see Abba; Son of God) in fulfilling this function. Jesus is not yet identified with Wisdom itself. This christological step is taken by Matthew.
2. Matthew.

Matthew's presentation of Jesus in relation to wisdom motifs is to be seen primarily in the redaction of wisdom material from the double tradition. The most important passages are: 11:2-19; 23:34-39; and 11:25-30.

2.1. Jesus as Wisdom (Mt 11:2-19 par. Lk 7:18-35). The setting of this passage is John the Baptist's question concerning Jesus and Jesus' testimony regarding John. Matthew introduces this section with a phrase that seems to be his: "the works of the Christ" (Mt. 11:2; cf. Lk 7:18). As we have seen (1.1.2. above), most interpreters of the double tradition regard Luke's version of the wisdom saying at the conclusion of this section ("wisdom is justified by all her children," Lk 7:35) as earlier than Matthew's ("wisdom is justified by her works," Mt 11:19b). It appears that Matthew has framed the passage to equate "the works of the Christ" (11:2) with "wisdom is vindicated by her works" (11:19b). This change virtually identifies Jesus, "the Christ" (cf. Mt 1:1, 16-17), with God's divine Wisdom. If this is the case, then in Matthew Jesus is no longer just Wisdom's messenger; Jesus is Sophia incarnate (Suggs).

2.2. Wisdom Speaks (Mt 23:34-39 par. Lk 11:49-51; 13:34-35). Matthew's redaction of the double tradition in order to equate Jesus with Wisdom is consistent also with the differences between Matthew and Luke in this passage. We have already discussed Jesus' lament for Jerusalem in 23:37-39 (1.1.4.), a passage following on Matthew's larger context of Jesus' woes on the Scribes* and Pharisees* and, finally in 23:34-36, the sending of prophets, the wise and scribes who are killed and persecuted by Israel's leaders.

If the parallel passage of Luke 11:49-51 (par. Mt 23:34-36) represents the earlier form of the double tradition, as most interpreters believe, then Matthew has made several significant modifications. First, the phrase "the Wisdom of God said" (past tense) becomes in Matthew an emphatic first-person saying of Jesus in the present tense ("Behold! I am sending you prophets . . ."). A saying of Wisdom has become a saying of Jesus.

Second, although it is unclear that Matthew is responsible for joining the tradition found in 23:37-39 (par. Lk 13:34-35) with that of 23:34-36 (par. Lk 11:49-51), a strong contextual argument can be made that he did. Matthew 23:37-39 in the double tradition is a lament of Jesus about Jerusalem's rejection of his message. In order to express his pathos, Jesus uses the image of Wisdom-
Shekinah ("God's presence") as a mother bird gathering its brood. In Matthew, however, Jesus has just been identified with Wisdom (23:34 par. Lk 11:49) so that the lament over Jerusalem now reads as their rejection of Jesus as God's incarnate Wisdom.

The rejection theme fits both the overall context of the woes (see Blessing and Woe) against the Scribes* and Pharisees* (Mt 23) and Jesus' subsequent departure from the Temple* (24:1). Matthew has also omitted the story of the widow's mite (cf. Mk 12:41-44 par. Lk 21:1-4). This omission links Jerusalem's rejection of Jesus as Wisdom with Jesus' emphatic departure from the Temple. In this way the theme of rejection is enhanced in Matthew. Jerusalem's "house" (i.e., the Temple) is "forsaken and desolate" (23:38 par. Lk 13:35) because Jerusalem has rejected the very incarnation of Wisdom itself.

In so doing Matthew seems to be building on the motifs present in the Jewish wisdom tradition. In Sirach, Sophia sought a dwelling place among all peoples, but God assigned her to dwell in the Temple at Jerusalem (Sir 24:1-12). Elsewhere we find the emphasis that Wisdom was rejected and left desolate because of God's judgment* of Jerusalem (Bar 4:12), or that she could find no place to dwell at all and returned to heaven* (1 Enoch 42:1-2; cf. 4 Ezra 5:9-10). While we cannot establish Matthew's direct literary dependence on these traditions, given Matthew's evident redaction of the double tradition it seems reasonable to suggest that Jesus is presented as Wisdom incarnate who is rejected by Israel, pronounces judgment on her (23:35-36, 38) and then withdraws his presence (23:39-24:1).

2.3. Wisdom Beckons (Mt 11:25-30). The double tradition has emphasized already that Jesus' function as the Son is to reveal God's wisdom (Mt 11:25-27 par. Lk 10:21-22; see 1.1.5.). Matthew now links 11:25-27 with 11:28-30, so that Jesus not only reveals God's wisdom but issues an invitation to take his yoke and learn from him. The language certainly alludes to the yoke of the Law, but because Wisdom and Torah had already been identified in some traditions (Sir 24:23; Bar 3:37-4:1), Wisdom could also invite any who would do so to take her yoke and experience her rest (e.g., Sir 51:26-27).

In Matthew Jesus no longer only reveals Wisdom; his teaching is the total expression of God's revelation because he is Wisdom-Torah. The community of Jesus studies his words as God's revelation (cf. 5:18; 24:35), and he, as the very presence of God's revelation (1:21-23), guides them (18:20; cf. 'Abot 3.3, 7; 6.10). Righteousness now consists of knowing and doing Jesus' teachings rather than the yoke of Torah (see Law; Justice, Righteousness).

2.4. Summary. In the Synoptic tradition Matthew goes beyond both Judaism (in which wisdom is never incarnate as a human) and the double tradition (in which Jesus and John are both Wisdom's final messengers) by moving to a wisdom christology in which Jesus is Wisdom incarnate. The Fourth Gospel takes a similar step but by different means and with different emphases.

John 1:1-18 presents Jesus as the cosmic logos ("Word"). Logos and Wisdom were virtually interchangeable concepts in both Philo (Dodd) and The Wisdom of Solomon (9:1-2; 18:15). Knowledge of this background has led interpreters to note the emphasis on wisdom in John's prologue.

In the wisdom tradition Wisdom is depicted as participating with God's Word in creation (Prov 8:27-31; Wis 9:1-2, 9). John goes beyond this tradition by emphasizing not only that God created Wisdom before anything else and that Wisdom assisted with creation (Prov 8:22-26; Sir 1:4, 9; 24:3-5), but that the Logos was pre-existent with God (1:1; cf. Sir 24:9).

Wisdom and life are also associated in the wisdom tradition (e.g., Prov 4:1-13; Wis 8:13, 17), and John emphasizes that life is in the Logos (1:4). The theme that Wisdom is the perfect reflection of God's light (e.g., Wis 7:26) is also in John (1:4-5). The emphasis in John, however, is on the Logos who came to his own with God's revelation but was rejected (1:9-11). The scheme of the appearance of the Logos, his rejection and his departure (Jn 14-17) is like Sophia's rejection and departure (cf. 1 Enoch 42:1-2; 4 Ezra 5:9-10).

If the wisdom emphases in John's prologue are intended to apply to the entire Gospel's presentation of Jesus, then some very important christological points have been made. John has already gone beyond the traditions which relate Wisdom and Logos with his statement that they are incarnate in Jesus (1:14). Furthermore, in contrast to gnostic traditions, for John Wisdom and Logos do not stay with Jesus only temporarily, but they are given a particular narrative history in the life of Jesus. Jesus is thus presented materially and essentially as the unique Wisdom-Word of God. This means, for example, that in the "I Am" statements (6:35; 8:12; 10:9; 11:25-26; 14:6; 15:1; cf. 8:58; 10:36) Jesus himself is the message of salvation.* The person, so to speak, is the kerygma.

If this is true, then of all the NT wisdom traditions John's presentation of Jesus as Wisdom is the strongest christological development.

Witness

The witness theme occupies a place of considerable importance in the Bible. Witness (martys) is a forensic term employed by writers in ancient Israel and the early church. A witness is a person who knows the truth and can testify before a court of law, declaring what has been seen or heard. Witness terminology is also employed in connection with Israel* and the church* as God's* witnesses.

1. Introduction

2. Witness in Mark

3. Witness in Matthew

5. Witness in John

1. Introduction.

Witnesses throughout the Bible can certify facts (Jer 32:10,12; Ruth 4:9-11; Is 8:2; Acts 10:39). Unfortunately, they can also prove to be false or malicious witnesses; these are frequently condemned in biblical literature (Ex 23:1; Prov 19:5, 9; Acts 7:58). False witnesses are mentioned in the NT in the trials of Jesus and Stephen (Mt 26:60; Mk 14:57-59; Acts 6:13).

The Jewish law of multiple witness was important throughout biblical times. The law of Moses demanded the evidence of several witnesses to convict a person of a capital crime (Deut 17:6-7; Num 35:30).

The principle of multiple witness is honored in the NT (Jn 5:31-32; Heb 10:28) and features prominently in cases of church discipline (Mt 18:16; 2 Cor 13:1; 1 Tim 5:19).

Thus witness language is used in a juridical manner throughout the Bible. However, the most significant use of witness terminology is in connection with Israel and the church as God's witnesses (Is 43:10, 12; 44:8; Lk 24:48; Jn 15:27; Acts 1:8, 22; 2:32; 5:32; 10:39,41).

In the NT the witness theme is prominent in John's Gospel (1:7,19; 3:11, 32-33; 4:39; 5:31-39; 8:13-14,18), Acts (3:15; 13:31; 22:15,20; 26:16) and Revelation (1:5; 2:13; 3:14; 6:9; 11:3; 17:6). The idea of witness also appears frequently elsewhere (e.g., Lk 22:71; Rom 1:9; 1 Cor 1:6; 2 Cor 1:23; Phil 1:8; 1 Thess 2:5,10; 1 Tim 6:12-13; 2 Tim 2:2; 1 Pet 5:1; 2 Pet 1:16; 1 Jn 5:6-11).

2. Witness in Mark.

Mark recognizes the importance of valid evidence (Mk 1:44) and accepts the Jewish law of multiple witness (14:56, 59). He knows of demoniac "confessions" of Jesus (1:24; 3:11; 5:7; cf. Lk 4:34; Mt 8:29; see Demon, Devil, Satan), but he believes that Christ* is to be confessed by disciples.* The demonic forces are opposed to God's purposes; for this reason, their testimony is unacceptable (Mk
When the Twelve are sent forth they are told to shake off the dust from their feet if their message meets with rejection, "for a testimony unto them" (Mk 6:11 RV). Witness has been given to God, but if that witness does not lead to repentance and faith,* it will provide evidence which will be brought forth against that community on the day of judgment.* This ominous note is even stronger in Luke, where the action is viewed as a threat ("testimony against them," Lk 9:5 NIV).

The themes of testimony and confession appear in Mark 13:9-13 and its parallels. Here witness is offered against a background of persecution (Mk 13:12-13; Lk 21:16-17; Mt 24:9). Christians will be hauled before local councils, flogged in the synagogues* (Mk 13:9; Mt 10:17; Lk 21:12) and delivered to the custody of the police or courts (Mk 13:9, 11-12; Lk 21:16). In such circumstances the Holy Spirit* will tell them what to say (Mk 13:11; Mt 10:19-20). Their task is to remain alert and be faithful (Mk 13:37). Those who are ashamed of Christ will be put to shame on the Last Day before the Son of man, "when he comes in the glory of his Father with the holy angels" (Mk 8:38 RSV; see Son of Man).

3. Witness in Matthew.

Matthew contributes to an understanding of courtroom procedure. Both Matthew and Luke use the proper terms to describe the "accuser" and the "judge" (Mt 5:25-26; Lk 12:58-59). A final "day of judgment" is mentioned when an "account" must be given (Mt 12:36-37). This evidence will provide the basis for a verdict of acquittal or condemnation. No witnesses will be called, for the evidence will be furnished by their own "words" (cf. Job 15:6; Lk 19:22; 22:71; see Apocalyptic Teaching).

A striking use of witness imagery occurs in Christ's reference to the people of Nineveh and the Queen of the South (see Sign of Jonah). They are cited as accusing witnesses who will "condemn this generation" (Mt 12:4142; cf. Lk 11:31-32). They will provide the evidence which will secure the conviction of Jesus' unbelieving contemporaries (cf. Mt 12:27; Lk 11:19).

Matthew recognizes that witnesses can testify against themselves (Mt 23:29-36; Lk 11:47-51). Unless there is genuine repentance, the recalcitrant will be charged with the blood of all the martyrs from the time of Abel onwards (Mt 23:35; cf. Lk 11:50-51). In repeatedly opposing God's "prophets and sages and scribes" (Mt 23:34), they are providing incriminating evidence that they are ethically the children of those who killed the prophets* (Mt 23:30-31). Thus they witness "against" themselves (Mt 23:31; cf. Lk 11:48).

One of Matthew's most gripping scenes is that of the Last Judgment (25:31-46). The judge is the Son of man. With him are the angels* who function as court officials. There is a judgment seat or throne on which the judge sits to judge (25:31). The nations are gathered and a process of judgment takes place in which the sheep (see Sheep and Shepherd) and the goats are separated. Verdicts are formally pronounced on the two classes (25:34-36, 4143). Christ is here described as the judge at the Last Day while in similar passages he is depicted as a witness (Mt 10:32-33; cf. Lk 12:8-9).

Luke is acquainted with some of the main terms of witness and makes use of them in his Gospel. The nouns "witness" (11:48; 24:48) and "testimony" (martyria, 22:71) are used, and reference is made to legally admissible evidence (martyrion, 5:14; 9:5). The normal verb for "bearing witness" is used once (martyred, 4:22), as is the verb for "bearing false witness" (pseudo-martyred, 18:20). The compound verb for "bearing solemn witness" is used once in a context of warning (diamartyromai, 16:28).

Luke begins by giving special recognition to the primary witnesses, the aposdes. They are qualified to attest the basic facts of Jesus' life, death (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection* because they were "eyewitnesses" (autoptai, Lk 1:2) as well as servants of the word.

Luke views witness as a live metaphor against a background of strife, contention and debate. This leads him to draw attention to Jesus' exhortation to fearless confession (12:1-12): "I tell you, everyone who acknowledges me before others, the Son of man also will acknowledge before the angels of God, but whoever denies me before others will be denied before the angels of God" (Lk 12:8-9 NRSV; cf. Mt 10:32-33). As in the other Gospels, Peter fails when he denies his Lord (Lk 22:57, 61; cf. Mk 14:68, 70-71; Mt 26:70, 72, 74). Luke sees Jesus preparing his followers for witnessing in difficult circumstances: "When you are brought before synagogues, rulers and authorities, do not worry about how you will defend yourselves or what you will say, for the Holy Spirit will teach you at that time what you should say" (12:11-12 NIV). Similarly, in Luke 21 there is a warning of hard times, but the crisis situation is seen as an opportunity for bearing witness: "This will result in your being witnesses to them" (21:13 NIV). The fulfillment of these predictions is amply illustrated in Acts, where Paul appears before governors, kings and the house of Israel on numerous occasions (Acts 22:1-22; 25:1-27; 28:23-31). Witnessing was to be a joyful, but precarious, activity of the church, fraught by the possibility of arrest, imprisonment and death. The death of Stephen is a case in point (7:54-60). Luke describes him as a "witness" who paid the supreme price of martyrdom (22:20).

Luke's witness theme assumes even greater importance in Acts, where "witness" and six related terms occur a total of thirty-nine times. Jesus had prepared his disciples for their future role as witnesses (Lk 24:4449). He had told them: "You will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:8 NIV). This verse summarizes the thrust of Acts. The witness theme is explained further when Ananias is divinely instructed: "Go! This man is my chosen instrument to carry my name before the Gentiles and their kings and before the people of Israel" (9:15 NIV). The remainder of Acts is largely the unfolding of Paul's faithful witness, with occasional attention to the work of Peter and other Christian leaders. It is, as F. Stagg has often observed, the story of an "unhindered" gospel (28:31).

With the coming of the Holy Spirit the disciples are empowered for witness (2:4; cf. 1:5). Luke notes: "With great power the apostles continued to testify to the resurrection of the Lord Jesus" (4:33 NIV). As this text implies, Luke regards as particularly central to the role of the apostles* their service* as witnesses to the resurrection of Jesus (e.g., Acts 1:22; 2:32; 3:15; et al.). In times of persecution the church prayed for boldness in witness, and asked for divine signs and wonders to be performed in the name of Jesus (4:29-30).

This remarkable "boldness" (parrēsta) is a striking feature of apostolic witness, and it is clearly in evidence in church leaders such as Peter, John, Stephen, Philip, Barnabas and Apollos (2:29; 4:9-10, 13; 7:2-53; 8:30-35; 14:3; 18:26). It is most prominent in the case of Paul (9:27-28; 19:8; 28:31), whose speeches in Jerusalem, Rome and before Felix, Festus and Agrippa are remarkably bold and fearless (22:3-21; 23:1-6; 24:10-21; 25:8-11; 26:2-29; 28:16-20, 23-31; cf. 13:9-11; 14:14-18; 17:30-31). This outspoken quality is given by the Holy Spirit, who energizes the witness and directs the entire mission of the church (8:29; 10:19-20; 11:12; 16:6-7).

To summarize, Luke in both his Gospel and Acts highlights the witness motif. The apostles have a special role as the original eyewitnesses of the whole public ministry of Jesus from the baptism* to the ascension* (Acts 1:21-22). Jesus tells them: "You are witnesses of these things" (Lk 24:48 NIV). But they do not stand alone. Other Christians are summoned to take Christ's side, plead his case and urge all to accept his claims as Messiah and Lord.* This loyal witness will frequently entail persecution and suffering, for the witness is messianic and religious and often takes Christians into the lawcourts. However, these stressful situations will be opportunities for bearing testimony. Witnesses are empowered by the Spirit, who enables them to speak boldly for their Lord and to do signs and wonders in the name of Jesus. Thus the Jewish principle of multiple witness is honored, that every matter be established on the evidence of two or three witnesses (Deut 19:15; cf. 17:6). The witness of the apostles and other Christians is corroborated by the Holy Spirit (Acts 5:32), and also by the OT Scriptures (Lk 24:25-27, 44-49; Acts 10:43), presenting a cohesive case for the claims of Jesus as Savior* and Lord.

5. Witness in john.

In the Fourth Gospel witness is a central issue. John follows rather closely the formal pattern of the covenant lawsuit which is worked out in detail in Isaiah 43—48. There God has a lawsuit with his people and takes them to court, calling witnesses and laying charges against them. In John, God incarnate in Jesus has a controversy with the world* as it is incarnate in "the Jews," the Jewish leaders who epitomize the world in its opposition to the Gospel (Jn 5:16, 18; 6:41; 7:1; 10:31; 11:8). Each side presents witnesses, offers evidence and pleads its case. Witnesses such as John the Baptist (5:33-35; see John the Baptist), the disciples (15:27), the Scriptures (5:39), the mighty works of Christ (5:36; cf. 10:25) and the Father (5:32, 37) are called to offer testimony on behalf of Christ. This evidence fails to convince opponents, however, unless it is accompanied by the inward witness of the Holy Spirit (15:26; cf. 14:16-17, 26). When the Spirit comes, he drives home the truth,* convicting the world of sin, of rightousness and of judgment (16:8-11). Christ won his case on the cross, and as the victor will judge all people on the Last Day (16:33; 5:27-30).
The witness theme assumes major importance in the first twelve chapters of John. This is particularly evident in "the great controversy" of John 5—12. This controversy, or covenant lawsuit, revolves around three miracles performed by Jesus, namely, the healing of the man at the pool (Jn 5), the feeding of the 5,000 (Jn 6) and the healing of the man born blind (Jn 9). In each case a common pattern is observed. The miracle takes place, followed by a debate with opponents in which the claims of Jesus are asserted, objections are handled and further development of the argument takes place. This results in a division of opinion, some coming to faith in Christ and others taking offense at his teaching (6:60-69; 7:43; 9:16; 10:19). The argument wages fast and furious, some charging Jesus with demon-possession (7:20; 8:48) or deception of the people (7:12), while others acknowledge him as "a good man" (7:12), "a prophet" (9:17), "the Christ" (7:41) or "Lord" (9:38). A decisive judgment follows (Jn 11 and 12).

The situation changes following the glorification (see Glory) of Jesus and his return to the Father. While he was on earth, Jesus bore witness to the truth and served as the chief advocate for God in the world (18:37; 10:34-38; 14:10-11; 18:23). Now his juridical functions are taken over by "another Paraclete" (see Holy Spirit), the Holy Spirit promised by Jesus (14:16-18). The Spirit acts as "the advocate," taking charge of Christ's case and calling on the disciples to support it. Christ now serves as "advocate" in heaven* (1 Jn 2:1 KJV). As in Acts, the apostles have a twofold role to play. First they are eyewitnesses and can attest the basic facts of Jesus' life, death and resurrection (Jn 15:27). Second, they serve as witnesses to convictions, for they believe that they have been called to attest the great redemptive act of God. Thus they serve as advocates, taking Christ's side and pleading his cause in a hostile world (15:18-20; 16:14).

The Holy Spirit bears witness in two ways. First, he reminds the disciples of the things which Jesus had communicated to them (14:26). Then he explains to them how the scriptural promises find their proper fulfillment in the long-awaited Christ (2:17; cf. Ps 69:9; Jn 19:23-24; cf. Ps 22:18). The Spirit functions both as a witness and an advocate of Christ.

One other element in John's Gospel is the lawsuit of the Last Day (Jn 5:28-29). Christ will exercise a judicial role, for the Father "has given him authority to judge because he is the Son of Man" (5:27 NIV; cf. Dan 7:13-14; Lk 21:36). The final judgment will be closely related to what has preceded it. Those who have rejected the claims of Christ will find his words standing as accusing witnesses against them in the Last Day (Jn 12:48; cf. Mt 12:41-42; Lk 11:31-32). For the believer the judgment of the Last Day has already been met, and the divine sentence of acquittal has been pronounced (Jn 5:24).

WOMEN

All four Gospels contain information on Jesus' relationship to women and the involvement of women in Jesus' life and ministry. Jesus accepted and affirmed as persons of worth various women who were neglected or rejected within his society. Jesus taught women and included them among his disciples.* Women also participated in the proclamation of the gospel.* Many women associated with Jesus are known by name. Among the four Gospels Luke evidences the greatest interest in Jesus' relationship with women and their involvement in his life and ministry. The contacts and involvements between Jesus and women need to be set within the social and cultural contexts of the first century A.D. The Gospel data on Jesus and women lead also to discussions about the significance of this data for women in ministry, leadership and authority* within the church*

2. Women As Persons of Dignity and Worth
3. Women As Disciples
4. Women As Proclaimers
5. Women Specifically Named
6. Women in the Perspective of Each Gospel
7. Conclusions and Significance

1. Women in the Social-Cultural Contexts of the First Century A.D.

In very general terms Jesus lived in social-cultural contexts (the Jewish context and the larger Greco-Roman society) in which the male view of women was usually negative and the place of women was understood to be limited for the most part to the domestic roles of wife and mother. Women were perceived by extant male writers to be responsible for most (all?) sin, and especially for sexual temptation and sin. There are, on the other hand, clear indications both from literary and non-literary sources that there were positive roles for women as well.

The extant male literary sources of ancient Judaism,* which reflect both a class and gender perspective, present a fairly consistent pattern of a negative view toward women (see Swidler 1976). For example, Josephus,* the first-century A.D. Jewish historian, states that the Law* holds women to be inferior in all matters and that, therefore, women should be submissive (Ag. Ap. 2.25 §201). Philo, the first-century A.D. Alexandrian Jewish philosopher and biblical commentator, refers throughout his writings to women and female traits as examples of weakness (e.g., Op. Mund. 151-52; Quaest. in Gen. 1.33). Philo argues that women ought to stay at home, desiring a life of seclusion (Spec. Leg. 3.169-77; Flacc. 89). Sirach, a proto-Pharisaic work from about 180 B.C., presents women either as good wives or as problems. It even states that "better is the wickedness of a man than a woman who does good; it is woman who brings shame and disgrace" (Sir 42:14 NRSV). According to the rabbinic Tosefta, which may well in this case reflect first-century A.D. tradition, a Jewish man prayed three benedictions each day, including one in which he thanked God* that he was not made a woman (t. Ber. 7.18).

Such texts reflect social reality to some extent and set a framework of societal expectation for the behavior and relationships of men and women.

This negative picture within Judaism was greatly shaped and influenced by Creek and Greco-Roman androcentrism and misogyny. However, as some have argued (e.g., Meyers), women's place in Israel began to decline with the emergence of a bureaucratic monarchy, prior to Greek influence.

However, there are, in spite of the lack of literary evidence from women, substantial indications that positive roles did exist for women within Judaism, even if limited. Especially important is the evidence that some women held the office of ruler or president of synagogues* in ancient Judaism (see Kraemer). Significant religious roles for women are also indicated by the portrayal of Job's three daughters as those who speak the language of angels* in the Testament of Job and in the traditions about Beruriah, a second century A.D. rabbi (see Swidler 1976). Women as strong leaders are portrayed in the Hellenistic Jewish story of Judith and in the rule of Salome Alexandra as Queen in Judea (approximately 76-67 B.C.). There is also substantial non-literary evidence which shows that Jewish women often took initiative for their lives and activities in spite of the male orientation and domination prevalent in the culture (see Kraemer). These positive roles and opportunities constitute Jewish evidence for the significance of women in ancient Judaism.

Thus, it is important for Christians not to set a "Christian" Jesus over against his Judaism and Jewish context as the deliverer of women and thus engage in a subtle form of anti-Judaism. Christians can hardly deny that the history of the church shows that it, as much as any human social reality, has neglected and oppressed women over many centuries.

Yet, as a jewish male in an androcentric, patriarchal society, Jesus' respect for women as persons of dignity and worth and his inclusion of them as disciples and proclaimers in his life and ministry was very significant in its own first-century context for women and their place and activity in ministry in the earliest churches and is important as a heritage for both Jewish and Christian people today.

2. Women As Persons of Dignity and Worth.

According to the Gospels Jesus clearly regarded women as persons of dignity and worth by his many healings* of women, by his acceptance and forgiveness* of undesirable and ritually unclean (see Clean and Unclean) women, and by his implicit challenges to male sexual devaluation of women.

2.1. Women Healed by Jesus. Jesus healed various unnamed women: Peter's mother-in-law (Mt 8:14-15; Mk 1:29-31; Lk 4:38-39); the daughter of jairus and the woman with the twelve-year flow of blood (Mt 9:18-26; Mk 5:21-43; Lk 8:40-56); and the eighteen-year crippled woman (Lk 13:11-17) whom Jesus called a "daughter of Abraham, *" probably an important status marker for a woman (see further the discussion of Lk 8:1-3 in 3.1. below). In addition, Jesus raised the son of the widow of Nain (Lk 7:11-17). In most of these stories Jesus touched or was touched by the woman involved. This is particularly important in terms of the woman with the twelve-year flow of blood, since she would have been considered ritually unclean according to levitical law (Lev 18).

2.2. Women's Sexual Integrity Affirmed by Jesus. According to two Gospel stories Jesus accepted and forgave two women understood to be guilty of sexual sins. In Luke 7:36-50 a woman, called a sinner,* anoints (see Anointing) and kisses Jesus' feet in the home of a Pharisee.* Jesus accepted her actions as those of love* and declared: "Your faith has saved you; go in peace" (7:50). In the story of the woman caught in adultery (Jn 7:53—8:11; although not found in any of the oldest Greek manuscripts of the NT, most scholars regard this as an authentic story about Jesus) Jesus said: "Neither do I condemn you; go, and sin no longer" (Jn 8:11). This Jesus did in the presence of male critics who had brought only the woman, of the two involved, to Jesus.

Also to be noted in this connection is Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan* woman (see 4.2. below), who is presented as one living in adultery. The male disciples are offended that Jesus is talking with a woman but dare not ask him why (Jn 4:27), indicating their negative sexual assumptions.

In fact, one saying of Jesus makes the general statement that "tax collectors and sexually immoral women (hat pornos; often translated "prostitutes"*) will enter before you [religious leaders] into the kingdom of God" (Mt 21:31; see Kingdom of God). Jesus notes that such persons had already responded to the preaching of John the Baptist (Mt 21:32; see John the Baptist).

In one saying of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:27-30; see Sermon on the Mount) concerning adultery, Jesus places the blame for lust on men, something rather unusual in ancient Mediterranean cultures.
In the Matthean account of Jesus' debate with the Pharisees on divorce* (Mt 19:3-9), reference appears to be made to the dominant position that men could divorce their wives for virtually any reason (see "for any cause" in Mt 19:3; see Josephus Ant. 4.8.23 §253; Life 76 §426; m. Git. 9:10). Jesus responds by placing Deuteronomy 24:1-4 in a secondary position to Genesis 2:24 (Mt 19:5-6) which affirms the concept of "one flesh," giving sexual equality to both women and men.

2.3. Women As Positive Examples in Jesus' Teaching. Jesus often used women as positive examples in stories and events for those who have responded to God with appropriate faith.* Such regard prepares the way for women as disciples and proclaimers (as described in 3. and 4. below).

Women are used, sometimes in parallel with men, to describe the faithful and faithless at the time of the arrival of the future kingdom (Mt 24:41; Lk 17:35; Mt 25:1-13). A woman and her leaven are central in a parable* about God's kingdom (Mt 13:33; Lk 13:20-21).

More important are the instances in which women portray persons of faith: the widow of Zarephath (Lk 4:26; see 1 Kings 17—18); the Syrophoenician (or Canaanite) woman (Mt 15:21-28; Mk 7:24-30); and the persistent widow (Lk 18:1-8). Faith is also an explicit feature of the women in the stories noted above (2.1. and 2.2.), of the woman who anoints Jesus' feet (Lk 7:50) and of the woman with the twelve-year flow of blood (Mt 9:22; Mk 5:34; Lk 8:48). The story of the "widow's mite" (Mk 12:41-44; Lk 21:1-4) presents a woman as one who fulfills Jesus' requirements, made especially clear in Luke, of discipleship with reference to material possessions.

The parable of the lost coin (Lk 15:8-10) presents a woman as the finder who rejoices with a party, the same role portrayed by the shepherd and the father in Luke 15. In all three cases this person images God who rejoices over repentant (see Repentance) sinners (see also Mt 23:37; Lk 13:34 in which Jesus likens his concern for Jerusalem to that of a mother hen for her chicks).

3. Women As Disciples.

The Gospels indicate that women were among the followers (= disciples) of Jesus and were taught by him with the understanding that they could respond with obedience and commitment to the word of God.
3.1. The Women Who Followed Jesus. All four Gospels attest to the fact that a group of women followed Jesus in Galilee and to Jerusalem where they were present as faithful and active at the crucifixion (see Death of Jesus), burial* and resurrection* of Jesus (Mt 27:55-56; 27:61-28:1; Mk 15:40-41; 15:47-16:1; Lk 23:49; 23:55-24:1; Jn 19:25-27; 20:1).

The verb used to designate their following of Jesus is akoloutheō (or its compounds), a term which occurs over seventy-five times in the Gospels and normally means following Jesus in the sense of being a disciple. This lexical evidence confirms the narrative presentation of women as disciples of Jesus, although some would argue that when this term is used of women it does not designate discipleship.*

Luke describes these female disciples in the Galilean context (Lk 8:1-3). Luke notes that the women were traveling with Jesus and the Twelve and that they were providing for them as well, which is probably an indication of their upper-class status and comparative wealth. These women apparently became disciples of Jesus as a result of the healing they had received from him. Luke mentions three by name, Mary Magdalene, Joanna and Susanna, and notes that there were also many others.

The mention of these women in the Jerusalem context repeats the name of Mary Magdalene and adds the names of Mary the mother of James the younger and Joses (Joseph), Salome and Mary the wife of Clopas (Jn 19:25), who may be the same person as Mary the mother of James and Joseph. Also noted are the mother of Jesus (Jn 2:5 and 19:26-27 also attest to her discipleship), her sister and the mother of the sons of Zebedee (who may be the same person as Salome).

Luke, whose Gospel alone mentions these women in both the Galilean and Jerusalem contexts, also notes in Acts 1:14 that certain women, presumably those he has described in Luke 8:1-3 and in the passion narrative, are present in the upper room in Jerusalem, along with Mary the mother of Jesus. Presumably, then, these female disciples were among the one hundred twenty followers of Jesus (Acts 1:15) who waited for and received the Holy Spirit (see Holy Spirit) on the day of Pentecost, fulfilling the prophecy of Joel that "... in the last days... I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy..." (Acts 2:17; see Joel 2:28-29). The mention by Luke of Tabitha (Acts 9:36), also known as Dorcas, designated as a disciple (matheutra), and Mary the mother of John Mark (Acts 12:12) as the one (leader?) in whose home believers were meeting, may indicate additional women by name who were followers of Jesus.

3.2. Mary of Bethany As a Disciple. According to Luke 10:38-42 Mary assumed the posture of a disciple by sitting at Jesus' feet (see Acts 22:3; m. 'Abot 1:4), listening to Jesus' word (logos). In spite of the objections of Mary's sister Martha, based on the traditional female obligation to prepare the meal, Jesus affirmed Mary's choice: "Mary has chosen the better part which will not be taken from her" (Lk 10:42). Presumably, the "better part" refers to Jesus' teaching on the kingdom which characterizes Luke's central section of the Gospel (Lk 9:51—19:28) in which this story occurs.

Some interpreters have understood the story to present an image of women as silent learners rather than as active participants or speakers in the life of the church, indicating a redactional stage which reflects an alleged retreat from a more positive, egalitarian role for women in the very earliest years of the church. However, it is more likely that the story of Mary presents the image of women as disciples in equal partnership with men.

The presentation of Mary in John 11:28-33, 45; 12:1-8 may also point to her role as a disciple of Jesus, although it is certainly not as clear as it is in the Lukan story. Martha's confession in John 11:27, parallel to Peter's confession in John 6:69 and in the Synoptic tradition (see Mt 16:16), indicates her discipleship as well.

3.3. Motherhood and Obedience. Two Gospel pericopes contain a similar saying of Jesus in which response and obedience to God's word (discipleship) appears to be placed above motherhood, the traditional role for women (Mt 12:46-50 par. Mk 3:31-35 and Lk 8:19-21; Lk 11:27-28). In the common Synoptic story Jesus says: "My mother and my brothers and sisters are those who hear the word (logos) of God and do it" (Lk 8:21; see Family). In the incident reported only in Luke, Jesus says in response to a woman's affirmation of his mother "Blessed rather are the ones who hear and keep the word (logos) of God" (Lk 11:28).

4. Women As Proclaimers.

The Gospels present three occasions in which women were proclaimers of Jesus, the Lukan infancy narrative (Lk 1—2), the story of the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:4-42) and the accounts of the women at the tomb in the resurrection narratives.

4.1. The Women Who Interpreted Jesus' Birth. In the Lukan infancy narrative (Lk 1:5—2:40) there are five persons, three of whom are women (Elizabeth; Mary, the mother of Jesus; and Anna; Zechariah and Simeon are also named), who speak by the power of the Holy Spirit or as a prophet* in order to provide a divine interpretation of the meaning of Jesus' birth for the history of God's salvation (see Birth of Jesus).

Elizabeth (Lk 1:41-45) is filled with the Holy Spirit and pronounces a blessing* on Mary, including designating her as "the mother of my Lord." Mary (Lk 1:26-38, 46-56), assuming her to be the speaker of the Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55; see Mary's Song), declares the saving work of God in language and structure similar to Hannah's prayer in 1 Samuel 2:1-10. Anna (Lk2:36-38) is a prophet who praises God and speaks about Jesus to all who were waiting for the redemption of Jerusalem. In the structure of Luke's Gospel these three women, along with Zechariah, Simeon, the angel Gabriel (Lk 1:26-38) and the angels who speak to the shepherds (Lk 2:8-15), proclaim Jesus' place in God's salvation,* giving theological understanding and perspective to the event of his birth.

4.2. The Samaritan Woman. After Jesus' discourse with the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:7-26) she returns to her city and recounts her experience with Jesus: "Many of the Samaritans from that city believed in him, because of the word (logos) of the woman that he told me all that I did" (Jn 4:39). The Johannine account does go on to note that the Samaritans then have a direct encounter with Jesus' word (logos), which they understand as the basis for their faith (Jn 4:40-42).

4.3. The Women As Witnesses to Jesus' Resurrection. All four Gospels report that the female disciples of Jesus were the first ones to receive the angelic account of Jesus' resurrection* and commission to go and tell the male disciples of this event (Mt 28:1-8; Mk 16:1-8; Lk 24:1-12; see Jn 20:1-13). According to Luke (Lk 24:10-11, 22-24) the men did not believe the report of the women (see also Mk 16:11 in the long addition to Mark).

Further, the Gospels of Matthew and John and the long ending of Mark report that Jesus appeared first to Mary Magdalene (Jn 20:14-18; Mk 16:9-11; in Mt 28:9-10 the other Mary [see Mt 27:61; 28:1] is with Mary Magdalene; this other Mary is presumably Mary the mother of James the younger and Joseph, mentioned in Mt 27:56). In the Matthean and Johannine accounts Mary Magdalene is commissioned by Jesus to tell the male disciples what she has seen and heard.

It has often been noted that Paul, who provides the earliest written account of resurrection appearances of Jesus (1 Cor 15:3-8), does not mention the role of the women. It is often assumed that this is due to a Jewish understanding of the inadmissibility of the testimony of women in legal contexts (see Josephus Ant. 4.8.15 §219) and the argument Paul wishes to establish.

The first known pagan written critique of Christianity, that of the middle Platonist Celsus entitled The True Word (c. AD. 175), builds on the Gospels' report of women as the first witnesses and proclaimers of Jesus' resurrection. Celsus, citing his alleged source, says that a hysterical female (and perhaps someone else) was the witness to Jesus' resurrection, which Celsus then discounts (apud Origen Contra Celsum 2.55). Origen responds (c. AD. 225) to Celsus by saying that there were other witnesses in addition to the woman and that the Gospels do not say that she was hysterical (Origen Contra Celsum 2.59-60). Celsus' attack on Christianity shows how clearly and firmly the role of the women as the first witnesses of Jesus' resurrection was in the Gospel tradition and early church. It may be worth noting how important this theme is to the history of the discussion of the significance of Jesus' relationship to women for the church. In what may be the first book published in English in defense of women's preaching, Margaret Fell refers to the role of Mary Magdalene in the tide of her book: Womens Speaking Justified, Proved and Allowed of by the Scriptures,. . . And how Women were the first that preached the Tidings of the Resurrection of Jesus, and were sent by Christ's Own Command, before He ascended to the Father, John 20.17 (London, 1666).

4.4. Women in Non-Canonical Gospel Traditions. Women are frequently presented as disciples and leaders, especially in resurrection narratives, in various non-canonical apocryphal (see Gospels [Apocryphal]) and gnostic Gospels (e.g., Cos. Thorn. 21, 61, 114; Dial. Sav.; see the comments on Mary Magdalene in 5.6. below).

This data is a witness to the strength of the Gospel tradition of the involvement of women as disciples and proclaimers of Jesus. It may also suggest, according to some scholars, that in some second-century AD. circles women had more options for involvement among gnostic groups than in the "orthodox" church, which was increasingly excluding women from leadership. This understanding is, however, debatable and fraught with problems of social-historical analysis.

5. Women Specifically Named.

In the Gospels seventeen women are specifically named (some of them may, however, actually be the same person; see especially 5.7, 5.10 and 5.11). The amount and character of information concerning them varies as does their relationship to Jesus. What follows is an alphabetical list of these women with the Gospel references and basic information provided.

5.1. Anna. Anna was a prophet mentioned only in Luke 2:36-38. She spoke in the Temple* of the infant Jesus to all who were waiting for the redemption of Jerusalem. She was the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Asher and a widow who spent most of her time in the Temple. It is not clear whether she was eighty-four at the time of the story or whether she had been a widow for eighty-four years (probably fourteen at marriage, plus seven years of marriage plus eighty-four years as a widow = one hundred five years of age, the age reached by Judith, a hero in Israel [Jdt 16:23]).

5.2. Elizabeth. Elizabeth, mentioned only in Luke 1, was of priestly descent (see Priest and Priesthood) and the wife of the priest Zechariah, mother of John the Baptist and a relative of Mary the mother of Jesus. Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Spirit and greeted Mary as the mother of her Lord.*

5.3. Herodias. Herodias, noted in Mark 6:17-29; Matthew 14:3-12 and Luke 3:19-20, was the granddaughter of Herod the Great (see Herodian Dynasty), the daughter of Aristobulus, the wife of Herod (called Philip in the Gospels), the mother of Salome and the mother-in-law of Philip the tetrarch (Josephus Ant. 18.5.1 §§110-11, 136). She conspired to have Herod Antipas kill John the Baptist (Josephus Ant. 18.5.2 §§116-19).

5.4. Joanna. Joanna is mentioned in Luke 8:3 and 24:10 as one of the female disciples of Jesus who followed him in Galilee and to Jerusalem, where she is mentioned as one of the women who first received the message of Jesus' resurrection. She is identified as the wife of Chuza, a steward of Herod (Antipas), about whom nothing else is known.
5.5. Martha. Martha lived in Bethany and was the sister of Mary and Lazarus.* She is described in Luke 10:38-42 and in John 11:1-44 and 12:2. Martha, in contrast to Mary in both stories, was the one who prepared the meals for Jesus as a guest in their home. In the Lukan story Martha objects to Mary's involvement as a disciple of Jesus. In the Johannine story Martha makes a disciple's confession of Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God (Jn 11:27; see Christ; Son of God).

5.6. Mary Magdalene. Mary Magdalene (from the Galilean town of Magdala; see Archeology and Geography) was a prominent disciple of Jesus who followed him in Galilee and to Jerusalem. She is always listed first in groups of named female disciples and was the first person to whom the resurrected Jesus made an appearance (Mt 27:56, 61; 28:1; Mk 15:40, 47; 16:1 [16:9]; Lk 8:2; 24:10; Jn 19:25; 20:1, 11, 16, 18). Her status is attested by the numerous references to her in early apocryphal and gnostic Christian literature (see Grassi; e.g., the Nag Hammadi Gos. Phil. 59, 6-9).

5.7. Mary the Mother of James [the Younger] and Joseph [Joses]. This Mary is mentioned as one of the female disciples of Jesus (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40, 47; 16:1; Lk 24:10) who was among those who received the first message of Jesus' resurrection. She is probably to be identified with the "other Mary" of Matthew 27:61 and 28:1, based on the Markan and Lukan parallel texts (see 5.11. and also 5.10. below).

5.8. Mary the Mother of Jesus. Jesus' mother is mentioned by name in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 1 — 2; 13:55; Mk 6:3; Lk 1—2). John refers to her as Jesus' mother without ever noting her name (Jn 2:1, 3, 5,12; 6:42; 19:25-27). Mary is prominent in the birth narratives and functions as God's obedient servant (see Lk 1:42 "Blessed are you among women...") and as an interpreter of God's saving work (the Magnificat in Lk 1:46-55; see Mary's Song). Jesus' conversation with her in John 2 does not indicate disrespect, but rather shows John's emphasis on Jesus' own authority and responsibility for his mission and implies Mary's discipleship. Mary is understood as a disciple (see Jn 19:25-27; Acts 1:14).

5.9. Mary of Bethany. Mary was the sister of Martha and Lazarus and lived in Bethany (Lk 10:38-42; Jn 11:11-45; 12:1-8). She was a disciple of Jesus, commended by him for choosing the "better part" (see 3.2. above). She, according to the Johannine story, anointed Jesus' feet with costly perfume (the parallel stories in Mt 26:6-13 and Mk 14:3-9 do not name the woman; the story in Lk 7:36-50 is set in a different time and place). Jesus defends her act of devotion as an act of discipleship.

5.10. Mary the Wife of Clopas. This disciple of Jesus is mentioned only in John (Jn 19:25), along with Mary the mother of Jesus, her sister and Mary Magdalene at the cross of Jesus (see Death of Jesus). Due to the names in the parallel texts in Matthew 27:56 and Mark 15:40, there is some possibility that this Mary is to be identified with the Mary the mother of James and Joseph (see 5.7. above; see also 5.11. below).

5.11. The Other Mary. The "other Mary" is a designation which appears only in Matthew 27:61 and 28:1. She is one of Jesus' disciples at the cross and the resurrection. The parallel texts in Mark 15:47 and 16:1 and the data of Matthew 27:56 and Luke 24:10 suggest that the "other Mary" is probably to be identified with Mary the mother of James and Joseph (see 5.7. and also 5.10. above).

5.12. Rahab. Rahab is mentioned in the Matthean genealogy* of Jesus (1:5; see Josh 2 and 6). She was considered an important woman in the Jewish and early church traditions, as suggested here and attested in Hebrews 11:31 and James 2:25. She is one of four women mentioned in Matthew's genealogy (see 5.13., 5.16. and 5.17. below). All of these women are Gentiles; their mention here may signify God's mercy and point to the Gentile mission (cf. Mt 28:18-20). They may also point to Mary as indicative of God's choice of unexpected women in the history of salvation.

5.13. Ruth. Ruth is mentioned in the Matthean genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1:5; see 5.12. above).

5.14. Salome. Salome is mentioned in Mark 15:40 and 16:1 as one of Jesus' disciples at the cross and the resurrection. Due to the parallel to Mark 15:40 in Matthew 27:56, it is possible that Salome is the wife of Zebedee and, thus, the mother of James and John, two of Jesus' twelve disciples.

5.15. Susanna. Susanna is one of Jesus' disciples mentioned only in Luke 8:3. Nothing else is known of her.

5.16. Tamar. Tamar is mentioned in the Matthean genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1:3; see Gen 38; Ruth 4; 1 Chron 2:4; see 5:12. above).
5.17. The Wife of Uriah. Uriah's wife, Bathsheba, is mentioned in the Matthean genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1:6; see 2 Sam 11; 12:24; 1 Chron 3:5; see 5:12. above).

Another way of viewing the data on Jesus and women is to look at the individual approach of each of the four Gospels. Among the four, Luke evidences the greatest interest in material that relates to women in the life and ministry of Jesus.

6.1. Matthew. The Gospel of Matthew contains stories about the healing (Mt 8:14-15; 9:18-26) and faith (Mt 9:22; 15:21-22) of women, as well as stories in which women are involved which define the kingdom (Mt 13:33; 24:41; 25:1-13). Four Gentile women are included in the genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1:3, 5-6). The sexual integrity of women is upheld in the discussions of lust (Mt 5:27-30) and divorce (Mt 19:3-9), and the inclusion of sexually immoral women in the kingdom is noted for the preaching of both John the Baptist and Jesus (Mt 21:31-32).

The discipleship of women, including their involvement in proclamation, is noted both in a general saying of Jesus (Mt 12:49-50) and in the passion (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection narratives (Mt 27:55-56; 27:61-28:10).

Matthew is the only Gospel which tells the story (Mt 27:19) of Pilate's wife who, because of a dream, attempts to dissuade Pilate from being involved with Jesus (see Pontius Pilate).

6.2. Mark. The Gospel of Mark probably has the least amount of data about Jesus and women, yet Mark, with the rest of the Gospels, presents women as among the disciples of Jesus. Mark contains stories about the healing (Mk 1:29-31; 5:21-43) and faith (Mk 5:34; 7:24-30) of women.

The discipleship of women is noted in a general saying of Jesus (Mk 3:31-35), in the story of the widow who gave all her money (Mk 12:41-44) and in the passion and resurrection narratives (Mk 15:40-41; 15:47-16:8; see also 16:9-11).

6.3. Luke. The Gospel of Luke shows the greatest interest in women in the life and ministry of Jesus, including numerous accounts and stories about women unique to its presentation. Luke also gives the specific names of more women in Jesus' life than do the other Gospels. This interest is continued in Acts (for Jesus' female disciples see Acts 1:14).

The place of women in discipleship is particularly stressed by Luke, both in general statements (Lk 8:19-21; 11:27-28), in the story of Mary and Martha (Lk 10:3842) and in the reports of the female disciples who traveled with Jesus (Lk 8:1-3) and are described in the passion and resurrection narratives (Lk 23:49; 23:55—28:12). Again, some of these accounts are unique to Luke (Lk 8:1-3; 10:3842; 11:27-28).

Woman are prominent as proclaimers in the infancy narratives (Elizabeth, Mary the mother of Jesus, Anna; Lk 1—2) and in the resurrection narratives (Lk 24:10-11,22-24).

6.4. John. The Gospel of John portrays in particular the discipleship of the mother of Jesus (Jn 2:1-12; 19:25-27), the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:742), Mary and Martha (Jn 11:145; 12:1-8) and Mary Magdalene (Jn 19:25; 20:1-18). Both the Samaritan woman and Mary Magdalene are proclaimers of Jesus in John, and both receive extended attention in the Johannine narratives.

7. Conclusions and Significance.

Jesus' respect for and inclusion of women as disciples and proclaimers provided the foundation for the positive place of women in the earliest churches and their ministry.

In fact the baptismal formula reflected in Galatians 3:28 and its statement that in Christ "there is neither . . . male nor female" is probably rooted in the traditions of Jesus (see MacDonald). This indicates the formative role of Jesus in Paul's theological vision for the church's inclusive character.

The fact that there were no women among the Twelve is often cited as evidence that Jesus did not intend women to exercise leadership or authority in the church. However, it would not have been culturally possible to have included women in that most intimate group of Jesus' followers. It is remarkable and significant enough that many women, at least eight of whom are known by name and often with as much or more data as some of the Twelve, were included as disciples and proclaimers during Jesus' ministry (not to mention Elizabeth and Anna in Luke 1—2). It has often been observed that all of the Twelve were Jews, yet the early church, as it developed in other social contexts, included Gentiles in leadership. Thus, the precise composition of the Twelve should not be pressed too far.

More significant is the fact that the Twelve did not constitute or provide the model or framework for leadership or authority in the early church, apart from the very earliest days in the Jerusalem church. Rather, what was significant for the character of leadership in the early church was Jesus' call to discipleship and its definition in terms of service and the fact that both men and women were among Jesus' followers as disciples and proclaimers.

It sometimes is noted that Jesus did not appoint any women to office. Neither did Jesus appoint any men to office (apart from the case of Peter, and that did not determine church structure apart from initial leadership in the Jerusalem church). The structures of leadership and authority in the early churches, especially those of Paul, for which the best evidence is available, were somewhat fluid and unstructured. In such contexts women did exercise leadership and authority (twelve women are known by name among Paul's coworkers in ministry; see Rom 16:1-16; Phil 4:2-3; 1 Cor 1:11; Col 4:15; Acts 16:14-15, 40).

WORLD

The language of the Gospels provides us with no exact precedent for what we mean by "world," though kosmos comes close to doing this. The distinctiveness of the modern perception of the world constitutes a difficulty in the task of reconstructing ancient understandings of the world. Difficulty also arises because the Gospel writers did not give detailed accounts of their understandings of the world, though John comes closer to doing this than the Synoptics. When writing about the "world" in the Gospels gaps must be filled in on the basis of what we suppose the authors would have known. It is frequently suggested that the writers of the NT thought of the earth as a disk upon which the heavens rest like a dome and under which the waters of the deep also formed the sea. But from the time of Aristotle the Greeks understood the world to be a sphere (Cael. II:2.285a.32) and perceptive attempts were made to calculate the circumference of the earth. It is not safe to assume that knowledge of this sort was foreign to the Gospel writers. It could also be a mistake to interpret biblical imagery as scientific description rather than as poetic portrayal.
1. Terminology and Usage

The Gospel writers build on both Jewish- and Greek-language traditions when writing of the world. The Greeks provided the word kosmos, which has become a technical term in Western tradition. By the first century this word was used to convey a complex range of meaning. The dominant sense of an ordered system had applications to areas other than cosmology. They do not concern us here. The kosmos is sometimes understood as planet earth but also, in a wider sense, as the universe. In this latter sense it has the same meaning as the OT "heaven and earth" (Hebrew, haššāmayim wehā'ares) meaning the creation. Writers closely dependent on the OT used this language instinctively even though kosmos had become part of the vocabulary of Greek-speaking Jews. But the translators of the Greek version of the OT (LXX) had no cause to use the term kosmos because the natural translation for the Hebrew of "heaven and earth" is ouranos kai gē and the OT has no single word which covers the same semantic area as kosmos. Consequently, it is only in the later books composed in Greek, such as Wisdom of Solomon (19 x), 2 Maccabees (5 x) and 4 Maccabees (4 x) that kosmos is used. The Synoptic Gospels show a preference for the use of gē rather than kosmos. Matthew uses gē forty-three times, Mark nineteen times and Luke twenty-five times compared with the use of kosmos eight times, three times and three times respectively. The reverse tendency is seen in John, where kosmos is used seventy-eight times and gē eleven times.

Two other expressions relate to what we mean by "world" and overlap the Greek use of kosmos. The first of these is oikoumenē, which is short for oikoumenē gē and was used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew tēbēl. In the poetic works of the OT tēbēl is frequently used in parallel with eres ("earth"). By the time the Gospels were written oikoumenē had come to mean "the inhabited world," which was sometimes considered to be coterminal with the Roman Empire (see Rome). The second word is *awn, which was used to translate the Hebrew 'ôlām. Both the Hebrew and the Greek words have a reference to time but when used in the expression "this age" have substantially the same meaning as "this world."

2. Age (Gk aiōn; Heb 'ôlām).

In the Synoptics the world is conceived as a temporal reality with beginning and end. Beyond that it is also a new world (a notion found also in Stoicism) which finds expression in the terms "this age" and "the age to come," expressions which are found on the lips of Jesus.

2.1. Mark. Jesus speaks of what awaits his disciples* in this and the coming age (Mk 10:30 par. Lk 18:30; cf Mt 19:29). In the phrase "this age" the word used is *kairos while in "the coming age" it is aiōn (see Kingdom of God). Strangely (see 2.2. below), Matthew omits this reference to the two ages. Reference to "the cares of the age" (Mk 4:19 par. Mt 13:22; Luke has "cares") is to be understood in terms of "this age."

2.2. Matthew. Matthew has increased the references to the two ages by introducing these terms into a Markan context from which they were absent (Mt 12:32 par. Mk 3:29 and Lk 3:10); by transforming the wording of "all things to be fulfilled" (synteleisthai panta, Mk 13:4, cf. Lk 21:7) to "the fulfillment (end) of the age" (synteleias tou aiōnos, Mt 24:3) and by introducing frequent references to "the end of the age" (Mt 13:39-40, 49; 28:20).

2.3. Luke. Jesus speaks of "the sons of this age" (hoi huioi tou aiōnos toutou), contrasting them with "the sons of light" (see Light) who also exist in the present time. The contrast suggests that "the sons of this age" are "the sons of darkness" and "the sons of light" are "the sons of the age to come" (16:8). In Luke 20:34-35 "the sons of this age" are contrasted with "those who are accounted worthy to attain to that age and the resurrection from the dead" The two ages appear to be in sequence, present and future. Apparently, "the sons of light" (16:8) are those thought worthy to attain to "that age."

The language of the two ages, a feature of Jewish apocalyptic,* was probably characteristic of the teaching of Jesus, being found in Mark and the traditions peculiar to Matthew and Luke. Matthew, influenced by Jewish apocalyptic, has increased the use of this language. It is altogether absent from Q* and from John, though John's use of "this world" (kosmos) is formally similar but on closer inspection differs in meaning.

3. Earth (Gk ἔδαφος; Heb הָרֶץ).

Each of the four Gospels uses the word earth to mean "soil," a particular "land" and planet "earth," though the latter sense is rarely found in John. It is evident in the phrase "heaven and earth," in which the OT spoke of creation, an idiom familiar to Jesus and found in each of the Synoptics but not in John. Sayings which have reference only to the earth can be ambiguous because the word can mean "soil" and "land" as well as "planet earth."

3.1. Mark Jesus asserts, "heaven and earth will pass away" (Mk 13:31 par. Mt 24:35 and Lk 21:33), a notion consistent with the language of the two ages. Jesus claims, "the Son of man has authority to forgive sins on earth" (Mk 2:10; Mt 9:6; Lk 5:24; see Forgiveness). The authenticity of this saying, along with the other Son of man sayings (see Son of Man), has been hotly debated. It asserts the universal authority of the Son of man on earth. Two other uses of "earth" by Mark (4:31; 9:3) are omitted by Matthew and Luke, though they make use of the parable of the mustard seed and the narrative of the Transfiguration from Mark. The mustard seed is described as the smallest of seeds on earth, and Jesus' clothing is described as whiter than any fuller on earth could achieve. Both could be considered as Markan editorial comments. In Mark the finite character of the creation and the universal nature of Jesus' authority are affirmed.

3.2. Q Material. Jesus asserts "heaven and earth shall pass away" (Mt 5:18 par. Lk 16:17). He says, "I thank you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth" (Mt 11:25 par. Lk 10:21), affirming God's lordship over all creation. Referring to his own mission Jesus says, "Do not suppose that I came to bring peace on earth" (Mt 10:34 par. Lk 12:51); and contrasting the response to his word he tells his hearers that "the queen of the South came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon" (Mt 12:42 par. Lk 11:31). Matthew appears to have added reference to "the heart of the earth" in a Q context (Mt 12:40 par. Lk 11:30) and may have omitted it from another (Mt 16:3 par. Lk 12:56), though it is more likely that Luke has added it along with the reference to "hypocrites," which Matthew is not likely to have omitted. As in Mark the finite character of the creation is clear. God's lordship over creation is affirmed and Jesus' mission is further clarified in terms of conflict with the world.
3.3. Matthew. Jesus promised the meek that they would inherit the earth (Mt 5:5), meaning either the promised land or the world (see Sermon on the Mount). He tells the disciples, "You are the salt of the earth" (Mt 5:13), a Matthean saying combined with Markan material (Mk 9:50). He forbids swearing by heaven or earth (5:34-35) and teaches the disciples to pray, "Let your will be done, as in heaven so on earth" (6:10), which may be a Matthean interpretation of the petition (found also in Lk 11:2), "Let your kingdom come." He admonishes, "Do not store up treasures on earth" (Mt 6:19). The relative value of earthly possessions is a dominant theme in Luke. Distinctive to Matthew are the sayings to Peter (16:19) and the disciples (18:18) about binding and loosing on earth with apparent consequent effects in heaven. The closest parallel in meaning—though not in language—is found in John 20:23, which is expressed in terms of forgiving sins. The thought of the influence of earth on heaven* is continued where Jesus says that the agreed request of two disciples on earth will be granted by "my Father in heaven" (18:19). In the idiom of apocalyptic Jesus speaks of "the kings of the earth" (17:25) and "the tribes of the earth" (24:5), which appears to be Matthean redaction introduced into a Markan context (Mk 13:2 par. Lk 21:27). Finally, Jesus asserts, "All authority in heaven and earth has been given to me" (28:18) and commissions his disciples to continue his mission, promising to be with them until the end of the age (28:20). While the relative value of the created order is maintained, salvation* is increasingly interpreted in terms of this world. The lordship ascribed by Jesus to his Father in Q is claimed by him in Matthew, and indeed his authority is extended to his disciples as they carry on his mission to the world.

3.4. Luke. At the birth of Jesus the angels announce "peace on earth" (2:14; see Birth of Jesus), a view of Jesus' mission apparently in conflict with the Q saying of Jesus, "Do not suppose that I came to bring peace on earth" (Mt 10:34 par. Lk 12:51). Consistent with the Q saying, Luke's "I came to cast fire on earth" (Lk 12:49) could be a part of Q not used by Matthew. Jesus asks, "When the Son of man comes, will he find faith on earth?" (18:8), and in the Markan context of the apocalyptic discourse Jesus in Luke refers to distress (anagkē) on earth (Lk 21:23; see Mk 13:19) and anxiety (synochē) of the nations on earth (Lk 21:25; see Mk 13:25) and warns that "that day will come suddenly upon all who dwell on the face of all the earth" (Lk 21:35; see Mk 13:33-34 and Lk 21:36; see Apocalyptic Teaching). Luke may reduce the political scandal of Jesus' life, but the crisis of his mission remains clear, and the apocalyptic expectation of the end of the age is undiminished.
3.5. John. References to planet earth are few because John has favored the use of kosmos. In John 3:31 there are three references to being "of the earth" (ek tēs gēs), the equivalent of being "from below" (kotō) as opposed to "from above" (and). In John 12:32 "lifted up from the ground" (cf. Jn 3:14) is intended to have overtones of leaving the world (cf. Jn 3:13). Jesus, the Son of man, is exalted from earth to heaven by way of the cross upon which he is lifted up from the earth. Finally, Jesus asserts, "I glorified you (the Father) upon earth" (17:4). While the antithesis between heaven and earth is strong in John, the mission of the heavenly emissary is carried out on earth for the sake of those on earth.

4. Inhabited World (Gk oikoumenē; Heb ἃβēl).

Oikoumenē is used only fifteen times in the NT of which Luke is responsible for eight (five in Acts and three in the Gospel). It is used once in Matthew 24:14 in the context of the Markan apocalyptic discourse to assert that before the end comes this gospel of the kingdom must first be preached in the whole inhabited world. Here Matthew's use of oikoumenē is an interpretation of Mark's "all the nations" (la ethnē, Mk 13:10). In the Q account of the temptation narrative (see Temptation of Jesus), where Jesus is shown all the kingdoms of the world, Luke's use of oikoumenē (4:5) is probably redactional, being more appropriate to the political sense than Matthew's kosmos (4:8). Luke 2:1 refers to the decree to tax "the whole world," in other words, "the entire Roman empire." Luke has also probably introduced oikoumenē into the Markan apocalyptic discourse when Jesus warns of people fainting with fear and foreboding of what is coming on the inhabited world (Lk 21:26). Thus this and the other use of oikoumenē by Jesus (Mt 24:14) are probably due to the redaction of Matthew and Luke.

5. World (Gk kosmos).

Thus far there has been little discussion of John's view of the world. This now changes because the Gospel and first letter of John provide more than half of the uses of kosmos in the NT. Only Paul in 1 Corinthians comes even close to this frequency of use. Paul uses kosmos forty-seven times, of which twenty-one uses occur in 1 Corinthians.

Jesus asks the value of gaining the whole world and losing life* itself (Mk 8:36 par. Mt 16:26 and Lk 9:25). This relative value of possessions was an important emphasis in the teaching of Jesus (see Rich and Poor). Jesus says that wherever the gospel* is preached in the whole world the details of his anointing* will be spoken of (Mk 14:9 par. Mt 26:13). This notion of the gospel being preached universally was introduced by Mark or the tradition that came to him as is suggested by the use of the word gospel (euangelion). In the longer ending of Mark (16:15) Jesus commissioned the disciples to "go into all world (kosmos) and proclaim the gospel to the whole creation" (ktisis). This text has no strong claim to contain authentic Markan tradition, let alone genuine sayings of Jesus.

5.1. Foundation of the World (katabolēs tou kosmou); Beginning of the World (archē tou kosmou). Jesus spoke of "the blood of all the prophets shed from the foundation of the world" (Lk 11:50; cf. Mt 23:35). Into the Markan framework of the explanation of parables (Mk 4:33-34), Matthew has inserted as his commentary Psalm 78:2, "I will open my mouth in parables, I will utter what has been hidden since the foundation of the world." John's christology is expressed when Jesus asserts the Father's love for him "before the foundation of the world" (Jn 17:24 and cf. Jn 17:5). In the parable of the great judgment* the king tells those on his right hand, "inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Mt 25:34). The beginning of the world (archē tou kosmou) has the same meaning (Mt 24:21). The Markan parallel has "from the beginning of the creation" (ap' arches ktiseōs, 13:19). The same phrase is used by Jesus in his discussion of marriage and divorce (see Marriage and Divorce), arguing that "from the beginning of creation God made them male and female" (Mk 10:6). In this way the idea of the creation by God was clearly expressed in the teaching of Jesus and finds expression in each of the Gospels.

5.2. The World of Humanity. The nations of the world (la ethnē tou kosmou, Lk 12:30; see Gentiles) and the kingdoms of the world (hai basileiai tou kosmou, Mt 4:8), like the references to the kings of the earth and the tribeś of the earth (Mt 17:25; 24:30), refer to the world of humanity and might have used the term oikoumenē. The disciples are told by Jesus, "You are the salt of the earth" (Mt 5:13), a saying which stands beside "You are the light of the world" (Mt 5:14). In Hebrew this parallelism might have been expressed using ereṣ and ṭēbēl John may have developed the discipleship* saying in a christological direction when Jesus claims, "I am the light of the world (kosmou)" (Jn 8:12; 9:5). In the parable of the tares it is explained that the field is the world (Mt 13:38). Woe is pronounced on the world of humanity (Mt 18:7). This reminds us that this world, though the creation of God, is dominated by the demonic (see Demon, Devil, Satan). That the world is under the power of evil and needs to be liberated by God is part of the apocalyptic world-view which dominates the Synoptics, especially Mark. Jesus' role in inaugurating the kingdom of God is expressed in exorcisms. They are evidence that the present world ruler has been overthrown and that the kingdom of God is already dawning (Mk 3:20-30; Mt 12:2 par. Lk 11:20).

5.3. John. John's prolog (Jn 1:1-18) provides a detailed reinterpretation of the Genesis creation story. A Jewish understanding of creation is daringly reinterpreted in the light of faith in Jesus as the savior of the world. Here the kosmos is first the universe, the totality of the creation. The word is used four times in the prolog, but the most emphatic statement occurs in verse 3, "All things (panta) were made (egeneto) by him and without him was not anything made that was made." Speaking of the creation in terms of "the all" may owe something to the influence of Platonism, though precedent can also be found in Jewish tradition. What is distinctive about the prolog is that the mediating role of the logos* in creation is identified with the figure of Jesus.

The form and content of the prolog raise questions about its milieu. R Bultmann argued that this is to be found in the syncretistic Jewish baptist movement influenced by gnosis. Certainly, the view of the world in John's Gospel, amongst other matters, sets it apart from the Synoptics (see Synoptics and John). Like the writings of Philo, John shares a concentrated use of kosmos, which signals a form of Hellenistic influence scarcely to be found in the Synoptics. Concentrated use of kosmos is matched by the distinctly dualistic framework in which it is set with references to "this world" (planet earth) and "the judgment of the prince of this world" (12:31; 14:30; 16:11). This world is not contrasted with some future world. Rather, the world below is contrasted with the world above, the world of darkness with the world of light This world, though created by the logos, is ruled by the prince of this world. In John only Jesus is accused of demon possession; there are no exorcisms. Nevertheless, Jesus' struggle with the prince of this world is a central feature, further accentuated by the antithesis of light and darkness dominating the Gospel.

Jesus, the emissary from above, has come into this world (1:9-10; 3:16-17, 19; 6:14; 10:36; 11:27; 12:46; 16:28; 17:18, 21, 23; 18:37). His mission was an expression of God's love* for the world (3:16). This world is dominated by darkness and the prince of this world. The world in view is humanity. The coming of the emissary was to save, not to condemn the world (3:17; 4:42; 6:33, 51; 12:47), but condemnation is inevitable where the saving mission is rejected (9:39). The coming of the emissary is expressed in terms of the coming of the light into the world as the light of the world (3:19; 8:12; 9:5; 12:46). The light does not belong to the world (8:23; 17:16; 18:36) but has come to reveal the Father and his love for the world (14:31; 17:21, 23-24). His coming was to bring life to the world (6:33) by giving his life for the world (1:29; 6:51). Having entered the world and completed his mission, the emissary departs from it (13:1; 14:19; 16:28), having commissioned his disciples to continue his mission to the world (17:21, 23). Those who are called out from the world (by the emissary) and no longer belong to it (15:19; 17:6, 11, 14, 16) are consequently hated by it, as the emissary himself was hated (15:18-19; 17:14). The mission was made possible by the coming of the Paraclete/Spirit of Truth (see Holy Spirit) to expose the world to the truth revealed by the light (3:19-21; 16:8). Yet the world does not recognize the Spirit just as it did not recognize the emissary. It knows only the mission of Jesus and those who continue his mission. Only those who believe perceive the light of the world which has the power to transform those who belong to the world so that their lives are shaped by the light from above.

In John the focus moves from the world perceived as creation to the world of humanity dominated by the darkness of false loves, false values, false knowledge and to the mission to save the world. Much of this interpretation of the world is given in the words of the narrator (1:9-10; 3:16-17, 19) or other characters such as John the Baptist* (1:29), the Samaritans* (4:42) and the crowd (6:14; see People, Crowd) in addition to Jesus himself. Jesus, narrator and believing witnesses (see Witness) present a consistent view of the world, its predicament and its salvation.

WORSHIP

The Gospels do not speak often of worship. The various Greek terms which might be considered its equivalents (latria, leitourgia, proskynēsis, etc.) and the many technical terms connected with worship do not frequently appear in them. Moreover, many references to worship occur almost in passing; the time and place of a healing* miracle,* the Sabbath* in a synagogue,* for example, might be given. While the references to worship are often incidental, however, worship itself is by no means peripheral. It is there in the Gospels in much the same way as the air that Jesus and the disciples* breathed. It is so omnipresent that it is more assumed than mentioned.

One may speak of worship in the Gospels in two ways, of the worship practices of Jesus and the disciples and what one may infer about the worship practices of the early Christian churches in which the Gospels themselves were composed. The Gospels are not as directly informative about these last matters as the Acts of the Apostles or the various epistles, but can nevertheless make a useful contribution to our knowledge of Christian worship in the NT era. This article will discuss those two areas and also the theory that the Gospels were shaped according to the lectionary of OT readings in use in that period.

1. The Worship of Jesus and the Disciples

2. The Worship of the Early Church

3. The Gospels and Jewish Lectionaries

1. The Worship of Jesus and the Disciples.

Jesus and his disciples were, of course, Jewish. As such he (and they) took part in the religious life of the Jewish people (see Judaism). It is a reasonable assumption that the religious practices of his people were acceptable to Jesus except for those cases in which the Gospels record an attack against them.

There were three great foci of Jewish worship in the period, the home, the synagogue and the Temple.* Of the first the Gospels speak very little. We know it was Jesus' custom, as with all pious Jews, to bless God* before sharing bread* (God rather than "bread" should be supplied as the object of the verb "bless" in such cases). The Synoptic Gospels also describe the Last Supper* as a Passover meal (see Feasts), implying that Jesus shared the practices of the Jewish home in this respect also. It was also his custom to pray, usually in private. He also commended to his disciples the practice of private prayer* (Mt 6:6). It is especially noteworthy that in his prayers all four Gospels report that Jesus addressed God as "Father" (probably the Aramaic 'Abbā'). Sometimes the simple address "Father" appears; sometimes a qualifying term expressing the transcendence of God is linked with it. Beyond this, little can be said.

It is also clear that Jesus shared in the corporate worship life of Israel in the synagogues of Galilee.* Jesus' word concerning private prayer (Mt 6:6) should not be interpreted as criticism of corporate worship; the focus is on hypocrisy (see Hypocrite) and ostentation. It is in the synagogue that Jesus habitually teaches and preaches. He is apparently a welcome guest at the assemblies of his native province. Only in Luke 4:16-30, Luke's account of the rejection at Nazareth, is there any description, even in passing, of the synagogue service itself. There Jesus is invited to read the lesson, apparently a perfectly normal procedure, in itself not at all surprising. Only the subsequent interpretation of the reading of Isaiah 61 provokes outrage.

During the time of Jesus synagogue services were held three or perhaps four times on the Sabbath. The normal pattern of the synagogue service appears to have included the recital of the Shema, a combination of Deuteronomy 6:4-9; 11:13-21 and Numbers 15:37-41, the Tephillah, also known as the Amidah, or the Shemoneh Esreh, a lengthy and elaborate corporate prayer, and the reading and interpretation of Scripture, perhaps on the basis of a lectionary. There is no comment about these matters in any of the Gospels. The worship of the early church tended to carry on the worship practices of the synagogue. While that affinity is chiefly the result of factors other than Jesus' own precept and example, it is hard to imagine the early church carrying on a form of worship so reminiscent of the synagogue if Jesus himself had condemned such worship. In this instance the argument from silence seems compelling.

With respect to the Temple the picture is more complex. The Temple is held in esteem by the Synoptic Gospels, especially by Luke, who places much of his infancy narratives (set Birth of Jesus) and much of the early portions of Acts within its precincts. It is rightly a house of prayer (Mk 11:17 and par.) and, inasmuch as prayer was indeed a regular part of the Temple liturgy, it could rightly be considered of value. It is worthy of note that Acts represents early Christians such as Peter and John (Acts 3:1-3) frequenting the Temple for prayer. Paul, at the urging of James, even involves himself indirectly with the sacrificial cult (Acts 22:17-26). Jesus is willing to pay the tax* which maintains it, although the willingness springs mainly from a desire to avoid unnecessary offense (Mt 17:24-27). In John also much of the action of the Gospel takes place within the Temple. It is the spiritual center of Judaism and "salvation* is of the Jews" (Jn 4:22). Yet it is not truly necessary for right worship. John asserts most vigorously that in the new age inaugurated by Jesus right worship is "in spirit and in truth" (Jn 4:23). Moreover, it will, after all, be destroyed with not one stone standing upon another (Lk 21:6). The clear implication is that the Temple is no longer essential (see Destruction of Jerusalem).

The chief difficulty here lies, it seems, in the Temple's reason for being, the sacrificial system itself. A consideration of a key pericope, the cleansing of the Temple, may be useful here (Mt 21:1-11; Mk 11:15-19; Lk 19:45-48; Jn 2:13-22; see Temple Cleansing). This heavily symbolic action may be more than a reaction to the excesses and the corruption involved in the system. The moneychangers, the animal sellers and of course the animals themselves are necessary if the system is to function at all. Driving them out may therefore symbolize a rejection of not only the corruption associated with the sale of sacrificial animals but also the sacrificial system itself. The Temple functions rightly not as place of sacrifice but as a "house of prayer" (Mk 11:17 and par.). The Temple is a convenient and appropriate place for worship but, inasmuch as the sacrificial system is no longer valid in the new age inaugurated by the life, death (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection* of Jesus Christ, it is not an essential place for worship of the God of Israel.*

Perhaps this last point is best symbolized by the rending of the veil of the Temple at the moment of Jesus' death on the cross (Mt 27:31; Mk 15:38; Lk 23:45). The old system with its limited and carefully regulated means of access to God has died. The Gospels and indeed the NT as a whole have a new and utterly different world view with respect to the relationship between God and humanity. The distinction between the sacred and the common is radically altered, not by the decrease of the realm of the holy as in modern secularization, but in the sacralization of that which had formerly been considered common (cf. Acts 10 and the Letter to the Hebrews). All human religious practices are diminished in significance because the new age is breaking into the world in Jesus Christ Old practices are therefore necessary no longer; old ways of speaking about the worship of God no longer suffice (see Kingdom of God).

One's estimate of the accuracy of these various reports concerning the worship attitudes and practices of Jesus will be very much influenced by one's general attitude with respect to the historical reliability of the Gospels (see Gospels [Historical Reliability]). There is a considerable consistency between the reports about the attitudes and practices of Jesus on the one hand and those of the early church on the other. This would render these reports suspect in the eyes of a critic devoted to the criterion of dissimilarity (the principle that suggests one may safely accept as historical primarily those sayings or reports that are dissimilar from both the Jewish background of Jesus' time and from the teaching or practices of the later church; see Form Criticism). The application of the criterion seems out of place in this instance, however. While one may doubt the historicity of specific pericopes, there seems no reason to doubt the accuracy of the genera) picture of Jesus' practices and attitudes with respect to worship presented by the Gospels.

2. The Worship of the Early Church.

The Gospels also provide us with information concerning the worship of the early church or, to put it more precisely, with the early churches known by the Evangelists. It is important not to speak with excessive precision regarding the worship of the early church. The NT era is marked by a very considerable diversity in many areas of Christian life, including worship. Moreover, one may not safely read back into the first century practices and attitudes typical of the third century, an era concerning which our knowledge of worship practices is more extensive. Generalizations concerning worship in this period are both difficult and dangerous.

It is also reasonably clear that early Christian worship owes much to Jewish worship, especially that of the synagogue. Recent scholarship is not, however, willing to speak about Jewish liturgical forms and practices in the NT era as precisely as did a previous generation.

With some caution, however, a few observations may be made with respect to early Christian worship. Some passages in the Gospels may come from the worship of the early church. The Gospels may, for example, provide several examples of early Christian praise. In the infancy narratives of the Gospel of Luke we find three magnificent psalms of praise, the songs of Mary (Lk 1:46-55; see Mary's Song), of Zechariah (1:68-79; see Zechariah's Song) and of Simeon (Lk 2:29-32; see Simeon's Song). These are identified by many scholars as hymns of the early Jewish-Christian church inserted by Luke to enrich his narrative. These hymns are so Jewish in their vocabulary and form that it is difficult to prove beyond reasonable doubt that they are in fact Christian. The Jewishness of these psalms suggests, as one might expect, that Jewish Christians, at least, continued to offer praise in much the same manner as they had always done.

One may recall at this point the manner in which the Evangelists speak so acceptingly of synagogues with little of the ambivalence one notices with respect to the Temple. The word synagogue is sometimes actually used to describe the assemblies of Christians (cf. Jas 2:2 and various extra-canonical sources). All this may tend to support, though it cannot prove, the contention that early Christian worship was in many ways a continuation of Jewish worship.

Luke's hymns are not the only examples of praise in the Gospel. The angelic (see Angels) acclamation of Luke 2:14 and the various forms of the human acclamation at Jesus' entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21:9 and par.; see Triumphal Entry) are other examples of the explosion of praise that seems to have accompanied the early years of Christianity. These ejaculations of praise, perhaps best labelled "victory shouts," are not dissimilar to certain fragments of praise in the Book of Revelation. Perhaps all these materials are clues to the kind of praise offered in the first years of Christianity.

The prolog to the Fourth Gospel (Jn 1:1-18) probably contains another early hymn. Scholars differ as to the exact extent of the original hymn embedded in these verses (at least the references to John the Baptist are interpolated by the Evangelist) but widely agree that a hymn is actually present. In this case praise overlaps with confession of faith. Communities define themselves by means of the praise they offer as well as by the doctrines they profess. This impressive hymn may have functioned in precisely that manner for the community of the Beloved Disciple (see John, Gospel of).

With respect to prayer there also appears to be a continuity between material in the Gospels and the practice of the early church. The Lord's Prayer (see Prayer) was certainly used by early Christians. The Didache, an early Christian manual of instruction, provides a version of the Prayer almost identical to Matthew's, and enjoins repetition of the Prayer three times a day. This appears to be a continuation of the practice of pious Jews who recited the Tephillah three times daily. We know, likewise, that early Christians followed Jesus' example in addressing God as "Abba," Father (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6).

The accounts of the Last Supper (Mt 26:26-30; Mk 14:22-26; Lk 22:14-23; cf. 1 Cor 11:23-25; see Last Supper) reflect in their variety not only the events of the night before the crucifixion but also the eucharistic practices of the Evangelists' churches. For example, Mark and Matthew have separate prayers over both bread and cup, whereas in Luke and in Paul the two prayers were apparently combined into one prayer of thanksgiving, the pattern that has endured in the liturgies of later centuries. It also appears that the actual words of interpretation, "This is my body were not part of the prayers themselves, as in many later liturgies, but were associated with the sharing of the elements themselves. The words are addressed to the disciples rather than to God (note the second-person-plural verb forms). Moreover, in each case the words for prayer (either eucharisteō, "to give thanks," or eulogeō, "to bless"; the two appear to be synonymous in this context) are aorist participles. This form, which normally indicates the action of the participle, precedes the action of the main verbs of the sentence.

3. The Gospels and Jewish Lectionaries.

Various scholars have advanced in different forms a remarkable theory that the Gospels were shaped and some of their pericopes created to meet the needs of Christian worship. The theory begins with the unchallenged observation that Christian churches appear to have continued the synagogue practice of reading and interpreting the Torah and the Prophets. It is then argued that the churches also observed the Jewish sacred calendar and followed a fixed Jewish lectionary. The Evangelists, it is affirmed, ordered the various pericopes of the Gospels not according to the life of the historical Jesus nor according to their own theological programs but according to the texts of the Law and Prophets of the hypothetical lectionary. So, to give but one example, the Emmaus road story of Luke 24, in which the risen Christ eats with two unknowing disciples, corresponds to the hypothetical reading of Genesis 18—22 on the fourth Sabbath of the month of Nisan, chapters which include accounts of the Lord, under the form of three men, eating with both Abraham and the unknowing Lot. In some cases, it is alleged, the Evangelists created pericopes of the Gospels according to the rather elastic rules of midrash,* a Jewish method of interpretation of Scripture, to provide correspondences in the life of Christ to the prescribed readings of the day (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

The hypothesis is daring and far-ranging. In some cases most of the NT and large sections of the OT are explained according to this principle. The hypothesis has not met with wide approval, however. The exact shape of Jewish lectionaries of the period and the degree to which they were fixed is uncertain. The reconstructions employed are therefore highly speculative. When one comes to examine particular Gospel passages OT texts other than the supposed lectionary readings often seem to be more clearly connected with the passages in question. Some proponents ignore evidence accumulated over decades of painstaking scholarship of sources underlying our Gospels and grant a degree of creativity to the Evangelists that few have found likely (see Form Criticism). In short the hypothesis is more ingenious than it is persuasive.

ZECHARIAH'S SONG

The first two chapters of Luke's Gospel set forth the circumstances surrounding the birth of both Jesus (see Birth of Jesus) and John the Baptist (see John the Baptist). The account is carefully crafted in the form of a diptych to display both a parallelism between the two figures and the subordination of John to Jesus. Zechariah's song (Lk 1:68-79), also known as the Benedictus, is one of the most striking features of those segments of the infancy narratives which deal with John the Baptist.

The hymn functions in two ways, as a hymn praising God* (w. 68-75 and perhaps 78-79) and as a prophecy (see Prophet and Prophecy) concerning the destiny and task of the infant John the Baptist (w. 76-77). As such it parallels very closely Simeon's Song (Lk 2:29-32; see Simeon's Song) and Simeon's prophecy concerning the infant Jesus (Lk 2:34-35). In both cases pious aged men, representative of the best in Israel* praise God upon the fulfillment of a promise and declare the future work of the special child in question. The pattern of Luke's concern is clear—promise, sign of fulfillment and praise—a pattern repeated with respect to both Mary's Song (see Mary's Song) and Simeon's Song.

The origin of the hymn is disputed. Some conservative scholars maintain that this and the other hymns of the infancy narratives were composed by the persons named in the narrative, in this case Zechariah. Others credit the hymn to Luke himself, believing that the Evangelist, like his Greek historian models, felt free to place appropriate speeches in the mouths of his characters. Still others believe that this hymn and the John the Baptist sections of the narrative originated in circles of disciples* who venerated John as the Messiah. The purpose of this part of the Gospel, according to this theory, would be to persuade those people to recognize Jesus as the true Messiah (see Christ). Others believe that the hymn originated in an early Jewish-Christian community and was inserted by the Evangelist to enrich his narrative.

It does appear that the hymn praises God for the advent of a Messiah of David's line (see Son of David), "He has raised up a horn of salvation in the house of David his servant" (v. 69). Moreover, the anatolē, or "dayspring," of verse 78, a difficult word which contains within its range of meaning reference both to the sprouting up of a plant and the rising of a star, seems to refer to the "sprout" or "root" of David (Jer 23:5; cf. Zech 3:8; 6:12). The images are combined in Revelation 22:16 in which the exalted Christ declares, "I am the root and offshoot of David, the bright morning star." The hymn seems an answer to those hopes later formalized in the fifteenth benediction of the great synagogue* prayer,* the eighteen benedictions (šmōneh 'ešrēh), "Let the shoot of David speedily spring up and raise his horn in Your Salvation. . . . May you be blessed, O Lord, who lets the horn of salvation flourish." A reference to the coming of Jesus seems clearly indicated, making a Baptist origin unlikely.

The question of the original language of the hymn is also disputed. The favored options at present are Greek, whether by the Evangelist himself or a Jewish-Christian community or, on the other hand, Hebrew (see Languages of Palestine). There is likewise a dispute over the form and extent of the hymn. Among scholars one can find support for the position that the hymn is a unity as it stands at present, that the hymn concludes at verse 75, with verses 76-79 added at a later point, and that verses 76 and 77 are insertions by Luke into a freestanding hymn comprising the present verses 68-75 and 78-79.

In form the hymn resembles those hymns of praise that thank God for salvation accomplished. The introductory word of praise, "Blessed is . . . ," is a particularly common Jewish prayer and praise of the period. A striking parallel is the "Hymn of the Return" from Qumran (1QM 14), the hymn to be sung when God has given the faithful community its decisive victory over the power of evil. Perhaps those who first loved and used this hymn believed that the coming of Jesus Christ represented the ultimate victory of God in the long struggle against evil. The hymnic portions of this psalm, verses 68-75 and 78-79, are heavily influenced by the language of the OT, so much so as almost to be a mosaic of allusions (see Old Testament in the Gospels). The similarities in the prophecy concerning John the Baptist, verses 76-77, are, on the other hand, to the Synoptic description of the Baptist Zechariah's Song proclaims a vision of a God who has never forgotten the people, who has promised to Abraham* and to all the forebears a consummation of a worship-filled peace, untroubled by enemies and without fear. This people is apparently Israel; there is at this point no distinction between Christian and Jew. This long-promised time now has drawn near in the miraculous birth of the infant John and, still more definitively, in the advent of the one whose coming it will be the task of the adult John to proclaim. The hymn praises with an overflowing heart the "tender mercies of our God" (v. 78; see Mercy), whose will it is to "guide our feet into the way of peace" (v. 79; see Peace). As such the hymn is one of the most magnificent examples of the explosion of praise of God that surrounded the coming of Jesus Christ and is testimony to Luke's theology of the significance of the coming of Jesus Christ.

What New Testament scholars are saying about the

DICTIONARY OF JESUS AND THE GOSPELS

"A splendid achievement! This volume fills a large gap in recent literature on the Gospels and their christologies . . . [and] will take its place on the shelf and desk of all alert ministers, hard-pressed students and even circumspect professors!"

Ralph P. Martin, Fuller Theological Seminary

"What James Hastings's famous Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels did for the early twentieth century, IVP's stunning Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels has done for the late twentieth and early twenty-first century—provide an authoritative treatment of all the major historical and theological themes found in the four Gospels. . . . The Dictionary will prove a splendid tool not only for pastors and teachers, but also for students and laypersons."

Murray J. Harris, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School

"I am impressed by the breadth of research and the care with which evidence is weighed and conclusions are stated.... This volume makes readily available virtually all of the relevant data and presents summaries of the major conclusions that characterize contemporary Gospel scholarship."

Paul J. Achtemeier, Union Theological Seminary, Virginia

"The DJG is a superb resource. Because these excellent articles are limited to Jesus and the Gospels, they can be much longer than is typically the case in reference works. The contributors represent the finest contemporary scholarship and are often among the leading authorities on the subjects they have been assigned. This is a reference volume that every serious student of the Gospels will be grateful to own and use."

Donald A. Hagner, Fuller Theological Seminary

"The Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels offers the pastor, the serious layperson and the theological student a marvelous summary of recent biblical scholarship as it is helpful for the study of the four-fold gospel... .."
This volume can be enthusiastically recommended to all who desire to gain a better informed understanding of the New Testament writings."

W. Ward Gasque, Pacific Association for Theological Studies

"This reference work harvests the fruit of the best contemporary evangelical scholarship on the Gospels. Students who seek a responsible, critically conservative perspective on the Gospel traditions will find a rich source of information here. The up-to-date selective bibliographies make this volume especially valuable as a teaching tool."

Richard B. Hays, Duke Divinity School
The Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels is unique among reference books on the Bible, the first volume of its kind since James Hastings published his Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels in 1909. In the century since Hastings wrote, our understanding of Jesus, the Evangelists and their world has grown remarkably. New interpretive methods have illumined the text, the ever-changing profile of modern culture has put new questions to the Gospels, and our understanding of the Judaism of Jesus’ day has advanced in ways that could not have been predicted in Hastings’ day. But for many readers of the Gospels the new outlook on the Gospels remains hidden within technical journals and academic monographs.

The Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels bridges the gap between scholars and those pastors, teachers, students and laypeople desiring in-depth treatment of select topics in an accessible and summary format. The topics range from cross-sectional themes (such as faith, law, Sabbath) to methods of interpretation (such as form criticism, redaction criticism, sociological approaches), from key events (such as the birth, temptation and death of Jesus) to each of the four Gospels as a whole. Some articles—such as the Dead Sea Scrolls, rabbinic traditions and revolutionary movements at the time of Jesus—provide significant background information to the Gospels. Others reflect recent and less familiar issues in Jesus and Gospel studies, such as divine man, ancient rhetoric and the chreia.

Contemporary concerns of general interest are discussed in articles covering such topics as healing, the demonic and the historical reliability of the Gospels. And for those entrusted with communicating the message of the Gospels, there is an extensive article on preaching from the Gospels.

The Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels presents the fruit of evangelical New Testament scholarship at the end of the twentieth century—committed to the authority of Scripture, utilizing the best of critical methods, and maintaining dialogue with contemporary scholarship and challenges facing the church.
